In relation to both Hopu and Vakoumé the question arises whether, when Article 27 ICCPR does not apply because of a ‘reservation’, provisional measures clearly aiming at preventing irreparable harm to the cultural integrity of a group could be linked to the right to family life and privacy (Article 23) rather than to the group’s right to enjoy its own culture under Article 27. Even if ‘family’ and ‘privacy’ are interpreted in the context of the petitioners’ culture, as they should in light of different cultural notions about these concepts, the texts of these articles still relate to an individual right and not the right of a group. The dissenters in Hopu may be correct in noting that the petitioners had failed to provide sufficient information to justify a finding of a violation of the right to family.¹⁶⁹ This could be different if the petitioners had specified why in their culture the concept of ‘family’ included the ancestors of their ethnic or cultural group. In other words, why it was important not only to respect their ancestral burial grounds as part of their culture but also as part of their family life.¹⁷⁰ Kingsbury notes that the Committee did ‘not specify the analytical structure and limits of the concepts’ on which it relied. He gives a ‘speculative explanation of the Committee’s unarticulated premises’, namely that it ‘was drawing sustenance from the developing international commitment to rights of indigenous peoples’.¹⁷¹ He also draws attention to ‘the wider problem for the Committee of whether to enunciate only standards capable of global application or to try to nudge some governments in a positive direction where wishes of the larger group of beneficiaries relevant in this type of provisional measure involving rights with collective aspects. However, any doubts about the location of ancestral tombs could have been addressed with further questions. See further Chapter XIII, section 4 on representation and consultation and Chapter XV on assessment of risk. The HRC declared the case inadmissible for non-exhaustion of domestic remedies. The petitioners had not awaited the outcome of the appeal and the Committee could not accept ‘counsel’s contention that given that the construction has already been completed, the courts would no longer be able to guarantee an appropriate remedy’. It noted that review of its decision was possible upon receipt of a written request containing information to the effect that the reasons for inadmissibility no longer applied.

¹⁶⁸ HRC Vakoumé and 28 other persons v. France, 31 October 2000 (inadm.), §3.2.

¹⁶⁹ Scheinin (2000) takes a more positive attitude towards the decision in Hopu. He discusses various aspects of the case in pp. 217-222. See also Donders (2001), pp. 187-188, observing that Article 27 would have been the most appropriate provision, while the use of Articles 17 and 23 ‘may appear to be far less tenable’. Nevertheless, now that Article 27 was declared inadmissible it was important to find a ‘creative solution’ so that ‘France could not avoid dealing with cases concerning cultural aspects of minority rights’. ‘Such an approach is allowed considering the cohesion of human rights, especially in relation to the protection of cultural identity’. See in general Chapter VII of her book and, in particular, pp. 340-341 discussing the emergence of cultural identity as a principle of human rights law, referring to a ‘freedom of cultural identity’ reflecting a ‘more dynamic approach’ and implying ‘the right to change cultural identity’.

¹⁷⁰ One might think of a situation in which clan names are personal genealogical names that are used as lineage and family names and that are sometimes counted and memorised for up to sixty generations. Among Hani and Akha, for instance, it is reported that such a system underlines the alliance of transfer of knowledge and is necessary for their survival. The ancestors’ service and the complicated customary rules related to it is considered ‘the ideology and the backbone of the ethnic alliance system’. They honour their ancestors nine to twelve times each year in ceremonies marking important occasions. Each family in the village performs these ceremonies in honour of its ‘line of life’. In such context one could envisage that the concept of family in itself would be such as to include all the ancestors in this line and still have a discrete meaning. See e.g. the information provided at <www.hani-akha.org> (consulted 2 November 2002).

¹⁷¹ Kingsbury (2001), p. 242.

the local political and legal climate is receptive'. He considers that it had pursued the latter strategy in this case 'with some success'.¹⁷²

While the petitioners necessarily were individuals (to satisfy the requirements of the OP) it is clear that the provisional measures used in cases involving indigenous culture have aimed at preserving the collective aspects of their rights. It turns out, however, that in Hopu the HRC found a violation of an article in which the collective aspect does not prevail. Still it would have made sense for the Rapporteur to use provisional measures in this case. After all, at the time of his decision on provisional measures he could not have known that the HRC would decide not to deal with Articles 27 or 18 ICCPR.¹⁷³

From the decision in Hopu onwards the use of provisional measures in similar circumstances (only involving Articles 23 claims) would be less opportune, as long as there is no prospect of the Committee changing its attitude towards the French declaration about Article 27. This could only be different if, for instance, the HRC considers that the cultural integrity of ethnic Polynesians as an indigenous people is subsumed in the concept of family and privacy to the extent that the rights to family life and privacy are not individual rights alone. If, moreover, the HRC considers that provisional measures protecting the very existence of individuals or groups should not only be used to prevent irreparable harm to life (Article 6), personal integrity (Article 7) or the cultural survival of an indigenous group (Article 27) but also to prevent irreversible situations in relation to other rights, this could equally explain its use of provisional measures in new cases against France involving cultural issues.¹⁷⁴ In that case the HRC should specify this.

The UN Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD) has confirmed the importance of the relation of indigenous peoples with their lands. It has especially called upon States parties to the Convention on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination 'to recognize and protect the rights of indigenous peoples to own, develop, control and use their communal lands, territories and resources and, where they have been deprived of their lands and territories traditionally owned or otherwise inhabited or used without their free and informed consent, to take steps to return those lands and territories'.¹⁷⁵

The Inter-American Commission and Court have been increasingly specific on the collective rights of indigenous peoples.¹⁷⁶ In the early 1990s several organizations petitioned the CIDH on behalf of the Huaorani people.¹⁷⁷ They asserted an imminent threat because oil exploitation

¹⁷² Id., p. 243. According to counsel in Hopu and Bessert the French government had not been that receptive, see Chapter XVII on the official responses by addressee States.

¹⁷³ See Chapter XIV on the relationship with admissibility and jurisdiction on the merits.

¹⁷⁴ This is further discussed in Chapter XII (Other situations) and Conclusion Part II.

¹⁷⁵ CERD General Recommendation XXIII on the rights of indigenous peoples, A/52/18, annex V, §5 (adding that this right to restitution should only be substituted by the right to just, fair and prompt compensation only when such restitution factually is impossible. In that case the compensation 'should as far as possible take the form of lands and territories').

¹⁷⁶ Already in 1973 the Inter-American Commission, dealing with a petition on behalf of the Aché people in Paraguay (case 1802), discussed the issue of the refusal to recognize collectively owned lands and other rights 'of a clearly collective nature'. In the Miskitos case against Nicaragua the Commission confirmed the collective right of the Miskitos to determine the form of ownership and use of their ancestral lands. In 1985 the Commission recognized the collective rights of the Yamomami and recommended Brazil, among others, to demarcate their lands. On these cases see CIDH 'The human rights situation of the indigenous people in the Americas', OEA/Ser.L/V/II.108, Doc. 62, 20 October 2000, Chapter III (6A).

¹⁷⁷ The petition, dated 1 June 1990, was filed by the Confederación de Nacionalidades Indígenas de la Amazonía Ecuatoriana (CONFENIAE) on behalf of the Huaorani People. Hearings on the petition were held on 20 September 1991 and 4 October 1993. The Organización de la Nacionalidad Huaorani de la Amazonia Ecuatoriana (ONHAE) became a co-petitioner in September of 1992.

activities within their traditional lands would irreparably harm them, threatening their physical and cultural survival. It was this petition that prompted the Commission's visit to Ecuador in 1997. In its report of this visit the Commission refers several times to the importance of ensuring cultural survival. It observed that for indigenous peoples the 'continued utilization of traditional systems for the control and use of territory are essential to their survival, as well as to their individual and collective well-being'.¹⁷⁸

In the more recent case of the Dann Sisters v. US (2002) the Inter-American Commission pointed out on the merits that 'the provisions of the American Declaration should be interpreted and applied (...) with due regard to the particular principles of international human rights law governing the individual and collective interests of indigenous peoples'.¹⁷⁹ Thus States must take special measures to ensure recognition of the particular and collective interest of indigenous people in the use of their traditional lands and resources.¹⁸⁰

In this case, in which it had previously used precautionary measures, it found on the merits that the US had failed to ensure the right to property of the Dannels under conditions of equality. They should be provided with an effective remedy 'in a manner that considers both the collective and individual nature of the property rights that the Dannels may claim in the Western Shoshone ancestral lands' 'The process must also allow for [their] full and informed participation in the determination of their claims'.¹⁸¹

In a case involving the Mopan and Ke'kchi Maya people of the Toledo District of Southern Belize the Commission also dealt with claims regarding certain lands and natural resources. The Commission noted the development in international human rights law that indigenous human rights 'are frequently exercised and enjoyed by indigenous communities in a collective manner, in the sense that they can only be properly ensured through their guarantee to an indigenous people as a whole'. In the context of the right to property, which 'has been recognized as one of the rights having such a collective aspect',¹⁸² the Commission has noted that 'the organs of the Inter-American human rights system have acknowledged that indigenous peoples enjoy a particular relationship with the lands and resources traditionally occupied and used by them'.¹⁸³ Through this relationship 'those lands and resources are considered to be owned and enjoyed by the in-¹⁷⁸ Report on the Situation of Human Rights in Ecuador, Chapter IX, Human rights issues of special relevance for the indigenous inhabitants of the country, OEA/Ser.L/V/II.96, Doc. 10 rev. 1, 24 April 1997. UN sub-commission Rapporteur Daes has pointed out: 'The very survival of indigenous peoples is at risk owing to the continuing threats to their lands, territories and resources'. Final working paper prepared by the Special Rapporteur, Mrs. Erica-Irene A. Daes, Indigenous peoples and their relationship to land, E/CN.4/Sub.2/2001/21, 11 June 2001, §119.

¹⁷⁹ CIDH Mary and Carrie Dann v. US, 27 December 2002, §131, referring, among others, to 'legal recognition of their varied and specific forms and modalities of their control, ownership, use and enjoyment of territories and property' and emphasizing mutual consent.

¹⁸⁰ Relevant provisions of the American Declaration in this respect include Article II (the right to equality under the law), Article XVIII (the right to a fair trial), and Article XXIII (the right to property). The Commission also referred to Article XVIII Draft American Declaration on the Rights of indigenous Peoples, stipulating the protection of traditional forms of ownership, the right to land and resources and, more generally, cultural survival. It noted that this Declaration had not yet been approved by the OAS General Assembly, but that 'the basic principles reflected in many of the provisions of the Declaration, including aspects of Article XVIII, reflect general international principles developing out of and applicable inside and outside of the inter-American system and to this extent are properly considered in interpreting and applying the provisions of the American Declaration in the context of indigenous peoples'. CIDH Mary and Carrie Dann v. US, 27 December 2002, §129.

¹⁸¹ CIDH Mary and Carrie Dann v. US, 27 December 2002, §§171-173.

¹⁸² CIDH Maya Indigenous Communities of the Toledo District (Belize), 12 October 2004, §113.

¹⁸³ Id., §114.

indigenous community as a whole and according to which the use and enjoyment of the land and its resources are integral components of the physical and cultural survival of the indigenous communities and the effective realization of their human rights more broadly' (footnotes omitted).¹⁸⁴ The Commission also noted that it has stressed the need for States to protect the rights of indigenous peoples to their ancestral territories not only in its decisions on the merits in individual cases, but also in its reports on the general situation of human rights in the OAS members States and in its use of precautionary measures.¹⁸⁵ The right to property under the American Declaration, it has pointed out, 'must be interpreted and applied in the context of indigenous communities with due consideration of principles relating to the protection of traditional forms of ownership and cultural survival and rights to land, territories and resources'.¹⁸⁶

The Inter-American Court has equally developed a broad concept of property (under Article 21 ACHR), mindful of the communal ownership by indigenous groups. In the landmark case Awas Tingni (2001), which was decided before the Commission's decision on the merits in the aforementioned Belize case, it determined that Article 21 ACHR also protects 'the rights of members of the indigenous communities within the framework of communal property'.¹⁸⁷ "As a result of customary practices, possession of land should suffice for indigenous communities lacking real title to property of the land to obtain official recognition of that property, and for consequent registration".¹⁸⁸

It specifically elaborated on the close ties between indigenous peoples and their lands:

"Among indigenous peoples there is a communitarian tradition regarding a communal form of collective property of the land, in the sense that ownership of the land is not centred on an individual but rather on the group and its community. Indigenous groups, by the fact of their very existence, have the right to live freely in their own territory; the close ties of indigenous people with the land must be recognized and understood to have one basis of their cultures, their spiritual life, their integrity, and their economic survival. For indigenous communities, relations to the land are not merely a matter of possession and production but a material and spiritual element which they must fully enjoy, even to preserve their cultural legacy and transmit it to future generations".¹⁸⁹

It concluded that the State must 'carry out the delimitation, demarcation, and titling of the territory belonging to the Community'. Lack thereof had created a 'climate of constant uncertainty among the members of the Awas Tingni Community, insofar as they do not know for certain how far their communal property extends geographically and, therefore, they do not know until where they can freely use and enjoy their respective property'.¹⁹⁰ Until this delimitation the State should abstain from actions 'that might lead the agents of the State itself, or third parties acting with its acquiescence or its tolerance, to affect the existence, value, use of enjoyment of the property located in the geographical area where the members of the Community live and carry out their activities'.¹⁹¹ In Moiwana Village v. Suriname (2005) the Court also found that the State was to adopt measures to ensure their property rights, including 'the creation of an effective mechanism for the delimitation, demarcation and titling' of these traditional territories. The remains of the community members killed in November 1986 were to be delivered to the surviving community

¹⁸⁴ Id., § 114.

¹⁸⁵ Id., § 115.

¹⁸⁶ Id., § 115.

¹⁸⁷ IACHR Awas Tingni v. Nicaragua, 31 August 2001, § 148.

¹⁸⁸ Id., § 151.

¹⁸⁹ Id., § 149.

¹⁹⁰ Id., § 153.

¹⁹¹ Ibid.

members.¹⁹² Among others this case is interesting as it concerns not an indigenous people, strictly speaking, as being indigenous to the region, but a community that settled in Moiwana in the 19th century and developed a 'profound and all-encompassing relationship to their ancestral lands'.¹⁹³

In Yakye Axa Indigenous Community v. Paraguay (2005) the Court specifically noted that not just the 'right to community property of the indigenous communities over their traditional territories' but also over the 'natural resources linked to their culture' in fact correlated with the term 'goods' in Article 21 ACHR.¹⁹⁴ The Court concluded that the State had failed to guarantee the rights of the members of the Community to common property, which had affected their right to a dignified life, as they were unable to gain access to their traditional means of subsistence, the use of natural resources necessary to obtain clean water and for the practice of traditional medicine.¹⁹⁵ Among others the Court paid attention to the position of persons of age suffering from chronic diseases and the obligation of States to alleviate suffering. It noted that among the Yakye Axa mainly the elderly have the task to tell the stories and pass on the culture to the younger generations.¹⁹⁶ This indicates an awareness of the importance of cultural practices and the obligation to ensure cultural survival. The majority considered the State was not responsible for the death of 16 members of the Yakye Axa community.¹⁹⁷ Yet it did find that the State had violated Article 4(1) with respect to the surviving community members. It ordered a range of reparations, including a public act acknowledging responsibility,¹⁹⁸ the demarcation of their traditional land and, in the meantime, provision of the basic services necessary for a life in dignity.¹⁹⁹

The next year the Court dealt with the case of the Sawhoyamaxa (2006), an indigenous group in circumstances largely similar to those of the Yakye Axa. The Court found that their right to property, life, personal integrity and legal personality had been violated. It held the State responsible for failure to prevent the deaths of 19 children and one adult.²⁰⁰ In addition to forms of reparation similar to those ordered in Yakye Axa the Court also ordered to put in place a program of registration and documentation.²⁰¹

It has been noted that cultural identity can be seen as a component or aggregate of the right to life proper.²⁰² For indigenous peoples this is closely related to their ancestral lands. When they ¹⁹² IACHR Moiwana Village v. Suriname, 15 June 2005. Among others the Court had found that the State had violated the freedom of movement and residence of the community members (Article 22 ACHR) and the right to property (Article 21) in relation to the traditional territories from which they were expelled. Generally on this case see Martin (2006).

¹⁹³ IACHR Moiwana Village v. Suriname, 15 June 2005, §132.

¹⁹⁴ IACHR Comunidad Indígena Yakye Axa v. Paraguay, Order of 16 June 2005, §§137 and 154. In this case the CIDH had used precautionary measures in September 2001. In March 2003 the Commission had submitted this case, in which it had used precautionary measures, to the Inter-American Court. It noted that the Community's territorial claims had been under litigation since 1993. It had been 'impossible for the community and its members to assert ownership and possession of their territory'. 'As a result of the situation, the community has been kept in a situation of nutritional, medical and sanitary deprivation that poses a constant threat to the survival of its members and the integrity of the community'. CIDH Press release 30/03, October 2003, §15.

¹⁹⁵ IACHR Comunidad Indígena Yakye Axa v. Paraguay, 16 June 2005, §168.

¹⁹⁶ Id., §175.

¹⁹⁷ Id., §177. See also the dissents by Judges Abreu Burelli, Cançado Trindade and Ventura Robles.

¹⁹⁸ IACHR Comunidad Indígena Yakye Axa v. Paraguay, 16 June 2005, §226 (specifying the accessibility and reach of the public event).

¹⁹⁹ Id., §221. See also 6 February 2006 (Interpretation of judgment).

²⁰⁰ IACHR Comunidad Indígena Sawhoyamaxa v. Paraguay, 29 March 2006, §178. See also the individual opinions of judges Ventura Robles and Cançado Trindade.

²⁰¹ IACHR Comunidad Indígena Sawhoyamaxa v. Paraguay, 29 March 2006.

²⁰² Id., Individual Opinion Judge Cançado Trindade, §4.

are forcibly displaced, and thereby uprooted from these lands, this seriously affects their cultural identity and ultimately their right to life in the broad sense.²⁰³ The definite transfer of the communal lands 'is a question of survival of the cultural identity of the members of such Community'.²⁰⁴

The African Commission has also dealt with cases involving indigenous peoples, but rather than to cultural identity it has referred to the (collective) right to health, food and housing. Nevertheless its emphasis on the problems created by forced eviction is in fact particularly relevant in the case of indigenous peoples. In the context of the Ogoni people it has discussed environmental degradation and health problems resulting from the contamination of the environment by oil developments. It has pointed out that Nigeria had clearly violated the legal protection against forced eviction, harassment and other threats. This right to be protected was 'enjoyed by the Ogonis as a collective right'.²⁰⁵ "The survival of the Ogonis depended on their land and farms that were destroyed by the direct involvement of the Government". This impacted not just individual members of the Ogoni, but the life of the 'Ogoni Community as a whole'.²⁰⁶

While the provisions of the African Charter invoked in the Endorois case,²⁰⁷ discussed under section 2, originally may have been intended as equating 'States' and 'peoples' and various governments still take the approach that there are no separate indigenous peoples within African States, the above Ogoni case, the recent special attention by the Commission in its non-litigious activities, such as the introduction of a Working group on Indigenous Populations/

²⁰³ Ibid., §28.

²⁰⁴ IACHR Comunidad Indígena Yakye Axa v. Paraguay, 16 June 2005, §221. See also 6 February 2006 (Interpretation of judgment), Individual Opinion Judge Cançado Trindade, §8.

²⁰⁵ ACHPR The Social and Economic Rights Action Center and the Center for Economic and Social Rights v. Nigeria (Ogoni case), October 2001, §63. Specifically it pointed out that the pollution and environmental degradation had reached a level 'humanly unacceptable', which had made 'living in the Ogoni land a nightmare'. In general about this case see Coomans (2003).

²⁰⁶ ACHPR The Social and Economic Rights Action Center and the Center for Economic and Social Rights v. Nigeria (Ogoni case), October 2001, §67. The Commission noted that it conducted a mission to Nigeria in March 1997 'and witnessed first hand the deplorable situation in Ogoni land including the environmental degradation'. On this case see also e.g. Coomans (2003). The Commission acknowledged that multinational corporations may constitute a potentially positive force for development as long as the State and the people concerned are aware of 'the common good and the sacred rights of individuals and communities'. ACHPR The Social and Economic Rights Action Center and the Center for Economic and Social Rights v. Nigeria (Ogoni case), October 2001, §69. It found Nigeria in violation of a range of rights laid down in the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights.²⁰⁶ It listed actions and abstentions that would help 'ensure protection of the environment, health and livelihood of the people of Ogoniland'. These included 'stopping all attacks on Ogoni communities and leaders by the Rivers State Internal Securities Task Force and permitting citizens and independent investigators free access to the territory' and conducting investigations into human rights violations. Adequate compensation should include 'relief and resettlement assistance to victims of government sponsored raids,' and a 'comprehensive cleanup of lands and rivers damaged by oil operations'. ACHPR The Social and Economic Rights Action Center and the Center for Economic and Social Rights v. Nigeria (Ogoni case), 27 October 2001.

²⁰⁷ In their submission the petitioners had invoked the free practice of religion (Article 8 ACHPR), the right to property (Article 14), to enjoy the best attainable standard of physical and mental health (Article 16) and the right to freely take part in the cultural life of the community (Article 17(2)), the right of all peoples to exist (Article 20(1)), the right of all peoples to freely dispose of their wealth and natural resources (Article 21) and Article 22(1) on development and identity.

Communities,²⁰⁸ and the provisional measures in the Endorois case all indicate that the African Commission itself now considers that indigenous peoples within States may themselves claim group rights. Moreover, considering the right to freely take part in the cultural life of the community and the right of all peoples to exist it becomes clear that ‘the right to enjoy one’s culture cannot be enjoyed if the group no longer exists’.²⁰⁹ This again points at the importance of cultural survival.

In the context of the Bosnia Chamber’s provisional measures it is not surprising that the petitions invoked freedom of religion in Article 9 ECHR,²¹⁰ combined with the prohibition of discrimination. Another relevant article is Article 8 ECHR on the right to privacy and family life. Article 27 ICCPR was not specifically invoked, although the Framework Agreement also refers to the ICCPR.

In a case concerning the aftermath of the destruction of the three mosques in Zvornik, in which the Chamber had used provisional measures several times, on the merits it noted that the right to religion includes the right to create a space for practicing it.²¹¹ It also noted that the prohibition of discrimination is a central objective of the framework Agreement ‘to which it must attach particular importance’.²¹²

²⁰⁸ Triggered, among others, by the Arusha resolutions adopted by indigenous peoples from East, Central and Southern Africa, January 1998, posted at the website of the International Work Group for indigenous Affairs, <www.iwgi.org/sw579.asp>.

²⁰⁹ Murray/Wheatley (2003), p. 222.

²¹⁰ The Chamber has quoted the ECtHR’s qualification of the freedom protected in Article 9 ECHR: “It is, in its religious dimension, one of the most vital elements that go to make up the identity of believers and their conception of life, but it is also a precious asset for atheists, agnostics, sceptics and the unconcerned. The pluralism indissociable from a democratic society, which has been dearly won over the centuries, depends on it”. Bosnia Chamber Islamic Community in BiH v. Republika Srpska, 9 November 2000, §80 quoting ECtHR Kokkinakis v. Greece, 25 May 1993, §31.

²¹¹ Bosnia Chamber Islamic Community in BiH v. Republika Srpska, 9 November 2000, §86, referring to the case of the Banja Luka Mosques, 11 June 1999, §182.

²¹² It was ‘appropriate to have particular regard to the importance of preventing – and if necessary, stopping – discrimination on religious and ethnic grounds in order to enable refugees and displaced persons to return safely to their homes of origin’. Bosnia Chamber Islamic Community in BiH v. Republika Srpska, 9 November 2000, §96. See generally Chapter XI on halting mass expulsion and forced eviction. As a form of reparation it ordered, among others, the respondent Party to allocate a suitable and centrally located building site to replace one of the destroyed Mosques, to remove all market stands and a car park from the site of another destroyed mosque and grant the necessary permit for its reconstruction ‘at the location at which it previously existed’ and, in order to replace the third former mosque, a building site in its vicinity. All of this should be done ‘in consultation with the Islamic Community, and for its use only’. Bosnia Chamber Islamic Community in BiH v. Republika Srpska, 9 November 2000, §§124 and 120-122. More generally on the protection required by provisional measures and their relation with reparation see Chapter XIII (Protection). In the previous case involving Banja Luka (1999) the Chamber ordered Republika Srpska, among others, to allow the petitioner to erect fences around the sites of the 15 destroyed mosques, to refrain from building on the sites, cemeteries, etc. and to swiftly grant them the necessary permits to reconstruct 7 of the mosques at the site where they previously existed. In another case Republika Srpska had ignored the Chamber’s provisional measures and allowed construction of a bank on the site of the destroyed Atik mosque in Bijeljina. Upon the finding of various violations, the Chamber ordered reparation to the effect that the Islamic Community should be granted the necessary permits for the reconstruction of the five mosques and that business facilities were to be removed from these sites. Bosnia Chamber

3.4 Moment of infringement-moment of irreparability

In order to clarify the cases in which the HRC used provisional measures in cases involving cultural rights it is important to refer to the Committee's substantive discussion in Länsman I (inadm. 1994). In this case, involving the Angeli area, the HRC used a specific test to examine whether activities amounted to a denial of cultural rights. Pending the case it had considered the use of provisional measures to be premature.²¹³ It recalled its decision in Kitok v. Sweden (1988) that 'economic activities may come within the ambit of article 27, if they are an essential element of the culture of an ethnic community'.²¹⁴ It then pointed out that the right to enjoy one's culture could not be determined in abstracto but was to be placed in context. It observed that, contrary to the State party's submission, the article did not just protect the traditional means of livelihood of national minorities.²¹⁵ The Committee also confirmed that Mt. Riutusvaara 'continues to have a spiritual significance relevant to their culture'.²¹⁶ Nevertheless, it considered that economic activities with a limited impact would not necessarily amount to a denial of the right to culture.

The HRC used the following test: whether the impact of the (economic) activities is so substantial that it effectively denies the petitioners the right to enjoy their cultural rights.²¹⁷ While it did not find a violation of Article 27, it did point out that in order to comply with this article

The Islamic Community in BiH (former Atik Mosque, Bijeljina) v. Republika Srpska, 6 December 2000, provisional measure of 10 July 1999 and further Order of 7 July 2000 to protect the site of Atik Mosque.

²¹³ HRC Ilmari Länsman v. Finland, 26 October 1994 (inadm.). See further Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction and admissibility). The HRC phrased the issue to be determined on the merits as follows: 'Whether quarrying on the flank of Mt. Etelä-Riutusvaara, in the amount that has taken place until the present time or in the amount that would be permissible under the permit issued to the company which has expressed its intention to extract stone from the mountain (i.e. up to a total of 5000 cubic metres) would violate the authors' rights under article 27 of the Covenant'.

²¹⁴ HRC Ivan Kitok v. Sweden, 27 July 1988, §9.2. See also the discussion under section 3. In General Comment 23 on Article 27 (1994) the HRC refers also to traditional activities such as hunting and fishing, §7.

²¹⁵ "Therefore, that the authors may have adapted their methods of reindeer herding over the years and practice it with the help of modern technology does not prevent them from invoking article 27 of the Covenant". Ilmari Länsman v. Finland, 26 October 1994 (inadm.), §9.3. In other words the HRC explained that the right to enjoy one's culture is not static because this culture itself is not static and cannot be frozen into a specific time capsule. See also Scheinin (2000), p. 169, Meijknecht (2001), p. 96 and Donders (2002), p. 333.

²¹⁶ HRC Ilmari Länsman v. Finland, 26 October 1994 (inadm.), §9.3.

²¹⁷ It also specifically dismissed the State's reliance on a margin of appreciation, such as typically used by the ECtHR. It pointed out that the scope of the State's freedom to encourage development or allow economic activities by enterprises was 'not to be assessed by reference to a margin of appreciation, but by reference to the obligations it has undertaken in article 27'. Still, it showed deference to the State and it did not find a violation of Article 27. Schmidt (1997), p. 338 points out that in fact the HRC did allow the State a certain margin of appreciation. He notes that the Committee 'had to balance the applicants' interests against general economic interests advanced by the Finnish government'. "In both decisions the Committee implicitly granted the state party what amounted to a margin of appreciation in determining whether the applicants' interests had been sufficiently protected, and concluded that their rights had not been violated." Yet, the HRC was unwilling to succumb to the State's arguments about the general economic development. Scheinin (2000), p. 169 points out that the HRC took 'a very cautious position to arguments related to general economic development and well being'. He notes the reference in Kitok to the well being of the Sami minority rather than of the country as a whole. Hence the Committee does give the State considerable leeway when it argues measures are infringing upon individual rights in the interest of the Sami collectivity.

economic activities must be ‘carried out in a way that the authors continue to benefit from reindeer husbandry’.²¹⁸ It also emphasized that if the State were to approve mining activities in the Angeli area on a large scale and if companies with exploitation permits would significantly expand their activities this could in fact constitute a violation of Article 27. The State had a duty to bear this in mind ‘when either extending contracts or granting new ones’.²¹⁹

In relation to the future logging activities, in Länsman II the HRC made a remark clarifying its test for finding a violation of the petitioners’ right to enjoy their own culture. It observed that logging had been approved ‘on a scale which, while resulting in additional work and expenses for the authors and other reindeer herdsman, does not appear to threaten the survival of reindeer husbandry’.²²⁰ This suggests that a threat to the survival of such husbandry would indeed result in a denial of the right to culture. This, in turn, may mean that in Article 27 cases involving infringements on the natural habitat the HRC would only find a violation if there were a threat of irreparable harm (or such harm had already occurred), but not if harm other than irreparable harm would occur. Indeed, in relation to the collective aspects of Article 27 the HRC has only found a violation in cases in which it had previously considered that further actions would result in irreparable harm to indigenous peoples (rather than minorities). While in other situations involving other rights (without collective aspects) it might find violations of a less serious nature for which it would require compensation, thus far it has never done so with regard to collective aspects. In other words, in such cases the HRC is only likely to find a violation in cases in which, at an earlier stage, provisional measures were (or would have been) warranted as well. As we have seen, however, even in cases in which it did use provisional measures, subsequently, on the merits, it did not often find a violation. The HRC has not yet addressed the question when subsequent exploitation of the lands would result in a violation and when such violation would be irreparable.²²¹

3.5 Collective rights and human dignity: special status right to culture of indigenous peoples

Apart from the emphasis on the collective aspects of the right to culture, the special status of indigenous peoples and their right to culture may equally help explain the use of provisional measures by some of the adjudicators. For the HRC this has become apparent in its reference to Article 27 ICCPR in its discussion on reservations and non-derogable rights. The HRC underlined the condition of non-discrimination in Article 4(1) ICCPR (on states of emergency and non-derogable rights) and pointed out that there were elements in Article 27 ICCPR that must be respected in all circumstances, exactly because of their fundamental nature.

Article 27 ICCPR is not listed as one of the non-derogable rights in Article 4 ICCPR, but the HRC has referred to this provision as containing ‘rights of profound importance’.²²² Moreover, it has noted that some elements of provisions not explicitly listed as non-derogable in Arti-

²¹⁸ HRC Ilmari Länsman v. Finland, 26 October 1994 (inadm.), §9.8.

²¹⁹ Ibid.

²²⁰ HRC Länsman II, 30 October 1996, §10.6.

²²¹ The CERD has equally confirmed that measures in relation to the status, use and occupation of traditional lands ‘may cumulatively lead to irreparable harm’ to the indigenous communities involved. CERD Early warning and urgent action procedure decision 1 (68), February-March 2006, §4.

²²² See HRC General Comment 24 on reservations to the ICCPR or the Optional Protocols, 4 November 1994, CCPR/C/21/Rev. 1/Add. 6, §10.

cle 4(2) cannot be derogated from either. In that context it also referred to elements contained in Article 27.²²³

As Anaya points out the HRC has ‘acknowledged the importance of lands and resources to the survival of indigenous cultures’, which implies an acknowledgement of the importance of indigenous self-determination.²²⁴ In its discussion of State reports the HRC can be more flexible than in the individual complaint procedure. Among others, it specifically requests information about compliance with the right to self-determination (Article 1 ICCPR).²²⁵ It has noted that a reservation to Article 1 would be incompatible with the object and purpose of the Covenant.²²⁶

The UN Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD) discusses the rights of indigenous peoples within the general framework of the International Covenant on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (ICERD) and the norm of non-discrimination. It has ‘effectively promoted the integrity and survival of indigenous groups’.²²⁷ Its General Recommendation on the rights of indigenous peoples indicates the special status of the indigenous right to culture, including the right to control and use of their communal lands and resources.²²⁸ Meanwhile, the possibility of CERD taking provisional measures for the first time and doing so in relation to land rights and indigenous culture cannot be ruled out.²²⁹

²²³ HRC General Comment 29 on states of emergency (Article 4), 24 July 2001, § 13(c).

²²⁴ Anaya (1996), p. 104.

²²⁵ See e.g. the discussion in Kingsbury (2001), pp. 206 and pp. 228-229. About the reporting procedure of the Committee in general see Boerefijn (1999). An example is the concern expressed by the HRC that the dam projects on the Biobio River in Chile ‘might affect the way of life and the rights of persons belonging to the Mapuche and other indigenous communities’. Concluding Observations of the HRC in relation to Chile, CCPR/C/79/Add.104 (1999) as referred to by Kingsbury (2001), p. 206. According to Schmidt the incremental approach of the periodic State reporting mechanism ‘tends to yield positive results’ for the promotion of indigenous peoples’ rights. Schmidt (1997), p. 339. Other issues the HRC has emphasised under the reporting mechanism are the importance of land demarcation and the protection of cultural identity against developments such as oil drilling and their collateral effects. See e.g. references in Thornberry (2002), p. 164. The Inter-American Commission on Human Rights intervened in relation to the above situation involving the Bio-Bio river, using precautionary measures: Mercedes Julia Huenteao Beroiza et al. v. Chile, 11 March 2004 (friendly settlement), §§5, 6 and 15.

²²⁶ See HRC General Comment 24 on reservations to the ICCPR or the Optional Protocols, 4 November 1994, CCPR/C/21/Rev. 1/Add. 6, §9. In 2006, in its Concluding Observations to the US report on its compliance with the ICCPR (2006) the HRC also pointed out that the ‘State party should review its policy towards indigenous peoples as regards the extinguishment of aboriginal rights on the basis of the plenary power of Congress regarding Indian affairs and grant them the same degree of judicial protection that is available to the non-indigenous population’. HRC Concluding Observations to the US report, 2006

²²⁷ Anaya (1996), p. 157.

²²⁸ CERD General Recommendation XXIII on the rights of indigenous peoples, 1997, A/52/18, annex V.

²²⁹ More generally authors have advocated increased use by indigenous peoples of the individual petition system under the ICERD, see e.g. Anaya (1996), p. 157 and Dommen (1998), p. 13, pointing out that road and bridge construction projects on lands traditionally belonging to the Wichi, Chorote, Nivakle, Toba and Tapiete communities in Northern Argentina could all be brought before CERD, claiming that their traditional ways of life are threatened because they do not have official title to their lands. Dommen argues that the ‘impacts of environmental harm often fall hardest on individuals or groups suffering discrimination, thus a case brought to CERD regarding environmental discrimination would likely succeed’, p. 23.

It has also taken the historic step to invoke its Early Warning and Urgent Action Procedure on behalf of the abovementioned Western Shoshone peoples who had been unable to resort to the individual complaint procedure under ICERD as the US has not deposited a declaration under Article 14 ICERD.²³⁰ The Committee pointed out that the procedure was ‘clearly distinct from the communication procedure’ under Article 14. “Furthermore, the nature and urgency of the issue examined in this decision go well beyond the limits of the communication procedure”.²³¹

Its decision to invoke the Urgent Action procedure not only indicates a recognition of the special position of indigenous peoples in international law, but also follows up on a decision on the merits by the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights involving specific members of the Western Shoshone, confirming the Commission’s approach to land rights.

CERD was concerned by the State’s position that the Western Shoshone’s ‘legal rights to ancestral lands have been extinguished through gradual encroachment, notwithstanding the fact that the Western Shoshone peoples have reportedly continued to use and occupy the lands and their natural resources in accordance with their traditional land tenure patterns’. Moreover, this position was made on the basis of processes before the former Indian Claims Commission that, and here CERD quoted from the Dann Sisters case by the Inter-American Commission (2002), ‘did not comply with contemporary human rights norms, principles and standards that govern determination of indigenous property interests’.²³²

CERD also referred to ‘(t)he reported resumption of underground nuclear testing on Western Shoshone ancestral lands’ and the lack of consultation, combined with the reported intimidation and harassment ‘through the imposition of grazing fees, trespass and collection notices, impounding of horse and livestock, restrictions on hunting, fishing and gathering, as well as arrests, which gravely disturb the enjoyment of their ancestral lands’.²³³ Among others it urged the State to freeze any plan to privatize their lands, abstain from activities in relation to their natural resources and stop imposing grazing fees etc. until a final settlement was duly reached.²³⁴

²³⁰ CERD Early Warning and Urgent Action Procedure, Decision 1 (68). This is not the first time CERD intervened on information that a State was disregarding its previous recommendations and that indigenous peoples were facing irreparable harm, see e.g. in response to a draft mining Act approved by the Council of Ministers of Suriname, but addressing a range of issues involving notification, prior agreement or informed consent, Decision 1 (67), CERD/C/DEC/SUR/2, 18 August 2005.

²³¹ CERD Early Warning and Urgent Action Procedure, Decision 1 (68), §4. It expressed concern about the lack of action taken by the State upon its 2001 Concluding Observations, in which it had already paid attention to the situation of the Shoshone. CERD Concluding Observations on the US report, A/56/18, 13 August 2001, §400. “Although these are indeed long-standing issues, as stressed by the State party in its letter, they warrant immediate and effective action from the State party”. CERD Early Warning and Urgent Action Procedure, Decision 1 (68), §5. In the background of this decision is the State’s failure to respond to a list of questions, including questions relating to the situation of the Shoshone, sent by the Committee in August 2005 in the context of the State’s periodic reporting obligation (the report had been due in November 2003).

²³² CERD Early Warning and Urgent Action Procedure, Decision 1 (68), §6, quoting from Mary and Carrie Dann v. US, 27 December 2002. It expressed particular concern about reported legislative efforts to privatize the ancestral lands ‘for transfer to multinational extractive industries and energy developers’; destructive activities conducted or planned ‘on areas of spiritual and cultural significance to the Western Shoshone peoples, who are denied access to, and use of, such areas’. It noted the ‘reinvigorated federal efforts to open a nuclear waste repository at the Yucca Mountain; the alleged use of explosives and open pit gold mining activities on Mount Tenabo and Horse Canyon; and the alleged issuance of geothermal energy leases at, or near, hot springs’.

²³³ CERD Early Warning and Urgent Action Procedure, Decision 1 (68), §7.

²³⁴ Id., §§9-10.

The special status of the indigenous peoples' right to culture, or at least the particular vulnerability of indigenous peoples to human rights violations, is also confirmed by the institution of the UN Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights of indigenous people.²³⁵ As noted, in 2007 the UN General Assembly adopted the Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples. Over the years many drafts had circulated, which had already served either as overviews of the developments in the law or otherwise to inspire the case law and the practice of various international bodies.²³⁶ In addition, in the Inter-American system a draft declaration on the rights of indigenous peoples has also played an important role in the development of awareness of the importance of indigenous rights. Moreover, both the Inter-American Commission and the African Commission have introduced Rapporteurs on the rights of Indigenous Peoples as well. Within the European (and Eurasian) region indigenous peoples may resort to the international treaties (ICCPR or CERD), to the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities and the general opinions of its Advisory Committee²³⁷ or to the OSCE High Commissioner on National Minorities. Finally, the Inter-American Court has shown particular sensitivity to indigenous culture in its judgment on reparations.²³⁸

²³⁵ See Resolution 2001/57 of the UN Commission on Human Rights (2001), confirmed by Resolution 6/12 of the UN Human Rights Council (2007). The first Rapporteur was Rodolfo Stavenhagen; the second Rapporteur, since May 2008, is James Anaya.

²³⁶ For a brief overview of the Declaration see e.g. Anaya/Wiessner (2007).

²³⁷ In 2000 the Advisory Committee on the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities made the following observation regarding the Sami in Finland: "Given the importance of reindeer herding, fishing and hunting to the Sami as an indigenous people, the issue of land rights in the Sami Homeland is of central relevance to the protection of Sami culture and their identity. Therefore, the Advisory Committee expresses the wish that the existing dispute over land rights in this area be resolved as expeditiously as possible in a manner that will contribute to the protection of the culture of the Sami without interfering with the rights of the non-Sami population. The Advisory Committee is of the opinion that the central role of the Sami Parliament should be maintained in this process and adequate resources should be secured for the Sami Parliament to carry out its tasks in this sphere. The Advisory Committee further emphasises that, while the issue of land rights is being reviewed, the existing practices relating to the use of the land at issue should be carried out in a manner that does not threaten the maintenance or development of Sami culture or the preservation of their identity. This concerns, inter alia, logging operations administered by the National Board of Forestry". Advisory Committee on the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities, First Opinion on Finland, 22 September 2000, ACFC/INF/OP/I(2001)002, §22. Six years later the Committee expressed particular concern about reports that logging and other activities State Forest Administration 'are in some cases carried out without adequate attention being paid to the maintenance and development of reindeer herding or other aspects of Sami culture, and in a manner that does not sufficiently accommodate the views of the Sami Parliament'. "While acknowledging the importance of forestry to the economy of the municipalities in the Sami Homeland and while being aware that also some Sami are employed in this sector, the Advisory Committee stresses that there is a clear obligation to pursue logging and other related economic activities in a manner that protects the right of the Sami, as an indigenous people, to develop reindeer herding and other elements of their culture. In this context, the Advisory Committee notes with regret that the specific status of Sami as the only constitutionally recognised indigenous people of Finland seems not to be fully comprehended throughout the State Forest Administration staff". Advisory Committee on the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities, Second Opinion on Finland, 2 March 2006, ACFC/OP/II(2006)003, published 20 April 2006, §55.

²³⁸ See e.g. IACHR Aloeboetoe et al. (Suriname), 10 September 1993; Bámaca Velásquez, 22 February 2002; Massacre at Plan de Sánchez (Guatemala), 19 November 2004, Moiwana Community (Suriname), 15 June 2005.

The Inter-American Commission applies not just Inter-American but also international norms in relation to indigenous peoples, including Article 27 ICCPR, in particular when it proposes solutions.²³⁹ Already in 1985 it interpreted Article 27 ICCPR when it recommended Brazil to demarcate and secure the lands of the Yanomami. It referred to the recognition in international law of the right of ethnic groups to special protection 'for all those characteristics necessary for the preservation of their cultural identity'.²⁴⁰ In another case it pointed out that preservation of the cultural identity of an indigenous group should extend to 'the aspects linked to productive organization, which includes, among other things, the issue of ancestral and communal lands'.²⁴¹ The Commission has held this norm 'to cover all aspects of an indigenous group's survival as a distinct culture, understanding culture to include economic or political institutions, land use patterns, as well as language and religious practices'.²⁴²

As Anaya and Williams concluded in 2001, 'rights to lands and resources are property rights that are prerequisites for the physical and cultural survival of indigenous communities, and they are protected by the American Declaration, the American Convention, and other international human rights instruments, such as the Convention of the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination and the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights'.²⁴³

The step is not that great from protecting land rights of indigenous peoples to protecting the right of peoples that have been subjected to ethnic cleansing to respect for their religious sites.

In the Mahmutović case the Chamber had first used provisional measures to 'desist from' implementing the domestic order for the exhumation of his wife from the Muslim cemetery closed by Republica Srpska.²⁴⁴ On the merits it found that Mr Mahmutović had been discriminated against in the enjoyment of his right to private and family life and freedom of religion. It noted that the ordinance to close the cemetery 'affected only the Muslim Cemetery and not the Orthodox or Catholic cemeteries situated nearby'.²⁴⁵ The respondent party had never provided a reason for the closure. It found that the only plausible explanation of the 1994 ordinance prohibiting burials at the Muslim Town Cemetery 'was to contribute to the elimination of all traces of the Muslim population from the town centre of Prnjavor'.²⁴⁶ As part of its decision on the merits it ordered the respondent Party 'to refrain from any steps to remove the remains of Mrs Mahmutović from her place of burial'. In other words the protective measures required as a provisional measure are very similar to those required upon the finding of a violation, except that in the latter case the requirement is more precise.

In another case the Chamber found on the merits that the continued enforcement of a 1994 ordinance putting the Muslim Town Cemetery out of use and prohibiting further burials constituted 'discrimination against the Islamic Community and the Muslim population of Prnjavor in the enjoyment of their right to freely practice religious beliefs'. 'The Chamber therefore deems it appropriate to order the respondent Party to revoke the ordinance' and 'to desist from any further steps of enforcement, such as prohibiting burials at that cemetery or ordering the exhumation of ²³⁹ See e.g. the references by Anaya (1996), pp. 168-169 and p. 182.

²⁴⁰ CIDH Yanomami case (v. Brazil), 5 March 1985 (brought on behalf of a large group of Yanomami, recommending the adoption of preventive health measures, the demarcation and delimitation of their land, educational programs, etc., all to be carried out in consultation with the peoples involved and advised by medical staff, anthropologists and other experts).

²⁴¹ See CIDH Miskito report relating to Nicaragua, 16 May 1984 (resolution regarding friendly settlement).

²⁴² See Anaya (1996), p. 100.

²⁴³ Anaya/Williams (2001), p. 53.

²⁴⁴ Bosnia Chamber Mahmutović v. Republika Srpska, 8 October 1999, §4.

²⁴⁵ Id., §89.

²⁴⁶ Ibid.

the remains of persons buried there'.²⁴⁷ Pending the proceedings the Chamber had initially refused to order a provisional measure because there had initially not been any individual threat of exhumation or interference with burials in Prnjavor. Following a domestic decision prohibiting a specific burial, the Chamber did order provisional measures prohibiting the Municipal authorities from obstructing further burials.²⁴⁸ Again there is a clear correlation between the protection required pending the proceedings and in the decision on the merits, where in the latter is simply more broadly worded.

3.6 Consultation of indigenous peoples and impact assessment

The requirements of notification and consultation, often mentioned in the context of environmental law, also have their counterparts in the jurisprudence of the HRC in relation to indigenous peoples.²⁴⁹ Clearly domestic decisions made on the basis of proper consultation gain legitimacy, as is also recognized, at least theoretically, in non-human rights fora.²⁵⁰ In its Concluding Observations to State reports, the HRC has recommended States with indigenous populations to 'take further steps to secure the rights of all indigenous peoples, under articles 1 and 27 of the Covenant, so as to give them greater influence in decision-making affecting their natural environment and their means of subsistence as well as their own culture'.²⁵¹ The substantive law on consultation, as interpreted by the human rights adjudicators, could be relevant in the context of future decisions about provisional measures, including the group of beneficiaries.

The HRC has developed a two-part test for examining violations of Article 27 in relation to land use: on the one hand consultation and on the other economic sustainability.²⁵² In its General Comment on Article 27 the HRC referred to the positive requirement to take measures to 'ensure the effective participation of members of minority communities in decisions which affect ²⁴⁷ Bosnia Chamber Islamic Community in BiH v. Republika Srpska (Muslim Town Cemetery in Prnjavor), 11 January 2000, §211 (dissenting opinion by Republika Srpska members Popović and Pajić).

²⁴⁸ Id., §§9 and 10.

²⁴⁹ Environmental impact assessment requires consultation of those persons directly affected by certain economic developments such as the construction of a dam. Environmental law acknowledges the role of indigenous peoples in particular, at least in theory. Principle 22 of the Rio Declaration, for instance, notes: "Indigenous people and their communities, and other local communities, have a vital role in environmental management and development because of their knowledge and traditional practices. States should recognise and duly support their identity, culture and interests and enable their effective participation in the achievement of sustainable development." The Rio Declaration on Environment and Development, Rio de Janeiro, 3-14 June 1992.

²⁵⁰ In its Operational Directive on indigenous peoples the World Bank has adopted the rule that Bank staff is required to identify the impact of proposed projects on indigenous peoples. World Bank officers must identify the indigenous peoples involved 'through direct consultation'. Operational Directive 4.20 of June 1990, § 8, see World Bank Operation Manual at <www.worldbank.org>. The World Bank started its first environmental impact assessment in 1992 as part of its decision making on funding the Sardar Sarovar hydro-electric dam in North-West India. The government proposing a project should show that indigenous people have 'participated meaningfully in the development of the plan', particularly in relation to land access and use. The burden of proof is on the State showing there was adequate consultation of indigenous peoples. See about Operational Directive 4.20: De Feyter (2001), pp. 164-167.

²⁵¹ HRC Concluding Observations to the US report, 27 July 2006, CCPR/C/USA/CO, §37.

²⁵² Scheinin (2000), p. 168, referring to the above Sami cases. See also HRC Apirana Mahuika v. New Zealand, 27 October 2000.

them'.²⁵³ Apparently, in the face of disputes about the facts relating to the cultural survival of the group and the expected risk to economic sustainability, it finds no violation if it believes the group in question has been sufficiently consulted.²⁵⁴ With regard to consultation the HRC noted, in Länsman II (1996), that it was uncontested that the Muotkatunturi Herdsmen's Committee had been consulted 'in the process of drawing up the logging plans' and that it 'did not react negatively to the plans for logging'.²⁵⁵

"That this consultation process was unsatisfactory for the authors and was capable of greater interaction does not alter the Committee's assessment. It transpires that the State party's authorities did go through the process of weighing the authors' interests and the general economic interests in the area specified in the complaint when deciding on the most appropriate measures of forestry management, i.e. logging methods, choice of logging areas and construction of roads in these areas".²⁵⁶

²⁵³ HRC General Comment 23 on Article 27, 8 April 1994, §7.

²⁵⁴ The second Mikmaq case (1991) dealt with the issue of consultation. See HRC Grand Chief Donald Marshall et al. v. Canada, 4 November 1991. The complaint was submitted in 1986, two years after the HRC declared the first Mikmaq case, A.D. (on behalf of the Mikmaq Tribal Society) v. Canada, inadmissible on 29 July 1984. This time A.D. had managed to involve the Grand Chief in the complaint. Grand Chief Donald Marshall, Grand Captain Alexander Denny and Advisor Simon Marshall submitted the complaint as officers of the Grand Council of the Mikmaq tribal society. The HRC gave considerable leeway to the State in its interpretation of the right to take part in the conduct of public affairs. It found that the State party's failure to invite representatives of the Mikmaq Tribal Society to the constitutional conferences on aboriginal matters did not violate Article 25(a) ICCPR. Scheinin (2000), p. 164 notes that the 'view taken by the HRC suggests that no far-reaching standards can be derived from Art. 25 as regards specific arrangements for autonomy or self-government by minorities or indigenous peoples'. In later cases, however, the HRC did point out that 'the provisions of article 1 may be relevant in the interpretation of other rights protected by the Covenant, in particular articles 25, 26 and 27'. See e.g. Diergaardt et al. v. Namibia, 25 July 2000, §10.3. See in general about consultation: De Feyter (2001), pp. 157-171 and Anaya (1996), Chapter 5.

²⁵⁵ HRC Länsman II, 30 October 1996, §10.5.

²⁵⁶ Ibid. Among others, the State had pointed out that the records of the Inari District Court showed that during the extraordinary meeting between the Central Forestry Board and the Muotkatunturi Herdsmen's Committee of 16 July 1993 two opinions were presented: one in support of and one against the petitioners. According to the State the Herdsmen's Committee did not make statements directed against the Central Forestry Board (§6.1). It noted that it had had continuous negotiation links with the Herdsmen's Committee 'in a framework in which interests of forestry and reindeer husbandry are reconciled'. The 'experiences with this negotiation process have been good' (§6.12). The petitioners, on the other hand, asserted that 'there had been no negotiation process and no real consultation of the local Sami when the State forest authority prepared its logging plans'. "At most, the Chairman of the Muotkatunturi Herdsmen's Committee was informed of the logging plans." They also quoted the resolution adopted by the Sami Parliament of 16 December 1995, after it had discussed the experiences with the consultation in relation to the logging plans. Among others this resolution noted that it is 'the opinion of the Sami Parliament that the present consultation system between the Central Forestry Board and reindeer management does not function in a satisfactory way'. The petitioners contended that 'what the State party refers to as "negotiations" with local reindeer herdsman amounts to little more than invitations extended to the chairmen of the herdsman's committees to annual forestry board's meetings, during which they are informed of short-term logging plans'. They emphasised that this process involved no real consultation of the Sami (§§7.8 and 7.9). Scheinin (2000), p. 272 notes that '(g)uidance for a more thorough analysis of the requirement of effective participation can be

The discussion in Länsman II shows the importance the HRC attaches to the State's opinion that it consulted the petitioners. The State used this consultation as one of the arguments to convince the Committee to set aside its provisional measures. It noted that it had negotiated with the larger association to which the petitioners' Herdsmen Committee belonged, suggesting that consultation should already play a role at the provisional measures stage. The State argued, in addition, that provisional measures only aimed at avoiding irreparable harm to the victim of the alleged violation and did not cover measures resulting in otherwise long-lasting damage.²⁵⁷

In the Maya Indigenous Communities of the Toledo district case (2004) the Inter-American Commission observed that 'the requirement that states undertake effective and fully informed consultations with indigenous communities regarding acts or decisions that may affect their traditional territories' was 'one of the central elements to the protection of indigenous property rights'.²⁵⁸ Articles XVIII and XXIII American Declaration 'specially oblige a member state to ensure that any determination of the extent to which indigenous claimants maintain interests in the lands to which they have traditionally held title and have occupied and used is based upon a process of fully informed consent on the part of the indigenous community as a whole'. 'This requires, at a minimum, that all of the members of the community are fully and accurately informed of the nature and consequences of the process and provided with an effective opportunity to participate individually or as collectives'. The Commission has pointed out that this also applies to other State decisions 'such as the granting of concessions to exploit the natural resources of indigenous territories'. After all, such decisions will also have an impact on indigenous lands and their communities.²⁵⁹

One could argue that if the State cannot show meaningful participation this may indeed be an additional reason to resort to provisional measures immediately. At the same time, however, information about some forms of participation should not be a determining factor for not using provisional measures at some point during the proceedings.

As noted, in Länsman II the HRC responded by setting aside its provisional measures. In future cases it may have to analyse more in depth what constitutes appropriate consultation. Otherwise it will not be able to deal effectively with those cases in which consultation of the indigenous peoples and environmental impact assessments are little more than window dressing.

The Inter-American Commission has equally emphasized the importance of consultation. It has recommended, for instance, that Colombia would carry out the process of consultation with the indigenous communities before it authorised the exploitation of natural resources on their lands and not afterwards. Such exploitation of resources should 'not cause irreparable harm to the identity or religious, economic, or cultural rights of the indigenous communities'.²⁶⁰

In addition to consultation the use of impact assessments may also be relevant in the decision to order provisional measures. In the context of the aforementioned Ogoni case involving environmental degradation and health problems resulting from the contamination of the environ-sought from domestic jurisdiction, e.g. the Delgamuukw case'. This case established that in determining aboriginal land rights the cultural importance of lands and resources must be taken into account. See British Columbia v. Delgamuukw, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 1010. About the Committee's lenient assessment of the effectiveness of the participation in this case, see also De Feyter (2001), p. 157.

²⁵⁷ HRC Länsman II, 14 March 1996, §§4.6 (Negotiation) and 4.4 (Irreparable harm). In fact the Committee's emphasis on consultation and representation seems inspired by ILO Convention 169. Meanwhile the emphasis is now not just on 'informed consent' but also on 'control'. See e.g. UN Declaration on Indigenous Peoples, adopted by the General Assembly on 13 September 2007, A/RES/61/295 preamble, Articles 12(1), 14(1), 26(2) and 31(1).

²⁵⁸ CIDH Maya Indigenous Communities of the Toledo district (Belize), 12 October 2004, §142.

²⁵⁹ Ibid.

²⁶⁰ CIDH Annual Report 1999, Chapter V – Colombia, §148.

ment the African Commission has also emphasised the importance of 'environmental and social impact assessment' and meaningful access to information on health and environmental risks and 'to regulatory and decision-making bodies to communities likely to be affected by oil operations'.²⁶¹

4 CONCLUSION

The rights invoked by the adjudicators in their use of provisional measures in cases involving culture are minority rights, the right to culture, the right to religion and the right to property read in spiritual rather than financial terms. Several adjudicators have used provisional measures to protect collective aspects of these rights where they considered that (industrial) developments would cause irreparable harm to the collective enjoyment by indigenous peoples of their culture. In the context of the Dayton Peace Accord the Bosnia Chamber has used provisional measures in cases involving religious and property rights, individual dignity and pervasive discrimination. These cases also include a collective element.

It has been suggested that a General Comment on indigenous peoples' rights drafted and presented by the UN treaty bodies jointly would both enhance the rights of indigenous peoples in the UN system and assist the UN specialised agencies and multilateral institutions, such as the World Bank, when their activities may affect the rights of indigenous peoples.²⁶² Meanwhile various UN treaty bodies and regional adjudicators have dealt with the above rights in the context of indigenous peoples and persecuted minorities. Moreover, the UN General Assembly has adopted the Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples (2007), which could also help enhance the rights of indigenous peoples by providing an authoritative overview of core rights. After all 'there is substantial movement toward a convergence of international opinion on the content of indigenous peoples' rights, including rights over lands and natural resources'.²⁶³ In fact the text of this UN Declaration confirms and validates the practice of the human rights adjudicators with regard to the use of provisional measures in cases involving indigenous culture.

This is the case in particular for the Inter-American Commission and Court, which have enhanced indigenous rights in the doctrine and also in practice both in their provisional measures and in their decisions on the merits, as well as in country reports. The concepts of survival and participation applied in the Inter-American system are reflected in the Declaration. The UN Declaration speaks of minimum standards for the survival, dignity and well-being of indigenous peoples.²⁶⁴ Its Preamble affirms the collective rights possessed by indigenous peoples that are indispensable for their existence and well-being. The Declaration also emphasises the importance of participation and the consent of the indigenous peoples affected²⁶⁵ and the special relationship between indigenous peoples and their lands.²⁶⁶ It points out the positive obligations of States and the right to reparation for wrongs committed against indigenous peoples.²⁶⁷

²⁶¹ ACHPR The Social and Economic Rights Action Center and the Center for Economic and Social Rights v. Nigeria (Ogoni case), 27 October 2001.

²⁶² Asian Centre for Human Rights (an NGO based in New Delhi), ACHR features, strengthening the UN treaty bodies, index: ACHRF/2004, <www.achrweb.org> (consulted on 5 August 2004).

²⁶³ Anaya/Williams (2001), p. 54.

²⁶⁴ The rights recognized in the Declaration 'constitute the minimum standards for the survival, dignity and well-being of the indigenous peoples of the world' (Article 43).

²⁶⁵ See Article 41 (on participation) and, on (informed) consent, Articles 10, 11(2), 19, 28, 29(2) and 32(2).

²⁶⁶ See e.g. Articles 25 and 26. Indigenous peoples 'have the right to maintain and strengthen their distinctive spiritual relationship with their traditionally owned or otherwise occupied and used lands, territories, waters and coastal seas and other resources and to uphold their responsibilities

The text of the UN Declaration might also trigger a more pro-active approach by the HRC. Thus far the HRC decisions on the cultural rights of indigenous peoples have been unsatisfactory from both an individual and a collective rights perspective. Indigenous groups cannot, as such, claim the collective right to self-determination under the OP. Neither does the Committee's approach necessarily do justice to the rights of individual self-identified members of indigenous groups. This may be on the assumption that an individual member of an indigenous group would find sufficient satisfaction in the knowledge that some segment of the indigenous group would be able to continue its traditional activities, thereby maintaining the existence of its culture, even though the individual member would no longer be able to participate in it.²⁶⁸ Thus it appears that within the constraints of the ICCPR and the OP the Committee cannot offer sufficient solace to indigenous peoples.

Still, on the basis of the case law it developed, including the Lubicon Lake Band case, it could do more than it has thus far. In a similar case it could intervene earlier in the proceedings by using provisional measures and motivate them on the basis of its previous case law on irreparable harm. Subsequently, it could monitor compliance. If in the discussion on the merits the HRC confirms the prima facie evidence of (threats of) irreparable harm and finds violations, it could carefully draft in its decision how these should be prevented or halted permanently or, to the extent that certain acts or omissions have already become irreversible, what measures of compensation should be taken that would protect cultural survival.

Although the decisions by the HRC in these cases have not prevented the actions they aimed to prevent, neither through provisional measures pending the proceedings, nor (in the Lubicon Lake Band and Hopu and Bessert cases) in the final decision, the concepts developed in these cases may have a protective impact in the long run, including a more effective use of provisional measures by the HRC itself. After all, its approach already is incremental. While its case law in relation to Article 27 may not have brought concrete relief to the indigenous peoples on whose behalf the petitioners were acting, it has confirmed several principles that can be useful to support these peoples domestically. An example is the Committee's statement that an accumulation of infringements could result in the denial of the right to culture even if one infringement examined in isolation would not violate this right. Another example is its confirmation of the dynamic nature of the culture of indigenous groups.

Provisional measures could aim at halting industrial developments until the adjudicator considers that an appropriate environmental impact assessment has taken place, during which the indigenous groups affected have been consulted. The adjudicator could assist in this process, inspired by successful national agreements between indigenous peoples and State and provincial authorities about environmental impact assessment. This approach may broker better results for to future generations in this regard' (Article 25). They have the right to these lands and resources. They have the right to own, use, develop and control them and States shall give legal recognition and protection to these lands, territories and resources. "Such recognition shall be conducted with due respect to the customs, traditions and land tenure systems of the indigenous peoples concerned" (Article 26).

²⁶⁷ Article 8 stipulates, among others, that States shall provide effective mechanisms to prevent and redress 'any action which has the aim or effect of depriving them of their integrity as distinct peoples, or of their cultural values or ethnic identities'; 'any action which has the aim or effect of dispossessing them of their lands, territories or resources' and 'any form of forced population transfer which has the aim or effect of violating or undermining any of their rights'. Article 20 points out that that indigenous peoples deprived of their means of subsistence and development are entitled to just and fair redress. Article 28 notes that if restitution is not possible, a just, fair and equitable compensation 'shall take the form of lands, territories and resources equal in quality, size and legal status or of monetary compensation or other appropriate redress'.

²⁶⁸ See e.g. HRC Ivan Kitok v. Sweden, 27 July 1988.

the indigenous communities concerned than the approach taken by the HRC thus far. The Optional Protocol to the ICCPR and the Committee's Rules of Procedure, for instance, do not rule out possibilities for (informal) mediation and forging a friendly settlement. Its decisions may then become more practically relevant. This approach may be possible even through long-distance paper proceedings, although clearly it would be easier to realise in a regional system making use of on-site visits and hearings, as has become clear from the practice of the Inter-American Commission.²⁶⁹

One of the problems to be dealt with by adjudicators that take a quantitative (rather than qualitative) approach to infringements on land rights is how to determine the actual moment at which an accumulation of (industrial) activities triggers a human rights violation. Moreover, if such moment can be determined, does prevention of such a violation warrant the use of provisional measures? It is suggested that in certain circumstances involving threats to indigenous culture human rights adjudicators could and should take provisional measures at once. This would be so if the petitioners can show that exploitation or other economic developments are about to take place that could result in irreparable harm and there is some indication that those persons directly affected have not been consulted or the State has not performed an environmental impact assessment, taking into account cultural integrity and sustainability. Upon receipt of information to the contrary the adjudicator could decide to not to maintain its provisional measure.

Because indigenous peoples have acquired a special position in international law, warranting protection against threats to their cultural survival, the prevention of irreparable harm to persons must take into account the collective aspects of the rights involved. The use of provisional measures to halt destruction of indigenous culture could be explained by this special position of indigenous peoples and the inappropriateness, in the face of threats to their very existence, of forms of reparation limited to financial compensation.

Another UN treaty body has also taken a pro-active turn. CERD has invoked its Early Warning and Urgent Action Procedure in order to be able to speak out on behalf of an indigenous group that was unable to formally resort to the individual complaint procedure. In this context it also referred to the State's non-compliance with the decision of a regional human rights adjudicator. This is an illustration of the increasing cross-fertilization, and indeed 'cross-follow-up', between the various adjudicators.²⁷⁰

The context of the hybrid Bosnia Chamber is different from that of the (other) international adjudicators, but its provisional measures have been used to help prevent the further eradication of the Muslim religious presence from the region where they have long had their roots. In the context of Bosnia the Orders to respect Muslim sites, including cemeteries, seem particularly appropriate as they aim to address serious and pervasive discrimination relating, moreover, to issues involving respect for religion, for the dead and their community as well as to access to religious sites and protection against erasing them from the history of the region, all affecting to the core the dignity of the group at issue.

The use of provisional measures when the cultural/religious survival of an indigenous people, or of a group that has been subjected to ethnic cleansing, is at stake could be seen as belonging to the category of provisional measures used to prevent irreparable harm to persons, their existence as peoples and their cultural survival.

Given the practice of the Inter-American Commission and Court, the African Commission and the HRC and, in a different context, the Bosnia Chamber the concept of provisional measures in international human rights adjudication no longer relates just to the prevention of irreparable ²⁶⁹ See in general Chapter II (Systems), section 4.

²⁷⁰ Another example is the aforementioned remarks on the situation of the Lubicon Lake Band (Canada) in the Concluding Observations by the UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. More generally on follow-up see Chapter XVIII and on cross-fertilization see Chapter II.

harm to individual life and personal integrity, but also encompasses the survival of indigenous culture as well as the culture of minorities that have recently suffered extreme violence and struggle to survive as a people in a context of pervasive discrimination. Thus the provisional measures of the human rights adjudicators now also aim to prevent irreparable harm to the cultural survival of a people rather than only to the life of an individual person.²⁷¹

²⁷¹ Given the special background and context of the practice developed by the Bosnia Chamber, on the one hand, and the focus on indigenous peoples by the other adjudicators, on the other hand, it remains to be seen what will be the consequence of this development for minority rights in general.

CHAPTER XI

HALTING MASS OR ARBITRARY EXPULSION AND FORCED EVICTION

1 INTRODUCTION

Different from the Inter-American Commission, the Inter-American Court has not yet dealt with the issue of non-refoulement.¹ This Court has, however, confirmed the Inter-American Commission's practice to intervene urgently in situations of arbitrary or mass expulsion. In other words, the Inter-American Commission and Court have used provisional measures in the context of mass expulsion. Moreover, the Bosnia Human Rights Chamber has dealt extensively with the issue of forced eviction and has sometimes used provisional measures in this context as well. This means that the Inter-American Commission and Court and the Bosnia Chamber have ordered provisional measures in situations not directly involving threats to life and personal integrity or cultural survival. This section refers to relevant cases in order to illustrate this practice.

Mass expulsion and forced eviction may also be part of a wider range of threats and harassment against the life and physical integrity of the persons involved and sometimes also against the cultural survival of an indigenous people.² In such cases the adjudicator may specify the provisional measures ordered to protect against such threats to make sure that the State does not 'ensure' this protection through internal displacement. Instead, as part of the provisional measures to protect their lives and personal integrity, the State must also protect them against forced displacement.³

Provisional measures to protect against mass or arbitrary expulsion have been used predominantly in the Inter-American system, although one example can be given involving the African system and even the possibility of use in the European system cannot be ruled out.⁴ Provisional measures to protect against forced eviction have been ordered in the Bosnian system created under the Dayton Peace Agreement. These instances in which provisional measures were ordered seem particularly adapted to the local situation. Nevertheless, the practice of the adjudicators does indicate a particular kind of provisional measure, ordered in a context of endemic and widespread discrimination. This warrants discussion in a separate chapter.⁵

In addition there is another atypical, but related, situation in which one adjudicator has used provisional measures, namely in order to ensure access to education. It was decided to discuss this

¹ See Chapter V (Non-refoulement).

² On provisional measures to protect against death threats and harassment see Chapter IX (Threats). On cultural survival see Chapter X.

³ More generally on the protection required as part of provisional measures see Chapter XIII (Protection).

⁴ With regard to the ICCPR Special Rapporteur Scheinin considered it more likely that he would decide to request a State to halt an immediate forced eviction with racist motives (Articles 26, 23, 17) than to request it to take positive action to protect against a threat to life. Scheinin, Geneva, April 2003. In fact he later did use provisional measures on behalf of a person who had been harassed and threatened, see Chapter IX (Death threats and harassment).

⁵ There is also a clear relation with the previous chapter on provisional measures to protect cultural and religious rights, especially in the context of forced eviction of indigenous peoples from their lands or destruction of, and discrimination in the access to, religious sites.

situation in this Chapter rather than in Chapter XI because it involves another aspect of the Haitian case discussed below and has in common the underlying endemic situation of discrimination.

2 THE PRACTICE OF THE ADJUDICATORS TO TAKE PROVISIONAL MEASURES TO HALT MASS OR ARBITRARY EXPULSION AND FORCED EVICTION

2.1 Introduction

This section first discusses the practice developed in the Inter-American system to halt arbitrary or mass expulsion and the related provisional measure to ensure access to education. It then briefly refers to the approach in the African and European systems, concluding with the specific practice developed by the Bosnia Chamber to halt forced eviction.

2.2 The Inter-American system

In the landmark Order for provisional measures in the matter⁶ of Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic (2000)⁷ the Inter-American Court dealt with the issue of arbitrary and mass expulsion and the question whether this required urgent intervention.

In November 1999 the Inter-American Commission decided to take a precautionary measure on behalf of a group of Haitians and Haitian-origin Dominican people who were at risk of being expelled or deported collectively by the Dominican Republic. It requested the State to halt these mass expulsions or, at least, ‘in the event that they would continue to be made’ that this would be done in conformity with the requirements of due process.⁸ Six months later it decided to appeal to the Court for provisional measures and while the Court did not accept the Commission’s request to cover an unnamed number of people with its protective order (at least not in this case),⁹ as to subject matter it did expand its use of provisional measures to a broader range of cases. The Court not only ordered the government to protect the right to life, but also the right to family unification and the free movement of certain people. This was the first time the Inter-American Commission persuaded the full Court to go beyond the protection of the rights of physical integrity and life in its use of provisional measures.¹⁰

Commissioner Mendez believes that one of the reasons the Commission achieved this was the fact that it had previously taken its own precautionary measures. During the hearing before the Court the Dominican Republic repeatedly asked why they were called to the Court. The Commission answered that it had requested the State to do something about the situation six months previously and that the State had not even responded. In other words, the Commission had no choice

⁶ The Court refers to it as ‘matter’ rather than ‘case’ because the case itself was still pending before the Commission and the Court was only dealing with the Commission’s request for provisional measures.

⁷ IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic (Dominican Republic), Order of 18 August 2000.

⁸ IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic (Dominican Republic), Order of 18 August 2000, second ‘Having seen’ clause.

⁹ See further on the group of beneficiaries Chapter XIII (Protection).

¹⁰ On the possibility of the President of the Inter-American Court to take urgent measures until the full Court would convene to discuss the request for provisional measures, see Chapter II (Systems). See further Chapter XII (Other situations), referring to a few cases in which the President of the Court took urgent measures.

but to go to the Court about this issue.¹¹ It explained that despite its precautionary measures there had 'been no change in the practice of the Dominican authorities of deporting and expelling Haitians and Haitian-origin Dominicans'.¹² It also noted that '(t)his practice, which is carried out arbitrarily, in summary fashion, and without guarantees, continues to be aimed against individuals whose skin color is "black". Because of the fact that they are black, they are suspected to be Haitian; it is then presumed that if they are Haitian they are illegally in the country and are therefore expelled'.¹³ Ten days after the hearing the Court ordered provisional measures for the first time, on behalf of five of the seven persons specifically mentioned.¹⁴ The Court considered that the events presented by the Commission prima facie showed a 'situation of extreme gravity and urgency as to the rights to life, personal integrity, special protection for children in the family, and to residence and movement' for the persons identified by the Commission.¹⁵

The Commission had noted that 'neither the text nor the spirit of Article 63(2) of the American Convention establish an impossibility or restriction as to whether the irreparable damage should be against life, integrity or any other right. There is, therefore, the need to recognize that other rights protected by the Convention should be subject to a protection similar to the protection thus far afforded life and personal integrity'.¹⁶ This statement is not sufficiently clear. A need to recognise that rights other than life and personal integrity should receive a similar protection does not necessarily follow from the fact that text and spirit of Article 63(2) do not rule out such an interpretation. The Court, however, indeed ordered provisional measures to halt arbitrary expulsion. It may have combined the fact that Article 63(2) does not rule out such an interpretation with the seriousness of the situation, creating a need to use provisional measures also in a situation of arbitrary expulsion.

In short, in its Orders of August and November 2000 and May 2001 the Court expected the State to respect the lives and personal integrity of the several alleged victims, as well as two witnesses, but also to prevent the expulsion of three of them and allow the immediate return of three others who had already been expelled in an arbitrary manner. In addition, the State should facilitate the family unification of some of the alleged victims and in particular assist one of them in finding his family either in the Dominican Republic or in Haiti. The State should also provide detailed information on the situation of the inhabitants of the bateyes who could be subjected to forced repatriation.¹⁷ In its provisional measure of May 2001 the Court confirmed its previous orders and added that all the beneficiaries should receive a document of 'safe passage' and the relevant authorities should be informed of the fact that they were protected by these provisional measures. Finally, the State and the Inter-American Commission should take all necessary meas-

¹¹ Interview of author with Commissioner Juan Mendez, Washington D.C., 17 October 2001.

¹² IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic (Dominican Republic), Order of 18 August 2000.

¹³ Id. In its brief of 30 May 2000 the Commission mentioned that it had issued precautionary measures on 22 rather than 21 November 1999.

¹⁴ It did not yet include the other two persons for lack of evidence. About evidentiary requirements see Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

¹⁵ IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic (Dominican Republic), Order of 18 August 2000, 9th 'Considering' clause. The Commission had identified these persons in its Addendum of 13 June 2000.

¹⁶ IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic (Dominican Republic), Order of 18 August 2000, 'Having seen' clause 11d.

¹⁷ IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic (Dominican Republic), Orders of 18 August 2000 and 12 November 2000. The latter reference to a larger group at risk is the only concession by the Court vis-à-vis the Commission's request to protect a larger group of unnamed persons. See further Chapter XIII (Protection) and its section on the group of beneficiaries.

ures, before the end of June 2001, to create an appropriate mechanism for the coordination of and supervision over the implementation of the provisional measures.¹⁸ Eventually, in March 2002, the State provided the documents of 'safe passage' and met with the representatives of the Commission and the petitioners to create a supervisory committee for the implementation of the provisional measures.¹⁹

Yet subsequently the Court received reports that the authorities had destroyed some of the 'safe conducts' and that the children of one of the witnesses were being threatened. Out of fear they left their country. The other witness, Father Ruquoy, had also left the country out of fear for his life, after having lived there for 30 years. Moreover, the Supreme Court had declared unconstitutional the agreement ('Acta de Entendimiento') between the representatives of the State, the Commission and the petitioners regarding the implementation of the provisional measures.

In February 2006 the Court ordered, once more, the protection of the lives and personal integrity of the petitioners and witnesses, especially of the one witness and her four children. The State should ensure the necessary conditions for their return to their place of residence in the Dominican Republic.²⁰ The Court repeated the substance of its previous Orders and pointed out that the State must ('debe') implement these.²¹ This related not just to the order to protect the lives and personal integrity of the beneficiaries, but also to the order to prevent their deportation.²² For the time being it maintained the provisional measures on behalf of father Ruquoy, even though he had left the country. The State should offer the necessary conditions of safety in case he would decide to return.²³

The Court further noted the importance of the 'safe passage' documents to protect the lives and personal integrity of the beneficiaries but also prevent their deportation. Thus it expressed concern about the destruction of the 'safe passage' documents of two of the beneficiaries. The State should investigate the facts that led to the burning of these documents and it was to replace them as soon as possible.²⁴ It also observed that, after the judgment by the Constitutional Court, the State had not yet informed it on the institution of a new and appropriate mechanism for the implementation of the provisional measures.²⁵

It pointed out that the State was also required to protect the beneficiaries against threats by third parties, unrelated to the State.²⁶ Further it stressed that Article 63(2) ACHR made it obligatory on the Addressee State to implement the provisional measures ordered by the Court, just like

¹⁸ IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic (Dominican Republic), Order of 26 May 2001. The content of the Orders is more specific and pressing, yet some of the language used initially appears less obligatory: while the previous two Orders used the term 'requerir'/require, this Order used the term 'solicitar'/seek.

¹⁹ See Acta de Entendimiento, 19 March 2002, reproduced at the website of the National Coalition for Haitian Rights, one of the petitioners: <www.nchr.org/dr/iachr_entendimiento.htm> (consulted 21 February 2007).

²⁰ IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic (Dominican Republic), Order of 2 February 2006, 'Decisional' clauses 2 and 3.

²¹ Id., 9th 'Considering' clause.

²² Id., 21st 'Considering' clause.

²³ Id., 'Considering' clause 19. It added that the Commission and the representatives should keep the Court informed of his situation so that it could evaluate whether these measures should be maintained.

²⁴ Id., 13th 'Considering' clause.

²⁵ Id., 14th 'Considering' clause.

²⁶ Id., 'Considerando' ochendo, referring to its provisional measures in the Eloisa Barrios et al. case, Order of 22 September 2005, 'Considerando' séptimo and Eloisa Barrios et al. case, Order of 29 June 2005, 'Considerando' octavo and Case of Penitenciarias de Mendoza, Order of 18 June 2005, 'Considerando' cuarto.

the basic principle of state responsibility that States must comply with their treaty obligations in good faith.²⁷ In addition the State was required to create the necessary mechanism to plan and implement the provisional measures.²⁸

President Cançado Trindade had attached a Concurring Opinion to the Court's Order of 18 August 2000, its first provisional measures involving arbitrary expulsion. He discussed the legal nature of provisional measures for human rights, pointing out that in order to deal with the tragedy of displacement and uprooted people and the consequent alienation, the emphasis must be on prevention. The use of provisional measures in those situations was a good example of this preventive approach. He referred to an 'intertemporal dimension'²⁹ that manifests itself in the application of provisional measures as well as in the phenomenon of uprooted people. Moreover, the indivisibility of all human rights was equally clear in the above phenomenon as well as in the application of provisional measures.³⁰ He argued that there were no legal or epistemological impediments against using provisional measures with regard to rights other than the fundamental right to life and personal integrity. As long as the two requirements of 'extreme gravity and urgency' and prevention of 'irreparable damage to persons' in Article 63(2) ACHR were met, it would be possible, he argued, to order provisional measures with regard to all rights in the Convention, because they are all interrelated.³¹ The extreme complexity of the problem of uprooted people caused the extension of the application of provisional measures from the right to life and personal integrity to the right to personal liberty, the right to special protection of children and family and the freedom of movement and residence (Articles 7, 9 and 22 ACHR). He pointed out that this was the first time in the history of the Court that it had used provisional measures this way. It had done this because, in light of its evolutive jurisprudence, it was aware of the need to develop new ways of protection inspired by the reality and intensity of the human suffering involved.³²

According to Cançado Trindade the Court's Order revealed that the concept 'project of life' was also relevant in the field of provisional measures, just as it had surfaced in its Judgment on reparations in the case of *Loayza Tamayo*³³ and its Judgment on the merits in the case of the Street children killed in Guatemala.³⁴ Provisional measures had their historical roots in domestic

²⁷ IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic (Dominican Republic), Order of 2 February 2006, 'Considerando' ochendo.

²⁸ Id., Resolatory point 4 and 'Considering' clause 9(j).

²⁹ IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic (Dominican Republic), Order of 18 August 2000, Concurring Opinion Judge Cançado Trindade, §13. In this context this notion is used to refer to the continuity between generations of people, ancestors and descendants and the consequent need to take preventive action to protect this continuity.

³⁰ Id., Concurring Opinion Judge Cançado Trindade, §14.

³¹ Id., Concurring Opinion Judge Cançado Trindade, §§13-14.

³² Id., Concurring Opinion Judge Cançado Trindade, §15.

³³ IACHR Loayza Tamayo (Peru), 27 November 1998 (Reparations), §§147-148. The Court has referred to the project of life as 'akin to the concept of personal fulfilment, which in turn is based on the options that an individual may have for leading his life and achieving the goal that he sets for himself'. See §148.

³⁴ IACHR Villagrán Morales et al. (the 'Street Children Case' v. Guatemala), Judgment of 19 November 1999, referring to the rights of 'at-risk children', and the failure of States to 'prevent them from living in misery, thus depriving them of the minimum conditions for a dignified life and preventing them from the "full and harmonious development of their personality"', as referred to in the preamble to the Children's Convention, 'even though every child has the right to harbor a project of life that should be tended and encouraged by the public authorities so that it may develop this project for its personal benefit and that of the society to which it belongs', §191. See also the Concurring Opinion of Cançado Trindade and Abreu Burelli. Cançado Trindade also attached a Concurring opinion to the Court's Judgment on Reparations in this case, 26 May 2001, legal proceedings and were originally conceived to safeguard the efficiency of the adjudicatory function. Gradually, the autonomy of this precautionary action was confirmed at the international level in both the arbitral and judicial practice. Yet with this transfer to the level of public international law, the rationale of provisional measures did not change substantively. Provisional measures continued to aim at preserving the rights claimed by the parties and the integrity of the eventual decision on the merits. The change in the object of provisional measures only arose with the emergence of the international law of human rights.³⁵ With the transfer from the realm of the traditional contentious proceedings between States to that of international human rights law, the protective function of provisional measures was enhanced, in order to protect the substantive rights of human beings themselves. The Order in Haitians in the Dominican Republic, he noted, consolidated this gradual evolution.³⁶ He pointed out that the Court's approach was innovative yet prudent. It had recognised the great complexity of the problem and had taken care that it would not prejudice the merits of the case pending before the Commission, in particular with regard to the question of due process of law. Its Order contributed to the characterisation of the concept 'tutelar' (protect), more than simply 'cautelar' (prevent), of provisional measures in the realm of human rights.³⁷ He pointed out that the law evolves in order to attend to social necessities and in recognition of the values underlying the norms.³⁸

In its subsequent Orders, including in the Haitian case, the full Court has confirmed the above approach. Indeed in the Haitian case the Court considered, in its Order of May 2001, that under national legal systems the purpose of provisional measures is 'to preserve the rights of the parties to a dispute, ensuring that the future judgment on merits will not be prejudiced by their actions pendente lite', but that 'the purpose of provisional measures in international human rights law goes further, because, in addition to their essentially preventive nature, they effectively protect fundamental rights, since they seek to avoid irreparable damage to persons'.³⁹ In other words the Court confirmed that, in human rights law, the concept of provisional measures is evolving from the traditional preventive function to a more encompassing protective function.

Apart from ordering precautionary and provisional measures to halt arbitrary expulsion, the Inter-American Commission and Court have also dealt with the issue of citizenship registration and access to education of children of Haitian descent born in the Dominican Republic. The Court has done so in a judgment on the merits that will be discussed in section 3, while the Commission has even intervened pending the proceedings, ordering precautionary measures in August 1999 in order to ensure access to primary school for the child Violeta Bosica. It did so in addition to ordering precautionary measures to halt her deportation as well as that of the other alleged victim. The petitioners had claimed that the State had denied Violeta Bosica her Dominican nationality despite the fact that the Constitution established the principle of ius soli and she had indeed been born in the Dominican Republic. Many children of Haitian descent who were born in the Dominiin which he invoked the project of life, §§21 and 33. See further Cantoral Benavides, 3 December 2001 (Reparations): "The pain and suffering that those events inflicted upon him prevented the victim from fulfilling his vocation, aspirations and potential, particularly with regard to his preparation for his chosen career and his work as a professional. All this was highly detrimental to his "life project"', §60. See also Concurring Opinion Judge Cançado Trindade, §§8, 10, 12-13. See also Chapter VII (Detention), section 3 and Chapter XII (Other situations), sections 2.5 (Preservation of IVF embryos) and 2.6 (Arbitrary detention).

³⁵ IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic (Dominican Republic), Order of 18 August 2000, Concurring Opinion Judge Cançado Trindade, §17.

³⁶ Id., §18.

³⁷ Id., §23.

³⁸ Id., §24.

