The Harvard Law School Human Rights Program, founded in 1984, fosters coursework; the participation of students in human rights activities through practical involvement as well as scholarly research and writing; and assistance to the world-wide human rights community. The Program forges cooperative links with a range of human rights workers, scholars and organizations from all parts of the world through its student summer internships, visiting fellows (scholars and activists), speakers, applied research and clinical work. HRP also plans and directs roundtables and conferences on human rights issues and publishes the resulting reports and analyses. These publications, together with a brochure describing HRP's activities, its newsletter and other related documents, are available at the HRP web site (indicated below) or upon request.

The Center for the Study of Developing Countries, established in February 1995, is Egypt's first institution committed to the undertaking of multidisciplinary research on the question of development, broadly defined, with human rights at the core of its concept of development. In order to accomplish this mission, it carries out research on various economic, social, cultural and political dimensions of development. It disseminates the findings of its research activities through a variety of publications in Arabic and English, conferences, workshops and public lectures. It strives to set an example of the participatory approach in the design and implementation of development projects by bringing together trade unionists, business people, government officials and academics to debate strategies and current problems of development. It strives also to promote exchange of views and experiences with research centers with similar concerns in other countries.
