ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This volume derives from lectures delivered at Yeshiva University as Benjamin Gottesman Lectures, a series established by Mr. Gottesman's family on the occasion of his seventieth birthday and in recognition of his long interest in the university of which he has been a trustee for more than fifty years.

According to the university's announcement, Gottesman Lectures are intended to be of "scholarly and creative significance" and should "broaden the focus of academic inquiry and explore implications for larger intellectual and social problems." The charge was challenging, and I was grateful for the opportunity.