³⁹ IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic, Order of 26 May 2001, 7th 'Considering' clause.

can Republic and would, therefore, have the right to Dominican nationality, have been denied this right. Apparently this also means that they are deprived of their right to attend school. A case was brought on behalf of Violeta Bosica, 4th grader at the time, as well as on behalf of Dilcia Yean, who was still a toddler. The case was originally submitted in October 1998, the year Violeta Bosica was denied access to her school. For the school year 1998-1999 she decided to enrol in adult evening classes instead. It was only in April 1999 that the Commission received an amended petition that included a request for precautionary measures and only in June 1999 this petition was submitted in Spanish, as requested by the respondent State. In August 1999 the Commission indeed requested the State to adopt precautionary measures on behalf of both children to grant them ‘forthwith the necessary guarantees to avoid them being expelled from Dominican territory and so that Violeta Bosica (sic) m[ight] continue attending school regularly, and receiving the education offered to all other Dominican children’.⁴⁰ The formulation shows that the Commission asserted her Dominican nationality already at this stage. In fact there was no need to do so as by 1999 the right to access to primary education had already been established as being inherent in each child, independent of its nationality.⁴¹ The State responded within three days, requesting the Commission’s rationale for using these precautionary measures at this stage of the proceedings ‘and not previously or subsequently’. It also inquired about ‘any new facts that justified this request’.⁴² In its response the Commission simply noted that its request referred to a situation that met ‘the requirements of truth and urgency, and the need to prevent irreparable harm to persons’.⁴³ Subsequently the State pointed out that it would never repatriate a Haitian citizen who was in the country legally, ‘or according to any of the conditions that have been established in accepting illegal immigrants, [such as] individuals who have been in the country for a long time, or who are related to Dominican nationals’. It noted that the Directorate General of Migration had emphasised that both children ‘should not be repatriated while the procedure of verifying the legitimacy of their arguments was underway’.⁴⁴ Violeta Bosica was allowed access to primary school education. Although these precautionary measures seem to have been successful for one girl, there are apparently many other children deprived of primary education in the Dominican Republic.⁴⁵

2.3 African Commission

In the context of a claim of arbitrary expulsion the African Commission has ordered Zambia to allow the return of one of the alleged victims to his home country and to allow the body of the other alleged victim, who had died upon expulsion, to be returned for burial.⁴⁶

⁴⁰ IACHR Yean and Bosico children v. Dominican Republic, 8 September 2005, §8 (including comments from the original).

⁴¹ See further section 3 of this Chapter.

⁴² IACHR Yean and Bosico children v. Dominican Republic, 8 September 2005, §9.

⁴³ Id., §9.

⁴⁴ Id., §11.

⁴⁵ See further in section 3.

⁴⁶ ACHPR Amnesty International v. Zambia (on behalf of William Banda and John Chinula), 5 May 1999 (merits), referring to the Commission’s decision, at its 23rd session, to order provisional measures. The Commission informed the State on 19 July 1998. It sent a reminder on 17 November 1998, §§17-19.

2.4 ECtHR

In October 1999 the ECtHR used provisional measures in a case in which the petitioner had invoked both the prohibition of cruel treatment in Article 3 ECHR and the prohibition of collective expulsion in Article 4 of Protocol 4 to the ECHR in order to halt the collective expulsion of a group of 74 Roma from Belgium to Slovakia. It is not clear whether the Court ordered provisional measures simply because Art. 3 had been invoked or also in order to prevent a violation of the prohibition of collective expulsion under Article 4 Protocol 4 as such. What is clear is that the petitioner requested it to apply its Rule on provisional measures, or in the alternative, its Rule on prioritizing cases. Moreover, along with its provisional measures, the Court specifically requested information on whether the State had examined the risk of inhuman or degrading treatment in Slovakia. Subsequently, when the Court found a violation of Article 4 Protocol 4, in conjunction with Article 13 ECHR, it did not devote any discussion to its provisional measures and the fact that Belgium had ignored them.⁴⁷ In other words the practice of the ECtHR does not yet show an expansion of its use of provisional measures to include cases of arbitrary expulsion, yet it does not deny the possibility either. Contrary to the Bosnia Chamber it does not use provisional measures in the context of forced eviction.

2.5 Bosnia Chamber

Between November 1996 and December 2001 the Bosnia Chamber regularly ordered provisional measures to halt forced evictions. In fact this is the situation in which it used provisional measures most often.⁴⁸ After all, under the Dayton Peace Accord it had a particular role in dealing with situations involving discrimination. Yet the fact that so many requests for provisional measures were successful triggered almost automatic requests for them with each petition. Moreover, the Chamber was faced more and more with petitions by individuals requesting the Chamber to order provisional measures on their behalf, even though the eviction order had been brought so as to enable the return to their homes by the persons who had originally lived there, but had fled or been forcibly displaced.⁴⁹ In response, while it still often granted them, as of July 1998 the Chamber began to deny the majority of the requests to halt such evictions.⁵⁰

The Chamber has also ordered provisional measures in cases that are not typical of the post war situation in Bosnia, but that have also arisen in other places throughout the world, involving ⁴⁷ In its decision on admissibility the ECtHR simply echoed Cruz Varas et al. v. Sweden, 20 March 1991, stating that its provisional measures were not legally binding, Conka v. Belgium, 13 March 2001 (adm.), §11. It was only in Mamatkulov ((Grand Chamber) Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004) that the Court found that its provisional measures are legally binding. See further Chapter XVI (Legal status). See generally on the official State responses Chapter XVII and, on the follow-up by the adjudicator, Chapter XVIII.

⁴⁸ During this period the Chamber ordered such provisional measures in more than 30 cases, most of them against Republika Srpska.

⁴⁹ Interview by author with Jacob Möller, Geneva, October 1998.

⁵⁰ In 1999, for instance, it denied more than 33 requests for provisional measures in eviction cases, while during that year it does not appear to have ordered provisional measures to halt forced eviction. See e.g. Bosnia Chamber Aiša Tufekčić v. Federation BiH, 6 December 2001 (adm.). While initially, in 2000, provisional measures were ordered in this case, the Chamber subsequently rejected a request for extension by the Citizens' Association for the Protection of Human Rights of Temporary Occupants of Abandoned Apartments in the Federation of BiH. In Ristić v. Srpska, 4 September 2000 the Chamber initially used provisional measures, but subsequently found that the petitioner himself was an illegal occupant and the case was declared admissible. See also S.K. v. Srpska, 14 May 1999.

industrial developments threatening to displace persons. In 2000 it ordered such measures in the case Dautbegović and 51 other villagers from Duge v. Fed. BiH (2001), after the petitioners had alleged that the planned construction of a hydroelectric plant near their village threatened their livelihood and homes.⁵¹

3 RELATION BETWEEN PROVISIONAL MEASURES TO HALT MASS OR ARBITRARY EXPULSION AND FORCED EVICTION AND THE EXPECTED DECISION ON THE MERITS

3.1 Introduction

As noted in the previous chapters, e.g. on protection against threats and on the right of indigenous peoples to respect for their culture, provisional measures often involve several rights that are interrelated. In the context of complaints regarding threats to the right to life, personal integrity and/or cultural survival, people sometimes face arbitrary expulsion, forced evictions and internal displacement.

What distinguishes the cases discussed in this chapter, in which provisional measures were used, is the arbitrary nature of the expulsion or eviction, without any meaningful review, as well as the dominance of the element of unequal treatment and discrimination. Already in 1935 the Permanent Court of International Justice noted that ‘there would be no true equality between a majority and a minority if the latter were deprived of its own institutions, and were consequently compelled to renounce that which constitutes the very essence of its being as a minority’.⁵² This statement may serve as a point of reference in discussing provisional measures dealing with the issue of discrimination, such as those of the Bosnia Chamber involving forced evictions and the precautionary and provisional measures in the Inter-American system involving arbitrary or mass expulsion.

The fact that various treaties prohibit, and a range of supervisory bodies emphasises, the seriousness of forced eviction and mass expulsion,⁵³ especially in the context of discrimination, lends support to the practice of the above adjudicators in using provisional measures to halt certain cases of mass or arbitrary expulsion and forced eviction.

Article 2(1)(a) ICERD stipulates that States are to refrain from racial discrimination and ensure that public authorities and institutions refrain from racial discrimination. Article 5 ICERD speaks of, among others, the right to security of the person including the protection from violence or bodily harm, but also the right to housing, health care and education. Article 6 ICERD is an undertaking to ensure effective protection and remedies including reparation and satisfaction. The Committee supervising the ICERD has instituted an Early-Warning and Urgent Action procedure in order to deal with particularly urgent cases,⁵⁴ but it has never invoked its Rule on provisional measures.

The HRC has pointed out that States may not invoke a declaration of a state of emergency, made pursuant to Article 4(1) ICCPR, as a justification to engage in propaganda for war, or in ⁵¹ Bosnia Chamber Dautbegović and 51 Other Villagers from Duge v. Federation BiH, 2 July 2001. In 2000 the Chamber had ordered provisional measures. In reaction the businessmen planning construction of the plant requested provisional measures as well. The Chamber rejected these. See Drago Lukenda and Miroljub Bevanda v. Federation BiH, 5 July 2001 (inadm.). See also Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4 on the beneficiaries.

⁵² PCIJ Minority schools in Albania, Advisory Opinion of 6 April 1935, p. 17.

⁵³ See in general on the issue of mass expulsion in international law Henckaerts (1995).

⁵⁴ See Van Boven (1998).

advocacy of national, racial or religious hatred that would constitute incitement to discrimination, hostility or violence, contrary to Article 20 ICCPR.⁵⁵ This emphasis on Article 20 could also be relevant with regard to the substance of possible provisional measures to halt mass expulsion or systematic forced eviction and internal displacement of certain ethnic or religious groups, to the extent that a State may be ordered to publicly explain that persons are being protected by provisional measures and that discrimination and threats against them will not be tolerated.⁵⁶

The IACHR has noted that ‘the principle of equality and non-discrimination is fundamental for the safeguard of human rights in both international law and domestic law’ and that ‘the fundamental principle of equality and non-discrimination forms part of general international law’ and ‘(a)t the current stage of the development of international law, the fundamental principle of equality and non-discrimination has entered the domain of jus cogens’.⁵⁷

This chapter deals with case law on mass and arbitrary expulsion on the one hand and forced eviction on the other.

3.2 Mass and arbitrary expulsion

A still infamous case of mass expulsion is that by Uganda under Idi Amin, collectively expelling large groups of Asians. As Lillich has noted, this expulsion ‘in and of itself violated the UN Charter because it was racially discriminatory in nature’.⁵⁸ Article 22 International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families (1990) prohibits measures of collective expulsion and determines that each case of expulsion should be ‘examined and decided individually’ and in accordance with the law.⁵⁹

Are the human rights adjudicators likely to find violations on the merits of the specific rights claimed in the cases in which provisional measures have been used? The HRC has pointed out that Article 13 ICCPR ‘entitles each alien to a decision in his own case’ and that the obligations under this article would therefore ‘not be satisfied with laws or decisions providing for collective or mass expulsions’.⁶⁰

In its Concluding Comments to the State report by the Dominican Republic the HRC expressed grave concern ‘at the continuing reports of mass expulsions of ethnic Haitians, even when ⁵⁵ HRC General Comment 29 on states of emergency (Article 4 ICCPR), 24 July 2001, §13.

⁵⁶ This is obviously relevant in the context of provisional measures to protect against death threats and harassment, see Chapter VII. See also Article 4 ICERD.

⁵⁷ IACHR Advisory Opinion 18(3) on the Juridical Condition and Rights of the Undocumented Migrants, 17 September 2003, §173(3) and (4).

⁵⁸ Lillich/Hannum (1995), p. 65, referring to Article 55 (c) UN Charter, the Universal Declaration and the Restatement (3rd) of the Foreign Relations Law of the US (1987).

⁵⁹ As of 18 July 2007 this treaty was ratified by 35 States (<www.ohchr.org>, accessed 18 May 2008).

⁶⁰ It also referred to the right to submit reasons against expulsion and to have the decision reviewed by the competent authority and emphasized that ‘(d)iscrimination may not be made between categories of aliens in the application of article 13’. HRC General Comment 15(27) on the position of aliens, 22 July 1986, §10. In 1990 it found the Dominican Republic in violation of Article 13 ICCPR because the extradition of Paul Giry was not seen to have been performed according to law and he had not been granted an opportunity to contest it. HRC Giry v. Dominican Republic, 20 July 1990. In an individual opinion four members of the Committee noted that had there been an administrative decision, this case would have come under Article 13, but as there was not, the case was to be discussed under Articles 9 and 12 ICCPR. They would have found violations of these provisions. Individual Opinion Chanet, Aguilar Urbina, Ando and Wennergren.

such persons are nationals of the Dominican Republic'. It held 'mass expulsions of non-nationals to be in breach of the Covenant since no account is taken of the situation of individuals for whom the Dominican Republic is their own country', in light of Article 12(4) ICCPR, 'nor of cases where expulsion may be contrary to article 7 given the risk of subsequent cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, nor yet of cases where the legality of an individual's presence in the country is in dispute and must be settled in proceedings that satisfy the requirements of article 13'.⁶¹

Article 12(5) ACHPR stipulates that 'the mass expulsion of non-nationals shall be prohibited. Mass expulsion shall be that which is aimed at national, racial, ethnic or religious groups'.⁶² Subsequent to the mass expulsion from Zambia of 517 East Africans, during two days in February 1992, a case was submitted to the African Commission on their behalf. The expulsion had already taken place and no provisional measures were requested. The Commission found that they were 'arrested and assembled over time, with a view to their eventual expulsion. The deportees were kept in a camp during this time, not even an ordinary prison, and it was impossible for them to contact their lawyers'.⁶³

Mass expulsions constitute a violation of human rights whether on the basis of nationality, religion, ethnic, racial, or other considerations and independent of the challenges faced by many African countries.⁶⁴ The expulsion of West African nationals from Angola, in 1996, violated Articles 7 and 12(4) ACHPR as they were not allowed to challenge their expulsion. Article 12(5) was violated as well, because they had been expelled based on their nationality.⁶⁵ In the case of John Modise, who was deported from Botswana to South Africa after he had started an opposition party, the Commission found, among others, a denial of equal protection before the law and of the respect for each individual's legal status.⁶⁶ This had 'greatly jeopardised' his freedom of movement and infringed upon his right to leave and to return to his country.⁶⁷

The case of Malawi African Association et al. v. Mauritania (2000) illustrates that mass expulsion, forced eviction and the destruction of property often go hand in hand with endemic discrimination.⁶⁸ Among others, the African Commission found that '(e)victing Black Mauritians from their houses and depriving them of their Mauritanian citizenship' constituted a violation of

⁶¹ HRC Concluding Observations, CCPR/CO/71/DOM, 26 April 2001, §16.

⁶² In ACHPR Organisation Mondiale Contre La Torture v. Rwanda, October 1996 the African Commission found a violation of this provision with regard to the expulsion of groups of Burundian refugees. Article 12(4), prohibiting the arbitrary expulsion of asylum seekers, was also found to have been violated, as well as Article 7(1) ACHPR because of their expulsion from Rwanda without giving them the opportunity to be heard by the national judicial authorities.

⁶³ ACHPR Rencontre Africaine pour la defence des droits de l'homme v. Zambia, October 1997, §28. It found violations of Articles 2, 7(1)(a) and 12(5) ACHPR.

⁶⁴ ACHPR Federation Internationale des Ligues des Droits de l'Homme v. Angola, 11 November 1997, §§13 and 16.

⁶⁵ Id., §14. The African Commission has pointed out that '(w)hile the decision as to who is permitted to remain in a country is a function of the competent authorities of that country, this decision should always be made according to careful and just legal procedures, and with due regard to the acceptable international norms and standards'. ACHPR John K. Modise v. Botswana, October/November 2000, §83.

⁶⁶ ACHPR John K. Modise v. Botswana, October/November 2000, §88.

⁶⁷ Id., §93.

⁶⁸ This was a case combining a range of complaints, including torture and cruel treatment in detention as well as slavery like practices. In the latter context the Commission found that 'there was a violation of article 5 of the Charter due to practices analogous to slavery' and emphasised 'that unremunerated work is tantamount to a violation of the right to respect for the dignity inherent in the human being'. It also considered that the conditions to which the descendants of slaves are subjected clearly constitute exploitation and degradation of man', ACHPR Malawi African Association et al. v. Mauritania, 11 May 2000, §135.

Article 12(1) ACHPR.⁶⁹ ‘The confiscation and looting of the property of black Mauritians and the expropriation or destruction of their land and houses before forcing them to go abroad’ constituted a violation of the right to property (Article 14 ACHPR).⁷⁰ Among others the Commission recommended the new government of Mauritania to ‘take diligent measures to replace the national identity documents of those Mauritanian citizens, which were taken from them at the time of their expulsion and ensure their return without delay to Mauritania as well as the restitution of the belongings looted from them at the time of the said expulsion’.⁷¹

In July 1998 the African Commission had used provisional measures ordering the return of one alleged victim to his home country as well as the return the body of the other alleged victim, who had since died. On the merits it confirmed this as definite obligations.⁷² Pending the proceedings of Amnesty International v. Zambia (1999) the Commission had used provisional measures to ensure the return of Mr Banda and the burial of Mr Chinula (who had died in Malawi). On the merits the Commission found that Zambia had violated Articles 7 and 12(4) ACHPR with regard to Mr Banda, who had unsuccessfully challenged his deportation in the Zambian courts, but was denied access to the administrative proceedings.⁷³ Mr. Chinula was not allowed to challenge his deportation at all. He was forcibly deported and when he tried to return to Zambia in order to challenge his expulsion he was threatened with imprisonment.⁷⁴ The African Commission found a violation of Article 7 ACHPR.⁷⁵ It also noted that it had previously used provisional measures and repeated them in substance by stating that ‘Zambia must be required to allow the return of William Steven Banda with a view to making application for citizenship by naturalisation’.⁷⁶ It added that the family of John Lyson Chinula, who died in Malawi, was ‘requesting the return of his body for burial in Zambia. The Government of Zambia should be required to grant that wish’.⁷⁷

In 2002 the ECtHR held that the expulsion of 74 Roma from Belgium to Slovakia constituted a violation of Art. 4 Protocol 4, on the prohibition of collective expulsion, in conjunction with Article 13 ECHR.⁷⁸ The procedure had provided insufficient guarantees to ensure that the personal circumstances of each of those concerned would be taken into account ‘genuinely and individually’.⁷⁹ Moreover, petitioners could not depend on the suspensive effect of domestic proceedings, contrary to Article 13 ECHR.⁸⁰ As noted, the Court had ordered provisional measures in this case, but they were not respected and it is not clear whether the Court decided to order them given the Article 3 claim or in light of the collective nature of the impending expulsion.

As discussed, the Inter-American Court has confirmed the Inter-American Commission’s approach to urgent situations of arbitrary or mass expulsion. Thus, it has ordered provisional measures in situations not directly involving threats to life and physical integrity. The situation

⁶⁹ ACHPR Malawi African Association et al. v. Mauritania, 11 May 2000, §126.

⁷⁰ Id., §128.

⁷¹ Id., Concluding part, following §142.

⁷² ACHPR Amnesty International (on behalf of William Banda and John Chinula) v. Zambia, 5 May 1999.

⁷³ Id., §§7 and 44.

⁷⁴ Id., §§7 and 11.

⁷⁵ Id., §46. The Commission noted that the claw-back clauses such as Article 2(2) must not be interpreted contrary to the principles of the Charter and that rules of natural justice must apply, §50.

⁷⁶ Id., §47.

⁷⁷ Id., §48.

⁷⁸ ECtHR Conka v. Belgium, 5 February 2002.

⁷⁹ Id., §63.

⁸⁰ Id., §§78-83.

clearly related to human rights violations that were more serious than ‘simple’ mass expulsion.⁸¹ It involved racial discrimination as well. Moreover it concerned a range of rights including the right to access to primary education and other children’s rights.

The Inter-American Court specifically referred to statements by UN bodies⁸² in its discussion of the case of the Yean and Bosico children (2005), including the forms of reparation required on their behalf.⁸³ The mothers of Dilcia Yean and Violeta Bosica were Dominican and ⁸¹ In his Concurring Opinion to the Order for provisional measures in the Haitian case Cançado Trindade sketched the general context of mass expulsion cases, by paying attention to the phenomenon of uprooted people and the state responsibility triggered in this regard. He pointed out that this issue must be treated not in light of state sovereignty but as a truly global problem bearing in mind the erga omnes obligations of protection. Since the phenomenon of uprooted people is of a global character, States cannot shirk their responsibility and continue applying criteria based on their internal legal order alone. IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic (Dominican Republic), Order of 18 August 2000, Concurring Opinion Judge Cançado Trindade, §§10-11. They must take into account the consequences of the norms and public policies they adopt in relation to the issue of migration and, in particular, the procedures of deportation and expulsion, id. §12. He emphasized the grave consequences of separating persons from their roots. The connection with their roots is necessary to maintain their spiritual legacy and to keep open channels of communication between the living and the dead. IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic (Dominican Republic), Order of 18 August 2000, Concurring Opinion Judge Cançado Trindade, §5. He noted that uprooting people causes them to lose touch with daily life and their mother tongue as a way to express their ideas and feelings as well as with their work that gives everyone a sense of life and of being useful. By losing their own way to communicate with the outside world, they also lose the possibility of developing a ‘project of life’. IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic (Dominican Republic), Order of 18 August 2000, Concurring Opinion Judge Cançado Trindade, §6. On the concept of ‘project of life’ see also Chapter XII (Other situations). While the roots involved in this case seem less deep than those involving ancestral lands, this remark shows a more general awareness of the problem of displacement. The reference indicates a correlation with the Court’s statements on indigenous peoples and their ancestral grounds as well as with those on the importance in general of being able to bury the dead. See respectively IACHR Mayagna (Sumo) Awá Tingni Community case, 31 August 2001; Bámaca Velásquez case, 22 February 2002 (Reparations); Villagrán Morales et al. (the ‘Street Children Case’), 26 May 2001 (Reparations). See also African Commission Amnesty International v. Zambia, 5 May 1999 (on behalf of William Banda and John Chinula). According to Cançado Trindade today answers must be found to the new demands for protection even if they are not literally contemplated in the international human rights instruments. IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic (Dominican Republic), Order of 18 August 2000, Concurring Opinion Judge Cançado Trindade, §7.

⁸² Committee on the Rights of the Child CRC/C/15/Add.150, 21 February 2001.

⁸³ IACHR Yean and Bosico children v. Dominican Republic, 8 September 2005, §237. The Court also invoked its Advisory Opinion 17 on the Juridical Status and Human Rights of the Child, 28 August 2002 and Advisory Opinion 18 on the Juridical Status and Rights of Undocumented Migrants, 17 September 2003. In 1997 the ESC Committee specifically dealt with the plight of Haitian workers in the Dominican Republic. It noted ‘that approximately 500,000-600,000 Haitian illegal workers reside in the Dominican Republic, some of them for one or two generations, without any legal status and any protection of their economic, social and cultural rights. In this respect, the Committee is particularly concerned about the situation of the children who, due to the restrictive interpretation of article 11 of the Constitution by the authorities, do not receive Dominican nationality on the grounds that they are children born of foreigners in transit. These children are thus denied their most basic social rights, such as the rights to education and health care’. ESC-Committee E/C.12/1/Add.16, 12 December 1997, §17. Among others it their fathers Haitian. The two children remained stateless for more than four years despite the fact that in the Dominican Republic ius soli applies, meaning that persons born there have the right to Dominican nationality.⁸⁴ They are just two of a great many children whose birth registration was made impossible. In this context the Dominican Republic has used the argument that the Haitian workers are within its jurisdiction ‘in transit’ and therefore its normal rule on ius soli does not apply.⁸⁵ recommended ‘that the principle of jus soli under article 11 of the Constitution be applied to the children of Haitian residents without delay’. ESC-Committee E/C.12/1/Add.16, 12 December 1997, §34. It also expressed concern about the inadequate living conditions in the bateyes. ESC-Committee E/C.12/1/Add.16, 12 December 1997, §18, also referring to its previous report: E/C.12/1/Add.6, §13. It urged the State to adopt positive measures to improve the living conditions. “To this end, the Committee recommends that the legal status of the bateyes be modified and their relationships with municipalities be improved, and that sugar cane companies be required to provide inhabitants of the bateyes with basic facilities, such as water and electricity, and with health and social services”. ESC-Committee E/C.12/1/Add.16, 12 December 1997, §34. CERD has equally recommended the Dominican Republic to ‘take urgent measures to ensure the enjoyment by persons of Haitian origin of their economic, social and cultural rights without discrimination. Efforts should be made, in particular, to improve their living conditions in the bateyes (shanty towns)’. CERD Concluding Observations CERD/C/304/Add.74, 26 August 1999, §11. In addition, CEDAW has expressed concern over the discriminatory character of the definition of nationality and the effects on Dominican women and girls of Haitian origin, who were among the most vulnerable groups in the State. In particular, this definition obstructed their access to education and other basic services. CEDAW Concluding Observations on the report of the Dominican Republic, 26 July 2004, §§33-34.

84

It was only in September 2001 that birth certificates, and, consequently, Dominican nationality, were granted to both children. IACHR Yean and Bosico children v. Dominican Republic, 8 September 2005, §147. In its Concluding Comments to the State report by the Dominican Republic the HRC paid attention to a range of human rights issues that are also relevant in the context of the provisional measures ordered in the Inter-American system. These issues include the living and working conditions in the bateyes (see e.g. the direct contact mission by the ILO Committee of Experts, January 1991, on the situation of Haitian workers on sugar plantations. See CEACR General Report, §60. See also CEACR individual observation on Convention 111, 2004). Other issues were the difficulties for children born in the Republic to get registered and the mass expulsion of Haitians and Dominicans with Haitian background. The HRC noted that ‘failure to protect Haitians living or working in the Dominican Republic from serious human rights abuses such as forced labour and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment’ and expressed ‘concern over the living and working conditions of Haitian workers and the tolerated practices that restrict their freedom of movement’. HRC Concluding Observations of CCPR/CO/71/DOM, 26 April 2001, §17. “The State party should give priority to addressing the issue of the working and living conditions of Haitian workers, and ensure that those workers can take advantage of the rights and safeguards laid down in articles 8, 17 and 22 of the Covenant”. HRC Concluding Observations of CCPR/CO/71/DOM, 26 April 2001, §17. It also expressed concern ‘at the abuse of the legal notion of “transient aliens”. According to information in its possession, such persons may be born in the Dominican Republic to parents who were also born there but are still not considered to be nationals of the Dominican Republic’. It pointed out that “The State party should regulate the situation of everyone living in the country and grant the rights recognized by article 12 of the Covenant”. HRC Concluding Observations of CCPR/CO/71/DOM, 26 April 2001, §18.

85

The UN Committee on the Rights of the Child has paid particular attention to the birth registration of children in the Dominican Republic. A large percentage were still not registered and not provided with identity cards. As a result these children, particularly children of Haitian origin or belonging to Haitian migrant families, ‘have not been able to enjoy fully their rights,

The Court pointed out that the right to a nationality (Article 20 ACHR) was a fundamental human right that could not be derogated from in times of emergency (Article 27 ACHR). It understood nationality as ‘a juridical expression of a social fact that connects an individual to a State’.⁸⁶ This allowed ‘the individual to acquire and exercise rights and obligations inherent in membership in a political community’.⁸⁷ International law had evolved so as to limit the discretionary authority of States, ‘on the one hand, by their obligation to provide individuals with the equal and effective protection of the law and, on the other hand, by their obligation to prevent, avoid and reduce statelessness’.⁸⁸ The Court referred to ‘the peremptory legal principle of the equal and effective protection of the law and non-discrimination’.⁸⁹ It observed that ‘the obligation to respect and ensure the principle of the right to equal protection and non-discrimination is irrespective of a person’s migratory status in a State’.⁹⁰ Moreover, ‘to consider that a person is in transit, irrespective of the classification used,’ the State must respect a reasonable temporal limit and understand that a foreigner who develops connections in a State cannot be equated to a person in transit’.⁹¹ Finally, ‘under no circumstances, could the State have applied the exception referring to the children of a person in transit to the Yean and Bosico children, because the mothers of the alleged victims are Dominican and the children were born in the Dominican Republic’.⁹²

Among others, it found that the State had applied different and more difficult requirements than was the norm. Thus it had ‘acted arbitrarily, without using reasonable and objective criteria, and in a way that was contrary to the superior interest of the child’. This constituted discriminatory treatment, placing the children outside the State’s juridical system and keeping them stateless. They were brought in a situation of ‘extreme vulnerability’.⁹³ ‘Bearing in mind that the alleged victims were children, the Court considers that the vulnerability arising from statelessness affected the free development of their personalities, since it impeded access to their rights and to the special protection to which they are entitled’.⁹⁴ In addition, ‘the discriminatory treatment imposed’ on them was ‘situated within the context of the vulnerable situation of the Haitian population and Dominicans of Haitian origin in the Dominican Republic’.⁹⁵

The failure to recognize persons’ juridical personality harmed their human dignity.⁹⁶ The Court also discussed that Violeta Bosico had been prevented from attending day school during one school year. It observed that the fact that she was forced to study at evening school ‘exacerbated her situation of vulnerability, because she did not receive the special protection, due to her such as to access to health care and education’ and the State should increase its measures to ensure their immediate registration. See e.g. Committee on the Rights of the Child CRC/C/15/Add.150, 21 February 2001, §§26-27, referring to Article 7 Children’s Convention. It expressed concern at ‘various forms of discrimination and exclusion which still affect the right to education of certain groups of children, such as pregnant adolescents, unregistered children, children with disabilities and children of Haitian origin born in the State party’s territory or belonging to Haitian migrant families, reflecting insufficient attention to article 29 of the Convention’. Committee on the Rights of the Child CRC/C/15/Add.150, 21 February 2001, §41.

⁸⁶ IACHR Yean and Bosico children v. Dominican Republic, 8 September 2005, §136, referring to ICJ Nottebohm (Liechtenstein v. Guatemala) 2nd phase, 6 April 1955, p. 23.

⁸⁷ IACHR Yean and Bosico children v. Dominican Republic, 8 September 2005, §137.

⁸⁸ Id., §140.

⁸⁹ Id., §141.

⁹⁰ Id., §155.

⁹¹ Id., §157.

⁹² Id., §158.

⁹³ Id., §166.

⁹⁴ Id., §167.

⁹⁵ Id., §168.

⁹⁶ Id., §179.

as a child, of attending school during appropriate hours together with children of her own age, instead of with adults'.⁹⁷ She should have attended day school 'together with her peers, owing to her age, aptitudes and the appropriate curriculum and level of difficulty. This situation caused the child uncertainty and anxiety'.⁹⁸ The Court noted that the child's right to special protection, laid down in Article 19 ACHR and interpreted in light of the Children's Convention and the Protocol of San Salvador, meant that 'the State must provide free primary education to all children in an appropriate environment and in the conditions necessary to ensure their full intellectual development'.⁹⁹

The African Commission has also dealt with the issue of access to education. In one case it found that the closure of secondary schools and universities for two years was a violation of Article 17 ACHPR on the right to education.¹⁰⁰ It is unlikely that the Commission would use provisional measures in this case, unless the access was hindered just for certain groups. Yet it may consider a case like this to be urgent and accelerate its proceedings, especially when it involves access to primary school education.

In the Yean and Bosico children case the Inter-American Court referred to the vulnerability, suffering and uncertainty of the children, but decided to take this into account not in the context of finding a violation of the right to humane treatment, but rather when establishing the pertinent reparations.¹⁰¹ In other words, with regard to the two children the Court acknowledges a link with the prohibition of cruel treatment, but deals with it not in its finding on the merits, but in determining the appropriate form of remedy.¹⁰² With regard to their next of kin the Court did find a violation of the right to humane treatment. The situation of vulnerability the children were in also caused their mothers and sister uncertainty and insecurity, among others because of 'the very real fear that they could be expelled from the Dominican Republic'.¹⁰³

The case law on the merits of the African Commission has made a link between arbitrary expulsion and cruel treatment. In Modise v. Botswana (2000) it found that John Modise, after his deportation from Botswana, had never been accepted in South Africa as a citizen and had 'suffered the fate of being deported four times'. He had been forced 'to live for eight years in the "homeland" of Bophuthatswana, and then for another seven years in "No Man's Land", a border strip between the former South African Homeland of Bophuthatswana and Botswana' from which he was later deported back to Botswana.¹⁰⁴ In this context the Commission pointed out that '(d)eportation or expulsion has serious implications on other fundamental rights of the victim, and in some instances, the relatives'.¹⁰⁵ Modise had argued that 'his incessant deportation, constant threats of deportation and the accompanying disastrous consequences constitute a violation of Article 5 of the Charter' and the Commission indeed found that he had been exposed to 'personal suffering and indignity in violation of the right to freedom from cruel, inhuman or degrading

⁹⁷ Id., §185.

⁹⁸ IACHR Yean and Bosico children v. Dominican Republic, 8 September 2005, §225.

⁹⁹ Id., §185. See also §244. It appears that the foreign minister of the Dominican Republic, at a General Assembly meeting of the OAS in June 2006, has announced that the State will comply with the Court's ruling in the Yean and Bosico case. See Minority Rights Group, Public letter to President Leonel Fernández, 1 October 2006 at: <www.minorityrights.org/media_centre/media_comment/media_centre_letter_do> (consulted 11 January 2007).

¹⁰⁰ ACHPR Free Legal Assistance Group v. Zaire, October 1995, §48.

¹⁰¹ IACHR Yean and Bosico children v. Dominican Republic, 8 September 2005, §204.

¹⁰² See Chapter XIII (Protection) on the relation between the protection required as part of provisional measures and as part of a judgment on reparations.

¹⁰³ IACHR Yean and Bosico children v. Dominican Republic, 8 September 2005, §§205-206.

¹⁰⁴ ACHPR John K. Modise v. Botswana, October/November 2000, §87.

¹⁰⁵ Id., §90.

treatment guaranteed under Article 5 of the Charter'.¹⁰⁶ In the abovementioned Banda and Chinula case the Commission confirmed this approach. It pointed out that by forcing them 'to live as stateless persons under degrading conditions, the government of Zambia has deprived them of their family and is depriving their families of the men's support, and this constitutes a violation of the dignity of a human being'.¹⁰⁷

The adjudicators that have dealt with the issue of arbitrary or mass expulsion have expressed themselves strongly on the prohibition of discrimination. The available case law also shows an awareness of the impact of discrimination on personal dignity and have made a link, one way or other, to the prohibition of cruel treatment. Finally, on the merits the particularly vulnerable position of children has been stressed. This case law on the merits would appear to support the use of provisional measures in certain cases of arbitrary or mass expulsion.

3.3 Forced eviction

The issue of forced evictions has 'reached the international human rights agenda because it is considered a practice that does grave and disastrous harm to the basic civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights of large numbers of people, both individual persons and collectivities'.¹⁰⁸ Are the adjudicators likely to find violations on the merits in the type of cases in which the Bosnia Chamber has used provisional measures to halt forced eviction?

Several monitoring bodies that have not dealt with individual complaints have nevertheless dealt with the issue of forced eviction in a manner that indicates the importance attached to this issue. The Committee supervising the International Convention on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ESC Committee) has sometimes reacted to planned evictions, or evictions that have already taken place, outside the context of the consideration of a State report. In 1991 the Committee asked the Dominican Republic (in a general context involving housing, not specifically related to persons of Haitian descent) to 'suspend any actions which are not in clearly in conformity with the provisions of the Covenant' and to provide it with additional information 'as a matter of urgency'.¹⁰⁹ The country report of the Dominican Republic was not on the Committee's agenda during that session, indicating a special initiative on the part of the Committee. That same year the Committee also prepared a General Comment on the right to adequate housing (Article 11 (1) ICESCR).¹¹⁰ A few years later it devoted a General Comment specifically to the issue of forced eviction, in which it defined this phenomenon as 'the permanent or temporary removal against their will of individuals, families and/or communities from the homes and/or land which they occupy, without the provision of, and access to, appropriate forms of legal or other protection'.¹¹¹

¹⁰⁶ Id., §91.

¹⁰⁷ ACHPR Amnesty International v. Zambia, 5 May 1999, §58.

¹⁰⁸ UN study on the right to restitution, compensation and rehabilitation, final report by Special Rapporteur Van Boven, E/CN.4/Sub.2/1993/18, §21. Particularly on the impact on women, see Westendorp (2008).

¹⁰⁹ ESC-Committee E/C.12/1991/4, §330.

¹¹⁰ ESC-Committee General Comment 4 on the right to adequate housing, 13 December 1991.

¹¹¹ ESC-Committee General Comment 7 on the right to adequate housing: forced evictions, 20 May 1997, §4. Other examples are CERD, which has emphasized the right of all refugees and displaced persons freely to return to their homes of origin under conditions of safety. States parties are obliged to ensure that the return of such persons is voluntary (CERD General Recommendation XXII (49)) and the UN Sub-Commission on Human Rights, which in 2005 adopted 'Principles on housing and property restitution for refugees and displaced persons'. See final report Special Rapporteur Pinheiro, E/CN.4/Sub.2/2005/17. In HRC Dahanayake and 41 others v. Sri Lanka, 25 July 2006 (inadm.), it is noted that two requests by the petitioners for

The African Commission has also shown awareness of the interrelated nature of the rights protected in the Charter. In the Ogoni case (2001) it discussed the right to adequate housing of members of the Ogoni community under Articles 14 (right to property) and 18(1) (family life) ACHPR and pointed out that ‘when housing is destroyed, property, health, and family life are adversely affected’. Thus, ‘the combined effect of Articles 14, 16 and 18(1) reads into the Charter a right to shelter or housing which the Nigerian Government has apparently violated’.¹¹² It also referred to its obligation to prevent the violation of the right to housing by third parties. It explained that ‘the right to shelter even goes further than a roof over one’s head. It extends to embody the individual’s right to be let alone and to live in peace – whether under a roof or not’.¹¹³ It pointed out that the ‘particular violation by the Nigerian Government of the right to adequate housing as implicitly protected in the Charter’ also encompassed the right to protection against forced evictions.¹¹⁴ It noted that it drew inspiration from the definition of the term ‘forced evictions’ by the UN Committee on Economic Social and Cultural Rights.¹¹⁵ The African Commission also referred to an earlier General Comment by the UN Committee, stating that ‘all persons should possess a degree of security of tenure which guarantees legal protection against forced eviction, harassment and other threats’.¹¹⁶ The African Commission concluded that the conduct of the Nigerian government clearly demonstrated a violation of this right enjoyed by the Ogonis ‘as a collective right’.¹¹⁷

The European system takes a more individualistic approach, but has nevertheless dealt with the issue of forced eviction. It has mainly done so in the context of Article 8(1) ECHR, referring to respect for private and family life and home, and Article 1 of Protocol No. 1, stipulating the right to peaceful enjoyment of possessions. In various cases the ECtHR has found that security forces deliberately destroyed the homes and property of certain petitioners, depriving them of their livelihood and forcing them to leave their villages.¹¹⁸

While mass expulsion is always based on a specific decision by the State, a pattern of forced evictions may also be based on decisions by private parties against which the State fails to act. Whether the responsibility of the State (or entity) is based on an act or omission, the underlying cause is often racial or religious discrimination resulting in ethnic cleansing of (certain parts of) a State. This is obvious in the cases dealt with by the Bosnia Chamber under the Dayton Peace Accord. The Chamber refers extensively to the case law of the European Commission and Court regarding forced eviction. Yet the context of the Chamber’s cases also indicates the rationale for its use of provisional measures. It has dealt with many cases brought by persons who had been forcibly evicted or had fled in light of the general situation of ethnic cleansing. They subsequently faced various obstacles in trying to re-obtain their property. In some cases the authorities had provisional measures to the effect that the State should refrain from evicting them and their families from their land and homes or ‘involuntarily resettling’ them, were denied by the special Rapporteur, §1.2.

¹¹² ACHPR The Social and Economic Rights Action Center and the Center for Economic and Social Rights v. Nigeria (Ogoni case), 27 October 2001, §63.

¹¹³ Id., §64.

¹¹⁴ Id., §66.

¹¹⁵ Ibid., referring to ESC-Committee General Comment 7 on the right to adequate housing: forced evictions (Article 11(1) ICESCR), 20 May 1997.

¹¹⁶ ACHPR The Social and Economic Rights Action Center and the Center for Economic and Social Rights v. Nigeria (Ogoni case), 27 October 2001, §66, referring to ESC-Committee General Comment 4 on the right to adequate housing, 13 December 1991, §8(a).

¹¹⁷ ACHPR The Social and Economic Rights Action Center and the Center for Economic and Social Rights v. Nigeria (Ogoni case), 27 October 2001, §66.

¹¹⁸ See e.g. ECtHR Akdivar et al. v. Turkey, 16 September 1996, Selçuk and Asker v. Turkey, 24 April 1998, Bilgin v. Turkey, 16 November 2000 and Dulaş v. Turkey, 30 January 2001.

failed to enforce domestic court orders and had failed to protect against third parties.¹¹⁹ In many cases the Chamber found that pre-war owners or occupants were still not enabled to return to their houses, constituting continuing violations of the right to their home and property.¹²⁰ In other cases the Chamber has pointed out that the ‘threatened eviction of a person from their home constitutes an “interference by a public authority” with the exercise of the right to respect for the home’.¹²¹ In such cases there appears to be a clear link between the substantive law on the merits and the provisional measures taken pending the proceedings.

The ECtHR itself has not used provisional measures to halt forced eviction. Yet its case law on the merits recognizes the serious nature of ethnic discrimination. In Moldovan et al. v. Romania (2005) the ECtHR found that ‘police officers were involved in the organised action of burning the houses’ of the petitioners (all Roma) and later ‘tried to cover up the incident’. The petitioners, ‘having been hounded from their village and homes’ had to live ‘and some of them still live, in crowded and improper conditions – cellars, hen-houses, stables, etc. – and frequently changed address, moving in with friends or family in extremely overcrowded conditions’.¹²² While the incident itself took place before Romania became a Party, in light of ‘the direct repercussions of the acts of State agents’ on the petitioners the Court considered that the responsibility of the Government was engaged with regard to their subsequent living conditions.¹²³ There was no doubt in this case that these conditions fell within the scope of ‘their right to respect for family and private life, as well as their homes’, making Article 8 ECHR clearly applicable.¹²⁴

Yet the Court did not ‘just’ find a violation of Article 8, but also of Article 3 ECHR. It noted that in previous cases it had deemed treatment to be ‘degrading’ within the meaning of Article 3 ECHR, because it was such as to arouse in the victims feelings of fear, anguish and inferiority capable of humiliating and debasing them.¹²⁵ In this respect it would examine whether the object of a particular form of treatment ‘is to humiliate and debase the person concerned and whether, as far as the consequences are concerned, it adversely affected his or her personality’.¹²⁶ Nevertheless ‘the absence of any such purpose cannot conclusively rule out a finding of a violation’ of Article 3.¹²⁷ It considered that the petitioners’ ‘living conditions in the last ten years, in particular the severely overcrowded and unsanitary environment and its detrimental effect on the applicants’ health and well-being, combined with the length of the period during which the applicants have had to live in such conditions and the general attitude of the authorities, must have caused them considerable mental suffering, thus diminishing their human dignity and arousing in ¹¹⁹ See e.g. Bosnia Chamber M.J. v. Srpska, 7 November 1997.

¹²⁰ One category of cases was based on legislation on so-called ‘abandoned property’. In various cases the Chamber found violations of the right to respect for the home and possessions, see further Neussl (1999).

¹²¹ See e.g. Bosnia Chamber Turčinović v. Fed. B&H, 11 March 1998, §20 and Nada Blagojević v. Srpska, 11 June 1999, §49. Another category of cases in which the Chamber has also used provisional measures concerned the so-called ‘JNA cases’ involving a Decree annulling contracts in which persons had bought apartments from the Yugoslav National army (JNA). The Chamber found that the owners’ right to their property had been violated, see e.g. Medan et al. v. State and Fed. B&H, 7 November 1997 and Kalinčević v. B&H and Fed. B&H, 11 March 1998 (provisional measures of 12 December 1996 and order on the merits not to evict the victim from the apartment).

¹²² ECtHR Moldovan et al. v. Romania, 12 July 2005, §103.

¹²³ Id., §104.

¹²⁴ Id., §105.

¹²⁵ See e.g. ECtHR Kudla v. Poland, 26 October 2000 (Grand Chamber), §92.

¹²⁶ See e.g. ECtHR Raninen v. Finland, 16 December 1997, §55.

¹²⁷ ECtHR Moldovan et al. v. Romania, 12 July 2005, §101, referring to Peers v. Greece, 19 April 2001, §74.

them such feelings as to cause humiliation and debasement'.¹²⁸ It added that the remarks concerning the honesty and way of life of the petitioners, made by some public authorities, 'in the absence of any substantiation', appeared to be 'purely discriminatory'.¹²⁹

The Court reiterated that discrimination based on race could 'of itself amount to degrading treatment within the meaning of Article 3 of the Convention'.¹³⁰ Such discriminatory remarks 'should therefore be taken into account as an aggravating factor in the examination' of the complaint under Article 3 ECHR.¹³¹ In conclusion, the ECtHR found that the 'living conditions and the racial discrimination to which they have been publicly subjected by the way in which their grievances were dealt with by the various authorities' constituted 'an interference with their human dignity which, in the special circumstances of this case, amounted to "degrading treatment" within the meaning of Article 3 of the Convention'.¹³²

Similarly, in certain circumstances the burning and destruction of houses itself constitutes acts of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. A few years before the ECtHR judgment in Moldovan (which for reasons of jurisdiction ratione temporis could only relate to the situation subsequent to the burning of houses), the UN Committee against Torture already pointed this out in Hajrizi Dzemajl et al. v. Yugoslavia (2002). This case was brought on behalf of 65 persons of Romani origin, nationals of Yugoslavia, who had been driven out of their homes while their property was completely destroyed. After the first weeks of hiding they have since continued to live 'in abject poverty, makeshift shelters or abandoned houses'.¹³³

CAT added to its statement that the burning of their houses constituted acts of cruel treatment that the 'nature of these acts is further aggravated by the fact that some of the complainants were still hidden in the settlement when the houses were burnt and destroyed, the particular vulnerability of the alleged victims and the fact that the acts were committed with a significant level of racial motivation'. It also emphasized the positive obligations of the State, considering that the complainants had 'sufficiently demonstrated that the police (public officials), although they had been informed of the immediate risk that the complainants were facing and had been present at the scene of the events, did not take any appropriate steps in order to protect the complainants, thus implying "acquiescence" in the sense of article 16 of the Convention'.¹³⁴ It found that the State had failed to observe its obligations under this article 'by failing to enable the complainants to obtain redress and to provide them with fair and adequate compensation'.¹³⁵

4 CONCLUSION

The practice of the Bosnia Chamber to halt forced eviction in certain cases is closely related to its function under the Dayton Peace Accord and must be explained in the context of the recent history of ethnic cleansing, along with religious and ethnic discrimination that had become endemic, as well as the particular hybrid nature of the Human Rights Chamber, both constitutional and ¹²⁸ ECtHR Moldovan et al. v. Romania, 12 July 2005, §110.

¹²⁹ Id., §111.

¹³⁰ Id., §111, referring to EComHR East African Asians v. UK, 14 December 1973, p. 62. In fact in that case the European Commission noted that, depending on the circumstances, this might 'constitute a special affront to human dignity', §207. It found that the UK immigration legislation constituted an interference with the human dignity of the petitioners that, in the circumstances, amounted to 'degrading treatment' forbidden under Article 3 ECHR, §208.

¹³¹ ECtHR Moldovan et al. v. Romania, 12 July 2005, §111.

¹³² Id., §113.

¹³³ CAT Hajrizi Dzemajl et al. v. Yugoslavia, 21 November 2002, §2.27.

¹³⁴ Id., §9.2.

¹³⁵ Id., §9.6.

international. At the same time, while the other adjudicators have not used provisional measures to halt forced eviction, their condemnation of the phenomenon of forced eviction on the merits to a great extent converges with the approach of the Chamber. It cannot be ruled out that other adjudicators, faced with a similar set of circumstances, will use provisional measures to halt forced eviction even if their nature is regional or international rather than ‘hybrid’.

The extension, in the Inter-American system, of the use of provisional measures to situations of arbitrary expulsion may be based on an extensive interpretation of the requirements of protection of personal integrity or on an extension of the application of Article 63(2) ACHR preventing irreparable harm to other rights than the right to life and personal integrity. In both cases the extension, as the Court puts it, is a confirmation that in human rights law the concept of provisional measures is evolving from the traditional preventive function to a more encompassing protective function.¹³⁶ In the Haitian case groups of people found themselves in desperate situations without legal protection and separated from their families. In this light the urgent intervention could be seen as aiming at preventing irreparable harm to human dignity and – as such – bearing some relationship with the prohibition of cruel treatment in Article 5 ACHR.

The African Commission has made a link between the uncertain situations that have often resulted from arbitrary expulsion on the one hand and cruel treatment on the other. The Inter-American Commission and Court have considered that the inability to register children and the uncertainty resulting from it might constitute cruel treatment. Moreover, both in the European system and in the system developed under the ICAT discrimination can play a role in the determination that certain acts or omissions resulted in cruel treatment in violation of international obligations.

The findings on the merits by these adjudicators, which elucidate the fact that arbitrary or mass expulsion and forced eviction can result in particular harm to children and may constitute cruel treatment, might therefore help justify a movement of this type of provisional measures towards the common core.¹³⁷

¹³⁶ See e.g. IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic, Order of 26 May 2001, 7th ‘Considering’ clause.

¹³⁷ See the Conclusion to Part II of this book.

CHAPTER XII

PROVISIONAL MEASURES IN OTHER SITUATIONS

1 INTRODUCTION

The previous chapters have discussed situations in which provisional measures have been used by more than one adjudicator. It appears that these situations mostly involve threats to rights that the various human rights adjudicators have considered particularly crucial for the protection of life and personal integrity.

The Conclusion to Part II will more closely discuss the common core of the concept of provisional measures as used by the human rights adjudicators and will argue that this common core involves the prevention of irreparable harm to persons.¹

Yet the concept of provisional measures must be clarified also by examining its outer limits. In some situations provisional measures have been used in one system only. In addition there have been several situations in which petitioners requested provisional measures to no avail. Some of these cases may nevertheless belong to the common core, but most of them are more likely to help determine the outer limits of the concept. This chapter provides some examples of atypical provisional measures and of failed requests for provisional measures by petitioners.² It appears that most of these examples may be situated on a continuum between ‘towards the common core’ and ‘towards the outer limits’ (section 2), while some of the examples are clearly beyond the outer limits of the concept (section 3).

As noted in the Introduction to Part II, one of the assumptions underlying this book is that the use of provisional measures to prevent reversible harm is beyond the outer limits of the concept of provisional measures. On the other hand, their use to prevent harm that is not only irreversible, but also irreparable is more likely to fall within the common core of the concept. The ‘in-between’ cases involve irreversible harm to the claim or the procedure rather than to persons. When it concerns harm to the claim or the procedure, but not to life and physical integrity, the term irreversible harm is used.

2 TOWARDS THE COMMON CORE OR TOWARDS THE OUTER LIMITS?

2.1 Introduction

Most human rights adjudicators have used provisional measures at least in one or two atypical situations. These range from halting the destruction of a painting to safeguarding documentary evidence. Sometimes a broader interpretation is given to the right to life involving a dignified life in which the fundamental right to life also means the right not to be prevented from ‘having access to the conditions that guarantee a dignified existence’,³ including the so-called ‘project of life’ of the beneficiaries.⁴ Indeed it is assumed that cases affecting a person’s life in such manner may be situated more closely towards the common core, even if most (or all) adjudicators may not yet be ready to order provisional measures in that specific situation. That fact, however, does indicate that there is insufficient evidence to consider these cases as already falling within the common core.

¹ As well as groups in some cases, see particularly Chapter X on indigenous peoples and the discussion in the Conclusion to Part II, section 2.3.

² It must be born in mind, however, that most adjudicators do not systematically publish information on failed requests. Thus, while the examples discussed may help clarify the outer limits of the concept, they are not necessarily representative of the range of situations in which a petitioner’s request has failed.

³ IACHR Villagrán Morales et al. (the ‘Street Children Case’ v. Guatemala), Judgment of 19 November 1999, §144. See also IACHR Advisory Opinion 17 on the Juridical Condition and Human Rights of the Child, 28 August 2002, §§80 and 84 (referring to the obligations of the State to provide the necessary means for life to develop under decent conditions and stressing in this respect the importance of the right to education).

⁴ This concept was referred to by the Commission as ‘life plan’ and by the Inter-American Court as ‘project of life’, or the first time in Loayza Tamayo (Peru), 27 November 1998 (Reparations). This Court discussed it as ‘akin to the concept of personal fulfilment, which in turn is based on the options that an individual may have for leading his life and achieving the goal that he sets for himself’, §148. See also IACHR Villagrán Morales et al. (the ‘Street Children Case’ v. Guatemala), Judgment of 19 November 1999, confirming that ‘every child has the right to harbor a project of life that should be tended and encouraged by the public authorities so that it may develop this project for its personal benefit and that of the society to which it belongs’, §191. The representatives of the victims’ next of kin in the Street Children case had pointed out that the right to life in the ACHR has an autonomous value and the concept is ‘superimposed on what the Commission calls the life plan’, §85. The Commission had indicated that ‘the five youths were deprived of the basic measures of safety and protection that the State should have provided to them as at-risk children, and also the opportunity to develop and live with dignity. Furthermore, the State did not respond to the systematic abuses perpetrated against them’. It considered that the ‘elimination and reduction of the life plans of these youths has objectively restricted their freedom and constitutes the loss of a valuable possession’, §86. Cynically, the State had proposed that ‘the precarious situation of the victims makes it highly probable that they did not have a life plan to put into practice’. It requested the Court to reject the Commission’s request to establish separate financial reparations for this concept. It accepted its responsibility in this case ‘as regards to general failure to adopt effective policies to avoid having a street children problem’ but pointed out that ‘the victims’ next of kin also bear responsibility in this respect, because they did not fulfil their basic functions’, §87. In making its calculation for non-pecuniary damage, the Court noted, it had also ‘borne in mind the overall adverse conditions of abandonment endured by the five street children, who were in a high-risk situation and without any protection as regards their future’, §§88 and 90. In reference to the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child it established the content and scope of the ‘measures of protection’ mentioned in Art. 19 ACHR (rights of the child). It emphasised ‘non-discrimination, special assistance for children deprived of their family environment, the guarantee of survival and development of the child, the right to an adequate standard of living, and the social rehabilitation of all children who are abandoned or exploited’. It was clear, the Court pointed out, that these rights had been violated by the acts perpetrated against the victims in this case, ‘in which State agents were involved’, §196. See further Cantoral Benavides, 3 December 2001 (Reparations): ‘The pain and suffering that those events inflicted upon him prevented the victim from fulfilling his vocation, aspirations and potential, particularly with regard to his preparation for his chosen career and his work as a professional. All this was highly detrimental to his ‘life project’’, §60. Cançado Trindade has invoked the notion also in the context of provisional measures: IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic (Dominican Republic), Order of 18 August 2000, Concurring Opinion Judge Cançado Trindade, §17. See further infra sections 2.5 (Preservation of IVF embryos) and 2.6 (Arbitrary detention) of this Chapter. See also Chapter VII (Detention), section 3 and Chapter XI (Mass expulsion), section 2 and the Conclusion to Part II, section 3.2.

Other atypical cases may not (directly) involve a person's basic existence and integrity, but may nevertheless make sense within a given human rights system. This may be the case given the specific function assigned to the adjudicator or the specific aim of the treaty supervised by it. After all provisional measures have also been used simply to prevent irreversible harm to the claim or procedure, albeit not irreparable harm to persons. Such measures fall within the outer limits, but not within the common core.

2.2 Providing assistance in life threatening situations or situations violating personal integrity

2.2.1 Introduction

The Inter-American Commission has regularly used precautionary measures to provide medical assistance against life threatening illness outside the context of detention, as well as in the context of the right to reparation for previous wrongs and to provide humanitarian support. At least on one occasion the European Commission on Human Rights used provisional measures in response to a situation in which a State had put a group of individuals into an adverse humanitarian situation involving lack of basic facilities.⁵ The Bosnia Chamber has also done so at least once. Thus far, the HRC has not used provisional measures in medical assistance cases outside the detention context.⁶ This section discusses the limited European and the more extensive Inter-American practice.

2.2.2 Practice of the European Commission on Human Rights

As noted, there is one example of a provisional measure by the European Commission on Human Rights in which it intervened on behalf of 53 persons who had been denied access to Spain and were staying on no-man's land in adverse conditions involving lack of water, medication, sanitary facilities. The Commission used provisional measures in July 1992, asking Spain to take measures preventing irreparable harm. Spain responded two days later informing the Commission that it had allowed several organisations to provide relief. Four days later it allowed the entrance of the beneficiaries for humanitarian reasons. While this was just a single case and it involved the impact of a refusal by the State to allow entrance, thus seeming to be linked to non-refoulement,⁷

⁵ See also Chapter IX (Threats), section 2.2, referring to the ECtHR's provisional measures of 12 August 2008 vis-à-vis Russia and Georgia calling on 'both the High Contracting Parties concerned to comply with their engagements under the Convention, particularly in respect of Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention'. Georgia had requested the Court to order provisional measures to the effect that Russia should 'refrain from taking any measures which may threaten the life or state of health of the civilian population and to allow the Georgian emergency forces to carry out all necessary measures in order to provide assistance to the remaining injured civilian population and soldiers via humanitarian corridor'. Press release 581 of 12 August 2008.

⁶ See HRC W. v. New Zealand, initial submission of 2 October 1997; transmission under Rule 91 on 15 October 1997. In this case the petitioner had requested the HRC to use provisional measures to request the State to make available kidney dialysis so as to prevent irreparable harm. The HRC did not do so and eventually the case was discontinued, at the 66th session (1999), after the petitioner died.

⁷ See Chapter V (Non-refoulement).

at least it indicates that a former body of the European human rights system at one point saw fit to intervene in a situation involving dire social and economic conditions of life.⁸

2.2.3 Practice of the Bosnia Chamber

At least once the Bosnia Chamber has ordered provisional measures to protect the beneficiaries' health by improving the heating and sanitary conditions in a refugee camp. It also requested the addressee parties (the federal government and the constituent state of B&H) to consider urgently their transfer to 'more suitable premises'.⁹ Subsequently the federal authorities transferred the refugees to newly built facilities.¹⁰

2.2.4 Practice of the Inter-American Commission to ensure HIV medication outside of the detention context

Between early 2000 and early 2004 the Inter-American Commission intervened several times (on at least twelve different occasions), requesting the State to ensure medication for persons carrying the HIV virus. Together this involved more than 190 beneficiaries. This section discusses the first of these cases.

In February 2000 the Inter-American Commission took the first such precautionary measure. It did so on behalf of 27 members of the Asociación Atlacatl carrying the AIDS virus. They had claimed that their rights to life and health were in great danger and that they needed to be able to access the medication necessary for treatment. More than four months previously the Commission had already requested information from El Salvador about the situation. Since then, ten members of the Association had died. In its precautionary measure the Commission requested El Salvador to provide the necessary treatment and anti-retroviral medication to prevent the deaths of the 27 persons, 'as well as the necessary hospital, pharmacological and nutritional care needed to strengthen their immune systems and prevent the development of infections'.¹¹

The petitioners had alleged, among others, that El Salvador violated the right to life, health and well-being of the victims by not providing them with the medication they needed to prevent them from dying and to improve their quality of life. They attributed the situation of these 27 persons to negligence on the part of the State and maintained that this constituted cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment.¹²

⁸ See EComHR B. M. and 51 others v. Spain, struck out 11 September 1992, following resolution of the case.

⁹ Bosnia Chamber Dyke Hasanaj et al. (11 adults and 27 children) v. B&H and Fed. B&H, 16 April 1999, §4 (provisional measure of 4 December 1998).

¹⁰ Id., §9.

¹¹ The request for precautionary measures was as follows: "[W]ithout prejudice to other actions that your Government deems necessary, the Commission holds the view that urgent measures should be adopted in order to provide the medical care capable of safe-guarding the life and health of Jorge Odir Miranda Cortéz and the other persons listed above. In particular, the IACHR asks that your Government provides the anti-retroviral treatment and medication necessary to avoid the death of the aforementioned persons, as well as the hospital, pharmacological, and nutritional care needed to strengthen their immune systems and to prevent the development of diseases and infections". CIDH Jorge Odir Miranda Cortez et al. v. El Salvador, 7 March 2001 (adm.). Precautionary measure of 29 February 2000 (See its footnote 2).

¹² CIDH Jorge Odir Miranda Cortez et al. v. El Salvador, 7 March 2001 (adm.), §24.

In January 2001 the petitioners maintained that El Salvador was refusing to purchase ‘the triple therapy and other medications that prevent death and improve the quality of life of persons living with HIV/AIDS’.¹³ They stated:

“The right to life encompasses much more than not dying as a result of action or negligence attributable to the State, in accordance with the rules of international law. The right to life, in that broader sense, presupposes, inter alia, that a person lives under conditions that are conducive to his well being”.¹⁴

In other words, they argued that the State had failed to guarantee the alleged victims ‘the quality of life that allows them to achieve well being’.¹⁵ According to the petitioners the State’s negligent acts ‘can also place or allow a group of persons to be placed in cruel, inhumane, or degrading conditions’.¹⁶

“The State should conduct all acts and omissions [sic] that are necessary to improve health, leading to the highest level of physical, mental, and social well being through the use of modern advances and scientific medical discoveries. The Salvadoran State cannot therefore fail to purchase and administer anti-retroviral treatments to persons living with HIV/AIDS for budgetary reasons if it did not seek and implement, sometime earlier, reasonable financial adjustments to permit their purchase and administration”.¹⁷

In March 2001, when the Commission adopted its admissibility report, three of the alleged victims mentioned in the petition had died. In its admissibility decision the Commission stated that it would determine during the merits phase whether the alleged facts, if found, violated Articles 2 (duty of implementation), 24 (equal protection of the law), 25 (judicial protection) and 26 (economic, social and cultural rights) ACHR. In its interpretation of these articles it would take into account the provisions related to health.¹⁸ It also deferred to the merits stage of the case the discussion of admissibility of the claims with regard to the right to life and humane treatment. It believed that these claims were secondary in nature and contingent on the conclusions the Commission would reach on the merits of the other claims already declared admissible.¹⁹

Shortly after the Commission’s admissibility decision the Supreme Court of El Salvador finally ordered the State to provide Odir Miranda with antiretroviral treatment. A UNAIDS report

¹³ Ibid.

¹⁴ Ibid.

¹⁵ Ibid.

¹⁶ Id., §25. Moreover, they alleged that the State had violated the victims’ right to health in Article XI of the American Declaration and Article 10 of the Protocol of San Salvador as well as the social rights laid down in Article 26 of the American Convention. According to them, it is possible to infer an ‘immediate legal obligation’ from the aforementioned instruments.

¹⁷ Id., §26.

¹⁸ The Commission considered itself competent to examine the merits of the case. It did note, however, that it was not competent ratione materiae to determine, through the system of individual petitions, violations of Art. 10 (right to health) of the Protocol of San Salvador. Under this instrument the Commission may deal with individual complaints about violations of trade union rights (Article 8 (1) (a) and the right to education (Article 13) only. At the same time, it could of course ‘consider this Protocol in the interpretation of other applicable provisions, in light of the provisions of Articles 26 and 29 of the American Convention’. CIDH Jorge Odir Miranda Cortez et al. v. El Salvador, 7 March 2001 (adm.), §36.

¹⁹ CIDH Jorge Odir Miranda Cortez et al. v. El Salvador, 7 March 2001 (adm.), §46.

considers that this decision was ‘presumably prompted by the Inter-American Commission’s criticism’.²⁰

In a press release a Costa Rica based organisation supporting the petitioners noted that the Commission’s precautionary measure could become a precedent for persons living with AIDS in other Latin American States.²¹ Indeed, subsequently the Commission also resorted to precautionary measures in various similar cases.²² One of them was on behalf of three persons with HIV/Aids in Chile. They had contacted the Commission because ‘they believed their right to life and health was in serious danger’. In November 2001 the Commission informed Chile that these three persons ‘urgently needed basic assistance from state institutions in order to secure the drugs needed for their treatment’. It requested Chile to ‘ensure them access to the medicines needed for their survival and to medical examinations for the regular monitoring of their health conditions’. The State responded two weeks later describing the ‘preliminary steps’ taken at the Ministry of Health. It reported that the persons involved were receiving medication and undergoing examinations so that the State’s services could monitor their health conditions.²³

In another case the Commission used precautionary measures ‘on behalf of the 39 persons named since they had not been dispensed appropriate medication by the Guatemalan public health system’.²⁴ It subsequently declared admissible the complaints based on Article 4 (right to life), and Article 25 ACHR (judicial protection).²⁵ Thus in this case it did not consider the right to life ‘secondary in nature’.

2.2.5 Practice of the Inter-American Commission to call for the provision of humanitarian support

There are several, quite diverse, situations in which the Commission has intervened pending the proceedings because of the dire living conditions of the alleged victims.

²⁰ UNAIDS, Joint UN programme on HIV/AIDS, March 2006, p. 71.

²¹ See Aguabuena Asociación de Derechos Humanos, ‘La Comisión Interamericana De Derechos Humanos Ordena A El Salvador Que Suministre Medicamentos Contra El Hiv’, 1 March 2000, <<http://www.aguabuena.org/articulos/salvador.html>> (consulted 15 June 2007).

²² See e.g. CIDH Annual Report 2001, §12; Annual Report 2002, §§13, 42, 51, 53, 58, 64, 71, 74 and Annual Report 2003, §61, involving (apart from El Salvador), Chile, Bolivia, Colombia, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Guatemala, Honduras, Mexico and Peru. See also CIDH Luis Rolando Cuscul Pivaral and 38 others (persons living with HIV/AIDS) v. Guatemala, 7 March 2005 (adm.) (petition and request for precautionary measures of 26 August 2003; request by Commission for additional information on some of the petitioners and their state of health of 3 October 2003; response of 9 October 2003 that given the petitioners’ whereabouts they would need time to gather the information; the petitioners provided this information on 13 April 2004 (‘except for certain tests like the determination of viral load which were deemed too expensive’); on 21 April 2004 the Commission formally forwarded the petition to the State and granted the precautionary measures on behalf of the 39 persons named ‘since they had not been dispensed appropriate medication by the Guatemalan health system’, §§5 and 7; apparently the Commission had previously used precautionary measures already on behalf of 12 of them, §1).

²³ CIDH Annual Report 2001, Chapter III (a), §12.

²⁴ The petitioners had requested precautionary measures on behalf of the presumed victims already in August 2003. ‘Given the victims’ whereabouts’ (this explanation is not specified in the case report) it was difficult to gather the information on their state of health and the Commission only decided to grant precautionary measures in April 2004. CIDH Luis Rolando Cuscul Pivaral et al. v. Guatemala, 7 March 2005 (adm.), §7.

²⁵ CIDH Luis Rolando Cuscul Pivaral et al. v. Guatemala, 7 March 2005 (adm.).

In July 2001 the Commission granted precautionary measures on behalf of the survivors of the Aguas Blancas massacre in Mexico.²⁶ While the Commission sought protection against threats for one of them, for seven survivors ‘who still bear physical and psychological scars from the massacre’, it sought medical attention. Within two weeks Mexico ‘reported on the measures adopted in compliance with the [Commission’s] request, which included contacting each of the protected persons, providing access to health centers in the state of Guerrero, and holding meetings to resolve the problems that have been identified’.²⁷ Obviously this case bears a relation with the State’s obligation to provide reparation for past violations as well.²⁸

In March 2004 the Commission decided to take precautionary measures on behalf of 63 children and more than 50 adults in the so-called ‘Bello diversion’ situation in Colombia. The beneficiaries were victims of internal displacement within the city. They had been forcibly evicted ‘under conditions that jeopardized their health and personal safety’.²⁹ The Commission requested Colombia to guarantee ‘adequate accommodations and the necessary conditions for the subsistence’ of the persons identified.³⁰ The State should also ‘report on the actions adopted to clarify the abuse of force that may have been exercised against the beneficiaries’.³¹ Almost half a year later the Commission decided to lift the measures, ‘after receiving information provided by the parties on a series of agreements between the State, the beneficiaries and the petitioners’.³²

That same year the Commission took precautionary measures to protect the life and personal safety of the members of the Community of San Mateo de Huanchor, comprising of more than 5,000 families. The Commission noted that the available information indicated that the ‘deposits from an open-air mine in the vicinity of the Rimac River’ would severely affect the ‘living conditions, health, food, farming and livestock’ of these indigenous campesino families. Environmental studies conducted by the Ministry of Health concluded ‘that the cumulative power and ²⁶ In June 1995 17 men, members of a Campesinos organisation, had been executed extra judicially in the state of Guerrero, Mexico. See e.g. CIDH Tomas Porfirio Rondin v. Mexico, 18 February 1998.

²⁷ In September 2001 ‘the State reported that a meeting had taken place in Chilpancingo, Guerrero, between the victims and several state and federal officials. This meeting agreed on several issues relating to medical attention, the patients’ traveling and accommodation expenses, specialized treatment, and drugs and medical equipment as indicated by their needs’. Annual Report 2001, §40.

²⁸ See also Chapter XIII (Protection).

²⁹ CIDH Annual Report 2004, §16.

³⁰ Ibid.

³¹ Ibid.

³² Ibid. In its Annual Report 2006 the Commission appears to discuss this case, even though it refers to its precautionary measures as adopted in October 2004, rather than 5 March 2004 (lifted on 25 August 2004). It mentions the housing plan formulated by the State, which had allowed the Commission to lift its precautionary measures ‘on behalf of a number of families left homeless and displaced in the city of Medellin, who were forcibly evicted in spite of the existence of a judicial order that defined the specific, non-violent circumstances in which they could be moved from the so-called “Bello or river diversion”’. The Commission took new precautionary measures in a situation falling ‘within the framework’ of the previous because the aforementioned housing plan had apparently excluded nine of the families, ‘because they had been displaced from within the city, and they therefore returned to the Bello or river diversion’. These nine families had been subjected to threats from groups of paramilitaries. Apart from adopting the necessary measures to protect the life and integrity of the leader of this community of nine families, as well as that of his wife and children, the state was also requested to ‘provide information on the situation of the nine affected families who were beneficiaries of precautionary measure 784-04 64 Children and 50 Adults in the Bello Diversion’, Annual Report 2006, §15 (precautionary measure on behalf of Eduardo César Ariza Ulloque et al. v. Colombia of 23 March 2006).

chronic effect of arsenic, lead, and cadmium in the deposits generated a high risk of exposure for the communities of the zone; that environmental pollution is affecting the health of the dwellers of the communities; and that children are suffering from very high levels of lead concentration in their blood'. The Commission did not specify how Peru should protect the life and personal safety of the beneficiaries, but it added that 'likewise' the State should 'implement a health assistance and care program for the population, particularly for children, to identify the persons who might have been affected by the consequences of the pollution and provide the relevant medical care; and to begin transferring the deposits in accordance with the best technical conditions as determined by the relevant environmental impact study'.³³

In the context of murders, death threats, disappearances and stigmatization of 35 displaced families living in various districts of the city of Villavicencio (Colombia), the Commission not just requested Colombia to take the necessary measures to guarantee the life and physical integrity of the people involved, but added that persons with the status of internally displaced persons must be provided with 'the humanitarian assistance required, in the light of the Governing Principles of Internal Displacements and domestic law'. In this particular case it referred to information that the families were 'living in misery and/or marginal conditions and under the control of the same paramilitary-type structures that led to their displacement from the municipality of Castillo, on the border of the former zone of détente'.³⁴

Thus the Commission's precautionary measures have sometimes aimed to provide urgent medical or other support and improvement of living conditions for victims of massacres, for victims of forced displacement (in reference to the Governing Principles) and for victims of environmental pollution. They often involve rights that are interrelated. A precautionary measure, for instance, may also have the composite purpose to protect against death threats and harassment, to ensure cultural survival and, as the Commission stressed in its precautionary measure on behalf of the Wiwa People (Colombia), 'to provide humanitarian assistance to the victims of the displacements and food crises, in particular the indigenous people's minor children'.³⁵

2.2.6 Conclusion

The Inter-American Commission, as discussed above, makes a very interesting use of precautionary measures in these cases as they clearly deal with prevention of irreparable harm to persons, but in the context of positive obligations of the government outside the contexts of detention or ³³ CIDH Annual Report 2004, §44. See also section 2.5 on protection against nuclear radiation; Chapter XIII (Protection) on the specificity of the provisional measures and the group of beneficiaries and Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk), including the reference to the use of environmental impact assessment.

³⁴ CIDH Annual Report 2004, §21.

³⁵ In this precautionary measure, taken on behalf of the members of the Wiwa People of the Sierra Nevada, Colombia was also asked 'to agree on collective protection measures, including the presence of a community defender, with the beneficiaries, through their representative organizations'. The Commission mentioned two specific organizations, Annual Report 2005, §14. See also the Commission's precautionary measures of 12 October 2004 on behalf of the Kelyenmagategma Indigenous Community of the Enxet People. They had been forcibly displaced from their ancestral land by individuals who destroyed their homes and working tools. The petitioners had alleged that they were now living in 'deplorable conditions' and that their personal safety was 'in imminent danger'. The Commission requested Paraguay not just to adopt the necessary measures to protect their lives and physical integrity, but also 'to provide humanitarian support to the displaced persons and guarantee their prompt return to their ancestral land'. Annual Report 2004, §41. See further Chapter X (Cultural rights) and Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4.4 (group of beneficiaries).

protection against death threats. While it may take considerable time before the other adjudicators follow suit in using provisional measures to improve social and economic conditions of life that are life threatening or amount to cruel treatment, for the Inter-American Commission the practice now seems firmly established.³⁶ This practice clearly is within the outer limits of the concept of provisional measures aiming to prevent irreversible harm to the claim. In addition, the harm in question constitutes irreparable harm to persons. Thus the Commission's practice is leaning closely towards the common core.

Moreover, on the merits other adjudicators have recognized the positive obligations of States in the context of basic rights such as the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment.³⁷ The African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights, for instance, refers to economic, social and cultural rights as rights that may be legally enforceable. In a case against Zaire (Congo) the African Commission found that failure by a State to provide basic services such as safe drinking water, electricity and medication was a violation of the right to health in Article 16 ACHPR.³⁸ While the adjudicators may have qualms to intervene in such cases already pending the proceedings, for fear of entering into the policy choices of States, once several adjudicators have developed a practice first on the merits and subsequently pending the proceedings (for instance by just asking the State to take measures to prevent irreparable harm to persons, but leaving the State free in choosing the necessary measures), this type of provisional measure could be considered part of the common core not just theoretically, but in practice as well.

2.3 Protecting the physical or mental integrity of minors

2.3.1 Introduction

Outside of the context of detention, refoulement and mass expulsion adjudicators have also been faced with the urgent needs of children.³⁹ The European Court likely faces its share of child custody cases in which risk of harm to the child is at issue.⁴⁰ Yet this section discusses a few occasions in which provisional measures were used in the Inter-American system, involving children of disappeared parents and involving positive obligations to protect against child abuse and take remedial measures. It also refers to the practice of the HRC. After all, the latter has emphasized that the accessible and effective remedies required in Article 2(1) ICCPR 'should be appropriately adapted so as to take account of the special vulnerability of certain categories of persons, including in particular children'.⁴¹

³⁶ The Commission appears to take into account, implicitly the specific situation in countries such as Colombia, El Salvador, etc. when taking such precautionary measures.

³⁷ See e.g. IACHR Yakye Axa Indigenous Community v. Paraguay, Judgment of 17 June 2005. More generally on positive obligations see also e.g. Chapters VII (Detention) and IX (Threats).

³⁸ ACHPR Free Legal Assistance group, and others v. Zaire (1995), §47. For the African Commission's provisional measures in the context of culture and land rights, see the case of the Endorois referred to in Chapter X (Culture). More generally on basic social and economic rights see e.g. Coomans (2003).

³⁹ See the Chapters VII, V and XI respectively.

⁴⁰ See e.g. ECtHR Williams v. Germany, Judgment of 12 September 2002 (struck out) involving a refusal by the Court to take provisional measures to halt the return of a child to its father in the US, but with a priority decision under Rule 41.

⁴¹ HRC General Comment on Article 2 ICCPR, §15.

2.3.2 Children of disappeared parents

On one occasion the Inter-American Court has used provisional measures in the context of identity, guardianship, visiting rights and access of grandmothers of the disappeared to their grandchildren.

In 1993 the President of the Court ordered Argentina to adopt, without delay, the necessary measures to protect the psychological well-being of two minors to avoid (any further) irreparable harm. This was a very difficult case relating to children of disappeared parents. They had been brought up by their kidnappers and initially were not aware that these were not their true parents. Of course, in such case the irreparable harm had already been done a long time ago but, at the same time, the harm was increasing each day the situation continued.⁴² Yet there could be some such situations where the children involved may be harmed even more by having to move to their biological parents or grandparents. In this particular case, the full Court did not need to ratify the President's decision because Argentina had reported that the minors were brought in the custody of their biological family.⁴³

One HRC case relates to the rights of a child of disappeared persons to act against visiting rights of a former caretaker who was complicit in covering up her parents' abduction.⁴⁴ In 1984 the petitioner found her granddaughter, who was then residing in the house of a nurse (S.S.) who claimed that she had taken care of the child since her birth. In January 1989 the petitioner received provisional guardianship of her granddaughter, but in September 1989 the nurse was granted visiting rights. The Supreme Court held that the petitioner had no standing in the proceedings about guardianship because only the parents and legal guardians have standing. By the end of September 1989 the petitioner requested the Court to order a discontinuance of the visits, basing herself on the psychiatric reports on the effects of the visits on her granddaughter. Her legal action in this respect was equally dismissed for lack of standing.⁴⁵ The unwanted visits were continuing in the Spring of 1991. Eventually the visiting rights were terminated in 1991, without intervention by the HRC. In 1995 the HRC found 'that the protection of children stipulated in article 24 of the ⁴² As Buergenthal (1994), p. 79 notes, there is no doubt that the mental harm being caused here falls within the scope of Article 63(2) ACHR. "The more difficult issue, however, is whether, given all the time that has already elapsed, the Commission should not first have decided the claim and then referred the entire case to the Court instead of invoking the Article 63(2) procedure".

⁴³ See IACHR Reggiardo Tolosa (Argentina), Order of the President, 19 November 1993. Thus, the Court decided that there was no longer a need to order the provisional measures requested by the Commission, Order of 19 January 1994.

⁴⁴ HRC Darwinia Rosa Mónaco de Galliccho and her granddaughter Ximena Vicario v. Argentina, 3 April 1995. At the time of the submission the petitioner's granddaughter was 14 years old. In February 1977, when she was nine months old, she was taken with her mother to the headquarters of the federal police in Buenos Aires. The next day her father was arrested as well. Both her parents subsequently disappeared.

⁴⁵ She submitted that further appeals in civil proceedings would be unjustifiably prolonged to the extent that her granddaughter would likely reach the age of legal competence by the time of final decision. Her initial submission was on 2 April 1990. The Special Rapporteur transmitted the case to the State party on 24 August 1990, four months after the initial submission. In her later comments she pointed out that by the spring of 1991 the criminal proceedings about the disappearance had been pending at first instance for more than six years. The psychological state of her granddaughter had deteriorated 'to such an extent that, on an unspecified date, a judge denied S.S. the month of summer vacation with Ximena Vicario she had requested'. He did authorise her to spend a week with the petitioner's granddaughter in April 1991. The petitioner claimed that the civil proceedings would be unjustifiably prolonged.

Covenant required the State party to take affirmative action to grant Ms. Vicario prompt and effective relief from her predicament⁴⁶.

Generally speaking the HRC may not be in the most favourable position to assess the best interests of the child in this type of situation (simply because of the absence of hearings and the lack of geographical proximity), but in the face of convincing and consistent expert reports about the situation of a child, together with a declaration of intent (depending on age) of the child on the one hand and consistent actions or omissions by the State contrary to his or her interests on the other hand, the HRC might indeed consider using provisional measures to prevent irreparable harm in such cases.

Since the situation was ongoing, another question arises, namely at what point interference is necessary in order to prevent or put a stop to irreparable harm. Ongoing violations have a cumulative effect. At what point does this result in irreparable harm?⁴⁷ In light of the different developmental stages and special vulnerability it is clear that for a child action or omissions could have irreparable consequences much sooner than for an adult.⁴⁸ Article 24 ICCPR already acknowledges this by stipulating that every child shall have the right to ‘such measures of protection as are required by his status as a minor on the part of his family, society and the State’. In its General Comment to this article the HRC points out that children must benefit from all rights in the Covenant, not only Article 24 and emphasises, in the context of cultural rights, that States should take every possible measure on behalf of children ‘to foster the development of their personality’.⁴⁹

⁴⁶ The HRC found that the initial denial of standing of her grandmother effectively left Ximena Vicario without adequate representation. This way she was deprived of the protection to which she was entitled as a minor, in violation of Article 24 ICCPR. The HRC pointed out that it was evident that the ‘abduction of Ximena Vicario, the falsification of her birth certificate and her adoption by S.S. entailed numerous acts of arbitrary and unlawful interference with their privacy and family life’ in violation of Articles 17, 23(1), 24(1) and (2) ICCPR. It noted, however, that these acts occurred prior to entry into force of the ICCPR and its OP in November 1986. It then proceeded to examine whether there existed continuing effects of those violations, which in themselves constituted violations of the ICCPR. The HRC observed that the various judicial proceedings extended for more than 10 years. In the meantime the granddaughter, who was 7 years old when found, turned 18 in 1994. Her legal identity as Ximena Vicario was officially recognised only in 1993, when she was 17 years old. “Bearing in mind the suffering already endured by Ms. Vicario, who lost both of her parents under tragic circumstances imputable to State party, the Committee finds that the special measures required under article 24, paragraph 1, of the Covenant were not expeditiously applied by Argentina, and that the failure to recognise the standing of Mrs. Monaco in the guardianship and visitation proceedings and the delay in legally establishing Ms. Vicario’s real name and issuing identity papers also entailed the violation of article 24, paragraph 2, of the Covenant, which is designed to promote recognition of the child’s legal personality”.

⁴⁷ See also section 2.6 of this chapter and Chapter X (Culture), section 3.

⁴⁸ See e.g. Willems (1998).

⁴⁹ The ICCPR refers to the family, society and the State as the responsible parties guaranteeing children the necessary protection. “Although the Covenant does not indicate how such responsibility is to be apportioned, it is primarily incumbent on the family, which is interpreted broadly to include all persons composing it in the society of the State party concerned, and particularly on the parents, to create conditions to promote the harmonious development of the child’s personality and his enjoyment of the rights recognised in the Covenant”. Article 24(4) provides that every child has the right to be registered immediately after birth and to have a name. The HRC considers that this is closely linked to the right to special measures of protection and is designed to promote recognition of the child’s legal personality. Its main purpose is to ‘reduce the danger of abduction, sale of or traffic in children, or of other types of treatment that

As discussed, the Inter-American Court has once intervened urgently in a situation in which the child was in the custody of adoptive parents after her biological parents had been disappeared and in which her grandmother had been unable to establish guardianship.⁵⁰ This is an extremely painful situation and it is difficult to assess how the mental integrity of the children of disappeared parents is ensured best.

While it may indeed be possible to use provisional measures in such a case, it is vital in such circumstances to assess the wishes of the children involved, as a transfer of custody may in fact equally result in irreparable harm to children, if they consider their caretakers as their parents. Apart from the fact that these cases involve the rights of grandparents and other family to establish contact with their grandchildren, who grew up among strangers following the disappearance of their parents, they may also involve the rights of minors indicating a preference for not knowing about their real family, least of all being forced to live with them. In this respect the question whether the people who raised them have in fact been complicit in the disappearance of their parents, by act or omission, is a relevant consideration as well.

2.3.3 Children who have suffered abuse from their parents or caretakers

An interesting case unrelated to a past of disappearances, but more generally involving the positive obligations of the State to protect the physical and mental integrity of children against harm by third parties is that of a five-year-old child in Nicaragua on whose behalf the Inter-American Commission took precautionary measures in 2001. According to the complaint her father had raped her. The petitioners stated that her physical and mental integrity were at risk for the following reasons: her mother refused to believe her relatives' accusations about her husband, she had suspended the psychological treatment recommended by specialists and she had taken the child to prison to visit her father, 'thus causing her emotional problems'.⁵¹ In September 2001 the Commission asked Nicaragua to adopt protective measures on her behalf.

In a different situation, but also involving the positive obligations of the State, in September 2003 the Commission granted precautionary measures on behalf of a seven-year-old to the effect that the State should adopt the necessary measures, 'including specialized medical treatment', in order to protect his 'physical, psychological, and moral health'.⁵² In its Annual Report the Commission noted regarding these precautionary measures that the information available indicated that Michael Roberts⁵³ had been 'a victim of sexual abuse while at children's homes under the Department of Children and Family Services of Jamaica's Ministry of Health, and that even after the abuse was detected, he was the victim of omissions and negligence for lack of adequate treat-are incompatible with the enjoyment of the rights provided for in the Covenant'. HRC General Comment no. 17 on Article 24, 5 April 1989.

⁵⁰ IACHR Reggiardo Tolosa (Argentina), Order of the President of 19 November 1993 and Order of the Court of 19 January 1994.

⁵¹ CIDH Annual Report 2001, §47. In an interview by the author with the late Henry Schermers, member of the European Commission on Human Rights, the latter indicated that he would consider feasible the intervention of the Commission in ongoing child abuse cases, if the State concerned failed to take action to prevent further harm, interview of 3 March 1998 (on file with the author).

⁵² Before taking precautionary measures the Commission first sought information from the State with regard to the situation of the child.

⁵³ For the purposes of the proceedings the child was referred to as 'Michael Roberts. The Commission noted that his real name would be kept under seal to protect his identity.

ment'.⁵⁴ The State responded to the measures with the statement 'that the beneficiary was receiving specialized medical treatment' and 'asked that the precautionary measures be lifted'.⁵⁵ In November of that year the Commission reaffirmed the precautionary measures 'and requested additional information on the medical condition of the beneficiary, and the treatment he was receiving'.⁵⁶

Another form of abuse flows from illegal adoption procedures. The Commission also intervened in such a context, on behalf of 26 children in the process of being adopted. The Commission asked Guatemala to define the conditions and the place where the beneficiaries could be found, and to report on their legal and family status and on the measures it would be taking to protect them.⁵⁷

2.3.4 Conclusion

In situations involving children, adjudicators might use provisional measures in contexts in which they would not on behalf of adults. This is because some situations are likely to impact on the development and thus the life and personal integrity of the child involved.⁵⁸

Yet in the above case by the HRC relating to visiting rights no provisional measures had been taken. In this case the child involved had clearly indicated a wish to live with her real family and carry her real name. As confirmed by psychological reports, the continued encounters with her former caretaker had a negative impact on her.

What is clear in all cases involving minors is that for provisional measures truly to protect the beneficiary there should be sufficient evidence of the psychological impact on the child of continued encounters with certain caretakers or parental figures and, taking into account developmental stages, there should also be sufficient evidence of the will expressed by the child itself, e.g. in an interview with an independent psychologist.

2.4 Protection against nuclear radiation

The ICJ, but also the HRC and the European Commission on Human Rights have been faced with requests for provisional measures to halt nuclear tests. The ICJ dealt with the issue in the Nuclear Test cases (1973-1974).⁵⁹ It used provisional measures in June 1973, ordering France to avoid ⁵⁴ The Commission added that the 'diagnosis in the record' indicated that Michael Roberts 'suffers from post-traumatic stress disorder and that the absence of adequate medical treatment tends to give rise to behavior such as sexual aggression directed at other children'.

⁵⁵ CIDH Annual Report 2003, §55.

⁵⁶ Ibid.

⁵⁷ CIDH Annual Report 2007, 33 ('The persons requesting the measures allege that the adoption procedures are irregular, and that the children are being housed in private homes without judicial authorization and in violation of the law. It is also indicated that there is no information on the conditions in which the children were separated from their biological parents, and that adoption procedures are being carried out through civil-law notary proceedings without the supervision of the competent authorities').

⁵⁸ See e.g. Willems (1998).

⁵⁹ ICJ Nuclear Test Cases (New Zealand v. France and Australia v. France), Orders for provisional measures of 22 June 1973. In Judgments of 20 December 1974 the ICJ found that the applications by the two States, dating from 9 May 1973, no longer had any object. Their aim had been achieved in as much as France had announced its intention not to carry out further atmospheric nuclear tests now that it had completed the 1974 series. The ICJ considered that France was held to adhere to its unilateral declaration in good faith.

nuclear tests causing a radioactive fall-out on Australian or New Zealand territory. Nevertheless, France carried out a series of atmospheric nuclear tests in 1974.⁶⁰

Different from the ICJ none of the human rights adjudicators has used provisional measures either to halt nuclear tests or to take positive measures to protect persons against nuclear radiation. Thus far petitioners have unsuccessfully requested the HRC and the European Commission to order provisional measures to halt nuclear tests. In Bordes and Temeharo v. France (1996) the petitioners were French citizens residing in Papeete, Tahiti, French Polynesia.⁶¹ In June 1995 President Chirac announced the intent to conduct a series of underground nuclear tests in the South Pacific on the atolls of Mururoa and Fangataufa. The petitioners claimed that these tests would threaten their right to life (Article 6 ICCPR) and their right not to be subjected to arbitrary interference with their privacy and family life (Article 17 ICCPR).⁶² They requested the HRC to use provisional measures. The HRC decided not to grant the protection requested. It may be concluded from the unusual fact that it mentions that it discussed the request for provisional measures during two consecutive sessions, that the refusal to order provisional measures had been a difficult decision.⁶³ Between 5 September 1995 and the beginning of 1996 the French authorities carried out six underground nuclear tests. In July 1996 the HRC declared the case inadmissible because the petitioners did not satisfy the victim requirement. The question arises whether the Committee's reason not to use provisional measures was the fact that it already anticipated this,⁶⁴ or was more generally based on its reluctance to get involved in such a highly politicised issue. It had previously noted, in a different case, that the individual complaint procedure was not meant for public policy discussions on issues such as nuclear weapons.⁶⁵

In a case brought before the European Commission on Human Rights in order to prevent the same tests in the South Pacific, the Commission similarly denied the request for provisional measures and subsequently declared the case inadmissible (December 1995).⁶⁶ As noted, the tests had already taken place by that time.

The President of the Commission had rejected two consecutive requests for provisional measures to the effect that the State should be requested not to proceed with the renewed nuclear tests.⁶⁷ The subsequent request was rejected by the Commission as a whole, during its session in ⁶⁰ See Chapter I.

⁶¹ HRC Vaihere Bordes and John Temeharo v. France, 22 July 1996. Initially Tauria also took part in the complaint, but later he withdrew his participation because of his involvement in a case pending before the European Commission on Human Rights, also discussed in this section.

⁶² See also Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

⁶³ HRC Vaihere Bordes and John Temeharo v. France, 22 July 1996 (inadm.), § 1-2.3 (discussion on provisional measures during the 54th and the 55th sessions).

⁶⁴ See Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

⁶⁵ See e.g. HRC E.W. and others v. the Netherlands, 8 April 1993 (inadm.). It recalled its second General Comment on Article 6, in which it noted that 'the designing, testing, manufacture, possession and deployment of nuclear weapons are among the greatest threats to the right to life which confront mankind today', §6.2. At the same time it considered 'that the procedure laid down in the Optional Protocol was not designed for conducting public debate over matters of public policy, such as support for disarmament and issues concerning nuclear and other weapons of mass destruction'. It declared the case inadmissible as 'at the relevant period of time', the situation did not 'place the authors in the position to claim to be victims whose right to life was then violated or under imminent prospect of violation', §6.4.

⁶⁶ EComHR Tauria et al. v. France, 4 December 1995 (inadm.).

⁶⁷ Requests of 8 and 17 August, rejected by the President on 10 and 21 August, respectively, EComHR Tauria et al. v. France, 4 December 1995 (inadm.), under 'Procédure devant la Commission'.

September 1995. At that time it did decide to grant the case priority under Rule 33 of its Rules of Procedure.⁶⁸

When it declared the case inadmissible it noted, among others, that simply invoking risks inherent in the use of nuclear energy, whether used for military or for civil purposes, was insufficient for making a showing that the petitioners would become victims of a violation of the Convention and thereby fulfilled the victim requirement. It pointed out that a great many human activities generated risk. The petitioners had failed to substantiate that the likelihood of risk of harm, despite the sufficient precautions ('précautions suffisantes') taken by the authorities, would be such as to constitute a violation of the Convention. Moreover, the Commission considered that the consequences of the action were too remote.⁶⁹

In order to understand the Commission's decision not to use provisional measures pending the proceedings it may be useful to examine part of the State's arguments, which involved a reference to the concept of irreparable harm. It had argued, among others, that the decision to resume nuclear tests was not an act, like extradition or expulsion,⁷⁰ that would as such and necessarily result in a violation of the Convention. In fact, it argued, the implementation of the decision did not itself constitute a violation, but the violations lay only in the consequences that the petitioners attributed to it, namely a pollution of the environment harming the population. It also argued that the domestic remedies had not yet been exhausted as there would be several such remedies once actual damage were shown. The State then noted that the petitioners' argument that this would be too late was based on the mistaken idea that nuclear tests would necessarily result in irreparable harm ('un préjudice irréparable').⁷¹

The findings by the Commission itself indicate its difficulty in grappling with the scientific claims asserted by both parties. It pointed out that it was only exceptionally that the victim requirement was fulfilled when it concerned a future risk and that the petitioners had failed to provide sufficient evidence showing that this exception was applicable here. The Commission did not consider it opportune to decide on the scientific validity of the various expert reports, particularly ⁶⁸ Decision of 5 September 1995 on the renewed request by the petitioners of 31 August 1995, EComHR Tauira et al. v. France, 4 December 1995 (inadm.), under 'Procédure devant la Commission'.

⁶⁹ EComHR Tauira et al. v. France, 4 December 1995 (inadm.), §2 (¶29). The Commission considered that accidents could always happen, but the petitioners could not show that France had failed to take all necessary measures to prevent such an accident, (¶30). There was such controversy among scientists as to the question whether the tests would fracture the atolls, that the petitioners could not base themselves on this 'hypothetical fracturing' for the purpose of proving they met the victim requirement (¶31). It was not contested that in the past the atmospheric tests had resulted in radioactive contamination, but what was contested was the level of contamination and the consequences for the environment in general and for the health of the population in particular. In any case the Commission considered that the petitioners had furnished insufficient information on their work at Mururoa in the past, that could have exposed them to the radiation (¶32). Moreover, apart from the fact that the petition was directed against the June 1995 decision to resume the tests halted in 1992 and not at the previous period, the petitioners had failed to submit information on their state of health (¶33). Regarding the risk of contamination of the food chain, including the consumption of migratory fish (that would be contaminated at the sites, more than 1000 km from the residence of the petitioners), the Commission considered that the petitioners had provided insufficient evidence for it to conclude that they could be victims of a violation of the Convention, as the resumption of the tests would presently have repercussions that would be too remote for this resumption to be considered an act that would directly affect their personal situation (¶35).

⁷⁰ To a State where the petitioner would face a real risk of ill treatment.

⁷¹ EComHR Tauira et al. v. France, 4 December 1995 (inadm.), §2 (¶4).

as the experts themselves expressed differing views. The Commission's decision does not refer to the precautionary principle and it would appear that the petitioners had not invoked it.⁷²

In Athanassoglou et al. v. Switzerland (2000) the ECtHR (Grand Chamber) had decided, by sixteen votes with one abstention, not to take provisional measures to halt resumption of the operation of a nuclear power plant. It subsequently found on the merits that the rights claimed (Article 6 on the right to a fair trial and Article 13 ECHR on the right to an effective remedy) were not applicable. The petitioners had claimed that they had no access to court and no effective remedy under domestic law to enable them to complain of a violation of their right to life (Article 2) and of a violation of their right to respect for physical integrity. In the latter context they invoked Article 8 (privacy and family life). The Court found that the connection between the domestic procedure about the extension of the operation of the power plant 'and the domestic-law rights to protection of life, physical integrity and property' invoked by the petitioners 'was too tenuous and remote to attract the application of Article 6 § 1'.⁷³ Equally, the petitioners did not have an arguable claim of violations of Articles 2 and 8 in relation to the domestic law decision in question and, consequently, no entitlement to a remedy under Article 13.⁷⁴ The Court, and previously the Commission, did not directly examine Articles 2 and 8 ECHR. The request for provisional measures, on the other hand, clearly related to life and physical integrity rather than just access to court and the right to an effective remedy. An argument could be made that halting resumption of the operation of the nuclear power plant would be the only way to ensure the right to an effective remedy invoked in the petition. A domestic remedy that could not achieve the aim for which it was invoked could not be considered effective. Yet on the merits the majority of the Court considered that the petitioners resorted to a domestic remedy that was not sufficiently related to the right to life and respect for the home. The question arises to what extent this was or should have been clear already at the stage of provisional measures. After all, five members of the Court had considered that the petitioners' claims domestically had been arguable and that Arts 6 and 13 were indeed applicable.⁷⁵

Exceptionally, the Judgment indicates that the decision not to take provisional measures was made 'by sixteen votes with one abstention'.⁷⁶ What it does not indicate is the reasoning for this decision. It is possible that some judges did not see a sufficient link with Article 2 because the ⁷² Id., §2 (¶11) indicates that the petitioners argued that they had had been refused access to information in light of military secrets and they had been refused access to medical dossiers. A reference was also made to the Rio Declaration, but apparently without specifically invoking the precautionary principle (¶14).

⁷³ ECtHR Athanassoglou et al. v. Switzerland, 6 April 2000, §59.

⁷⁴ Five members dissented. In passing they also said something about risk that may explain why the Grand Chamber had decided not to take provisional measures: "One might of course question whether it is impossible to establish that the danger exists to the requisite degree. For example, it is virtually impossible to prove imminent danger in the case of inherently dangerous installations: the catastrophes that have happened in a number of countries were obviously unforeseeable or, in any event, unforeseen". See ECtHR Athanassoglou et al. v. Switzerland, 6 April 2000, joint dissenting opinion Costa, Tulkens, Fischbach, Casadevall and Maruste.

⁷⁵ ECtHR Athanassoglou et al. v. Switzerland, 6 April 2000, joint dissenting opinion Costa, Tulkens, Fischbach, Casadevall and Maruste. They considered that the 'nature of administrative decisions to grant or refuse applications for licences to operate nuclear power plants does not mean that they should be exempt from judicial review; on the contrary, the dangers presented to the environment and the population by such installations make it, if anything, more necessary for such decisions to be subject to review by an independent and impartial tribunal an adversarial proceedings aided, of course, by expert evidence'.

⁷⁶ ECtHR Athanassoglou et al. v. Switzerland, 6 April 2000, §7. Moreover, usually it is the President rather than the full (Grand) Chamber who decides on the use of provisional measures, see Chapter II (Systems), but in this case it was the Grand Chamber.

petition was based on Articles 6 and 13 ECHR. It is also possible that they considered that if there were a link they would still not be able to prove 'a specific and imminent danger in their personal regard'.⁷⁷

The HRC has also dealt with a case involving storage of radioactive waste near residential areas. The petitioner had requested the Committee 'to consider the matter and to urge the Canadian Government to remove all radioactive waste from Port Hope to a permanent, properly managed, dumpsite away from human habitation'.⁷⁸ The HRC transmitted the case to the State party more than three months later. It did not use (informal) provisional measures. Almost a year later it did request information from the State as to how the residents were assisted in the clearance process,⁷⁹ but upon receipt of the State's responses in this respect it declared the complaint inadmissible for non-exhaustion of domestic remedies.⁸⁰

These cases indicate that, thus far, the human rights adjudicators have not used provisional measures to halt nuclear tests or to order a State to take positive measures to protect residents against nuclear radiation. This may be explained by the political sensitivity of the subject matter, the conviction that it is a policy issue and the related difficulty in fulfilling the 'victim requirement'. Conflicting scientific evidence in particular appears to be a serious stumbling block for ⁷⁷ ECtHR Athanassoglou et al. v. Switzerland, 6 April 2000, §52. After all, the Court eventually observed that the petitioners were rather alleging 'a general danger in relation to all nuclear power plants'. '(M)any of the grounds they relied on related to safety, environmental and technical features inherent in the use of nuclear energy', §52. Thus they were 'seeking to derive' from Art. 6(1) ECHR 'a remedy to contest the very principle of the use of nuclear energy', §53. The Court considered that 'how best to regulate the use of nuclear power is a policy decision for each Contracting State to take according to its democratic processes', §54. See also Chapter XII (Protection), discussing the beneficiaries of provisional measures. The dissenters considered that the fact 'that popular initiatives have enabled the public democratically to declare itself in favour of the State nuclear programme does not to our mind mean that a concrete judicial review would be devoid of purpose'. It is nevertheless possible that the dissenters did vote against the use of provisional measures, as did those in the majority, in order to avoid an actio popularis. Another explanation may be their doubts about the urgency and risk involved. See Chapter XV (Immediacy and Risk).

⁷⁸ HRC E.H.P. v. Canada, 27 October 1982 (inadm.), §2.

⁷⁹ Id., §6.

⁸⁰ Id. The petitioner had submitted the complaint in April 1980, on her own behalf and, 'as Chairman of the Port Hope Environmental Group, on behalf of present and future generations of Port Hope, Ontario, Canada, including 129 Port Hope residents who have specifically authorised the author to act on their behalf', §1.1. The HRC treated the petitioner's reference to 'future generations' as 'an expression of concern purporting to put into due perspective the importance of the matter raised in the communication', §8(a). Port Hope was a town of about 10,000 inhabitants. In 1975 large-scale pollution of their houses and other buildings was discovered. About 200,000 tons of radioactive waste remained in this town. During the cleaning process the waste was stored in eight 'temporary' disposal sites near or directly beside residences. One of them was approximately 100 yards from the public swimming pool. Some of these 'temporary' disposal sites were still in existence more than thirty years after they were licensed. Pending the case the HRC had asked the State party whether the federal government was in a position to assure the HRC that it would give the necessary assistance if the owners of the sites were otherwise unable to heed to an injunction to the effect that they should clear the sites. Canada responded that resolving the problem was 'a matter which necessarily involves delay due to certain practical and technical considerations', §7. If the petitioner was unwilling to accept such delay, 'inherent in resolving the problem, she could seek injunctive relief against the owners of the sites'. It also referred to other possibilities for domestic recourse. On the basis of the State's responses the HRC declared the case inadmissible for non-exhaustion of domestic remedies.

them to decide on a nexus between an act or omission and a risk to life.⁸¹ Yet a precedent is already available in general international law in the form of the ICJ's provisional measures in the aforementioned case by Australia and New Zealand against France. Moreover, exposure to risk of nuclear radiation potentially concerns preventing irreparable harm to persons, involving their very survival, which conceptually would be situated more towards the common core than towards the outer limits of the concept. If a practice were to develop in which human rights adjudicators would regard the issue as one involving human rights and in which they would start to order provisional measures, the type of provisional measure involved would indeed fall within the common core.

2.5 Preservation of IVF embryos

There is one occasion on which one of the human rights adjudicators, the European Court of Human Rights, used provisional measures in order to prevent the destruction of several embryos created through the harvesting of eggs and their fertilization in vitro.

In February 2005 the ECtHR indicated to the UK that 'it was desirable, in the interests of the proper conduct of the proceedings that the Government take appropriate measures to ensure that the embryos were preserved until the Court had completed the examination of the case'.⁸²

For medical reasons (the removal of ovaries because of tumours) the petitioner had been told to wait two years before attempting to implant any of the embryos in her uterus. Meanwhile the relationship with her partner, with whom she had created the embryos, had broken down and her former partner informed the clinic involved of his wish for the embryos to be destroyed. The petitioner argued that the particular domestic legislation invoked by her ex partner prevented her 'from using the embryos she and J had created together, and thus, given her particular circumstances, from ever having a child to whom she is genetically related'.⁸³

While it was at first the President of the Chamber instituted to deal with the case that had ordered the provisional measures (and decided that the case should be given priority treatment), four months later the full Chamber confirmed these measures.⁸⁴

On the merits the Court held that there had been no violation of Article 2 (life), Article 8 (respect for private life)⁸⁵ and Article 14 (non-discrimination) in conjunction with Article 8 ECHR. Yet it decided to maintain its provisional measures until such time as the judgment would become final, or until further order.⁸⁶ Indeed, the petitioner requested referral of the case to the Grand Chamber. A panel of the Grand Chamber granted this request in July 2006 and on that day the President of the Court decided to prolong the provisional measures.⁸⁷ On the merits the Grand Chamber's decision was similar to the above decision by the Chamber.⁸⁸ This meant that eventually the petitioner was unable to prevent destruction of the embryos.

This was the first time that the ECtHR, or any human rights adjudicator, dealt with a case such as this and given the irreversible nature of the destruction of the embryos the use of provisional measures was within the outer limits of the concept.

⁸¹ See further Chapter I (ICJ), section 5.3.3 and Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

⁸² ECtHR Evans v. UK, 7 March 2006, §3. See also ECtHR (Grand Chamber) Evans v. UK, 10 April 2007, §5.

⁸³ ECtHR (Grand Chamber) Evans v. UK, 10 April 2007, §72.

⁸⁴ ECtHR Evans v. UK, 7 March 2006, §4.

⁸⁵ See dissenting opinion of judges Traja and Mijović.

⁸⁶ ECtHR Evans v. UK, 7 March 2006, §77, fifth declaratory clause.

⁸⁷ ECtHR (Grand Chamber) Evans v. UK, 10 April 2007, §7.

⁸⁸ See also the joint dissenting opinion of Judges Türmen, Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Spielman and Ziemele.

Moreover, given that the private life argument may make feasible an argument based on personal integrity and the so-called ‘project of life’,⁸⁹ as to underlying rationale this case may be situated more closely towards the common core of the concept than towards the outer limits. Yet there is no practice by the other adjudicators and given the judgment on the merits it is unlikely that the ECtHR will deal with a similar case in the near future. In addition, in this case the ‘project of life’ argument would apply in some measure to the petitioner’s partner as well,⁹⁰ indeed making it a situation that may at present be more appropriately dealt with by each European State individually, as the Court considered with its reference to the margin of appreciation.⁹¹

2.6 Releasing from (prolonged) arbitrary detention

2.6.1 Introduction

There are a few cases in which international adjudicators have dealt with requests by petitioners for provisional measures aimed at someone’s release from arbitrary detention or at preventing an arbitrary detention altogether. In yet fewer cases adjudicators have actually ordered such measures.

As discussed in Chapter I, in the Hostages case the ICJ had ordered provisional measures to the effect that Iran should make sure that the persons taken hostage in the US Consulate in Tehran would be released. While its findings on the merits were based on the law of diplomatic and consular relations and specifically concerned the detention of internationally protected persons the ICJ noted more generally:

“Wrongfully to deprive human beings of their freedom and to subject them to physical restraint in conditions of hardship is in itself manifestly incompatible with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations, as well as with the fundamental principles enunciated in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights”.⁹²

The importance attached by the international community to protection against arbitrary detention is apparent from the institution in 1991 of the UN Working Group on Arbitrary Detention, which constituted the fourth UN thematic mechanism.⁹³ This Working Group has developed a practice

⁸⁹ On the concept of ‘project of life’ see section 2.1 of this Chapter and references therein.

⁹⁰ His life plan might have been affected by becoming a father, even uninvolved, of a child with whose mother he no longer is in a relationship. Yet this would appear to impact his project of life to a lesser extent, taking into account the impact on him of becoming an (uninvolved) father of a child to which he was genetically related, on the one hand, at this point in his life, and the impact of destroying the embryos on her project of life, on the other hand, given that this was her only chance of becoming a parent of a child to which she was genetically related.

⁹¹ Yet see the criticisms against this approach, e.g. Forder/Wittingham (2006), pp. 863-880; Brems (2006), pp. 428-442 and Bomhoff/Zucca (2006), pp. 431-440 commenting the judgment of 7 March 2006.

⁹² ICJ US Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran (US v. Iran) (Hostages case), Judgment of 24 May 1980, §91. See further Chapter I, section 3.3.3.

⁹³ Following the Working Group on Disappearances and the two Special Rapporteurs, one against torture and inhuman treatment and the other against summary and arbitrary executions. In addition, the Restatement (Third) of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States, §702, dating from 1985, mentions the prohibition of prolonged arbitrary detention as a peremptory rule of international law.

of resorting to an urgent action procedure, which it has referred to as necessarily exceptional in principle and summary in method.⁹⁴

As noted, some human rights adjudicators have used provisional measures because of the alleged arbitrary nature of a detention as well. These measures could aim either at the prevention of detention in the first place, or at the release of detainees pending the proceedings. If the beneficiaries of these provisional measures are facing a clear threat to their lives or personal integrity the measures clearly belong to the common core.⁹⁵ If the situations in which these provisional measures are used do not involve direct threats of ill-treatment and direct risks to life the question arises whether they belong to the common core of the concept of provisional measures or even whether they belong within the outer limits.

2.6.2 Practice in the Inter-American system

The Inter-American Commission has used precautionary measures several times in order to intervene in a situation of arbitrary detention. The Inter-American Court may have done so once, although it continued to stress the life and safety of the beneficiary rather than his release.

In general the Court has not been keen on using provisional measures in this context.

In January 1993 it explicitly refused a request for provisional measures. This was in response to a request by the Inter-American Commission on behalf of Carlos Chipoco, a 'human rights activist' who had 'taken part in the Neira Alegria et al. and in the Cayara case'.⁹⁶ The Commission argued that should he return to Peru and be arrested he could face a prison sentence of more than 20 years, lose his nationality and be held in the same detention place as the 'leaders and activists of the terrorist groups whose acts he has publicly condemned, which would constitute a grave threat to his right to life and integrity of the person which are recognized by the Convention'. It considered that the Peruvian Government wanted to 'punish, penalize and intimidate those who utilize international procedures and courts for the protection of human rights'.⁹⁷ The ⁹⁴ It was in 1993 that it decided on 'Criteria to resort to the "urgent action" procedure'. It considered that apart from its normal reason for using this procedure, namely 'where there are sufficiently reliable allegations that a person is being detained arbitrarily and that the continuation of the detention constitutes a serious danger to the person's health or even life', it could also use this procedure 'where the detention may not constitute a danger to the person's health or life, but where the particular circumstances of the situation warrant urgent action'. It noted that in this case the Chairman must secure the agreement of two other members of the Working Group. See UN Working Group on Arbitrary Detention Deliberation 03 under D. Its Revised Methods of work, which are reproduced in Fact Sheet No. 26 on the Working Group on Arbitrary Detention, Annex IV (undated), discuss the Urgent Action Procedure in §IV: "A procedure known as "urgent action" may be resorted to in the following cases: (a) In cases in which there are sufficiently reliable allegations that a person is being arbitrarily deprived of his liberty and that the continuation of such deprivation constitutes a serious threat to that person's health or even to his life; (b) In cases in which, even if no such threat is alleged to exist, there are particular circumstances that warrant an urgent action. (c) The Chairman, or in his absence the Vice Chairman, shall transmit the appeal by the most rapid means to the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the country concerned". See E/CN.4/1993/24, 12 January 1993.

⁹⁵ See also Chapter VII (Health in detention).

⁹⁶ IACHR Chipoco case, President's Order denying provisional measures of 14 December 1992, 4th 'Having seen' clause.

⁹⁷ Id., 6th 'Having seen' clause. Peru had filed criminal charges against him and other Peruvians residing abroad 'for allegedly committing the crime of justification of terrorism against the state', 3rd 'Having seen' clause. Among others he was charged with activities in the US 'in support of subversion' such as 'maintaining contacts with human rights organizations, with false information, in which they denigrate the Armed Forces and the Police and other State institutions

Commission, which had yet to decide on the merits in this case, requested the Court's provisional measures.⁹⁸

What made the situation urgent, according to the Commission, was the need to avoid that an he would be indicted 'without an exhaustive investigation and without having afforded the accused or his representatives an opportunity to prepare his defense'.⁹⁹ This, in the argument of the Commission, would violate the right to a fair trial (Article 8 ACHR) and also constitute a violation of the right to humane treatment (Article 5), freedom of thought and expression (Article 13) and the general obligation to respect rights (Article 1(1), as well as the possibility to resort to the Commission and Court.¹⁰⁰

The Court decided it was 'inappropriate at this time' for it to order provisional measures.¹⁰¹ It considered that the case concerned 'a matter which is not presently before the Court, but rather before the Commission, and the latter has not submitted information to the Court sufficient to support the adoption of such measures, which requires the Commission to have gathered preliminary evidence to support a presumption of the truth of the allegations and of a situation whose grave seriousness and urgency could cause irreparable harm to persons'.¹⁰² In other words, before ordering provisional measures, or apparently even before holding a hearing on the request for provisional measures, the Court required more evidence both on the facts alleged and on the possibility that the situation could cause irreparable harm to persons.¹⁰³

Juan Mendez, who at the time was litigating this case as an attorney at Human Rights Watch,¹⁰⁴ mentions that the petitioners had alleged that Chipoco's liberty was at stake, not his life or physical integrity.¹⁰⁵ This, together with the fact that Mr. Chipoco was still present in the US, may also help explain the Court's refusal to order provisional measures.¹⁰⁶

A few years later the Court dealt with another request by the Commission involving arbitrary detention. In 1996 the President of the Court did take urgent measures to the effect that Ecuador was to adopt forthwith the measures necessary 'to effectively ensure the physical and related to the struggle against subversion', see 3rd 'Having seen' clause. The Commission's request added that he had condemned the terrorist acts carried out by the Shining Path and MRTA and 'has been critical of the acts of rebels as well as those of the Peruvian Government'. Id., 4th 'Having seen' clause.

⁹⁸ See Article 63(2) ACHR, last sentence. See further Chapter II (Systems). The request was to the effect that Peru would 'establish as soon as possible the veracity of the allegations' and if they 'are found to be true, that it carry out an exhaustive investigation, specify the acts on which the charge of justification of terrorism is based, and disclose the evidence against Mr. Chipoco, prior to taking any penal actions against him'. Moreover, at all stages of the proceedings Peru was to guarantee him 'the full exercise of his human rights and, in particular, the right to due process and personal security, should he be deprived of his personal liberty, and taking into account the danger to which he would be exposed wherever he might be held'. Finally, Peru should 'guarantee the right to recur to the American system for the protection of human rights', see IACHR Chipoco case, President's Order denying provisional measures of 14 December 1992, 1st 'Having seen' clause.

⁹⁹ IACHR Chipoco case Order of 27 January 1993 denying provisional measures, 4th 'Considering' clause.

¹⁰⁰ IACHR Chipoco case, Order denying provisional measures of 14 December 1992, 7th 'Having seen' clause

¹⁰¹ IACHR Chipoco case Order of 27 January 1993 denying provisional measures, 1st 'Resolving' clause.

¹⁰² Id., 2nd 'Whereas' clause.

¹⁰³ On evidentiary issues see also Chapter XV.

¹⁰⁴ Subsequently he became a member of the Inter-American Commission.

¹⁰⁵ Interview of author with Juan Mendez, Washington DC, 17 October 2001.

¹⁰⁶ Id.

moral integrity of Mr. Rafael Iván Suárez-Rosero, so that any provisional measures that the Inter-American Court may take can have the requisite effect'.¹⁰⁷ Yet he did not heed to the Commission's request to seek from Ecuador such provisional measures as were 'necessary to ensure that Mr. Iván Suárez-Rosero is immediately released pending continuation of the procedures'.¹⁰⁸ The Commission had stated that his situation was 'extremely grave, inasmuch as it may cause him irreparable damage' as he had been 'held in preventive detention for a longer period than he would have served had he been tried and convicted'.¹⁰⁹ The President decided not to take these urgent measures, which, he noted, implied 'anticipation of certain effects that would be produced by the judgment on the merits which this Court may deliver'.¹¹⁰ He observed that the Commission had found on the merits that the imprisonment of the alleged victim was contrary to the ACHR. In that sense the measures requested were 'precautionary measures described in legal writings as partially restitutive or anticipatory and which the court cannot prescribe without first hearing the adversary, in this case the Government of Ecuador'.¹¹¹ One requisite for provisional measures was 'a preliminary analysis of the situation that necessitates the order for provisional measures'.¹¹² The President pointed out that he was only authorized to order urgent measures. It was 'for the Court at its next session to decide on the appropriateness of the anticipatory provisional measures sought by the Commission, which can only be granted after the Government concerned has been heard'.¹¹³ This means he did not rule out 'anticipatory provisional measures' as such, but just his own authority to order urgent measures to this effect.¹¹⁴ The Court itself did not deal with this issue. It observed that the reasons for the President to order urgent measures had ceased to exist with the release of the beneficiary and the fact that the Commission had noted that 'there was currently no risk to the safety of Mr. Suárez-Rosero and his family'.¹¹⁵

In the case of Cesti-Hurtado the Inter-American Commission did take precautionary measures, but the Inter-American Court refused to order provisional measures. In February 1997 Mr. Cesti-Hurtado was detained in the Simón Bolívar barracks in Peru. He was tried by military courts despite an order by a domestic court for his release issued in a habeas corpus ruling. In April the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights took precautionary measures and requested Peru to report within 30 days 'on whether it had completely complied with the order of habeas corpus [and] which measures [would be] adopted'.¹¹⁶ 'Furthermore, it requested the State to submit information on the medical attention that Gustavo Adolfo Cesti Hurtado had received'.¹¹⁷ In May Peru responded by arguing that its military courts had jurisdiction and that the seven year sentence imposed on Mr Cesti-Hurtado was justified. Subsequently the Commission requested the Court to order Peru to comply with the domestic habeas corpus ruling.

¹⁰⁷ IACHR Suárez-Rosero (Ecuador), Order of 12 April 1996 (President). Later that same month the President expanded the urgent measures to include the family members of the detainee, Order of 24 April 1996 (President).

¹⁰⁸ IACHR Suárez-Rosero (Ecuador), Order of 12 April 1996 (President), 4th 'Considering' clause.

¹⁰⁹ Ibid.

¹¹⁰ IACHR Suárez-Rosero (Ecuador), Order of 12 April 1996 (President), 6th 'Considering' clause.

¹¹¹ Ibid.

¹¹² Ibid.

¹¹³ IACHR Suárez-Rosero (Ecuador), Order of 12 April 1996 (President), 8th 'Considering' clause.

¹¹⁴ See also Chapter II (Systems), section 4.3 on the urgent measures by the President before the Court has convened to decide on provisional measures.

¹¹⁵ IACHR Suárez-Rosero (Ecuador), Order of 28 June 1996, 2nd and 3rd 'Considering' clause.

¹¹⁶ CIDH Cesti Hurtado (Peru) precautionary measures of 25 April 1997, referred to in IACHR Order of 29 July 1997, 'Having Seen' clause 2(i).

¹¹⁷ CIDH Cesti Hurtado (Peru) precautionary measure of 25 April 1997, referred to in IACHR Judgment of 29 September 1999, §7.

As the Court was not sitting at the time, the President had to provide an initial response. He did not grant this specific request by the Commission but instead took urgent measures proprio motu with the aim to protect his health.¹¹⁸ The Court confirmed this by ordering provisional measures proprio motu in order to protect his health.¹¹⁹ It equally noted that ‘the facts and circumstances raised by the Commission’ implied that there was a ‘direct link’ between the Commission’s request for his release, in compliance with the order of habeas corpus issued by the domestic court and the very merits of the case placed before the Inter-American Commission. This matter was ‘for the Commission to decide at this stage’ and ‘(t)o accept the request of the Commission would mean that the Court could advance criteria on the merits of a case which is not before it yet’.¹²⁰

Eventually this case was completed by the Commission and brought before the Court. Referring, among others, to the refusal of the military authorities to obey and execute the legitimate order of domestic court, the Inter-American Court determined that his right to personal liberty had indeed been violated.¹²¹ Several years later the President of the Inter-American Court again denied a request by the representative of the victim for provisional measures on his behalf.¹²² He noted that at the stage of provisional measures the merits should not be examined unless strictly related to the extreme gravity, urgency and the need to prevent irreparable harm to persons.¹²³ He noted that it was not the type of situation that would warrant provisional measures. Instead it related to the supervision of compliance with the Court’s judgment in this case.¹²⁴ Indeed the Court subsequently did deal with this issue in an order on the State’s non-compliance.¹²⁵

The above cases indicate that the Inter-American Commission has taken a more liberal approach to the use of provisional measures in these circumstances than the Inter-American Court.¹²⁶ It was in the case of General Gallardo that the Court was persuaded to intervene pending the procedure to order a halt to a prolonged arbitrary detention. In November 2001 the Commission had already taken precautionary measures in this case.¹²⁷ General Gallardo, who had criti-

¹¹⁸ IACHR Cesti Hurtado (Peru), Order of the President of 29 July 1997, 5th and 6th ‘Considering’ clauses.

¹¹⁹ See further Chapter VII (Detention).

¹²⁰ IACHR Cesti Hurtado (Peru), Order of 11 September 1997, 5th ‘Considering’ clause.

¹²¹ IACHR Cesti Hurtado (Peru), Judgment on the merits of 29 September 1999. See further the judgment on reparations of 31 May 2001 and on the request for interpretation of 27 November 2001 (regarding the indemnities due to Mr Cesti)

¹²² IACHR Cesti Hurtado v. Peru, Order of the President of 21 December 2005 (denying provisional measures).

¹²³ IACHR Cesti Hurtado v. Peru, Order of the President of 21 December 2005, 5th ‘Considering’ clause. See also Jorge Castañeda Gutman, Order of 25 November 2005, 8th ‘Considering’ clause and James and Others (Trinidad and Tobago), Order of 29 August 1998, 6th ‘Considering’ clause.

¹²⁴ ACHR Cesti Hurtado v. Peru, Order of the President of 21 December 2005, 6th ‘Considering’ clause.

¹²⁵ ACHR Cesti Hurtado v. Peru, Resolution of 22 September 2006.

¹²⁶ This does not mean that it always uses precautionary measures. See e.g. IACHR Figueredo Planchart v. Venezuela, 13 April 2000. The petitioner had requested the Commission to order precautionary measures to the effect that the execution of his arrest warrant should be suspended so as to avert irreparable injury to his ‘physical and moral integrity’ and to allow him to ‘come forward at liberty, subject to due assurances and guarantees, to exercise his right of defense in the proceedings against him’, §24. At the same time he also requested the Commission to appeal to the Court for provisional measures, §25-27.

¹²⁷ CIDH Gallardo v. Mexico, precautionary measures of 2 November 2001, Annual Report 2001, §43. The substance of the precautionary measures was as follows: ‘measures to protect Gen.

cised corruption and human rights violations by the Mexican Army, remained in prison in spite of the Commission's specific recommendations in its decision on the merits with regard to his case, determining violations of the ACHR.¹²⁸ In its Annual Report the Commission subsequently noted that the gravity and urgency of this case arose from the ongoing violations faced by General Gallardo in jail: 'the harassment he receives from the prison authorities and a series of threats and incidents involving him and his family that have never been fully cleared up'.¹²⁹ The State did not respect the Commission's precautionary measures and the Commission requested the Court to order provisional measures. As noted, this time, and different from the previous cases, the President of the Inter-American Court indeed decided to take urgent measures, in anticipation of the Court's provisional measures.¹³⁰ The Commission had requested these measures to avoid irreparable damage to the life, and the physical, psychological and moral well-being' of the General 'and also to his freedom of expression related to his life'. The provisional measures were also requested to prevent irreparable harm to the psychological and moral well-being of his wife and children. Regarding his eight year old daughter the Commission requested the Court to adopt 'special protection measures to safeguard her safety'. In other words, it argued that Gallardo's continued detention was also harming his family. Moreover, it is clear from the reference to harm 'to his freedom of expression related to his life' that the freedom of expression was an important incentive for the Commission's decision to request provisional measures. This is underlined by its statement that another purpose of the measures is to 'avoid irreparable damage to the right of Mexican society as a whole to receive information freely'.¹³¹ Two days later the President of the Court, 'after having consulted all the judges of the Inter-American Court', decided to order urgent measures calling on the State to adopt without delay all necessary measures to protect Gallardo's life and safety.¹³²

While the text of the urgent measures is conventional in referring to life and safety, the decision to order them appears to be based on the fact that his detention was illegal and part of a continuing pattern of harassment. In its submission the Commission had argued that he was 'submitted to numerous acts of harassment, because the prison authorities denied him the right to receive visits on several occasions, in an apparently arbitrary manner, and he had been subjected to sudden transfers without any explanation'. His right to life was threatened by his 'de facto detention'. This continued detention 'did not permit safeguarding his life and physical well-being, or that of the members of his family'. "In these conditions, the liberation of general Gallardo is a Gallardo's life, person, and liberty, along with guarantees to enable his family and representatives to visit the facility where he is being held'.

¹²⁸ CIDH Gallardo Rodríguez v. Mexico, 15 October 1996, in which it found that 'through the detention and continuous submission of General José Francisco Gallardo to 16 preliminary inquiries and 8 criminal cases without a reasonable and justifiable purpose, the Government of Mexico has failed to discharge its obligation to respect and guarantee the rights to personal integrity, legal guarantees, honor and dignity, and legal protection of Brigadier General José Francisco Gallardo Rodríguez, according to articles 5, 7, 8, 11 and 25 of the American Convention, for the repeated acts that have taken place in Mexico since 1988', §115. Among others, he 'should be set at liberty immediately', §116.

¹²⁹ CIDH Gallardo v. Mexico, precautionary measures of 2 November 2001, Annual Report 2001, §43. See also, e.g., Amnesty International, Silencing dissent, An update on General Gallardo, 9 November 2001, AI Index: AMR 41/037/2001.

¹³⁰ See Chapter II, section 4.3 on the urgent measures by the President before the Court has convened to decide on provisional measures.

¹³¹ IACHR Gallardo Rodríguez v. Mexico, Order of 18 February 2002, 1st 'Having seen' clause. See also Order of 23 January 2002.

¹³² IACHR Gallardo Rodríguez v. Mexico, Order of the President of 20 December 2001, 1st 'Resuelve' clause.

sine qua non condition to avoid the occurrence of the irreparable damage that threatens them". With regard to the claim that the 'de facto detention' also 'generated irreparable damage to his freedom of expression in relation to his life' the Commission had noted that it 'prevented him from fully expounding his version of the campaign of harassment to which he has been subjected and freely expressing his opinions about the acts which he considers constitute an abuse of authority within the Mexican army'.¹³³

Thus, the facts of the case indicate a concern regarding the effects of continued arbitrary detention on the detainee, his family and the freedom of expression at large, rather than indications of immediate health problems or death threats that would traditionally warrant the use of provisional measures.¹³⁴ This is also born out by the witnesses proposed by the Commission, whom the Court planned to hear at a public hearing on 19 January 2002. Two of the witnesses were well-known authors planning to make a statement on the right of both General Gallardo and 'the population of Mexico' to 'seek, receive and disseminate information and opinions about the case'.¹³⁵ Indeed, the State understood the underlying intention of the urgent measures. It informed the Court, a few weeks before the planned hearing on the actual use of provisional measures, that it had reduced the General's sentence and had released him. It also noted that he was 'protected 24 hours by an escort'.¹³⁶

Subsequently the Commission withdrew its request for provisional measures and requested a cancellation of the hearing. The President did the latter, but decided to maintain the urgent measures to protect Gallardo's life and safety.¹³⁷ As in previous cases, he noted that in human rights law provisional measures do not just have a preventive nature, preserving 'a juridical situation', but that they are 'fundamentally protective, because they protect human rights'. When the basic requisites of extreme gravity and urgency and the prevention of irreparable harm to persons are present, provisional measures become a 'real jurisdictional guarantee of a preventive nature'.¹³⁸ Subsequently, the full Court confirmed 'all the terms of the orders of the President'.¹³⁹ In its Order of 11 July 2007 the Court discontinued its provisional measures. It noted that the petitioners had submitted, in February 2004, that Gallardo had been threatened by telephone the previous month.¹⁴⁰ It noted, however, that since that time the situation had been stable.¹⁴¹ The State had pointed out that 'in the last five years the State has adopted measures to protect Mr. Gallardo Rodríguez, among them: security detail provided by federal authorities, an official vehicle with two agents at the beneficiary's home, and a protection service consisting of police patrol-

¹³³ IACHR Gallardo Rodríguez v. Mexico, Order of 18 February 2002, 1st 'Having seen' clause a) to i).

¹³⁴ See Chapter VII (Detention situations) and IX (Death threats).

¹³⁵ See e.g. IACHR Gallardo Rodríguez v. Mexico, Order of the President of 14 February 2002, 3rd 'Having Seen' clause, referring to the President's order of 23 January 2002. In fact the President had already called these witnesses in his Order for urgent measures of 23 January 2002, 1st 'Resuelve' clause. The authors were Hernán Lara Zavala and Homero Aridjis (involved in International PEN).

¹³⁶ The escort was composed of agents of the Ministry of Public Security and the Federal preventive police. See brief of 8 February 2002, referred to in IACHR Gallardo Rodríguez v. Mexico, Order of 18 February 2002, 4th 'Having Seen' clause. See also CIDH Press Release 3/02, 'IACHR welcomes freeing of General Gallardo in Mexico', 12 February 2002. See generally Chapter XVII (Official responses).

¹³⁷ IACHR Gallardo Rodríguez v. Mexico, Order of the President of 14 February 2002.

¹³⁸ Id., 5th 'Considering' clause.

¹³⁹ IACHR Gallardo Rodríguez v. Mexico, Order of 18 February 2002, 1st 'Decisional' clause.

¹⁴⁰ IACHR Gallardo Rodríguez v. Mexico, Order of 11 July 2007, 3rd 'Considering' clause.

¹⁴¹ Id., 4th 'Considering' clause.

ling and 24-hour emergency telephone numbers'.¹⁴² The petitioners had argued that he would only be safe once investigations into the threats had been completed and those responsible identified.¹⁴³ The Court considered that the statements of the representatives 'regarding the fact that there are still judicial processes currently pending', did not constitute circumstances of extreme gravity and urgency that called for the continuance of the provisional measures.¹⁴⁴ It added that 'the above does not prevent the State from continuing with the corresponding investigations within the domestic jurisdiction to identify and, if it is the case, to punish those responsible for the threats suffered by Mr. Gallardo Rodríguez'.¹⁴⁵

This was a case that involved respect for the Inter-American system, freedom of speech, impunity and arbitrary detention. The detention, implicitly, seemed to have been recognised as arbitrary by the then newly elected Government of Mexico, at least to the extent that it had indicated it would comply with the Commission's reports. Nevertheless, General Gallardo was not released but instead remained subjected to prolonged arbitrary detention. Not just civil society (e.g. International PEN and Amnesty International, which adopted him as a prisoner of conscience), but also the Inter-American Commission and the UN Working Group on Arbitrary Detention¹⁴⁶ had denounced the arbitrariness of his detention. It also constituted a threat to freedom of expression. Moreover, after its recognition of the compulsory jurisdiction of the Inter-American Court, the Government had committed itself – in abstracto – to implement the Commission report, but in fact Gallardo remained in detention.¹⁴⁷

To the extent that the Court's Order was made to intervene in a situation of arbitrary detention, it could be argued that it is exactly the recognised arbitrariness, in combination with the lack of actual redress (even the opposite: a continued detention), that could explain the use of provisional measures to put a stop to this continuing violation. This could help restore, as much as possible, the status quo ante, before a further irreparable harm was done to the project of life of the General and his family.¹⁴⁸

While the Court does not expressly call for release but instead simply calls for respect for the safety of the General and his family, this case could nevertheless be seen as an example of a ¹⁴² Id., 9th 'Considering' clause.

¹⁴³ Id., 6th 'Considering' clause.

¹⁴⁴ Id., 11th 'Considering' clause.

¹⁴⁵ Id., 12th 'Considering' clause.

¹⁴⁶ The Working Group on Arbitrary Detention had determined that his detention was arbitrary and related to a violation of, among others, freedom of speech. In the decision it is not mentioned whether it used its urgent appeal procedure, Opinion 28/1998, E/CN.4/2000/4/Add.1, p. 17 and p. 18.

¹⁴⁷ The Inter-American Commission's determination of arbitrariness in General Gallardo's case was a fact prior to Mexico's recognition of the competence of the Court. Mexico had only recognised the Court's competence for facts subsequent to this recognition. Thus, at the time of the Commission's determination of the arbitrariness of the detention of the General and its recommendation for release, the Commission was the ultimate authority in the Inter-American system. The new Government, on the other hand, has reopened the Commission cases that had been 'closed' by the previous Government. It might be argued that, therefore, they constituted 'new facts' falling within the competence of the Court. In particular, the fact that the Government had committed itself to comply with these Commission cases was an acknowledgement of its obligation to comply with the Inter-American Human Rights system, and in particular the Convention, in good faith and, in the case of the General, it may imply an admission of the arbitrariness of his detention. Continuing such detention clearly constitutes a lack of respect by certain sectors of government for the commitments undertaken under the Convention. It may mean that the Commission needs to open the case anew so that the Court can subsequently examine it. Consequently, all this time the arbitrary detention is being prolonged.

¹⁴⁸ On the concept of 'project of life' see section 2.1 of this Chapter and references therein.

case in which de facto the Court intervened in a situation of arbitrary detention that also implicated the right to ‘seek, receive, and impart information and ideas’ (Article 13(1) ACHR). With all of this it must be kept in mind though that the Court used its provisional measures based on its traditional argument of protection against threats and it was on this basis also that it maintained its provisional measures upon Gallardo’s release until 2007.

In 2003 the Commission took precautionary measures on behalf of another General, who was claimed to have been arbitrarily deprived of his liberty two weeks previously, this time in Venezuela. It was alleged that the officers who carried out his arrest and detention ‘did not show any judicial or other warrant, did not provide information on the reasons for the detention, nor did they indicate which authority had ordered the detention’. Moreover the next day a domestic judge had ordered his release. Through its precautionary measure the Commission asked Venezuela ‘to implement immediately the habeas corpus order on behalf of Gen. Alfonso Martínez, and to guarantee him, adopting the pertinent security measures, his personal security and that of his family, and the exercise of his civil and political rights’.¹⁴⁹

2.6.3 Practice in the African system

In October 2002 the African Commission took a provisional measure on behalf of journalists detained without charge in Liberia. The nature of this provisional measure was not specified.¹⁵⁰

The decision on the merits does not provide sufficient information to infer any specific approach of the Commission in this regard, e.g. in light of the health situation. The Commission may have intervened urgently simply because of a general concern about the use of detention without charge in order to hinder the freedom of expression.

2.6.4 Practice by the EComHR

In several early cases the European Commission refused to take provisional measures to secure the provisional release of a petitioner on account of poor health.¹⁵¹ Yet this may have been due to ¹⁴⁹ CIDH Gen. Rafael Alfonso Martínez v. Venezuela, Annual Report 2003, §65.

¹⁵⁰ African Commission Samuel Kofi Woods, II and Kabineh M. Ja'neh v. Liberia, November 2001 (provisional measure of 23 October 2002; this may have been an informal rather than a formal provisional measure). See also Chapter VIII (Procedure).

¹⁵¹ See EComHR X v. Germany (FRG), 22 March 1958 (inadm.) (297/57). The petitioner, a commercial representative, was arrested and placed in preventive detention on 22 May 1957 for holding a leading position in a ‘clandestine association’ (the German Communist Party, which was declared unconstitutional in 1956), Yearbook of the European Convention on Human Rights Vol. 2, 1958-59, Martinus Nijhoff, The Hague 1960, pp. 204 and 206. In his second appeal against his detention before the national courts he requested, among others, ‘his provisional release at least on account of his poor state of health’. Before the Commission, violation of the Articles 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13 and 14 ECHR were alleged. The petitioner had asked the Commission to declare his application admissible ‘and to intervene with the authorities of the Federal Republic of Germany on his behalf in order to secure his immediate release’ ‘Whereas the Convention does not contain any such obligations binding upon the High Contracting Parties as invoked by the Applicant; whereas, moreover, the Convention does not contain any provision giving the Commission competence to order provisional measures; whereas it therefore appears that the application is in this respect incompatible with the provisions of the Convention; whereas it should, in pursuance of Article 27, paragraph 2, of the Convention, accordingly be rejected’. See Yearbook 2 (1960), p. 212.

the Commission's weariness, at the time, about its competence to order provisional measures in the first place, rather than to this specific request to order the release of a detainee.¹⁵²

2.6.5 Practice by the Bosnia Chamber

In October 2001 the Bosnia Chamber ordered provisional measures to prevent resort to compulsory pre-trial detention. The petitioners had argued that 'many citizens had spent several years in detention before being finally released with no charges filed against them'.¹⁵³ The Order would remain in force for several days and was not extended, as the State had responded the next day that it would respect it 'completely'.¹⁵⁴ and the disputed legislation was subsequently repealed as well.¹⁵⁵ This indicates an approach by the Chamber that is aimed more at preventing undue hardship to persons, or irreparable harm to the Article 5 claim.¹⁵⁶ By respecting the Chamber's provisional measures, the respondent had in fact made the Article 5 claim redundant since as a result the petitioners were never subjected to detention under the old legislation.

In a previous case, in July 1997, it had denied a request for provisional measures for the release of a petitioner.¹⁵⁷ While it appears from the case that the petitioner was in poor health, the request for provisional measures may in fact relate to the claim of illegal detention.¹⁵⁸ In its deci-

¹⁵² See for a refusal to take provisional measures in early cases e.g. X. v. FRG, 297/57, 22 March 1958 (inadm.), Yearbook 2, pp. 204-214; in 1963, a petitioner sought the quashing of a sentence and the cessation of certain measures pending the case. In this case the Commission equally considered that it was 'not empowered to order protective measures', but could only 'suggest' such measures. Moreover, it considered that the fact that it was dealing with the case did not have suspensive effect at the domestic level. It noted that 'far from obliging national courts to wait for the Commission to complete its work before they complete theirs, the Convention, in principle, provides for the opposite solution (Article 26) and assigns a mainly subsidiary role to the collective guarantee machinery set up by it'. See X and Y v. Belgium (1420/62, 1477/62, 1478/62), 18 December 1963, Yearbook 2, p. 626. Finally, in Wemhoff v. Germany, 1 April 1966, the petitioner had requested the Commission to order his release from prison. In February 1965, however, the plenary Commission considered that 'it results from Article 19 of the Convention that the task of the Commission is to 'ensure the observance of the engagements undertaken by the High Contracting Parties' in the Convention; whereas, however, the Convention does not contain any provision giving the Commission competence to order provisional measures in the exercise of its functions under Article 19'. Thus, it added that it had 'no competence to order the Applicant's release from prison as requested by him; whereas, furthermore, the Commission does not consider it appropriate in the circumstances to take any other steps in this connection' Wemhoff v. Germany, 1 April 1966, pp. 118-121. Again, the reference did not relate to the contents of the request.

¹⁵³ Bosnia Chamber Ivo Lozančić et al. v. Federation BiH, 8 March 2002, (inadm.), §§14-15.

¹⁵⁴ Id., §16.

¹⁵⁵ This was done by the High Representative. Bosnia Chamber Ivo Lozančić et al. v. Federation BiH, 8 March 2002, (inadm.), §§17.

¹⁵⁶ There are also several cases in which the Chamber has refused requests for release or suspension of execution of a sentence, often in the context of an alleged arbitrary detention. See e.g. Milorad Marčeta v. The Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, 3 April 1998; Novo Bencuz v. Republika Srpska, 8 February 2000 (inadm.); Edin Garplija v. Federation BiH, 9 April 2002; Jasmin Šljivo v. Republika Srpska, 9 February 2001 (inadm.); M.A. v. Federation BiH, 7 March 2001 (inadm.) and Ibrahim Makić v. Federation BiH, 9 November 2001 (inadm.).

¹⁵⁷ Bosnia Chamber Milorad Marceta v. Fed. B&H, 3 April 1998, §3.

¹⁵⁸ In this case representatives of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees had learned that the petitioner had been arrested. It had informed his family and the Ombudsperson. His

sion on the merits the Chamber noted its refusal to order provisional measures and added that it did so ‘on the basis of the information then available to it’.¹⁵⁹ A month later the Deputy Prosecutor of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY) stated that ‘the evidence was insufficient by international standards to provide reasonable grounds for believing that the applicant had committed a serious violation of international humanitarian law’.¹⁶⁰ Subsequently Senior Deputy High Representative for Bosnia ‘stated in strong terms that a serious violation of human rights and breach of the Rome Agreement had occurred’.¹⁶¹ He called for the release of the petitioner and stated that he ‘was referring the case to the Ombudsperson since such a gross human rights abuse could not be remedied simply by [his] release’.¹⁶² The next day the Cantonal Court in Bihać was informed of the decision of the Prosecutor of the ICTY and the petitioner was released that same day.¹⁶³ It is very well possible that the Bosnia Chamber would have used provisional measures for the release of the petitioner if it had had more information.¹⁶⁴

2.6.6 Conclusion

If provisional measures are to be used in the context of an arbitrary detention, somehow it must be established at which point the situation of this detention starts to be urgent and why irreparable harm is threatened. Otherwise provisional measures should only be used in situations where the prison conditions and the individual conditions of the person involved require it and then it would concern a traditional reason for using a provisional measure: preventing irreparable harm to life and physical integrity (e.g. prolonged incommunicado detention, threat of disappearance, threat of torture).¹⁶⁵

At the same time it is suggested that with regard to minors a credible case of arbitrary detention could indeed warrant the use of provisional measures to the effect that they should be released. If, for instance, the CIDH had had prima facie evidence of such arbitrariness in the case of the Honduran minors discussed in Chapter VII, on halting cruel treatment in detention, it could have used precautionary measures to demand their release pending the case.¹⁶⁶ After all, in its discussion of the legal framework of the right to personal liberty in this case it noted that ‘[t]here is a clear tendency in international human rights law to afford greater protection to minors than to adults’.¹⁶⁷ family then engaged a lawyer, who lodged a petition with the Ombudsperson. In June of that year the latter referred the case to the Chamber.

¹⁵⁹ Bosnia Chamber Milorad Marčeta v. Fed.BiH, 3 April 1998, §3.

¹⁶⁰ Id., §30.

¹⁶¹ Id., §31.

¹⁶² Id., §31.

¹⁶³ Id., §34.

¹⁶⁴ About the information required for the Chamber to take provisional measures see also Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

¹⁶⁵ The protection required in most such cases would not necessarily have to be ‘release’ but rather to provide protection, medicine, access, etc. See in general about the protection required Chapter XIII (Protection).

¹⁶⁶ In the actual case the Inter-American Commission noted in its final report that there was insufficient evidence with regard to the particular minors participating in the complaint. With regard to the study of the Office of the National Human Rights Commissioner about the reasons for incarceration of 84 juveniles in the Jalteva prison, the Commission considered that it had not been proved that the specific minors referred to by the parties had been detained for motives of vagrancy, for their own protection, because they were abandoned, or because they were orphans.

¹⁶⁷ CIDH Minors in detention case (Honduras), case 11.491, Report on the merits 41/99, 10 March 1999, §113. In this case the CIDH had concluded that a violation of Article 7(2) ACHR had not been proved, §120. In an obiter, however, it pointed out the legal framework with regard to

While some adjudicators have used provisional measures that appear to aim at preventing arbitrary detention, only the Inter-American Commission has done so more than once and it is too early, given the dearth of information, to argue that a practice has developed in more than one system. Traditionally provisional measures have only been used in detention cases when there was a threat of torture or cruel treatment. Thus, the question must be addressed, in cases not involving children in detention, at which point in time the situation of an arbitrary detention starts to be urgent and why irreparable harm is threatened. This can only be done on a case by case basis.

The Inter-American Commission, with its wide protective mandate, and the Bosnia Chamber, with its almost 'constitutional' mandate (on a temporary basis), based on the specific post-war Bosnian situation, have extended this traditional approach at least once to the very limited group of cases of prima facie arbitrary detention in combination with another situation of gravity (such as continued detention despite Government 'admission' of arbitrariness). A similar approach is taken by the UN Working Group on Arbitrary Detention, which uses the tool of urgent actions in such cases.¹⁶⁸ Moreover, as to the merits the approach of all human rights adjudicators has indeed converged, showing a clear aversion to the practice of arbitrary detention.

Prolonged arbitrary detention is seen as a particularly serious violation of customary law.¹⁶⁹ Yet it may be argued that arbitrary detention is a situation that is reversible and therefore the use of provisional measures to halt or prevent such detention would be situated beyond the outer limits of the concept. Nevertheless there are several examples of provisional measures ordered in these circumstances. The question arises how their use can be explained.

One situation this section singles out is that where an international adjudicator examines a case involving a detention situation that has already been determined to constitute arbitrary detention (for instance as a punishment for the exercise of the freedom of expression), either in a previous decision by this adjudicator, or by another international adjudicator.

When a judgment on the merits or reparations has ordered the release of a detainee, each day he or she continues to be detained may be argued to result in additional irreversible harm to the system of human rights protection. Yet provisional measures do not appear to be the most appropriate tool to prevent such harm. In fact most adjudicators have created follow-up mechanisms that could appropriately be used to emphasize the need for compliance.

On the other hand, there is another situation in which the use of provisional measures to prevent irreparable harm to the procedure does appear particularly appropriate. This is when a Article 7: "The Commission considers that the practice of incarcerating a minor not because he committed a criminalized offence but simply because he was abandoned by society or was at risk, or is an orphan or a vagrant, poses a grave threat to Honduran children. The State cannot deprive of their freedom children who have committed no crime, without incurring international responsibility for the violation of their personal liberty (Art. 7 of the Convention)", §109. The fact that it concerns minors may lead to the conclusion that the 'grave threat' mentioned here would necessitate precautionary measures to prevent irreparable harm to these children, even if detained in special juvenile facilities. "Minors cannot be punished because they are at risk, that is to say, that (sic) because they need to work to earn a living, or because they have no home and thus have to live on the streets. Far from punishing minors for their supposed vagrancy, the State has a duty to prevent and rehabilitate and an obligation to provide them with adequate means for growth and self-fulfilment", §110. See also IACHR Advisory Opinion on judicial status and human rights of the child, 28 August 2002.

¹⁶⁸ While insufficient information is available on the approach of the African Commission in this respect, its role could be or become similar to that of the Inter-American Commission: protective, mediatory and rather informal.

¹⁶⁹ See e.g. the statement of the ICJ quoted in the beginning of this section, as well as the decision to institute a UN Working Group on Arbitrary Detention and the reference in the US Restatement of the law (third).

person is faced with detention as a result of participation in the individual petition system, either as a petitioner or as a witness. Outside of the latter context the use of provisional measures against the predetermined arbitrary detention of a person because ignoring previous decisions by the adjudicators would result in irreversible harm to the system is not convincing.

A second, rather far-reaching, argument for the use of provisional measures to halt a person's detention in such cases would be that each day a detainee is unlawfully kept in detention she is hindered in the further development of her project of life. Particularly when this detention is prolonged it may have an irreparable impact on the life plans (blocking the capacity to make arrangements for livelihood and life experiences including study, work, family planning, etc.) of the person in question. This may trigger right to life issues in the broader sense of the term, combining life and personal integrity rights and encompassing the right not to be deprived of a dignified life. Provisional measures are then aimed at ensuring to some extent the continuance, in an adapted form, of the detained person's original life plans.¹⁷⁰

Yet in order to uphold their authority and effectiveness it is important that provisional measures remain exceptional. Clearly the use of provisional measures for the release of persons in contested detention (without any health risks) does not fall within the common core of the concept of provisional measures in international human rights adjudication. Many petitioners may claim the reason for their detention is arbitrary or their trial was so unfair as to render their detention arbitrary. Generally speaking, there is no convincing practice supporting the use of provisional measures in this type of circumstance.

In the Gallardo case, on the other hand, there was a situation of established prolonged arbitrary detention, both the General himself and his family had been harassed, and the continued detention could result in irreparable harm to their project of life. In that sense the Court's provisional measures could still be seen as somewhat belonging to the traditional group of provisional measures.

While protection against arbitrary detention and supervision of compliance with its judgments are both eminently important, the use of provisional measures to ensure this generally speaking is not warranted. This is different when the rights at stake also involve the basic existence of persons. There may be situations when this existence is at stake because of a prolonged and continuing arbitrary detention as well as clear indications of irreparable harm to the project of life.

2.7 Preventing impunity

2.7.1 Introduction

On one occasion the Committee against Torture has used an atypical provisional measure specifically in order to prevent impunity.¹⁷¹ It did so in light of the obligation in the Convention against Torture to either prosecute or extradite persons suspected of having perpetrated torture. Thus, this provisional measure was not taken as part of provisional measures against death threats and harassment, but in order to ensure compliance with specific provisions of the Convention against Torture.¹⁷² As compared to other provisional measures, considerable information is available on the provisional measure and its aftermath, which will be referred to in this section. This serves to illustrate how this provisional measure has been taken to prevent irreversible harm to the claim.

¹⁷⁰ On the concept of 'project of life' see section 2.1 of this Chapter and references therein. Apart from stopping the original life plan from being blighted further and ensuring the conditions to pursue the initial life plan as much as possible, another purpose of provisional measures may be ensuring the conditions for a new project of life: planning a liveable life, or even having the option in the first place to plan a life.

¹⁷¹ It normally takes provisional measures in non-refoulement cases, see Chapters V (Non-refoulement) and XV (Immediacy and risk).

2.7.2 Practice

In 1999 a Chadian NGO,¹⁷³ 'with the Pinochet precedent in mind', requested Human Rights Watch to assist it in bringing the former President of Chad, in exile in Senegal, to justice in that country.¹⁷⁴ Habré ruled Chad from 1982 until the end of 1990. He then fled to Senegal. In the early 1990s a Chadian truth commission published a report on the responsibility of Habré's government for 40,000 murders as well as for the systematic use of torture.

In January 2000 seven victims from Chad, acting as private plaintiffs, together with another Chadian NGO,¹⁷⁵ provided a Senegalese court with details of 97 cases of political killings, 142 cases of torture and 100 disappearances committed during 1982-1990 by police forces instructed by Habré. A coalition of NGOs was formed to support the victims.¹⁷⁶ Among others, the victims had asserted that the UN Convention against Torture obliged Senegal to either prosecute or extradite alleged torturers present in its territory. The next month the Senegalese judge in question indicted Habré on torture charges and placed him under house arrest. In July 2000 the Court of Appeals dismissed these charges, considering that Senegalese courts had no jurisdiction over torture committed outside the territory of Senegal and against non-nationals. The Cour de Cassation (court of final appeals) upheld this decision in March 2001.¹⁷⁷ In the meantime, another group of victims had filed a case against Habré in Belgium. They were supported by the same coalition.

In April 2001 the President of Senegal publicly declared that he had given the former dictator one month to leave Senegal. Assisted by Reed Brody of Human Rights Watch, Suleymane Guengueng¹⁷⁸ and six others resorted to CAT in order to ensure the principle that perpetrators of torture must be either prosecuted or extradited: aut dedere aut iudicare. They also requested provisional measures. They were afraid 'that Habré would move to a country out of reach of an ¹⁷² While it is difficult to disentangle these obligations, an attempt is made to discuss the general obligation in this section and the obligation as part of protection against death threats in Chapter IX and Chapter XIII (Protection).

¹⁷³ The Chadian Association for the Promotion and Defence of Human Rights (ATPDH).

¹⁷⁴ See e.g. Human Rights Watch, 'The case against Hissène Habré, an 'African Pinochet'', May 2006, <www.hrw.org> (consulted 16 May 2006).

¹⁷⁵ The Chadian Association of Victims of Political Repression and Crime (AVCRP).

¹⁷⁶ It consists of human rights groups from Chad: the Chadian Association of Victims of Political Repression and Crime (AVCRP), the ATPDH and the Chadian League for Human Rights (LTDH), the African Assembly for the Defence of Human Rights (RADDHO) and the National Organisation for Human Rights, both based in Senegal, Agir Ensemble pour les Droits de l'Homme and the International Federation of Human Rights Leagues (FIDH), both based in France and Interights (UK).

¹⁷⁷ See e.g. Human Rights Watch, United Nations asks Senegal to hold ex-Chad dictator, victory for Hissène Habré's victims, 23 April 2001, <www.hrw.org> (consulted on 10 April 2003).

¹⁷⁸ Guengueng is one of the founders of the AVCRP. Human Rights Watch reports that he almost died of dengue fever during two years of mistreatment in prisons in Chad. HRW, Senegalese President urged to aid rights prosecution, 27 June 2001, <www.hrw.org> (consulted 10 April 2003).

extradition request or a final U.N. ruling and asked the Committee to issue an interim ruling to preserve their ability to bring him to justice'.¹⁷⁹

The complaint before CAT claimed violations of Article 5(2) ICAT (failure to establish jurisdiction over the crime of torture committed abroad in cases where the alleged offender is present on the State's territory) and Article 7 ICAT (failure to prosecute or extradite the alleged offender).¹⁸⁰ As primary forms of remedy for these violations the victims asked the Committee to recommend Senegal to amend its legislation to establish jurisdiction over the crime of torture committed abroad in cases where the alleged offender is present on its territory, in conformity with Article 5(2) and to either extradite Habré or submit his case to the competent authorities in Senegal for the purpose of prosecution, as required by Article 7. At the same time the petitioners also asked the Committee to take provisional measures in order to prevent Habré from leaving Senegal except pursuant to an extradition demand. They first discussed the risk of irreparable harm and then the issue of urgency. On the risk of irreparable harm the complaint pointed out:

"If Hissène Habré leaves Senegal, the authors will suffer irreparable harm because there will likely be no possibility to bring the man responsible for their torture, Hissène Habré, to justice, and there will thus be no means of remedying the violation of Article 7 which they have suffered. Indeed, Senegal would incur supplemental violation of the Convention by letting Habré flee. Having initiated the prosecution of Habré, the author/plaintiffs have a right to see Habré extradited or prosecuted under Article 7. The victims' right to bring Habré to justice is implicit in their right to a remedy, their right to compensation and their right to reparations, and has been recognized by U.N. rapporteurs such as Joinet and van Boven".¹⁸¹

The complaint then continued with an explanation of the urgency of the matter, referring to the fact that in early April President Wade had declared publicly that he had given Habré one month to leave Senegal. The petitioners did not know when the President had notified Habré about this. They also explained that other victims of Habré had opened criminal proceedings in Belgium 'and the authors are concerned that any request for extradition by Belgium, as well as any relief recommended by the Committee against Torture (in particular the prosecution or extradition of Habré pursuant to Article 7), would be frustrated if Habré had already left Senegal'.¹⁸²

In response, CAT took a provisional measure that same month. It requested the State not to expel Habré and to take all necessary measures to prevent him from leaving Senegalese territory in any way other than through an extradition proceeding (the principle aut dedere aut iudicare).¹⁸³

¹⁷⁹ Human Rights Watch, United Nations asks Senegal to hold ex-Chad dictator, victory for Hissène Habré's victims, 23 April 2001, <www.hrw.org> (consulted on 10 April 2003).

¹⁸⁰ The complaint referred to the concern expressed jointly by the UN Special Rapporteur on the Independence of Judges and Lawyers and the UN Special Rapporteur against Torture about the circumstances surrounding the dismissal of the charges against Habré by the Court of Appeals. The Rapporteurs had reminded Senegal of its obligations under the UN Convention against Torture.

¹⁸¹ Letter to the United Nations Committee against Torture, 18 April 2001, <<http://www.hrw.org/french/themes/habre-cat.html>> (consulted 14 June 2007).

¹⁸² Letter to the United Nations Committee against Torture, 18 April 2001, <<http://www.hrw.org/french/themes/habre-cat2.html>> (consulted 14 June 2007). See in general about imminence Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

¹⁸³ It sent a note verbale to this effect to the Government of Senegal, on the basis of its Rule 108(9), and in so far as the conditions for requesting provisional measures existed: 'en vertu de l'article 108, paragraphe 9, de son règlement d'ordre intérieur et dans la mesure où les conditions pour demander des mesures provisionnelles sont remplies, le Comité prie l'Etat partie de ne pas expulser Mr. Hissène Habré et de prendre toutes les mesures nécessaires pour empêcher que Mr. Hissène Habré quitte le territoire du Sénégal autrement qu'en vertu d'une procédure

Reed Brody of HRW pointed out that ‘this ruling’ (the decision to take a provisional measure) was ‘a great victory for Habré’s thousands of victims’.¹⁸⁴ His organisation noted that ‘States usually comply with its [the Committee’s] decisions, and Senegal is expected to do so’.¹⁸⁵ As discussed in Part IV to this book (Responses) various actors subsequently played a role in reinforcing compliance with the provisional measures by the State.

In May 2006 CAT published its decision on the merits. It noted that its consideration ‘had been delayed at the explicit wish of the parties because of judicial proceedings pending in Belgium for the extradition of Hissène Habré’.¹⁸⁶ It found violations of Articles 5(2) and 7 ICAT. Senegal was indeed obliged to prosecute Habré ‘for alleged acts of torture unless it could show that there was not sufficient evidence to prosecute, at least at the time when the complainants submitted their complaint in January 2000’.¹⁸⁷ In addition, since 19 September 2005, when Belgium made a formal extradition request, the State party ‘had the choice of proceeding with extradition if it decided not to submit the case to its own judicial authorities for the purpose of prosecuting’ him.¹⁸⁸ By refusing to comply with this extradition request the State party had ‘again failed to perform its obligations under article 7 of the Convention’.¹⁸⁹ Under Article 5(2) Senegal was obliged to take the necessary measures, including legislative, to establish jurisdiction and under Article 7 it was obliged to submit the case ‘to its competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution or, failing that, since Belgium has made an extradition request, to comply with that request, or, should the case arise, with any other extradition request made by another State, in accordance with the Convention’.¹⁹⁰ The Committee referred to its provisional measure as a request not to expel Habré as well as ‘to take all necessary measures to prevent him from leaving d’extradition’. At the end of that month the Secretariat of CAT also informed the petitioner of the registration of the complaint and the provisional measure requesting the State ‘not to expel Mr. Hissène Habré and to take all necessary measures to prevent Mr. Hissène Habré from leaving the territory of Senegal except pursuant to an extradition demand, while the communication is under examination by the Committee’. Letter of 27 April 2001, posted on the internet site of Human Rights Watch, <www.hrw.org> (consulted on 10 April 2003).

¹⁸⁴ Human Rights Watch, ‘United Nations asks Senegal to hold ex-Chad dictator’, press release of 23 April 2001, <<http://hrw.org/english/docs/2001/04/23/senega161.htm>> (consulted 14 June 2001). According to the Human Rights Watch the ‘abrupt decision’ of the Senegalese President that Habré should leave Senegal within a month ‘was a tribute to the victims’ efforts’. At the same time it ‘raised the possibility that Habré would go to a country out of justice’s reach’. This was why the victims appealed to CAT and why the latter indeed decided to take provisional measures. Human Rights Watch, The case against Hissène Habré, an ‘African Pinochet’, May 2006, <www.hrw.org> (consulted on 16 May 2006). See also Kirgis (2000/2001).

¹⁸⁵ Human Rights Watch, ‘United Nations asks Senegal to hold ex-Chad dictator’, press release of 23 April 2001, <<http://hrw.org/english/docs/2001/04/23/senega161.htm>> (consulted 14 June 2001). Senegalese lawyer and President of the Fédération de droits de l’homme (FIDH), Sidiki Kaba, was quoted stating that ‘this decision is based on the principle that Senegal is obliged to prosecute or extradite alleged torturers like Hissène Habré’. A representative of the African Assembly for the Defence of Human Rights (RADDHO) considered it unlikely that Senegal would ignore the provisional measure and allow Habré to escape justice. The Chadian victims themselves felt supported by the decision and one of the victims involved in the complaint, Mr. Guengueng stated: “The United Nations has heard our pleas”. Human Rights Watch, ‘United Nations asks Senegal to hold ex-Chad dictator’, press release of 23 April 2001 <<http://hrw.org/english/docs/2001/04/23/senega161.htm>> (consulted 14 June 2001).

¹⁸⁶ CAT Guengueng et al. v. Senegal, 17 May 2006, §9.1.

¹⁸⁷ Id., §9.8.

¹⁸⁸ Id., §9.10.

¹⁸⁹ Id., §9.11.

¹⁹⁰ Id., §10.

the territory other than under an extradition procedure'. It noted that Senegal had 'acceded to this request'.¹⁹¹

Subsequently the abovementioned Committee of Eminent African Jurists set up by the African Union issued its report recommending his prosecution in Senegal. Indeed, in July 2006 the African Union's Assembly followed this recommendation and called on Senegal to prosecute him 'in the name of Africa'. Senegal responded that it would do so.¹⁹²

2.7.3 Conclusion

This section specifically discussed a provisional measure taken by CAT in order to prevent a violation by the State of its obligation under Articles 5 and 7 ICAT to act against impunity.

The obligation to prosecute and punish as part of provisional measures against death threats clearly aims at preventing irreparable harm to persons. The provisional measure in the Habré case, on the other hand, aims to ensure a core provision of the Convention against Torture in light of the general obligation to act against impunity. Thus, it aims to prevent irreversible harm to the claim under these articles and, seen more widely, to the system of protection created with this Convention.

The events subsequent to the Committee's provisional measures revealed a complex web of interactions between various actors concerned with the implementation of Articles 5(2) and 7 ICAT.

Requiring States to establish jurisdiction over the crime of torture committed abroad and to extradite or prosecute perpetrators of torture, Articles 5 and 7 ICAT may be considered essential for the implementation of the general obligation to prevent torture. They have been inserted to deal with situations in which the State where the torture took place is unwilling or unable to prosecute the alleged perpetrator so that prosecution should take place in another jurisdiction in order to prevent impunity or, alternatively, to prevent impunity in cases where the alleged perpetrator may run a risk to be tortured or receive the death penalty in the State the requesting his extradition.

While the provisional measure taken by CAT does not directly prevent irreparable harm to the life and personal integrity of specific individuals, it certainly makes sense in the specific context of the Convention against Torture. If Habré would have left Senegal this State could not have made him return in order to satisfy its obligation to extradite or prosecute. In that sense the situation would have been irreversible. Given that at least the situation would result in irreversible harm to the claim, the provisional measures did not stretch beyond the outer limits. After all, once the suspect is no longer present on its territory, a State's chance of implementing this obligation becomes almost nil.

Without the provisional measures it is unlikely that the Committee's finding on the merits would have provoked the African Union to become actively involved in the situation.

The question arises whether the use of such provisional measures is likely in the other systems too. While lacking the abovementioned specific provisions on the prosecution or extradition of torture suspects, the HRC, Inter-American Commission and Court and ECtHR have nevertheless developed case law involving the obligation to investigate human rights violations and bring to justice the perpetrators. They have done so on the basis of the positive obligations of States to prevent threats to and attacks on the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment. Obviously the obligation to investigate extreme human rights violations and bring to justice the perpetrators, in order to prevent (further) violations of the rights of specific persons (right to life and right not to be subjected to torture and cruel treatment) is closely related to the obligation to act against impunity in the general interest of preventing further violations and in order to achieve some form of closure for the victims and society as a whole. Impunity often causes further threats against witnesses, petitioners or others. Thus, the Inter-American Court generally requires investigation and prosecution as part of both its provisional measures and of its judgments on merits and reparations. In the first case it is meant as a concrete protective measure, in the second as a concrete step in implementing the obligation of non-repetition. Yet the provisional measures taken in the inter-American system that refer to the obligation to investigate and prosecute differ from the provisional measure by CAT discussed in this section. The former cases involved the need to investigate and prosecute those responsible for direct threats in order to prevent their continuation.¹⁹³

¹⁹¹ Id., §1.3.

¹⁹² See the African Union's decision of 2 July 2006, Assembly /Au/3 (Vii), reproduced at <<http://www.hrw.org/english/docs/2006/08/02/chad13897.htm>> (consulted 14 May 2007). See also Lekha Sriram (2006) and the report by UN Special Rapporteur on torture Manfred Nowak, A/HRC/4/33, 15 January 2007, §§ 43-45. For subsequent events see e.g. Human Rights Watch, 'Senegal: New law will permit Habré's trial', 2 February 2007; 'Senegal: EU parliament calls for support of Hissène Habré trial, Senegal should present reasonable plan to prosecute Chad's dictator', 26 April 2007 and Press release by UN High Commissioner for Human Rights Louise Arbour, 'Senegal constitutional change paves way for Habré trial', 11 April 2008.

This section, however, discussed a provisional measure taken by CAT in order to prevent impunity in general. It was based directly on unique treaty provisions (Articles 5(2) and 7 ICAT), requiring States to establish jurisdiction over the crime of torture committed abroad and to extradite or prosecute perpetrators of torture. Judge Cançado Trindade refers to it as ‘the right to the realization of justice’.¹⁹⁴ He notes that only this ‘can alleviate the suffering of victims caused by the irreparable damage of torture’.¹⁹⁵ He also points out that ‘(i)n the context of impunity, urgency increase, rather than decreases, with the passing of time’.¹⁹⁶

This was an obligation aimed at the general prevention of torture, but not specifically related to the existence of ongoing threats to particular persons. It is within the outer limits, but does not (directly) involve preventing irreparable harm to persons. In this light it seems unlikely that the other human rights adjudicators, with a more general mandate, will also order such provisional measures in isolation, separately from the need to protect persons against specific death threats.¹⁹⁷

2.8 Protecting the independence of the judiciary in the context of harassment

2.8.1 Introduction

There is one situation in which the Inter-American Court ordered provisional measures that appear to be motivated partly by a desire to protect the independence of the judiciary. It does not ¹⁹³ See Chapter IX on provisional measures to protect against death threats and harassment and Chapter XIII (Protection) on the general reference of these measures to the State’s obligation to investigate and prosecute.

¹⁹⁴ ICJ Questions relating to the obligation to prosecute or extradite (Belgium v. Senegal), Order of 28 May 2009, dissenting opinion by Judge Cançado Trindade, §55.

¹⁹⁵ Id., §75.

¹⁹⁶ Id., §59.

¹⁹⁷ Obviously, the ICJ, when faced with a complaint based specifically on a State’s non-compliance with these provisions in ICAT, could indeed order provisional measures, as the ICJ pointed out in its Order denying the request for provisional measures in Questions relating to the obligation to prosecute or extradite (Belgium v. Senegal), Order of 28 May 2009. The ICJ noted that the rights asserted appeared plausible but denied the request for other reasons.

appear that other adjudicators have used provisional measures in order to protect the independence of the judiciary, but in a similar set of circumstances it cannot be ruled out.

More specifically, the provisional measures were taken in the context of the constitutional crisis in Peru under Fujimori. They could be argued to belong to the category of protection against death threats and harassment. The petitioner, an impeached justice of the Constitutional Court, and her family were being harassed and other justices, including the President of the Constitutional Court, had been physically attacked.

Indeed the Inter-American Court used the traditional phrase to ‘ensure the physical, psychological and moral integrity’ to motivate its use of provisional measures. In other words, in the text of its Order for provisional measures it did not really move away from its practice of ordering such measures to prevent irreparable harm to the life of the beneficiary and to his or her personal integrity. Yet given the apparent additional rationale of protecting the independence of the judiciary, this section sets out this case in more detail in order to examine whether the provisional measures aimed at preventing irreversible harm to the claim and whether they aimed to protect persons against irreparable harm.¹⁹⁸

2.8.2 The practice in the Inter-American system

Fujimori had been elected President in 1990. However, two years later he dissolved the Constitutional Court, as well as Congress. The next year a new Constitution was adopted and in 1996 a new Constitutional Court was appointed. That same year legislation was adopted that appeared to make Fujimori eligible for re-election for a third consecutive term of office. This legislation was appealed to the new Constitutional Court, which was divided on the issue. Five of the seven judges voted in favour of a draft judgment to the effect that the legislation did not apply to Fujimori’s situation. Such judgment would prevent him from running for re-election. Subsequently one of the two pro-Fujimori judges unlawfully took the draft from a file and, as he later confessed, delivered it to the police and the press. This triggered an ‘official campaign to pressure the five justices’.¹⁹⁹ Two of the justices originally in the majority called for a new vote and eventually only three of the five justices confirmed their original vote. The other four justices abstained. As it was a ruling on the inapplicability of legislation to a given situation, rather than on the constitutionality of the legislation, the Organic Law on the Constitutional Court determined that the vote could be taken by simple majority. This meant that, despite the campaign directed at the justices to prevent this conclusion, Fujimori was ineligible to run for re-election. In response the legislature took various actions against the three judges, culminating in their impeachment. They were subjected to various forms of harassment as well, in the context of which one of the justices, Delia Revoredo Marsano, sought and received asylum at the Costa Rican embassy.

¹⁹⁸ The case includes other factors as well that are relevant to the discussion of the concept of provisional measures. It shows the importance attached to the concept of provisional measures in the Inter-American system. It was the first case in which the Inter-American Court ordered them based on a direct request by the petitioner in a case pending before it, rather than a request by the Commission. Moreover, it is one of the instances in which the Court specifically determined on the merits that it would only close the case once it considered that the State has complied with its judgments on the merits and reparations. See further Chapter XVI (Jurisdiction and admissibility) and XVIII (Follow-up). Indeed its judgment on the merits was of January 2001 and its provisional measures were only lifted in March of that year. Only then the case was closed. Finally, it was just after the submission of this case to the Inter-American Court that Peru withdrew its recognition of the Court’s competence. On the Court’s jurisdiction see also Chapter XVI (Jurisdiction and admissibility).

¹⁹⁹ CIDH country report on Peru, 2 June 2000, Chapter II, §60.

The subsequent response to the involvement of the Inter-American system illustrates the importance attached to the issue in Peru.²⁰⁰ In July 1999 Peru simply decided to withdraw its recognition of the Court's contentious jurisdiction 'with immediate effect'.²⁰¹ Yet in September 1999 the Inter-American Court found that it was competent to deal with the case.²⁰²

In April 2000 Mrs Revoredo Marsano, one of the impeached justices, approached the Court directly (rather than going through the Commission first) requesting the use of provisional measures to the effect that Peru should abstain from harassing her and her husband 'while the proceeding on the reinstatement of the Constitutional Court justices is being heard'. This harassment was manifested in the 'control and manipulation of judges and courts'.²⁰³

As the Court was not in session, its President initially dealt with the request. He decided to order urgent measures ex officio (not requested by the Commission) to ensure Delia Revoredo's 'physical, psychological and moral integrity'. In addition, he requested both the State and the Commission to provide the Court with detailed information on her situation. As noted, the language used in the Order was nothing out of the ordinary. What is significant is the fact that the President called for urgent measures. This was subsequently confirmed with provisional measures by the full Court, ex officio and in response to a very specific request involving harassment not against the life of the petitioner but against judicial independence. More precisely, the petitioner had asked for the suspension of the judicial proceedings filed against her for 'the alleged crimes of misappropriation, fraud and crime against the authority to attest documents'.²⁰⁴ She had also requested that the company owned by her husband and herself to be allowed the legal recourse of appealing against an adverse arbitration award.²⁰⁵ It is clear that the Court did not heed these specific requests. Instead it used the more traditional phrase 'to ensure the physical, psychological and moral integrity'. Yet that at that time there were no clear threats against the life of the petitioner, otherwise they would have been mentioned. The fact that the Court nevertheless ordered provisional measures indicates its serious concern with the situation in Peru at the time.

²⁰⁰ See further Human Rights Watch, "Torture and Political Persecution in Peru", A Human Rights Watch/Americas Division Short Report, Vol. 9, No. 4(B), December 1997. See also section 3.4 of this chapter referring to the threats to the freedom of expression during the Fujimori regime, in particular the case of Ivcher Bronstein. In addition see the report of the UN Special Rapporteur, Cumaraswamy, on the independence of judges and lawyers, in an addendum regarding his mission to Peru (September 1996), expressing his concern 'as to whether the action of Congress in this matter has violated the principle of judicial immunity for decisions made in the exercise of judicial functions', E/CN.4/1998/39/Add.1, 19 February 1998, section III. Also see HRC Concluding Observations (Peru), 3 November 2000, §§10 and 14.

²⁰¹ The Inter-American Commission brought the case before the Court on 2 July 1999 and the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Peru received official notice of the case on 14 July. Two days later Peru returned all the paper work concerning the case to the Inter-American Court and delivered a note to its Secretariat informing it that it had withdrawn its recognition of the Court's contentious jurisdiction 'with immediate effect' as of 9 July 1999. This was the date on which it had deposited a declaration to this effect with the OAS Secretariat. It stated that this applied 'to all cases in which Peru has not answered the application filed with the Court'. IACHR Constitutional Court case (Manuel Aguirre Roca, Guillermo Rey Terry, and Delia Revoredo de Mur v. Peru), judgment of 24 September 1999 (Competence), §23.

²⁰² IACHR Constitutional Court case, judgment of 24 September 1999 (Competence). See further Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction).

²⁰³ IACHR Constitutional Court case, Order of 14 March 2001, 1st 'Having Seen' clause.

²⁰⁴ IACHR Constitutional Court case, Order of 14 August 2000, 2nd 'Having seen' clause.

²⁰⁵ See IACHR Constitutional Court case, President's Order for urgent measures, 7 April 2000 and Order for provisional measures of 14 August 2000, confirming the President's Order 'in all of its aspects', adding that this was 'in order to prevent her from suffering irreparable damage', 1st 'Decisional' clause.

Then the situation took an interesting turn. In September 2000 a video showing Vladimiro Montesinos, the President's advisor and de facto head of the National Intelligence Service,²⁰⁶ handing cash to legislators was broadcast and a corruption scandal unfolded. In November Fujimori and Montesinos fled Peru and a transitional government was installed.

In January 2001 the Court found on the merits that the right to due process (Article 8 ACHR) and adequate judicial recourse (Article 25 ACHR) of the three justices had been violated. It stressed the importance of judicial independence for the rule of law and the added importance of the independence of Justices of a constitutional court, 'owing to the nature of the matters submitted to their consideration'.²⁰⁷ One of the main purposes of the separation of powers is indeed the protection of judicial independence.²⁰⁸ The Court also referred to case law by the European Court on the importance of guarantees for judges against external pressure²⁰⁹ and it invoked the United Nations Basic Principles on the Independence of the Judiciary.²¹⁰

A few days after the publication of the judgment the Commission stated that despite the political change in Peru the provisional measures should be maintained, as the 'precautionary measures corresponding to the legal proceedings filed against [her] have still not been executed'.²¹¹ At the end of that month the State informed the Court that it had 'executed the necessary actions' to comply both with the Court's judgment and with its provisional measures. It stated that it had also taken steps to eliminate the political manipulation of the judiciary, which had 'created favorable conditions for deciding the cases that are being processed'. On 17 November the Congress had reinstated the three justices and, the day before it approached the Inter-American Court, the State had also held a meeting with Delia Revoredo 'to co-ordinate compliance with the judgment on the merits'.²¹²

The Court decided to lift its provisional measures and to close the file. It pointed out that provisional measures 'have an exceptional nature and are therefore ordered having regard to the need for protection and, once ordered, they must be maintained' as long as the criteria in Article 63(2) ACHR apply.²¹³ It noted the changes that had occurred in Peru and the developments in the Constitutional Court case, in particular Mrs. Revoredo's reinstatement as a justice. Thus 'the reasons that caused this Court to order provisional measures (...) have terminated', since the cir-

²⁰⁶ In a talk in 2005 Justice Revoredo commented on the role of Montesinos during the Fujimori reign. "Justice Revoredo also recalled the "cell-phone" votes, where Fujimori's secretive security chief Vladimiro Montesinos would call members of congress moments before an issue was to be decided and tell them how to vote. The dismantling of the legal and legislative system was so intricately orchestrated that it was not apparent to anyone, not even those recruited by Fujimori, exactly how the laws were being manipulated to favor Fujimori". See Veronica Herrera, 'Fujimori's Quiet Coup d'Etat and the Restoration of Peru's Constitutional Court', 24 January 2005, report of talk by Justice Delia Revoredo Marsano, co-sponsored by the Center for Latin American Studies and Boalt Hall School of Law, University of California, <<http://socrates.berkeley.edu:7001/Events/spring2005/01-24-05-revoredo/index.html>> (consulted 10 June 2007).

²⁰⁷ IACHR Constitutional Court case, 31 January 2001 (merits), §73.

²⁰⁸ Id., §75.

²⁰⁹ Id., §7, referring to the appointment process (e.g. ECtHR Langborger, 27 January 1989, §32); the importance of a fixed term position (see e.g. Le Compte, Van Leuven and De Meyere, 23 June 1981, §55; and of guarantees against external pressure (see also, e.g. Piersack, 1 October 1982, §27).

²¹⁰ Adopted by the Seventh United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, Milan 26 August-6 September 1985, and confirmed by the General Assembly in its resolutions 40/32, 29 November 1985 and 40/146, 13 December 1985.

²¹¹ IACHR Constitutional Court case, Order of 14 March 2001, 5th 'Having Seen' clause.

²¹² Id., 6th 'Having Seen' clause.

²¹³ Id., 3rd 'Considering' clause.

cumstances of ‘extreme gravity and urgency’ and the probability of irreparable harm, as required by Article 63(2) ACHR, no longer existed. What is relevant to its approach to the concept of provisional measures is that the Court specifically considered that the Commission’s argument that legal proceedings were still pending did ‘not bear any relation to the purpose of the provisional measures adopted by the Court’ in August 2000, ‘in its first operative paragraph; moreover, they do not constitute circumstances of extreme gravity and urgency that would warrant maintaining the actual provisional measures’.²¹⁴ In other words, Mrs Revoredo’s reinstatement had occurred subsequent to the Commission’s submission and seems to have been the most important reason for the Court to lift its provisional measures. Its main concern now was to emphasize the exceptional nature of its provisional measures. Yet this case indicates that in the context of Fujimori’s reign the Court had considered the legal harassment of a petitioner and her continued impeachment as a justice to be a circumstance of extreme gravity and urgency.

2.8.3 Conclusion

Lack of judicial independence in one individual case generally speaking can be reversed,²¹⁵ but the same is not the case when there is a climate of fear and corruption of the judiciary. As the Court’s provisional measures were ordered in such a context, they may be considered to be aimed at the prevention of irreversible harm to the claim. In that sense such provisional measures are within the outer limits of the concept. Moreover, to the extent that the legal harassment complained of is likely to lead to other types of harassment and threats as well, the provisional measures aim to prevent irreparable harm to persons. As the case was brought in a context in which death threats and attacks had taken place, the likelihood of irreparable harm to persons was not remote. Given the context and wording of the provisional measures in this case, they may be argued to fall within the common core of the concept as well.

2.9 Preserving evidence

2.9.1 Introduction

The former European Commission appears to have used provisional measures at least once to safeguard evidentiary material. It invoked the rule on provisional measures in a case after the deaths of the petitioners. This case may serve as an example where a human rights adjudicator has used provisional measures in order to prevent irreversible harm to the procedure, but not irreparable harm to persons.²¹⁶

The chapter on the development of the concept of provisional measures by the ICJ (Chapter I), referred to irreparable harm to the claim, to the proceedings or to persons. In this chapter a distinction is made between irreparable and irreversible harm. As noted, when it concerns harm to the claim or the procedure, but not to life and physical integrity, the term irreversible harm is used.²¹⁷

²¹⁴ Id., 4th ‘Considering’ clause.

²¹⁵ Unless, e.g. the death penalty is imposed, see Chapter III (Executions).

²¹⁶ A situation in which the irreparable harm to persons is not directly related to the rights claimed in the case pending before the adjudicator but rather to harm to the proceedings is that of death threats and harassment to witnesses in the case. In such situation there is irreparable harm to persons as well. See Chapter IX (Threats).

²¹⁷ See the Introduction to Part II.

2.9.2 Practice

In Ensslin, Baader, Raspe v. Germany (1978) the petitioners before the European Commission claimed that they were subject to exceptional conditions of detention, in particular prolonged isolation, ‘causing them to undergo considerable physical, psychological and mental suffering’.²¹⁸ In October 1977 the Commission decided to postpone its examination of the complaint ‘by reason of the circumstances obtaining at that time’.²¹⁹ A few days later, however, the petitioners were found dead. The President of the Commission immediately informed the government, ‘under Rules 36, 14 and 28 of the Rules of Procedure’, that ‘he thought it desirable, in the interests of the proper conduct of the proceedings, that a Commission’s delegation should be enabled to visit Stuttgart-Stammheim prison and make any observations which might prove necessary in order to establish the facts’.²²⁰ Rule 36 was the Commission’s Rule on provisional measures. With the Government’s agreement, two delegates of the Commission travelled to Stuttgart on 19 and 20 October 1977. The Commission’s provisional measures were taken following the deaths of the petitioners on 17 October. They do not involve intervention in detention situations, since the petitioners were already dead. The fact that the Commission invoked Rule 36 (together with Rules 14 and 28) may be explained here by the Commission’s aim to safeguard the evidence in the interest of the proceedings pending before it.²²¹

In this respect it referred to the observations by the delegates of the Commission when they inspected the cells of the petitioners on 19 and 20 October.²²² It also noted that while it was to examine in particular the complaint of sensory and social isolation, and while the circumstances of the deaths of the petitioners were ‘not in themselves the subject of the application’, the question did arise whether their deaths may have been ‘the consequence of the treatment of which they complained’.²²³ Yet it concluded that there was ‘no objective indication along those lines’.²²⁴ Subsequently the Commission found the claim of violations of Articles 3 and 6 ECHR manifestly ill-founded and the case was declared inadmissible.

As has been pointed out elsewhere, in a similar situation the Court is now more likely to resort to the possibility to ask the State for clarifications, or would carry out an on-site investigation, both under different rules,²²⁵ rather than using provisional measures in this context.²²⁶

2.9.3 Conclusion

The text of the Rules on provisional measures used by the European Court of Human Rights, the former European Commission on Human Rights and the Bosnia Chamber, which are virtually ²¹⁸ EComHR Ensslin, Baader and Raspe v. FRG, 8 July 1978 (inadm.), §42.

²¹⁹ Id., §44.

²²⁰ Id., §44.

²²¹ The Commission may have deemed it advisable to show an immediate response especially because just prior to the deaths of the petitioners it had decided to postpone the proceedings, with a rather cryptic justification. It is also possible that the initiative in fact came from the government. In any case, the Commission’s decision presents it as the initiative of its President to invoke Rule 36.

²²² According to the delegates the cells ‘were well-lit by windows which could be opened from inside; the walls were largely covered with books and posters. The cells were not sound-proofed either from the inside or from the outside: two persons confined on opposite sides of the central corridor could talk to each other by raising their voices’, EComHR Ensslin, Baader, Raspe v. FRG, 8 July 1978 (inadm.), §6.

²²³ EComHR Ensslin, Baader, Raspe v. FRG, 8 July 1978 (inadm.), §11.

²²⁴ Id., §12.

²²⁵ See Rules 54(2a) and 42(2) respectively.

²²⁶ See Haack/Burbano Herrera/Zwaak (2008), p. 44.

identical, is of particular interest in the context of preventing irreversible harm to the claim and of the proceedings. Different from the provisions of the other human rights adjudicators on provisional measures it does not refer to preventing irreparable harm, but just to ‘any interim measure which it considers should be adopted in the interests of the parties or of the proper conduct of the proceedings before it’.²²⁷ In the above case the use of provisional measures could be justified as in the interest of the ‘proper conduct of the proceedings before it’. Provisional measures to prevent irreversible harm to the proceedings pending before the human rights adjudicator could be within the outer limits of the concept. Yet they would require a more convincing case than that before the European Commission in this instance. Nevertheless, given the specific function assigned to the European Commission (as well as the Court) and given the text of the Rule on provisional measures employed in the European system, its invocation of the Rule on provisional measures to prevent irreparable harm to the procedure could certainly be justified.

2.10 Halting the destruction of a work of art

The HRC has used provisional measures in one exceptional case involving the threatened destruction of a painting critical of the South Korean government. In Hak-Chul Shin v. Republic of South Korea (2004) the artist was accused of supporting the North Korean government with this painting. He had been arrested in August 1998 and his painting was seized and allegedly damaged by careless handling. The proceedings against him were concluded in November 1999, confirming his conviction, following the finding that the picture was an ‘enemy-benefiting expression’. The painting ‘was thus ready for destruction following its earlier seizure’.²²⁸

Counsel for the petitioner submitted his case to the HRC several months later and the Special Rapporteur used a provisional measure requesting the State, while the case was pending before the HRC, not to destroy the painting for which the petitioner had been convicted.²²⁹ On the merits the HRC found that the painting’s confiscation and the conviction of the petitioner violated his right to freedom of expression. The State was to provide him with an effective remedy, including compensation for and annulment of his conviction and payment of legal costs. Moreover, because it had not shown that any infringement on the petitioner’s freedom of expression, ‘as expressed through the painting’ is justified, ‘it should return the painting to him in its original condition, bearing any necessary expenses incurred thereby’.²³⁰ Clearly, if the painting had been destroyed this remedy would have been impossible. In that sense the provisional measures aimed to prevent irreversible harm to the claim and may thus be situated within the outer limits. Yet it does not concern irreparable harm to persons involving the right to life and the prohibition or torture and ill-treatment. Currently it does not fall within the common core of the concept of provisional measures in human rights adjudication.

²²⁷ See Rule 39 of the current Rules of Court, but also Rule 36 of the former Commission and Rule 36 of the Bosnia Chamber.

²²⁸ HRC Hak-Chul Shin v. South Korea, 16 March 2004, §2.4.

²²⁹ The petitioner contended that his painting ‘depicts his dream of peaceful unification and democratisation of his country based on his experience of rural life from his children’. Among others he sought an ‘unconditional and immediate return of the painting in its present condition’ and a repeal or suspension of Article 7 of the National Security Law, Id., §3.7. In December 2001 the State party responded that it could not commit itself to such a suspension or repeal. Among others it argued that the case was inadmissible because the judicial proceedings had been consistent with the ICCPR, Id., §4.2.

²³⁰ HRC Hak-Chul Shin v. South Korea, 16 March 2004, §9.

2.11 Securing political rights

2.11.1 Introduction

There have been a few situations, before the Bosnia Chamber and in the Inter-American system, in which petitioners requested the use of provisional measures in order to secure political rights. It is clear, however, that the European Court does not appreciate receiving requests for provisional measures in the context of political rights. In 2007 its Registrar published a press release entitled ‘Inappropriate use of interim measures procedure’ in which it was noted that the Court within a few days the Court had received ‘a large number of requests’ for the Court to adopt provisional measures ‘in respect of the French Government’s decision not to organise a referendum on the European Union Lisbon Treaty’. Yet ‘as a matter of consistent practice’, it only uses its power to adopt provisional measures ‘where the applicant is at an established risk of imminent and irreparable harm. This typically involves allegations of exposure to ill-treatment in breach of Article 3 (prohibition of torture and inhuman and degrading treatment) of the European Convention on Human Rights and the most common example is where the applicant is on the point of expulsion to a country where he or she will be at risk of such treatment or indeed face a life-threatening situation (raising issues under Article 2 of the Convention – the right to life)’.²³¹

Some figures were provided as general background:

“In 2007 the Court has received approximately 1,060 requests for interim measures and granted 252 of them. The Court has, however, never granted a request for interim measures in circumstances such as the refusal by a government to hold a referendum which falls far outside the usual ambit of this procedure. The recent requests, which appear to be part of an orchestrated campaign, have no chance whatsoever of success and serve solely to take up time which could be spent on more urgent matters in respect of which the Court might be called upon to issue an interim measure. The Court has currently some 100,000 applications pending before it”.²³²

Clearly this type of situation does not deal with irreparable harm to persons. Moreover, the claim itself does not appear pressing from an ECHR perspective.²³³ This section briefly discusses the Inter-American practice and the practice of the Bosnia Chamber.

2.11.2 Practice of the Bosnia Chamber

In 1998 the Bosnia Chamber ordered provisional measures to secure ballot papers of out-of-country voters for elections taking place in Srpska.²³⁴ It subsequently withdrew its Order, but this was ²³¹ ECtHR Press release issued by the Registrar, ‘Inappropriate use of interim measures procedure’, 21 December 2007.

²³² Ibid.

²³³ For a claim that was considered more serious by the Court see Information Note 18 (May 2000) regarding Comitato Promotore Referendum Antiproporzionale (del 21/5/2000), Comitato Promotore Referendum Maggioritario (del 18/4/1999) v. Italy, where the Court refused to take provisional measures ordering a State to take the necessary measures to alter electoral rules, but where it did decide to treat the case with priority under Rule 41 (decision of 27 April 2000). See also Press Release 555 issued by the Registrar, ‘Information concerning an application lodged against Turkey’, 28 July 2008, referring to the Court’s decision not to adopt a provisional measure under Rule 39 to prevent the Turkish Constitutional Court from ordering the dissolution of the Justice and Development Party AKP. The Court had also rejected the requests for urgent notification and granting priority (Rules 40 and 41).

because it determined it had no competence to deal with the case ratione personae.²³⁵ Nevertheless, this indicates that had the State BiH and Republika Srpska, rather than the OSCE, been responsible for the actions complained of, the Chamber would have maintained its Order. Thus, in this national but internationalized hybrid and transitional post-war system provisional measures have been used in the context of political rights (free elections).

In another case the Chamber denied a request for provisional measures to secure participation in the local elections by certain members of the Serb Radical Party. The petitioners had requested the Chamber to order Bosnia and Herzegovina to take all necessary steps to withdraw a specific Article of the Rules and Regulations of the OSCE Provisional Election Commission 'or to suspend the election proceedings until a final decision was reached'.²³⁶ The Election Commission had required the party to replace three leaders and register itself under a new name. As the party had failed to do so, it had not met the requirements for registration.

Like in the previous case the Chamber subsequently declared the case inadmissible ratione personae since the General Framework Agreement did not provide for the intervention of the respondent Party in the conduct of the elections. 'Accordingly', the contested actions were 'not such' as would be 'within the responsibility of the respondent Party'.²³⁷ The Chamber's previous refusal to order provisional measures may be due to its prima facie lack of jurisdiction to deal with the case, which was the more evident as it had already dealt with such a case before. On the other hand, the context of these cases is very different. The first dealt with a situation in which predominantly Bosniak out-of-country voters were prevented to vote in the Srpska elections and the second dealt with disgruntled Serb nationalists wishing to take part in the elections on their own terms, contrary to the principles of the Framework Agreement.

2.11.3 Inter-American practice

In November 2000 the Inter-American Commission 'granted general precautionary measures on behalf of persons affected by detention resulting from the electoral process in Haiti' and on behalf of three persons in particular. It requested Haiti to take the necessary measures:

"To respect and ensure the full and free exercise of the following rights: freedom of conscience, thought, and expression and the right to assembly, association, free movement, and residence, political rights, and due process".²³⁸

The Commission noted that, according to the information received, members of the government, government security forces or private agents tolerated or motivated by such public officials, had persecuted and threatened several political opponents. This included acts of violence.²³⁹ The protective measures required, however, apparently did not relate to protection of life and physical integrity but to several political and other rights. Also, the Commission called these 'general precautionary measures'.²⁴⁰ It seems that the purpose of the precautionary measure in this case was to prevent irreparable harm to rights such as the freedom of expression in the context of the ²³⁴ Bosnia Chamber Adnan Suljanović, Edita Čišić and Asim Lelić v. State BiH and Republika Srpska, 14 May 1998, (inadm.), §12.

²³⁵ Id., §44 (provisional measures 'no longer appropriate'). On provisional measures and jurisdiction see further Chapter XVI (Jurisdiction and admissibility).

²³⁶ Bosnia Chamber Srpska Radikalna Stranka v. State BiH, 8 December 2000 (inadm.), §6.

²³⁷ Id., §§12-13.

²³⁸ CIDH Political Opponents v. Haiti, precautionary measure of 13 November 2000), Annual Report 2000, §36.

²³⁹ Ibid.

²⁴⁰ Ibid.

electoral process. In that case it may be that the rationale for such measures is that violations of aforementioned political rights could not be repaired by allowing such freedoms again after the elections, or by monetary damages. After all such violations may negatively influence the results of the elections themselves.

In October 2005 the Commission had used precautionary measures on behalf of Jorge Castañeda Gutman (Mexico). He could not be registered at an independent political candidate as the domestic rules on elections provided that only political parties could request the registration of candidates 'for popularly elected offices'. According to the Commission 'this situation could lead to irreparable damage to the exercise of political rights'. Thus it requested the government to allow his provisional registration as a political candidate.²⁴¹ Yet it could be argued that these measures have the character of summary proceedings rather than provisional measures to prevent irreversible harm to the claim. Indeed, when the Commission subsequently requested the Court to order provisional measures, the Court denied this request.²⁴² It observed that the case was still pending before the Commission. In this case ordering such measures would anticipate a discussion on the merits of a case that was not yet pending before the Court.²⁴³ It dismissed the request as inadmissible because it could not rule on the presence of a cognizable claim, unless it would have a direct bearing with the extreme gravity, urgency and necessity to prevent irreparable harm to persons.²⁴⁴ The request was not of the type warranting provisional measures.²⁴⁵ Other legal claims could only be brought before the Court in the context of contentious cases pending before it, or in request for Consultative Opinions.²⁴⁶

The Judges Cançado Trindade and Ventura Robles would have preferred this decision to have been taken after a public hearing, discussing the scope of orders for provisional measures.²⁴⁷ They would have had many questions to ask of the legal representatives and the Commission. They noted that in this case the Commission requested the Court's provisional measures before it had even decided on the admissibility of the case pending before it. This was in sharp contrast with the many cases involving risk of irreparable harm to the life and personal integrity of persons in which it first maintained its own precautionary measures for a considerable time before resorting to the Court.²⁴⁸ In many cases it maintained its precautionary measures despite successive violations of fundamental rights such as the right to life and personal integrity by the addressee State.²⁴⁹ There was an apparent lack of clear criteria applied by the Commission in its decision whether to request the Court's provisional measures.²⁵⁰ Why was the Commission so quick, they wished to know, in requesting the Court's provisional measures in an election dispute in Mexico that was still pending before it, while on the other hand it waited more than five years before requesting the Court's provisional measures in the case of the detention circumstances at the ²⁴¹ CIDH Annual Report 2005, Jorge Castañeda Gutman (Mexico), §32.

²⁴² IACHR Jorge Castañeda Gutman (Mexico), Order of 25 November 2005 denying a request for provisional measures.

²⁴³ Id., 4th and 9th 'Considering' clauses.

²⁴⁴ Id., 8th 'Considering' clause.

²⁴⁵ Id., 9th 'Considering' clause.

²⁴⁶ Id., 8th 'Considering' clause.

²⁴⁷ Id., Voto razonado conjunto de los jueces A.A. Cançado Trindade y M.E. Ventura Robles, §1. The two judges also observed that the Court had dismissed certain observations sent by the State proprio motu because it had not requested them, see §2.

²⁴⁸ Id., Voto razonado conjunto de los jueces A.A. Cançado Trindade y M.E. Ventura Robles, §3.

²⁴⁹ Id., Voto razonado conjunto de los jueces A.A. Cançado Trindade y M.E. Ventura Robles, §8.

²⁵⁰ Id., Voto razonado conjunto de los jueces A.A. Cançado Trindade y M.E. Ventura Robles, §§4 and 8.

FEBEM detention center,²⁵¹ which had already caused the deaths of children and adolescents? In that case, concerning a true human tragedy, it had in vain maintained its own precautionary measures and only resorted to the Court because of the initiatives taken by the representatives of the beneficiaries.²⁵²

The two judges also noted that this was not the first time that the Commission had attempted to resolve the merits of a contentious case through a request for provisional measures. They referred to another case in which it had attempted thus to resolve a situation involving the electoral process of a State.²⁵³ In addition they referred to the Chipoco case (Peru) as ‘another example of such trivialization’. In this case the Court had denied the Commission’s request for provisional measures ‘to protect the freedom of expression’ of Mr Chipoco, for lack of sufficient information.²⁵⁴

2.11.4 Conclusion

It depends on the context how ‘irreversible’ hindrance of political rights would be. The result of blocking political access of minorities in a context of pervasive discrimination,²⁵⁵ or of blocking such access to political opponents, in a context of widespread political persecution, could be argued to be irreversible in the long run. Yet blocking candidacy for political elections in one single instance is unlikely to be considered irreversible.²⁵⁶ The criterion could be whether the hindrance has a considerable and pervasive impact on society as a whole, rather than on an individual. In such case provisional measures may still be within the outer limits of the concept, but in the other cases they move beyond these limits.

3 BEYOND THE OUTER LIMITS?

3.1 Introduction

There are situations in which petitioners have requested provisional measures where their use clearly would be beyond the outer limits of the concept. An example dealt with by the HRC is B.L. v. Australia (1996). The petitioner alleged that the legal system and legal profession were corrupt and that the State party was responsible for tolerating it.²⁵⁷ She requested ‘interim protection’ by the HRC. Among others, she considered that it had the obligation to warn members of the international community that Australia did not provide equality before the law and that the law

²⁵¹ See IACHR Case of the children and adolescents deprived of their liberty in the ‘Complexo do Tatuapé’ of FEBEM (Brazil), Orders of 17 and 30 November 2005. See further Chapter VI (Detention).

²⁵² IACHR Jorge Castañeda Gutman (Mexico), Order of 25 November 2005, Voto razonado conjunto de los jueces A.A. Cançado Trindade y M.E. Ventura Robles, §5.

²⁵³ Id., Voto razonado conjunto de los jueces A.A. Cançado Trindade y M.E. Ventura Robles, §7 referring to Delgado Parker (Peru).

²⁵⁴ See Chipoco case, denial of provisional measures of 27 January 1993 (and previously denial by the President of 14 December 1992). See also section 2.6 of this Chapter.

²⁵⁵ See also the Inter-American Court’s judgment on the merits IACHR Yatama v. Nicaragua, 23 June 2005, in which an indigenous party was excluded from the elections. Among others the Court found violations of Articles 8 and 25 ACHR. See e.g. §248 and §259.

²⁵⁶ Of course the individual candidate’s plans would be hindered, but he could run for elections at a later point.

²⁵⁷ HRC B.L. v. Australia, 8 November 1996.

did not protect overseas investments in Australia. In reference to the Committee's statement in Stewart v. Canada,²⁵⁸ a case discussed in section 3.2, the Secretariat advised her that no provisional measures could be used in her case.²⁵⁹ Indeed, if she had had a case in the first place, compensation would have been an adequate remedy for the violation found. This clearly shows a basic requirement of provisional measures, namely that the violation should be prevented because any compensation would be inadequate.

The HRC does not generally refer to failed requests for provisional measures. The above example was found in the case files in Geneva during a research visit in October 1998 and it may be assumed to represent a range of cases which the petitioners considered urgent, but the HRC did not.²⁶⁰ The Inter-American Court has recorded a few instances in which it refused to order provisional measures.²⁶¹ Moreover, the Bosnia Chamber routinely included a reference to its refusal to order provisional measures in its decisions on merits and inadmissibility. Most of them related to forced evictions and some to issues such as reinstatement of officials, payment of pensions, and other financial issues.

There have also been cases in which adjudicators have used provisional measures that appear to be beyond the outer limits of the concept. This section singles out a few of them as well.

3.2 Halting deportation in 'family life type' cases (not involving non-refoulement)

Once in a while the ECtHR has used provisional measures in cases pending under Article 8 ECHR on the right to family life, rather than (also) on Article 3 ECHR on the prohibition of cruel treatment.²⁶² On one occasion the HRC has used provisional measures to halt deportation in a case involving a lawful alien facing a deportation order. In other words this was not a non-refoulement case involving a real risk of ill treatment or the imposition of the death penalty in the receiving State. While this case seems an exception not just vis-à-vis the other adjudicators, but ²⁵⁸ See e.g. submissions by the petitioner of 17 December 1994, 21 and 29 January 1995, 13 and 25 February 1995 and letter by the Secretariat to the petitioner of 7 February 1995, B.L. v. Australia, 8 November 1996 (inadm.) (on file with the author).

²⁵⁹ At the same time it requested her to substantiate her claim so that the case could be brought to the attention of the Special Rapporteur in due time. Subsequently, in a two-page decision, the HRC declared the case inadmissible. It observed that the petitioner had not substantiated the claim. The allegations remained sweeping and did not in any way reveal how her rights might have been violated. HRC B.L. v. Australia, 8 November 1996 (inadm.).

²⁶⁰ An example of a failed request to which it did refer is in HRC Walter Obodzinsky v. Canada, 19 March 2007 (petitioner, a war criminal, had sought a stay of his citizenship revocation proceedings, which was rejected by the Special Rapporteur on 7 October 2007, §1.2). Another example involves a right to privacy claim (Article 17 ICCPR) in which the petitioner had requested the Committee's provisional measures to the effect that it ask the State 'not to subject her to any non-consensual medical or psychiatric examination, or the threat thereof, before the Committee has considered her case', §3.9. In July 2006 the petitioner was informed by the Secretariat that the Rapporteur had decided not to take the provisional measures requested, §1.2. On the merits the HRC did find a violation of Article 17 as the interference with the privacy of the petitioner was unreasonable in the circumstances. See HRC M.G. v. Germany, 23 July 2008.

²⁶¹ These are discussed in this chapter. The European Commission initially occasionally noted, in the context of specific cases, that it had no power to use provisional measures. See e.g. Chapters II (Systems) and XVI (Legal status).

²⁶² See e.g. ECtHR Hamidovic v. Italy, No. 31956/05 and Useinov v. the Netherlands, No. 61292/00, both referred to in Annual Report 2005 of the Third Section, p. 10.

also for the HRC itself, it is worth discussing as it provides a rationale for its use of provisional measures. Moreover, the case may serve to show the outer limits of the concept.

Stewart v. Canada (1996)²⁶³ dealt with a British citizen who had lived in Canada since he was seven years old and was now facing deportation to the UK.²⁶⁴ In April 1993 the Rapporteur used provisional measures and almost a year later the HRC confirmed this in its admissibility decision.²⁶⁵ Among others, the petitioner had argued that his deportation would amount to cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment within the meaning of Article 7.²⁶⁶ He had pointed out that the prison terms he served for various convictions already constituted adequate punishment, that his criminal record did not reveal that he was a danger to public safety, that he had lived in Canada since the age of seven and that his deportation would effectively and permanently sever all his ties in Canada. On the other hand, Canada considered that there were no 'special or compelling circumstances in the case that would appear to cause irreparable harm', although he would 'undoubtedly suffer personal inconvenience'. It noted that it was not deporting the petitioner to a country 'where his safety or life would be in jeopardy'. It also noted that he 'would not be barred once and for all from readmission to Canada'.²⁶⁷ About the use of provisional measures in general Canada submitted that the Committee 'should not impose a general rule on States parties to sus-

²⁶³ HRC Stewart v. Canada, 1 November 1996 (while the information on the use of provisional measures is not provided on the cover page, §§2.7, 4.1-4.5, 7.7 discuss the issue). The cover page of the admissibility decision does refer to provisional measures of 24 April 1993 (§4.1 of the View refers to 26 April 1993); admissibility decision of 18 March 1994, CCPR/C/50/D/538/1993, 3 May 1994 (unpublished document on file with the author).

²⁶⁴ The petitioner was living together with his mother and younger brother. His mother was in poor health and his brother was mentally disabled and suffering from chronic epilepsy. Apart from his older brother, who had been deported to the UK the previous year, all his relatives lived in Canada. He had two young children, who were living with their mother. Between September 1978 and May 1991 he was convicted on 42 occasions mostly for petty offences and traffic offences, although one was for assault with bodily harm. His counsel noted that most of her client's convictions were attributable to his substance abuse problems, in particular alcoholism. For the last two years and four months he had participated in rehabilitation programs and remained alcohol-free, with the exception of one relapse.

²⁶⁵ As discussed in Chapter II of this book, in between sessions it is the Special Rapporteur appointed by the HRC from among its members, who decides on how to proceed with new cases. This includes decision-making on the use of provisional measures.

²⁶⁶ The petitioner claimed violation of Articles 7, 9, 12, 13, 17 and 23 ICCPR. With regard to Article 7 the HRC should determine on the merits the question 'whether the permanent separation of an individual from his/her family and/or close relatives and the effective banishment of a person from the only country he ever knew and in which he grew up may amount to cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment'. He submitted that Article 12(4) was applicable to his situation because for all practical purposes Canada was his own country and his deportation would result in 'an absolute statutory bar from re-entering Canada'. Article 12(4) stipulates: "No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of the right to enter his own country". He pointed out that Article 12(4) used the phrase 'his own country' rather than country of nationality or country of birth. With regard to Article 9 he noted that there was no indication that the concept of liberty only encompassed physical freedom. Article 12 recognized liberty in a broader sense as well. He believed that his deportation would violate 'his liberty of movement within Canada and within his community', §3.5.

²⁶⁷ Canada pointed out, moreover, that 'although the author's social ties with his family may be affected, his complaint makes it clear that his family has no financial or other objective dependence on him: the author does not contribute financially to his brother, has not maintained contact with his father for seven or eight years and, after the divorce from his wife in 1989, apparently has not maintained any contact with his wife or children'.

pend measures or decisions at a domestic level unless there are special circumstances where such a measure or decision might conflict with the effective exercise of the author's right of petition'.²⁶⁸ In relation to deportation in particular it considered that '(t)he fact that a complaint has been filed with the Committee should not automatically imply that the State party is restricted in its power to implement a deportation decision'.²⁶⁹ According to Canada 'considerations of state security and public policy must be considered prior to imposing restraints on a State party to implement a decision lawfully taken'.²⁷⁰ It therefore requested the HRC 'to clarify the criteria at the basis of the Special Rapporteur's decision to call for interim measures of protection and to consider withdrawing the request for interim protection under rule 86'.²⁷¹

Counsel emphasised that the test of what may constitute 'irreparable harm' to the petitioner should be considered by reference to the Committee's own criteria and not those developed by Canadian courts. In Canada, she submitted, the test for irreparable harm in relation to the right to family life had become 'one of almost exclusive financial dependency'. She had resorted to the HRC 'precisely because Canadian courts, including the Immigration Appeal Division, do not recognise family interests beyond financial dependency of family members'.²⁷² This test was, in fact, the issue before the HRC. It would, therefore, 'defeat the effectiveness of any order the Committee might make in the author's favour in the future if the rule 86 request were to be cancelled now'.²⁷³ It would be unjustified, moreover, 'to apply a "balance of convenience" test in determining whether or not to invoke rule 86, as this test is inappropriate where fundamental human rights are at issue'.²⁷⁴

In March 1994 the HRC (in full session) maintained the Rapporteur's provisional measures. As part of its admissibility decision the Committee 'noted' Canada's request to clarify the criteria for using provisional measures and its request for the withdrawal of the provisional measures in this case.²⁷⁵ It observed that 'what may constitute "irreparable damage" to the victim within the meaning of rule 86 cannot be determined generally'. It did clarify, to some extent, what it considered essential:

"The essential criterion is indeed the irreversibility of the consequences, in the sense of the inability of the author to secure his rights, should there later be a finding of a violation of the ²⁶⁸ HRC Stewart v. Canada, 1 November 1996, §4.3.

²⁶⁹ Ibid.

²⁷⁰ Ibid., §4.3.

²⁷¹ About the issue of the official State responses see Chapter XVII.

²⁷² HRC Stewart v. Canada, 1 November 1996, §4.5.

²⁷³ Ibid. 'Rule 86' refers to the rule on provisional measures.

²⁷⁴ Ibid. As part of its arguments on admissibility the State pointed out, once more, that its decision to deport the petitioner was 'justified by the facts of the case and by Canada's duty to enforce public interest statutes and to protect society. Canadian courts have held that the most important objective for a government is to protect the security of its nationals'. The State noted the immigration authorities had taken into account humanitarian and compassionate grounds, including family considerations, and balanced these against Canada's duty to protect society and 'properly enforce public interest statutes', §5.7. According to counsel the humanitarian and compassionate discretion of the Minister did not provide an effective mechanism to ensure that family interests were balanced against other interests. She also dismissed as 'patently wrong' the argument by Canada 'that the Court, upon application for judicial review of a deportation order, may balance the hardship caused by removal against the public interest', §6.4. She pointed out that the court had repeatedly explained that it is limited to strict judicial review and cannot balance these interests.

²⁷⁵ HRC Stewart v. Canada, 1 November 1996, §7.7.

Covenant on the merits. The Committee may decide, in any given case, not to issue a request under rule 86 where it believes that compensation would be an adequate remedy".²⁷⁶

Applying this criterion to the specific situation of deportation cases, the HRC explained that it required information on the ability of the petitioner 'to return, should there be a finding in his favour on the merits'.²⁷⁷ In fact it maintained the provisional measure while it declared inadmissible the complaint that the separation from his family would amount to cruel and inhuman treatment in violation of Article 7 ICCPR.²⁷⁸ This article is often invoked in the context of provisional measures. Thus the HRC must have maintained its provisional measures on the basis of the remaining claims of Articles 12(4), on the right to enter his 'own country', 17 and 23 ICCPR (family life).

Canada's reference to the petitioner's right of petition indicates that it considers that the Committee's use of provisional measures is justified at least in order to guarantee this right. The HRC itself did not explicitly refer to the right of petition.²⁷⁹

The State's first argument against the provisional measure had been that the petitioner would not be returned to a country where his safety or life would be in jeopardy and that, 'furthermore, he would not be barred once and for all from readmission to Canada'.²⁸⁰ It is clear from the Committee's decision not to withdraw its provisional measure, that the HRC required more information before it was convinced of the possibility for the petitioner to return to Canada to visit his family.

The State party's second argument was that his family had 'no financial or other objective dependence' on him, although his social ties with the family may be affected. Thus, it considered that there were no special compelling circumstances in the case that would appear to cause irreparable harm in that respect either.²⁸¹ In the context of its decision not to withdraw its provisional measures, the Committee did not specifically address this argument. At a later stage, however, in its decision on the merits, it did attach importance to it.

In February 1995 the State considered, once more, that the deportation would not operate as an 'absolute bar' to re-entry into Canada. This time, this remark probably is a direct, albeit not very precise, response to the Committee's statement relating to the ability of the petitioner to return to Canada.²⁸²

²⁷⁶ Ibid.

²⁷⁷ Ibid.

²⁷⁸ It considered that the petitioner had not substantiated his claim that deportation to the UK and separation from his family would amount to cruel and inhuman treatment or violate his right to liberty and security of person. As it was not apparent that the State's decision to deport him was reached arbitrarily, it also declared inadmissible the Article 13 (procedural rights of lawful aliens) claim for failure to substantiate.

²⁷⁹ There is, however, a clear link between on the one hand the right of petition and on the other the Committee's discussion of irreparable harm to the victim, the petitioner's inability to secure his rights and the possible findings on the merits.

²⁸⁰ HRC Stewart v. Canada, 1 November 1996, §4.2.

²⁸¹ Ibid.

²⁸² Subsequently counsel pointed out that the petitioner would 'face serious obstacles in gaining readmission to Canada as a permanent resident and would have to meet the selection standards for admission to qualify as an independent immigrant, taking into account his occupational skills, education and experience', id. §10.2. In any case, he would be barred from readmission as a permanent resident unless he was pardoned from his prior criminal convictions. Counsel also stressed the 'emotionally supportive relationship' with his mother and brother. She argued that the domestic court's emphasis on the financial aspect of the family relationship did not take into account the emotional family bond.

Possibly, the decision on the merits in Stewart is based on a sense of realism: the HRC did not want the consequences of finding a violation, which could be that an extensive range of deportation situations would result in cruel treatment. In the meantime, when the provisional measures had been in place for three years and seven months, the HRC found on the merits that Articles 12(4), 17 and 23 ICCPR had not been violated.²⁸³

In this case the Special Rapporteur evidently had not considered compensation to be an adequate remedy in the event that the HRC would later find a violation of the Covenant on the merits.²⁸⁴ The full Committee confirmed this by deciding not to withdraw its provisional measures.

Thus far this is the only case in which the HRC has taken such an extensive approach in its use of provisional measures in deportation cases. The explanation it provided does not rule out that it would use them again in other cases not involving non-refoulement. This may mean that the HRC does not limit its use of provisional measures to halt deportation, expulsion or extradition to cases in which the petitioner is being returned to a country where his safety or life would be in jeopardy. In that case it does not limit their use to the prohibition of cruel treatment either. In other words, there may be circumstances other than a threat to safety or life in the receiving State or a separation from the family as cruel treatment that the Committee considers to be able to cause irreparable harm.²⁸⁵

As a practical matter, this means that in this case the HRC disagreed with the State's argument that there were no special or compelling circumstances that would appear to cause irreparable harm, although the petitioner 'would undoubtedly suffer personal inconvenience'.²⁸⁶ The HRC's statement implies that before it could withdraw its request it would have to be certain that the petitioner would indeed be able to return to Canada, should there be a finding in his favour on the merits. In other words, in this type of deportation case the HRC may decide to use provisional measures when it considers that, should it later find a violation of the Covenant, the petitioner would be unable to secure his rights, in this case to live in the country in which he grew up and to stay in touch with his family. Interpreting the Committee's general statement about its provisional measures, they aim at postponing irreversible consequences until the Committee has been able to determine, on the merits, whether these would result in 'irreparable harm' to the claim.²⁸⁷

Nevertheless, the HRC may have been proclaiming a general rule to explain its use of provisional measures in this case without actually adhering to that rule in practice. After all, in subsequent cases on the rights of lawful aliens who had considered a State as their own for a considerable number of years and who often had no links with their country of nationality, the HRC did ²⁸³ While several members of the HRC would have preferred a less restrictive interpretation of 'own country' in Article 12(4) and would have found violations of Articles 12 and 13, the majority did not. See the dissents by Evatt, Medina Quiroga, Francis, Chanet, Prado Vallejo and Bhagwati. Bhagwati considered that the Committee's narrow interpretation left without any protection 'people who have forged close links with a country not only through long residence but having regard to various other factors, who have adopted a country as their own, who have come to regard a country as their home country'.

²⁸⁴ See also Chapter XIII on the relationship with forms of reparation.

²⁸⁵ See also the conclusion to this Chapter arguing that the Committee's provisional measures should indeed be limited to situations causing irreparable harm to persons.

²⁸⁶ HRC Stewart v. Canada, 1 November 1996, §4.2.

²⁸⁷ After all, the HRC speaks of the 'irreversibility of the consequences', in the sense of the petitioner's inability to secure his rights, 'should there later be a finding of a violation of the covenant on the merits'. Moreover, it would only take provisional measures when it believes that compensation would be an inadequate remedy, see HRC Stewart v. Canada, 1 November 1996, §7.7.

not use provisional measures.²⁸⁸ While several of these cases were subsequently discontinued, Canepa v. Canada (1997) was decided on the merits. Like the discontinued cases, Canepa dealt with issues similar to those raised in Stewart v. Canada (1996) and again no violations were found. In fact the main difference between the two cases seems to be that the Committee used provisional measures in Stewart but not in Canepa.²⁸⁹

²⁸⁸ See e.g. HRC Canepa v. Canada (1997), J.P.A.F. v. Canada (disc. 1998), L. v. Canada, and A.B. v. Canada (disc. 1998). With regard to the latter case counsel submitted a claim on behalf of an Italian citizen who had been living in Canada for more than 30 years, since the age of six. His parents and brother were living in Canada and he had no real connections with Italy. Between 1975 and 1992 he was convicted of various crimes, which according to his counsel were mostly attributable to alcoholism and drug addiction. She pointed out that if the petitioner would be deported he would be barred from readmission to Canada. Counsel claimed deportation would interfere with his liberty of movement and with Articles 17 and 23(1) (protection of the family). She also made the argument that enforcement of the deportation order would result in cruel treatment under Article 7 ICCPR. This argument was based on the separate opinion of Judge de Meyer of the ECtHR in Beldjoudi v. France, Judgment of 26 February 1992, stating that the removal of an applicant from his country of residence and the severance of the ties with his wife and family would amount to inhuman treatment. Counsel pointed out that the deportation order could now be enforced at any point in time and she requested the use of Rule 86. She pointed out that the consequences of deportation were irreversible and 'should there later be a finding of a violation of rights under the Covenant on the merits', he would be 'unable to secure his rights'. The Special Rapporteur decided not to use provisional measures. The petitioner was deported as scheduled and eventually the Rapporteur transmitted the case under Rule 91. Note verbale to the permanent representative of Canada of 3 March 1995 in A.B. v. Canada (622/1995) (on file with the author). At the end of 1995 counsel notified the HRC that she was no longer retained to continue as counsel for this matter. In August 1998 the HRC informed the petitioner's parents that it had decided to discontinue examination of the case, taking into account that it had received no correspondence since 1995. Letter to the petitioner's parents of 13 August 1998 in A.B. v. Canada (622/1995) (on file with the author). Different from cases such as P.L.-B. v. Canada (where the reason provisional measures were not used probably related to time constraints) in this case there seems to have been a clear decision not to use provisional measures.

²⁸⁹ HRC Giosue Canepa v. Canada, 3 April 1997. Counsel's requests for provisional measures in Canepa v. Canada (1997), J.P.A.F. v. Canada (disc. 1998), L. v. Canada, and A.B. v. Canada (disc. 1998) were made in 1994, shortly after the Committee's admissibility decision in Stewart approving of the Rapporteur's provisional measures in that case. In 1993 counsel for Canepa and Stewart had asked the HRC to deal with the cases jointly since they raised 'identical issues'. Initial submission of 16 April 1993 in Canepa v. Canada (558/1993) (on file with the author). The HRC did not do so. The State, on the other hand, had requested the Committee, in November 1995, to examine the above three cases before formulating its Views in Stewart, because it considered the four cases raised similar legal issues while the factual situations were significantly different. It believed that the Committee's consideration of each of those cases would be facilitated if it would be familiar with the range of circumstances presented by them. It did not refer to Canepa. Letter by the State to the HRC, 1 November 1995 in relation to 538/1993 (Stewart) and 620-622/1995 (on file with the author). After 'due consideration' the HRC decided it would nevertheless be appropriate to proceed with the examination of the merits in Stewart at its forthcoming session in April 1996, rather than to put this on hold until it would have been able to examine the admissibility of the other three cases. It noted that the State could submit additional information about the different circumstances mentioned by it in order to facilitate the Committee's task. Letter by the Chairman of the HRC to the Deputy Permanent Representative of Canada, 3 November 1995 in relation to 538/1993 and 620-622/1995 (on file with the author). Counsel in J.P.A.F. v. Canada, 13 August 1998 (disc.) (on file with the author) worked at the same law firm that was dealing with Stewart and Canepa. The petitioner was convicted of a

As the situations in these cases were similar to Stewart and the same Rapporteur dealt with the requests for provisional measures, it may be assumed either that the Secretariat had not been able to contact her in time or the Committee had discussed the issue and decided no longer to use provisional measures in this context. After all it did not involve a real risk of torture or inhuman treatment in the receiving State.

In Winata and So Lan Li v. Australia (2001)²⁹⁰ the HRC determined that the removal by the State party of the petitioners would result in a violation of Article 17 (prohibition of interference with privacy, family etc.), Article 23(1) (protection of the family) and Article 24(1) (protection of children).²⁹¹ Inspired by this decision counsel have requested the use of provisional measures in series of criminal offences ‘largely stemming from an alcohol abuse problem and a very physically abusive childhood’. On 5 July 1994 he was transferred to a facility for immigration detention for deportation to Portugal. Counsel submitted a case on his behalf a week later. She considered that provisional measures should be used because the petitioner had been in Canada since he was nine years old. He was unfamiliar with Portugal and would experience numerous difficulties there. His entire immediate family was in Canada. He was emotionally dependent on his mother and five sisters and had a solid relationship with his wife with whom he had been married for almost thirteen years. He had two sons, thirteen and five years old. In counsel’s opinion the petitioner’s ‘only hope of avoiding a relapse’ in his struggle against his alcohol addiction was ‘through family support and ongoing treatment’. She noted that Canada seemed to be unwilling to give a guarantee that it would permit a return to Canada should there later be a finding of a violation of the Covenant on the merits. Her argument was based on the admissibility decision in Stewart, stipulating that ‘the essential criterion for a consideration of action taken under Rule 86 was the irreversibility of the consequences, in the sense of the inability of a person to secure his rights, should there later be a finding of a violation’. Apart from the risk of harm to the petitioner she also referred to the harm to his children. In October 1994 counsel informed the HRC of the negative decision of the Appeal Division, upholding the deportation order. She expected that her client would be removed in a week. She urged the HRC to consider the request for provisional measures. It appears from the file that the Special Rapporteur decided not to use them. Submission of 3 October 1994 in J.P.A.F. v. Canada (on file with the author).

290

291

HRC Hendrick Winata and So Lan Li v. Australia, 26 July 2001.

It noted that ‘the mere fact that one member of a family is entitled to remain in the territory of a State party does not necessarily mean that requiring other members of the family to leave involves such interference’ (§7.1). Nevertheless it considered that in this case there was an ‘interference’ with the family because ‘substantial changes to long-settled family life would follow’ from the decision of the State party ‘to deport two parents and to compel the family to choose whether a 13-year old child, who has attained citizenship of the State party after living there 10 years, either remains alone in the State party or accompanies his parents’. Accordingly, the HRC was to determine whether this interference would be arbitrary and contrary to Article 17. It noted that given the fact that the petitioners’ son had grown up in Australia from his birth thirteen years ago, it was ‘incumbent on the State party to demonstrate additional factors justifying the removal of both parents that go beyond a simple enforcement of its immigration law in order to avoid a characterisation of arbitrariness’. It found a violation of Article 17(1) in conjunction with Article 23 in respect of all alleged victims and an additional violation of Article 24(1) in relation to Barry Winata ‘due to a failure to provide him with the necessary measures of protection as a minor’ (§§7.2 and 7.3). Under Article 2(3)(a) the State party was under an obligation to provide an effective remedy ‘including refraining from removing the authors from Australia before they have had an opportunity to have their application for parent visas examined with due consideration given to the protection required by Barry Winata’s status as a minor’. It did not further discuss Article 24. Hendrick Winata and So Lan Li v. Australia, 26 July 2001, §9. Bhagwati, Khalil, Kretzmer and Yalden dissented with regard to the findings of a violation under Articles 17 and 23. See also Burchill (2003) discussing the problematic aspects of this case, especially regarding the attitude of the partents and the ‘right to live wherever you want’.

several ‘Winata-type claims’, based on Article 24(1) ICCPR, the protection of minors. They involved deportation cases in which petitioners were facing the choice between, on the one hand, uprooting their child and taking him along on their forced return or, on the other hand, leaving him alone in the country he grew up in. The Special Rapporteur, however, has refused to use provisional measures in these cases.²⁹² Thus, while Winata type cases concern children, and a finding on the merits already is available, the Special Rapporteur is not inclined to use provisional measures. This is a clear indication that the HRC has become stricter than it was while the Stewart case was pending.

Especially in light of the Committee’s refusal to take provisional measures in this situation involving children, its use of provisional measures in the Stewart case, to halt expulsion in the context of a complaint on the rights of aliens (not involving non-refoulement), is likely a one time occurrence. After all facing being uprooted or being separated from their parents is more likely to have irreparable consequences for children, given their developmental needs, than forced removal would have for adults. In this light it may be assumed that the general rule on provisional measures as proclaimed by the HRC in Stewart does not apply across the board or, in any case, should be interpreted restrictively. Despite the obvious hardship that an expulsion such as that of Stewart may cause, it does not constitute irreparable harm to the life and personal integrity of the intended beneficiary. In fact on a continuum of situations in which provisional measures have been used, this case could be situated not altogether beyond the outer limits, as indeed in practice once deported it would be difficult to reverse the situation, but nevertheless just inside the outer limits, tending towards its edge.

Thus, provisional measures used in deportation cases not specifically involving Article 7 ICCPR could be situated within or beyond the outer limits of the concept, depending on the facts of the case. The use of provisional measures in situations involving Articles 12 and 13 claims would only be within the outer limits of the concept if their expulsion would be irreversible. In such case there might be irreversible harm to the claim. In all other cases provisional measures would be beyond the outer limits of the concept.

On the other hand, when children are involved, in light of the child’s developing life, situations are less easily reversible and these irreversible situations may also result in irreparable harm to persons. If provisional measures were to be taken in such a context, they would in fact not just be within the outer limits of the concept, but could be situated more closely towards the common core. If several human rights adjudicators would develop a practice to use provisional measures in certain irreversible situations involving children, in order to prevent irreparable harm to persons, this practice would indeed fall within the common core of the concept.²⁹³

²⁹² Interview by author with Martin Scheinin, Geneva, April 2003. Scheinin mentioned two or three ‘Winata’ type situations involving family life in which he refused to use provisional measures because the government act would not be irreversible but just inconvenient.

²⁹³ In this respect the adjudicators might also turn to the Children’s Convention for inspiration with regard to the irreversibility and irreparability of certain situations when involving children.

3.3 Protecting freedom of expression and access to information (without threats to life and physical integrity)

3.3.1 Introduction

The Inter-American Commission and Court (and the African Commission)²⁹⁴ have used provisional measures in cases involving freedom of expression and access to information also when there was no actual threat to the life and personal integrity of the beneficiaries.²⁹⁵ In this respect it is worth noting that the Inter-American Commission attaches particular importance to the freedom of expression and in 1997 it instituted the permanent office of the Special Rapporteur for Freedom of Expression, 'with its own functional and budgetary independence'.²⁹⁶ As one of the duties and mandates of the Office it named 'immediately informing the Commission of urgent situations that merit the Commission requesting the adoption of precautionary measures or provisional measures that the Commission may request of the Inter-American Court, to prevent grave and irreparable harm to human rights'.²⁹⁷ Several press organisations are actively lobbying the various organs of the OAS including the Inter-American Commission.²⁹⁸ The OAS Heads of State and Government have supported and ratified the mandate of the Rapporteur.²⁹⁹

The Rapporteur brings cases to the attention of the Commission so that it will take precautionary measures to protect the lives and physical integrity of journalists. In fact in 2006 he implemented a system for daily monitoring in which the Office contacts journalists that are receiving threats and informs them of the possibility of seeking precautionary measures from the Commission 'to protect their lives and personal integrity'.³⁰⁰ Yet apart from actively pursuing these situations, the Rapporteur also brings cases to the Commission's attention where journalists'

²⁹⁴ See ACHPR Open Society Justice Initiative (on behalf of Njawe Noumeni) v. Cameroon, provisional measures of 15 July 2004 to 'ensure that no irreparable damage is done to the equipment of Radio Freedom FM', §12, case discontinued in May 2006 upon an amicable settlement.

²⁹⁵ For provisional measures to protect freedom of expression as well as the right to life and physical integrity see Chapter IX (Threats). See also Chapter XIII (Protection).

²⁹⁶ See e.g. Report of the Office of the Special Rapporteur for Freedom of Expression Dr. Ignacio Alvarez, OEA/Ser.L/V/II.127, Doc.4, 3 March 2007, p. 5. In general see Thompson (1996), pp. 231-254.

²⁹⁷ Id., p. 6.

²⁹⁸ The Special Rapporteur on Freedom of Expression is financed by US media, for instance the Washington Post special fund and by La Sociedad Interamericana de Prensa (SIP). In 1999 SIP had started an extensive campaign to amend internal legislation in the Americas in order to abolish desacato (crimes against the honour). See also Inter-American Press Organization (IAPA), www.sipiapa.org. See further Report of the Office of the Special Rapporteur for Freedom of Expression Dr. Ignacio Alvarez, OEA/Ser.L/V/II.127, Doc.4, 3 March 2007, p. 3 referring to the firm support of the sectors with which the Office interacts, including journalists and media. In 2006 the Office also organized seminars to train journalists in the use of the Inter-American system, p. 2.

²⁹⁹ See e.g. the references to the second and third Summit of the Americas in Report of the Office of the Special Rapporteur for Freedom of Expression Dr. Ignacio Alvarez, OEA/Ser.L/V/II.127, Doc.4, 3 March 2007, p. 4 and pp. 6-7. See also E. Green, US Info staff writer, 'United States Emphasizes Importance of Protecting Press Freedom, New report from Organization of American States details threats to journalists', 13 April 2007, <<http://usinfo.state.gov/xarchives/display.html?p=washfile-english&y=2007&m=April&x=200704131600481xeneerg6.847781e-02>> (consulted 14 June 2007).

³⁰⁰ See e.g. Report of the Office of the Special Rapporteur for Freedom of Expression Dr. Ignacio Alvarez, OEA/Ser.L/V/II.127, Doc.4, 3 March 2007, pp. 1-2.

freedom of expression is at stake, but their lives and physical integrity are not under threat. He specifies that these measures ‘were adopted to make possible the full exercise of the freedom of expression and to protect journalists’.³⁰¹

3.3.2 Inter-American practice

In 1995 CEJIL, the main NGO in the Inter-American system of human rights protection, requested the Commission to take precautionary measures directly for the protection of freedom of expression. At that time the Commission was not inclined to do so.³⁰²

Two years later it did, in the case of Ivcher Bronstein. The latter was born in Israel but had been a Peruvian citizen since 1984. He was the president and majority shareholder of Channel 2, which disseminated news on torture and other human rights violations and on the multimillion dollar payments to Mr Montesinos, President Fujimori’s right hand man. In April 1997 Peru arbitrarily stripped Ivcher Bronstein of his citizenship. Following this, his position as president of this television station was revoked and his shareholder rights were suspended. Moreover, judicial action was brought against him, his wife and two daughters, his employees and his attorneys. The intended purpose was to remove him from editorial control of the TV channel and to abridge his freedom of expression, which he was exercising through reports on corruption and serious human rights violations. In July 1997 the Commission took precautionary measures on his behalf for the first time in order ‘to prevent the victim from being stripped of his nationality, so that he might be regarded as a citizen in the legal action he has brought, thereby avoiding irreparable harm to him’.³⁰³ The State had protested this request arguing that its domestic law provided sufficient remedies. Even if he were to win the cases brought before the domestic courts, the damages he already sustained were ‘of enormous magnitude and would be very difficult to redress in full’. These damages were ‘aggravated day by day’ and required a ‘simple and effective remedy’. ‘For that reason, the Commission, without prejudging the facts but applying the maxim that requires it to opt for the interpretation of the law that best protects human rights, agreed to seek precautionary measures for Mr. Ivcher’.³⁰⁴

In its admissibility decision the Commission observed that the petitioner’s ‘present situation is extremely disturbing, as he appears to have suffered virtually irreparable damage’.³⁰⁵

The domestic remedies had been ‘neither swift nor effective in preventing harm of such severity’. ‘This harm becomes greater with the passage of time, given the nature of the rights involved (...). The fact that harm has materialized in the interim, before the domestic courts handed down a final ruling on the applications filed seeking writs of amparo, demonstrates how slow and ineffective the remedies in this case have been, and gives the Commission grounds to declare the case admissible’.³⁰⁶

The Commission found that the State’s refusal to heed to the Commission’s precautionary measures and the delay in the domestic proceedings placed him in a defenceless position ‘and have thus far been ineffective in avoiding harm to the victim, although eventually everything

³⁰¹ Id., p. 5.

³⁰² Interview by author with Viviana Krsticevic, Executive Director CEJIL, Washington, D.C., 10 October 2001.

³⁰³ CIDH Baruch Ivcher Bronstein v. Peru, 3 March 1998 (adm.), §57. See also §27.

³⁰⁴ Id., §56.

³⁰⁵ Id., §57.

³⁰⁶ Id., §60.

might well be settled and any wrong done by the regular courts might eventually be fully righted'. It observed that this could happen with the decision of the constitutional court.³⁰⁷

In August 1997 the Commission took precautionary measures on behalf of Gorriti Ellenbogen, a Peruvian journalist and the associate director of the Panama's newspaper 'La Prensa'. It requested Panama to 'suspend his imminent expulsion and enable him to continue exercising his profession as a journalist'.³⁰⁸ In June 1999 it took precautionary measures on behalf of two persons who were under a detention order in relation to the publication of the 'Black Book of Chilean Justice' by journalist Alejandra Matus. A month later the Commission amplified its measures to extend to the journalist. It requested guarantees for her security and physical integrity as well as for her right to freedom of expression and her intellectual property rights.³⁰⁹ Moreover, in November 1999 the Commission took precautionary measures on behalf of another Peruvian journalist.³¹⁰ Allegedly, security agents had committed repeated acts of persecution against him. The Commission pointed out that the measures it requested Peru to adopt 'were based on the need to enable Mr. Gonzáles Arica to fully exercise his freedom of expression'.³¹¹ In other words, the emphasis was on his freedom of expression rather than his life and physical integrity.

In March 2000 the Commission took precautionary measures requesting Peru to respect the press freedom and freedom of expression of Mr. Delgado Parker.³¹² Apparently, the authorities had stripped him of control of the television chain 'Global Network' and confiscated the broadcasting equipment of his radio station 'Radio 1160'.³¹³ In December 2000 Peru reported to the Commission that it had complied with its request.³¹⁴ The precise substance of the precautionary measures is not clear, but presumably they dealt with returning the television station to his control and also returning the radio broadcasting equipment.³¹⁵

In July 2000 the Commission took precautionary measures on behalf of the director of the newspaper 'El Siglo' in Panama. He had been detained for violation of the defamation laws ('desacato'). A critical article in his newspaper had potentially implicated the Attorney General in illegal acts. The Commission requested the State to nullify the arrest warrant and guarantee his right to physical integrity and freedom of expression.³¹⁶

It also took precautionary measures on behalf of a journalist in Honduras. It asked his State to 'prevent the risks he is facing from materialising, based on information presented to the Commission, and to guarantee his unrestricted ability to work as a journalist in Honduras'.³¹⁷

In February 2001 the Commission took precautionary measures on behalf of a Venezuelan journalist, director of the weekly 'La Razón'. The Commission indicated that he was 'at grave ³⁰⁷ Id., §59. On the merits, 9 December 1998, the Commission found, among others, that he had been arbitrarily deprived of his nationality, contrary to Article 20(3), so as to suppress his freedom of expression.

³⁰⁸ CIDH Gorriti Ellenbogen v. Panama, Annual Report 1997.

³⁰⁹ CIDH Annual Report 1999, §15.

³¹⁰ Id., §50.

³¹¹ Ibid.

³¹² CIDH Delgado Parker, 12.262, precautionary measures of 10 March 2000, Annual Report 2000, Chapter III, C.1., §42.

³¹³ CIDH Annual Report 2000, §42.

³¹⁴ Ibid., §42.

³¹⁵ About the specific protection required as part of provisional measures, see also Chapter XIII (Protection).

³¹⁶ CIDH Annual Report 2000, §41.

³¹⁷ Id., §37.

risk and requested that the affronts on the journalist's freedom of expression be stopped and, as a result, the censorship measures against him be lifted, including those on La Razón.³¹⁸

The aforementioned Ivcher Bronstein case, dealt with by the Commission, was subsequently brought before the Court. In 2000 the Court ordered provisional measures as well, on behalf of Ivcher Bronstein, his wife, daughters and several others 'in order to ensure their physical, psychological and moral integrity and right to judicial guarantees'.³¹⁹ The Court noted that 'the purpose of Provisional Measures in international human rights law is broader since, in addition to their essentially preventive character, they protect effectively basic rights inasmuch as they seek to avoid irreparable damage to persons'.³²⁰ While most of the text of the motivation given is not that exceptional (physical, psychological and moral integrity), again it is clear here that the provisional measures were ordered against a background of increasing concern about the freedom of expression and the situation in Peru in general. After the Court found for Ivcher Bronstein on the merits, it maintained the case,³²¹ including the provisional measures, until its implementation by Peru.³²²

A second situation in which the Inter-American Court has used provisional measures is to delete the registration of a journalist and a representative of a newspaper from the criminal records. In the context of freedom of expression and the phenomenon of 'desacato' (so-called crimes against the honour) the Court has ordered provisional measures in the La Nación case against Costa Rica. Previously, in March 2001, the Commission itself had adopted precautionary measures on behalf of journalist Mauricio Herrera Ulloa and Fernán Vargas Rohmoser, the legal representative of La Nación, the main Costa Rican newspaper. Mr Herrera had reported information previously published in the Belgian newspaper De Morgen questioning the activities of a former Costa Rican ambassador. Subsequently, this journalist was criminally convicted for the pain and suffering allegedly caused by this publication. The Supreme Court of Costa Rica upheld his conviction. The Commission requested Costa Rica to suspend execution of his sentence in order to give it time 'to conduct a full investigation of the allegations raised in the petition, on the grounds that executing it before the Commission investigated the case would cause irreparable ³¹⁸ Id., §57 (Case 11.762). The journalist had submitted information on this case on November 1999. The president of the country's largest insurance company had sued him because his newspaper had identified this man as having funded the political campaign of President Chávez. It had accused the insurance company of benefiting from state insurance contracts. A trial judge had subsequently ordered the arrest of the journalist and placed a ban on references to the president of this insurance company. In 2001 another trial judge ordered an arrest warrant 'ignoring the Commission's request for precautionary measures'. Annual Report 2001, Chapter III (a), §60.

³¹⁹ IACHR Baruch Ivcher Bronstein v. Peru, Order of 21 November 2000. See also the Order of 23 November 2001 expanding the provisional measures.

³²⁰ IACHR Baruch Ivcher Bronstein v. Peru, Order of 21 November 2000, 9th 'Considering Clause'.

³²¹ See Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction) and XVIII (Follow-up) on the practice of the Court to maintain a case that has been decided on the merits and reparations until it has been implemented.

³²² IACHR Baruch Ivcher Bronstein v. Peru, Judgment of 6 February 2001 and Order of 14 March 2001 lifting the provisional measures: "That the changes that have occurred in Peru, the willingness of the State to respect the recommendations formulated by the Commission in its Report No. 94/98, the developments in the Ivcher Bronstein case, particularly the Ivcher family's return to Peru, the cancelling of the arrest warrants against them, the reinstatement of Mr. Ivcher as shareholder and chairman of the board of Compañía Latinoamericana de Radiodifusión S.A., the company that operates Peruvian television's Channel 2, and also other relevant information submitted by the parties, lead this Court to conclude that the justification of "extreme gravity and urgency" and the probability of irreparable damage required by Article 63.2 of the Convention, which led to provisional measures being ordered in the instant case, no longer exist". Order of 14 March 2001 lifting the provisional measures, 4th 'Considering' clause.

harm to Messrs. Herrera and Vargas'.³²³ The Commission pointed out that it based itself on a recommendation from the OAS Special Rapporteur for Freedom of Expression.³²⁴ It noted that it took these measures 'in light of the information submitted by the petitioners indicating that these individuals' right to free expression required immediate protection in order to avoid irreparable harm'. Apart from the request to suspend execution of the sentence, the precautionary measures included as well a request 'to refrain from any act tending toward the inclusion of the journalist Herrera in the Costa Rican Judicial Register of Criminals' and 'to refrain from any act or action affecting the right of free expression of the aforesaid journalist or of the newspaper La Nación'. La Nación published the complete text of the precautionary measures. They consisted of a letter by the Executive Secretary of the Commission, to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Costa Rica referring to the rule on precautionary measures in its Rules of Procedure as well as of a recommendation of the OAS Special Rapporteur for the Freedom of Expression.³²⁵ According to the Commission the denounced facts could result in 'irreparable harm' to the human rights of journalist Herrera Ulloa and Mr. Vargas Rohrmoser, representative of the newspaper. It pointed out that in its interpretation of Article 13 ACHR (freedom of expression) limiting the freedom of expression would result in irreparable harm.³²⁶ It emphasised that the article corresponds to a broad concept of freedom of expression and autonomy of persons. The respect for the freedom of expression, it noted, was the instrument for the free interchange of ideas and functioned as a fortifier of democratic processes so as to provide a basic instrument for informed participation. The article's object is to protect and promote access to information, ideas and expression and, thus, to fortify the functioning of a pluralist democracy. The Commission pointed out that it has said before that the use of powers to limit the expression of ideas lends itself to abuse and that subduing unpopular ideas or criticism would restrict the debate fundamental for the effective functioning of the democratic institutions. It emphasised that penalising expressions directed at public functionaries in such a way was a disproportionate punishment in light of the importance of freedom of expression and information in a democratic system. Limiting the free flow of ideas, as long as they do not incite violence, is incompatible with the freedom of expression and the basic principles sustaining pluralistic and democratic societies. The Commission distinguished between the individual and the social dimension of the freedom of expression³²⁷ and pointed out that the denounced facts would constitute irreparable harm both to the individual freedom of expression of the two beneficiaries and to the citizens of Costa Rica who find themselves deprived of access to information about the activities of public functionaries. At the end of its letter, after describing the specific type of measures required of the State,³²⁸ it explained that the precautionary measures were aimed at preventing the materialisation of the risks facing the two beneficiaries.³²⁹ Thus, CEJIL pointed out that the Commission had taken precautionary measures to prevent 'irreparable harm' to the freedom of expression of the journalist and newspaper and of the citizens of Costa

³²³ CIDH La Nación, Annual Report 2000, §28.

³²⁴ See also Chapter II, section 4.3 referring to the role of this Rapporteur.

³²⁵ In 2001 this Special Rapporteur, Santiago A. Canton, became the new Executive Secretary of the Commission.

³²⁶ In the Spanish text it says 'ha interpretado como "daño irreparable" el cercenamiento de medidas que limiten la libertad de expresión'.

³²⁷ It did not use the phrase 'état de droit' but appears to be referring to it.

³²⁸ Note that the Commission's precautionary measures in Spanish apparently use the term 'requerir' ('la Comisión requiere al Estado...') which appears to refer to 'necessitate' or 'require', while the Commission's precautionary measures in English use the term 'request'.

³²⁹ Letter of Jorge E. Taiana, Executive Secretary of the Commission, to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Costa Rica, Roberto Rojas L., as published in La Nación, titled 'Evitar "daños irreparables"', 2 March 2001, <www.nacion.com> (consulted 8 May 2002).

Rica who would otherwise be deprived of access of information about the activities of public functionaries.³³⁰

It is not clear from the information provided by the Commission what would be the irreparable harm caused. The journalist's criminal conviction included an order to pay a fine. A civil suit for damages was also admitted. The journalist and the newspaper company were held jointly liable. The measures did not prevent the public from being informed as they were taken ex post facto. Thus, it is not censorship as such.

This means that the precautionary measures aim at the general risk of inability of journalists to inform the public, including the risk of self-censorship. Only if the prosecution took place in a general context of harassment and intimidation and amounted to cutting off public access to information it could properly be considered as causing harm that is irreversible. Provisional measures to prevent such irreversible harm to the claim could be within the outer limits of the concept as used in the Inter-American system.

Apart from using its own precautionary measures that month, in March 2001 the Commission also petitioned the Court to order provisional measures to safeguard the freedom of expression of Mr. Herrera Ulloa and Mr. Vargas Rohrmoser. Costa Rica had not complied with its precautionary measures taken earlier that month. In September 2001 the Court ordered Costa Rica to adopt, without delay, 'those measures deemed necessary to nullify [their] registration in the Judicial Registry of Criminal Offenders until the case was definitively resolved by the bodies of the inter-American human rights system'. It also ordered Costa Rica to stay the order to publish the operative provisions of the guilty verdict in the newspaper La Nación as well as to stay the order to establish an online 'link' in the digital version of La Nación between the operative part of the verdict and the articles that were the subject of the domestic complaint in the first place.³³¹ A month later Costa Rica informed the Court of its decision indeed to stay the execution of the criminal verdict against the journalist, as well as his registration in the Judicial Registry of Criminal Offenders, but in November 2001 the Commission informed the Court that 'in flagrant disregard for the provisional measures the Court had agreed upon' there was now an affidavit certifying that Mr. Herrera was nevertheless registered in the judicial registry.

In the matter of La Nación, brought by the Commission to the Court, the provisional measure by the Court only indirectly dealt with the freedom of speech. It mainly ordered Costa Rica to prevent irreparable harm to the good name of the journalist involved. It does not appear that the Court has confirmed this approach in other cases. Several years later, for instance, it noted that attacks against the honour and good name do not constitute a situation of extreme gravity and urgency.³³² The development made by the Court is also illustrated in the Court's provisional measures regarding the matter of Luisiana Ríos et al. At various points in time the Court has put a different emphasis on freedom of expression in its provisional measures. The Commission had requested the Court to order Venezuela also to protect the freedom of expression of the five employees of Radio Caracas Televisión (RCTV), but in 2002 the Court only issued its usual order for the State to adopt all necessary measures to protect their life and personal integrity.³³³ Then in November 2003 it also referred to the freedom of expression of the journalists, but in subsequent Orders it did not repeat this,³³⁴ until 2005 when it issued a strongly worded Order for provisional ³³⁰ La Competencia de la CIDH, comunicado del Centro por la Justicia y el Derecho Internacional (CEJIL), in La Nación, 5 April 2001, <www.nacion.com> (consulted 2 April 2002).

³³¹ IACHR La Nación, Order of 7 September 2001, 2nd 'Decisional' clause.

³³² IACHR Miguel Castro Castro Prison (Peru), Order of 30 January 2007 (denying a request for provisional measures), 13th 'Considering' clause.

³³³ IACHR Luisiana Ríos et al., Orders of 27 November 2002 and 20 February 2003.

³³⁴ IACHR Luisiana Ríos et al., Order of 21 November 2003. Orders of 2 December 2003; 4 May 2004; 27 July 2004 (President); 8 September 2004 (following up, emphasizing the obligation to comply with the provisional measures).

measures, among others to take measures to protect the life, personal integrity and freedom of expression of all news media people of RCTV. As part of this provisional measure the Court stressed the importance of the freedom of expression for a democratic society, noting, among others, that a society that is not well-informed is not truly free.³³⁵ Since that time the Court has explicitly pointed out that in the previous Orders it decided on the ‘protection of freedom of expression in direct relation to the danger to life and personal integrity as a result of the alleged threats and harassment to which the beneficiaries of the measures were being subjected’. Yet it denied a request for an expansion of these Orders aimed separately at the protection of freedom of expression without such threats. It considered it was not appropriate to order the adoption of the measures requested ‘in this case’ because it was ‘not possible to determine fumus boni iuris without making a ruling on the merits of the matter in question, which would imply an assessment of whether the facts alleged by the representatives are in conformity with the American Convention. A decision on merits is made in a judgement delivered in the course of the proceedings on a contentious case lodged before the Court, and not while processing provisional measures. The adoption of the requested measures could imply an incidental prior judgment, with the subsequent establishment of some of the facts and their respective consequences, and these are the object of the principal dispute in the case lodged before the Court’.³³⁶

3.3.3 Conclusion

It is mainly in the Inter-American system that provisional measures have been used to protect the freedom of expression and the public’s access to information, although information is available with regard to the African Commission as well.³³⁷ In practice the activities of the Rapporteur, together with those of press organisations, and the institutional support by the OAS for the issue of freedom of expression, may have played a role in the choice by the Inter-American Commission to expand the scope of its use of precautionary measures.

³³⁵ IACHR Luisiana Ríos et al., Order of 12 September 2005, 8th ‘Considering’ clause, referring, among others, to its Herrera Ulloa judgment of 2 July 2004, §112, its previous Order for provisional measures in Luisiana Ríos et al., 8 September 2004, 9th ‘Considering’ clause and its early Advisory Opinion Compulsory Membership in an Association Prescribed by Law for the Practice of Journalism (Articles 13 and 29 American Convention on Human Rights). Advisory Opinion OC-5/85, 13 November 1985, §70.

³³⁶ IACHR Luisiana Ríos et al., Order of 3 July 2007 (maintaining the previous Orders, but rejecting a request for expansion), 10th ‘Considering’ clause, referring to Matter of Castañeda Gutman (Mexico), Order of 25 November 2005, 6th ‘Considering’ clause. The commission has since referred to ‘the precedent set by the Inter-American Court in the La Nación case, in which an order was issued requiring that execution of a judicial sentence be suspended’, see CIDH Annual Report 2005, §33, in the context of its own precautionary measures asking Panama to suspend execution of the order for the arrest of a person for failure to pay a fine for slander and defamation for publicly reporting that the attorney general’s office had tapped, recorded and published his telephone calls.

³³⁷ See also the HRC’s provisional measures to prevent the destruction of a painting, section 2.11. Outside of the Americas importance has also been attached to the freedom of expression, but only in case law on the merits, or by instituting special mechanisms. See e.g. the African Commission’s Special Rapporteur on the Freedom of Expression, the UN Special Rapporteur on the Freedom of Expression and the OSCE Representative on the freedom of the media. For case law on the merits see e.g. IACHR Case of Herrera Ulloa, 2 July 2004, §113; Case of Ivcher Bronstein, 6 February 2001, §152; Case of “The Last Temptation of Christ” (Olmedo Bustos et al.), 5 February 2001, §69; and ECtHR see e.g. Scharsach and News Verlagsgesellschaft v. Austria, 13 November 2003, §29; Otto-Preminger-Institut v. Austria, 20 September 1994, §49; The Sunday Times v. United Kingdom, 29 March 1979, §65; Handyside v. United Kingdom, 7 December 1976, §49.

Not only does the American Convention on Human Rights contain a provision on provisional measures, but this provision explicitly refers to irreparable damage to persons. Thus, it specifies the type of 'irreparable harm' warranting provisional measures. Nevertheless, the Inter-American Court has not always used provisional measures with the limited aim of preventing such harm to persons. In the case of the La Nación Newspaper, for instance, it used them to prevent 'irreparable harm' to the good name of journalists by ordering the State to take their name from the register of delinquents.

The Court paid lip service to the basic requirements of extreme gravity and urgency and the prevention of irreparable damage to persons, mentioned in Article 63(2) ACHR. Yet in fact this provisional measure was aimed at ensuring freedom of expression by taking away inhibiting factors. Even if entry in this register could be said to be irreversible (which clearly it was not) it would result in irreversible harm to the claim, not to persons.

On its website the Commission refers to its requests to the Court to order provisional measures in urgent cases involving 'danger to persons'. On the other hand, when it refers to its function to request 'precautionary measures' it specifies these measures as aimed 'to avoid serious and irreparable harm to human rights in urgent cases'.³³⁸ This phrase appears to include irreversible harm to the claim, rather than just irreparable harm to persons. Indeed, different from the provisional measures by the Court, given the functions of the Commission it is feasible that its precautionary measures are used more flexibly.

Despite the fact that the domestic law and practice of various States regarding desacato is clearly problematic, and the Inter-American Court has found violations on the merits, the latter's provisional measures in the La Nación case seem to be beyond the outer limits of the concept.³³⁹

3.4 Halting the judicial seizure of assets or other financial measures

In the European and Inter-American systems the question whether or not to use provisional measures to halt financial measures has come up not just in cases declared inadmissible *ratione materiae*³⁴⁰ but also in more 'serious' cases.

³³⁸ See <<http://www.cidh.org/what.htm>> (consulted 7 June 2007).

³³⁹ Indeed, concerns have been expressed that the use of provisional measures to protect the freedom of expression may be the opening of Pandora's box. Interview of December 2001 by author with Victor Rodriguez, former staff member Court, in December 2001 a senior research fellow at the International Human Rights Law Institute of DePaul University. Still, in its Order in the La Nación case the Court apparently considered that 'the basic requirements of extreme gravity and urgency and the prevention of irreparable damage to persons' were met. It was also in this Order that it noted that the nature of provisional measures in international human rights law is not only 'preventative' but 'fundamentally protective'. Provisional measures are preventive 'in the sense that they preserve a juridical situation'. They are protective as well because they 'protect human rights'. It noted that 'provided the basic requirements of extreme gravity and urgency and the prevention of irreparable damage to persons are met, provisional measures become a genuine jurisdictional guarantee of a preventive nature'. In other words, the Court seems to consider that the protective nature of provisional measures in international human rights law is expressed by the fact that they have become a 'genuine jurisdictional guarantee of a preventive nature', Order of 6 December 2001, 4th 'Considering' clause.

³⁴⁰ See e.g. ECtHR Izquierdo Galbis v. Spain, 20 May 2003 (inadm.), where a provisional measures requested by the petitioner on 23 March 2001 was not adopted.

The first example is from the European Court. In the summer of 1984, the case Bönisch v. Austria (1985) was referred to the ECtHR and in the autumn of that year the petitioner requested the Court to recommend the Government to suspend the execution of fines imposed on him in Austria until delivery of the Court's judgment. The petitioner had argued that even if he would be awarded compensation later (under Article 50), he would already have paid his debts and his means of existence would already have been endangered. The State responded that it had no observations on the petitioner's request.

The next month the President of the Court 'took the view that recovery of the fines in question did not constitute a serious and irreparable measure', but nevertheless, 'acting through the Registrar and without prejudice to the Court's ultimate decision on the merits of the case', he 'expressed the wish that the Austrian authorities should consider the possibility of suspending execution'.³⁴¹ In January 1985 Austria notified the Registrar 'that this wish had been brought to the attention of the responsible authorities'.³⁴² While the petitioner's request was made under the Court's rule on provisional measures, it is clear from the President's formulation (not 'serious and irreparable') that his request to the State was not a provisional measure. Despite the text of the European rule on provisional measures, which does not refer to irreparable harm, such harm appears to be the criterion used also in 1985.

The Inter-American Commission appears to have used its precautionary measures at least once in a financial context. The first precautionary measure mentioned in the Inter-American Commission's Annual Report of 1997 clearly does not deal with the prevention of irreparable harm to life and personal integrity. It consisted of postponement of the judicial seizure of the assets of the petitioner, while a friendly settlement procedure was ongoing between him and Argentina. The Commission mentioned that, from 1972 on, the petitioner, Mr. Jose Maria Cantos, had been stripped of a large number of commercial documents. He claimed that State and provincial officials had caused him economic losses and duress for which he sought restitution and indemnity.³⁴³ Now judicial seizure of his assets was threatened based on the judgement of costs, following ten years of processing the case in the Supreme Court of Justice of Argentina. The Commission took precautionary measures in March 1997.

It is not clear why judicial seizure of his assets would result in irreparable harm. In fact, any damage would be reparable at a later stage by returning the money to him. It would be interesting to know why the Commission used precautionary measures here. Did it believe that, in the circumstances of that particular case, the seizure of his assets would cause irreparable harm to his livelihood and, thus, his life?³⁴⁴

³⁴¹ ECtHR Bönisch v. Austria, 6 May 1985, §6.

³⁴² Ibid. The Court found that there had been no equality of arms with regard to the treatment of witnesses, in violation of Article 6(1) ECHR.

³⁴³ CIDH Jose Maria Cantos v. Argentina, case 11.636, Annual Report 1997. CEJIL notes in its case docket of 1997 that Mr. Cantos was detained without cause on 40 occasions and subjected to other forms of intimidation. It presented this case before the Commission in June 1996 'as an example of an individual's lack of access to the judicial process in Argentina'. According to CEJIL he was in danger of having to declare bankruptcy, CEJIL case docket 1997. It seems that CEJIL and the Commission consider this as the irreparable harm that was to be prevented. See also the reference to the Commission's precautionary measures of 11 March 1997 in IACHR Cantos v. Argentina, Judgment of 28 November 2002, §3.

³⁴⁴ The case was subsequently brought before the Inter-American Court, which found violations of Articles 8(1) and 25 ACHR and ordered the State to abstain from any further financial measures against Mr Cantos and to cover the costs of the various proceedings. See IACHR Cantos v. Argentina, 28 November 2002.

4 CONCLUSION

This chapter gave some examples of atypical use of provisional measures and of failed requests for provisional measures made by petitioners. It presented these examples as gravitating between common core, outer limits and beyond. It distinguished between provisional measures that are within and those that are beyond the outer limits of the concept.

In my view the regional courts and the HRC should reserve their provisional measures mainly for situations where life and physical or psychological integrity are at stake. This way, the authority and effectiveness of provisional measures is likely to be better upheld. Extensively using provisional measures to intervene in pending cases dealing with other rights would inevitably make the use of provisional measures less exceptional and more routine. This could also lead to diminished compliance. The Conclusion to Part II (purpose) further discusses the common core of the concept of provisional measures and how this relates to preventing irreparable harm to persons.

Provisional measures by the Inter-American Commission, the African Commission and the Bosnia Chamber are sometimes used in a context slightly different from those of the other adjudicators. Given their different functions (next to the adjudicatory function also monitoring or State reports, or preparing country or thematic reports, organizing on-site visits, informal meetings, promotional activities and issuing press releases) and regional nature the Inter-American and African Commission are more closely in touch with the petitioners and potentially more aware of the local situations in which the victims and the beneficiaries of their provisional measures must operate.³⁴⁵ Thus these adjudicators may be better able to adapt their use of provisional measures to the exigencies of the situation.

Because of its more constitutional and local 'sui generis' position, a similar reasoning could apply to the Bosnia Chamber.³⁴⁶ Moreover, a greater flexibility in the use of provisional measures would be warranted because the Chamber was explicitly mandated to order provisional measures and this mandate was not limited to irreparable harm to persons. Yet exactly because it was an adjudicator of final instance, with a near constitutional status to live up to, this flexibility should not extend to the use of provisional measures beyond the outer limits, in other words, provisional measures that do not even aim at the prevention of irreversible harm to the claim.

In this chapter the examples discussed were situated either on a continuum between 'towards the common core' and 'towards the outer limits', as discussed in section 2, or possibly beyond the outer limits of the concept, as discussed in section 3. Those provisional measures situated more closely towards the common core should therefore be seen as most convincing and authoritative.

Not just the rights invoked are relevant in this respect, but also the persons involved. Indeed the HRC has stressed that the accessible and effective remedies required in Article 2(1) ICCPR ³⁴⁵ Previously this was also the case, to some extent, with the European Commission on Human Rights.

³⁴⁶ See also the advice of the Venice Commission regarding the merger of the temporary Bosnia Chamber (whose case law is referred to in this book) and the Constitutional Court of Bosnia and Herzegovina, which discussed the need for the Constitutional Court to apply provisional measures in a similar manner as the Bosnia Chamber: 'it must be avoided that the broad protection accorded by means of provisional measures be diminished by the application, by the Constitutional Court, of criteria which may turn out to be more restrictive and thus less functional'. European Commission for Democracy Through Law (Venice Commission), Report of the Working Group on the Merger of the Human Rights Chamber and the Constitutional Court of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Sarajevo, Strasbourg, December 1999-June 2000, 16 June 2000, Restricted CDL (2000) 47 fin, §47, <http://www.venice.coe.int/docs/2000/CDL\(2000\)047_fine.asp047_fine.asp)> (consulted 22 June 2007).

‘should be appropriately adapted so as to take account of the special vulnerability of certain categories of persons, including in particular children’.³⁴⁷ More specifically, the protection of children’s rights may warrant the adjudicators’ early intervention because a violation of their rights is more likely to cause irreparable harm than the violation of the same rights, for instance the right to respect for family life, would cause adults. In that sense, even a temporary separation from his or her parents, for instance through deportation, could cause a child irreparable harm. In fact, this harm could be such as to impact on the development and thus the life and personal integrity of the child involved. Provisional measures used in this context therefore fit within the rationale of provisional measures that all human rights adjudicators seem to have in common.

In other cases, however, not involving children, a violation of the right to family life, freedom of expression, liberty, etc. in itself normally is not irreversible, let alone irreparable in the same sense as a violation of the right to life and personal integrity.

For the sake of argument and presentation this book refers to a common practice when more than one adjudicator has clearly used provisional measures in the circumstances at hand. Together with a common rationale this would bring such provisional measures within the common core of the concept, as discussed in the previous chapters.

Those provisional measures referred to as beyond the outer limits, because the harm they aim to prevent in fact is not irreversible, are in fact inappropriate. This inappropriateness does vary depending on the nature of the tasks of the adjudicator. The Inter-American Commission appears to have developed a practice in which it sometimes uses precautionary measures more loosely in order to publicly intervene and exert pressure pending the proceedings. This way it shows that it attaches particular importance to an issue such as the freedom of expression. Strictly speaking this type of precautionary measures often is beyond the outer limits of the concept of provisional measures.

It is true that when it comes to the African and Inter-American Commission their flexibility is one of their main assets. It could be argued that, given the context of their other, non-adjudicatory, functions, and the presence of a higher adjudicatory body, the need for them to act within the outer limits of the concept of provisional measures is less pressing, so long as the decision-making is sufficiently transparent. Yet the fact that they also prepare country and thematic reports and take promotional and diplomatic action could help inform their decision-making in individual cases, but it should not make this decision-making process and its outcome less ‘judicial’. Their flexibility lies in resorting to their reporting function both to reinforce their adjudicatory function and for more general promotional and advisory action.

Thus, while they perform their adjudicatory function they should in fact apply the judicial tool of provisional measures in a manner that is convincing and does not move beyond the outer limits of the concept. This applies all the more for the regional courts and the international adjudicators as judicial bodies of final instance. For them to follow the practice of the Inter-American Commission of sometimes moving beyond the outer limits of the concept would dilute the authority of their provisional measures.

³⁴⁷ HRC General Comment on Article 2 ICCPR, §15.

CHAPTER XIII

PROTECTION

1 INTRODUCTION

The previous chapters discussed a range of situations in which human rights adjudicators have used provisional measures and the relation of these measures with the eventual decision on the merits. It appears from the examples discussed that the protection required by provisional measures may take various forms.

This chapter deals first with the question whether provisional measures require action or abstention (section 2) and whether, in the former situation, they are phrased in general terms or specify the exact measures to be taken by the State (section 3). In addition this chapter deals specifically with the approach of the various adjudicators to the beneficiaries and addressees of their provisional measures (section 4).

Finally, in order to properly understand the purpose and scope of provisional measures in human rights adjudication, this chapter also examines how the preventive measures required at the provisional measures stage relate to the measures required upon a finding of a violation, particularly in the form of cessation and reparation (section 5).

With regard to the issues of specificity and the group of beneficiaries, the focus is on the practice of the Inter-American Commission and Court, which provides more insights than that of the other human rights adjudicators. With regard to the relation to reparation the focus is on the somewhat problematic practice of the HRC in this respect.

2 ACTION OR ABSTENTION: POSITIVE OBLIGATIONS IN ORDERS FOR PROVISIONAL MEASURES

2.1 Introduction

At first sight the protection requested in provisional measures would seem exclusively negative: to refrain from torture, execution or threats to life. In fact, however, States must take at least some positive action in order to implement such an Order for provisional measures. We have seen this already in the practice of the ICJ and even of its predecessor, which at one point ordered China to provide ‘effective protection’ to Belgian citizens.¹ The ICJ’s Order to halt an execution in the LaGrand case (Germany v. US) was more explicit in this respect in light of the US response to the earlier Order on behalf of Breard. It specified that the federal State must ensure that its constituent parts comply as well.²

¹ PCIJ Sino-Belgian case, Order of the President of 8 January 1927. See Chapter I (ICJ).

² ICJ LaGrand (Germany v. US), Order of 3 March 1999. See Chapter I (ICJ). See also ICJ Questions relating to the Obligation to Prosecute or Extradite (Belgium v. Senegal), Order of 28 May 2009, Dissenting opinion of Judge Cançado Trindade, §53 (“The urgency of a situation can be determined by reference to action as well as omission”).

While it is established in all human rights systems that States must make expenditures in order to fulfil their human rights obligations, including those relating to the right to life and the prohibition of torture, it is mainly in the Inter-American system that this aspect has been introduced in provisional measures as well. Only requiring negative measures, such as halting the execution of a death sentence, as part of an order for provisional measures, may in fact make insufficient use of this tool. This section first discusses how even negatively phrased provisional measures may require positive action. Then it refers to how the human rights adjudicators have dealt with positive obligations in their decisions on the merits. Finally it notes how in the Inter-American system an extensive practice has developed of ordering provisional measures that require positive action too, a practice which appears to be cautiously followed by other human rights adjudicators as well.

2.2 Positive obligations implied in orders to abstain from acting

Even a negatively phrased Order without any directions on implementation requires some positive action, for instance to inform governors, local authorities, courts and the management of prisons. This also implies the use of resources. If the State in question fails to take such positive action, the adjudicator may subsequently specify the action required more closely.

Thus in practice many provisional measures require a State to refrain from certain action. At the same time even such abstention from, for instance, executing a death sentence, corporal punishment or expulsion may imply some obligations to act as well.³

2.3 Positive obligations on the merits

In their decisions on the merits the various human rights adjudicators have recognized that certain rights have been violated because of omissions by the State. All adjudicators discussed have found violations of the right to life and the prohibition of torture or cruel treatment for failure to take preventive measures.⁴ Thus their case law on the merits does not form an obstacle but indeed supports the use of provisional measures requiring positive action pending the proceedings.

Both in the European and in the Inter-American jurisprudence it is possible to speak of a continuum between negative and positive obligations under the right to life and the prohibition of torture. The ECtHR has also considered that a positive obligation arises when the authorities ‘knew or ought to have known’, about ‘a real and immediate risk to the life of an identified individual or individuals from the criminal acts of a third party’. States should take measures ‘within the scope of their powers which, judged reasonably, might have been expected to avoid that risk’.⁵

³ See Chapters III-V, respectively.

⁴ The HRC, for instance, has found violations of the right to life (Article 6 ICCPR), the prohibition of torture and inhuman or degrading treatment (Article 7), the obligation to treat detainees humanely (Article 10) and the obligation to protect their security (Article 9) because of an omission by the State and has recommended positive measures to remedy such violations. See particularly Chapters VI (Disappearances), VII (Health in detention), IX (Death threats), X (Culture) and XI (Mass expulsion).

⁵ See e.g. ECtHR Mahmut Kaya v. Turkey, 28 March 2000, §86 and Osman v. UK, 28 October 1998, §116: “For the Court, and having regard to the nature of the right protected by Article 2, a right fundamental in the scheme of the Convention, it is sufficient for an applicant to show that the authorities did not do all that could be reasonably expected of them to avoid a real and

2.4 Explicit positive obligations in provisional measures

In the Inter-American system the continuum between positive and negative obligations is not just reflected in the Judgments on the merits and reparations, but also in the substance of the provisional measures. Judgments on the merits and reparations may require expenditures, but provisional measures may too. Especially in the Inter-American system, but also in some of the others, provisional measures have been ordered in which the State clearly was to act rather than to refrain from acting. The Inter-American Court has required a State, as part of a provisional measure, to allow a person's return.⁶ The European Commission has done so too, but in the particular circumstance in which previous provisional measures to halt their expulsion had been ignored. Following Sweden's expulsion of Cruz Varas to Chile and Mansi to Jordan, in contravention of the Commission's provisional measures, the Commission took new provisional measures for Sweden to enable them to return as soon as possible.⁷

As noted, it is not always easy to distinguish between positive and negative obligations. There is at least one case in which the European Commission implicitly requested a State to take positive measures. In September 1992 Spain had sent a group of 53 African refugees across the border, but Morocco refused their entry. They were waiting on no man's land in the burning sun, without water, shelter or sanitation. In a provisional measure the European Commission indicated the desirability of Spain taking the necessary measures to prevent treatment of the petitioners that could be contrary to Article 3 ECHR.⁸ While the Commission did not specify the manner in which the State should take the necessary measures, both immediate provision of water, shelter and sanitation and allowing immediate access to Spanish territory would require positive action rather than abstention. This also illustrates that the obligation to take a positive measure may also be phrased in general terms and does not necessarily have to be specific.⁹

The Inter-American Commission, moreover, has used precautionary measures ordering States to provide HIV medication.¹⁰ Examples of positive action required in provisional measures immediate risk to life of which they have or ought to have knowledge". See also Z. et al. v. UK, 10 May 2001, §121. When there is a credible assertion that authorities have treated someone in violation of Article 3, the State has the obligation to investigate this, see e.g. Labita v. Italy, 6 April 2000. In other cases public authorities have specific obligations, involving persons in a vulnerable situation, to investigate a situation before taking certain action. Keenan v. UK, 3 April 2001, discusses the example of a psychotic detainee who was put in solitary confinement and was found dead the next day, judgment of. Clearly the obligation to investigate a situation before taking any action applies as well in the face of an impending expulsion when the person involved claims a real risk of torture in the receiving State, see Jabari v. Turkey, 11 July 2000. See generally for the ECtHR approach to positive measures in the context of private life, freedom of expression and the margin of appreciation, e.g. X and Y v. the Netherlands, 26 March 1985; Plattform 'Ärzte für das Leben' v. Austria, 21 June 1988; Powell and Rayner v. UK, 21 February 1990; Keegan v. Ireland, 26 May 1994; Stubbings v. UK, 22 October 1996; Özgür Gündem v. Turkey, 16 March 2000 and Von Hannover v. Germany, 24 June 2004. For an analysis see e.g. Vlemmincx (2002) and Mowbray (2004).

⁶ See Chapter XI (Mass expulsion).

⁷ EComHR provisional measure of 19 October 1989 in Mansi v. Sweden, 9 March 1990 (struck out) and 7 December 1989 (adm.). Provisional measures of 9 November 1989 and 7 December 1989 in Cruz Varas et al. v. Sweden, judgment of 20 March 1991.

⁸ EComHR B., M. and 51 others v. Spain, 11 September 1992.

⁹ See also section 3 on the specificity of provisional measures requiring positive action.

¹⁰ See Chapter XII (Other situations).

taken by other adjudicators as well are to ensure access to medication in detention and to ascertain the whereabouts of alleged victims.¹¹

There have equally been several informal provisional measures requesting information about the health, whereabouts or access to counsel of the alleged victim.¹² Obviously in such cases the State had to take positive action in order to provide such information. At the same time the adjudicator may have hoped this would encourage the State to take positive measures to protect the health and safety of the detainee.

The Inter-American Commission and Court have gone a step further in their use of provisional measures. In the first case before it the Court ordered provisional measures to protect witnesses against threats, something obviously requiring positive measures. By now the Commission and Court have built an extensive practice in this respect.¹³ On a regular basis they order States to take positive action to protect persons (both alleged victims and witnesses) against death threats and harassment. In fact most of their provisional measures involve protection against death threats and thus require such action.

Recently, the HRC also used provisional measures to protect someone against death threats and harassment.¹⁴ More generally, the HRC has noted that the legal obligation under Article 2(1) ICCPR is both negative and positive in nature. This provision also underlies the Committee's use of provisional measures.¹⁵

In its first provisional measure CEDAW asked a State to protect the petitioner against threats by her former partner.¹⁶ The African Commission, CAT and CEDAW have used provisional measures with this aim as well. The ECtHR, however, has not yet done so.¹⁷ It was argued in Chapter IX (Threats) that all human rights adjudicators should be able to use provisional measures to order the State to take positive measures pending the proceedings in order to prevent irreparable harm to persons. After all, in cases involving life and personal integrity, appropriate redress is no longer possible after the harm has occurred.

In view of the fact that States are expected to devise adequate policies, make expenditures and prioritise in order to meet their obligations under human rights treaties, the use of provisional measures to prevent attacks against persons has been a logical step, taken clearly in the Inter-American system, but to a certain extent in most other human rights systems as well. In particular,

¹¹ See e.g. Bosnia Chamber Matanović et al. v. Republika Srpska, 6 August 1997, §63, discussed in Chapter VII on disappearances. In this case the Bosnia Chamber used provisional measures 'immediately to take all necessary steps to ascertain the whereabouts or fate of the applicants and to secure their release if still alive'. It left open 'the possibility of ordering further steps to be taken by the respondent Party as may appear appropriate in the future'. More closely see Chapters VII (Health care in detention) and VI (Disappearances).

¹² See Chapters VII (Health care in detention), VI (Disappearances) and VIII (Procedural rights).

¹³ This includes positive obligations of the State to protect against acts of third parties as well, e.g. IACHR Caso de las Comunidades del Jiguamiandó y del Curbaradó, Order of 15 March 2005, 7th 'Considering' clause; case of the Peace community of San José de Apartadó, Order of 15 March 2005, 7th 'Considering' clause and Case of las penitenciarías de Mendoza, Order of 22 November 2004, 13th 'Considering' clause. See further Chapter IX (Threats).

¹⁴ See Chapter IX (Threats).

¹⁵ HRC General Comment on Article 2 ICCPR, 29 March 2004, §6.

¹⁶ CEDAW A.T. v. Hungary, 26 January 2005 (provisional measures of 20 October 2003). In this case CEDAW found violations of Article 2(a), (b) and (e), Article 5 and Article 16. With regard to the petitioner the State was to take 'immediate and effective measures' to guarantee her physical and mental integrity and that of her family. It should also ensure that she was 'given a safe home in which to live with her children, receives appropriate child support and legal assistance as well as reparation proportionate to the physical and mental harm undergone and to the gravity of the violations of her rights', §9.6 under I.

¹⁷ See Chapter IX (Threats).

preventive measures must be taken to protect the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment, which have a special place in the human rights treaties.

With regard to detention situations, death threats and disappearances provisional measures generally order to put a stop to an already continuing situation. Thus, while substantively provisional measures may aim at preserving the status quo, in some cases they may even aim at changing it. After all when someone is being threatened over a long period of time a provisional measure could be seen as aiming at changing the status quo, but also as returning to the previous position in which there were no threats (the status quo ante). In the interest of the proceedings there may also be a need to maintain the status quo or return to the status quo ante in order to prevent (further) irreparable harm to the witnesses of a violation or to family or counsel of the petitioner or even to human rights defenders in general.

2.5 Conclusion

In sum, in certain contexts involving threats to life or personal integrity, provisional measures have required States to take positive measures as well as measures to refrain from undertaking certain action.¹⁸ Qualifying an obligation as one of action or abstention sometimes depends on the way it is put: using the word ‘respect’, for instance, seems to point at a duty to refrain from acting while in reality it may encompass an obligation to take positive action as well.

Often there is a continuum between positive and negative obligations as part of the measures that must be undertaken in order to comply with provisional measures. The key is the prevention of irreparable harm. As has been done in the Inter-American system, in the other systems any possible positive measures required could equally be mentioned incrementally.

States must make expenditures in order to fulfil their human rights obligations. Indeed, in decisions on the merits the adjudicators have established that States are not only obliged to refrain from certain action, but must also guarantee, by positive measures, that others do not violate these rights, especially if there is some relationship with the State in the sense of acquiescence or (indirect) involvement. It is therefore not far-fetched for adjudicators to use provisional measures requiring a State to protect persons against death threats and harassment pending the case.

At first sight the obligation to refrain from action seems less invasive to the State than is taking provisional measures that require positive action. Nevertheless, exactly because of this continuum and in light of the importance attached to the rights involved, provisional measures requiring positive action are sometimes essential to guarantee the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment and torture. Protection against death threats involves the right to life and protection of physical integrity. They are core rights whose violation causes irreparable harm to persons. Such violations must therefore be prevented even if this entails that the State must take positive measures pending the proceedings.

Provisional measures may be warranted to put a stop to ongoing violations, through positive measures, exactly because continuing violations increase the irreparable harm already incurred. As noted, sometimes this even requires return to the previous situation (status quo ante). If this is the only way to halt further irreparable harm to personal integrity in the context of the prohibition of cruel treatment or torture, provisional measures should in fact require this. In other circumstances such return to the previous situation would be too far reaching as part of positive measures required pending the proceedings. For instance, if return to the status quo ante would mean the demolition of buildings constructed against the protests of indigenous people, it would be more appropriate to require this following the finding of a violation, as part of the decision on reparations.¹⁹ On the other hand, if the adjudicator has already used provisional measures to halt the construction of these buildings but the State ignores these and the building is nevertheless constructed, legally it could be appropriate to require return to the status quo ante already pending the proceedings rather than as a form of reparation only. Nevertheless, even in such circumstances adjudicators are unlikely to require this type of restoration of the status quo pending the proceedings, if only because financial consequences would be considerable, especially if the adjudicator would later conclude that there had been no violation other than the disruption of the provisional measure.²⁰

¹⁸ See also Nørgaard (1994), p. 184 and Garry (2001), p. 404, noting that provisional measures may be either of a ‘prohibitive’ or of a ‘proactive’ nature.

An element of positive action is present in most provisional measures and should in fact be made explicit in cases involving ongoing situations such as adverse detention conditions, recent disappearances and death threats.

3 THE SPECIFICITY OF PROVISIONAL MEASURES

3.1 Introduction

As already became evident in international case law not exclusively dealing with human rights, the duty to cooperate is of fundamental importance, for instance in relation to the environment. This duty underlies orders for provisional measures, but sometimes these measures explicitly refer to this duty as well.²¹ We will see something similar in the context of the Inter-American human rights system in particular. In addition, as ICJ Judge Shahabuddeen has pointed out, provisional measures ‘should be framed in self-executing terms, in the sense that [they] should contain all the legal elements required for [their] interpretation and application’.²² Again, we will see that such specificity is found in the Inter-American system in particular.

The question of the differences in the specificity of the measures required obviously is closely linked to that of the previous section involving the obligation to act. These differences are particularly relevant for provisional measures to protect against threats and harassment.²³ Already in 1927 the PCIJ ordered China to provide ‘effective protection’ to Belgian nationals, among others by accompanying any Belgian requiring such protection ‘in safety to the nearest Belgian consulate’.²⁴ As we will see, especially in the Inter-American system provisional measures have sometimes acquired a similar specificity.

In the Frontier Dispute case (1986) the ICJ ordered the withdrawal of the armed forces of both parties, the terms of which should be determined by agreement between them. Only if the states would fail to reach such agreement, the ICJ would step in once more. Again we will find similarities in approach in the practice developed by the Inter-American Court ordering the State to agree with the beneficiaries on the specific protection required. At the same time this Court obviously takes into account the special vulnerability of the individual vis-à-vis the State.

¹⁹ This example is inspired on the factual situation in HRC Hopu and Bessert v. France, 29 July 1997. See Chapter X (Culture).

²⁰ See e.g. ICJ Passage through the Great Belt case (Finland v. Denmark), Order of 29 July 1991, §31 as discussed in Chapter I (ICJ), section 3.6.

²¹ See e.g. ITLOS MOX plant case (Ireland v. UK), Order of 3 December 2001. See Chapter I (ICJ and ITLOS), section 3.7.2. See also Chapters XV (Immediacy and risk) and XVIII (Follow up).

²² Declaration of Judge Shahabuddeen attached to the ICJ Order for provisional measures in Cameroon v. Nigeria, 15 March 1996. See further Chapter I (ICJ).

²³ Obviously this Chapter should be read in close conjunction with Chapters III to XII on the situations in which provisional measures have been used.

²⁴ PCIJ Sino-Belgian case, Order of the President of 8 January 1927. See Chapter I (ICJ).

We have also seen that the ICJ has the authority to order provisional measures proprio motu and that it routinely modifies the substance of the provisional measures as requested by one State in order to accommodate the interest of the other State, as well as in the general interest of preventing the escalation of a conflict or irreparable harm to human beings squashed in the middle.²⁵ Human rights adjudicators equally have the authority to order provisional measures proprio motu, as well as modify the terms of the provisional measures requested by the petitioner.

Sometimes human rights adjudicators only point out that States must protect certain persons or groups.²⁶ At other times they indicate more concretely the protective measures that States should undertake. As noted, all adjudicators have used provisional measures of a rather general nature, simply ordering the State to refrain from acting in a certain manner or to act exactly in order to achieve a certain result (e.g. protection against threats). At times adjudicators have specified certain of the positive measures required. This could relate, for instance, to providing information about an alleged victim's state of health or to access to medication. This specification could also relate to specific measures protecting against threats, including investigation and prosecution of previous threats.

Leaving the choice of implementation to the State generally is the initial approach of the human rights adjudicators. In light of the attitudes of addressee States provisional measures may become increasingly more specific. Generally speaking the HRC and CAT do not specify their provisional measures. On the other hand, already in its first provisional measure the CEDAW specified that the measures to be taken by the State should be 'immediate', 'appropriate', 'concrete' and 'preventive'.²⁷ The African Commission does not specify its provisional measures either, at least no specific information is available with regard to their contents.²⁸ Mugwanya points out that, thus far, these measures 'have not been sufficiently elaborate' or 'specific'.²⁹ In comparison to the Inter-American Commission and Court the ECtHR does not generally specify the specific steps to be taken as part of its provisional measures.³⁰ Traditionally the European Court has been cautious in its directions, even at the merits stage, possibly still out of fear for being considered 'intrusive'.³¹ Various reasons are possible for the Court to increasingly specify

²⁵ See Chapter I (ICJ).

²⁶ The next section deals with the (group of) beneficiaries.

²⁷ CEDAW A.T. v. Hungary, 26 January 2005, §4.2.

²⁸ See also Chapter II (Systems).

²⁹ Mugwanya (2003), pp. 376-377, referring to ACHPR Degli v. Togo, March 1995 (17th session) and Ken Saro Wiwa v. Nigeria, 31 October 1998.

³⁰ It does appear to do so on occasion, but it takes a very gradual approach. An example where it apparently became increasingly specific is provided by the NGO St. Petersburg International Collegium of Advocates (London office). It notes that the ECtHR had intervened several times on behalf of Alkesanyan who had contracted HIV/AIDS and was being denied medical treatment in detention. Allegedly, on 28 November 2007 it requested his immediate in-patient treatment in a specialized AIDS hospital; on 5 December it reiterated its provisional measure, indicating it must be implemented before 10 December of that year and requesting a response to the petitioner's allegation that he is being pressured to give false testimony in exchange for release for medical treatment; on 11 December 2007 it asked what efforts Russia had undertaken to secure his transfer to a specialized clinic; and on 21 December 2007 it warned Russia that if the petitioner's health would deteriorate or he would die in detention, 'it may find Russia responsible' for a violation of his right to life and the right not to be subjected to inhuman and degrading treatment. It extended its provisional measure and 'requires the creation of a bipartisan medical commission of doctors' appointed by the petitioner and the State together in order to 'assess his medical condition and prepare a plan for his treatment'. See <www.mka-london.co.uk/timeline.asp> (consulted 23 September 2008).

³¹ See further section 5.3 of this Chapter. This may also be related to a specific perception of the 'non-activist' role of an adjudicator. The sensitivity for a specified manner of implementation, the obligations of States. The Court is dealing more and more with extreme situations of gross human rights violations. In addition the Court may hope that an increased specificity will assist States in implementing their obligations under the ECHR, both pending the case and upon the finding of a violation on the merits.³² Both old and new members of the Council of Europe have an interest in this. Moreover, the overburdened Court clearly has, in order to avoid the need to deal with repeated complaints.³³

In order to clarify the ways in which an international adjudicator could (incrementally) specify its provisional measures, this section draws from the rich practice developed in the Inter-American system. General orders are flexible and leave greater discretion to the State with regard to their implementation. Yet in the experience of the Inter-American Commission and Court they have appeared to be less appropriate in cases involving risks to life and personal integrity.

Before discussing whether it is necessary for human rights adjudicators to specify their provisional measures, first another issue is addressed involving cautious phrasing in provisional measures in unprecedented cases.

perceiving this as an ‘imposition’, applies mainly to European States. In Ilascu et al. v. Moldova and Russia, 8 July 2004, the ECtHR (Grand Chamber) noted: “Although it is not for the Court to indicate which measures the authorities should take in order to comply with their obligations most effectively, it must verify that the measures actually taken were appropriate and sufficient in the present case. When faced with a partial or total failure to act, the Court’s task is to determine to what extent a minimum effort was nevertheless possible and whether it should have been made. Determining that question is especially necessary in cases concerning an alleged infringement of absolute rights such as those guaranteed by Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention”. ECtHR Ilascu et al. v. Moldova and Russia, 8 July 2004, §334. See generally e.g. Van Kempen (2003), pp. 92-101. Yet the ECtHR is more specific about the obligations of States when it has found a violation of the right to life. In Kaya (2000) it reiterated with regard to the alleged inadequacy of the investigation, ‘that the obligation to protect life under Article 2 of the Convention, read in conjunction with the State’s general duty under Article 1 of the Convention “to secure to everyone within [its] jurisdiction the rights and freedoms defined in [the] Convention”, requires by implication that there should be some form of effective official investigation when individuals have been killed as a result of the use of force’, ECtHR Mahmut Kaya v. Turkey, 28 March 2000, §102 also referring to McCann and Others v. UK, 27 September 1995, §161. See also Assanidze v. Georgia, 8 April 2004 (ordering the petitioner’s immediate release). Moreover, the Court is becoming more aware of the possibility to specify the necessary changes in law and practice in its judgments on the merits (see e.g. Minutes of meeting between Court and organizations representing applicants and/or intervening as third parties, 10 April 2006, p. 3). For an example see Dybeku v. Albania, 18 December 2007, §64 (‘the Court considers that in view of its findings in the present case, the necessary measures should be taken as a matter of urgency in order to secure appropriate conditions of detention and adequate medical treatment, in particular, for prisoners, like the applicant, who need special care owing to their state of health’).

³² For an example of such specificity ECtHR Shtukurov v. Russia, 27 March 2008, §33 where the provisional measures were as follows: “the respondent government was directed to organize, by appropriate means, a meeting between the applicant and his lawyer. That meeting could take place in the presence of the personnel of the hospital where the applicant was detained, but outside their hearing. The lawyer was to be provided with the necessary time and facilities to consult with the applicant and help him in preparing the application before the European Court. The Russian Government was also requested not to prevent the lawyer from having such meeting with his client at regular intervals in the future. The lawyer, in turn, was obliged to be cooperative and comply with reasonable requirements of the hospital regulations”.

³³ See also Rieter (2007), p. 974.

3.2 Cautious phrasing and lack of precedent

The specific terminology used in provisional measures may not only help clarify the nature of the State's obligations, but also indicate the doubts the adjudicator has regarding the appropriateness of the use of provisional measures. This may be illustrated by a provisional measure ordered by the HRC. In Weiss v. Austria (2003), involving a life sentence in the U.S., the petitioner had argued that he would risk irreparable harm.³⁴ In response, the Rapporteur did not request the State to halt the extradition until the Committee had been able to examine the case. Instead he requested to halt the extradition until it 'had received and addressed the State party's submission on whether there was a risk of irreparable harm to the author, as alleged by counsel'. In other words, rather than assuming a risk of irreparable harm until it had been able to make a final determination it requested the State to explain why it considered the extradition would not result in irreparable harm. This variation in the substance of the request for provisional measures indicates a special limited duration of its provisional measures. It also makes explicit the shift in the burden of proof that takes place from the petitioner to the State, once the adjudicator has decided to take provisional measures. At that point it is the State that has to show that there is no risk. Once the HRC considers that the State has met this burden it will withdraw the provisional measure.³⁵

According to Naldi the Committee's phrasing of its provisional measures in Weiss v. Austria indicates that 'irreparable harm is no longer a condition precedent for the granting of interim measures' and that those provisional measures 'that are issued while the Committee considers whether they are justified are similarly considered binding'. This, he notes, broadens 'the protective scope' of provisional measures.³⁶ The phrasing in this case indeed is new, but in fact the HRC has also taken provisional measures in earlier cases, which it withdrew or decided not to prolong in the face of information provided by the Government. While in some cases this may have been new information, for instance the fact that a residence permit has been granted or a death sentence commuted, in other cases the information provided by the Government may simply have convinced the Rapporteur that there was no real risk of irreparable harm. At the provisional measures stage the Rapporteur does not have to be certain about such a risk in any case. In that sense the approach taken in Weiss simply draws attention to the fact that the Rapporteur has rather more doubts than usual about the risk of irreparable harm.³⁷

In Länsman II the Rapporteur equally was rather cautious in the phrasing of the provisional measures involving a complaint by Sami in Finland aimed at the protection of the environment constituting their cultural habitat.³⁸ In both cases no firmly established case law was available yet about the use of provisional measures in the circumstances. In Länsman II there was one precedent, Lubicon v. Canada, in which the HRC had previously used provisional measures in the context of cultural survival. In Weiss v. Austria there was no precedent of a provisional measure to halt extradition because of a real risk of a life sentence. The cautious phrasing in both cases may be attributed exactly to the lack of precedent with regard to the purpose of provisional measures, rather than to doubts about the assessment of risk.

³⁴ HRC Sholam Weiss v. Austria, 3 April 2003.

³⁵ See further Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

³⁶ Naldi (2004), p. 450. On the legal status of provisional measures see Chapter XVI.

³⁷ See Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

³⁸ See Chapter X (Culture).

3.3 Specific requirements found in orders for provisional measures

3.3.1 Introduction

This section examines the specificity of provisional measures. The discussion of specific requirements first provides examples presented by issue area. The examples range from provisional measures halting executions to those (partly) aimed at protecting freedom of expression or a combination of rights. Subsequently this section deals with one particular requirement found in provisional measures ordered in the context of ongoing situations such as death threats: the obligation to investigate, prosecute and punish. Then the incremental approach to specificity is discussed that is taken by the Inter-American Court in cases of death threats and harassment, with the Peace Community case as a point of departure. Again this illustrates that often a range of interrelated rights is involved and again it illustrates the importance of investigation and prosecution of death threats and harassment.

Finally this section examines the obligation implicit in all provisional measures, and made explicit in the Inter-American system, to provide information on their implementation and more generally to cooperate with the adjudicator.

3.3.2 Concrete provisional measures in various issue areas

3.3.2.1 HALTING EXECUTIONS

In 1993 the Inter-American Commission requested ‘that the Governor of Texas and the State ensure that the death sentence not be carried out on Mr. Sankofa, for humanitarian reasons and to avoid irreparable harm’. It specifically called upon the US ‘to take the necessary measures to ensure that Mr. Sankofa was afforded a hearing before the Texas Board of Pardons and Paroles’. The protective measures as requested are interesting because they are more specific than just requesting a stay of execution. They show an awareness of the specific circumstances in Texas.³⁹

3.3.2.2 PROTECTING THE LIFE AND PERSONAL INTEGRITY OF RECENTLY DISAPPEARED PERSONS

In December 2001 the Inter-American Commission took precautionary measures to determine the whereabouts of two persons from the region of Antioquia and to protect their lives and persons. They were last seen three weeks before at a Medellín metropolitan police checkpoint. In its Annual Report the Commission notes that it ‘undertook a series of steps toward clearing up this situation during its on-site visit’ of 7 to 13 December. Apparently these steps had not been sufficiently effective as five days later the Commission resorted to the formal issuance of precautionary measures. As part of these measures it also asked Colombia to ‘launch a prompt and effective investigation using the urgent search mechanism established by Law 589/2000’.⁴⁰

³⁹ CIDH Gary T. Graham, now known as Shaka Sankofa v. US, 15 June 2000 (adm.). The petitioners had asked the Commission, on 4 October, to request the State to ‘ensure that Mr. Sankofa was afforded a fair hearing’ before this Board. In Texas, this Board was in the habit of deciding on clemency on the basis of just a telephone conference. No hearing would take place and no clemency would be granted. The petitioners had also asked the Commission to request that the State would ‘urge the Board to recommend that he be pardoned of the capital offence of which he was convicted’.

⁴⁰ CIDH Annual Report 2001, §26.

In July 2001 the Commission took precautionary measures on behalf of someone who had been violently detained, without a warrant, in June 2001. His family had witnessed how agents of the judicial police of the state of Guerrero had abducted him in an operation involving several vehicles also marked as belonging to this police force. They had filed complaints with the Attorney General of that state, who apparently did not take effective steps to locate him. Upon the petitioners' request the Commission's precautionary measures included intervention by the federal Attorney General because they suspected complicity between the kidnappers and the public prosecution service of Guerrero.⁴¹

3.3.2.3 PROTECTING THE LIFE AND PERSONAL INTEGRITY OF DETAINEES

Also in the context of detention the Inter-American Court is increasingly specific in its use of provisional measures.⁴² The case of Elena Loayza Tamayo serves as an example of the possible specificity of provisional measures in detention cases. The Court requested Peru to adopt all necessary measures to 'effectively ensure her physical, psychological and moral integrity'.⁴³ The Commission had been even more specific in its request to the Court, requesting the end of the solitary confinement and incommunicado detention imposed on her and the return to 'Pavilion 'A' of the Chorrillos Women's Maximum Security Penitentiary in the same conditions in which she had been held prior to her transfer'.⁴⁴ The Court subsequently did specify its previous measures by ordering Peru to modify her prison conditions, in particular with regard to her solitary confinement, and provide her with medical treatment.⁴⁵

In September 1997 it issued its judgment on the merits, finding violations of Articles 5 (personal integrity), 7 (liberty) and 8 (judicial guarantees), ordering her release.⁴⁶ She was released the next month. Subsequently the Court lifted its provisional measures.⁴⁷ In 1998 it ordered Peru to take several measures of reparation.⁴⁸ Yet these were not implemented and Ms Loayza continued to live in destitute conditions. Moreover, a June 1999 judgment by the Supreme Court of Peru 'overturned' the judgment of the Inter-American Court, threatening her renewed detention.⁴⁹ She ⁴¹ In November the Commission extended its precautionary measures to cover the wife of the disappeared man who was in grave danger because of her search and a former officer of the judicial police in Guerrero who was under arrest and whose life was being threatened if he continued to make allegations about the involvement of judicial police officers and their superiors in kidnappings. CIDH Annual Report 2001, §39.

⁴² See e.g. IACHR Las penitenciarías de Mendoza v. Argentina, Order of 22 November 2004, expanded several times, e.g. 30 March 2006 (including the individual votes of García Sayán, García Ramírez and Cançado Trindade); Case of the children and adolescents deprived of liberty at the 'Complexo do Tatuapé' of FEBEM, Order of 30 November 2005 (including the individual votes of García Ramírez and Cançado Trindade). See also Order of 4 July 2006; and Cárcel de Urso Branco case (Brazil), Order of 21 September 2005 (including the individual opinions of García Ramírez and Cançado Trindade).

⁴³ IACHR Loayza Tamayo v. Peru, Urgent measures of 12 June 1996 and Order of 2 July 1996.

⁴⁴ IACHR Loayza Tamayo v. Peru, Order of 2 July 1996, §4.

⁴⁵ IACHR Loayza Tamayo v. Peru, Order of 13 September 1996.

⁴⁶ IACHR Loayza Tamayo v. Peru, 17 September 1997 (merits).

⁴⁷ IACHR Loayza Tamayo v. Peru, Order of 11 November 1997.

⁴⁸ IACHR Loayza Tamayo v. Peru, 27 November 1998 (reparations).

⁴⁹ See also IACHR Loayza Tamayo v. Peru, 17 November 1999 (execution of judgment) and letter of 12 November 2000 of the Inter-American Court, 'signed by all of the Judges, addressed to the Secretary General of the Organization of American States, where it was stated, inter alia, that compliance by the State "has particular effects in the case of Ms. Loayza-Tamayo who, according to truthful information received by the Court, is going through serious economic and health went into exile in Chile, where she received some medical support by an NGO that itself was lacking adequate means. Because of her physical and emotional condition she was unable to find an adequate and more permanent job. The petitioners requested renewed provisional measures, arguing that her 'life project' had been damaged, and 'the conduct of the State, to date,' had prevented her from having 'the minimum of a dignified life'. In addition her right to health was 'seriously violated and diminished'.⁵⁰

Arguing that in this case the power to order provisional measures implied 'to look after the personal integrity of Ms. Loayza-Tamayo',⁵¹ the President of the Court noted that the information submitted in this case showed prima facie a threat to her integrity.⁵² He deemed 'necessary for the State to ensure Ms. Loayza-Tamayo the security conditions necessary for her to return to her country without fearing consequences on her physical, psychic, and emotional integrity'.⁵³ He adopted urgent measures on her behalf calling on Peru to 'adopt, without delay, all necessary measures to effectively ensure the return to her country (...), and also her physical, mental and moral integrity, so that any provisional measures that the Inter-American Court of Human Rights may decide to order in this case may have the pertinent effects'.⁵⁴ In February 2001 the Court confirmed this decision.⁵⁵ In January 2001 the new government of Peru, installed after Fujimori had fled the country, had noted that there was no arrest warrant against Ms Tamayo. It had expressed its 'willingness to grant the said citizen the necessary guarantees and measures that her physical safety, mental health and moral integrity will not be harmed'. It also pointed out that it was taking the 'pertinent measures' to comply with the Court's judgment in her case.⁵⁶ While, given the Court's Order of February 2001, it was not immediately convinced by these arguments, difficulties that could be palliated, at least in part, by the compliance of the respective judgement". In said letter, the Court requested the Secretary General to submit the [...] communication "as soon as possible to the Permanent Council, and later, to the General Assembly of the Organization", IACHR Loayza Tamayo (Peru), Order of 13 December 2000, 4th 'Having seen' clause.

⁵⁰ IACHR Loayza Tamayo v. Peru, Urgent measures of 13 December 2000, 1st 'Having seen' clause. They requested specifically to 'urgently adopt every provisional measure' for the teacher María Elena Loayza-Tamayo, to recover the sum of money decided by the Court as a fair indemnification, together with fair interests in arrears, and all other material and moral damages related to the violations resulting from the failure of Peru to comply with the decision on indemnifications, that will allow her to leave the condition of misery she is now living in, to cease being a quasi beggar and to begin enjoying a 'dignified life'; [for her] to be able to develop a new (though limited) life project, beginning a new professional formation abroad that would be within her reach, while her situation of insecurity in Peru persists; [for her] to be able to take adequate care of her health; [and for her] to support directly and personally the needs of her children, after suffering the humiliation of having them under the care of the grandparents and aunts'.

⁵¹ IACHR Loayza Tamayo, Urgent measures of 13 December 2000, 6th 'Having seen' clause.

⁵² IACHR Loayza Tamayo, Urgent measures of 13 December 2000, 7th 'Having seen' clause.

⁵³ IACHR Loayza Tamayo, Urgent measures of 13 December 2000, 12th 'Having seen' clause, referring to Peace Community San José de Apartadó, Order of 24 November 2000, 8th 'Considering' clause and 5th and 6th 'Resolution' clauses; Haitians and Haitian-Origin Dominicans in the Dominican Republic, Order of 18 August 2000, 4th 'Resolution' paragraph; Alvarez et al., Order of 21 January 1998, 4th 'Resolution' paragraph; Giraldo Cardona, Order of 5 February 1997, 5th 'Considering' clause; Giraldo Cardona, Urgent measures of 28 October 1996, 2nd 'Resolution' paragraph and Colotenango, Order of 22 June 1994, 2nd 'Resolution' paragraph.

⁵⁴ IACHR Loayza Tamayo v. Peru, Urgent measures of 13 December 2000.

⁵⁵ IACHR Loayza Tamayo v. Peru, Order of 3 February 2001.

⁵⁶ IACHR Loayza Tamayo v. Peru, Order of 3 February 2001, 7th 'Having seen' clause.

in August 2001, on request of the Commission and the State, it did decide to lift the provisional measures. The situation of the beneficiary was no longer extremely serious and urgent to such an extent as to require provisional measures.⁵⁷

Since this case the Court has regularly dealt with urgent detention cases.⁵⁸ The Court has also increasingly specified what it means with the State's reporting obligations.⁵⁹ For instance, it has explained that it was essential that the adoption of the priority measures indicated in the Order should be reflected in reports that described concrete results based on the specific needs for protection of the beneficiaries of the measures. It has added that in this respect the supervisory role of the Inter-American Commission was particularly important in order to monitor the implementation of the measures ordered adequately and effectively.⁶⁰

It has equally reiterated that the State should take the relevant steps to ensure that the measures of protection were planned and implemented with the participation of the representatives of the beneficiaries of the measures and, in general, keep them informed of progress in implementation. This also meant that the State must facilitate the entry by the representatives of the beneficiaries of the measures into the detention facility. It must also facilitate communications between the representatives and the young detainees. These communications must be conducted in the most confidential manner possible so as to avoid intimidating the youngsters. The Court has ⁵⁷ IACHR Loayza Tamayo v. Peru, Order of 28 August 2001. The State had argued that provisional measures were reserved for extremely urgent situations where the beneficiary was facing irreparable harm and that this was not the case here (3rd 'Having seen' clause). The Court agreed, emphasizing that provisional measures are exceptional in character.

⁵⁸ See e.g. IACHR Matter of the Penitentiary Center of the Central Occidental Region (Uribana Prison) (Venezuela), Order of 2 February 2007 (e.g. measures must be implemented immediately to avoid the loss of life or harm the physical, mental and moral integrity of all those deprived of liberty in the Uribana Prison, of those who may enter the penitentiary center as prisoners, and also of those who work there and who enter the prison as visitors and more long-term measures aimed at, e.g. the reduction of overcrowding and the separation of male and female inmates); Matter of Urso Branco prison (Brazil), Orders of 2 May 2008, 21 September 2005, 7 July 2004, 22 April 2004, 29 August 2002 and 18 June 2002; Matter of the Mendoza prisons (Argentina), 27 November 2007, 30 March 2006 (particularly, to eliminate the risk of violent death and the inadequate internal security and monitoring conditions in the prisons), 18 June 2005, 22 November 2004; Matter of the persons imprisoned in the "Dr. Sebastião Martins Silveira" Penitentiary in Araraquara São Paulo (Brazil), Order of the President of 10 June 2008; Order of 30 September 2006; Matter of Children Deprived of Liberty in the "Complexo do Tatuapé" of FEBEM (Brazil), Order of President 10 June 2008, Orders of 3 July 2007, 4 July 2006, 30 November 2005 and 17 November 2005; Matter of Yare I and Yare II Capital Region Penitentiary Center (Venezuela), Orders of 30 November 2007 and 30 March 2006; Matter of Capital El Rodeo I & El Rodeo II Judicial Confinement Center, Order of 8 February 2008; Matter of Monagas Judicial Confinement Center ('La Pica') (Venezuela), Order of 3 July 2007 (e.g., as a more long-term measure, the confiscation of weapons and provide the necessary medical care), and 9 February 2006; Case of the Miguel Castro-Castro Prison v. Peru, Orders of 29 January 2008 and 30 January 2007 (dismissing the requests by the petitioners).

⁵⁹ This is relevant as a measure of follow-up. Generally on follow-up by the adjudicators, see Chapter XVIII.

⁶⁰ IACHR Matter of the Mendoza Prisons (Argentina), Order of 27 November 2007. See also Matter of the Yare I and Yare II Capital Region Penitentiary Center (Yare Prison) (Venezuela), Order of 30 November 2007 (to request the State to report on the availability of means and mechanisms whereby the persons deprived of liberty in the Capital Region Penitentiary Center Yare I and Yare II (Yare Prison) can obtain information on their rights and formulate petitions or complaints in this regard).

equally stressed the obligation to send it an updated list of all the young people residing in the detention facility.⁶¹

In a follow up provisional measure the Court has even specified that those beneficiaries who would be or had been transferred to another detention center subsequent to the Court's earlier provisional measures, continued under the protection of the Court's provisional measures. Their next of kin were to be informed of these transfers and the State was to avoid unduly violent acts by State officers, particularly during those transfers. It was also to make sure that the beneficiary was not exposed to overcrowded detention conditions upon transfer, that convicted prisoners and pre-trial detainees were not detained together, that access to medical staff was provided and that the right of access to defense counsel and next of kin was respected.⁶²

Yet the Inter-American Court now distinguishes between the more long-term measures required in the context of detention and the immediate measures required to prevent violations of the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment. In this respect in a separate opinion Judge García Ramírez pointed out the difference between the material and temporal scope and nature of provisional measures on the one hand and of judgments of the Court on the other. The more long-term measures (often requiring legal reforms and reorganisation) are matters to be examined on the merits rather than in the context of provisional measures.⁶³ Judge García Ramírez drew attention to the fact that multiple, complex and persistent measures were necessary to deal with structural problems in the short, medium and long run.⁶⁴ At the same time, of course, the Court has stressed that while the State makes the appropriate adjustments to deal with the structural problems, the detainees affected by the existing flaws must be protected by provisional measures if their condition is of extreme gravity and urgency.⁶⁵ In a subsequent matter involving detention the Court itself observed that the improvement and correction of the situation in the detention center Urso Branco constituted a process that required the State to take measures in the short, medium and long run to deal with the structural problems affecting the detainees. The duty to adopt such measures derived from the general obligation to respect and guarantee their rights. The compatibility of the measures taken by the State with the Inter-American standards must be examined at the appropriate moment, at the stage of the examination of the merits. Meanwhile, as part of the provisional measures, the state was to concretely eradicate the risk of violent deaths and attacks against the personal integrity.⁶⁶ Yet a detailed analysis of the compatibility of the detention conditions with the ACHR was to be made on the merits of the case, which was still pending before the Commission.⁶⁷ In this respect, in the face of allegations of inhuman detention conditions, it was the Commission that should take the measures it considered pertinent, based on its own functions.⁶⁸

At the same time the Court has pointed out that its competence to order provisional measures is not necessarily limited by the existence of a case relating to measures pending before the

⁶¹ See e.g. IACHR Matter of the Children and Adolescents Deprived of Liberty in the "Tatuapé Complex" of the CASA Foundation (Brazil), Order of 3 July 2007.

⁶² IACHR Matter of the persons imprisoned in the "Dr. Sebastião Martins Silveira" Penitentiary in Araraquara, São Paulo (Brazil), Order of 30 September 2006, 21st-24th 'Considering' clauses.

⁶³ IACHR Matter of Capital El Rodeo I and El Rodeo II Judicial Confinement Center, 8 February 2008, Separate opinion Judge García Ramírez (joined by Judge Medina Quiroga), §§18 and 19.

⁶⁴ IACHR Matter of Capital El Rodeo I and El Rodeo II Judicial Confinement Center, 8 February 2008, Separate opinion Judge García Ramírez (joined by Judge Medina Quiroga), §20.

⁶⁵ IACHR Matter of Capital El Rodeo I and El Rodeo II Judicial Confinement Center, 8 February 2008, 14th 'Considering' clause.

⁶⁶ IACHR Asunto de la Cárcel de Urso Branco (Brasil), Resolución de 2 de mayo de 2008, 20th 'Considering' clause.

⁶⁷ Id., 21st 'Considering' clause.

⁶⁸ Id., 22nd 'Considering' clause.

Commission, as in certain circumstances, in light of the rights at stake, the Court has recognized that its provisional measures do not just have a preventive, but in fact have a truly protective character.⁶⁹ Nevertheless, in the context of these measures the Court may only consider arguments that relate strictly and directly to the extreme gravity that is required for the use of provisional measures.⁷⁰ In a situation where the Court must decide whether its provisional measures previously ordered, must be maintained, it must examine whether the situation of extreme gravity persists or whether new circumstances that are equally grave merit the maintenance of the provisional measures. Any other claim can only be brought to the Court's attention through the corresponding contentious proceedings.⁷¹

It is noteworthy that in the matter that triggered these statements the State had argued many structural steps that it had undertaken. It had hired new prison staff, prison populations had decreased and prison cells that were previously connected had been repaired so that aggression between detainees was limited. Moreover the administration of Urso Branco prison had a policy of eliminating all violence, while the sanctions against detainees were limited to prohibiting visits.⁷² Yet the Commission argued that the measures had not been sufficient to guarantee the lives and integrity of the detainees and the petitioners noted, among others, that by the end of 2006 the State had substituted its laissez faire policy for an new repressive policy that included the use of torture in order to guarantee control over the detention centre. Among others, within six months, four directors had been fired for committing or allowing torture.⁷³ The Court concluded that the continued attacks and killings indicated the persistence of a situation of extreme gravity and urgency and the recent allegations of torture by state agents represented an aggravation of the imminent risk to life and personal integrity of the detainees.⁷⁴ The State had not provided information on concrete measures to put a stop to the killings and deal with the allegations of torture. It had limited itself to offering information on hiring new personnel and improving the detention conditions.⁷⁵ It observed that the fact that Brazil is a federal state cannot serve as an excuse for non-compliance. The Court found that there had been no major improvement during the six years of provisional measures and it specifically took note of the request by the petitioners at the internal level for the federal government to intervene in the detention system of the constitutive state Rondônia.⁷⁶ In the circumstances the measures to be adopted by Brazil must include some directly aimed to protect the right to life and integrity of the detainees, both in their relations amongst themselves and between them and the State agents. In particular the State was to take immediate measures necessary to eradicate concretely the risks of violent killings and grave attacks against personal integrity, making sure that its agents do not commit unjustified acts against the life and integrity of detainees and prohibiting, in all circumstances, the practice of torture. The measures were to include a confiscation of weapons and the maintenance of state control in a manner that fully respected the human rights of the detainees.⁷⁷ In other words, in the face of the continuing grave situation the Court specified its provisional measures and, in passing, also reminded the State of a request by the petitioners to intervene in the detention system of a constituent state.

None of the adjudicators have used provisional measures regularly to secure release, halt the execution of a detention order, halt re-imprisonment or arrange a prison transfer in light of the ⁶⁹ Id., 4th 'Considering' clause.

⁷⁰ Id., 5th 'Considering' clause.

⁷¹ Id., 5th 'Considering' clause.

⁷² Id., 7th 'Considering' clause.

⁷³ Id., 8th 'Considering' clause.

⁷⁴ Id., 10th 'Considering' clause.

⁷⁵ Id., 12th 'Considering' clause.

⁷⁶ Id., 14th 'Considering' clause.

⁷⁷ Id., 15th 'Considering' clause.

petitioner's state of health. The HRC nevertheless has done so at least once.⁷⁸ Moreover, the ECtHR has recently done so on behalf of several persons alleging to be suffering serious health problems as a result of a prolonged hunger strike.⁷⁹

In the Inter-American system the transfer of detainees has also been suggested or even ordered explicitly. A fire had broken out in a juvenile detention centre in Paraguay, killing nine minors protesting the detention conditions. Subsequently 125 minors were transferred to another facility, but this did not meet the minimum standards for the protection of minors either. In addition the authorities sent the other 130 minors to different parts of the country and placed them in prisons together with adults, in overcrowded cells.⁸⁰ The relocation of these minors to distant prisons aggravated their critical situation and made family visits impossible. In its precautionary measure of August 2001 the Commission very specifically requested that:

“(1) The minors be immediately transferred to the Itaguá Education Center. (2) The physical, mental, and moral integrity of the minors be ensured and, in particular, that minors and adults be kept completely separate during the temporary relocation of the young inmates in the aforesaid facilities. (3) Access to the minors by their legal counsel and family visitors be granted. (4) The circumstances that gave rise to these measures be investigated, in particular, those that led to the death of Benito Augusto Moreno (or Augusto Benitez), and that the perpetrators thereof be punished”.⁸¹

Yet the Inter-American Court has also indicated certain limits to its protective task. In the context of a request to amplify a pre-existing Order by the Inter-American Court for provisional measures on behalf of the detainees of Mendoza, which the President of the Court denied, he quoted extensively from judgments and orders by Argentina's domestic courts aimed at the implementation of the State's human rights obligations and explicitly referring to the previous Order of the Inter-American Court.⁸² In this respect he specifically referred to the principle of subsidiarity ‘that informs the Inter-American human rights system’. This meant that provisional measures would be used only in cases of extreme gravity and urgency when the normally existing guarantees available in the State are insufficient or ineffective and the authorities will not or cannot make them prevail.⁸³ The full Court confirmed this approach, noting among others that ⁷⁸ See e.g. HRC V. v. Spain, 495/1992 (disc. 1995), provisional measures of 22 May 1992. The telegram to the Ministry of Justice contained more information than the official Note Verbale to the Permanent Representative, but probably the other information could be found in the annexes to the Note Verbale (on file with the author).

⁷⁹ See e.g. ECtHR Yildiz v. Turkey, 20 October 2005.

⁸⁰ Only in the San Juan Bautista and Emboscada facilities were they placed in separate children's blocks.

⁸¹ CIDH Annual Report 2001, §48. See also the subsequent judgment of the Court: IACHR “Instituto de Reeducación del Menor” (Paraguay), Judgment of 2 September 2004.

⁸² IACHR Las Penitenciarías de Mendoza (Argentina), President's Order of 22 August 2007 (maintaining the existing provisional measures, but refusing to amplify them), 11-13th ‘Considering’ clause. See e.g. Corte Suprema de Justicia de la Nación, 13 February 2007 (“como custodio que es de las garantías constitucionales, y en atención a la falta de resultados obtenidos con relación a la orden dada por la Corte Interamericana de Derechos Humanos, se ve en la ineludible obligación de, intimar al Estado Nacional a que en el plazo de veinte días adopte las medidas que pongan fin a la situación que se vive en las unidades carcelarias de la Provincia de Mendoza, y de tomar las medidas que se indicarán en las parte dispositiva de esta sentencia”).

⁸³ IACHR Las Penitenciarías de Mendoza (Argentina), President's Order of 22 August 2007 (maintaining the existing provisional measures, but refusing to amplify them), 14th ‘Considering clause’. See also Matter of Yare I and Yare II Capital Region Penitentiary Center (Venezuela), Order of 8 February 2008, 15th ‘Considering’ clause.

overcrowding was one of the situations that had generated its previous Order for provisional measures and that Argentina had constructed a new detention centre and transferred detainees to this centre exactly to deal with this issue of overcrowding. As no facts had been brought to the Court's attention implying a situation of extreme urgency and gravity for the life and integrity of the people held in that centre, the Court decided not to extend its provisional measures. It did remind the State, however, of its general obligations under Article 1(1) ACHR, in particular in the context of detention.⁸⁴

3.3.2.4 PREVENTING EXPULSION OR EXTRADITION

In November 2002 the Bosnia Chamber ordered provisional measures for the respondent Parties 'to take all necessary steps to prevent the applicants from being taken out of the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina by the use of force'.⁸⁵ They were nevertheless handed over to the US authorities and transferred to Guantanamo Bay. In response, in its decision on the merits and reparation the Chamber was very precise on the measures required of the respondent Parties. The Chamber ordered Bosnia and Herzegovina to 'use diplomatic channels' in order to protect their basic rights. In particular it ordered the State to 'take all possible steps to establish contacts with the applicants and provide them with consular support'. Equally Bosnia was ordered to take all possible steps to prevent imposition and execution of the death penalty, including seeking, ex post facto, assurances of the US authorities, 'via diplomatic contacts', that the death penalty would not be imposed.⁸⁶ In addition, both respondent Parties (not only BiH but also the constituent State Fed.BiH, each bearing half of the costs) were ordered to retain lawyers 'authorised and admitted to practice in the relevant jurisdictions and before the relevant courts, tribunals and other authoritative bodies in order to take all necessary action to protect the applicants' rights while in US custody and in case of possible military, criminal or other proceedings involving the applicants'.⁸⁷ This very precise order already indicates a relation between provisional measures and reparation, a link further explored in section 4 of this chapter. The increased precision also serves as a form of follow-up for earlier non-compliance.⁸⁸

3.3.2.5 PHYSICAL PROTECTION AGAINST DEATH THREATS⁸⁹

The Inter-American Commission has brokered specific agreements between the beneficiaries (and/or their representatives)⁹⁰ and the State such as installing armoured glass or a telephone connection and providing bodyguards to human rights defenders. In the context of death threats by one group of detainees against another the Commission obtained a promise by Colombia to build a 'separating partition' in the prison.⁹¹

⁸⁴ IACHR Matter of the Mendoza Prisons, Order of 27 November 2007, 9th and 10th 'Considering' clauses.

⁸⁵ Bosnia Chamber Boudellaa, Lakhdar, Nechle and Lahmar v. BiH and Fed.BiH, 11 October 2002 (adm. & merits), §5.

⁸⁶ Id., §330.

⁸⁷ Id., §331.

⁸⁸ On follow up see Chapter XVIII.

⁸⁹ See also section 3.3.3.

⁹⁰ See also section 4 (beneficiaries).

⁹¹ CIDH Annual Report 2001, Chapter IV, §16 and Press release 33/01 'Inter-American Commission on Human Rights concludes its visit to the Republic of Colombia', 13 December 2001, §18.

As part of the protective measures required of a State sometimes physical protection is warranted. The beneficiaries of such measures, however, do not necessarily feel protected by the members of the police or military proposed. The Commission now includes in its precautionary measures references to the obligation of the State to agree with the beneficiaries about the precise substance of the protective measures. In this respect it is not surprising that organisations like Peace Brigades International (PBI) are sometimes proposed to provide protection.⁹² This organisation has built up credibility in certain areas of, for instance, Mexico. The type of protection provided, however, is that of providing an unarmed international presence, peacefully and continuously accompanying persons threatened. Normally persons threatened seem to either contact non-governmental organisations such as PBI, or the Commission requesting it to take precautionary measures. If the Commission does so, it points out to the State concerned its obligation to provide protection against threats. In such cases one often thinks of providing armed protection as well as investigation of the threats and prosecution of the perpetrators. More and more often, however, the protective measures suggested include providing mobile phones, closed-circuit TV systems etc.⁹³ The beneficiaries of precautionary measures sometimes do not trust the (local) police but they do trust a certain division within the army, or the other way around. In other situations they do not trust any armed public officials. In such case the State and the beneficiaries are forced to find alternatives. They may make a list of persons mutually trusted. The State may have to train these persons and provide them with weapons.

In other cases, where international accompanying organisations such as PBI are involved, who do not carry arms, the State may have to provide them with facilities or cover their expenses. It may also be that the State has offered some form of armed protection that is accepted by the beneficiaries as long as an unarmed international organisation can be present to monitor this as well.

In 1996 the Commission suggested, for instance, that the Court would order the State to give the relatives of a presidential candidate who was receiving threats, 'the name and telephone number of a person in a position of authority in the Government who will be responsible for providing him with protection should it become necessary' and provide him with an 'armoured car' so that he could travel the entire national territory.⁹⁴

In Newton Coutinho Mendes et al. v. Brazil (1997) the Commission initially asked for each individual name included on a specific list of persons targeted by death squads. It only took precautionary measures on behalf of Father Ricardo Rezende. He had left the region due to the threats against him, but he was planning to return.⁹⁵ With regard to the names of the other intended beneficiaries the petitioner responded that 'local police knew whose names were on the list', but 'the petitioner had not gained access to most of the names of the persons threatened due to the complicity of the police with the criminals'.⁹⁶ Subsequently the Commission did take pre-

⁹² See e.g. CIDH Teodoro Cabrera García and Rodolfo Montiel Flores v. Mexico, 27 February 2004 (adm.), §7. In April 2002 the Commission allowed the measures to expire when it did not hear anymore from either the beneficiaries or the State. See §8. See also Annual Report 2001, Chapter III (a), §44.

⁹³ See e.g. CIDH Annual Report 2001, Chapter III (a), §45, referring to precautionary measures of November 2001 on behalf of two members of the Zapotec indigenous people in Mexico to provide them 'with vehicles, mobile telephones, and closed-circuit TV systems'.

⁹⁴ Communication of 2 February 1996 quoted in IACHR Alemán Lacayo v. Nicaragua, Order of 2 February 1996, 2nd 'Having seen' clause.

⁹⁵ CIDH Newton Coutinho Mendes et al. v. Brazil, 1 October 1997 (adm.); precautionary measures of 20 March 1996, §§50-51.

⁹⁶ CIDH Newton Coutinho Mendes et al. v. Brazil, 1 October 1997 (adm.); precautionary measures of 20 March 1996, §§14 and 57.

cautionary measures on behalf of all persons.⁹⁷ It requested ‘more specifically that: (a) the agents entrusted with protecting the persons threatened by the “Xinguara list”, including Father Ricardo Rezende, be trained in the use of firearms, and that they be adequately armed so as to guarantee effective protection for the persons threatened; (b) the individuals for whom preventive arrest warrants have been issued be detained; (c) the persons responsible be tried and punished; and, (d) the actions taken in this respect be reported’.⁹⁸ When it reiterated its request the next month, it added the names of six persons whom the State should detain, as their arrest had been ordered for their involvement in the murders and death threats. Even more specifically, the Commission added that if the involvement of the Pará civilian police in the escape of one of the suspects was confirmed, the protection of the widow of one of the persons murdered should be provided by another police force.⁹⁹

An issue that is relevant as well is the geographic scope of the protection in death threat cases. It is insufficient for the State to provide protection only at the home of the beneficiary. In its follow-up order in Blake, for instance, the Court specified that protection should be provided to the beneficiaries also when they ventured outside of their homes.¹⁰⁰

3.3.2.6 PROTECTION AGAINST MASS EXPULSION

In the Haitian case (2000) the Inter-American Commission had requested several concrete measures of protection on behalf of the group as a whole.¹⁰¹ It argued that the expulsions and deportations placed at risk the life and physical integrity of those deported as well as of the family members who had been separated from them, ‘especially children under age who are left abandoned’.¹⁰² It requested the Court to order the State to establish procedures distinguishing ‘cases where deportation is not applicable, from cases where it is applicable’. In any such case of applicability the State must strictly observe due process ‘including a minimum term for notification, access to family members, adequate hearings, and decisions adopted lawfully by the competent authorities’.¹⁰³ In any case, the State must make decisions on deportations with regard to the intended group of beneficiaries on an individual basis.

Later it also urged the Court to order provisional measures on behalf of seven specific persons. These measures were to permit their immediate return from Haiti to the Dominican Republic or, in the alternative, protect them from any ‘detention or deportation action based on racial or national origin, or on the suspicion that they are not full-fledged citizens’.¹⁰⁴

In addition it requested the Court to urge the State more generally ‘to establish adequate procedures for the detention and determination of measures for the deportation of deportable aliens, including the holding of hearings to prove the right that the person may have to remain on ⁹⁷ CIDH Newton Coutinho Mendes et al. v. Brazil, 1 October 1997 (adm.); precautionary measures of 17 February 1995, §59. See also section 5 of this chapter.

⁹⁸ CIDH Newton Coutinho Mendes et al. v. Brazil, 1 October 1997 (adm.); precautionary measures of 17 February 1995, §59.

⁹⁹ CIDH Newton Coutinho Mendes et al. v. Brazil, 1 October 1997 (adm.); precautionary measures of 23 April 1996, §61. See also the follow up precautionary measures of 1 August 1996.

¹⁰⁰ IACHR Blake (Guatemala), Order of 18 April 1997. See further section 3.3.3.

¹⁰¹ See also section 5 of this Chapter (Beneficiaries).

¹⁰² IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic (Dominican Republic), Order of 18 August 2000, 2nd ‘Having seen’ clause.

¹⁰³ Id., 2nd ‘Having seen’ clause.

¹⁰⁴ Id., 3rd ‘Having seen’ clause.

Dominican soil or, in its defect, to communicate with their families and employers, in order to normalize the collection of salaries and the protection of their property and personal effects'.¹⁰⁵

The Court did not order the exact provisional measures the Commission had requested. It did not take over the Commission's emphasis on due process and it did not refer to the possible racist motivation behind the arbitrary expulsions.¹⁰⁶ It did require the State to abstain from deporting specific persons. With regard to two others it required the State to allow their immediate return to the Dominican Republic. This reaffirmed the Commission's precedent with regard to its own precautionary measures in this respect.¹⁰⁷

Moreover, the Court required the State to permit 'within the shortest possible time, the family reunification' of one person whose wife and minor children had already been deported. The State was also to collaborate with him in order 'to obtain information on the whereabouts of his next of kin either in Haiti or the Dominican Republic'.¹⁰⁸

With regard to two persons on whose behalf the Commission had requested the Court's intervention, the Court initially considered that it had insufficient information, in light of the diverging statements of the Commission and the State about them. Thus, the Court required the Commission to 'urgently report in detail' about their current situation. It required the State, moreover, to investigate the situation of these two persons so as to expedite the Commission's examination of their situations.¹⁰⁹ Here the protective measures required (investigation of the situation) are connected to the Court's evidentiary requirements for accepting persons as beneficiaries of its protective Order. By September 2000 the President required the State to protect these two persons as well. As requested by the Commission the State was to refrain from deporting one of them and to allow the immediate return of the other, 'even making it possible for him to meet with his son'.¹¹⁰ Two months later the full Court confirmed this.¹¹¹

In May 2001 the Court ordered the Dominican Republic, in compliance with its previous Orders, to refrain from deporting or expelling three of the beneficiaries, to allow the immediate return of three other persons and to allow, as soon as possible, the reunification of a family. The Court requested the State to collaborate with one of the beneficiaries, a father and husband, to obtain information about the whereabouts of his family, either in Haiti or in the Dominican Republic. It specified its previous Orders by requiring the State 'to notify the competent authorities in writing' of the names of six beneficiaries of the provisional measures to prevent them from being deported or expelled from the Dominican Republic.¹¹² The Commission had also suggested that a 'special document' should be given to them, indicating that they were subject to interna-

¹⁰⁵ Id., 3rd 'Having seen' clause.

¹⁰⁶ In his Concurring Opinion Judge Cançado Trindade considered that the Court had taken care that it would not prejudice the merits of the case pending before the Commission, in particular with regard to the question of due process of law. This may mean he considers that ordering a State to observe principles of due process of law would prejudice the merits.

¹⁰⁷ Part of the Court's provisional measures simply dealt with the protection of two witnesses who had testified before the Court about the need to order provisional measures to halt arbitrary expulsion. After their testimony they received several threats. This triggered the Court's already established use of provisional measures to protect witnesses.

¹⁰⁸ IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic, Order for provisional measures, 18 August 2000, 5th and 6th decisional clauses.

¹⁰⁹ Id., 2nd 'Decisional' clause. See also Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

¹¹⁰ President IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic, Decision of 14 September 2000, 3rd 'Decisional' clause.

¹¹¹ IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic, Order of 12 November 2000, 3rd 'Decisional' clause.

¹¹² IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic, Order of 26 May 2001, 4th 'Decisional' clause.

tional protection.¹¹³ Indeed, the Court ordered the State to grant these six persons identification documents that would indicate that they were the beneficiaries of the Court's provisional measures.¹¹⁴ It ordered the State to continue following up on the investigations with regard to the situations of the beneficiaries and it requested both the State and the Commission to 'take the necessary steps to create appropriate mechanisms to coordinate and monitor' the measures ordered within a month.¹¹⁵

In this case the Commission and Court operated in a continuum, ordering both an abstention from deporting and the immediate return of those already deported. They also emphasised the importance of family reunification, although the Commission put more emphasis on protecting the rights of children and preventing the separation of families. On the Commission's request, the Court ordered the State to grant the beneficiaries identification documents indicating their status as beneficiaries of the Court's provisional measures. It ordered the State and the Commission to follow up the situation as well.

3.3.2.7 PROTECTING FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

In Ivcher Bronstein v. Peru, the Commission requested Peru to 'refrain from taking or executing any action or measure that would worsen his situation, including his capture by Interpol' while his case was pending before it.¹¹⁶ The Court ordered provisional measures as well, but these were generally phrased, referring to the prevention of irreparable harm to his life, personal integrity, but also the right to judicial guarantees.¹¹⁷

The Commission's precautionary measure on behalf of a journalist and director of a weekly magazine in Venezuela included a request to lift the 'previous censorship measures' against the journalist and the magazine, to guarantee the full exercise of the journalist's right to defend himself and to ensure his exercise of his personal freedom, freedom of expression and the right to due process of law.¹¹⁸

3.3.2.8 PROTECTING A RANGE OF RIGHTS

In July 2001 the Commission requested Haiti to protect the judicial magistrate in charge of the investigation into the murder of journalist Jean Dominique on 3 April 2000.¹¹⁹ Two earlier judges had also received threats and subsequently withdrew from the investigation. In light of 'the lack of adequate protective measures' he felt forced to withdraw from the case as well. The government, however, did not accept his withdrawal. The Commission noted that, 'with the beneficiary's agreement', it requested Haiti to adopt the following measures:

"(1) Immediate adoption of all measures necessary to protect their life and personal integrity of Mr. Claudy Gassant; (2) Adoption of all measures necessary to ensure the exercise of his right ¹¹³ Id., 5th and 9th 'Having seen' clauses.

¹¹⁴ Id., 4th 'Decisional' clause.

¹¹⁵ Id., 5th 'Decisional' clause.

¹¹⁶ CIDH Annual Report 1998, §48.

¹¹⁷ IACHR Baruch Ivcher Bronstein v. Peru, Order of 21 November 2000. See further Chapter XII (Other situations), section 3.3.

¹¹⁸ CIDH Report of the Special Rapporteur for Freedom of Expression, Chapter V, §§23-25, in Annual Report of the Inter-American Commission 2001, Volume II. See also Chapter XII (Other situations).

¹¹⁹ CIDH Annual Report 2001, Chapter III (a), §37.

to investigate, receive, and disseminate information with respect to the investigation of the facts surrounding the death of the journalist Jean Dominique, pursuant to the provisions of Art. 13 of the American Convention on Human Rights and the second principle of the Declaration of Principles on Freedom of Expression".¹²⁰

Apart from the express reference to the beneficiary's agreement with the precautionary measures¹²¹ the protective measures required are themselves remarkable. The Commission requested the State to adopt measures not only to protect the life and personal integrity of the judge but also to ensure the exercise of his right to investigate as well as receive and disseminate information with respect to the investigation of the death of said journalist. In other words, the precautionary measure seems to combine the aim of protecting the life and integrity of persons threatened with the aims of protecting judicial independence and preventing impunity in another case by enabling a judge to properly perform his function. In a sense this is comparable to some other precautionary measures taken by the Commission in which it specified that measures to protect persons, in practice human rights defenders or family members of victims, were not to limit the freedom of movement of the beneficiaries. In other words, they should be able to continue their activities. The reason why the Commission was so specific in this case may have been the fact that the judge was involved in the investigation of the murder of a journalist, freedom of expression being a particular interest of the Commission and the OAS.¹²²

Equally, the Commission has shown its awareness of the interrelated nature of certain rights in the case of the Yakye Axa indigenous community. When it took precautionary measures on behalf of this Community in Paraguay the Inter-American Commission noted that they were in 'an extremely needy situation, because of their inadequate access to food supplies and health care'. It requested Paraguay to take the following measures:

- "(1) To suspend the enforcement of any court or administrative order involving the eviction and/or removal of the homes of the Yakye Axa indigenous community and of its members.
- (2) To refrain from all other actions and undertakings affecting the right to property, free transit, and residence of the Yakye Axa indigenous community and its members.
- (3) To take all steps necessary to ensure the life and physical, mental, and moral integrity of the members of the Yakye Axa indigenous community".¹²³

Thus the Commission was aware that access to food and healthcare alone would not be sufficient because it might ensure their life and physical integrity, but not their mental and moral integrity. In other words, it took into account the right to cultural integrity and indicated that the State

¹²⁰ Ibid.

¹²¹ See Chapter XIII.

¹²² In fact, the OAS Special Rapporteur for Freedom of Expression mentions this case in his Annual Report as one of the four cases involving the freedom of expression in which the Commission took precautionary measures. He gave some additional information on this case, noting that the judge involved had 'conducted a series of investigation of political leaders and other Haitian citizens, in spite of having received direct death threats'. He also added that the assassination plot of 8 June was not only directed against this judge but also against a Senator 'who had been demanding justice since the death of the journalist Jean Dominique'. Apparently, the Commission's precautionary measures did not extend to this Senator. The Rapporteur also specified that the 'absence of effective protective measures to ensure the personal safety of Judge Gassant has led him to leave the country'. Report of the Special Rapporteur of Freedom of Expression, Chapter V, §22, in Annual Report 2001. Whatever action Haiti had undertaken to protect him, apparently it was insufficient. The fact that the Rapporteur and not the Commission itself provides this information may show that he has been closely involved in this case.

¹²³ CIDH case 12.313, Annual Report 2001, Chapter III (a), C.1, §49.

should not force members of the Community to move to another area away from their traditional territories, even if they would have better access to food and medical care. Instead, pending the case it should ensure access to food and healthcare on their traditional territories.¹²⁴

3.3.3 An incremental approach to specificity: the Peace Community and death threats and harassment

3.3.3.1 INTRODUCTION

Generally the Inter-American Commission's precautionary measures are more specific than the provisional measures of the Inter-American Court. This applies even more clearly to the earlier cases. In Chunimá (1991) the Commission had requested the Court to order provisional measures protecting a list of witnesses, relatives, human rights activists and judges. It had also requested it to order Guatemala to 'inform the human rights organizations affected of the name and phone-number of a civilian official in the government who will be responsible for providing them with protection should the need arise'.¹²⁵ Moreover, Guatemala should effectively ensure the return of human rights activists to their homes in Chunimá. It should carry out the arrest warrants issued against the members of the civil patrol of this village, who are the main suspects. Finally, the highest authorities in the government should 'make a public declaration to be published in the major media establishment in the country recognising the legitimacy of the work of human rights monitors in Guatemala and acknowledging that their activities are protected not only by the American Convention on Human Rights, but also by the Constitution of the Republic of Guatemala'.¹²⁶

The President of the Inter-American Court indeed ordered Guatemala to take 'all necessary measures' to protect the right to life and physical integrity of the fourteen persons.¹²⁷ The Court later confirmed this.¹²⁸ It did not indicate precisely what type of measures Guatemala was expected to take to protect each of the fourteen persons involved. Thus, the Court's provisional measures were of a more general nature. Yet it did emphasize that the State should indeed 'promptly specify' what measures have been taken to protect each of the beneficiaries.¹²⁹

The specificity of provisional measures has increased since, to include 'the granting of a permanent escort at the domicile of each one of the beneficiaries', as well as of the premises of a human rights institute of a university, and a specification that the 'security personnel assigned be given special training and adequate equipment' and that the aforementioned 'escorts should not belong to the law enforcement forces that, pursuant to the beneficiaries' statements, might be involved in the events reported'.¹³⁰

¹²⁴ In its Judgment of 17 June 2005 the Court ordered the State to take all necessary steps to ensure the life and physical, mental, and moral integrity of its members.

¹²⁵ IACHR Chunimá case (Guatemala), Order of 15 July 1991 (President), 3rd 'Having seen' clause.

¹²⁶ Id., 3rd and 4th 'Having seen' clauses.

¹²⁷ Id.

¹²⁸ IACHR Chunimá case (Guatemala), Order of 1 August 1991.

¹²⁹ Id., 2nd 'Decisional' clause. The order specified that the provisional measures would be in force until 3 December 1991. Apparently, in December 1991 the Commission requested the Court to re-establish the provisional measures, but the Court did not do so. IACHR Chunimá case. Letter of the President of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights addressed to the Executive Secretary of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, 14 January 1992, Compendium 1987-1996, p. 49.

¹³⁰ IACHR García Prieto family et al. (El Salvador), Order of 26 September 2006, 11th 'Considering' clause. Protective measures must be provided diligently and effectively and must

Rather than discussing a large range of cases that provide extensive information on the specific action required of the State to protect persons against death threats, and different approaches by the Commission and Court in this respect, this section focuses on the Peace Community case dealt with by the Inter-American Court. This case is illustrative of the provisional measures ordered in the Inter-American system with their awareness of the interrelationship between various rights. In the Peace Community case the Commission's requests to the Court for provisional measures were very precise not only about the specific action required but also about the manner in which it wished the State to implement provisional measures. An examination of the views of the Commission and the State in this case also shows that the dialogue between these two parties has gone into considerable detail. The Commission's requests included: preventing forced displacement; guaranteeing a safe return home; confronting the paramilitary; investigating threats and violence, prosecuting and punishing; severing existing links between (local) authorities and paramilitary groups; forbidding local authorities to make statements that could trigger violence and threats, instead formally recognising and publicly supporting the beneficiaries; political coordination and early warning; practical measures for physical protection; ensuring that the beneficiaries can travel freely and ensuring the free transport of goods to and from the Community.

In order to clarify the protective measures required to satisfy the overall requirement of protecting persons against threats, the discussion is subdivided into several different requirements, as they have been suggested by the Commission and sometimes ordered by the Court. The Court's consecutive Orders in the Peace Community case show that, when the adverse situation persists, the Court may order more of the measures requested by the Commission in each subsequent Order. Where relevant reference is also made to provisional measures ordered in other cases.

3.3.3.2 PREVENTING FORCED DISPLACEMENT

Due to the violence committed against them, the members of the Peace Community had been displaced to other parts of the country. The Commission had expressed concern about a group of inhabitants of the Municipality of Apartadó who chose their right not to be forcibly displaced from their place of origin.¹³¹ The Commission suggested the State would take the necessary action be planned and implemented with the participation of the beneficiaries of the measures or their representatives. IACHR Matter of Ramírez Hinostroza et al. (Peru), Order of 17 May 2007. Sometimes 'diligently and effectively' is further qualified by a reference to who should provide the protective measures: 'by adequately trained and qualified personnel who do not form part of the security units that have been denounced by the beneficiary'. IACHR Matter of Guerrero Gallucci and Martínez Barrios (Venezuela), Order of 29 November 2007. Sometimes the Order refers to the protection of the life and personal integrity of some of the beneficiaries and adds 'personal liberty' with regard to others. See e.g. IACHR Case of Gutiérrez Soler (Colombia), Order of 27 November 2007 and Matter of Carlos Nieto Palma et al. (Venezuela), Order of 3 July 2007.

¹³¹ The original Spanish text provides: 'un grupo de habitantes del Municipio de Apartadó optó por ejercer su derecho a no desplazarse de su lugar de origen, derecho reconocido en el Derecho Internacional y plasmado en los principios rectores del desplazamiento interno recogidos por el representante del Secretario General de la Naciones Unidas para los desplazados internos'. The English translation speaks of a group of inhabitants of the Municipality of Apartadó which 'chose to exercise their right not to move to their place of origin, which is a right recognized in International Law and stipulated in the governing principles of the internal moving collected by the representative of the Secretary General of the United Nations for internal movements'. In the context (see also the reference to the representative of the UN Secretary General on the issue of forced displacement) it is more likely that the inhabitants in question refused to be forcibly guaranteeing that the people of the Community could continue living in their homes or could return to them. It must offer them ‘the guarantee that they will not be persecuted or threatened by the State’s agents or by people acting with their acquiescence or by particular individuals’.¹³²

Meanwhile, the State had made available to the Court several documents aiming to show its commitment to fight forced displacement.¹³³ In November 2000, following the hearing and the examination of the written materials, the Court ordered several measures to be taken by the State to prevent displacement and enable displaced persons to return safely. It required the State to guarantee that the beneficiaries of its provisional measures would be able to continue to live in their normal place of residence and to enable those persons who had been forced to leave to return to their homes in San José de Apartadó.¹³⁴ In other words, in cases involving death threats the Court has taken over the Commission’s request to specifically order protection against forced displacement and guaranteeing safe return for those persons already displaced. Thus it specified that it is insufficient if the State ‘protects’ persons against death threats by ‘ensuring’ their protection away from their homes. It explicitly referred to the prevention of displacement.¹³⁵

3.3.3.3 CONFRONTING THE PARAMILITARIES

The Court did not specifically address another request by the Commission, namely to require the State to take the necessary measures to ‘repel and neutralise’ the paramilitary groups active in the region. The Commission had pointed out that one of the factors explaining the violence against the Community was the presence of paramilitary groups operating in the area freely and openly. Because of their close link with agents of the Colombian State, these paramilitaries had been the main source of hostile acts against the Community. The State should arrange for vigilance in the area surrounding the Community and carry out, in particular, effective operations to repress the displaced from the Municipality of Apartadó, IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order for provisional measures, 24 November 2000.

¹³² IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order for provisional measures, 24 November 2000.

¹³³ This included its Law 589 of 2000 and a teaching course for members of the public security force in the region of Urabá about the prevention of forced displacement and the protection of forcibly displaced persons (July 2000). Other examples were a workshop on human rights, international humanitarian law and forced displacement (August 2000) as well as a training workshop for instructors of the 17th Brigade of the national army in October 2000. It must be recalled that the 17th Brigade was implicated in violent acts perpetrated against members of the Community. See generally Chapter XVII (Official responses).

¹³⁴ IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order of 24 November 2000. See also Order of 18 June 2002. The Court referred to its earlier provisional measures in the case of Giraldo Cardona, Orders of 28 October 1996 (the President’s urgent measures) and 5 February 1997. It also referred to the Colotenango case, Order of 22 June 1994.

¹³⁵ Obviously the wishes of the beneficiaries are what matters. Thus, in May 1999 the Commission issued precautionary measures asking Argentina to relocate a witness and his family to a safe place and investigate the facts alleged so as to determine who was responsible for the injuries and threats received. The petitioners later requested the maintenance of the precautionary measures because the State had made very little progress in its investigation. Moreover, the arrangements, it had made for relocation to a safe place had been temporary. See Annual Report 1999, Chapter III C.1, §8. Luzia Canuto was the daughter of an agricultural labour union leader who was assassinated. She was a plaintiff and witness in the trial of those responsible for her father’s death. In March 1998 the Commission requested Brazil to take precautionary measures to protect her and, in particular, to halt her involuntary transfer to a place where she would have to teach in an area that was especially dangerous for her. Annual Report 1998, §12.

actions of paramilitary groups and to order the agents of the State not to collaborate with these groups. Instead, the Commission had emphasised, the State was expected to order its agents to protect the Community and to refrain from performing acts or making statements that would stigmatise and endanger the Community.¹³⁶ The Court did not refer either to the need to cut links between the State and paramilitary groups. During the public hearing the representatives of the State had argued that there was no civil war in Colombia because there was no popular support for the actors.¹³⁷ They denied accusations that its agents acquiesced in the activities of such groups or that they failed to take action against them.¹³⁸ At the same time they noted that the State was intent on putting an end to any commitment or link that may exist between the public security forces (army and police) and the paramilitaries. In order to achieve this, it intended to provide workshops for alternative dispute settlement and to review the justice-related work already undertaken in the Community, while respecting the Community's own mechanisms of supervision.¹³⁹

In another case, in October 2000, the Commission had used precautionary measures requesting Colombia to take steps to protect the life and physical integrity of the management and workers at the regional Committee for the Protection of Human Rights in Magdalena Medio (CREDHOS). It very specifically requested Colombia to report on measures taken to '(a) shed light on the serious complaints of law enforcement's tolerance or sponsorship of paramilitary groups stationed in Barrancabermeja and Yondó; and (b) guarantee that law enforcement complies with its legal functions and does not tolerate or sponsor paramilitary groups operating in the area'.¹⁴⁰

3.3.3.4 OFFICIAL RECOGNITION OF HUMAN RIGHTS DEFENDERS

One important example of a protective measure is the formal recognition by government authorities of the legitimacy and importance of the work of human rights defenders and others, as well as the recognition of peace communities. During the hearing the Commission requested the Court to order the State to issue a presidential directive expressly recognising the legality and legitimacy of the Community and expressing the State's support as well as its respect for the national and international organisations accompanying the Community.¹⁴¹ This probably was a reference to organisations such as Peace Brigades International and the Human Rights Accompaniment volun-

¹³⁶ IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order of 24 November 2000 (Commission request during hearing).

¹³⁷ On the other hand, they acknowledged that armed non-state actors had indeed caused confrontations. The State was taking efforts to fight them. It shared the same purposes of peace as the Peace Community and did not subscribe to the accusations that there was a relationship between the State and paramilitaries or illegal groups of armed actors.

¹³⁸ IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order of 24 November 2000 (statement by the representative of Colombia).

¹³⁹ IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order of 24 November 2000. See also Chapter XVII (Official responses).

¹⁴⁰ CIDH Annual Report 2000, §22. A course called 'Forum for Life and Human Rights' had been held in Barrancabermeja. State representatives and human rights defenders participated. Several of the human rights defenders were working with CREDHOS. This organisation has its headquarters in Barrancabermeja. When they were taking part in the aforementioned course they apparently found copies of a 'condolence card' making death threats against members of the organisation.

¹⁴¹ IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order for provisional measures, 24 November 2000.

teers of the US based Fellowship of Reconciliation. In its Order of November 2000 the Court did not heed to this specific request.

In its later reports the Commission again emphasised the need to give the Community the necessary support in the eyes of public opinion and in the eyes of the security forces operating locally. After all, the latter were responsible for their safety.¹⁴²

3.3.3.5 PRACTICAL MEASURES FOR PHYSICAL PROTECTION

The Court did not specify the practical measures that should be taken by the State in order to implement its provisional measure and ensure the physical protection of the beneficiaries. The Commission had suggested several concrete measures. In particular, it expected the State to strengthen its preventive and protective measures ‘in compliance with the commitments assumed by the Red de Solidaridad Social’.¹⁴³ These measures would include supplying short wave radios to San José de Apartadó and other dwellings¹⁴⁴ to which displaced persons had returned, installing reflectors to light the surroundings of the urban central area; providing exterior lighting of both this area and that of La Unión; installation of an alarm system; repairs of the roads between San José and Apartadó and repair of the telephone system between the municipality and the smaller dwellings.¹⁴⁵

3.3.3.6 PROTECTING FREE PASSAGE

In its first submission to the Court, the Commission already referred to the roadblock between Apartadó and San José. Inhabitants and others were accused of providing the guerrillas with food. The submission referred to paramilitaries entering vehicles in which Community members were travelling. Furthermore, on 11 and 14 November 2000, a month after the President of the Court ordered the State to take urgent measures on behalf of 193 members of the Community, some armed civilians boarded a bus travelling from Apartadó to San José. They forced it to alter its course. They also made the passengers get off the bus and show their identification, verifying whether they were on a list. They took all the food that the passengers were carrying.¹⁴⁶

Following the Court’s Order of 24 November 2000, which did not specifically address this problem, the Commission submitted several reports informing the Court of various violent acts and threats that subsequently occurred in the Community. According to the Commission these acts affected not only the members of the Community as beneficiaries of the measures but also various other persons providing services to the Community.

¹⁴² IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order for provisional measures, 18 June 2002. The Commission had also requested the Court to order the State to reinforce the political mechanisms of protection, which could help restore the confidence between the Community and the local authorities: IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Orders for provisional measures, 24 November 2000.

¹⁴³ This is a network for social solidarity.

¹⁴⁴ The English translation of the Order mentions ‘trails’. Presumably, these trails (‘las veredas’) also refer to the dwellings along these trails. In other places, the Spanish text mentions ‘la Vereda la Unión’ suggesting again that ‘la vereda’ refers to a location and not just a route.

¹⁴⁵ IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Orders for provisional measures, 24 November 2000.

¹⁴⁶ Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order for provisional measures, 24 November 2000.

In its second Order, of June 2002, the Court did order the State to guarantee the necessary security conditions on the route between Apartadó and San José de Apartadó as well as in the transportation terminal of Apartadó and in Tierra Amarilla. This protection was to ensure that public transportation would not be subjected to new acts of violence. At the same time this should ensure that the Community members would be able to effectively use transport and receive supplies on a permanent basis.¹⁴⁷

As noted, the problems of armed attacks during public transport and of confiscation of food were already clear from the Commission's first request for provisional measures, even though it did not ask for measures specifically dealing with those two problems.

In its first request the Commission had also mentioned the involvement of groups accompanying the members of the Community. It had requested the Court to order the State to issue a Presidential Directive expressing the State's support and respect for the national and international organisations accompanying the Community. The Court's Order of 24 November 2000, however, did not contain such a requirement. In its next Order, of 18 June 2002, the Court did require the protection of everyone providing services to the members of the community. This could also encompass the protection of unarmed (international) groups accompanying Community members for their protection.

3.3.3.7 INVESTIGATION AND PROSECUTION

The Commission stressed the importance of acting against impunity, remarking that it was necessary to adopt more effective measures to investigate the serious acts of violence and intimidation committed against members of the Community and to prosecute and punish those responsible, as this was 'an essential part of the process of control and elimination of the violence'. It asked the Court to order the dismissal or suspension those State agents with respect to whom there was serious evidence of complicity with paramilitary groups. It specifically mentioned the need to investigate and punish the members of the 17th Brigade Army as well as the police of Urabá involved in the violent acts. These investigations should take place before courts of ordinary jurisdiction. The investigations under military jurisdiction should be suspended. The Commission also emphasised that in order to ensure the effectiveness of the investigations, they should not be treated in a fragmented way as if they were 83 different acts of violence, but they should be accumulated. This request by the Commission again shows that it has become very precise about the type of protection it would like the Court to order. Nevertheless, as we will see, the Court usually does not order measures as precise as that.

The Court did order Colombia to investigate the facts that had prompted the adoption of the provisional measures, in order to identify those responsible and impose the corresponding sanctions. It also ordered the State to inform the Court about the situation of the beneficiaries of this Order.¹⁴⁸ It neither specified that the investigation and prosecution should take place under ordinary jurisdiction, rather than military, nor that the investigations should be taken together rather than be dealt with in a fragmentary way.

In the context of provisional measures ordering a State to protect persons against death threats and harassment, the Inter-American Commission and Court generally point out in their provisional measures that the State should take effective measures to investigate and punish the ¹⁴⁷ Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order for provisional measures, 18 June 2002, 5th 'Decisional' clause.

¹⁴⁸ IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order of 24 November 2000. According to the English translation Colombia was required 'to inform the people indicated in the above operative paragraphs about this situation'. The Spanish text provides: 'informe sobre la situación de las personas indicadas en los puntos resolutivos anteriores'.

perpetrators, ‘as a key element of its protective duty’.¹⁴⁹ Yet at the stage of provisional measures the Court no longer monitors compliance with this requirement. Instead it reserves this for the merits of the case.¹⁵⁰

In the face of specific death threats the Commission has sometimes been very specific in the protective measures required in this respect. In a case against Brazil it specified in its precautionary measures, among others, that ‘the agents entrusted with protecting the persons threatened by the “Xinguara list”, including Father Ricardo Rezende, be trained in the use of firearms, and that they be adequately armed so as to guarantee effective protection for the persons threatened’ and that ‘the persons responsible be tried and punished’.¹⁵¹ It also requested that ‘if the involvement of the civilian police in the escape of Wanderley Borges de Mendonça is confirmed’, the protection to be provided to one of the beneficiaries should be by a police force other than the civilian police implicated in the escape.¹⁵² Moreover, once it was informed of the name of one of the Civilian Police officers involved in the escape, the Commission noted that the State should also adopt urgent measures to detain, try, and punish him.¹⁵³

3.3.3.8 RESPECT OTHER RIGHTS

For the Court’s provisional measures to have proper effect the conditions of implementation are crucial. The Court itself has indicated the importance of mutual agreement between the beneficiaries and the State on the necessary protective measures. Equally, it has emphasised the importance of keeping the beneficiaries informed and respecting their dignity or the nature of the group, respecting the freedom of movement, information and expression of the beneficiaries and of ensuring that the protective measures do not hinder their normal activities (e.g. as human rights defenders).

In the Peace Community case the Commission had specified its request by stating that the Community members, the petitioners and Colombia must mutually agree on the substance of the protective measures.¹⁵⁴ It had also stressed the importance of considering the compatibility of the protective measures offered by the State with the collective neutrality and humanitarian principles on which the Peace Community was founded.¹⁵⁵

The difference in specificity between the Commission’s and the Court’s approach is also illustrated in the Giraldo Cardona case. In this case many of the members of the Meta Human Rights Civic Committee had been killed, had been forced to flee or otherwise to halt their activities. Eventually there were hardly any members left in Meta. As part of an order for provisional measures the Court pointed out that Colombia had to provide information on the efforts made to reopen this organization’s Office.¹⁵⁶

¹⁴⁹ See e.g. IACHR Giraldo Cardona case (Colombia), Order for provisional measures (on behalf of members of the Civic Human Rights Committee of Meta), 19 June 1998, 4th ‘Decisional’ clause.

¹⁵⁰ See IACHR Cárcel de Urso Branco (Brasil), Order of 2 May 2008, 26th ‘Considering’ clause. See also Asunto de los niños y adolescentes privados de libertad en el “Complejo do Tatuapé” de la Fundação CASA (Brasil), Order of 3 July 2007, 16th ‘Considering’ clause.

¹⁵¹ CIDH Newton Coutinho Mendes et al. v. Brazil, 1 October 1997, §59.

¹⁵² Id., §61.

¹⁵³ Id., §62. See section 5.4 on the more cautious approach by the Court, distinguishing between obligations to act against impunity pending the proceedings and in judgments on reparation.

¹⁵⁴ IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order of 24 November 2000.

¹⁵⁵ Id., 3rd ‘Having seen’ clause.

¹⁵⁶ IACHR Giraldo Cardona, Order of 30 September 1999, 3rd ‘Decisional’ clause.

3.3.4 The obligation of the State and the Inter-American Commission to provide information

Apart from requiring the State to ‘take all measures necessary’ to preserve the lives and physical integrity of the beneficiaries, the Court’s Orders also require the State to inform it on the measures taken. The Court often calls this an ‘urgent communication’ by the State. At certain intervals thereafter, the State is expected to send in follow-up reports. If the full Court has not yet decided on the Commission’s request for provisional measures or their amplification, the President’s Orders require the State to submit its observations on such request. This way, the Court can take into account the views of both parties about the urgency and the risk of irreparable harm.

The Orders of the President and the Court itself are not only addressed to the State but also to the Commission. The Court requires the Commission to present its observations on the State’s urgent communications and follow-up reports. The State and the Commission must send in these reports within certain time limits. After submission of the first report, the Court generally allots them more time for the submission of follow-up reports.¹⁵⁷ States used to send very general information in response to provisional measures. In response to this, the provisional measures ordered in the Inter-American system are now more detailed.

The specific information the Court requires from the State concerns ‘the status of the cases of all the persons protected by the Provisional Measures’ or ‘detailed information concerning the proceedings’ of a specific person. As part of its follow-up the Court urges the State to continue to report, usually every two months, ‘on the status of the appeals and scheduled executions’ of the persons concerned. With regard to the initial report, the precise time limits depend on the proximity of an execution date. The Court also urges the State and the Commission to inform it immediately of ‘any significant developments concerning the circumstances’ of the cases of the beneficiaries. It may summon the parties to a public hearing as well.¹⁵⁸

In his first Order to halt executions the President of the IACHR required the State to inform the Court, by a certain date, on the measures taken in compliance with his Order and to give the Court its views on the provisional measures requested by the Commission.¹⁵⁹ The Court received the State’s observations exactly on the deadline. In these observations it ‘gave the reasons why, in its opinion, the execution of the alleged victims could not be stayed’.¹⁶⁰

In a provisional measure to halt an execution by Trinidad, scheduled early the next morning, the President ordered the State to inform it, that same day, on the measures taken in compliance with the Order. It also required the Commission to present its observations on the urgent communication submitted by the State within two days of its receipt.¹⁶¹ As the execution would take place the next day it is clear why the President wished immediately to receive information on compliance with his Order. In this respect he may have adapted the deadline for the Commission as well, in order to conform more closely to the time limits required of the State. Normally the ¹⁵⁷ Follow-up reports normally are expected every two months and the Commission must comment on them within six weeks of their receipt. See also section 4 of this Chapter (Beneficiaries).

¹⁵⁸ See also Chapter XVIII (Follow-up).

¹⁵⁹ IACHR James, Briggs, Noel, Garcia and Bethel cases, Order of 27 May 1998 (President).

¹⁶⁰ The Court confirmed the President’s urgent measures and not only ordered the State to take all necessary measures to preserve the life and physical integrity of the six persons, but also to submit a report, by the end of the month, on the measures taken in compliance with the Order. It required the Commission to submit its observations on that report within two weeks of its receipt. James, Briggs, Noel, Garcia and Bethel cases, Order of 14 June 1998. As the Court’s session took place from 8 to 19 June, one may assume that there were no indications that Trinidad would proceed with the execution during the first half of that month.

¹⁶¹ IACHR James et al. cases, Order of 29 June 1998 (President).

Commission's deadline is within two weeks of receipt of the State's first report.¹⁶² He required the State to submit an urgent communication by 20 May 1999 on the measures taken to comply with the Court's Order. In fact, its next session would be held from 24 May to 4 June. This may explain why the Court ordered Trinidad to submit an urgent communication within nine days rather than the usual fifteen, as normally required, in cases in which there is no immediate execution date. This way the Court's staff could still process the information in time to be included for discussion during the Court's session. In its communication the Commission also mentioned the fact that the State's denunciation of the Convention would become effective on 26 May 1999. Possibly, the Court wanted to make sure that Trinidad would submit the information before 26 May because it expected a decreasing likelihood of compliance beyond this date.¹⁶³ In fact, Trinidad responded on 19 May 1999 claiming that the provisional measures requested by the Commission concerned matters falling within the reservation Trinidad made in recognising the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court.¹⁶⁴

3.4 Conclusion on the specificity of provisional measures

As the practice of the Inter-American Commission and Court shows, provisional measures must indeed be sufficiently specific, especially in relation to protection against threats.¹⁶⁵ The Commission and Court started with general orders, indicating what should be the end result.¹⁶⁶ Over the years they built up a practice of greater specificity that they now apply generally. The level of specificity is based on previous experiences in the system and with the State in question. Initially the measures must leave room for flexibility, as long as the beneficiaries are consulted about the protective measures. When there is a chain of provisional measures relating to one case, they may become increasingly specific in a follow-up to previous State (in-)action.

Faced with the realities in many countries in the Americas the Inter-American Commission and Court became more resourceful in their ways to deal with evasive State practices. In response to initial abuse by States of their more generally phrased provisional measures they became more specific in their provisional measures. States had informed the Court, for instance, that they had increased police surveillance in the neighbourhood of the beneficiaries of the Court's Order. However, the beneficiaries, rather than feel protected by this measure, became more afraid because the police division involved was in fact closely linked to the paramilitary group posing the threats. In cases involving threats resulting in internal displacement of persons, a State would argue something like: 'well, where they are now they are safe'. This meant that the Commission and Court had to be more precise and require the State to 'enable them to return home and be safe' rather than just 'be safe'.¹⁶⁷

Based on the experiences of the Commission, the Court started to include in its Orders a reference to the obligation of the State to meet with the beneficiaries, their representatives and ¹⁶² On timing see also Chapter II (Systems).

¹⁶³ IACHR James et al. case, Urgent measures of 11 May 1999.

¹⁶⁴ IACHR James et al. case, Order of 25 May 1999. See also Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction).

¹⁶⁵ Already in 1994 Buerghenthal, p. 94, pointed out the importance of specificity, at the same time considering that the 'remedy sought' should also be 'narrow in scope', because 'the broader the request the more difficult it will be for the Commission or the Court to monitor compliance'.

¹⁶⁶ This brings to mind the old distinction between obligations of conduct and result. Sepúlveda (2003), pp. 184-196 discusses these concepts and rightly criticizes the use of this distinction. Clearly in the context of defining human rights obligations it is unhelpful. While it may not create additional difficulties in the context of the specificity of provisional measures, the distinction does not seem to provide great additional value either.

¹⁶⁷ See e.g. the discussion of the Peace Community case in section 3.3.3.

representatives of the Commission in order to agree on specific protective measures that could be agreeable to all parties. The authorities in States such as Guatemala and Colombia have grown accustomed to the directive approach taken in the Court's Orders. In fact generally speaking they do not appear to find fault with this approach, possibly also because the provisional measures concern the most basic of rights: the right to life and the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment. The practice of the Commission and Court in this respect is now well established and is used vis-à-vis other States as well.

Especially when there is a chain of provisional measures relating to one case, it appears that the substance of the Order becomes increasingly specific. Often new Orders confirm and build on agreements made between the Commission, the State and the (representatives of the) beneficiaries.

These specific Orders could include the building of a protective wall between one division of a prison and another in order to prevent violence between the prison wing detaining the paramilitaries and the wing detaining opposing rebels. They could also include the obligation to finance bodyguards for human rights defenders, leaders of indigenous groups, trade unionists or religious leaders who are being threatened and attacked by paramilitary groups. Other examples are the obligation to repair a telephone connection to a remote area where a peace community is located or to install armoured glass in the offices of a human rights organisation. All these measures require the use of resources and at the same time they must be taken on an urgent basis.

Both the Inter-American Commission and the Court have taken an incremental approach, specifying more and more the exact measures required to achieve the necessary protection against death threats and harassment. Their specificity is increased particularly in response to previous State (in-)action. Especially the Commission is now very precise on what it wants a State to do. The Court still makes room for flexibility. By referring, for instance, to the possibility of reporting on alternative measures, it allows the State to take a different approach so long as it does prevent irreparable harm. Moreover, even now, the Court often simply directs the State to reach an agreement with the Commission and the petitioners on the specific measures to be taken.¹⁶⁸ This way it provides pressure and follow-up, but the concrete solution can be prepared by the State, as long as certain conditions are fulfilled. In this respect it has also explicitly referred to the principle of subsidiarity.¹⁶⁹

While the Inter-American Court has not detailed the measures required to the same extent as the Commission, it always requires the State to consult with the representatives of the beneficiaries and of the Commission about the specific protective measures necessary. This way some of the specific measures proposed by the Commission are discussed again during the implementation phase of the provisional measures. After all, the Commission proposed these measures based on the concrete information about and requests by the beneficiaries.¹⁷⁰

¹⁶⁸ Note, however, the scepticism expressed by Judge Cançado Trindade in his individual opinion to IACHR Las penitenciarías de Mendoza v. Argentina, Order of 30 March 2006: with regard to attempts to 'look for a "negotiation" or "conciliation" between the "parties" in a summary proceeding in connection with the extreme gravity and urgency as is the case of provisional measures of protection. The Inter-American Court is not a "conciliation body", and must act as the international court it is, with even more power in cases of provisional measures of protection'), §16, noting that the participants, including the State, agreed on the need for a 'clear and firm order of the Court'.

¹⁶⁹ IACHR Las Penitenciarías de Mendoza (Argentina), President's Order of 22 August 2007 (maintaining the existing provisional measures, but refusing to amplify them), 14th 'Considering' clause.

¹⁷⁰ See also section 5 of this Chapter (Beneficiaries).

Thus, in the Inter-American system the provisional measures have become increasingly specific, partly in light of the experiences of the Commission and Court with certain States.¹⁷¹ In fact they provide insight into the ways States could or must protect persons under their jurisdiction against threats by paramilitary groups or other groups operating with the acquiescence of (certain factions of) the army, the police, or other authorities. They show that protection against threats means that the State must protect the beneficiaries in the area in which they live and work, rather than banishing them to 'safe areas', claiming that this would absolve it from taking protective measures. Providing effective protection against death threats is not divorced from other human rights obligations, which means that States must assist internally displaced persons to return safely and allow human rights defenders or journalists to continue the activities that had triggered the threats in the first place.¹⁷² In other words, the State's obligations vis-à-vis the persons under threat do not just relate to the right to life and the prohibition of torture and ill-treatment (even though this was the reason for asking provisional measures), but also involve respect for the cultural heritage of the persons threatened, their privacy, freedom of movement and expression and their access to basic resources. Moreover, the measures undertaken by the State should enable the beneficiaries to continue their activities as human rights defenders, journalists, etc. and should help protect against internal displacement.

Another specification introduced by the Inter-American Commission and Court is that the State is to report on the specific measures of protection and, as noted, that the representatives of the beneficiaries and the Commission should agree on these measures.¹⁷³ Finally, all provisional measures aiming to protect against death threats and harassment have specified the requirement of investigation and the punishment of those responsible.¹⁷⁴

Often provisional measures indicate the required result, such as to refrain from executing a death sentence or to protect persons against threats. Sometimes they are also more precise as to how the State should achieve this result, or at least they rule out certain activities that do not qualify as compliance.

In the other systems it may be wise to follow the incremental approach taken by the Inter-American Court. The more information adjudicators have, the more precise they can be about the substance of the Orders for provisional measures. Collecting and interpreting information may be assumed to be easier in a regional than in a universal system. Indeed the specific nature of the Inter-American Commission's precautionary measures may also be explained by its range of functions, visiting States, negotiating with governments and petitioners and acting as an intermediary between the petitioners and the Court. In the Inter-American system specific information may relate to the links between paramilitary groups, such as the Colombian self-defence units, and the police, military or other government authorities. It is assumed that international (rather than regional) adjudicators should also incrementally specify their provisional measures, so as to provide clarity to States as to what is expected of them, but they should do so even more gradually. This gradual approach is warranted exactly because of the less cohesive nature of an international as opposed to a regional monitoring system and the diminished possibility of collecting and interpreting information. Another aspect that might play a role is the sensitivity of some States

¹⁷¹ This applies in particular to their provisional measures ordering States such as Guatemala and Colombia to protect persons against death threats and harassment, but see also the increasingly specific precautionary measures by the CIDH in the case of the 'unlawful combatants' at Guantanamo Bay, directed at the US: 12 March 2002, 23 July 2002, 18 March 2003, 29 July 2004 and 28 October 2005.

¹⁷² See Chapter IX (Threats).

¹⁷³ See section 4 of this chapter on the beneficiaries of provisional measures.

¹⁷⁴ See Chapter IX (Threats). See also section 5 of this Chapter, dealing with the relation to reparation.

and the way these States would base their disagreement with certain provisional measures on regional doctrine, or insist on sovereignty over protection of human rights.

In fact States basing their objections on regional doctrine may predominantly be European. The subsidiarity principle, the principle of trust and the margin of appreciation seem rather specific to the European system,¹⁷⁵ although mention has been made of the principle of subsidiarity that 'informs the Inter-American human rights system' as well.¹⁷⁶

It could be argued that the Inter-American system simply is more expansive and specific in its use of provisional measures because the more extreme violations involved require a more extreme response. In the Americas there appears to be a closer link than in Europe between 'situations' and 'cases' and between collectivities and individuals. In addition, in relation to states of emergency some of the States most often addressed with provisional measures are disrupted anyway. A case in point is Colombia which, with regard to certain areas and in some respects, almost is a failing State. Yet it should be added, on the one hand, that Colombia, for instance, is an established constitutional democracy (with a functioning judicial system including a rather liberal constitutional court) and on the other hand that many European States currently appear to require specific explanations as well on what measures they should take to implement the provisional measures of the ECtHR. This applies not just to the new member States of the Council of Europe, but also to States that have considerable experience with the Strasbourg system. After all, for provisional measures to serve their purpose, the primary concern should be the prevention of irreparable harm to persons. The right to life and the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment may be compromised in the context of the concerted activities against immigration and the so-called 'war on terror'. To the extent these activities lead to a greater tendency to evade the purpose of generally phrased provisional measures, an increased specificity of their terms would be warranted.¹⁷⁷

The discussion on subsidiarity (and on the related margin of appreciation in the interpretation of treaty obligations) is more important in some systems than in others and plays out differently in each system.¹⁷⁸ In fact the theory of margin of appreciation and, to some extent, that of subsidiarity has been invoked mainly in the European system.¹⁷⁹ According to staff at the Secretariat of the Inter-American Commission the theory of obligation of conduct and result equally is more European. European States may be more sensitive to being allowed the flexibility to determine how they will protect persons. Nevertheless, this may be relevant with regard to provisional measures that are leaning more closely towards the outer limits of the concept. Especially with regard to core rights the provisional measures taken by the other human rights adjudicators should at least give some direction of what the State is expected to do or to abstain from in order to prevent irreparable harm to persons.¹⁸⁰

¹⁷⁵ In the Inter-American system the Commission and Court may be more directive without risking negative State responses. Still, they were not directive from the start.

¹⁷⁶ IACHR Las Penitenciarías de Mendoza (Argentina), President's Order of 22 August 2007 (maintaining the existing provisional measures, but refusing to amplify them), 14th 'Considering' clause.

¹⁷⁷ See also Chapter XVII (Official responses) and XVIII (Follow up).

¹⁷⁸ See e.g. Carozza (2003) and Petzold (1993).

¹⁷⁹ Carozza (2003) argues that the principle of subsidiarity applies both internationally and regionally and is not limited to the European system. The President of the IACHR appears to agree: IACHR Las Penitenciarías de Mendoza (Argentina), President's Order of 22 August 2007 (maintaining the existing provisional measures, but refusing to amplify them), 14th 'Considering' clause.

¹⁸⁰ More in general there appears to be a tendency in the European system now as well to make decisions more specific, allowing the State to have more clarity of what changes are required

4 THE BENEFICIARIES AND ADDRESSEES OF PROVISIONAL MEASURES

4.1 Introduction

Beneficiaries of provisional measures are individuals or groups whose immediate protection is the direct concern of the adjudicator. In that sense they always involve persons or groups in a vulnerable position vis-à-vis those in power. In this book beneficiaries are dealt with as rights-bearers, not as objects of charity.

In Alemán Lacayo (1996) the Inter-American Court initially ordered provisional measures, but subsequently it heeded to the Commission's request to lift them, because the beneficiary had become the president of Nicaragua. This made it 'inappropriate for an international body to adopt provisional measures to be instituted by a government on behalf of its own Head of State'.¹⁸¹ It is interesting to see how subsequently the Commission used precautionary measures, to be implemented by the State, represented by President Aleman, to protect persons against threats that they claimed originated from the President.¹⁸² Here over time a transformation took place from beneficiary to addressee of provisional (precautionary) measures. While this section focuses on the (group of) beneficiaries of provisional measures, it will also briefly deal with the addressees of these measures. This is an issue that may play out differently in the various systems. The ICJ as an inter-State adjudicator obviously has to take into account the interests of the addressee State as well as the complaining state, in the formulation of its provisional measures. The human rights systems are vertical systems, involving an individual or group on the one hand and a State party to a human rights treaty on the other. Do the human rights adjudicators also take into account the interests of the addressee States in their use of provisional measures?

Under the Dayton Peace accord the complaints before the Bosnia Chamber could be brought against three different state entities (Bosnia Herzegovina as a whole and the constituent States Bosnia en Republika Srpska). In addition, there are some systems in which provisional measures have addressed others than the respondent States. The Inter-American Court addresses the Inter-American Commission to negotiate with representatives of the State and the beneficiaries and report back to the Court on the implementation of the provisional measures, within certain time limits. In the European system the rule on provisional measures has occasionally been invoked to address the petitioner. These issues are discussed in this section.

An aspect of provisional measures that can be found already in provisional measures ordered by ITLOS and the ICJ, is the awareness of an overarching general interest to be protected. For ITLOS the protection of the (marine) environment is such a general interest and for the ICJ, for instance, the prevention of extension or aggravation of the dispute. While taken in response to a request by a party to the conflict, here one may speak of protection of the general interest, next to the specific interests of the States in question.

Both in the border conflicts, in which the ICJ paid attention to the population of a border area, and in cases brought before the ICJ explicitly invoking human rights, the Court appeared to have in mind a large, definite group of beneficiaries, but without names of individuals being domestically, see e.g. Response by President Wildhaber to a remark by a representative of the Irish Human Rights Commission, Minutes of meeting between Court and organisations representing applicants and/or intervening as third parties, 10 April 2006, Strasbourg, p. 3, <<http://unionedirittiumani.it/AutoGest/NewsFiles/incontro%20Corte%20ONG.pdf>>. This could be the result of an incremental development in the attitude of the ECtHR as well, both as it is more frequently dealing with situations involving gross human rights violations and because States generally appear to prefer greater precision in what is required of them.

¹⁸¹ IACHR Alemán Lacayo (Nicaragua), Order of 6 February 1997, 3rd 'Considering' clause.

¹⁸² CIDH Annual report 1999, Chapter 3., C.1, §46.

listed.¹⁸³ From the human rights adjudicators it is in particular the Inter-American Court that has struggled with the level of specificity of the group of beneficiaries that is required for the use of provisional measures.

Preventing irreparable harm to persons may include preventing harm to the alleged victim (and to the rights claimed) as well as to persons other than the alleged victim. In the latter case provisional measures may relate to the integrity of the proceedings on the one hand and on the other hand to the right to life and dignity of the other persons, such as witnesses, family or counsel.¹⁸⁴

Awareness of the role of the beneficiaries of provisional measures is particularly relevant in the context of adjudication in which the petitioner and the alleged victim are not the same. The beneficiary of the provisional measure does not always coincide with the alleged victim. Instead the beneficiary may be a witness in the case of the alleged victim, receiving threats. In both cases it is necessary to establish whether the beneficiaries indeed wish a certain provisional measure to be taken.

Even if a de iure representation is not necessary, it is still important to establish whether the petitioners substantively represent the persons on whose behalf they claim to be acting. When the petitioner is one of the alleged victims, claiming to represent a large group, it is important to find out whether this claim is justified. With regard to representation of the beneficiaries this section addresses in particular the issue of representation of indigenous peoples.

A related issue is that of consultation. Consultation is important in order to establish that the beneficiaries really want the provisional measures requested. In this light the question arises not only whether the NGO¹⁸⁵ consulted the beneficiaries before it requested provisional measures, but also whether the adjudicator consulted with the beneficiaries when drafting its provisional measures and whether the State consulted with them in its implementation of these measures.¹⁸⁶

Apart from the issues of representation and consultation, this section deals with the issue of individualisation. Sometimes provisional measures aim to protect large groups of persons, where no names can be provided for each and every individual beneficiary. It is not always clear whether they must be individualised, what are the advantages and risks of providing the names of the beneficiaries and what is the approach of adjudicators towards actio popularis.

4.2 The relation between beneficiaries, petitioners and addressees

4.2.1 Petitioners and victims

It has been noted that in light of the emergence of erga omnes obligations the human being is the ultimate subject of the rights of protection, the so called titulaire.¹⁸⁷ The procedural rules with ¹⁸³ See Chapter I.

¹⁸⁴ See also Chapter IX (Threats).

¹⁸⁵ See section 4.2 on NGOs as petitioners in the Inter-American and African systems, where there is no 'victim requirement'.

¹⁸⁶ In addition, the criterion of consultation seems to play a role in the decision making on the use of provisional measures by at least one adjudicator to the extent that when indigenous peoples have been consulted domestically regarding industrial developments the HRC seems less likely to use provisional measures, see further Chapter X (Protecting (indigenous) cultural and religious rights).

¹⁸⁷ See IACHR Blake v. Guatemala, Judgment on reparations of 22 January 1999, Separate Opinion Judge Cançado Trindade, §29. In its Order of 18 June 2002 in the Peace Community case the Inter-American Court discussed the issue of erga omnes obligations of protection. State Parties have the obligation, erga omnes, to provide protection to everyone under their jurisdiction in regard to the submission of petitions in general are important in order to understand the specific practices of the adjudicators with regard to provisional measures. In the international systems of the UN treaty bodies and in the European system the so-called ‘victim requirement’ applies, meaning that the petitioner must be the alleged victim of the violation claimed. This is different in the Inter-American and African systems. NGOs that are not themselves the victims of the violations claimed may submit petitions in these systems. Their ‘actio popularis’ standing can be inferred from the respective treaty provisions that do not refer to any victim requirement. Article 44 of the American Convention (ACHR) stipulates:

“Any person or group of persons, or any nongovernmental entity legally recognised in one or more member states of the Organization, may lodge petitions with the Commission containing denunciations or complaints of violation of this Convention by a State Party”.

Article 55 of the African Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights (ACHPR) speaks of ‘communications other than those of States parties’, which has been interpreted to mean that individuals and organizations may communicate to the African Commission alleging that a State party has violated one or more of the rights in the Charter. Article 5 Protocol to the ACHPR on the establishment of an African Court on Human and Peoples’ Rights (1998) entitles the African Commission and the States involved to submit cases to the Court. It adds, however, that ‘the Court may entitle relevant Non Governmental organizations (NGOs) with observer status before the Commission, and individuals to institute cases directly before it, in accordance with article 34 (6) of this Protocol’.¹⁸⁸ With regard to accepting representatives of an NGO or individuals without legal qualifications it has been noted that the African Court ‘should display flexibility in order to take account of the lack of material resources from which a sizeable portion of the populations of the African continent still suffers. This solution would also enable the Court to avoid being burdened with requests for free legal aid, which possibility is provided for by the Protocol’.¹⁸⁹ Art 30 of the Protocol on the African Court of Justice and Human Rights (2008) refers to ‘relevant Non-Governmental Organizations accredited to the African Union or to its organs’.

order to effectively guarantee the rights set forth in the Convention. According to the Court, the State has this obligation not only with regard to direct threats by official functionaries but also in relation to acts perpetrated by third parties, including irregular armed groups. It observed that, because of the special characteristics of the case and the overall conditions of the armed conflict in Colombia, and in light of the Convention and international humanitarian law, it was necessary to extend the protection of the right to life and personal integrity through the use of provisional measures. This extension was necessary to protect not only all members of the Peace Community but also those people who were connected to this Community by way of the services they provided. IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order for provisional measures, 18 June 2002. A few years before, in 2000, the State’s representatives had acknowledged the important antecedents of international law upholding the provisional measures as well as their collective nature. IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order for provisional measures, 24 November 2000. In the original text: ‘Estas medidas adoptadas con su carácter colectivo, están sustentadas en importantes antecedentes del derecho internacional’. On the official responses by States see Chapter XVII.

¹⁸⁸ Article 34(6) stipulates: “At the time of the ratification of this Protocol or any time thereafter, the State shall make a declaration accepting the competence of the Court to receive cases under article 5 (3) of this Protocol. The Court shall not receive any petition under article 5 (3) involving a State Party which has not made such a declaration”.

¹⁸⁹ Ouguergouz (2003), p. 737. This reference to free legal aid was not meant to apply as of right, but as an option for the Court, if it ‘were to be given the budgetary resources required’, p. 738.

4.2.2 Individuals or groups

Another issue that arises is whether only individuals or also groups can submit a petition. Before the HRC generally only individuals can do so.¹⁹⁰ The same applies to CAT.¹⁹¹ NGOs cannot bring a claim, unless each member submits such a claim on a personal basis. Under Article 14 ICERD and Article 2 Protocol to the CEDAW there is a possibility to bring a complaint on behalf of a group of individuals as well. Under Article 34 ECHR the ECtHR may deal not just with petitions by individuals, but also by groups of individuals or by NGOs, as long as they themselves claim to be the victim of a violation of any of the rights in the Convention. The Inter-American Commission and Court and the African Commission have all accepted claims involving groups of alleged victims as well as individual victims. As noted, these petitions are being brought either by the alleged victims or by petitioners who are not themselves the alleged victims.

In the Blake case (Guatemala)¹⁹² the Inter-American Court draws attention to a related matter, stressing the authority of the Commission to refer proprio motu to an additional deceased victim, if his family members show no interest. The Court regretted that the Commission had failed to make use of this authority in this case. It observed that ‘there were two people who disappeared in the same circumstances, Mr. Nicholas Blake and Mr. Griffith Davis’.

“Given that the remains of two people were found and that those of Mr. Griffith Davis were identified before Mr. Nicholas Blake’s, the Court is surprised that the Commission did not use its authority to include Mr. Griffith Davis as an alleged victim in the application. Moreover, at the public hearing held before this Court on April 17, 1997, the Commission, in reply to a question from Judge Cançado Trindade, merely declared that Mr. Griffith Davis’ relatives had not shown any interest in bringing an action before the Commission. Since the Commission did not use the authority established in Article 26(2) of its Rules of Procedure which enabled it to act motu proprio on the basis of any available information, even without an explicit petition by Mr. Griffith Davis’ relatives, the Court concludes that it may rule only on the events that occurred in connection with Mr. Nicholas Blake”.¹⁹³

Yet another issue relates to representation. Before the HRC a petitioner may only submit a claim on behalf of a victim when the victim is a family member who has been disappeared, detained incommunicado or killed.¹⁹⁴ The Rules of Procedure of CEDAW are a little less strict. Under Art. 2 of the Optional Protocol the CEDAW may examine petitions without explicit consent by the alleged victim, if the petitioner can justify this.¹⁹⁵ Its Rule 68 specifies that the petitioner should provide her reasons for this in writing. There is no mention of an obligation that the author of the petition must have a family relationship with the alleged victim(s).

¹⁹⁰ The HRC can examine a complaint by a group if the individuals involved are similarly situated and the petitioner properly represents them. See e.g. D.F. v. Sweden, 26 March 1998 (inadm.). As noted, in cases involving indigenous culture the HRC has taken provisional measures on behalf of groups, see e.g. Bernard Ominayak, Chief of the Lubicon Lake Band v. Canada, 26 March 1990.

¹⁹¹ See Article 22(1) ICAT: ‘from or on behalf of individuals’.

¹⁹² Certain witnesses in this case were the beneficiaries of provisional measures.

¹⁹³ IACHR Blake case (Guatemala), Judgment of 24 January 1998, §85.

¹⁹⁴ See e.g. the examples in Zwart (1994), pp. 72-77 and McGoldrick (1994), pp.170-172. Under the Rules of Procedure of ICERD and ICAT, family members can also submit a complaint on behalf of victims. For an interpretation by CAT see e.g. B.M’.B v. Tunisia, 5 May 1994 (inadm.).

¹⁹⁵ This Article points out that when a petition ‘is submitted on behalf of individuals or groups of individuals this shall be with their consent unless the author can justify acting on their behalf without such consent’.

As noted, in the Inter-American and African systems NGOs have a specific role.¹⁹⁶ They can be the petitioners in cases without having to fulfil the victim requirement necessary for the UN treaties and the ECHR. Without this it is likely that the majority of cases that have in fact been brought before the African and Inter-American Commissions would not have been brought. Without the ability to bring individual petitions, regional or international NGOs can assist individuals and groups that are being harassed and may have difficulty accessing the adjudicators on their own. This way these regional and international NGOs are able to perform their function of helping protect members of local NGOs, especially human rights defenders.¹⁹⁷ Thus petitioners are often NGOs representing the victim, rather than the victims themselves. Especially useful is the fact that, in the Inter-American system, for an NGO to be accepted as a petitioner, it needs to be recognised in just one OAS Member State.¹⁹⁸

In the Inter-American human rights system the Center for Justice and International Law (CEJIL) is the petitioner in a great majority of cases.¹⁹⁹ The downside obviously is that the position of one NGO may become too dominant. No matter the quality and sincerity of such organization, it is generally preferable for victims to be able to choose among a number of NGOs to effectively represent them. In addition transparency and media interest is particularly important to help counter any complacency that might otherwise occur.

A more specific question is who has standing to request the Inter-American Commission or Court to take provisional measures. In general, the petitioners request the Commission to take precautionary measures. In cases still pending before the Commission, it is the Commission that requests the Court to order provisional measures.²⁰⁰ It appears, however, that in freedom of speech cases, the OAS Special Rapporteur for Freedom of Expression and the journalists' organisations funding his Office are actively involved as well.²⁰¹

The Inter-American Commission and Court may also take urgent action proprio motu.²⁰² In the Constitutional Court case against Peru, that was pending before the Court rather than the Commission, the President indeed adopted urgent measures that were not requested by the Commission.²⁰³ He did this ex officio after one of the alleged victims sent information to the Court.²⁰⁴

¹⁹⁶ See also, e.g. Grossman (1992), pp. 363-389.

¹⁹⁷ The importance of the protection of human rights defenders is further emphasized in the more recent UN principles on the protection of human rights defenders. See further Chapter IX (Protecting against death threats and harassment). About the Declaration see Hallo de Wolf (2002).

¹⁹⁸ In general on the evolving status of NGOs in international law, see e.g. Kamminga (20020, pp. 387-406.

¹⁹⁹ CEJIL has several offices including its headquarters in Washington D.C., the seat of the Commission, and an office in San José, Costa Rica, the seat of the Court. Through its proximity to both the Commission and the Court it is able to attend hearings and maintain a close relationship with the Secretariats of both bodies. Hence, individual victims and local human rights groups very often depend on CEJIL to bring individual complaints before the Commission.

²⁰⁰ See Chapter II (Systems).

²⁰¹ See the report of the Office of the Special Rapporteur attached to the CIDH Annual Reports.

²⁰² See Chapter II (Systems).

²⁰³ IACHR Constitutional Court (Peru), Urgent measures of 7 April 2000 (President).

²⁰⁴ "4. That, from these provisions [Art. 63(2) ACHR and Rules 25(1) and (4)], it is evident that the Court, or, when appropriate, its President, may act de oficio in cases of extreme gravity and urgency to avoid irreparable damage to persons. The Court has already done so previously (Order of January 15, 1988, Provisional Measures in the Velásquez Rodríguez, Fairén Garbí and Solís Corrales, and Godínez Cruz cases, fourth and fifth preambular paragraphs). As the Court is not sitting, the President is authorized to adopt urgent measures de oficio in such cases of extreme gravity and urgency to avoid irreparable damages to persons". IACHR Constitutional Court

Later, during the hearing, the Commission backed up this request. The full Court confirmed the President's urgent measure as an official provisional measure.²⁰⁵

In the summer of 2001 the Inter-American Commission requested the Inter-American Court to interpret its Rules of Procedure specifically with regard to provisional measures and the role of the victims before the Court.²⁰⁶ Pursuant to Article 63(2) ACHR and Articles 23(1) and 25 of the Court's Rules of Procedure the Court decided the following:

"1. The Court will admit and hear autonomous requests, arguments, and evidence from the beneficiaries of provisional measures which it adopts in cases where the application has been presented before it; this will however, not exempt the Commission from its obligation under the Convention to provide the Court, at its request, with all the relevant information. 2. Only the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights is authorised to provide information to the Inter-American Court of Human Rights during the processing of measures ordered by the Court in cases where no application is pending before it".²⁰⁷

Subsequently the Court included the following in Article 25 of its Rules of Procedure: "In contentious cases already submitted to the Court, the victims or alleged victims, their next of kin, or their duly accredited representatives, may present a request for provisional measures directly to the Court".²⁰⁸ It also added a new Article 23 to the effect that '(w)hen the application has been admitted, the alleged victims, their next of kin or their duly accredited representatives may submit their pleadings, motions and evidence, autonomously, throughout the proceeding'.²⁰⁹ This constitutes a general norm applicable both to ordinary proceedings in contentious cases and to provisional measures. It affords victims the opportunity to autonomously submit their requests, arguments and evidence once the Court has admitted the application.

The beneficiaries in cases that are pending before the Commission still cannot go directly to Court to request provisional measures or a change in provisional measures already ordered. They need to convince the Commission to approach the Court on their behalf.²¹⁰ The beneficiaries of provisional measures in cases that are already before the Court, on the other hand, may now approach the Court themselves.

(Peru), Urgent measures of 7 April 2000 (President). He did so after consultation with all the other judges.

²⁰⁵ IACHR Constitutional Court (Peru), Order of 14 August 2000.

²⁰⁶ The Commission requested this in its submissions of 16 and 26 July and 1 and 9 August 2001, in relation to the Court's provisional measures in the cases of Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic, Digna Ochoa and Placido et al., Colotenango and Bámaca Velásquez.

²⁰⁷ IACHR Order on the issue of provisional measures, 29 August 2001.

²⁰⁸ Rules of Procedure approved by the Court during its XLIX Ordinary Period of Sessions, held from 16 to 25 November 2000, and partially reformed by the Court during its LXI Ordinary Period of Sessions, held from 20 November to 4 December 2003.

²⁰⁹ Rules of Procedure approved by the Court during its XLIX Ordinary Period of Sessions, held from 16 to 25 November 2000, and partially reformed by the Court during its LXI Ordinary Period of Sessions, held from 20 November to 4 December 2003.

²¹⁰ Judge Cançado Trindade has proposed an amendment to Art. 61(1) ACHR to the effect that with regard to a case not yet submitted to its consideration, the Court may order provisional measures not only at the request of the Commission, but also of the alleged potential victims. IACHR Matter of the persons imprisoned in the "Dr. Sebastião Martins Silveira" Penitentiary in Araraquara, São Paulo (Brazil), Order of 30 September 2006, Separate Opinion Judge Cançado Trindade, §31.

4.2.3 Addressees

The issue of the addressees of the provisional measures ordered by the adjudicators also deserves attention. As a general rule the addressees are the States against which a petition has been filed, but in the context of the provisional measures by the Bosnia Chamber the addressees are also (and more often) the constituent entities Republika Srpska and Fed. BiH, rather than just the State of BiH. The ECtHR has sometimes addressed more than one State party with a request to take provisional measures.²¹¹

The HRC generally addresses the State channelled through its diplomatic mission in Geneva, but in light of certain negative experiences in this regard it has also (informally) sent the information on its decision to take provisional measures to a government minister, prison warden or the judiciary.²¹² The ECtHR has equally been known to send its messages directly to the Agent for the Government at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and only copied them to the permanent representative in Strasbourg. Similarly the Inter-American Commission has sometimes directed itself not only to the US but also to the Governors of constituent states, as it did in 1993 when it approached the Governor of Texas in order to halt the execution of Gary Graham, aka Shaka Sankofa.²¹³ Obviously this must be seen as extra step in order to assist a State with a federal system in the implementation of its obligations. Article 29 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties stipulates that a treaty is binding upon each party in respect of its entire territory and this applies to the OAS Charter as well, meaning that a State is also responsible for its constituent parts (such as states making up a federation).²¹⁴

In the Inter-American system one can speak of the Inter-American Commission as a secondary addressee of the Court's provisional measures in the sense that the Inter-American Court orders it to monitor compliance and to send its observations to the Court within a certain time period.

Moreover, as discussed, the Inter-American Commission and Court often specify to some extent the measures required, including references to the need to contact different (regional) branches of government.²¹⁵

The Inter-American Commission has more flexibility than the Court in its decision-making with regard to urgent cases. It may even take some action vis-à-vis groups that are not the addressees proper of its precautionary measures. Faced with extreme human rights violations by insurgents and other non-state actors, it issues press releases condemning their acts and pointing

²¹¹ See e.g. ECtHR Shamayev and 12 others v. Georgia and Russia, 1 July 2003 (provisional measure of 4 October 2002 addressed to Georgia and of 17 June 2003 addressed to Russia).

²¹² For these negative experiences see also Chapter II (Systems).

²¹³ CIDH Gary T. Graham, now known as Shaka Sankofa v. US, 15 June 2000 (adm.). This was not only so in October 1993 but already in April, when the Commission sent its first note to the Governor requesting a stay. On this case see also Chapter III (Halting executions) and Chapter XVII (Official responses).

²¹⁴ As confirmed also by the US, see e.g. ICJ Request for interpretation of the Judgment of 31 March 2004 in the case concerning Avena and other Mexican nationals (Mexico v. US), Order for provisional measures of 16 July 2008, §42.

²¹⁵ The ICJ has also pointed out the obligations of the Addressee by specifying that the Respondent State should transmit the Court's order to its constituent parts, such as the Governor of Arizona in LaGrand. ICJ LaGrand case (Germany v. US), Order of 3 March 1999, §28.

out their obligation to respect humanitarian law.²¹⁶ Its precautionary measures proper, however, are addressed to OAS member States only.

4.2.4 The petitioner as addressee

The European Court has pointed out: “In most cases, measures are indicated to the respondent Government, although there is nothing to stop the Court from indicating measures to applicants”.²¹⁷

In this respect it has adopted the approach of the former European Commission. In Altun v. Germany (1983) the European Commission had taken provisional measures to halt the extradition of the petitioner, but also informed the petitioner himself ‘in accordance with Rule 36 of the Rules of Procedure, that it was desirable in the interests of the parties and the normal conduct of the proceedings that, if he was released, he should remain at the disposal of the German authorities pending the decision which the Commission might make at its session commencing 2 May 1983’.²¹⁸ In other words Germany could not keep him in detention any longer without breaking its domestic laws; hence the Commission’s ‘indication’ for the petitioner not to abscond. The petitioner did not and reported to the police as required. Subsequently the Commission was convinced by the State that a provisional measure to halt his extradition was no longer necessary given certain assurances offered by the requesting State. At the start of a court hearing on his extradition the petitioner killed himself.²¹⁹

The petitioner has also been addressed as part of a decision based on the rule on provisional measures in order to stop a hunger strike.²²⁰ In the context of complaints about detention situations or lack of access to medical treatment in detention, petitioners have requested provisional ²¹⁶ An example is: CIDH press release ‘IACHR urges the FARC to free Corporal José Norberto Pérez’, 31/01, 3 December 2001, appealing to FARC to free this corporal for humanitarian reasons so that his son, who was in a very advanced stage of cancer, could still see him.

²¹⁷ ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §105 the Court referred to Ilaşcu and others v. Moldova and Russia, 8 July 2004, §11 (“On 15 January 2004 the President decided to urge Mr Ivanțoc under Rule 39 to call off his hunger strike. On 24 January 2004 Mr Ivanțoc’s representative informed the Court that his client had ended his hunger strike on 15 January 2004”). In this case a provisional measure was addressed to the State first, see §10 (“On 12 January 2004 the President of the Grand Chamber decided to invite the respondent Governments under Rule 39 to take all necessary steps to ensure that Mr Ivanțoc, who had been on hunger strike since 28 December 2003, was detained in conditions which were consistent with respect for his rights under the Convention. The parties were invited, in accordance with Rule 24 §2 (a), to provide information about the implementation of the interim measures requested. Mr Ivanțoc’s representative, Mr V. Gribincea, and the Moldovan Government provided the Court with the information requested in letters dated 24 and 26 January 2004 respectively”). See also Chapter VII (Detention), section 2.5.4 (Protecting detainees on a hunger strike) and Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk), section 3.2.5 on health in detention and assessment of risk.

²¹⁸ EComHR Altun v. Germany, 3 May 1983 (adm.), §8.

²¹⁹ See also Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk), section 3.3.

²²⁰ See e.g. EComHR S., R., A. and C. v. Portugal, 15 March 1984 (inadm.); Vakalis v. Greece (petitioner was in deteriorating health resulting from hunger strike; the provisional measure of 3 April 1992 did not aim for his release, but indeed aimed at addressing the situation, it was directed to the petitioner as well as to the State), 15 January 1993 (struck from the role upon release) and Ilijkov v. Bulgaria (complaint about continued pre-trial detention and the conditions in which he was force-fed; provisional measure of 20 October 1997 only to the petitioner to stop his hunger strike; Article 31 Report of 29 October 1998; Judgment of 26 July 2001). See also the aforementioned ECtHR Ilaşcu and others v. Moldova and Russia, 8 July 2004, §11 and Rodić et al. v. Bosnia and Herzegovina, 27 May 2008. See further Zwart (1994), p. 34.

measures. In some cases this request boomeranged and the petitioner himself was addressed by the Commission or Court and advised to put a stop to his hunger strike. This has been interpreted as a condition for the further examination of the case.²²¹ On the one hand, it makes sense for adjudicators to suggest to petitioners that if they choose recourse to an international adjudicator, and this adjudicator intervenes urgently in order to ensure that no irreparable harm occurs, they should not continue their hunger strike in the meantime. On the other hand, in my view it is not appropriate to suggest to the petitioner that stopping this hunger strike is a prerequisite for examining the case and that he, rather than the State, should apply provisional measures.²²² Given the difference in what is at stake, as well as the more vulnerable procedural position of the petitioner, the practice developed by the European Commission and apparently accepted by the Court is puzzling.²²³

The reason why this practice was introduced in the European system, but not in the other systems, may be that in the European system the text of the Rule on provisional measures is different, referring to the interests of the parties and the proceedings, rather than the prevention of irreparable harm to persons. Yet in practice the European Court also applies the criterion of preventing irreparable harm.

Of course de facto a hunger strike often results in irreparable harm as well and, as noted, an adjudicator may have good reason to indicate to the petitioner that apart from using provisional measures addressed to the State in order to improve his detention situation, etc., it is also requesting the petitioner to put a stop to his hunger strike so that the case could be properly examined and concluded.²²⁴ Yet it does not seem appropriate to do this on the basis of the rule on provisional measures. Instead the Court could refer to the duty to cooperate, which includes taking 'such action within their power as the Court considers necessary for the appropriate administration of justice' (Rule 44A ECtHR Rules of Court). In case of failure to comply with an order of the Court concerning the conduct of the proceedings the President of the Chamber may take any steps he or she considers appropriate (Rule 44B). Where a party fails to participate effectively in the proceedings, the Court may draw such inferences as it deems appropriate (Rule 44C).

²²¹ See Zwart (1994), p. 34.

²²² Yet the Court uses the term 'invites' in this context. See ECtHR Rodić et al. v. Bosnia and Herzegovina, 27 May 2008, §4 where on 24 June one of the petitioners and on 29 June 2005 the other three were 'invited' under Rule 39 to end their hunger strike; they did so on 1 July 2005; on 13 September 2005 the case was granted priority under Rule 41. There have also been cases in which petitioners were on hunger strike but the Court did not use a provisional measure against them nor against the State, see ECtHR Lorsé et al. v. the Netherlands, initial application, 19 November 1999, request for provisional measures (cover page and p. 16, referring to a hunger strike since 15 November 1996 (on file with the author). Only the partial inadm. decision refers to the hunger strike, in the description of the facts, referring to 17 rather than 15 November. For the judgment on the merits see Lorsé et al. v. the Netherlands, 4 February 2003. With regard to the Bosnia Chamber the Berg Handbook (1999), p. 10 notes that the Chamber's Rule 36 on provisional measures may also be applied on the Chamber's own motion. It then adds that an 'injunction could also be issued against an applicant'. It does not give examples in which the Chamber had done so. It is not clear whether the Chamber formally decided that it could do so, or whether the author of the handbook, legal secretary of the ECtHR and legal officer of the former European Commission, has assumed this based on the fact that the Chamber has taken over many rules and practices of the Strasbourg bodies. In a footnote the Handbook refers to the practice of the former European Commission to recommend petitioners to stop their hunger strike.

²²³ See also, e.g., Rieter (2007), p. 974.

²²⁴ See e.g. EComHR Bhuyian v. Sweden, 14 September 1995 (inadm.). Request of 14 September 1995 to stop hunger strike and suicide attempts pending the case, but also to the State to provisionally suspend the expulsion.

The procedural responsibility of the petitioner may play a role in the decision-making on the use of provisional measures. The petitioners' negligence may have consequences for the progress of the case.²²⁵ If the beneficiaries differ from the petitioners, the petitioners have the responsibility to consult them and obtain their cooperation. In the Inter-American system petitioners in cases already pending before the Court have now procedural responsibility because they deal directly with the Court without the Commission serving as an intermediary. If potential beneficiaries contact the Court in the context of a case pending before it and they are not the petitioners and not even the alleged victims, these beneficiaries have now acquired procedural rights as well, with the consequent responsibilities. Yet this does not mean that the Court's provisional measures could be directed at them. Indeed the Inter-American Commission and Court have never done so. At most they could request information or other forms of cooperation (such as postponing a hunger strike) so that they could perform their function by ordering provisional measures that would indeed have a chance to prevent irreparable harm to persons.

4.2.5 Rights of addressees

As discussed with regard to the inter-State cases dealt with by the ICJ, that Court's Orders for provisional measures often are less far reaching than the original request by (one of) the parties and the ICJ often takes into account the rights of the respondent as well.²²⁶ While this applies more to inter-State cases not involving the rights of individuals, the statement that, given the interests of the addressee State, provisional measures should not accomplish more than necessary to prevent the irreparable harm,²²⁷ appears to hold true for provisional measures by the human rights adjudicators as well. While the main criterion is the protection against irreparable harm, meaning that the means to be chosen must be truly protective against such harm, if there are several options to achieve this, the option that is least invasive to the general interest should be chosen.

Sometimes adjudicators have been very accommodating to the State. In Länsmän II the HRC used provisional measures before it declared the case admissible, but it almost invited the State to object by suggesting the possibility that it would reconsider its use of provisional meas-²²⁵ See e.g. ECtHR Hun v. Turkey, 10 November 2005 (struck out). The petitioner had been invited under Rule 39 to respect its provisional measures in that she was to provide a medical report ordered by the committee of experts appointed by the ECtHR. She had responded that she had been unable to obtain this because of administrative difficulties, §35. Nevertheless, since then the petitioner had still failed to provide these reports and the Court was not convinced of these difficulties. It noted that she had not attempted to obtain the documents from another hospital either and that the government's explanations were more convincing. Moreover, it commended the exemplary cooperation of the State with the Court's provisional measures in this context (noting that even in this case, where at some point the petitioner had been arrested despite the Court's provisional measures to the State to halt her re-imprisonment, she had been released at once when the authorities realized their mistake, see also §§23-24), contrasting this with the failure of the petitioner to do the same, §§36 and 37. To be sure, the petitioner had initially complied with the provisional measures directed to her, by presenting herself for examination by the medical expert mission appointed by the ECtHR. Yet these experts had recommended a neurological examination before they could examine her condition. When almost 7 months later the Court had still not received the report requested of such examination, it decided to lift the provisional measures directed to the State halting her re-imprisonment. This withdrawal (as well as the subsequent striking out of the case) appears to be a reasonable response to the petitioner's procedural attitude.

²²⁶ See Chapter I (ICJ).

²²⁷ See e.g. Merrills (1995), p. 100.

ures if the State party disagreed.²²⁸ This was a new approach to the presentation of its provisional measures.²²⁹ CAT even has included in its Rules a specific reference to the possibility for the State to request withdrawal of the provisional measures.²³⁰ It is to be expected, however, that States disagreeing with the use of provisional measures in a given case would protest their use in any case, also without invitation. CAT has observed ‘that its procedures are sufficiently flexible and its powers sufficiently broad to prevent an abuse of process in a particular case’, which would protect the rights of the addressee States as well.²³¹

States have sometimes argued that their rights should be protected beyond ensuring procedural fairness, by stating that the rights and interests of the parties should be balanced, invoking principles such as ‘balance of convenience’.²³²

Yet as further discussed in the Conclusion to Part II international human rights adjudicators generally take provisional measures in only a very limited range of cases involving rights that are

²²⁸ HRC Jouni E. Länsman et al. v. Finland, 30 October 1996 (initial submission of 28 August 1995, Rule 86/91 of 15 November 1995); decision of 14 March 1996 to set aside its provisional measures (together with admissibility declaration).

²²⁹ Apart from referring to the possibility of reconsideration already in the Note Verbale, with the provisional measure, sent to the State or even already in the Rules of Procedure, there are also other ways to accommodate the State. In the same Länsman II case, in early December 1995 the petitioners informed the HRC, by urgent message, that a division of the Central Forestry Board had started logging at the end of November, despite the Committee’s provisional measure taken two weeks previously. This logging was scheduled to continue until the end of March 1996. The petitioners requested a reiteration of the provisional measure so that the State party would discontinue logging immediately. See §4.2 of Jouni E. Länsman et al. v. Finland, (Länsman II), 30 October 1996. Clearly, the Central Forestry Board should have known about the Committee’s provisional measures of 15 November 1995. The urgent request for provisional measures specified that the local branch of the Board was aware of the Rule 86 request before it started the logging. ‘Some kind of a meeting or consultation between the branch and the Foreign Ministry took place, apparently on Friday 24 November, some days before the logging was started’. Fax of the petitioner of 8 December 1995 (on file with the author). In Länsman I, Ilmari Länsman v. Finland, 26 October 1994, the HRC did not use provisional measures because it considered they would be premature. It is the only case involving culture in which the HRC motivated its refusal to use them. Yet the HRC did not reiterate the provisional measures it had initially ordered, despite the request by the petitioners. Apparently, in December 1995 a negotiation took place between the parties, during which a solution was actively sought. The Finnish Foreign Ministry had also indicated that it would respond to the Committee’s provisional measures and concede admissibility in the next week and would then indicate whether it might stop or scale down logging. Note of the Secretariat of 8 December 1995 (on file with the author). In this context the Rapporteur may have decided that it would serve little purpose to use provisional measures for the second time before he had seen the reply promised by the State. In fact, the question whether to maintain the first Rule 86 request was put before the Committee’s Working Group and decided in the negative on 14 March 1996. A month after the Committee had indicated provisional measures and more than two weeks after logging had been resumed, the State party indeed submitted its formal response. The State considered that the provisional measures were inappropriate in the circumstances of the case and requested the HRC to set them aside. Nevertheless, it undertook ‘not to elaborate further logging plans in the area in question, and to decrease the current amount of logging by 25 percent, while awaiting the Committee’s final decision’ (on file with the author).

²³⁰ See also Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

²³¹ CAT Ahmed Hussein Mustafa Kamil Agiza v. Sweden, 20 May 2005, §13.10.

²³² See e.g. Ontario Court of Appeal, Ahani v. Canada, 8 February 2002, dissenting opinion of Rosenberg, §107.

absolute. In such cases the balance of convenience no longer applies.²³³ This principle should apply in relations between equal parties and is therefore more suitable for proceedings not involving a threat to the very existence of a person or indigenous peoples. Balancing the interest of the petitioner with those of the State (or ‘the general interest’) normally is inappropriate in relation to those rights singled out in the treaties for their fundamental nature, not allowing for derogation even in times of emergency.

4.2.6 Indirect beneficiaries

While provisional measures only bind the addressee vis-à-vis the direct beneficiaries, they could also have an effect beyond the particular case. Other potential beneficiaries could refer to these provisional measures. While a provisional measure does not concern an ‘examination’ of the case, persons similarly situated to the beneficiary could refer domestically to the provisional measures by an international or regional adjudicator. This applies to persons claiming the same rights before domestic decision makers. They would then have to use this to underscore their own claim, as an indication of the risk perceived by this adjudicator in similar situations of urgency. If the provisional measure concerns halting an expulsion of certain persons to a certain State (e.g. in a situation of civil war) counsel for other persons similarly situated and risking expulsion to that same State could argue that it would be a pro-active good faith application of the treaty to halt these other expulsions as well, pending determination of the proceeding in which the provisional measures were used. This would also be in accordance with the rationale of the rule on exhaustion of domestic remedies. Moreover the State would prevent recourse to international proceedings by these other persons as well as the ensuing embarrassment of more provisional measures of a similar nature. Of course such an argument would apply only if the persons involved were truly similarly situated.²³⁴

4.3 Consent, consultation and representation

4.3.1 Introduction

It is inherent in the function of human rights adjudicators to take into account in particular the perspectives of the powerless. How well they can perform their function depends to a large extent on how the case is presented before them, in other words, on the power of the narrative. Yet in a sense those that are able to get across a powerful narrative are not among the most powerless and it is only to be hoped that the judicial follow-up to their stories will ultimately have an impact on the most powerless as well, or in jargon, ‘empower’ them. In any case, the question of who is represented by whom, and how, is quite relevant as well, not just in that this may influence whether an adjudicator decides to order provisional measures, but also the contents of these provisional measures and the scope of the group requiring protection.

In a strict inter-State approach, in which the individual is not much more than a pawn in the hands of the conflicting Parties, provisional measures function in a different way than they do as part of human rights adjudication proper. This becomes clear particularly in the context of the role of the beneficiary. Traditionally, there is no obligation to consult with the beneficiaries to see whether they consent to the provisional measures and, if so, how they consider they would best be protected. Yet in the Inter-American human rights system a practice has been developed in which such consultation serves as a focal point. Given the purpose of preventing irreparable harm to persons, for instance in the face of death threats, such consultation is particularly warranted. Moreover, in the Inter-American and African systems the petitioners often are not the victims, let alone the beneficiaries of the provisional measures, which makes consultation all the more important.

²³³ If human rights adjudicators take provisional measures in a wider range of cases the balance of convenience may apply.

²³⁴ See e.g. the ECtHR and cases against the Netherlands involving non-refoulement to regions in Somalia, discussed in Chapter II (Systems) and XVII (Official responses).

Under the ICCPR the issue of consultation has mainly surfaced in the context of provisional measures to protect indigenous culture. In other words, in the practice of the HRC it is important when dealing with the issue of collective rights. This section first deals with the issue of consent, particularly in the context of provisional measures to protect against death threats. It then examines the issues of consultation and representation, focussing on the rights of collectivities, in particular indigenous cultures.

4.3.2 Beneficiaries and their consent

In cases involving multiple beneficiaries it is especially important to establish that the petitioner does not misrepresent the interests of the beneficiaries.²³⁵ This means that the issue of representation and consent, which often arises in relation to the alleged victim(s), also has relevance with regard to the potential beneficiaries.²³⁶

In Sands v. UK (1981) the petitioner had requested the European Commission to intervene urgently on behalf of her brother who was on hunger-strike. As his life was at stake the Commission invoked Rule 36 on provisional measures. Under this Rule it expressed a wish to visit the petitioner's brother to enquire whether he indeed intended to make the petition. In other words this was a special type of provisional measure. While it involved a risk of irreparable harm to persons the Commission still wished to be sure that the person at risk agreed with the involvement of the Commission. It struck out the case once it had ascertained during its on site visit, triggered by its provisional measures, that the petitioner's brother did not intend to make the petition.²³⁷

Checking whether the beneficiary really wants the provisional measures also includes taking into account that the beneficiary may sometimes only withdraw a request for precautionary measures exactly because of intimidation. In the Blake case the Inter-American Commission had requested the Court to order provisional measures on behalf of certain people, including Justo Victoriano Martínez-Morales. He was 'a key witness in the Blake Case' because of 'his investigation of the circumstances that led to Mr. Nicholas Blake's abduction and disappearance'. The President of the Court indeed ordered these measures, pending discussion by the full Court. The ²³⁵ See also subsection 4.4.4 of this Chapter on identification and representation.

²³⁶ On this issue in relation to the alleged victims see e.g. Mutua (2004), pp. 191-215; Juma (2004), pp. 235-271; and Nmehielle (2001), pp. 309-324.

²³⁷ ECHR Marcella Sands and Robert Sands v. the UK, 14 October 1981 (struck out). Bobby Sands did express a willingness 'to see the Delegates in the presence of three persons previously named by him in a press statement which had been issued in his name'. "After further consultations the Delegates decided that in the circumstances it was not possible to see and confer with Mr Sands and accordingly no meeting took place". According to a statement by the Republican Prisoners in the H-Blocks, at the end of the second hunger strike, Marcella Sands had acted on the advice of the Premier of the Republic of Ireland, convincing her that the intervention of the European Commission could solve the issue. After the Delegation of the European Commission had left without meeting Sands and the people he had proposed, Bobby Sands released a statement attacking the Premier for 'unscrupulously exploiting his family's anxiety to cover his own inactivity'. Bobby Sands died from the effects of his hunger-strike on 5 May 1981. Later the other prisoners decided to end the hunger strike, 'faced with the reality of sustained family intervention', see <larkspirit.com/hungerstrikes/81statement_end.html> (consulted 8 September 2005).

State responded, among others, that Mr Victoriano Martínez himself ‘had denied being subjected to threats or attacks against his person or his family and would not agree to any personal safety measures. Because of this refusal, the National Police of Huehuetenango offered to guard his residence with a night patrol after 8 p.m., to which he agreed’.²³⁸ Subsequently the Commission ‘reiterated that a case of extreme urgency did exist for the aforementioned reasons, and that the threats extended’ to his family.²³⁹ The Court ratified the President’s Order and requested the State to maintain the provisional measures on behalf of the five persons involved.²⁴⁰ More than 1,5 year later Mr Victoriano Martínez-Morales testified at the public hearing on the merits of the Blake case. He ‘said that he feared for his and his family’s life and physical safety and that he was only protected at his place of residence’.²⁴¹ The Court responded to this by requiring the State ‘to provide those measures to the persons in whose favor they were adopted, not only while they are in their homes but also when they are away from them’. It decided to maintain the provisional measures so long as the circumstances of extreme gravity still existed.²⁴²

In the Paniagua case the fifteen year old son of one of the victims had testified at the public hearings on Reparations of the Inter-American Court in August 2000. Subsequently he was threatened. The Inter-American Commission informed the Court of the situation but did not request it to take provisional measures. The Court, though, took provisional measures proprio motu.²⁴³ It turned out, however, that the beneficiary felt that the Court’s order might work counterproductive. Thus, the petitioner wanted the provisional measures lifted. The Commission requested the Court to lift its provisional measures and the Court did so.²⁴⁴

4.3.3 Consultation

As discussed, the letters by the Inter-American Commission to the State have become more specific²⁴⁵ in its awareness of the importance of consultation between the State and the petitioner about the implementation of its precautionary measures. In its letters to governments it now notes that precautionary measures must be implemented in consultation with the interested parties and their representatives.²⁴⁶ The Inter-American Court takes a similar approach.

²³⁸ IACHR Blake case (Guatemala), Judgment of 24 January 1998, §38.

²³⁹ Id., §39.

²⁴⁰ Id., §40.

²⁴¹ Id., §41.

²⁴² Id., §42.

²⁴³ IACHR Paniagua Morales et al. case, Order of 29 January 2001.

²⁴⁴ Id., noting, in the 5th ‘Having seen’ clause, the submission by the State that the harassment experienced by the beneficiary ‘was due “to personal problems with a gang of hoodlums” and that the State was providing the minor with protection to and from the high school where he was a student’ and referring, in the 6th clause, to the ‘letter from the representative of the individual under protection (...) wherein the representative requests that the measures ordered by the Court be lifted’; finally mentioning the note by the Commission in which it agreed that ‘the provisional measures ordered for the minor should be lifted’ (7th ‘Having seen’ clause). The Court also pointed out, in its 4th ‘Considering’ clause, that the Commission would ‘continue to monitor the situation and, if need be, provide pertinent information’.

²⁴⁵ See section 3 of this Chapter.

²⁴⁶ States, especially those that are often the addressees of provisional measures, have now become accustomed to this type of provisional measures. This has not always been the case. According to Charles Moyer, Inter-American Institute of Human Rights, formerly Secretary of the Court and Commission, interview of December 2001, at least in the type of cases that he had dealt with in the ten years he worked at the Commission and the other ten years he worked at the Court, States would have been too antagonistic to sit around the table and discuss matters.

In the context of the Inter-American (and African) system we may assume that the petitioners representing the victims, also represent witnesses and other people involved in the case domestically (such as counsel, prosecutor or judge in domestic proceedings) when they are subjected to threats. In this context the interested parties (‘los interesados’) that must be consulted are all the beneficiaries of these precautionary measures.

In its Annual Reports the Inter-American Commission sometimes explicitly notes that the measures requested should be taken ‘with the beneficiary’s agreement’,²⁴⁷ or that a State is expected to investigate the threats and agree with the petitioners on security measures.²⁴⁸ Yet if it does not mention in its Annual Report the even more obvious need for an agreement with the actual beneficiary, rather than the petitioner, this does not necessarily mean that the Commission did not require such agreement.

In the Peace Community case the Inter-American Court ordered the State to allow the participation of the petitioners in planning and implementing and, in general, to keep them informed about the progress in the implementation of the Court’s provisional measures. Likewise, the State was to continue allowing the beneficiaries or their representatives to participate in the planning and implementation of the measures and, in general, to keep them informed about all developments.²⁴⁹

In August 1998 the Court took provisional measures again in the context of Alvarez et al. (Colombia), on behalf of an attorney and his family. He had been threatened because he was representing the families of detainees and missing persons in several criminal cases and suits for compensation. It requested Colombia to effectively investigate the alleged acts in order to determine the perpetrators and punish them. It requested the Commission to ‘urge the beneficiaries of the provisional measures adopted by the Inter-American Court of Human Rights in the matter to cooperate with the State of Colombia in order to enable the latter to more effectively adopt the necessary security measures’.²⁵⁰

4.3.4 Representation and collective rights

Many of the rights in the ICCPR may be enjoyed in community with others.²⁵¹ The HRC has noted that Article 1 OP restricts its competence to dealing with individual complaints, but that this ‘does not prevent such individuals from claiming that actions or omissions that concern legal persons and similar entities amount to a violation of their own rights’.²⁵²

Regarding the relationship between petitioners and beneficiaries it is important to note that while the HRC does not accept the group itself as a petitioner (although it came close in the Lubi-

²⁴⁷ CIDH precautionary measures of 5 July 2001 to protect the judicial magistrate in charge of the investigation into the murder of journalist Jean Dominique, Annual Report 2001, Chapter III (a), §37.

²⁴⁸ A security cooperative in Colombia had been threatening a trade union leader. This group had earlier claimed responsibility for several killings and for attacks on union leaders, Annual Report 2001, Chapter III (a), §22.

²⁴⁹ IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order for provisional measures, 18 June 2002.

²⁵⁰ IACHR Alvarez et al. (Colombia), Order of 29 August 1998, 5th ‘Decisional clause’. See also the even stronger expression in the 6th ‘Considering’ clause: ‘The beneficiaries of the provisional measures adopted by the Court in the instant case have the obligation to cooperate with the State so that the latter might more effectively adopt the necessary security measures’.

²⁵¹ See Chapter X (Culture). See also e.g. Coomans (2003), pp. 749-760; Martin (2006), pp. 491-504 and Murray and Wheatley (2003), pp. 213-236.

²⁵² HRC General Comment on Article 2 ICCPR, the nature of the general legal obligation imposed on States parties to the Covenant, 21 April 2004, §9.

con case), it certainly takes into account group aspects when it uses provisional measures involving the protection of indigenous culture. This was already the case in Lubicon, but it was confirmed in subsequent cases. In Lubicon the petitioner was Chief Ominayak but the HRC specifically made the Band members beneficiaries of the provisional measures, next to Chief Ominayak. It explained that it used provisional measures in light of the seriousness of the allegations 'that the Lubicon Lake Band was at the verge of extinction'.²⁵³

In its arguments on admissibility in Länsman III the HRC declared inadmissible the complaint in so far as it related to the Herdsmen's Committee and/or its constituent members other than Jouni and Eino Länsman. It noted that there was no indication that individual members had authorised the Herdsmen's Committee to bring a claim on their behalf or that Jouni and/or Eino Länsman were authorised to act on behalf of the Herdsmen's Committee and its members. Yet the provisional measure taken in this case had specified Jouni Länsman et al. as the beneficiaries, which could still include the Herdsmen's Committee. After all, previously the Committee had only taken provisional measures in Article 27 ICCPR cases in which the collective aspects were predominant.²⁵⁴

When dealing with the question of the identity and interests of the beneficiaries of the provisional measures used by the HRC to protect indigenous culture it is important to keep in mind the discussion about self-determination. If collective aspects play an important role in the enforcement of individual rights, the issue of who represents a group in international fora is relevant in order to clarify the possible group of beneficiaries of provisional measures.²⁵⁵ It is not clear, however, to what extent considerations about representation and consultation indeed already play a role in the decision whether or not to take provisional measures in cases involving culture.²⁵⁶

Clearly, if the aim is to prevent irreparable harm to an indigenous group the victim-petitioner must be seen to represent the interests of its members. Also, the provisional measures required should not be such as to cause irreparable harm to other indigenous groups in the area. Irreparable harm, however, is not likely to result from a request to postpone industrial activities threatening the natural habitat. The fact that the interests of other indigenous groups could eventually justify certain infringements of the rights of the petitioners does not mean that the HRC could not take provisional measures protecting these rights pending the proceedings.²⁵⁷ In other

²⁵³ HRC Lubicon Lake Band, 26 March 1990, §29.2.

²⁵⁴ See Chapter X (Culture).

²⁵⁵ The first Mikmaq case (1984), HRC A.D. v. Canada (1st Mikmaq case), 29 July 1984 (inadm.) relates to representation. See generally about representation Meijknecht (2001), pp. 103-120 and p. 189. The Committee observed that the petitioner had not proven that he was authorised to act as a representative of the Mikmaq and the HRC declared the case inadmissible. Furthermore, he had failed to advance relevant facts supporting the claim that he was personally a victim. One member of the Committee pointed out that it should also have dealt with the fundamental question whether the right to self-determination in Article 1 could be dealt with under the OP. Individual opinion by Roger Errera in A.D. v. Canada, 29 July 1984 (inadm.).

²⁵⁶ See about the requirement to be personally affected, requirements for other members of a group to be similarly affected, the possibility to submit a communication collectively and the role of the representative Meijknecht (2001), pp. 184-190. About the international legal capacity, international subjectivity and ius standi of indigenous peoples in general see Meijknecht (2001), Chapters 3-5.

²⁵⁷ In this case the State had pointed out that there were competing claims from 'several other native communities in the area', but the Band accused Canada of having sent agents to the area immediately surrounding the traditional Lubicon territory in order to induce native individuals to strike their own private deals with the federal government. HRC Lubicon Lake Band, 26 March 1990, §5.7. In the discussion following the Committee's interlocutory decision of July 1989, requesting information and repeating its provisional measures, the petitioner submitted that the State party had further violated Articles 1, 26 and 27 ICCPR by creating the 'Woodland Cree words, competing interests should generally not prevent the use of this type of provisional measures. On the other hand, by arguing or implying that other indigenous groups or other members of the same group have differing views about the risk of irreparable harm to the natural habitat a State could try to convince the Committee not to take provisional measures or to withdraw those measures already taken.²⁵⁸

In any case, it is not clear whether or to what extent the State's argument about conflicting interests of indigenous groups, or the lack of clarity in general about the factual situation, played a role in the HRC's eventual decision in Lubicon on the reparation required, with its ambiguous wording and consequent reflection on the purpose of its provisional measures in future cases.²⁵⁹

Discord among potential beneficiaries of the Committee's provisional measures could be relevant to the Committee's assessment whether such measures are warranted.²⁶⁰

Band' in an alleged attempt to 'fabricate' a competing claim to traditional Lubicon lands. He pointed out that the federal government had supported the new Band both financially and legally, 'recognising it "with unprecedented dispatch", thereby bypassing more than 70 other groups, including six different homogenous Cree communities in northern Alberta that had been awaiting recognition as Bands for over 50 years', §27.5. The Lubicon Lake Band received support from the Assembly of First Nations and others. On 7 November 1989 the National Chief of the Assembly of First Nations sent a letter to the Prime Minister of Canada, pointing out that the Lubicon Lake Nation had been waiting for more than 50 years for 'an acknowledgment of their rights to their unceded, traditional lands'. In this letter he expressed concern about apparent tampering with Band membership lists. In January 1990 the Mohawk Council of Kahnawake considered it 'extremely prejudicial' that the authorities created the Woodland Cree Band 'in the face of long standing, unresolved negotiations over the Lubicon Lake Indian Nation unceded territory and compensation'. He expressed concern that this 'divide and conquer tactic' would be used elsewhere too when the authorities would consider the negotiation process with existing Bands unsatisfactory. On 8 March 1990 the Grand Council of Treaty 8 Nations passed a resolution strongly supporting the Lubicon Lake Nation 'and its inherent jurisdiction to determine its own membership and to the ownership of the Lands and Resources in its Traditional Territory'. It condemned the actions of the Canadian government, seeking 'to undermine the rights and jurisdiction of the Lubicon Lake Nation by the creation of the Woodland Cree Band' and resolved not to recognize the Woodland Cree Band. On 20 March 1990 the Chief of the Assembly of First Nations addressed the Prime Minister once more. He also sent copies of this letter to several addresses, including the HRC. See <nativenet.uthscsa.edu/archive/nl/91d/0071.html> (accessed on 23 August 2003) The HRC did not refer to this, but dismissed as an abuse of the right of submission under Article 3 OP the Lubicon Lake Band's allegations 'that the State party has conspired to create an artificial band, the Woodland Cree Band, said to have competing claims to traditional Lubicon land'. See HRC Lubicon Lake Band, 26 March 1990, §32.3. On 22 December 1990 the Edmonton Journal published an editorial in which it noted that it was time for a Lubicon deal. It pointed out that Bands with legal status under the Indian Act had submitted 578 specific claims since 1973, only 205 of which had been either rejected or resolved. It noted that according to the Assembly of First Nations only 44 claims had been 'settled to mutual satisfaction in the past 17 years'. The editorial noted the 'cynical motivation behind Ottawa's generosity to the Woodland Cree in Northern Alberta' and pointed out that the authorities hoped that the Lubicon Lake band would now give in and 'stop claiming compensation for millions of dollars in resource revenue pumped from their own land for years without their permission'. Republished on <nativenet.uthscsa.edu/archive/nl/91d/0071.html> (accessed on 23 August 2003).

²⁵⁸ On the assessment of material urgency for the use of provisional measures see Chapter XV.

²⁵⁹ See Chapter X (Indigenous culture) and section 5 of this chapter, on the relationship between provisional measures and reparation.

²⁶⁰ The issue of conflicting rights also surfaced briefly in Länsman II when a group of Sami other than the petitioners addressed the Committee, disagreeing with them. HRC Länsman II, 30

In Sara et al. v. Finland (inadm. 1994)²⁶¹ the addressee State had also referred to conflicting positions by reindeer herdsman. By doing this it equally may have been suggesting disagreement between the beneficiaries about the risk of irreparable harm to the environment.²⁶² The petitioners pointed out that their rights under Article 27 ICCPR should not be denied just because they had not been able to maintain all traditional methods of reindeer herding.²⁶³ Equally, they noted that not all herdsman in Finland were in fact Sami. This could put into perspective the supposed disagreement among the beneficiaries.

The question also arises whether only the petitioners are the beneficiaries of the provisional measures, whether all the members of the two Sami Herdsman Committees are or all Finnish Sami.

Equally the question arises whether the rights of the non-Sami Herdsman, who clearly are no beneficiaries of the provisional measures, should play a role in the Committee's decision to take or maintain provisional measures. In Sara, for instance, the State pointed out that the Wilderness Act was based on a 'philosophy of co-existence of reindeer herding and forest economy'. Referring to the unemployment figures in Finnish Lapland it noted:

"While the Government fully took into account the requirements of article 27 of the Covenant, it could not ignore the economic and social rights of that part of the population whose subsistence depends on logging activities".²⁶⁴

Another concept that has entered the equation is that of the economic well-being of the State's population in general.²⁶⁵ In Länsman I the HRC pointed out that a 'State may understandably October 1996, §4.3. After the HRC had taken provisional measures, a group of Sami Forestry officials from the Inari area, earning their living from forestry and wood economy, submitted that reindeer husbandry and forestry could be practised simultaneously with reindeer herding. They pointed out that when forestry activities would be forbidden in the area, 'Sami groups practising two different professions would be subject to unequal treatment', ibid. In response the petitioners stated that the local branch of the Central Forestry Board had apparently organized a small group of its employees of Sami ethnic origin to approach the Committee for the purpose of expressing concern for their employment.

²⁶¹ HRC Sara et al. v. Finland, 23 March 1994 (inadm.).

²⁶² The State had noted that other herdsman had in fact requested preservative logging, arguing that this would be to the advantage of the lichen and would sustain the tree population. It also referred to the Association of Herdsman's Committees, which had noted that 'the income derived from logging is essential for securing the herdsman's livelihood and, furthermore, forestry jobs are essential to forest workers and those Sami herdsman who work in the forests apart from breeding reindeer'.

²⁶³ "While Finnish Sami have not been able to maintain all traditional methods of reindeer herding, their practice still is a distinct Sami form of reindeer herding, carried out in community with other members to the group and prescribed by the natural habitat. Snow scooters have not destroyed this form of nomadic reindeer herding. Other than in Sweden and Norway, Finland allows reindeer herding for others than Samis; thus, the southern parts of the country are used by herdsman's committees which now largely resort to fencing and artificial feeding". HRC Sara et al. v. Finland, 23 March 1994 (inadm.), §7.4.

²⁶⁴ HRC Sara et al. v. Finland, 23 March 1994 (inadm.), §4.6.

²⁶⁵ States have tried to convince the HRC that economic and social rights of the general population could justify transgressions upon the cultural rights of indigenous peoples. The European Commission on Human Rights indeed acknowledged as a justification for infringements on the right to respect for the particular life style of the Sami the interest of the economic well being of the country as a whole. See G. and E. v. Norway (inadm. 1993). The Commission noted 'a minority group is, in principle, entitled to claim the right to respect for the particular life style it wish to encourage development or allow economic activity by enterprises' but the 'scope of its freedom to do so is not to be assessed by reference to a margin of appreciation'.²⁶⁶ Rather, the scope of this freedom must be assessed by reference to its obligations in Art. 27 ICCPR. Still, the HRC pointed out that measures with 'a certain limited impact' will not necessarily amount to a denial of this article.²⁶⁷ Schmidt notes that the HRC 'had to balance the applicants' interests against general economic interests advanced by the Finnish Government'. Thus it 'implicitly granted the state party what amounted to a margin of appreciation' in determining whether their rights had been protected sufficiently.²⁶⁸ On the other hand, Scheinin notes the Committee's decision in Kitok in which the HRC 'referred to the well-being of the Sami minority, not to the economic well-being of the country as a whole'.²⁶⁹ Hence, he considers that the HRC has been willing to accept justifications for infringements on the right of an individual member of an indigenous group to enjoy his own culture if they aim at protecting the indigenous group as a whole, rather than if based on arguments about the interests of the general population. When taking Scheinin's interpretation regarding the Committee's decisions on the merits it seems unlikely that arguments about social and economic rights of the general population will play a role in its decisions on provisional measures. In any case, the HRC could more appropriately consider general interests in the reporting procedure under Article 40 ICCPR.²⁷⁰ may lead as being "private life", "family life" or "home" (p. 35). It was also 'prepared to accept' that the consequences for the petitioners arising from the construction of a hydro-electric plant did interfere with their private life and traditional activities 'as a minority, who move their herds and deer around over a considerable distance'. Yet this interference was limited to a 'comparatively small area'. Thus the Commission seemed to imply that the extent of the interference was insufficient for purposes of Article 8(1) ECHR. Nevertheless it continued by stating that it did not ascertain 'the exact extent and nature of the interference' under Article 8(1), but considered that such interference could in any case 'reasonably be considered as being justified' under Article 8(2) ECHR, among others 'in the interest of the economic well-being of the country' (p. 36). Following this substantive discussion it declared this part of the petition inadmissible as manifestly ill-founded.

²⁶⁶ HRC Ilmari Länsman et al. v. Finland, 26 October 1994, §9.4.

²⁶⁷ Ibid.

²⁶⁸ Schmidt (1997), p. 338.

²⁶⁹ See Scheinin (2001), p. 169.

²⁷⁰ An interesting case dealt with by the Bosnia Chamber is Lukenda and Bevanda v. Fed. B&H, 5 July 2001 (inadm.). Petitioners in this case sought the Chamber's withdrawal of the provisional measures it had ordered in another case, Dautbegović and 51 other villagers from the village of Duge v. Fed. B&H, 6 July 2001. These provisional measures required the respondent party 'to take all necessary measures to ensure that the construction works on the planned hydro-electric power plant near the village of Duge be stopped', §3. The petitioners requested 'as a provisional measure' that the Chamber withdraw this provisional measure, as they wished to continue construction of their power plant. The Chamber decided instead to extend its provisional measures in Dautbegović until it would adopt its final decision in that case or withdraw the order, §5. The case submitted by Lukenda and Bevanda was subsequently declared inadmissible as manifestly ill-founded: the approval and permits for the construction of the power plant 'on a site protected as an asset of natural heritage' were not issued in accordance with law, §107.

4.4 Extending the group of beneficiaries, identification and representation

4.4.1 Introduction

As noted, the beneficiaries of provisional measures in a given case do not necessarily coincide with the alleged victim. Moreover, they may also be a group of beneficiaries rather than just one or two persons. The issue of larger groups of beneficiaries has arisen mostly in three types of cases: death threats and harassment, mass expulsion and survival of indigenous groups.²⁷¹ Often, in consecutive provisional measures, the group of beneficiaries is extended. At times it is difficult to provide the names of all intended beneficiaries. Yet especially if this is not possible, the question arises to what extent they consider themselves to be represented by the petitioners.

This section first deals with extension of the group in general, then focuses on the question whether each person to be protected must be identified by name, whether provisional measures could play a role in early warning mechanisms, and finally it gives an example where, in a case in which not all of them were identified by name, some of them brought a motion for self-representation.

4.4.2 Extending the group of beneficiaries

Usually the HRC has used provisional measures on behalf of an individual or, if the complaint was filed by a group of persons, on behalf of all persons. Only in some cases dealing with the right to culture the group of beneficiaries encompassed in fact a larger group of persons than just those mentioned by name in the application. In the other systems provisional measures have sometimes benefited others than the individual victim as well.

The Inter-American Court's first provisional measures halting executions aimed to protect five persons whose cases were pending before the Inter-American Commission. Subsequently, it amplified its provisional measures from five to 41 beneficiaries.²⁷² In the Inter-American system the list of beneficiaries is regularly extended to include new persons, most often in cases involving threats.²⁷³ Indeed, in its Annual Reports the Inter-American Commission emphasises that the number of precautionary measures is not the same as the number of persons protected by them. The Commission grants many precautionary measures aimed at protecting several individuals or even 'a group of persons who cannot be counted, such as entire populations or communities'.²⁷⁴ As Judge Cançado Trindade pointed out, the Inter-American Court's provisional measures have covered almost 12,000 persons and even the members of whole communities. Thereby they have become a true preventive judicial guarantee.²⁷⁵

²⁷¹ See Chapters IX (Threats); XI (Mass expulsion) and X (Culture).

²⁷² IACHR James et al. cases, Orders of 25 October 2001 and 26 November 2001 (President). For previous Orders see James et al. cases, Orders of 29 June 1998 and 13 July 1998 (President); James, Briggs, Noel, Garcia and Bethel cases, Order of 22 July 1998. James et al. cases, Order of 29 August 1998. James et al. cases, Order of 11 May 1999 (President) and Order of 25 May 1999. James et al. cases, Order for provisional measures, 27 May 1999. James et al. cases, Order of the President for urgent measures, 19 June 1999 and Order for provisional measures, 25 September 1999. Trinidad executed two of them: Joey Ramiah and Anthony Briggs. Initially, as noted before, the cases of these beneficiaries were still pending before the Commission when the Court ordered provisional measures. Later, the Commission brought before the Court the three cases Hilaire, Constantine et al. and Benjamin et al. IACHR Hilaire v. Trinidad and Tobago case, judgment of 1 September 2001 (preliminary objections); Constantine et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago, judgment of 1 September 2001 (preliminary objections); Benjamin et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago case, judgment of 1 September 2001 preliminary objections. Together these cases dealt with 32 persons. All beneficiaries, however, were protected under the same Order for provisional measures. Of the five beneficiaries of the first Order for provisional measures, only two were included in the Hilaire, Constantine and Benjamin et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago Judgment. One of the persons not included was the aforementioned Anthony Briggs. The other two were Anderson Noel and Christopher Bethel. In its Judgment, moreover, the Court did not deal with the cases of three more persons who were included as beneficiaries since the Court's Order of 25 May 1999: Kevin Dial, Andrew Dottin and Anthony Johnson.

As noted, a distinct feature of the provisional measures in the Inter-American system is that the beneficiaries are not only the direct victims²⁷⁶ and their family in a pending case before the Inter-American Commission or Court, but also witnesses, counsel and others. Many of the persons abducted, disappeared or murdered had received threats previously. Moreover, the Court was faced with information of threats to witnesses and others involved in cases pending before it (or before the Commission). In response to this situation the Court decided to expand the scope of beneficiaries for the provisional measures from alleged victims and their family alone, to witnesses, counsel and others involved. Later the scope became even wider. Witnesses in a case pending before a local judge, human rights defenders, persons visiting the premises of a human rights organisation, etc. may become the beneficiary of a precautionary or provisional measure as well.²⁷⁷

In the European system at times provisional measures have also been used on behalf of larger groups of persons. In Becker v. Denmark (1976) the petitioner was the director of an organisation called Project Children's Protection and Security International. His petition concerned 'the alleged violation of the Convention by the Danish Government in the envisaged repatriation of 199 Vietnamese children'. The European Commission indeed used provisional measures on behalf of this large group of beneficiaries.²⁷⁸

In Islamic Community in BiH v. Republika Srpska (Muslim Town Cemetery in Prnjavor) the Bosnia Chamber initially refused to take provisional measures in the absence of individual threats of exhumation or interference with burials. In the face of a specific domestic decision prohibiting a burial the Chamber did order provisional measures. Apparently it phrased them more generally, ²⁷³ See e.g. IACHR Alvarez et al. case (Colombia), Orders of the President of 22 July 1997 and subsequent Orders by the Court, such as that of 8 February 2008. The measures included the provision of a cell phone and a security camera.

²⁷⁴ See e.g. CIDH Annual Report, 2000, §8.

²⁷⁵ See e.g. IACHR Matter of the persons imprisoned in the "Dr. Sebastião Martins Silveira" Penitentiary in Araraquara, São Paulo (Brazil), Order of 30 September 2006, individual opinion Judge Cançado Trindade, §4. This includes about 6,000 beneficiaries in the Matter of Pueblo indígena de Kankuamo (Colombia), more than 1,200 in the Matter of the Peace Community of San José de Apartadó (Colombia); more than 2,000 in the Matter of the Communities of Jiguamiandó and Curbaradó (Colombia), almost 900 in the Matter of Urso Branco Prison (Brazil) and about 1,200 in the Matter of Pueblo indígena de Sarayaku (Ecuador).

²⁷⁶ In practice, the petitioner normally is an international NGO, representing the victims and any other beneficiary of the provisional measure.

²⁷⁷ See also e.g. Matter of the Yare I and Yare II Capital Region Penitentiary Center (Yare Prison) (Venezuela), Order of 30 March 2006 (also on behalf of those persons who may, in the future, enter the prison as inmates, as well as those who work there, and those who enter as visitors) and IACHR Asunto de la Cárcel de Urso Branco (Brasil), Resolución de 2 de mayo de 2008 (including the protection of the life and personal integrity of visitors and security agents; and the obligation of the State to provide an up-to-date list of those who had been killed).

²⁷⁸ EComHR Becker v. Denmark, 3 October 1975 (inadm.), D&R 4, p. 215. See also e.g. EComHR B., M. and 51 others v. Spain, 11 September 1992 involving 53 refugees waiting on no man's land in the burning sun, without water, shelter or sanitation.

to apply not only to that specific burial, but instead ordering Srpska to prohibit the Municipal authorities of Prnjavor from obstructing further burials at the Muslim Town Cemetery.²⁷⁹

Sometimes provisional measures have also benefited a larger group than the beneficiaries referred to. The provisional measures by the ECtHR ordering the Netherlands to halt the expulsion of a Somali asylum-seeker serve as an example.²⁸⁰ In order to make sure that the Secretary of State on migration issues understood that the European Court's decision also applied to other asylum seekers similarly situated, the Court exceptionally²⁸¹ included an explanatory sentence to that effect as well. This was done in order to prevent a flood of cases being brought before the Court in Strasbourg. In a way the other, similarly situated, Somali asylum seekers could be seen as de facto beneficiaries of the Court's provisional measures.²⁸²

If the provisional measure concerns halting an expulsion of certain persons to a certain State (e.g. in a situation of civil war) counsel for other persons similarly situated and risking expulsion to that same State could argue that it would be a pro-active good faith application of the treaty to halt these other expulsions as well, pending determination of the proceeding in which the provisional measures were used. This would also be in accordance with the rationale of the rule on exhaustion of domestic remedies and the idea of the subsidiary nature of international supervision. Moreover the State would prevent recourse to international proceedings by these other persons as well as the ensuing embarrassment of more provisional measures of a similar nature. Of course such argument would apply only if the persons involved were truly similarly situated.

While a provisional measure does not concern an 'examination' of the case, persons similarly situated could refer domestically to the provisional measures by an international or regional adjudicator.²⁸³

Sometimes groups are in urgent need of protection, but the use of provisional measures is not an option. As part of the reporting procedure under Article 40 ICCPR, the HRC has started to identify in its Concluding Observations certain urgent issues requiring follow-up. It has also decided to appoint one of its members as a Special Rapporteur on the follow-up of Concluding Observations.²⁸⁴ Thus, the Special Rapporteur on the follow-up of Views now has its counterpart vis-à-vis the reporting procedure. Some of the issues the Rapporteur on Concluding Observations may have to deal with could relate to individuals in urgent situations. These situations may be comparable to those necessitating provisional measures as part of the individual complaint proce-

²⁷⁹ Bosnia Chamber Islamic Community in BiH v. Republika Srpska (Muslim Town Cemetery in Prnjavor), 11 January 2000.

²⁸⁰ See President ECtHR, Note Verbale with provisional measure, 3 May 2004, in case 15243/04, published in the Dutch journal JV 226 (Jurisprudentie Vreemdelingenrecht). See further Rieter (2005a) and (2006).

²⁸¹ See Chapter II (Systems), section 8.2 on the issue of transparency of information.

²⁸² See also ECtHR judgment NA. v. UK, 17 July 2008, which concerned even a greater number of cases involving imminent expulsion to Sri Lanka. The judgment referred to the unwillingness by the UK to take a general measure halting the expulsion of Tamils to Sri Lanka, resulting in the Court's being forced to order provisional measures 342 times in individual cases submitted by petitioners at risk of being deported from the UK to Sri Lanka, §§21-22.

²⁸³ See further Rieter (2005a) and (2006). See also IACHR Communities of the Jiguamiandó and of the Curbaradó, Order of 6 March 2003, Concurring Opinion Judge Cançado Trindade, §4 ('the protection of human rights determined by the American Convention, to be effective, comprises not only the relations between the individuals and the public power, but also their relations with third parties (...). This reveals the new dimensions of the international protection of human rights, as well as the great potential of the existing mechanisms of protection, – such as that of the American Convention, – set in motion in order to protect collectively the members of a whole community, even though the basis of action is the breach – or the probability or imminence of breach – of individual rights').

²⁸⁴ See further Chapter XVIII (Follow up)

ture. It is likely that these situations would often concern the plight of certain groups, in other words that the group of beneficiaries of this follow-up would be larger and have a more collective dimension than the group of beneficiaries of the Committee's provisional measures. The urgent situations may also concern threats to rights for the protection of which the HRC does not use provisional measures. The urgent issues approach is a useful complementary approach for those situations where provisional measures are unsuitable (e.g. involving virtually the whole population of a large area) or simply not an option because the State in question did not recognise the individual complaint procedure under the Covenant.²⁸⁵

4.4.3 Early warning

Early warning systems and other preventive mechanisms aim to protect large groups of people, while provisional measures normally concern smaller groups.²⁸⁶ In that respect the approach of the Inter-American Court, using provisional measures involving large groups of beneficiaries, deserves more attention by other human rights adjudicators. Of course the role of the Inter-American Commission with its combined function of investigator, adjudicator, mediator and petitioner, is very important in this respect. Because of, among others, its country visits it is more familiar with specific country situations and able to provide concrete suggestions for the use and implementation of provisional measures to protect groups of persons against threats. It is able to negotiate with representatives of the beneficiaries and the State. For other, especially for global, adjudicators acquiring the relevant knowledge of the situation may be more difficult. Nevertheless, they could also be inventive in creating mechanisms for negotiation about the implementation of such provisional measures. Maybe international adjudicators could informally contact UN Special Rapporteurs of the Human Rights Council in certain States to provide good offices for the negotiation of protective measures between the beneficiaries and State authorities. In some cases they could even provide suggestions and act as a mediator. If country visits and hearings are not possible, regional adjudicators could also suggest the good offices of organisations trusted by both the beneficiaries and the State. An example of such an organisation could be the OSCE. In some respects organisations such as the OSCE or the European prison visiting committee under the European Convention against Torture already perform the function of intervening against threats to life and personal integrity. Nevertheless, the latter Committee mostly only intervenes in specific cases if it happens to be visiting detention centre concerned.

4.4.4 Individual identification of each beneficiary?

4.4.4.1 INTRODUCTION

In the Inter-American system the group of beneficiaries sometimes even involves unnamed individuals. It may be difficult to access all persons at risk or obtain all official information.²⁸⁷

²⁸⁵ On serious and mass violations in general, see e.g. Medina Quiroga (1988) and Murray (1999), pp. 109-133.

²⁸⁶ With regard to high and low intensity conflicts and violent political conflicts in States that have ratified individual complaint proceedings, frequent use of provisional measures may be an indicator for early warning as well as a form of early intervention in specific cases. Yet in practice the step from early warning to early action often proves to be difficult with regard to large groups under threat. See e.g. Grünfeld/Huijboom (2007) and Grünfeld (2000), pp. 131-143.

²⁸⁷ See e.g. the exchange of information between the Court and the State relating to the death of one of the beneficiaries in IACHR Blake case, Order of 6 June 2003: "Justo Victoriano Martínez

The Commission and Court have sometimes ordered a State to protect a specific group as such rather than just those members of the group mentioned by name. In a mass expulsion case in 2000 the inter-American Court still refused to do so, but later that year, in a case involving death threats to all members of a 'peace community' it did grant an Order on behalf of unnamed persons.²⁸⁸

4.4.4.2 MASS EXPULSION

In the case of Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic (Haitian case, 2000) the Inter-American Commission requested the Court to order the State to suspend the massive expulsions and deportations both of legal and non-documented Haitian workers and of legal and non-documented Dominicans of Haitian origin living in the Dominican Republic. It had 'acquired knowledge of the identity of some of the alleged victims, who had given their approval to being named in the context of the request'.²⁸⁹ It described some of the specific circumstances of the seven persons it could specifically name, urging the Court to order provisional measures that would permit their immediate return from Haiti to the Dominican Republic or, when they were still in the Dominican Republic, protect them from any 'detention or deportation action based on racial or national origin, or on the suspicion that they are not full-fledged citizens'.²⁹⁰ The Court indeed ordered provisional measures on behalf of the seven persons specifically named.

The Commission also asked the Court to protect a group of persons not identified by name. It pointed out that it could not get access to these persons. It explained that the State's practice made it impossible to distinguish between individual group members, making all of them targets of mass expulsion. In addition, members of the group were afraid to come forward individually. The Commission also argued that the Inter-American human rights system simply was not equipped to process individual complaints of each member, even if they could be reached and would not be afraid to come forward individually.²⁹¹ As a result the Commission suggested some sort of actio popularis instead.

The State protested that it was necessary to reveal the identity of those persons in danger of suffering irreparable harm in order for it to take provisional measures. It emphasised that provi-

Morales, Justo Víctor Martínez Morales and Justo Víctor Morales Martínez" identify one and the same person, who was a beneficiary of provisional measures, §13.

²⁸⁸ For a different approach, see e.g. ECtHR Athanassoglou et al. v. Switzerland (2000) the petitioners had requested the ECtHR to take provisional measures to halt the resumption of a nuclear power plant. The Court decided not to do so. While it did not indicate its reasons, the actio popularis nature of the petition may have played a role. The Court subsequently found that Articles 6 and 13 ECHR were not applicable. See Chapter XII (Other situations). In passing it also noted that the petitioners had not been able to 'demonstrate a serious, specific and imminent danger in their personal regard'. ECtHR Athanassoglou et al. v. Switzerland, 6 April 2000, §§52 and 54. The admissibility report of the Commission was called Greenpeace Schweiz et al. v. Switzerland. In its judgment on the merits the ECtHR has pointed out that the positive obligation of States to protect the right to life relates to situations in which the authorities were aware, or should have been aware, of a real risk to the life of an identified individual or individuals. See e.g. ECtHR Mahmut Kaya v. Turkey, 28 March 2000, §86 and Osman v. UK, 28 October 1998, §116.

²⁸⁹ IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic (Dominican Republic), Order of 18 August 2000, 3rd 'Having seen' clause.

²⁹⁰ Ibid.

²⁹¹ Id., 'Having seen' clause 11c.

sional measures on behalf of nameless persons would hinder its right to protect its border and control the legal status of its inhabitants.²⁹²

The Court decided not to order provisional measures to protect ‘generically those in a given situation or those who are affected by certain measures’.²⁹³ It deemed ‘it indispensable to identify individually the persons in danger of suffering irreparable damage, for which reason it is not feasible to order provisional measures without specific names, for protecting generically those in a given situation or those who are affected by certain measures: however, it is possible to protect the individualized members of a community’.²⁹⁴ At the same time it did decide to order both the State and the Commission to provide it with ‘detailed information on the situation of members of the border communities or “bateyes” who could be subject to forced repatriations, deportations or expulsions’.²⁹⁵

²⁹² During the hearing of August 2000 the State responded that it was necessary to identify the persons on whose behalf provisional measures were being requested. It continued as follows: ‘however, the Dominican Republic is in the best disposition to study any individual case where the violation of rights is alleged’, IACHR case of Haitians and Haitian-origin Dominicans in the Dominican Republic, Order of 18 August 2000, ‘Having seen’ clause 12e. In the brief it submitted after the public hearing of 8 August 2000 the State alleged that ‘the identity of those persons who are in danger of suffering irreparable damage must be revealed for the adoption of provisional measures; measures adopted in relationship to nameless persons would only hinder the Dominican State’s right to protect its border and control the legal status of the persons who enter into its territory and live in it’. The Commission objected to the brief submitted by the State upon the closing of the public hearing. In response to a question by the President of the Court posed during the public hearing, the Commission indicated that its request for provisional measures in this case was an actio popularis, 15th ‘Having seen’ clause.

²⁹³ IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic (Dominican Republic), Order of 18 August 2000, 8th ‘Considering’ clause.

²⁹⁴ The IACHR referred to its Orders in Álvarez et al., 21 January 1998, Clemente Teherán et al., 19 June 1998, Digna Ochoa and Plácido et al., 17 November 1999.

²⁹⁵ IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic, Order of 18 August 2000. In its response to the Court’s Order to inform it about the situation of people living in ‘bateyes’ at the border area, the Dominican Republic noted that there were ‘bateyes’ only in Barahona on the border between the Dominican Republic and Haiti. The community was for seventy percent Dominican. Thirty percent was contracted and came to the Dominican Republic during the sugar cane harvest. The State did not clarify the actual situation of this Community. In his concurring opinion Cançado Trindade referred to the ‘undetermined’ character of the community and distinguished this from a community or group whose members can be individualised. In this case, he noted, taking an actio popularis approach would have risked to ‘disfigure the character of provisional measures of protection, in their present stage of historical evolution’. Concurring Opinion Judge Cançado Trindade, §§21-22. He emphasised that the Court needed to individualise the beneficiaries but that it kept an open eye for the context warranting the provisional measures. It also required the State to send it detailed information about the situation of the communities or ‘bateyes’ at the border. Concurring Opinion Judge Cançado Trindade, Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic, Order of 18 August 2000, §22. He furthermore expressed the hope that the measures the Dominican Republic would take to implement the individualised provisional measures of the Court would benefit all the other persons, who were not mentioned by name in the Commission’s petition, but who found themselves in the same situation of vulnerability and risk, §24. On the growing emphasis on actio popularis in international human rights adjudication, see also the African Commission in the Ogoni case: Social and Economic Rights Action Center for Economic and Social Rights v. Nigeria, 6 June 2001, §51: “The Commission thanks the two human rights NGOs who brought

4.4.4.3 PROTECTION OF PEACE COMMUNITY

As noted, the Inter-American Court took an altogether different approach later that year. The Peace Community case is instructive for the Inter-American Court's approach to the group of beneficiaries of provisional measures. In his Order for urgent measures on behalf of specific members of the Peace Community the President pointed out the more general duty of the States Parties, under Article 1(1) ACHR, to respect the rights and freedoms recognised in the Convention and to guarantee their free and full exercise for every person under their jurisdiction, including the inhabitants of the Peace Community of San José de Apartadó. Apart from the persons specifically named he expected the State's protective measures to benefit other people of the same Community as well, who may be in a similar situation of vulnerability and risk.²⁹⁶

During the public hearing of 16 November 2000 the Commission had argued in favour of expanding the protection of the Court's provisional measures from the specific group of beneficiaries in the President's Order for urgent measures to all members of the Peace Community. The Commission explained its effort to register names of members of the Community in its request for provisional measures. This resulted in a list of 193 people,²⁹⁷ but this list was not complete because 'the great majority of the members of the Community fear stigmatization and violence resulting from such stigmatization, and this is the only reason for which they did not authorize to make their names known'.²⁹⁸ The Commission referred to elements allowing for the identification of the members of the Community in a collective manner. It first mentioned the geographic element: the Community was located in a determined place, in the Municipality of Apartadó, formed by 32 surrounding dwellings, such as La Vereda la Unión, where the people identified in the President's Order came from. The other element it mentioned was the fact that belonging to this Community implied adherence to a series of norms and bylaws as well as a system of representation. Its members even identified themselves with an identification card.²⁹⁹ The Commission argued that it was suitable to consider the Community in question as a collective entity because the fundamental individual rights of each member were at stake, such as the right to life and personal integrity.³⁰⁰

To counter any arguments about the inability of the State to verify whom it needed to protect, the Commission pointed out that, during the three years in which it maintained its precautionary measures, which had been of a similar nature, the State did not allege 'having had problems to identify the people it had to protect'.

the matter under its purview: the Social and Economic Rights Action Center (Nigeria) and the Center for Economic and Social Rights (USA). Such is a demonstration of the usefulness to the Commission and individuals of actio popularis, which is wisely allowed under the African Charter".

²⁹⁶ IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order of 9 October 2000 (President).

²⁹⁷ The Court refers to 189 people, but lists 193 persons.

²⁹⁸ IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order of 24 November 2000.

²⁹⁹ There were also people in the Community who, although not formally identified with this card, were living there and were guided by the Community's principles and wished to become members. For the purpose of the provisional measures the Commission indicated that these people must be considered as members of the Community as well.

³⁰⁰ IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order of 24 November 2000. The Spanish text is as follows: 'En el presente caso es conveniente definir a la Comunidad de Paz de San José de Apartadó colectivamente, porque se trata de una afectación de derechos individuales fundamentales, como la vida y la integridad personal'.

“The Commission is convinced that the State understands the collective dimension of the problem, knows which people to protect, understands the geographic limits and the element of belonging to the Community, as well as the functioning mechanisms”.³⁰¹

In November 2000 the Court decided indeed to extend the group of beneficiaries. In its considerations, it referred to the State’s report and its arguments during the public hearing. It also attached importance to the Commission’s statement that many members of the Community did not wish to be identified for fear of reprisals. It differentiated this case from its earlier Order in the case of Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian origin. In the latter case it had ‘considered indispensable to individualize the people who are in danger of suffering irreparable harm in order to provide them with protective measures’. The Peace Community case, on the other hand, had special characteristics.

“Indeed, the Community of Paz de San José de Apartadó, formed according to the Commission by about 1200 people, constitutes an organized community located in a determined geographic place, whose members can be identified and individualized and who, due to the fact of belonging to said community, all its members are in a situation of similar risk of suffering acts of aggression against their personal integrity and lives”.³⁰²

Thus the Court considered that it was not only suitable to order provisional measures on behalf of the people already protected by the President’s urgent measures of 9 October 2000 but also, for the reasons presented in the public hearing ‘to expand them so that they cover all of the members of the aforementioned Community’. Consequently, it first ratified the President’s Order ‘in all its terms’ and then expanded these measures by ordering the State ‘to extend, forthwith, any measures as may be necessary to protect the lives and personal integrity of all of the other members of the Community of Paz de San José de Apartadó’.³⁰³

Judges Abreu Burelli and García Ramírez more closely discussed the issue of beneficiaries in their concurring opinion. They acknowledged that in the majority of cases it is indeed possible to identify individually the potential victims of the violation the provisional measure aims to protect. Yet there are cases where such precise individualisation proves difficult, at least initially. The real and imminent threat might be a threat against a great number of people who find themselves in more or less similar circumstances, putting them at risk. In such situations their protection is necessary even though it is not yet possible to individualise the subjects of the provisional protection by name. Such provisional protection, after all, always and by definition is an urgent protection.³⁰⁴

“To delay action until those exposed to that threat of grave and irreparable harm to legally protected interests – embodied in rights – can be individually identified would be to run the risk that the harm would materialize before the Court could intervene to prevent it, even though it had already established that the threat was not only possible but also probable and imminent. Thus, a surmountable technicality would prevent the Court from acting swiftly to fulfil its true mandate: to use the shield of its jurisdictional power to protect threatened rights. It would be

³⁰¹ IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order of 24 November 2000.

³⁰² Id., 7th ‘Considering’ clause.

³⁰³ Id., 3rd ‘Decisional’ clause.

³⁰⁴ Id., Concurring Opinion of Judge Abreu Burelli and García Ramírez.

hard to make the case that that kind of judicial restraint was consistent with the Inter-American Court's essential mission of protecting human rights".³⁰⁵

They considered the situation similar to that of 'diffuse interests': a group of people with various backgrounds shares a determined interest, legally relevant, that requires public protection. Yet, none of these subjects can be considered holder of a subjective right with regard to the right they invoke, nor can they attribute to themselves such entitlement in a way that would exclude the other subjects who find themselves in the same situation. In those circumstances anyone of them could resort to the relevant legal body and request the adoption of measures that would preserve the common interest of the group. In such case one would speak of an actio popularis or class action.³⁰⁶ The situation may indeed be similar to the example given by the two judges, but it is certainly not the same. After all, each inhabitant of the Community of San José de Apartadó who is threatened definitely could be considered the holder of subjective rights. The difference is that not all of them have individually claimed this before the Inter-American Court.

The two judges referred to the Court's Order in the case of the Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic in which it considered that it was indispensable to individualise the persons at risk and that it would not be feasible to order provisional measures without mentioning the names of the beneficiaries ('de manera innominada') simply in order to protect generically all people who could find themselves in a certain situation or could be affected by certain measures because the provisional measures could now protect a group of people with various backgrounds, without individualising them in advance. The judges pointed out that the Peace Community case went much further. Based on the protective criterion it was a reasonable extension of the scope of provisional measures to a larger group of beneficiaries in a way that fit in well with their preventive purpose. In its new approach, the Court's determination whether someone belongs to the group of victims who are to be beneficiaries of its provisional measures is not based on the knowledge and the precise manifestation of each individual by name, but on objective criteria -taking into account their links to the group in question and the risks involved- that would permit individualisation of the beneficiaries at the moment of implementation of the measures. In other words, the aim is to cover the risk run by all inhabitants of a community and not only, as normally is the case, the risk run by some individuals.³⁰⁷

4.4.4.4 MORE GENERALISED PROVISIONAL MEASURES

On several occasions since this case the Court has used a more general provisional measure where not all the beneficiaries are mentioned by name. As has been noted, this type of provisional measures may involve ethnic groups, a group of workers or members involved in a peace community 'linked by a common geography, which could change, and certain common decisions which were the source of the risks to individual and collective interests'.³⁰⁸ Such situations reveal 'a common-

³⁰⁵ Concurring Opinion by Judge García-Ramírez in IACHR Matter of Pueblo Indígena de Sarayaku, Order of 6 July 2004, §5.

³⁰⁶ Concurring Opinion of Judge Abreu Burelli and García Ramírez, Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order of 24 November 2000.

³⁰⁷ The two judges also emphasised the need to take into account that, in the circumstances of this case, the victims did not want to provide their names because this might make them even more vulnerable. Concurring Opinion of Judge Abreu Burelli and García Ramírez, Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order of 24 November 2000.

³⁰⁸ Concurring Opinion by Judge García-Ramírez on IACHR Matter of Pueblo Indígena de Sarayaku, Order of 6 July 2004, §§8-9.

ality of situation, which implies, in this case, a commonality of danger'.³⁰⁹ To give a few examples, when Maria Eugenia Cárdenas and her family were being threatened she was asked to identify her relatives but she did not want to name them for fear this might actually put them even more at risk. The Court then decided just to refer to Ms. Cárdenas 'and her next of kin'.³¹⁰ Yet in the context of the same case it did point out that 'in order to ensure an effective protection of the next of kin of Francisco García, it is advisable that they should be duly identified before the State by the Inter-American Commission'.³¹¹

While most of the beneficiaries of the Court are still individualized, a substantial portion is not. In 2006, for instance, 21% of the beneficiaries of the Court's provisional measures were 'natural persons, not individualized, members of a group' and 80% concerned 'natural persons individualized'.³¹²

In sum, the Inter-American Commission's precautionary measures on behalf of human rights defenders and others have become more specific and include an obligation of the State to consult with the beneficiaries. This specificity was necessary to make effective the precautionary measure. At the same time it turned out that, in the interest of the persons who were being threatened, it was sometimes necessary to be less specific about the names of the beneficiaries. While in the past, mentioning the names of the persons to be protected in the precautionary measure often was a guarantee for their safety and while often this is still the case, in some cases the beneficiaries prefer not to be mentioned by name for fear of pointing attention to themselves in a way that would in fact worsen their situation. In other cases the beneficiaries are now less specifically listed because they are an entire community or another group, such as everyone visiting the premises of a certain human rights organisation.

Indeed, the Commission has pointed out that its precautionary measures can protect 'either one person or an unquantifiable group of persons, often covering entire populations or communities'.³¹³

In the first case in which the Inter-American Commission took precautionary measures to ensure access to HIV medication the petitioning NGO had requested the Commission to name only one of the persons involved and not to disclose the names of the other 26 victims. The Commission respected this request and noted in its report that El Salvador was informed of the names and that they are on file at the Secretariat of the Commission.³¹⁴

³⁰⁹ Id., §9.

³¹⁰ See e.g. IACHR Alvarez et al. v. Colombia, Order of 13 May 2001, 1st 'Decisional' clause.

³¹¹ Id., 8th 'Considering' clause.

³¹² See IACHR Annual Report 2006, part IV Statistics of the Court, p. 93. See also its statistics for 2005, referring to 20%, Annual Report 2005, p. 76. For examples other than the matter of the Peace Community, see e.g. Matter of Capital El Rodeo I and El Rodeo II Judicial Confinement Center, Order of 8 February 2008, 21st 'Considering' clause and references therein relating to (indigenous) peoples and detainees. In this case the Court noted that 'the possible beneficiaries are identifiable since they are people who are confined or could be admitted as inmates in the future'.

³¹³ CIDH Annual Report, 2001, Chapter III (a), §10 (discussing the Haitian case). In June 2001 the Commission took precautionary measures on behalf of nine named persons and 'other members of the Embera Katio indigenous community of Alto Sinú' who had been abducted from the community's main town and the neighbouring areas. It asked Colombia to take the necessary steps to clarify the whereabouts of the persons who had been abducted and to protect their lives and persons. On behalf of the other members of that indigenous community, who had not yet been abducted but who were working in collaboration with the petitioners, the Commission took precautionary measures as well. The Commission also requested Colombia to investigate, judge and punish those responsible for the attacks against the indigenous community. Annual Report 2001, §17.

³¹⁴ CIDH Jorge Odir Miranda Cortéz et al v. El Salvador, 7 March 2001 (adm.).

In Newton Coutinho Mendes et al. v. Brazil (adm. 1997) the petitioners had alleged that a death squad formed by large ranchers had been murdering ‘persons involved in or suspected of being involved in land occupations in the region’. The Commission also received information ‘that these persons were alleged to be part of a “list of persons marked for death”, known as the “Xinguara list”, drawn up by those large ranchers, and including the names of dozens of persons’.³¹⁵ The petitioners requested precautionary measures on behalf of everyone on this list. Initially the Commission ‘asked the petitioner to provide the name of all the members of the “Xinguara list”, so that the Commission could request that the precautionary measures be extended to all the persons threatened, not only Father Ricardo Rezende’.³¹⁶ The petitioner provided additional information as to ‘the “Xinguara list”, petitioner reported that the list was found at the Fazenda Nazaré and that the local police knew whose names were on the list. Even so, the petitioner had not gained access to most of the names of the persons threatened due to the complicity of the police with the criminals’.³¹⁷ Moreover, ‘the persons against whom the judge of Xinguara had issued arrest warrants were free’ and ‘this was due to the irregular acts of the civilian and military police’.³¹⁸ On this basis the Commission decided to expand its precautionary measures to include everyone on the list, without requiring all names.³¹⁹

In detention cases the Court has also included all detainees, visitors and employees in its protective Orders. It has ordered provisional measures, for instance, in a matter pending before the Commission, where ‘the potential beneficiaries are identifiable, as they are persons held in prison, who might be held in prison in the future, or who enter the prison either in the course of their normal business or occasionally, either as officers or as visitors’.³²⁰ In this respect the fact that some beneficiaries are subsequently transferred to other detention facilities does not take away their status as a beneficiary. The State is still responsible for their custody and they are still identifiable.³²¹

In short, as Cançado Trindade has pointed out, in the last decade provisional measures have assumed considerable importance. About 12,000 persons in Latin America and the Caribbean, ³¹⁵ CIDH Newton Coutinho Mendes et al. v. Brazil, 1 October 1997, §2.

³¹⁶ Id., §56.

³¹⁷ Id., §57.

³¹⁸ Id., §58.

³¹⁹ Id., §59.

³²⁰ See IACHR Matter of the Penitentiary Center of the Central Occidental Region (Uribana Prison) (Venezuela), Order of 2 February 2007, 6th ‘Considering’ clause. See also, e.g. Matter of Yare I and Yare II Capital Region Penitentiary Center, Order of 30 March 2006, 8th ‘Considering’ clause; Matter of Children Deprived of Liberty in the “Complexo do Tatuapé” of FEBEM, Order of 30 November 2005, 6th ‘Considering’ clause (and concurring opinions by García-Ramírez and Cançado Trindade); Matter of Mendoza Prisons, Order of 22 November 2004, 13th ‘Considering’ clause and Matter of Monagas Judicial Confinement Center (“La Pica”), Order of 6 July 2004, 8th ‘Considering’ clause. In a case against Honduras the petitioners observed that the State had not provided exact figures on the number of juveniles held in adult penal institutions, but according to the Office of the National Human Rights Commissioner this concerned 201 juveniles. They referred to a study that same year by the Human Rights Commissioner reporting that of the 84 juveniles held in the Jalteva prison, 50 were held for vagrancy, 15 for sniffing resistol and the others for taking drugs, including marijuana, ‘for their own protection’ and ‘for being orphans’. CIDH Minors in detention v. Honduras, 10 March 1999 (merits), §17.

³²¹ IACHR Matter of the persons imprisoned in the “Dr. Sebastião Martins Silveira” Penitentiary in Araraquara, São Paulo (Brazil), Order of 30 September 2006, 10th ‘Considering’ clause (‘the beneficiaries of the measures are identifiable and are those persons detained at the Araraquara Penitentiary for whose benefit the adoption of the protective measures was ordered on July 28, 2006, without regard to the fact that they have been referred to some other penitentiary, since the State is still responsible for their custody’).

including the members of whole communities, are covered by the Court's provisional measures.³²²

4.4.5 Identification and representation

In its provisional measures in the case of the Communities of the Jiguamiandó and the Curbaradó (2003) the Court considered that it was 'appropriate to order provisional measures of protection for the members of the communities composed of the Community Council of the Jiguamiandó and the families of the Curbaradó that encompass all the members of the said communities'. It noted that 'it is evident that the communities comprising the Community Council of the Jiguamiandó and the families of the Curbaradó, made up of approximately 2,125 persons, forming 515 families, constitute an organized community, situated in a specific geographical location in the municipality of Carmen del Darién, Department of Chocó, whose members can be identified and specified and who, because they form part of the said community, are all in a situation of equal risk of suffering acts of aggression against their safety and lives, as well as being forcibly displaced from their territory, a situation that prevents them from exploiting the natural resources necessary for their subsistence'.³²³

The subsequent developments in this case show how identification and representation can be interrelated. Several years after the initial Order, the representative of the 32 families of Puerto Lleras and Pueblo Nuevo of Jiguamiandó river basin, and the representative of the 177 families of the Community Council of Curbaradó had rejected and challenged the representation by the NGO petitioning this case³²⁴ 'and they requested to be granted the same guarantees provided to other displaced groups to access the "humanitarian zones" represented by such organization and direct communication with the State to agree on measures to their benefit. In that regard, the State informed the Court that it had received various petitions from those who claim to represent said ³²² IACHR Las penitenciarías de Mendoza v. Argentina, Order of 30 March 2006, Individual Opinion of Judge Cançado Trindade §7. He noted that just in the Matter of the Pueblo Indígena Kankuamo (Colombia) there were 6,000 beneficiaries; in the Matter of the Community of San José de Apartadó (Colombia) the number of beneficiaries was more than 1,200; in the Matter of the Communities of Jiguamiandó and Curbaradó (Colombia) the number of beneficiaries exceeded 2,000; in the Matter of Urso Branco (Brazil), almost 900 inmates were the beneficiaries; in the Matter of the Pueblo Indígena Sarayaku (Ecuador), there were approximately 1,200 beneficiaries.

³²³ IACHR Communities of the Jiguamiandó and the Curbaradó, Order of 6 March 2003, 9th 'Considering' clause. In their Concurring opinion in this case Sergio García-Ramírez and Alirio Abreu-Burelli referred to their earlier statement that 'membership of the group of potential victims who benefit from the measures is not based on the precise identification and indication of each individual by name, but according to objective criteria – based on the linkage of membership and the observed risks – which will permit the beneficiaries to be specified when the measures are implemented. The intention is to encompass the danger faced by the members of a community, not merely a few individuals, as is generally the case. It is also necessary to take into account that one of the elements of this case, which could characterize other cases, is that the potential victims choose not to provide their names, owing to the very real risk that this identification might increase their exposure to the irreparable damage that we are trying to prevent'. They were 'pleased to observe that this criterion, accepted for the first time in the said Order corresponding to the Peace Community of San José de Apartadó, is the one that prevails today in the Court's jurisprudence, as can be observed in the measures adopted for the Communities of the Jiguamiandó and the Curbaradó. In this case, the measures encompass a group of identifiable persons who, because they form part of a community, are in a situation of grave risk'.

³²⁴ The Inter-Ecclesiastical Justice and Peace Commission.

families in order to have their representation recognized. In this sense, the Court was requested to indicate the name of the individual beneficiaries of these provisional measures to allow proper implementation thereof.³²⁵

The Court called a hearing specifically on this issue, and at the end of this hearing it found that ‘the universe of individuals who at this time form part of the beneficiary communities cannot be accurately identified or established’.³²⁶ It held:

“The criteria submitted by the Commission in its request for provisional measures are indeed insufficient for that purpose. Particularly, at this time the geographical standards for the group of individuals who allegedly benefit from these provisional measures are not clear enough.”³²⁷

It pointed out that the Commission should specify ‘to the Court what is the universe of individuals who benefit from these provisional measures, which were adopted at their request’.³²⁸ “To that effect, the Commission must indicate specific criteria to determine and identify the beneficiaries of these measures as a group”. Meanwhile, however, the existing provisional measures remained in force.³²⁹

4.5 Conclusion on beneficiaries and addressees of provisional measures

In order to truly examine the protection offered by provisional measures it must be clear who is included as a beneficiary and whether and how the beneficiaries have been consulted about the measures. While it does not appear appropriate to address an order for provisional measures to the alleged victim instead of to the State, as the European Court has done in hunger strike cases, it is important to make sure that the State’s positions and arguments are duly taken into account. In order to uphold the legitimacy of provisional measures it is vital to adhere to principles of procedural fairness.

Both as to purpose and as to substance the provisional measures should be consistent with similar measures already taken in order to increase their credibility and avoid discriminatory application vis-à-vis various beneficiaries and addressees. Comparable situations should be treated similarly and different situations should be treated differently.

The criterion of ‘balance of convenience’, used by international adjudicators (in cases not involving human rights) and also by some domestic courts, is inappropriate in human rights cases. Only if there is evidence of dispute between (potential) beneficiaries about the required substance of provisional measures this criterion could play a role. In other words, in the face of irreparable harm to persons adjudicators should not balance the rights of the intended beneficiaries with the general interest. In urgent cases involving indigenous culture, for instance, the interest of the ³²⁵ IACHR Asunto comunidades del Jiguamiandó y del Curbaradó (Colombia), Order of 5 February 2008, 4th ‘Whereas’ clause.

³²⁶ Id., 15th ‘Considering’ clause.

³²⁷ Ibid.

³²⁸ Ibid.

³²⁹ IACHR Asunto comunidades del Jiguamiandó y del Curbaradó (Colombia), Order of 5 February 2008, 16th ‘Considering’ clause (“Notwithstanding the above and until the Court renders a decision, the measures already adopted by the Court in its Order of March 6, 2003 (Operating Paragraph 1) remain fully in force and the subsequent Orders of November 17, 2004, March 15, 2005, and February 7, 2006 (supra ‘Having seen’ clauses 1 and 2) reinforce the obligation of the State to promptly adopt any measures necessary to protect the life and personal integrity “[o]f all members of the communities formed by the Community Council of Jiguamiandó and Curbaradó families”).

economic well being of the country as a whole should not play a role in denying provisional measures. Arguments about rights of the general population could more appropriately be considered in reporting procedures (if available) or as arguments at the merits stage.

As noted in Chapter X, when the right to culture of indigenous peoples is at stake their right to self-determination must be taken into account. This right is also relevant in order to determine who should be the beneficiaries of provisional measures to protect cultural survival. If alleged victims request an adjudicator to use provisional measures in order to protect collective aspects of their rights the adjudicator must have prima facie evidence that this will indeed be to the benefit of the group involved. The petitioners do not necessarily need to show formal representation of all beneficiaries. On the other hand, if the aim is to prevent irreparable harm to an indigenous group the alleged victim must be seen to represent the interests of the members of this group. The provisional measures required should not be such as to cause irreparable harm to other indigenous groups in the area. Such harm, however, is not likely to result from a request to postpone industrial activities threatening the natural habitat. The fact that the interests of other indigenous groups could eventually justify certain infringements of the rights of the victims does not mean that the adjudicator could not take provisional measures protecting these rights pending the proceedings. In other words, in the face of prima facie evidence of irreparable harm competing interests should generally not prevent the use of this type of provisional measures. On the other hand, by arguing or implying that other indigenous groups or other members of the same group have differing views about the risk of irreparable harm to the natural habitat a State could try to convince the adjudicator not to take provisional measures or to withdraw those measures already taken. This relates to the question of the evidentiary requirements for the use of provisional measures. Nevertheless, while the adjudicator may wish to balance the interests of different indigenous groups with regard to certain lands, normally this would not be necessary at the stage of provisional measures exactly because such measures mainly aim at halting certain developments pending the proceedings.

Apart from the question of the interests of the beneficiaries of provisional measures, the question has arisen of how to establish their identity. This applies in particular to situations of death threats and harassment and mass expulsion. The requirement that the beneficiaries must agree with the provisional measures applies particularly in cases in which they are indeed identified by name. Clearly, if they do not wish such identification it should not be forced upon them. Sometimes identifying a person who is being threatened will assist in this person's protection by giving him or her a name and a face.³³⁰ In other cases beneficiaries might wish to remain anonymous exactly for fear that threats may increase even more if they are publicly identified for their involvement in an international procedure.

Thornberry has noted:

"Instead of defining beneficiaries and then allocating rights, international law has often proceeded the other way round. Rights have been set out and continue to be developed in such a way that the contours of the communities appropriating them become clearer".³³¹

While the statement was made with respect to rights on the merits in cases involving culture, it seems applicable even more to the beneficiaries of provisional measures in such cases.

The majority of persons referred to as the beneficiaries of provisional measures are to be protected against death threats and harassment. In some situations all persons visiting the premises of an NGO are subject to threats. In such cases the practice of using provisional measures to protect all of them is appropriate. If only the members of the organisation working there would be granted protection the NGO would not be able to function properly because all other persons visiting the premises to request its assistance, to deliver goods or run errands would still receive threats and risk their lives. While they are not identified by name, the beneficiaries of the required protective measures are clear to the State.

³³⁰ More generally on the importance of 'naming names' see e.g. Bronkhorst (1998), pp. 457-474.

³³¹ Thornberry (2002), p. 52.

Sometimes beneficiaries may live in remote areas or be otherwise difficult to reach. In such cases it should not be required to establish written consent of each beneficiary, as long as there are indications that they are likely to agree and as long as there are no indications of disagreement.

Finally, the wider impact of provisional measures deserves attention. A good faith implementation of the obligations under the human rights treaty warrants a pro-active stance of the State to ensure the underlying rationale to a provisional measure is being met. When there are indications that this rationale would require a halt, for instance, to the expulsion of others than the specific beneficiary as well, measures would be warranted in order to arrange matters domestically to this effect so that recourse to the international adjudicator by all others similarly situated is no longer necessary.

5 THE RELATION TO CESSATION, ASSURANCES OF NON-REPETITION AND REPARATION

5.1 Introduction

The petitioner has the right to a procedural remedy and, already pending the proceedings, the substantive right to respect for his life and personal integrity. The adjudicator has the authority to use provisional measures. The State not only has the duty to provide for effective remedies and reparation, but also to prevent human rights violations, pending the proceedings as well as upon the conclusion of these proceedings. This obligation to prevent applies in particular to core rights such as the right to life and the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment.³³²

This section deals with the relation between the substance of provisional measures and of the legal consequences of a failure to comply with obligations under human rights treaties, such as cessation, assurances of non-repetition and forms of reparation.

The underlying argument in the previous chapters, on the various situations in which human rights adjudicators have used provisional measures, was that if there were no likelihood of finding a violation on the merits, given the applicable substantive law, the use of provisional measures pending the case would be inappropriate.³³³

It is argued that a similar approach should be taken as well for the relation between the substance of orders for provisional measures and of orders for reparation or other statements regarding the obligations of the State upon a finding of violation. If the adjudicator is unlikely to order certain measures, such as non-refoulement, following such a finding, it makes little sense to order provisional measures to that effect pending the proceedings.³³⁴ Thus it is submitted that the existing and expected case law on cessation, non-repetition and reparation (restitution) is relevant when deciding on the use of provisional measures.

³³² See in general, e.g. Shelton (2005a). See also Wellens (2002) noting that '(t)he basic imperative of human rights protection underpinning this network of regional and universal instruments and regimes irreversibly permeates almost every single aspect of the way states conduct their internal and external affairs', p. 15; 'the guarantee of effective legal protection must be considered a general principle of law', p. 16.

³³³ As always a delicate balance must be achieved with the aim not to prejudge the merits. See also Chapter I (ICJ), section 3.6. In particular provisional measures may not prejudge those aspects of the merits that are unrelated to preventing irreparable harm, but it is inevitable that with regard to preventing such harm there is some relation with the merits. See further Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk), as it is argued that the issue of prejudgment is relevant especially in the context of assessment of risk (evidentiary matters).

As discussed in Chapter I, it has been pointed out in the context of the ICJ and its predecessor that provisional measures aim to prevent pre-emption of any meaningful reparation by the respondent State, such as in situations where pecuniary redress would be inadequate.³³⁵ Obviously in its judgments the human rights adjudicator must be able to provide the relief requested as well.

In Gabcikovo-Nagymaros (1997) the ICJ pointed out that it was 'mindful that, in the field of environmental protection, vigilance and prevention are required on account of the often irreversible character of damage to the environment and of the limitations inherent in the very mechanism of reparation of this type of damage'.³³⁶

In human rights cases a similar approach applies, in which the statement could be that in the field of human rights vigilance and prevention are required on account of the often irreversible and irreparable character of harm to persons and of the limitations inherent in the very mechanism of reparation of this type of harm. This section aims to explain why.

In human rights adjudication the substance of provisional measures shares a striking resemblance with that found in friendly settlement agreements, in statements on the obligations of the State upon a finding of violation, and in judgments on reparations. The reason may be that they all aim at preventing further irreparable harm.

Sometimes a distinction is made between promotional, reactive and preventive human rights mechanisms. Judicial systems are generally seen as reactive in nature. Of course the reparation required may be forward looking and in that sense preventive. Yet the provisional measures, as taken by the human rights adjudicators, are inherently preventive. Even if they aim at halting ongoing rather than new violations they may be partly reactive, but still are predominantly preventive.

Indeed provisional measures aim at prevention while reparation aims at redress. Thus, at first sight they are relevant before and after the fact, respectively. In reality, however, particularly in relation to irreparable harm, an adjudicator may find on the merits that the most appropriate form of redress is for this harm not to occur. In its implementation the required measure may be a permanent injunction. In that sense both provisional measures and the obligation to prevent upon the finding that a violation would otherwise (continue to) occur, as well as forms of reparation are relevant before the fact. The substance and ultimate aim are the same: preventing irreparable harm to persons. It is their function that is different. A finding on the merits that a certain event must be prevented is a determination that not preventing this would constitute a violation resulting in irreparable harm to persons. A provisional measure, on the other hand, serves to prevent acts or omissions by the State that would make impossible such a finding. If the adjudicator determines in its decision on the merits that there is insufficient evidence for such a finding, the State is allowed to proceed with its previous course of (in)action. If it does find a violation, true reparation would hardly be available if the irreparable harm to the person has already occurred pending the proceedings.

Thus, alleged victims have the right to a remedy in the sense that they should be able to initiate a meaningful procedure. The adjudicators may then use provisional measures pending this procedure in order to ensure the effectiveness of the procedure. Ensuring this effectiveness means in particular that a meaningful outcome such as cessation, assurances of non-repetition and specific forms of reparation must not be made impossible already pending the case.³³⁷

³³⁴ See further the Conclusion to Part II.

³³⁵ See e.g. Dumbault (1932), p. 165.

³³⁶ ICJ Case concerning the Gabcikovo-Nagymaros project (Hungary v. Slovakia), 25 September 1997, §140. At the same time it did not apply the precautionary principle (see section 4.3.5 of Chapter I). Moreover, it did not use provisional measures (which were ruled out by the Parties now that they had brought the case before the ICJ by an Agreement excluding the possibility to request provisional measures). In addition it did not discuss the issue of 'ecological necessity'.

This section first refers to the relevant law and practice of human rights adjudicators regarding the correlation between orders for provisional measures and judgments on the merits and reparation. It then refers to the relation between cessation, non-repetition and reparation. Subsequently it singles out specific issues – other than halting executions, which will be discussed separately – in which continuity between prevention and reparation may be observed. In the context of protection against death threats it refers separately to the obligation to investigate, prosecute and punish. Finally, based on a discussion of the case law on the death penalty developed by the HRC and the Inter-American Court, the argument is made that human rights adjudicators should pay particular attention to the relation between provisional measures on the one hand and on cessation and reparation on the other.

5.2 Provisional measures and reparation

Section 3 discussed the specificity not of reparation but of provisional measures. Obviously, if the adjudicator is precise about the protective measures required pending the proceedings, it should also, following a finding on the merits, give a precise indication of the expected form of reparation.

The HRC and, more specifically, the Inter-American Commission and Court have paid particular attention to the issue of reparations.³³⁸ Yet the HRC has done so inconsistently and, at least until 2003, without consideration for the relationship between provisional measures and reparation. With its General Comment (2004) on Article 2 ICCPR (the right to an effective remedy) the HRC finally acknowledged the relationship between provisional measures and reparation.³³⁹

The European Court has only incidentally referred to forms of reparation other than those involving financial compensation or even just the finding of a violation in itself.³⁴⁰ Even in cases dealing with extreme violations comparable to those dealt with by the Inter-American Court, the European Court has maintained that it ‘will not make consequential orders or declaratory state-

³³⁷ Where possible this book refers to the term ‘reparation’ when dealing with substantive forms of reparation. Nevertheless, some adjudicators use the term ‘remedies’ both for procedural recourse and for these substantive forms of reparation.

³³⁸ Lawson (1999) refers to the ‘non-binding’ character of the HRC’s Views and speculates that it is this character that may have stimulated it to be very concrete in its recommendations. Yet this does not necessarily serve to explain this approach in light of the fact that the Inter-American Court does this as well. Moreover, the HRC emphasises the obligation to comply with its decisions in good faith, defying the ‘non-binding character’ that has traditionally been ascribed to it. See also Chapter XVI (Legal status).

³³⁹ See further sections 3.1 and 5.6 of this Chapter.

³⁴⁰ E.g. in ECtHR Hentrich v. France, 22 September 1994, §71, the Court considered ‘the best form of redress would in principle be to return the land. Failing that, the calculation of pecuniary damage must be based on the current market value of the land’. In this case it postponed a decision under Article 50. In that decision, of 3 July 1995, the Court simply ordered monetary damages, noting that the State had pointed out that it ‘could not, as its national law currently stood, take the measure recommended by the Court. Having become part of the private property of the State, the “pre-empted” land was subject to the provisions of the Code of State Property and it was impracticable to transfer it, let alone without requiring any payment’, §10. See also Clooth v. Belgium, 12 September 1991. Generally see e.g. Van Emmerik (1997) and Van Kempen (2003).

ments in this regard'.³⁴¹ Yet the text of the ECHR does not force the Court to take such a limited approach.³⁴²

The African Commission and the Bosnia Chamber have been more specific in their approaches. Strangely, Article XI (1(b)) of Annex 6 to the Dayton Accord stipulates that the Bosnia Chamber shall determine what steps the respondent Party shall take to remedy a breach, 'including orders to cease and desist, monetary relief (...) and provisional measures'. While this illustrates how closely related orders for protective measures pending the proceedings really are to such orders as part of judgments on reparation, traditionally the term 'provisional measures' is reserved for measures required pending the proceedings.³⁴³

Of all applicable human rights treaties the American Convention best reflects the correlation between provisional measures and reparation.³⁴⁴ Article 63 ACHR unites the two concepts in one provision. Article 63(1) stipulates:

"If the Court finds that there has been a violation of a right or freedom protected by this Convention, the Court shall rule that the injured party be ensured the enjoyment of his right or freedom that was violated. It shall also rule, if appropriate, that the consequences of the measure or situation that constituted the breach of such right or freedom be remedied and that fair compensation be paid to the injured party".

Article 63(2) provides:

"In cases of extreme gravity and urgency, and when necessary to avoid irreparable damage to persons, the Court shall adopt such provisional measures as it deems pertinent in matters it has under consideration. With respect to a case not yet submitted to the Court, it may act at the request of the Commission".

The Inter-American Court confirmed this relationship in James and others (2001).³⁴⁵ In fact the decisions of the Inter-American Commission and Court show that, throughout a single proceeding, positive obligations may be required at various stages (provisional measures, merits and reparation). This is due to the underlying purpose that cessation, non-repetition and reparation have in common, as discussed in section 5.3.

³⁴¹ ECtHR Akdivar and others v. Turkey, 1 April 1998 (compensation), §47.

³⁴² See e.g. Van Emmerik (1997) and Lawson (1999), p. 85.

³⁴³ In the Inter-American system provisional measures are sometimes maintained until after the Court's judgment on the merits, and often even until after its judgment on reparations. In these cases the Court points out that the case will only be closed once the judgment on reparations has been implemented and there is no complete implementation as long as petitioners or witnesses are still being threatened and harassed. See also Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction and admissibility).

³⁴⁴ Article 27 of the 1998 Protocol on the African Court of Human and Peoples' Rights makes a similar link, but the 2008 Protocol on the Statute of the African Court of Justice and Human Rights does not. Instead its Article 28 on the jurisdiction of the Court, provides under (h) the jurisdiction over disputes relating to 'the nature or extent of the reparation to be made for the breach of an international obligation'. In addition, Article 45, entitled 'Compensation', but referring to a greater range of reparations, stipulates: "Without prejudice to its competence to rule on issues of compensation at the request of a party by virtue of paragraph 1(h), of Article 28 of the present Statute, the Court may, if it considers that there was a violation of a human or peoples' right, order any appropriate measures in order to remedy the situation, including granting fair compensation".

³⁴⁵ IACHR James et al. v. Trinidad & Tobago, Order of 26 November 2001, 12th 'Considering' clause.

5.3 Provisional measures and cessation, non-repetition, reparation: a unison of purpose

The ILC Articles on State Responsibility have laid down secondary rules to be invoked by (injured) States against States that have committed an internationally wrongful act. Such responsibility is triggered when an act or omission is attributable to the State and constitutes a breach of an international obligation of the State, including a human rights obligation. Indeed the underlying concepts and principles in the ILC Articles are also relevant to the relation between individuals and States, as apparent from the case law developed by the various human rights adjudicators.³⁴⁶ Thus the Basic Principles and Guidelines on the Right to a Remedy and Reparation for Victims of Gross Violations of International Human Rights Law and Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law (2006)³⁴⁷ have been based, where appropriate, on the ILC Articles.³⁴⁸ This section deals with the contents of decisions on the merits and reparation. In the next sections the parallel with provisional measures is explored.

Strictly speaking assurances of non-repetition are not individual forms of reparation, but constitute more general obligations. Cessation and satisfaction are equally measures more generally owed, yet they obviously have special significance to the specific victims. These obligations arise upon a finding of a violation, but prior to additional statements on reparation.³⁴⁹ This chapter takes into account the relation of such obligations with obligations based on provisional measures. The substance, for instance, of guarantees of non-repetition may coincide with the protection required in provisional measures.

Part of the general responsibility of States that have committed an internationally wrongful act is that they must ‘continue’ to perform the obligation breached (Article 29 ILC Articles on State Responsibility, 2001). In practice this means that they must resume performance of the obligation. If the internationally wrongful act is continuing, the responsible State is obliged to cease it (Article 30 (a) ILC Articles). This is relevant in the context of any continuing human rights violation. Sometimes it is necessary pending the proceedings to use provisional measures ³⁴⁶ See e.g. Van Boven Study concerning the right to restitution, compensation and rehabilitation for victims of gross violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms, Final Report, E/CN.4/Sub.2/1993/8, 2 July 1993; revised version E/CN.4/Sub.2/1996/17, 24 May 1996 and E/CN.4/1997/104, 16 January 1997; independent expert to prepare a revised version of the Principles and Guidelines, Bassiouni, reports E/CN.4/1999/65 and E/CN.4/2000/62; Shelton (2005); De Feyter/Parmentier/Bossuyt/Lemmens (2005); Gumedze (2003); Van Boven (2001b); Van Boven (1999); Klein 1999 and Tomuschat (1999).

³⁴⁷ Basic principles and Guidelines on the Right to a Remedy and Reparation for Victims of Gross Violations of International Law and Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law, GA Resolution, 16 December 2005. See also Article 24 jo. 30 & 31 International Convention for the Protection of all Persons against Enforced Disappearances and the Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for victims of Crime and Abuse of Power, Adopted by General Assembly resolution 40/34, 29 November 1985.

³⁴⁸ For a different view see Germany’s position that the Basic Principles ‘erroneously sought to apply the principles of State responsibility to relationships between States and individuals’. See also d’Argent (2005). Yet see Van Boven’s appropriate criticism of the German position, Van Boven (2007), pp. 729-730. See further, e.g. Shelton (2005), pp. 28-29.

³⁴⁹ See also Report of the Independent Expert to update the Set of Principles to combat impunity, Orentlicher, E/CN.4/2005/102, 18 February 2005, under D. See in particular footnote 76 at p. 28; for the revised text of the Principles see E/CN.4/2005/102/Add.1, 8 February 2005, principle 35. See also Commission resolution 2005/81. See further Van Boven (2007), p. 735 confirming this distinction. Orentlicher also points out that ‘the right to restitution, compensation and rehabilitation does not pertain solely to “individual measures”, nor are measures of satisfaction appropriate only as “general measures”’.

exactly in order to make sure that an alleged act that is likely to be internationally wrongful is ceased immediately or in order to ensure the continued performance of an obligation, e.g. in the context of ongoing detention and access to health care.

States have the duty to organise their government apparatus so that they are capable of ensuring full enjoyment of human rights. As a consequence of this obligation they must prevent violations. To the extent violations have nevertheless taken place they must use all means at their disposal to investigate the facts and punish the perpetrators.³⁵⁰

The Inter-American Court has often emphasised the positive obligation to investigate death threats and harassment and prosecute those responsible. It considers these measures against impunity necessary in three phases of the proceedings: in the judgments on the merits,³⁵¹ in the judgments on reparations and also as part of its provisional measures.

In the judgment on the merits this is necessary because the obligation to guarantee and ensure the effective exercise of the rights in the ACHR is ‘independent of and different from the obligation to make reparation’.³⁵² This means that the State is obliged to investigate the facts and punish those responsible even if the victim or his next of kin would decide to waive the measures of reparation.³⁵³ Otherwise it would fail to comply with its general obligation to ‘ensure the free and full exercise’ of the rights under the ACHR.³⁵⁴

In its judgments on reparations the Court often reiterates the obligation to investigate the facts and identify and punish the perpetrators. From its first cases the Court has emphasised the importance for the next of kin of the victims of their right to know what happened.³⁵⁵ Equally, they have a right to know the identity of the perpetrators. The State had the duty to properly investigate the facts and punish those responsible.³⁵⁶

³⁵⁰ In general see Independent study on best practices, including recommendations, to assist states in strengthening their domestic capacity to combat all aspects of impunity, by Diane Orentlicher, E/CN.4/2004/88, 27 February 2004; Updated Set of principles, E/CN.4/2005/102/Add.1, 8 February 2005 and E/CN.4/2005/102, 18 February 2005.

³⁵¹ See e.g. IACHR Velásquez Rodríguez, 19 July 1988 discussing the merits: “The State has a legal duty to take reasonable steps to prevent human rights violations and to use the means at its disposal to carry out a serious investigation of violations committed within its jurisdiction, to identify those responsible, to impose the appropriate punishment and to ensure the victim adequate compensation”, §174. “The State is obligated to investigate every situation involving a violation of the rights protected by the Convention. If the State apparatus acts in such a way that the violation goes unpunished and the victim’s full enjoyment of such rights is not restored as soon as possible, the State has failed to comply with its duty to ensure the free and full exercise of those rights to the persons within its jurisdiction. The same is true when the State allows private persons or groups to act freely and with impunity to the detriment of the rights recognized by the Convention”, §176 and “The duty to investigate facts of this type continues as long as there is uncertainty about the fate of the person who has disappeared. Even in the hypothetical case that those individually responsible for crimes of this type cannot be legally punished under certain circumstances, the State is obligated to use the means at its disposal to inform the relatives of the fate of the victims and, if they have been killed, the location of their remains”, §181.

³⁵² IACHR Garrido and Baigorria, 27 August 1998 (Reparations), §72.

³⁵³ See e.g. IACHR Garrido and Baigorria, 27 August 1998 (reparations), §72.

³⁵⁴ See e.g. IACHR Bámaca Velásquez, judgment of 25 November 2000 (merits), §129; Garrido and Baigorria, judgment of 27 August 1998 (reparations), §73 and Paniagua Morales et al., judgment of 8 March 1998, §178.

³⁵⁵ See e.g. IACHR Velásquez Rodríguez, 29 July 1988 (merits), §181; Godínez Cruz, 20 January 1989 (merits), §191 and Aloeboetoe et al., 10 September 1993 (reparation), §109.

³⁵⁶ See e.g. IACHR El Amparo, judgment of 14 September 1996 (reparation), §61; Blake, 22 January 1999 (reparations), §65 and Súarez Rosero, 20 January 1999 (reparations), §§79-80, pointing out

The Court has defined impunity as the ‘total lack of investigation, prosecution, capture, trial and conviction of those responsible for violations of the rights protected by the American Convention’. In this respect ‘the State has the obligation to use all the legal means at its disposal to combat that situation, since impunity fosters chronic recidivism of human rights violations, and total defenselessness of victims and their relatives’.³⁵⁷

State responsibility also entails that the responsible State offers assurances and guarantees of non-repetition, that is, ‘if circumstances so require’ (Article 30 (b) ILC Articles). In cases, for instance, of continuing harassment of human rights defenders, circumstances may certainly require the State to offer them such guarantees. In fact, as we have seen, on the merits various adjudicators have referred to the obligation to investigate the facts and punish the perpetrators.³⁵⁸ At the same time the aforementioned Basic Principles eventually did not refer to this when they discussed guarantees of non-repetition. Instead they refer to, among others, strengthening the independence of the judiciary, ensuring ‘effective civilian control of military and security forces’ and one more directly preventive measure, namely ‘Protecting persons in the legal, medical and health-care professions, the media and other related professions, and human rights defenders’. In addition the Basic Principles note that the measures listed are not exhaustive (‘should include’) and that they ‘will also contribute to prevention’.³⁵⁹

While cessation obviously is a direct consequence of the finding of a violation and is an obligation that applies collectively as well, the Basic Principles also refer to ‘effective measures aimed at the cessation of continuing violations as a form of satisfaction to the victim’.³⁶⁰

In human rights law it appears that not just decisions on provisional measures, but also decisions on the merits and reparation focus on prevention and, ultimately, protection. This is confirmed by the Basic Principles, which point out that the obligation to ‘respect, ensure respect for and implement’ international human rights law includes the duty to take appropriate measures to prevent violations. They add that this obligation includes as well the duty to investigate violations and take appropriate action against the perpetrators, provide equal access to justice for alleged victims and provide effective remedies to victims, including reparation. In other words, according to the Principles the scope of the obligation to respect, ensure respect for and implement human rights law encompasses the duty to prevent, investigate, provide a remedy and provide reparation. As we will see, in fact these obligations are interrelated.

In 1993 UN Special Rapporteur Van Boven, appointed to deal with the issue of reparations, stressed that gross human rights violations are by their nature irreparable. Any form of reparation this is already an obligation on the merits, not just on reparations, referring to its judgment on the merits in this case of 12 November 1997, 6th operative paragraph.

³⁵⁷ IACHR Paniagua Morales et al., judgment of 8 March 1998 (merits), §173. It has also found certain amnesty laws to be incompatible with the ACHR and therefore lacking legal effect. Barrios Altos v. Peru, judgment of 14 March 2001 (merits).

³⁵⁸ See e.g. IACHR Asunto de la Cárcel de Urso Branco (Brasil), Resolución de 2 de mayo de 2008, 25th ‘Considering’ clause, specifically noting that the investigation of the facts and the eventual punishment of those responsible is a fundamental measure in order to ensure non-repetition.

³⁵⁹ Basic Principles, §23.

³⁶⁰ Basic Principles, §22(a). As noted, in her report Orentlicher correctly distinguishes between reparation, satisfaction, cessation and assurances. See e.g. Independent study on best practices, including recommendations, to assist states in strengthening their domestic capacity to combat all aspects of impunity, by Diane Orentlicher, Updated Set of principles, E/CN.4/2005/102/Add.1, 8 February 2005 and E/CN.4/2005/102, 18 February 2005, under D. See in particular footnote 76 at p. 28; for the revised text of the Principles see E/CN.4/2005/102/Add.1, 8 February 2005, principle 35. See also Van Boven (2007) agreeing with that approach.

would inevitably fail to be proportionate to the harm suffered.³⁶¹ Indeed, prevention of further such harm is the most appropriate action required of the State. With regard to the original victim this prevention could consist of halting continued harassment or ongoing adverse detention situations, etc. With regard to those related to persons killed, this could mean preventing more killings perpetrated by the same group of persons.³⁶²

The Basic Principles have confirmed the developments in international law specifically dealing with the relationship between individuals and States. At the same time they are necessarily more specific in their attention to the needs of individuals rather than States. This is illustrated, among others, by the fact that next to the customary restitution and compensation, as laid down also in the ILC Articles,³⁶³ in the Basic Principles from the outset rehabilitation was named as a form of reparation as well.

The Basic Principles refer to the duty to prevent not just in the section on the scope of the obligation to respect and ensure respect for human rights law.³⁶⁴ Also in the context of the treatment of victims they note that ‘appropriate measures should be taken to ensure their safety, physical and psychological well-being and privacy’.³⁶⁵ In addition, when discussing access to justice for victims they refer to the obligation to ‘ensure their safety from intimidation and retaliation, as well as that of their families and witnesses, before, during and after judicial, administrative, or other proceedings that affect the interests of victims’.³⁶⁶

The whole point of using provisional measures is that the irreparable harm threatened should be prevented. If these measures are subsequently ignored by the State, the adjudicator should comment on this in strongly worded terms. It should follow this up by ordering reparation to the effect of assuring non-repetition so that at least other persons would not suffer the same fate.³⁶⁷ Moreover, if a person has been tortured, the adjudicator should order reparations to the effect that the State would arrange for medical and psychological treatment³⁶⁸ and an official public apology.³⁶⁹

³⁶¹ See Study concerning the right to restitution, compensation and rehabilitation for victims of gross violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms, Final Report submitted by Theo van Boven, Special Rapporteur, E/CN.4/Sub.2/1993/45/8, 2 July 1993, §131. See also Revised set of basic principles and guidelines on the right to reparation for victims of gross violations of human rights and humanitarian law prepared by Mr. Theo van Boven pursuant to Sub-Commission decision 1995/117, U.N. Doc. E/CN.4/Sub.2/1996/17, 24 May 1996.

³⁶² In 1998 the then Commission on Human Rights appointed independent expert Bassiouni who continued examination of the issue. Bassiouni eventually submitted the Van Boven/Bassiouni Guidelines to the Commission, which adopted them in 2005. They were subsequently adopted by the General Assembly in December 2005. With regard to the obligations of the State the final version refers to ‘should’ rather than ‘shall’. Yet the Preamble emphasizes that the Principles and Guidelines did not entail new obligations but instead identified ‘mechanisms, modalities, procedures and methods for the implementation of existing legal obligations’. Thus it would have made sense to use the term ‘shall’, rather than ‘should’ to refer to the existing obligations of States.

³⁶³ According to Article 31 ILC Articles the responsible State is obliged to ‘make full reparation for the injury caused by the internationally wrongful act’ and restitution, compensation and satisfaction are named as forms of reparation (Article 34 ILC Articles).

³⁶⁴ Basic Principles, §3(a).

³⁶⁵ Basic Principles, §10.

³⁶⁶ Basic Principles, §12(b). The operative term used here is ‘should’, but, as noted, shall or must would reflect more appropriately the law as developed by the human rights adjudicators.

³⁶⁷ See also Chapter XVIII (Follow-up).

³⁶⁸ Rehabilitation, Basic Principles, §21, and to the extent costs have already been made, also compensation, Basic Principles, §20(e).

³⁶⁹ Satisfaction, see §22(e).

Apart from the traditional remedy of payment of compensation to victims or their family, the Inter-American Court also mentions more concrete forms of reparation such as the obligation to prevent and investigate human rights violations and to punish perpetrators.³⁷⁰ The obligations are often even more precise: to identify the remains of the victims and surrender them to their families; to declare domestic proceedings invalid; to order that victims are guaranteed a new trial or to take measures to reform domestic legal provisions. Another form of reparation the Court has required is to reopen a school, to attach a commemorative plaque to a public building or to name a street or a school after the victims.³⁷¹

The Inter-American Court has also referred to the obligation to declare domestic proceedings invalid, to order a new trial for the victims or to release someone. More generally it has ordered States to take measures to reform domestic legal provisions.³⁷²

In Bámaca Velásquez (2000) the IACHR had found Guatemala responsible for Bámaca's disappearance, torture and death. On the merits the Court stated: "In view of the nature of the instant case, although the Court is unable to order that the injured parties should be guaranteed the enjoyment of the rights and liberties violated, by means of the restitutio in integrum, it must, instead, order the reparation of the consequences of the violation of the rights mentioned and, consequently, the establishment of fair compensation. The amounts and form of this will be determined during the reparations stage".³⁷³

Two important rights of the family members of disappeared persons are the right to the truth and respect for the link between the living and the dead.³⁷⁴ With regard to the right to truth Judge Cançado Trindade pointed out that in light of the State's obligation to cease the violations of human rights, ensuring this right is in fact 'essential to the struggle against impunity' and 'is ineluctably linked to the very realization of justice, and to the guarantee of non-repetition of those violations'.³⁷⁵

A very important obligation the Court has referred to in recent judgments on reparations is to locate bodies, to identify the remains of victims and surrender the remains to the families. In ³⁷⁰ To this extent, its approach is similar to that of the HRC, but not to that of the ECtHR, which – so far – has been rather conservative in this area. See e.g. Van Emmerik (1997) and Van Kempen (2003). See §22, Basic principles on satisfaction, subsection (f) (and Part II, sections 4 and 5 when dealing with gross violations that constitutes crimes under international law).

³⁷¹ See e.g. IACHR Aloeboetoe et al. v. Suriname, Judgment of 10 September 1993 (reparation); The Street Children case (Villagrán Morales et al. v. Guatemala), judgment of 26 May 2001 (reparations).

³⁷² At the same time it is not always in a position to identify the exact legislative, administrative or other measures to be implemented in the internal legislation of a State. In the case of the Street Children, for instance, it did emphasise the obligation of the State, at the reparations stage, to adopt the necessary legislative or other measures in compliance with Article 2 ACHR, even though it had not found a violation of Article 2 in the judgment on the merits. It considered that the State must take the necessary measures to adapt its legislation to Article 19 ACHR (rights of the child to the measures of protection required by his condition as a minor) in order to ensure non-repetition of the violations. The representatives of the victims' next of kin and the Commission had requested the Court to order the State to derogate from the 1979 Minors Code or to bring into force the Children and Youth Code adopted by the Guatemalan Congress in 1996 and the 1997 plan of action for street children. The Court, however, pointed out it could not establish the exact nature of the implementation measures. IACHR 'The Street Children' case (Villagrán Morales et al. v. Guatemala), 26 May 2001 (reparations), §98.

³⁷³ IACHR Bámaca Velásquez v. Guatemala, 25 November 2000, §228.

³⁷⁴ More closely on the latter see Separate Opinion Cançado Trindade in Bámaca Velásquez, 25 November 2000 (merits).

³⁷⁵ IACHR Bámaca Velásquez v. Guatemala, 25 November 2000, Separate Opinion Cançado Trindade, §32.

the Street Children case (2001) the Court stated that Guatemala should ‘adopt the necessary measures to transfer the mortal remains’ of Henry Giovanni Contreras ‘to the place chosen by his next of kin, without any cost to them, so as to satisfy the desire of the family to give them appropriate burial, according to their religious beliefs and customs’.³⁷⁶

The ILC Articles refer to the obligation to give satisfaction insofar as the injury caused ‘cannot be made good by restitution or compensation’. It may ‘consist in an acknowledgment of the breach, an expression of regret, a formal apology or another appropriate modality’ (ILC Article 37).

A form of satisfaction mentioned in the Basic Principles is the search for the whereabouts of the disappeared and the identities of the children abducted. As discussed in Chapter VI, in disappearance cases provisional measures may be used pending the proceedings. After all when a person has recently been disappeared the likelihood of finding this person alive is greater pending the proceedings than upon their conclusion. Provisional measures prompting a State to find a person alive could thus help ensure the least serious consequences of a breach of State responsibility. The Basic Principles note that even when the victims have already been killed satisfaction should still consist of a search for their bodies as well as ‘assistance in the recovery, identification and reburial of the bodies in accordance with the expressed or presumed wish of the victims, or the cultural practices of the families and communities’.³⁷⁷ Circumstances are feasible in which such measures may be required of the State already pending the proceedings, in order to prevent further harm to those left behind.

Among others, in the Street Children case (2001) the Inter-American Court discussed how to deal with those harmful effects of the violations that could not be assessed in monetary terms. It noted that this may include the suffering and distress caused to the direct victims and their next of kin and ‘the impairment of values that are highly significant to them’.³⁷⁸ It was not possible to assign a precise monetary equivalent to the harm. Providing compensation could be done in two ways. The first would be to nevertheless determine a sum of money to be paid, or the assignment of goods or services. A second way would be ‘the execution of acts or works of a public nature or repercussion, which have effects such as recovering the memory of the victims, re-establishing their reputation, consoling their next of kin or transmitting a message of official condemnation of the human rights violations in question and commitment to the efforts to ensure that they do not happen again’.³⁷⁹ In other words, these measures could return some sense of dignity to the victims and their next of kin as well as constitute a preventive measure of a general nature.³⁸⁰

³⁷⁶ IACHR Street Children case, 26 May 2001 (Reparations), §102.

³⁷⁷ Basic Principles, §22(c).

³⁷⁸ IACHR ‘The Street Children’ case (Villagrán Morales et al. v. Guatemala), 26 May 2001 (reparations), §84.

³⁷⁹ IACHR ‘The Street Children’ case (Villagrán Morales et al. v. Guatemala), 26 May 2001 (reparations), §84.

³⁸⁰ Another example from the same case is the Court’s order to ‘designate an educational center with a name allusive to the young victims in this case and to place in this center a plaque’ with their names on it. This would ‘contribute to raising awareness in order to avoid the repetition of harmful acts such as those that occurred in the instant case and will keep the memory of the victims alive’. IACHR Street Children case (Villagrán Morales et al. v. Guatemala), 26 May 2001 (reparations), §103, referring to the names of victims: Henry Giovanni Contreras, Federico Clemente Figueroa Túnchez, Julio Roberto Caal Sandoval, Jovito Josué Juárez Cifuentes and Anstraun Aman Villagrán Morales. The Court also reiterated the obligation to investigate, identify and punish those responsible (§101). See also Benavides Ceballos, judgment of 19 June 1998, §§48.5 and 55 and Aloeboetoe et al. case, Judgment of 10 September 1993 (reparations), §96. Finally see IACHR Plan de Sánchez massacre case (Guatemala), 19 November 2004 (reparations), §§110-111.

In the Basic Principles the right to the truth and the obligation to prosecute and punish perpetrators are not mentioned as examples of guarantees of non-repetition. Instead ‘verification of the facts and full and public disclosure of the truth’ and ‘judicial and administrative sanctions against persons liable for the violations’ are mentioned under ‘satisfaction’.³⁸¹ Public apologies, commemorations and tributes to the victims as well as an official declaration or judicial decision ‘restoring the dignity, the reputation and the rights of the victim and of persons closely connected to the victim’ are such measures of satisfaction.³⁸² When provisional measures ordering States to protect persons against death threats are implemented, among others, through an official declaration by the State to the effect that certain people are not enemies of the State and that threats against them will be investigated and punished, this could almost be seen as a temporary counterpart of the aforementioned forms of reparation.

In other words, making a public apology and providing for public commemorations has a dual function as well: on the one hand recognition, satisfaction and rehabilitation and on the other hand prevention. Thus, pending the proceedings the State may be required to publicly acknowledge the legitimacy of the activities of human rights defenders, journalists and others under threat. In such cases the public statement is meant to prevent specific harm. Indeed, at the stage of provisional measures public apologies or at least public statements condemning rather than condoning or supporting threats and harassments would be warranted as well. The public statement required at the reparations stage in its presentation simply is more permanent and official rather than transitory and its purpose is to ensure satisfaction and general, rather than specific, prevention. Each stage of the proceedings is aimed both at prevention and at reparation.

5.4 A continuum of protection

5.4.1 Introduction

A few examples are given, from different issue areas, in order to illustrate the continuum between the substance of provisional measures on the one hand and cessation, assurances and reparation on the other hand. Whether pending the proceedings or upon a finding of a violation on the merits, States have the obligation to prevent irreparable harm to persons by taking measures of protection that may substantively coincide even though the function of these measures differs depending on whether they are required pending the proceedings or upon the finding of a violation.

5.4.2 Halting corporal punishment and the expected obligations on the merits

As discussed in Chapter IV it appears that all adjudicators, including those that have not been faced with requests for provisional measures, have found corporal punishment in violation of the prohibition of cruel treatment. As discussed, the HRC and the Inter-American Commission are the only adjudicators that have used provisional measures to halt execution of corporal punishment. In Osbourne v. Jamaica (2000) the HRC pointed out that the State party was obliged, under Art. 2(3)(a) ICCPR, to provide the petitioner with an effective remedy and it ‘should compensate him for the violation’. It was also obliged to refrain from carrying out the sentence and it ‘should ensure that similar violations do not occur in the future by repealing the legislative provisions that ³⁸¹ It adds in this context that this disclosure should not cause further harm or threaten the safety of the victim, the victim’s family, witnesses or persons who have intervened to either assist the victim or to prevent the occurrence of further violations. See Basic Principles, §22(a) and (f).

³⁸² See Basic Principles, §22(d), (e) and (g).

allow for corporal punishment'.³⁸³ The Committee uses the term 'obligation' of the State when it speaks of the right to a remedy and the duty to abstain from carrying out the sentence of corporal punishment. It uses exhortatory language ('should') when it specifies the remedy, although 'compensation' still is not very specific. It also uses the term 'should' in the context of the obligation to ensure that similar violations do not occur in the future, but since this is in fact an obligation under general international law it may be assumed that the exhortation lies in the second half of the sentence: the HRC considers that the best way to ensure that similar violations do not occur in the future would be to repeal the legislative provisions allowing corporal punishment. It is noteworthy that when the HRC published its decision on the merits, the Court of Appeal of Jamaica had already determined two years previously that the legislation on corporal punishment was unconstitutional.³⁸⁴

In corporal punishment cases the substance of the provisional measure and of the measures required following the finding of a violation partially coincide because both require the State to refrain from carrying out the sentence of corporal punishment. The substance of the provisional measure, namely that the State should halt its execution, would therefore have an indeterminate applicability. What is called provisional is in fact already permanent. In other words, on the basis of previous case law we already know before the final determination that the State will be required to respect the substance of the Committee's provisional measures beyond the duration of the case before the HRC. Thus, because of the unequivocal pre-existing case law on the merits this provisional measure is similar to an instant judgment on one particular issue. If the execution of a sentence of corporal punishment is indeed impending, the authorities must halt it not only pending the case before the HRC, but beyond this period as well.

The risk of execution of corporal punishment does not have to constitute the main claim. If there is a reference to such punishment in the complaint, the HRC can include it in the claims proprio motu and if the sentence has not yet been executed the Committee can use provisional measures to prevent irreparable harm. After all, it would find a violation of Art.7 ICCPR for any sentence of corporal punishment and would point out the State party's obligation not to carry out such a sentence. It would be reasonable to expect the HRC's proprio motu use of provisional measures in any new case similar to that in Matthews (1998).³⁸⁵ Yet it did not do so in Sooklal (2001).³⁸⁶ In this case it was not the petitioner who had raised a complaint with regard to the corporal punishment imposed on him, but the HRC itself had raised the issue proprio motu. It had also pointed out, in its paragraph on reparations, that the State was under an obligation not to carry out the sentence. The facts of the case were similar to those of Matthews, but the case law had since developed, in particular with regard to reparations. Moreover, the HRC had already used provisional measures twice in cases specifically complaining about corporal punishment. Nevertheless, the Committee did not use provisional measures proprio motu in Sooklal. The HRC could have used provisional measures in this case, because there was a relation with the decision

³⁸³ HRC Osbourne v. Jamaica, 15 March 2000.

³⁸⁴ See also HRC Higginson v. Jamaica, 28 March 2002. The Committee found that the State party was 'under an obligation to provide the author with an effective remedy, including refraining from carrying out the sentence of whipping upon the author or providing appropriate compensation if the sentence has been carried out'. Once more it noted that Jamaica 'should ensure that similar violations do not occur in the future by repealing the legislative provisions that allow for corporal punishment'.

³⁸⁵ HRC Matthews v. Trinidad and Tobago, 31 March 1998. See also Chapter XIV on admissibility and jurisdiction.

³⁸⁶ HRC Boodlal Sooklal v. Trinidad and Tobago, 25 October 2001.

on the merits. Provisional measures would not require more than the eventual decision would and these measures would ultimately prevent irreparable harm to persons.³⁸⁷

5.4.3 Halting expulsion and extradition and the expected obligations on the merits

Most human adjudicators have used provisional measures to halt expulsion and extradition, but the case law of the HRC provides information on the expected obligations on the merits. In light of its previous case law counsel in Judge v. Canada (2003) had not brought a claim based on the failure to obtain assurances against the death penalty.³⁸⁸ Nevertheless, after it had declared inadmissible the original claims the HRC raised this issue proprio motu. Ando disagreed with this approach. He considered it 'illogical' for the HRC to declare inadmissible the original complaints under Articles 6, 7, 10 and 14(5) ICCPR but at the same time to state that the communication raised issues under Articles 6, 7 and 2. He felt that a mere reference to 'the seriousness of these questions' did not suffice and that the HRC should have specified how these 'apparent contradictions' were to be solved.³⁸⁹ In fact it is standard practice of the HRC to indicate which provisions apply to the issues raised. As in the death penalty cases previously discussed the fact that the HRC did introduce this aspect proprio motu may indicate that even if there is no claim of Article 14 provisional measures could be used, because the HRC itself could find that the complaint raises issues under Article 14 and/or Article 6 ICCPR.

In Ahani (2004) the Committee found that Canada had violated Articles 9(4) and 13 in conjunction with Article 7, as well as the OP as such, by deporting the petitioner before the Committee's determination of his claim and in contravention of its provisional measures. With regard to the obligation to provide the petitioner with an effective remedy it pointed out that the State was obliged '(a) to make reparation to the author if it comes to light that torture was in fact suffered subsequent to deportation, and (b) to take such steps as may be appropriate to ensure that the author is not, in the future, subjected to torture as a result of the events of his presence in, and removal from, the State party'. It also pointed out that Canada was under an obligation 'to avoid similar violations in the future, including by taking appropriate steps to ensure that the Committee's requests for interim measures of protection will be respected'.³⁹⁰

In other words, by its nature the violation of the provisional measure could not be made good anymore through full reparation. In this light the HRC points out the obligation to guarantee non-repetition of this violation in future cases, as well as, vis-à-vis Ahani, the obligation to take those preventive measures that were still possible. These are requirements on the merits, which are not specified, but they may include demarches, monitoring and embassy visits. In the event that Ahani is indeed tortured, Canada is required to 'make reparation'. This is not specified either, but since return to the pre-existing situation would not be possible, one might imagine something ³⁸⁷ Since most international and regional adjudicators have declared (and those that have not dealt with it would be likely to declare) (judicial) corporal punishment a violation of the prohibition of cruel treatment there is a clear correlation between the eventual obligations (if sufficient evidence is available that the sentence has indeed been pronounced) and the provisional measure.

³⁸⁸ HRC Judge v. Canada, 5 August 2003. For the previous case law see Kindler v. Canada, 30 July 1993; Chitai Ng v. Canada, 5 November 1993 and Cox v. Canada, 31 October 1994.

³⁸⁹ HRC Judge v. Canada, 5 August 2003. Ando referred to the Committee's conclusion in §7.8. In fact the Committee noted that 'the facts before it raised two issues under the Covenant that were admissible and should be considered on the merits'. After posing these questions it concluded that, 'given the seriousness of these questions, the parties should be afforded the opportunity to comment on them before the Committee expressed its Views on the merits', §7.8.

³⁹⁰ HRC Mansour Ahani v. Canada, 29 March 2004, §12.

like facilitating his return to Canada, or at least his departure from Iran and his treatment in a medical facility specialised in treating torture victims, a public apology and a financial remedy.

In non-refoulement cases, provisional measures to halt an expulsion or extradition on the one hand and a decision on the merits determining that such removal would constitute a violation on the other simply build on each other. The permanent injunction would be pointless without the interim injunction.

5.4.4 Health and whereabouts and the expected obligations on the merits Claims by or on behalf of persons in detention that are based on violations of the prohibition of torture or cruel treatment after trial often relate to continuing violations, meaning that part of the remedy should be to put a stop to these violations. In order to prevent irreparable harm ongoing ill treatment should be dealt with as soon as possible pending the proceedings.

In its General Comment on Article 2 the HRC noted that ‘cessation of an ongoing violation is an essential element of the right to an effective remedy’.³⁹¹ Both its early and its more recent practice recognize the importance of intervening in such continuing violations pending the proceedings, when a determination on the merits about the existence of such violations has not yet been made. Such provisional measures aim at halting the continuation of acts or omissions that (could) constitute a violation. At the same time the HRC also refers to the obligation of States to try to repair ‘at the earliest possible opportunity’ any harm already caused. It ‘takes the view that ‘the right to an effective remedy may in certain circumstances require States Parties to provide for and implement provisional or interim measures to avoid continuing violations and to endeavour to repair at the earliest possible opportunity any harm that may have been caused by such violations’.³⁹² In other words, the State is required to redress possible violations causing irreparable harm already pending the proceedings, not only by halting certain actions, but also by repairing violations already caused.

Most ongoing detention cases dealt with by the HRC that show the relationship between the informal provisional measure taken pending the proceedings and the remedy eventually recommended are from the early 1980s. In Altesor v. Uruguay (1982) the Committee’s decision on the merits also specifically referred to the victim’s health: ‘the State party should also ensure that Alberto Altesor receives all necessary medical care’.³⁹³ On two previous occasions pending the proceedings the HRC had inquired about the health of the victim as well. Indeed the positive obligations mentioned in the Committee’s decisions on the merits clearly had their counterpart in its request, pending the proceedings, to inform it of the state of health of the alleged victim and/or to ensure the necessary medical treatment.³⁹⁴

³⁹¹ HRC General Comment on Article 2 ICCPR, §15.

³⁹² Id., §19.

³⁹³ HRC Altesor v. Uruguay, 29 March 1982. The HRC found that the victim had been held incommunicado for several months and had been denied the right to habeas corpus. The State party was under an obligation to provide him with effective remedies, including compensation and to take steps to ensure that similar violations did not occur in the future.

³⁹⁴ See e.g. HRC Teti Izquierdo v. Uruguay, 1 April 1982 or Pietraroia v. Uruguay, 27 March 1981. In Oxandabarat Scarrone v. Uruguay (1983) the HRC had repeatedly requested the State to provide specific information about the alleged victim’s state of health and the medical treatment given to him. The State eventually responded to this request with some specific information about treatment he received in December 1981 and the general statement that he was kept under examination and that his latest general examination (no date provided) found him in good health. It also mentioned two specific medications he was receiving. The HRC considered that the information before it did not justify a finding of a violation of Article 10(1) with respect to the detainee’s state of health. It did find a violation of Article 14. The State was obliged to provide Pending the proceedings in El Megreisi v. Libya (1994) the HRC had enquired about the whereabouts and health of the alleged victim. On the merits it found violations of Articles 9, 7 and 10(1).³⁹⁵ The HRC urged the State party to take effective measures to secure his immediate release. Pending the proceedings it had used informal provisional measures that were clearly related to the claims on the merits. Situations of incommunicado detention in an unknown location often result in irreparable harm such as torture or death. If the State would have indicated his whereabouts, would have ensured access to health care and lifted his incommunicado detention pending the proceedings, the violations in this respect would have been less serious. Moreover, the remedy of release would obviously be impossible after the death of the victim.

5.4.5 Death threats and harassment and the expected obligations on the merits

The traditionally most important form of reparation, restitutio in integrum, combined with another traditional obligation, namely assurances of non-repetition, could be a rationale for using provisional measures pending proceedings in human rights cases, requesting a State to protect persons against threats.

In its decision on the merits the HRC has referred to the duty to investigate and prosecute human rights violations.³⁹⁶ In Bautista de Arellana v. Colombia (1995) the HRC found violations of Articles 6(1), 7 and 9(1) ICCPR. It determined that the State was 'under an obligation to provide the family of Nydia Bautista with an appropriate remedy, which should include damages and an appropriate protection of members of N. Bautista's family from harassment'. It also urged the the victim with effective remedies 'and, in particular, to ensure that he continues to receive all necessary medical care and to transmit a copy of these views to him'. This shows that the HRC may use informal provisional measures to enquire about the health of an alleged victim pending the proceedings, as well as recommend continued access to medical care, but at the same time fail to find a violation of the right to humane treatment in Article 10. HRC Oxandabarat Scarrone v. Uruguay, 4 November 1983. By note of 31 October 1991 the State party informed the HRC that under Article 10 of the amnesty law of 8 March 1985 the petitioner was released on 10 March 1985. It is also possible that the Committee first requests the State to ensure medical treatment pending the proceedings, but in its decision on the merits, finding a violation of Article 10, does not specifically refer to the obligation to ensure medical treatment. If it points out that the State is under a particular obligation to ensure that the victim is treated with humanity, the obligation to ensure medical treatment may be interpreted as implicit in that obligation. HRC Manera Lluberan v. Uruguay, 6 April 1984. By note of 31 October 1991 the State party informed the HRC that the petitioner was released on 14 March 1985, under the amnesty law of 8 March 1985 (on file with the author).

³⁹⁵ It noted that the petitioner's brother had been 'detained incommunicado for more than three years, until April 1992, when he was allowed a visit by his wife, and that after that date he has again been detained incommunicado and in a secret location'. By being 'subjected to prolonged incommunicado detention in an unknown location', he was 'the victim of torture and cruel and inhuman treatment'. HRC Mohammed Bashir El-Megreisi (submitted by his brother Youssef El-Megreisi) v. Libya, 23 March 1994.

³⁹⁶ Initially it argued that Article 2 ICCPR constituted a general undertaking by States, which individuals could not invoke in isolation. See e.g. H.G.B. and S.P. v. Trinidad and Tobago, 3 November 1989 (inadm.). The right to a remedy arose only after a violation of a Covenant right had been established. See e.g. R.A.V.N. et al v. Argentina, 26 March 1990 (inadm.). This originally meant that it did not refer to this article when it took preventive measures such as indicating provisional measures. Recently, it has indeed recognised the relationship between provisional measures and Article 2 ICCPR. General Comment 31 on the nature of the general legal obligation imposed on States parties to the Covenant (Article 2), 29 March 2004.

State to ‘expedite the criminal proceedings leading to the prompt prosecution and conviction of the persons responsible for the abduction, torture and death of Nydia Bautista’. Finally, it reminded the State again of its obligation to ensure that similar events would not occur in the future.³⁹⁷

Decisions on the obligation to provide reparation generally include a reference to the obligation to investigate the facts complained of and arrest and try the alleged perpetrator. In the Inter-American system, however, the Commission and Court also order States to investigate and punish perpetrators as part of their precautionary and provisional measures.³⁹⁸ It is clear that they do this because such measures are necessary to prevent further threats and acts of harassment. Yet the Court will not consider the effectiveness of those investigations that have been realized nor the alleged negligence of the State with regard to these investigations, since it had not yet found a violation in this respect.³⁹⁹

The Inter-American Court has pointed out that ‘the Government has the obligation to prevent violations of human rights and to investigate the events that led to this request for provisional measures in order to identify those responsible and punish them appropriately so as to prevent any recurrence of the events’.⁴⁰⁰ This aim of preventing any recurrence explains the emphasis on investigation, identification and punishment as necessary ingredients in its Orders for provisional measures. Effective measures to investigate the events and, where appropriate, punish the perpetrators were ‘a vital aspect’ of the State’s protective duty. It ‘must be assumed by the State as a legal duty and not merely as a formality’.⁴⁰¹

Equally, the Commission has noted that the obligation to investigate the threats is part of its precautionary measures, in order to ‘investigate the source of the threats in order to put an end to the harassment of the persons protected by the precautionary measures’.⁴⁰²

The recurrence of the obligation in all phases of the proceedings indicates that in order to prevent irreparable harm to persons measures against impunity are necessary not only in the context of decisions on the merits (the obligation to guarantee the effective exercise of the rights in the Convention) and on reparation (the right to reparation), but also as part of provisional measures pending the proceedings (to ensure respect for the rights and in order to prevent their violation).

At the provisional measures stage investigation and prosecution are meant to put a stop to concrete and continuing threats. In the context of judgments on the merits on the right to life and the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment action against impunity (finding the truth and prosecuting those responsible) follows directly from the guarantee of non repetition. Article 1(1) ACHR requires investigation and prosecution in order to guarantee the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment.⁴⁰³

³⁹⁷ HRC Bautista de Arellana v. Colombia, 27 October 1995.

³⁹⁸ See Chapter IX (Threats).

³⁹⁹ See IACHR Cárcel de Urso Branco (Brasil), Order of 2 May 2008, 26th ‘Considering’ clause. See also Asunto de los niños y adolescentes privados de libertad en el “Complejo do Tatuapé” de la Fundação CASA (Brasil), Order of 3 July 2007, 16th ‘Considering’ clause.

⁴⁰⁰ IACHR Vogt case, Order of 12 April 1996 (President), 6th ‘Considering’ clause, referred to in Order of 27 June 1996, 3rd ‘Having seen’ clause.

⁴⁰¹ IACHR Vogt case, Order of 27 June 1996, 5th and 6th ‘Considering’ clauses.

⁴⁰² CIDH Annual Report 2001, Chapter III (a), §18, precautionary measure of June 2001 on behalf of chemistry students who had been declared ‘military targets’ by the paramilitary group Autodefensas Unidas de Colombia (AUC).

⁴⁰³ See e.g. CIDH Damion Thomas v. Jamaica, 4 April 2001 (merits), §45 (establishing that Article 1(1) ACHR, obligating the State to ensure the free and full exercise of the rights and freedoms in the Convention to all persons subject to its jurisdiction, requires the State ‘to organize the governmental apparatus and, in general, all the structures through which public power is

Pending the proceedings a provisional measure requiring investigation of death threats and harassment, prosecution and punishment of the perpetrators (as has been seen in the Inter-American system) may serve to prevent further attacks on the life and personal integrity of the beneficiary. At the stage of judgments on reparations action against impunity may be required to achieve reparation for specific individuals: the right to the truth, restoring some measure of dignity, removing fear and recognition of suffering. In other words, action against impunity at this stage aims at recognition, satisfaction and rehabilitation. The action required in all these cases is the same: investigation and prosecution. Its purpose in judgments on reparation encompasses more. As part of the decision on reparations, such investigation, prosecution and punishment, although it serves as a form of satisfaction, dignifying the victims, it may equally be forward looking (as a guarantee of non-repetition).⁴⁰⁴

Thus for the Inter-American Court the specific order to investigate and punish violations has been found both as part of the Court's judgment and as part of its provisional measures to protect persons against death threats and harassment. In the latter case, though, as part of provisional measures the obligation to 'investigate and prosecute' solely aims at preventing further threats, while the obligation to 'investigate and prosecute' as a form of reparation aims not only at prevention of further violations but also at assigning some moral satisfaction.

As noted, the Court has pointed out that the duty to investigate as part of provisional measures is meant to guarantee the right to life and personal integrity, while it will not consider the effectiveness of those investigations that have been realized nor the alleged negligence of the State with regard to these investigations, since it had not yet found a violation in this respect.⁴⁰⁵ In other words, in its provisional measures the Court suggests investigation and prosecution as a means of protection against death threats pending the proceedings, but evidently it cannot judge on this issue as part of its follow up on ongoing provisional measures other than to reassert the State's obligation to protect the beneficiaries and again suggest the measures that should be taken in this regard.

There is also another context in which provisional measures have been used addressing the issue of impunity. While in the Inter-American system, the obligation to investigate and prosecute has been referred to in provisional measures aimed at protecting persons against death threats and harassment, in light of its particular function the CAT has very specifically used provisional measures based on the State's obligation either to extradite or prosecute someone suspected of having perpetrated torture.⁴⁰⁶

5.4.6 Cultural survival and the expected obligations on the merits

The provisional measures ordered in the Inter-American system and by the Bosnia Chamber in order to ensure the cultural survival of a group appear justified by their general case law on the obligations on the merits, including reparation in cultural cases. Upon the finding of a violation, the obligations appear to make permanent what was ordered provisionally pending the proceed-exercised, so that they are capable of juridically ensuring the free and full enjoyment of human rights'. Flowing from these obligations 'are correspondent duties to prevent, investigate and punish any violation of the rights recognized in the Convention'.

⁴⁰⁴ Yet the official State response to this part of the Orders for provisional measures generally is not or insufficiently implemented by the respondent State. See generally Chapter XVII (Official responses).

⁴⁰⁵ See IACHR Cárcel de Urso Branco (Brasil), Order of 2 May 2008, 26th 'Considering' clause. See also Asunto de los niños y adolescentes privados de libertad en el "Complejo do Tatuapé" de la Fundación CASA (Brasil), Order of 3 July 2007, 16th 'Considering' clause.

⁴⁰⁶ See Chapter XII (Other situations), section 2.7.

ings.⁴⁰⁷ Obviously this is only possible if the provisional measures are indeed respected. A Bosnia Chamber case concerning the site of the Kizlaragina mosque is a case in point. In October 2001 the Chamber had used provisional measures to prevent the implementation of certain procedural decisions that would allocate the site of this mosque, which had been destroyed in 1992, to a private contractor for the construction of business premises. Nevertheless business premises had meanwhile been constructed. Apparently permission to build these premises ‘was obtained unlawfully and without the prior consent or knowledge of the Islamic Community’.⁴⁰⁸ Thus, subsequently the petitioner sought permission to rebuild the mosque and to remove these business premises. Yet the Chamber decided not to order demolition of the business premises and restitution of one plot adjacent to that of the destroyed mosque.⁴⁰⁹ It did order the respondent Party to ensure that the ownership of the plot where the mosque stood until 1992 ‘shall be legally transferred to the Islamic community and it shall be permitted to fence in the perimeter of the plot without any further obstruction or hindrance’.⁴¹⁰ In addition, ‘all temporary facilities (if any remain)’ were ordered to be removed and the site was ordered to be cleaned of all refuse.⁴¹¹

The Chamber pointed out that the present case revealed ‘a particularly serious form of discrimination (...) that seemed ‘to be aimed at humiliating the applicant and thereby disrupting the process of return in the Municipality’ in question.⁴¹² The Chamber noted ‘the difficulties inherent in the determination of an adequate monetary compensation for this kind of violation’. It recalled in particular that ‘the business premises were constructed on the site of a Muslim cemetery without exhuming the graves and that a representative of the respondent Party attempted to justify this by saying that they were ‘non-functional’ graves and that no one had in fact been buried there for 50 years’.⁴¹³ Whichever amount of compensation it would award for non-pecuniary damage, it ⁴⁰⁷ See Chapter X (Cultural and religious rights).

⁴⁰⁸ Bosnia Chamber Islamic Community in BiH (Mrkonjić Grad) v. Republika Srpska, 22 December 2003, §161. In fact the Chamber notes that “It is not known whether the construction of the business premises was concluded at this stage. However, by failing to inform the Chamber that the construction (...) had already been commenced or concluded, the respondent Party failed to implement the order as directed by the Chamber”. Bosnia Chamber Islamic Community in BiH (Mrkonjić Grad) v. Republika Srpska, §160. The petitioner had requested provisional measures in July 2001.

⁴⁰⁹ Among others it noted that there was sufficient space on which to reconstruct the mosque. It added that it was ‘not in a position to evaluate whether the restoration of the Kizlagarina mosque complex as a cultural landmark requires the business premises to be removed’, §168.

⁴¹⁰ Bosnia Chamber Islamic Community in BiH (Mrkonjić Grad) v. Republika Srpska, §165.

⁴¹¹ Id., §164. With regard to the upper part of the mosque site it considered it could not ‘now order the respondent party to bear the financial burden’ of the reconstruction of the mosque because its competence was limited ratione temporis (the destruction of the Mosque occurred before 14 December 1995). Neither would it order the respondent party to grant the petitioner a permit to reconstruct the mosque, because it had previously concluded that the petitioner had not yet exhausted domestic resources in this respect. Yet it did order Republika Srpska ‘to consider any future requests by the applicant for reconstruction (...) in good faith and to grant permission without unreasonable conditions’. See Bosnia Chamber Islamic Community in BiH (Mrkonjić Grad) v. Republika Srpska, §163.

⁴¹² Id., §174.

⁴¹³ Id., §173. The Chamber concluded that the respondent Party ‘targets the applicant as a religious community, because of its religion’. Id., §151. The conduct of the authorities showed ‘utter neglect of the religious feelings of the Muslim community that had been burying its dead at the cemetery of the mosque compound (...) over the last few centuries’. The organs of the respondent Party ‘took no steps at all to exhume the graves prior to permitting the construction of business premises on the same plot’. Id., §152. The Chamber found that the authorities in Mrkonjić Grad had subjected the petitioner to ‘specifically poor treatment, not only if compared would ‘not fully remedy the applicant’s complaints and return the previous status quo’.⁴¹⁴ This remark illustrates the importance of provisional measures in order to prevent such a situation.

The relation between provisional measures and subsequent obligations on the merits and reparation appears less straightforward for the HRC than for the Inter-American Commission and Court and the Bosnia Chamber, because of a lack of clarity in some of its case law on the merits.⁴¹⁵

The Lubicon Lake Band case (1990) is instructive in this regard.⁴¹⁶ In this case the HRC confirmed the admissibility of the case just before it found a violation and suggested an unspecified remedy. The HRC published its final View two years after the interlocutory decision reiterating its provisional measure. While it devoted 28 pages to the complicated issue of admissibility in this case, it used only one page for a discussion of the merits. The HRC stated that both historical inequities, ‘to which the State party refers’ and ‘certain more recent developments’ were threatening the way of life and culture of the Lubicon Lake Band in violation of Article 27. It concluded that the ‘State party proposes to rectify the situation by a remedy that the Committee deems appropriate within the meaning of article 2 of the Covenant’.⁴¹⁷ It is not clear what was the remedy deemed appropriate by the HRC. Apparently it considered sufficient the remedy already proposed by the State.

Chief Ominayak had pointed out that his reason to resort to the HRC had been to request it to assist the Band in ‘attempting to convince’ the State that the oil and gas development was seriously threatening the existence of the Band and that Canada was responsible for this situation. He stated that without the preservation of the status quo a final judgment on the merits would be ineffective. The only effective remedy would be to seek an interim injunction. Without it a final judgment could never ‘restore the way of life, livelihood and means of subsistence’ of the Band. The Committee’s provisional measures could be seen as seeking such an interim injunction. Yet because of the lack of precision in the remedy the HRC recommended eventually, the Commit-to the Serb Orthodox Church, but to the citizenry in general’. It considered the actions of the authorities ‘to amount to a clinical attempt to “cleanse” the Mrkonjić Grad area of all traces of Muslim presence’.

⁴¹⁴ Id., §174.

⁴¹⁵ In a few cases the HRC initially used provisional measures because cultural survival of the indigenous group to which the petitioner belonged might be at stake if the State would continue its activities. In relation to the future logging activities in Länsman II the HRC made a remark clarifying its test for finding a violation of the petitioners’ right to enjoy their own culture. It observed that logging had been approved ‘on a scale which, while resulting in additional work and expenses for the authors and other reindeer herdsman, does not appear to threaten the survival of reindeer husbandry’. This indicates that only a threat to the survival of such husbandry would result in a denial of the right to culture. This, in turn, may mean that in Art. 27 cases involving infringements on the natural habitat, on the merits the HRC would only find a violation if there was a threat of irreparable harm (or such harm had already occurred), but not if harm other than irreparable harm would occur. Indeed, in relation to the collective aspects of Article 27 the HRC has only found a violation in cases in which it considered that further actions would result in irreparable harm. While in other situations involving other rights (without collective aspects) it might find violations of a less serious nature for which it would require compensation, thus far it has never done so with regard to collective aspects.

⁴¹⁶ HRC Bernard Ominayak, Chief of the Lubicon Lake Band v. Canada, 26 March 1990.

⁴¹⁷ Ando expressed some doubts about ‘the categorical statement that recent developments have threatened the life of the Lubicon Lake Band and constitute a violation of article 27’, emphasising the importance of economic development for the society as a whole.

tee's decision on the merits could not be seen as seeking a permanent or even an interim injunction.⁴¹⁸

Most scholars qualify as ineffective the role of the HRC in the specific situation of the Lubicon.⁴¹⁹ They are generally more positive about its theoretical contribution to the protection of indigenous peoples, but with regard to the rights of the victims in question they criticise the Committee's vague formulation of the required remedy.⁴²⁰ Schmidt observes that the Committee's rationale was 'circuitous'.⁴²¹ Anaya notes that 'by not providing more guidance on the remedy issue, the committee left it subject to continuing controversy within Canada's internal processes in which the Canadian government had the upper hand'. "Thus, however path-breaking the committee's decision in the Lubicon case is in other respects, its effectiveness in that very case was undermined".⁴²² He considers that the Committee's deferential stance could be explained on the basis of the presumption of non-interference. Anaya argues that situations involving 'indigenous peoples facing entrenched historical inequities' required more active involvement by the HRC, also in respect of the appropriate remedies. He suggests that it should offer 'good offices to promote or mediate dialogue toward agreement on remedies'.⁴²³

De Feyter observes that the 'decisional paragraph of Lubicon Lake Band is extremely short'. "One may safely speculate that it is as long as the agreement among the majority of the Committee members".⁴²⁴ This is confirmed by Schmidt who refers to the Lubicon Lake Band case as one that 'has been criticised as having fallen victim of the search for consensus'.⁴²⁵

⁴¹⁸ The HRC has sometimes been more flexible in its Concluding Observations as part of the State reporting procedure. Possibly it feels less inhibited in its review of State reports than in its role of adjudicator. In 1999 it recommended 'that Canada's policy of requiring extinguishment of inherent or aboriginal rights be abolished because it violates Canada's human rights obligations under the ICCPR'. HRC Concluding Observations in relation to Canada, 7 April 1999, §8. It urged Canada to take 'decisive and urgent action' in order to fully implement the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, instituted by the Canadian government. Ibid. In 1996 this Royal Commission had noted that 'the actual reserve or community land base' of aboriginal people in Canada had shrunk by almost two third since 1867. "Aboriginal nations need much more territory to become economically, culturally and politically self-sufficient. If they cannot obtain a greater share of the lands and resources in this country, their institutions of self-government will fail". Ibid., quoting the 1996 recommendations of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples. The Royal Commission also noted that adequate lands and resources were necessary and without them 'they will be pushed to the edge of economic, cultural and political extinction'. Final Report of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, 1996, CD-ROM version, record 8380 as cited in Amnesty International, 'Time is wasting', April 2003, p. 6. This general remark seems to apply to the Lubicon case as well and supports the reasoning behind the Committee's use of provisional measures in this case. After all, the HRC had noted that it used provisional measures '(i)n view of the seriousness of the author's allegations that the Lubicon Lake Band was at the verge of extinction'. HRC Lubicon Lake Band, 26 March 1990, §29.3.

⁴¹⁹ An exception is De Zayas (2001), p. 113. "It is the author's conviction, that the negotiations that took place during the Committee's examination of the case ultimately contributed to some very interesting proposals and programs by the Canadian Government".

⁴²⁰ See Scheinin (2001), p. 166 and Anaya (1996), p. 165. On official responses and follow up in general see Chapters XVI and XVII.

⁴²¹ Schmidt (1997), p. 340.

⁴²² Anaya (1996), p. 166.

⁴²³ Ibid. See e.g. Opsahl (1992), p. 427, about the mandate and legal capacity to offer good offices and mediate dialogue.

⁴²⁴ De Feyter (2001), p. 156. De Feyter also notes that the HRC takes with one hand what it gave with the other. "Yes, there was a violation of Article 27 ICCPR, given 'historical inequities and

The fact that it declared the case admissible shows it still believed that a decision by a domestic court would be ineffective. However, in its decision on the merits it also seemed to suggest a remedy opting for the financial damages offered by the State, together with a certain demarcation of land, both of which the Band had rejected as unacceptable. Moreover the HRC did not follow up on its previous provisional measures.⁴²⁶ If it indeed considers that only compensation is warranted in cases such as these, and nothing more, its use of provisional measures would be questionable.⁴²⁷ more recent developments', but No the Band could not stop the corporate exploitation of its territories, as long as the Canadian government provided sufficient compensation. The compensation already offered by the Canadian government, i.e. the reservation of an area of land and an amount of money, was sufficient, regardless of the Band refusal to accept the offer (footnote omitted)". De Feyter (2001), p. 156.

⁴²⁵ Schmidt (1992), pp. 656-657. He noted about consensual procedures that 'as it is sufficient for one expert to oppose strongly a draft text otherwise acceptable to all the others, the search for consensus not only necessitates protracted consultations about a compromise text, it has also occasionally resulted in final decisions in which the close observer will find it difficult to follow the thread, or the logic of the legal argument'. See also on this issue Evatt (1998), p. 103, noting that the 'need to reach agreement means that the texts of the Committee's decisions are at times truncated and hard to understand'. Huff considers that the decision was positive to the extent that it could be interpreted 'as holding that the hunting and trapping culture of the Lubicon Cree constitutes an economic and social activity protected under Article 27'. Thus, 'environmentally based cultures can find some protection under the covenant'. Huff (1999), p. 188. He points out, however, that the Committee's decision 'approved of the very remedy rejected in 1989 by the Lubicon as guaranteeing a future of welfare dependence'. Huff (1999), p. 186. He specified the remedy the HRC could have suggested: "Theoretically, the HRC could have recommended that Canada take steps to encourage corporate withdrawal from Lubicon land. Such a recommendation would have been a strong affirmation of the basic link between degradation of the environment and resultant human rights abuses. It would have recognised that the only way to remedy such abuses is to restore the environment. However, any practical effect the HRC decision may have had was rendered moot by the HRC's actual recommended remedy: a small reserve and monetary resources for infrastructure development. This remedy does not provide for any reassertion of significant Lubicon control and thus seems to contemplate a future dependent upon federal welfare". Huff (1999), pp. 188-189.

⁴²⁶ See Chapter XVIII (Follow-up). See also Chapter X (Culture).

⁴²⁷ In a letter expressing the Band's discontent with the Committee's View Chief Ominayak pointed out that the Canadian Government 'initiated a major anti-Lubicon propaganda campaign claiming, among other things, that "the Human Rights Committee found the (take-it-or-leave-it) offer which Canada made to the (Lubicon people) is fair and reasonable and would meet any obligation Canada has under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights"'. Letter of 19 December 1991 to the HRC, on file with the author. This letter has also been posted on <nativenet.uthscsa.edu/archive/nl/9201/0028.html> (consulted on 13 March 2003). The sustainability test refers to the requirement of economic sustainability of the traditional way of life of indigenous peoples. After discussing this requirement of economic sustainability of the traditional way of life Scheinin has pointed out what should be the adequate remedy for a violation of Art. 27. He emphasised that it 'must be the termination of the interference, accompanied by a restitution of the conditions of the specific way of life'. Such a remedy 'should be compatible with the object of preserving and developing the specific way of life pursued by the community in question'. "The sustainability test requires that the form and modalities of compensation or other remedies for a violation of indigenous rights under Article 27 must be such as to serve the continued viability of the distinctive culture in question". He notes that the remedy could still 'partly be in the form of pecuniary compensation in cases where the economic hardship caused to the sustainability of the traditional economic activities cannot fully be

Thus far, this is the only provisional measure in an indigenous culture case in which the HRC later found a violation. It is unfortunate, however, that the protective measures it recommended on the merits do not seem to correspond with the aim of the provisional measures used pending the proceedings.

If the HRC indeed maintains its limited concept of measures required on the merits, taking the approach that only compensation is warranted and nothing more, its use of provisional measures in such cases is questionable.⁴²⁸ There should be a correlation between the measures required pending and concluding the procedure. If the HRC would never refer to the obligation to permanently halt certain destructive developments, provisional measures that would require a temporary halt to such developments would not be of much use. In fact the provisional measures would then go further than the eventual obligations on the merits.⁴²⁹

Indeed, a form of reparation aimed at restoring the situation as much as possible or at least at preventing further degradation would fit in well with the Committee's present approach to reparation as referred to in the 2004 General Comment. It would also justify the type of provisional measure taken pending the proceedings.⁴³⁰ restituted through measures that seek to restore the natural environment'. Scheinin (2001), p. 171. This illustrates the need for provisional measures pending the proceedings, to prevent such harm to the natural environment in the first place.

⁴²⁸ In a letter expressing the Band's discontent with the Committee's View Chief Ominayak pointed out that the Canadian Government 'initiated a major anti-Lubicon propaganda campaign claiming, among other things, that "the Human Rights Committee found the (take-it-or-leave-it) offer which Canada made to the (Lubicon people) is fair and reasonable and would meet any obligation Canada has under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights"'. Letter of 19 December 1991 to the HRC, on file with the author. This letter was also posted on <nativenet.uthscsa.edu/archive/nl/9201/0028.html> (consulted on 13 March 2003).

⁴²⁹ The HRC has sometimes been more flexible in its Concluding Observations as part of the State reporting procedure. Possibly it feels less inhibited in its review of State reports than in its role of adjudicator. In 1999 it recommended 'that Canada's policy of requiring extinguishment of inherent or aboriginal rights be abolished because it violates Canada's human rights obligations under the ICCPR'. HRC Concluding Observations in relation to Canada, 7 April 1999, §8. It urged Canada to take 'decisive and urgent action' in order to fully implement the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, instituted by the Canadian government. Ibid. In 1996 this Royal Commission had noted that 'the actual reserve or community land base' of aboriginal people in Canada had shrunk by almost two third since 1867. "Aboriginal nations need much more territory to become economically, culturally and politically self-sufficient. If they cannot obtain a greater share of the lands and resources in this country, their institutions of self-government will fail". Ibid., quoting the 1996 recommendations of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples. The Royal Commission also noted that adequate lands and resources were necessary and without them 'they will be pushed to the edge of economic, cultural and political extinction'. Final Report of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, 1996, CD-ROM version, record 8380 as cited in Amnesty International, 'Time is wasting', April 2003, p. 6. This general remark seems to apply to the aforementioned Lubicon case as well and supports the reasoning behind the Committee's use of provisional measures in this case. After all, the HRC had noted that it used provisional measures '(i)n view of the seriousness of the author's allegations that the Lubicon Lake Band was at the verge of extinction'. HRC Lubicon Lake Band, 26 March 1990, §29.3.

⁴³⁰ In the other situation in which the HRC clearly found a violation of the right to culture, although read into the right to family life and privacy (because of the French declaration to Article 27 ICCPR) it recommended an 'appropriate remedy'. In this case, Hopu and Bessert, the Committee noted that the State party was required to protect the petitioners' rights effectively and to ensure

5.4.7 Halt interrogation techniques and the expected obligations on the merits

In Ireland v. UK (1972) the European Commission considered that it could not meet the specific request for provisional measures made by Ireland. It did not address an argument raised by this State with regard to the right to an adequate remedy. In its original submission, Ireland pointed out that in domestic law the only remedy for violations of Article 3 ECHR would be the right to claim monetary damages. Such a remedy was insufficient, inadequate, and ineffective.⁴³¹ In its decision on the merits the Commission did find that the combined use of the five techniques in the cases before it constituted a practice of inhuman treatment and torture. Given the finding of both Commission and Court that these techniques constituted a violation of Article 3⁴³² and in light of the evolution in the practice of using provisional measures it may be expected that the present Court would in fact use provisional measures to halt continued use of such techniques pending the proceedings before it.⁴³³

Certain acts about to be committed are analogous to others that have already been found to violate the prohibition of torture or cruel treatment. It is submitted that in such cases the Court would be justified in using provisional measures also to halt such actions that it has not previously determined to be in violation of Article 3 ECHR. An example would be an interrogation method that appears to satisfy the criteria for illegal methods established in previous jurisprudence.

5.5 Halting executions and the expected obligations on the merits and reparations

5.5.1 Introduction

When it finds violations, the HRC always refers to the obligation to provide victims with an ‘effective remedy, including compensation’ and to the obligation ‘to ensure that similar violations do not occur in the future’. These forms of reparation are compatible with those under traditional international law (e.g. assurances of non-repetition). It also suggests measures such as commutation (in death penalty cases) or even release. Other possibilities are a retrial respecting the principles of Article 14 ICCPR, investigation of the killing, torture or disappearance and prosecution of those responsible could fall under the traditional restitutio in integrum (restitution in kind), while the investigation and prosecution would at the same time also qualify as concrete assurances of non-repetition. Sometimes the wording ‘an appropriate remedy, including’ is used, sometimes ‘an that similar violations did not occur in the future. Yet it did not specifically point out that this meant that the State was required, for instance, to put a stop to the completion of the hotel complex.

⁴³¹ EComHR Ireland v. UK, 5310/71, Yearbook 23 (1972), p. 100. It noted ‘the only purported remedy available to a person subjected to the aforesaid treatment constituting a breach of Art. 3 of the Convention, within the domestic law of the respondent Government, is, in the case where the tort of assault has occurred, the right to claim monetary damages. Such a remedy is not an effective remedy, nor is it a sufficient or adequate remedy for the acts referred in this submission to the Commission, and constituting breaches of Art. 3 of the Convention. Further, in cases where no such tort or assault has occurred not even this purported remedy exists’.

⁴³² For the ECtHR judgment finding a violation of the prohibition of inhuman and degrading treatment see Ireland v. UK, 18 January 1978. The finding of a practice of inhuman and degrading treatment was sixteen votes to one, and the finding that it did not constitute a practice of torture was thirteen to four.

⁴³³ In addition, of course, the Court’s Art. 3 jurisprudence has evolved as well. See e.g. Selmouni v. France, 28 July 1999.

appropriate remedy entailing (...)’ When the word ‘including’ is used, this is a minimum and more is warranted.

In Bradshaw v. Barbados (1994) the HRC referred to avoiding ‘irreparable damage to the victim of the alleged violation’. This is an indication that the HRC aims to prevent irreparable harm to persons and that this harm is related to the alleged violation.⁴³⁴

In this section the focus is on the Committee’s decision on cessation, assurances and reparation specifically in death penalty cases. Because of the assumption that provisional measures and such decisions are substantively interrelated, an examination of decisions by the HRC may shed light on the concept of provisional measures. As noted, its decisions on the merits, also indicating the remedy necessary to redress the violation, constitute practically the only public sources on its use of provisional measures.⁴³⁵

Pending the proceedings provisional measures aim to prevent the State from creating the impossibility of providing a remedy in case a violation will be found. The general legal obligations undertaken by States parties are closely related to the need to provide effective remedies in the event of a breach. In turn, the use of provisional measures in domestic proceedings and by the HRC itself is closely related to the right to an effective remedy.

At the same time, this section discusses how the Committee’s decisions on cessation, assurances and reparation in death penalty cases have not necessarily clarified its attitude towards the concept of provisional measures. Yet in 2004 the Committee published a General Comment on Article 2 ICCPR, which did confirm the relation between provisional measures and reparation. Finally this section refers to the practice developed in this respect in the Inter-American system.

5.5.2 The rationale of the Committee’s approach until its General Comment (2004)

Given the purpose of provisional measures the most important criterion for using them should not be the prima facie evidence of a violation, but the Rapporteur’s expectation of the obligations the Committee would refer to or the form of reparation it would recommend if it would find a violation.

Initially the situation was clear. In 1989, in the first death penalty case it determined on the merits, the HRC found that the petitioners were entitled to a remedy ‘the necessary prerequisite in the particular circumstances is the commutation of the sentence’.⁴³⁶ Different from later Views, ⁴³⁴ HRC Peter Bradshaw v. Barbados, 19 July 1994 (inadm.), §§2.9, 2.10, 4.2, 5.3; see also Denzil Roberts v. Barbados, 19 July 1994, §2.6, 2.7, 6.3.

⁴³⁵ See Chapter II (Systems).

⁴³⁶ HRC Earl Pratt and Ivan Morgan v. Jamaica, 6 April 1989. It found that the petitioners had been unable to appeal to the JCPC in the absence of a written judgment of the Court of Appeal. It also found a violation of Article 7 because of the delay of almost twenty hours from the time the stay of execution was granted to the time they were removed from their death cell. They were notified of the stay of execution only 45 minutes before the execution was originally scheduled. The authorities indeed commuted the sentence of Pratt and Morgan following the JCPC decision in their case. Ivan Morgan died on 28 April 1995. On this day an inmate sent a letter to the HRC informing it that Morgan was found dead in his cell that morning. He pointed out that Morgan had suffered a long illness and that he considered an autopsy should be done. He referred to stomach pain, an ulcer and ‘insanity’. He questioned why he was in a cell and not in hospital. He argued that Morgan died because of Government negligence. If he had been placed under medical observation his quick medical deterioration would have been detected. He noted that an autopsy could not bring back Morgan’s life, ‘but we can find out if there was negligence on the part of the Government in order that such a crisis doesn’t repeat itself on another prisoner’. Letter by an inmate in relation to Morgan’s death, 28 April 1995 (on file with the author). The Jamaica the Committee did not imply that only Article 14 violations result in a violation of Article 6. On the contrary, it stated that the death penalty 'should not be imposed in circumstances where there have been violations by the State party of any of its obligations under the Covenant' (emphasis added). It also explained that the necessary prerequisite in the particular circumstances was the commutation of the sentence.

Yet subsequently the HRC came to distinguish between death penalty cases involving fair trial claims and those without such claims. In death penalty cases where a violation of Article 14 (fair trial) and hence Article 6 (right to life) was found the HRC normally referred to 'remedies' ranging from release to commutation.⁴³⁷ But when it found violations of other provisions it did not specify, as a prerequisite, that the petitioner should remain alive in order to enjoy the reparation to which he was entitled.

With regard to Article 14 the case Ashby v. Trinidad and Tobago (2002) is particularly noteworthy. In this case the petitioner had been executed despite the Committee's provisional measure. The HRC pointed out:

Council for Human Rights sent several letters to the Commissioner of Corrections, the Department of Correctional Services and the Commissioner of Police, requesting copies of the medical and autopsy reports. Several newspapers also reported that Morgan may not have been admitted in the hospital because of insufficient availability of guards. Letters of 28 April, 4 May and 29 May 1995; 'Dead inmate suffered from depression', the Jamaica Herald, 3 May 1995; 'Why was Morgan not admitted to hospital?—JCHR', the Daily Observer, 2 May 1995; 'Morgan said ill, depressed before his death', the Sunday Gleaner, 30 April 1995 and Eulalee Thompson, 'Doctors shunning prisons', the Gleaner, 11 and 12 April 1995 (on file with the author).

⁴³⁷ 'In capital punishment cases, the obligation of States parties to observe rigorously all the guarantees for a fair trial set out in Art. 14 of the Covenant admits of no exception'. See e.g. HRC Paul Kelly v. Jamaica, 8 April 1991; Aston Little v. Jamaica, 1 November 1991; Raphael Henry v. Jamaica, 1 November 1991; Leaford Smith v. Jamaica, 31 March 1993 and Lenford Hamilton v. Jamaica, 21 March 1994; Garfield and Andrew Peart v. Jamaica, 19 July 1995; Abdool Saleem Yasseen and Noel Thomas v. Republic of Guyana, 30 March 1998; Tony Jones v. Jamaica, 6 April 1998; Victor Domukovsky, Zaza Tsiklauri, Petre Gelbakhiani and Irakli Dokvadze v. Georgia, 6 April 1998; Irving Phillip v. Trinidad and Tobago, 20 October 1998. The case Smith and Stewart v. Jamaica, 8 April 1999 illustrates the distinction the HRC appears to make between the need for reparation for a violation of Article 14 and reparation for other violations. In the case of Stewart the HRC found a violation of Articles 7 and 10(1) ICCPR, but in the case of Smith a violation of Article 14(3)(d). The effective remedy included compensation for both of them and release for Smith. Errol Smith and Oval Stewart v. Jamaica, 8 April 1999 (no provisional measures because their death sentences were already commuted prior to their initial communication). See also HRC Daniel Pinto v. Trinidad and Tobago, 20 July 1990. In this case the HRC had found violations of Articles 14(3)(d) and 6. Subsequently, he was not released, contrary to the recommendation of the HRC in 1990. Instead, in November 1992 his death sentence was commuted to life imprisonment with hard labour. He submitted a new case that year, on which the HRC decided in 1996. The HRC pointed out that 'to convey to the author that the prerogative of mercy would not be exercised and his early release denied because of his human rights complaints reveals a lack of humanity and amounts to treatment that fails to respect the author's dignity, in violation of article 10, paragraph 1'. Daniel Pinto v. Trinidad and Tobago, 16 July 1996, §§8.2-8.3. In this respect the HRC made a distinction between the specific entitlements of the petitioner on the one hand and the State's treaty obligation to implement its earlier View on the other. With regard to this case the petitioner was entitled to an appropriate remedy for the violation of Article 10. At the same time the State had a treaty obligation to implement its earlier View. In this light the HRC called upon it to release Pinto. As of 1995 the HRC introduced new phrases such as 'consider early release' or 're-trial' instead of release.

“Under article 2, paragraph 3, of the Covenant, Mr. Ashby would have been entitled to an effective remedy including, first and foremost, the preservation of his life. Adequate compensation must be granted to his surviving family”.⁴³⁸

Yet in relation to death penalty cases where it found violations of Articles 7 (prohibition of torture and cruel treatment), 9 (right to habeas corpus, etc.) and 10 (right to humane treatment) it simply noted that ‘an appropriate remedy’ was required without specifying that this implied that the petitioner should remain alive.⁴³⁹ Consequently, the State itself would not be inclined to consider this a prerequisite.

It is clear that in Article 14 cases (fair trial) without the provisional measure the required action on the merits, ranging from release to commutation, would have been made impossible. This explains as well why the HRC used provisional measures in such cases that were later found inadmissible or in which it found no violations.⁴⁴⁰ It explains equally cases where Articles 14 and 7 were claimed, but where the HRC later found a violation of Article 7 only.⁴⁴¹ This case law ⁴³⁸ HRC Glenn Ashby v. Trinidad and Tobago, 21 March 2002. See also Chapter XVII (Official responses).

⁴³⁹ In cases in which the HRC found violations of Articles 7 and 10 it simply recommended an ‘effective remedy’. The same applies to a case involving a finding of a violation of Article 9: HRC Peter Grant v. Jamaica, 22 March 1996; Michael Freemantle v. Jamaica, 24 March 2000 (commuted on an unspecified date) related to a violation of Article 9(3) as well, but in this case the HRC had also found violations of Articles 7 and 10(1)). Klein attached an individual opinion. He noted in relation to the remedy that the Committee should have expressly spelled out that apart from other possible appropriate remedies the petitioner was entitled to compensation according to Article 9(5) ICCPR.

⁴⁴⁰ Some of the petitioners specifically invoked Article 14 but the HRC eventually did not find a violation of that article. See e.g. HRC Willard Collins v. Jamaica, 1 November 1991. See also Peter Blaine v. Jamaica, 17 July 1994. In some cases the HRC did specify the remedy to a certain extent. In Hylton v. Jamaica (1994) the HRC found violations of Articles 7 and 10(1). At the time of the View the victim was awaiting execution. He was also receiving threats. On death threats see Chapter IX. The Committee pointed out that Jamaica was under an obligation to take effective measures to remedy the violations suffered, including the award of appropriate compensation, and ‘to ensure that similar violations do not occur in the future’. ‘In particular, the State party is requested to complete the investigations into the threats and the ill-treatment to which Mr. Hylton has been subjected, and to punish those who are held to be responsible for his treatment’. In other words, in this case the HRC does specify part of the remedy, but this specification does not imply that the State should preserve the life of the petitioner in the context of the death penalty. The conflicting language about the remedy that is required is worth noting: an ‘obligation’ to take effective measures, including an ‘obligation’ to award appropriate compensation and an ‘obligation’ to ensure that similar violations do not occur in the future. The Committee then specifies these obligations stating that, in particular, and now one would expect another obligatory term, the State party is ‘requested’ to complete the investigations and to punish those responsible. In other words the State party has an ‘obligation’ to award compensation and to ensure non-occurrence of similar violations and, in particular, it is ‘requested’ to investigate the occurrences and punish those found responsible. In Linton v. Jamaica (1992) the HRC found no violation of Article 14(1), but it did find violations of Articles 7 and 10(1). The State party was urged to take effective steps to investigate the ill treatment of the petitioner and to prosecute any persons that could be responsible and to grant the petitioner compensation. The HRC did not specify the remedy to include commutation. Again, this meant that the State would have the way clear for execution. Carlton Linton v. Jamaica, 22 October 1992.

⁴⁴¹ See e.g. HRC Dennie Chaplin v. Jamaica, 2 November 1995; Junior Leslie v. Jamaica, 31 July 1998 (later commuted); Barrington Campbell v. Jamaica, 20 October 1998; Anthony Leehong v.

does not explain, however, the use of provisional measures in cases where the petitioners had claimed a violation of Articles 7, 9 and/or 10(1) but not of Article 14.⁴⁴² In such cases it recom-

Jamaica, 13 July 1999; death sentence was reclassified as non-capital in November 1994); Michael Freemantle v. Jamaica, 24 March 2000 and Michael Robinson v. Jamaica, 29 March 2000 (commutation in 1997). In some cases the HRC did declare admissible these Article 14 claims, although eventually it did not find a violation. See e.g. HRC Ian Chung v. Jamaica, 9 April 1998. In other words, given the possibility of a finding of a violation of Article 6 (right to life) because of a finding of a violation of Article 14 (fair trial), the use of provisional measures pending the proceedings was clearly justified. In addition, as the State often subsequently commuted the death sentences, the fact that the HRC did not refer to commutation, retrial or release does not necessarily imply that it would have failed to do so in cases in which the petitioners were still awaiting execution. In one case it seems that the HRC considered Article 14 proprio motu and decided not to declare it inadmissible ratione materiae to allow the possibility of a finding of a violation requiring commutation under its case law. At the same time the possibility of such finding seemed remote from the beginning. In Barrett and Sutcliffe v. Jamaica (1992) the petitioner only invoked Articles 7 and 10 but the HRC considered that the complaint also related to Article 14 ICCPR. The role this inclusion played pending the proceedings before the HRC was as follows. The HRC obliquely noted that 'although counsel only invokes a violation of article 7 of the International Covenant of Civil and Political Rights, it transpires from some of the submissions that they also allege violations of article 14'. In 1989 it declared the communications admissible because the pursuit of domestic remedies had been unreasonably prolonged. It did not examine the claims ratione materiae for purposes of admissibility. Following this, it requested additional information from the State party in relation to the allegations under Articles 7 and 10, but not Article 14. On the merits, the HRC considered the Article 14 claim and noted that the petitioners had not corroborated the allegations that their identification parade was unfair, that the preparations for Barrett's defence were inadequate and that Sutcliffe had been denied access to counsel before his formal indictment. Hence it did not find a violation of Article 14 ICCPR, considering that counsel had not put forward any claims under that article. HRC Randolph Barrett and Clyde Sutcliffe v. Jamaica, 30 March 1992 (on 16 May 1995 his sentence was commuted to life imprisonment). Eventually, the HRC found a violation of Articles 7 and 10(1) in respect of the beatings and injuries suffered by one of the petitioners. Again this required 'an appropriate remedy' without specification as to commutation. With this the HRC removed the obstacle to the execution of the petitioners. This seems strange because the petitioner is unlikely to enjoy any remedy upon his execution. In this light the wording used seems hardly appropriate. In HRC Balkissoon Soogrim v. Trinidad and Tobago, 8 April 1993, the petitioner was awaiting execution and the claim included Article 14. Initially, all claims were declared admissible, but upon review the HRC limited this to those based on Articles 7 and 10. Apparently it maintained its provisional measure. Following this, it found violations of Articles 7 and 10(1). The petitioner was 'entitled to a remedy, including appropriate compensation'. The View does not refer to the use of provisional measures, but its use appears from the file. The petitioner was still awaiting execution at the time of publication of the View. Only subsequently his sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. This was done in light of the JCPC judgment in Pratt and Morgan (letter of 18 February 1994 by the Permanent Mission, on file with the author).

⁴⁴² In several cases in which petitioners were still awaiting execution the HRC found violations of Articles 7 and 10 for which it simply noted that 'an appropriate remedy' was required. It did not specify that it was a prerequisite to the enjoyment of any type of reparation not to execute the persons involved. In the approach of the State concerned (Jamaica) the fact that the HRC did not mention commutation as part of the remedy meant that its View did not block the execution of the victims. All the same, pending the proceedings the Committee had used provisional measures to halt their execution. In HRC Dwayne Hylton v. Jamaica and Ramcharan Bickaroo v. Trinidad and Tobago the claim only involved Articles 7 and 10. Nevertheless, in 1993 and 1994 the mends ‘an appropriate remedy’ without specification, which the addressee State may interpret as a licence to kill the petitioner. In other words, in such cases the rationale of the use of provisional measures must lie elsewhere. It may be that the Committee always uses provisional measures when an execution is threatened, without relating this decision to the possible findings of a violation and without looking at the possible remedy in such cases. This could be argued to be in line with its customary statement at the end of its communications (Notes Verbales) to the State referring to provisional measures, that an ‘expression of its views on interim measures does not imply a determination on the merits of the communication’. On the other hand, if the Committee would link the provisional measure to the possible remedy, this would still not imply a determination on the merits of the communication, since there are also many Article 14 cases where the HRC took a provisional measure but eventually did not find a violation.⁴⁴³

The argument has been made that the HRC uses provisional measures in cases not mentioning Article 14 claims because a discussion on this article was raised proprio motu in discussions within the Committee but eventually dropped. This discussion was simply not mentioned in the decision on the merits.⁴⁴⁴ This explanation seems strained as this discussion obviously is not part of the material before the Special Rapporteur on New Communications taking a decision on the use of provisional measures.⁴⁴⁵

It seems more likely that some Rapporteurs, especially abolitionists, tended to always use provisional measures, even if they did not expect the determination of a violation nor a finding that the remedy for a violation would include commutation. They may have decided to take provisional measures automatically in all death penalty cases.

In my view this would constitute an inappropriate use of this tool. The Special Rapporteur faces the choice to decide whether or not provisional measures are warranted given the Committee’s case law on the State obligations upon a finding of a violation in death penalty cases, or the Committee did take provisional measures in these cases. By this time its case law about the relationships between violation of Article 14 and commutation or release on the one hand and Articles 7 and 10 and an unspecified remedy on the other was already evolving. Given the fact that not only the findings, but also the claim involved Arts 7 and 10 alone, it is not clear why the HRC took provisional measures. After all, it must have been clear that any eventual remedy would not specify that the petitioner should remain alive. See Dwayne Hylton v. Jamaica, 16 July 1996, (provisional measure of 28 November 1994, death sentence commuted in 1995 by the Governor General upon advice of the Jamaican Privy Council; no violation Article 14) and Ramcharan Bickaroo v. Trinidad and Tobago, 29 October 1997 (provisional measure (no date); subsequent to his submission of 5 October 1993 his death sentence was commuted to life imprisonment by the President of Trinidad and Tobago on 31 December 1993, following the judgment of the JCPC of 2 November 1993 in the case of Pratt and Morgan v. Attorney General of Jamaica; no violation found). See also HRC A. H. v. Trinidad and Tobago, 31 October 1990 (inadm.).

⁴⁴³ See also Chapter I, section 3.5 discussing prejudgment.

⁴⁴⁴ Suggestion by Sir Nigel Rodley, Geneva, April 2003. In this respect HRC Randolph Barrett and Clyde Sutcliffe v. Jamaica, 30 March 1992, discussed in Chapter III (Executions) may serve as an example. Indeed the proprio motu inclusion of Article 14 in the initial discussion of Randolph Barrett and Clyde Sutcliffe v. Jamaica, 2 March 1992 justified the use of provisional measures ex post, whether this inclusion was intended as such or not. After all in this case the reference to Art. 14 was published in the decision on the merits.

⁴⁴⁵ The Special Rapporteur normally decides to transmit a case and use provisional measures on the basis of a case summary prepared by the Secretariat. This summary generally refers to the claims introduced by the petitioner. The fact that later in the proceedings members of the Committee, or the Rapporteur assigned particularly to that case, decide to introduce Article 14 into the discussion proprio motu does not necessarily have a bearing on the Special Rapporteur’s use of provisional measures earlier on.

likelihood of a change in its case law. Of course it would be tragic if the jurisprudence would indeed change and the petitioner who triggered this has already been executed by then. In this respect, it seems that the Special Rapporteur usually takes the approach of 'better be safe than sorry'. Nevertheless if he would decide to take provisional measures based on his belief that the Committee's jurisprudence should change, in a situation where this is very unlikely, this may not be a wise approach.

In practice the number of cases in which provisional measures were used when there was no Article 14 claim is limited, but generally speaking it would not enhance the goodwill of the addressee State if provisional measures would routinely be used also in cases where in the end the Committee does not recommend commutation of the sentence. More importantly, the Committee's role should not be to postpone death and prolong suffering until it publishes a finding on the merits that will require an unspecified form of reparation, but not commutation. A clear distinction should be made between taking provisional measures on the one hand and trying to change the Human Rights Committee's jurisprudence on the other. Provisional measures should not be used as statements in a quest to bring about such changes.⁴⁴⁶

Until the HRC is willing to clearly decide that violations of Arts 7 and 10(1) require commutation just as much as violations of Article 14, it is indeed necessary, for purposes of provisional measures, for the petitioner to claim a violation of Article 14.

The situation would be different if the HRC would either clearly establish that any finding of a violation in a death penalty case required an appropriate remedy the prerequisite for which would be that the petitioner would be allowed to remain alive.

In the alternative, it would be different if the HRC would clearly indicate that it uses provisional measures in all death penalty cases in order to guarantee the integrity of the OP by ensuring that both parties to the conflict can properly present their claims. After all, it is a plausible argument that it would never be acceptable to execute someone pending a case because that would cause irreparable harm to the proceedings under the OP. Once executed, the possible vindication of his rights would be of limited importance to the petitioner. Another purpose of provisional measures to halt execution could thus be to serve the interests of the proceedings before the Committee. If the petitioner is executed during the course of the proceedings of the Committee it would be difficult to properly hear both sides in a balanced examination (audiat et alteram pars). In other words, it would obstruct equality of arms and, therefore, the proper examination of the case. If this specific reason for the use of provisional measures applies, however, the HRC should make it clear from the outset. In any case this may be easier to argue in cases already pending before the Committee rather than in those declared inadmissible but open to review, such as A.H. v. Trinidad and Tobago.⁴⁴⁷ Nevertheless, the HRC could have justified its decision to maintain provisional measures with the argument of protecting the integrity of the ICCPR and the OP. After all executing petitioners immediately upon exhaustion of domestic remedies would prevent them from taking up their right to resort to the OP. This way the State would evade its obligations under the Covenant and the OP. Nevertheless, preventing irreparable harm to the procedure only seems a rather artificial explanation for the use of provisional measures in a death penalty case.

The most appropriate would be a clear decision on obligations on the merits and reparation in death penalty cases. In cases in which a violation of the right to life had been found reparation may consist of life as a right or of life as a remedy. Life as a right refers to the 'continued enjoyment' of this right. This would be required in the context of a finding of a violation of Article 14 ICCPR. Life as a form of reparation refers to the specific situation of a person sentenced to death, who has been the victim of torture or ill treatment in violation of Articles 7 and 10 ICCPR. In this light it is argued that full rehabilitation requires commutation of the death sentence since enjoyment of other forms of compensation becomes impossible if the person is executed. In other words, life is a precondition for the enjoyment of an adequate form of reparation.

⁴⁴⁶ Of course, if the HRC explicitly uses provisional measures in the interest of the proceedings, it does make sense to use them in Articles 7, 9, or 10 cases as well.

⁴⁴⁷ HRC A. H. v. Trinidad and Tobago, 31 October 1990 (inadm.).

Linked to the idea that life is a precondition to the enjoyment of any remedy, provisional measures are essential as well. Such measures halting the execution of a death sentence are crucial to ensure the commutation as a form of reparation in these circumstances, whether they preserve a right in itself or preserve instead the possibility for reparation for other violations. Without them the eventual determination of the case would be deprived of any sense. Obviously a return to the previous situation is not possible once the execution has already taken place.

Thus far the HRC has not taken the above approach to life as a form of – or precondition to the enjoyment of any form of – reparation. The case law of the HRC seems to point to the conclusion that only when an execution would result in a new violation, the remedy is commutation or release. In other words, the ‘appropriate remedy, including commutation’ is not so much a remedy for a past violation, but rather the action required for preventing a new violation (related to this past violation).

Yet pending the proceedings the HRC has used provisional measures even in cases in which Article 14 was not claimed, although it knew that if it would find violations the petitioner would nevertheless be executed, due to its approach towards reparation in Articles 7 and 10 cases.⁴⁴⁸ This means that the use of provisional measures in those cases made little sense because in its final decision the Committee would not recommend the State to continue to prevent irreparable harm to the person.

There are, however, indications of a change in the approach of the Committee in that it has spoken of commutation in relation to Articles 7 and 10 as well, although in these cases it did not refer to an entitlement to the preservation of their life, but simply recommended commutation.⁴⁴⁹ The individual opinions of one member of the Committee may be a precursor to a possible change in the Committee’s approach on the issue of reparation: ‘when a person has been sentenced to death in violation of the Covenant or treated contrary to the provisions of the Covenant while awaiting execution, the remedy should include an irreversible decision not to implement the death

⁴⁴⁸ See e.g. HRC A. H. v. Trinidad and Tobago, 31 October 1990 (inadm.); Dwayne Hylton v. Jamaica, 16 July 1996 and Ramcharan Bickaroo v. Trinidad and Tobago, 29 October 1997. In A. H. v. Trinidad and Tobago, 31 October 1990 (inadm.) the HRC declared a petition inadmissible based on non-exhaustion, with the possibility to deal with it again upon exhaustion. The petitioner could request a review of the inadmissibility decision once he had completed domestic remedies. However, the claims under Article 14 did not raise prima facie issues under Article 14 or they were insufficiently substantiated. It decided to maintain the provisional measure pending review of admissibility, upon exhaustion of domestic remedies for the Article 10 claim. Yet this may be explained by the fact that in 1990 the HRC had not yet determined the type of reparation required for ill treatment of persons sentenced to death. Its members may have assumed that the prerequisite for any ‘appropriate remedy’ was commutation. In the alternative, its use of provisional measures could also mean that it made no connection between provisional and remedial measures and simply aimed to prevent, for the time being, irreparable harm to the person involved even if its jurisprudence did not allow it to recommend preventing such harm as part of its decision on the merits.

⁴⁴⁹ See HRC Stephens v. Jamaica, 18 October 1995 (further consideration by Parole Board); Nicholas Henry v. Jamaica, 20 October 1998 (consideration for early release). See also Brown v. Jamaica, 23 March 1999 and R. S. v. Trinidad and Tobago, 2 April 2002 (appropriate remedy for violations of Articles 7 and 10(1) were appropriate medical and psychiatric care and improvement of conditions of detention in accordance with Article 10 or release. Had the petitioner still been under sentence of death, the reference to release may be expected to have implied commutation).

penalty'.⁴⁵⁰ The preservation of life was required under the entitlement to an effective remedy under Article 2(3) ICCPR.⁴⁵¹

Moreover, in 2004 the HRC acknowledged, in its General Comment on Article 2, that provisional measures and the right to a remedy (including the right to reparation) are related.⁴⁵² One might expect that it will continue in this direction and recommend commutation in relation to violations other than those of Article 14. In fact, now that it has acknowledged a relationship between provisional measures and the remedy it should consider the preservation of life a prerequisite for the enjoyment of any form of reparation for a violation of the ICCPR.

5.5.3 HRC General Comment on the right to an effective remedy (Art. 2 ICCPR)

In 2004, in its General Comment on Article 2 ICCPR, the HRC finally confirmed the relationship between the right to 'an effective remedy' and the use of provisional measures.⁴⁵³ The fact that the HRC has now specifically acknowledged the relation with the eventual form of reparation will likely improve its practice of using provisional measures and indicating the obligations required, at least in death penalty cases.⁴⁵⁴

In its General Comment the Committee noted that the legal obligation of States under Article 2(1), the obligation to respect and ensure the rights recognised by the Covenant, is both nega-

⁴⁵⁰ Individual opinion HRC member Scheinin, Deon Mc Taggart v. Jamaica, 31 March 1998. See also his individual opinions in Neville Lewis v. Jamaica, 17 July 1997 and Terrence Sahadeo v. Guyana, 1 November 2001.

⁴⁵¹ Individual opinion HRC member Scheinin Deon Mc Taggart v. Jamaica, 31 March 1998 and Terrence Sahadeo v. Guyana, 1 November 2001.

⁴⁵² See the next heading.

⁴⁵³ HRC General Comment 31 on Article 2 ICCPR: the nature of the general legal obligation imposed on States parties to the Covenant, 29 March 2004, §19. In 1977 Committee member Opsahl already made a connection with Article 2. During the initial discussion on the Rules of Procedure Committee member Movchan (USSR) did not agree with 'the provisions contained in rule 86' (the Rule on provisional measures) because they went 'beyond the scope' of the OP. Opsahl responded to this by stating that they should consider the question of provisional measures to avoid irreparable harm 'in the context of the Covenant and the Optional Protocol as a whole'. The suggestion that the procedure provided for in Rule 86 was outside the scope of the Covenant was 'unacceptable' in light of the States parties' undertaking in Article 2(2) ICCPR. Summary records of the meetings of the first session, thirteenth meeting, 29 March 1977 and seventeenth meeting, 31 March 1977, Yearbook of the HRC 1977-1978, Vol. I, CCPR/1, pp. 44-46 and 54. Moreover, in 1996, during the public meeting convened following the execution of Glenn Ashby, Committee member Evatt emphasised the obligation of the State to ensure an effective remedy for any person whose rights have been violated (Article 2 ICCPR). By executing a petitioner, she noted, a State fails to guarantee this right. Committee member Higgins equally referred to Article 2(3)(a) and the undertaking by the State to ensure an effective remedy. "In the present case, Mr. Ashby had been executed, and the Committee had been prevented from determining whether the State party had violated the provisions of the Covenant. Given those two facts, the Committee could justifiably conclude on the merits that Mr. Ashby had not had any remedy. It was precisely to avoid a situation of that sort that the Committee had adopted rule 86". Summary Record of the 1352nd meeting: Trinidad and Tobago, 26 July 1994, CCPR/C/SR.1352, 31 July 1996, §§15 and 24.

⁴⁵⁴ As discussed in section 4.6.2 its case law until this General Comment was lacking in clarity on the relation between the two concepts.

tive and positive in nature.⁴⁵⁵ Under Article 2(2) States must ‘take the necessary steps to give effect to the Covenant rights in the domestic order’.⁴⁵⁶ This ‘provides the overarching framework within which the rights specified in the Covenant are to be promoted and protected’.⁴⁵⁷ Article 2(3) ICCPR requires that individuals have accessible and effective remedies to vindicate their Covenant rights.⁴⁵⁸ In order to comply with the obligation to provide an effective remedy, an obligation ‘central to the efficacy’ of Article 2(3), States must make reparation to victims.⁴⁵⁹ Apart from the explicit reparation required by Articles 9(5) and 14(6) ICCPR the HRC ‘considers that the Covenant generally entails appropriate compensation’.⁴⁶⁰ It notes that ‘where appropriate reparation can involve restitution, rehabilitation and measures of satisfaction, such as public apologies, public memorials, guarantees of non-repetition and changes in relevant laws and practices, as well as bringing to justice the perpetrators of human rights violations’.⁴⁶¹

Moreover, the obligation of non-repetition is integral to Article 2. Without this the purposes of the Covenant would be defeated. This is why the HRC often emphasises, in its decisions on the merits, the need to take measures to avoid a recurrence of the violation. This reminder on avoiding a recurrence goes ‘beyond a victim-specific remedy’ and may require changes in the laws or practices of the State in question to ensure that a similar violation does not recur with regard to other possible victims.⁴⁶²

Obviously a reservation to the obligation to respect and ensure the rights in the ICCPR on a non-discriminatory basis would be unacceptable. Equally it would be unacceptable to indicate, through a reservation to Article 2(3) ICCPR, the intent to provide no remedies for human rights violations. After all, ‘guarantees such as these are an integral part of the structure of the Covenant and underpin its efficacy’.⁴⁶³

The use of provisional measures by the HRC is based on the right to an effective remedy as well. The HRC pointed out that ‘in certain circumstances’ the right to an effective remedy may require States parties ‘to provide for and implement provisional or interim measures to avoid continuing violations and to endeavour to repair at the earliest possible opportunity any harm that may have been caused by such violations’.⁴⁶⁴ It added that the use of provisional measures in domestic proceedings is equally based on the right to an effective remedy. The phrase ‘provide for’ provisional measures, used in the General Comment on Article 2 ICCPR, seems to refer to taking such measures on the basis of domestic law without instigation by the HRC, and the term ‘implement’ seems to refer to those provisional measures indicated by the HRC.

In sum, it is argued that a provisional measure cannot go further than the eventual form of reparation could. Upon finding a violation the obligation on the merits or form of reparation required should continue to prevent irreparable harm to persons. If the eventual obligation signifies less than the preservation of life the provisional measures used pending the proceedings do ⁴⁵⁵ HRC General Comment on Article 2 ICCPR, the nature of the general legal obligation imposed on States parties to the Covenant, 29 March 2004, §6 (negative in the sense of ‘refraining from’).

⁴⁵⁶ Id., §13.

⁴⁵⁷ Id., §5.

⁴⁵⁸ Id., §15.

⁴⁵⁹ Id., §16.

⁴⁶⁰ Ibid.

⁴⁶¹ Ibid.

⁴⁶² HRC General Comment on Article 2 ICCPR, §17.

⁴⁶³ See HRC General Comment 24 on reservations to the ICCPR or the Optional Protocols, 4 November 1994, §§9 and 11, as confirmed in General Comment 31 on Article 2 ICCPR, 29 March 2004, §5.

⁴⁶⁴ HRC General Comment 31 on Article 2 ICCPR: the nature of the general legal obligation imposed on States parties to the Covenant, 29 March 2004, §19.

not truly prevent irreparable harm to persons. They could only be said to prevent harm to the procedure.

In my view the HRC should follow the course it seems to have set by recommending commutation in all future death penalty cases finding a violation of any of the articles of the ICCPR. In fact, this would simply confirm what it already set out in Pratt and Morgan v. Jamaica (1989).⁴⁶⁵ This way there would be a relation between the provisional measures and the eventual reparation required so that provisional measures would truly serve to protect against irreparable harm to persons.

5.5.4 The Inter-American practice regarding obligations on the merits and reparation in death penalty cases

The Inter-American Commission has been very precise in its motivation of its precautionary measures. “It based its request on the fact that if the State were to execute (...) before such an assessment, any later decision of the Commission would be ineffective in providing potential remedies and that this would cause him irreparable harm”.⁴⁶⁶

The motivation used here seems to be implicit in all its requests to stay an execution. This is interesting because this statement implies, in my view correctly, that whenever the Commission would find a violation, the remedy provided would be ineffective if the State would still be allowed to execute the petitioner. As discussed, the HRC seems to have thought differently, at least for a considerable period, as in some cases it recommended ‘an effective remedy, including commutation’ while in other cases it merely recommended ‘an effective remedy’, knowing that in such cases the State would proceed with the execution.

In 2001 the Inter-American Commission clarified its use of precautionary measures by pointing out that an execution would make ineffective any eventual decision ‘in terms of future compensation and [the prisoner] would suffer irreparable harm’.⁴⁶⁷ In requesting the Court to order provisional measures the Inter-American Commission also argued that ‘the execution of the alleged victims prior to the completion of these processes would render any eventual recommendations or judgments moot in terms of the efficacy of potential remedies, such as commutation of their death sentences’.⁴⁶⁸

In practice, apart from commutation, in some cases the Commission went further in its petitions on the merits, requesting the Court to order a re-trial in accordance with due process or, if that were not possible, release.⁴⁶⁹ It has noted that, to the extent possible, the State must re-establish ‘the status quo ante which in the present case could be achieved by commuting the

⁴⁶⁵ HRC Earl Pratt and Ivan Morgan v. Jamaica, 6 April 1989.

⁴⁶⁶ See e.g. CIDH Annual Report 2000, §§45-46.

⁴⁶⁷ See e.g. CIDH Arnold Ramlogan, Case P12.355, 22 January 2001; Beemal Ramnarace, Case P12.377, 19 April 2001; Takoor Ramcharan, Case P0197/2001, 11 May 2001; Alladin Mohamed, Case P0842/2001, 18 December 2001. In Roodal v. Trinidad and Tobago, 10 October 2001 (adm.) the Commission noted that it used precautionary measures ‘contemporaneously with the transmission of the pertinent parts’ of his petition, on 13 November 2000. It noted that this request was made on the basis that if the State were to execute him before the Commission had had the opportunity to examine his case ‘any eventual decision would be rendered moot in terms of available remedies’ and he would suffer irreparable harm. In none of these cases did the State respond. CIDH Annual Report 2001, §§52-55.

⁴⁶⁸ IACHR Boyce and Joseph v. Barbados, 25 November 2004, 3rd ‘Having seen’ clause.

⁴⁶⁹ See e.g. IACHR Benjamin et al., 1 September 2001 (preliminary objections), §14B.

complainant's death sentence and adjusting the domestic law of Trinidad and Tobago accordingly'.⁴⁷⁰

While the Commission was still dealing with the cases on the merits it had already requested the Court to order provisional measures. In August 1998 the Court indeed ordered such measures to halt their executions.⁴⁷¹ In its reports about the cases of the eight persons discussed in the Court's Order of August 1998 the State argued that it had followed due process and that 'the Commission would still have other options available to compensate any violations it finds subsequent to an execution'.⁴⁷² Apparently the State does not subscribe to the traditional approach to the right to reparation. This traditional approach has a marked preference for restitutio in integrum. Instead the State believed it could go ahead with an execution pending the proceedings before the Commission. It argued that even when the Commission would find that the State had violated the Convention – something the Commission had in fact done already in the case Briggs – it would be sufficient to award monetary damages or other forms of compensation, following the execution.

In 2002 the Inter-American Court found violations in the death penalty cases that were brought before it by the Commission to deal with on the merits⁴⁷³ and it decided on a variety of reparations. It referred to its earlier jurisprudence that Article 63(1) ACHR is the codification of a rule of customary law constituting 'one of the fundamental principles of contemporary international law on State responsibility'.⁴⁷⁴ When the State is responsible for an illicit act, it has an immediate responsibility for the breach of the international norm involved, 'together with the subsequent duty to make reparations and put an end to the consequences of said violation'.⁴⁷⁵ It emphasised that such reparation required full restitution (restitutio in integrum), whenever possible, consisting of 'restoring the situation that existed before the violation occurred'.⁴⁷⁶ The Court also pointed out that a violating State cannot invoke provisions of its domestic law to modify or ⁴⁷⁰ IACHR Benjamin et al., 1 September 2001 (preliminary objections), §14C. See also IACHR Hilaire, Constantine & Benjamin et al., 21 June 2002 (merits & reparations), Operative paragraphs 8-11, in particular 11: 'the State should abstain from executing, in all cases, regardless of the results of the new trials'. With regard to the case of Joey Ramiah, who had been executed despite the Court's provisional measure, the Commission noted that this was no longer possible and that the consequences of the violations must be remedied by other means. In his case the Commission petitioned the Court to order the State to provide adequate compensation to his next of kin.

⁴⁷¹ The Commission can request the Court's intervention in such cases, based on Article 63(2) ACHR. See Chapter II (Systems). See further Chapters III (Executions) and XVII (Official responses).

⁴⁷² IACHR James et al. cases, Order of 29 August 1998 (reports of 5 June, 30 June, 29 June, 8 July, 15 July and 28 July 1998).

⁴⁷³ Violations of Articles 4(1), 4(2), 4(6), 5(1), 5(2), 7(5), 8, and 25.

⁴⁷⁴ IACHR Hilaire, Constantine and Benjamin et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago, Judgment of 21 June 2002, §202.

⁴⁷⁵ Ibid., referring to Cantoral Benavides case, Judgment of 3 December 2001 (reparations), §40, Cesti Hurtado case, Judgment of 31 May 2001 (reparations), §35, Villagrán Morales et al. ('Street Children' case), Judgment of 26 May 2001 (reparations), §62.

⁴⁷⁶ "When this is not possible, as in the present Case, it is the task of this international Tribunal to order the adoption of a series of measures that, in addition to guaranteeing respect for the rights violated, ensure that the damage resulting from the infractions is repaired, and order the payment of an indemnity as compensation for the harm caused in that case". IACHR Hilaire, Constantine and Benjamin et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago, Judgment of 21 June 2002, §203, referring to Cantoral Benavides case, Judgment of 3 December 2001 (reparations), §41, Durand and Ugarte, Judgment of 3 December 2001 (reparations), §25 and Barrios Altos, Judgment of 30 November 2001 (reparations), §25.

ignore altogether its obligation to make reparations. This obligation 'is regulated in all its aspects (scope, nature, modalities, and designation of beneficiaries) by international law'.⁴⁷⁷ 'Reparations,' it noted, 'consist of those measures necessary to make the effects of the violations committed disappear'.⁴⁷⁸

Following these general remarks about reparation, the Court ordered the State to abstain from applying its law dating from 1925 that made the death penalty mandatory for all cases of murder irrespective of the individual circumstances.⁴⁷⁹ It determined that in the cases of the 31 petitioners that were still alive, the State was to order a retrial applying the new criminal legislation resulting from the reform of the law of 1925. The Advisory Committee on the Power of Pardon was to resubmit the cases of the victims to the executive authority competent to render a decision in the mercy procedure. Implementing these obligations, however, was not sufficient. In the exercise of the authority conferred upon it by Article 63(1) ACHR it held 'on the grounds of equity, that the State, regardless of the outcome of the new trials (...) and independently of whether the new trials are actually carried out, should refrain from executing' the 31 persons involved.⁴⁸⁰

⁴⁷⁷ IACHR Hilaire, Constantine and Benjamin et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago, Judgment of 21 June 2002, §203, referring to Cantoral Benavides, Judgment of 3 December 2000 (reparations), §41, Cesti Hurtado, Judgment of 30 May 2001 (reparations), §35 and Villagrán Morales et al. ('Street Children' case), Judgment of 26 May 2001 (reparations), §61.

⁴⁷⁸ IACHR Hilaire, Constantine and Benjamin et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago, Judgment of 21 June 2002, §205, referring to Cantoral Benavides, Judgment of 3 December 2000 (reparations), §36, Cesti Hurtado, Judgment of 30 May 2001 (reparations), §36 and Villagrán Morales et al. ('Street Children' case), Judgment of 26 May 2001 (reparations), §63. Another general form of reparation was the obligation to improve the conditions of detention. The Court considered it pertinent and necessary to direct the State to bring its prison conditions in line with international human rights law. IACHR Hilaire, Constantine and Benjamin et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago, Judgment of 21 June 2002, §217.

⁴⁷⁹ Because of its finding that the way in which the crime of murder was penalised in the Offences Against the Person Act was 'in and of itself' a violation of the ACHR, the Court held that the State should refrain from future application of this Act and, 'within a reasonable time, bring the law into compliance with the American Convention and other international human rights norms, in accordance with Article 2, so that the respect and enjoyment of the rights to life, personal integrity, a fair trial and due process embodied in the Convention are guaranteed'. The Court was indeed very precise in its directions, establishing that 'the legislative reforms contemplated should include the introduction of different categories (criminal classes) of murder, in keeping with the wide range of differences in the gravity of the act, so as to take into account the particular circumstances of both the crime and the offender'. It also specified that the State should introduce a 'system of graduated levels' ensuring 'that the severity of the punishment is commensurate with the gravity of the act and the criminal culpability of the accused'. It pointed out that this form of reparation was 'consistent with the position which this Court has taken in the past'. IACHR Hilaire, Constantine and Benjamin et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago, Judgment of 21 June 2002, §213.

⁴⁸⁰ IACHR Hilaire, Constantine and Benjamin et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago, Judgment of 21 June 2002, §215. In his Concurring Opinion Judge de Roux-Rengifo pointed out that while these 31 persons had not yet been deprived of their lives, Article 4(2) had nevertheless been violated because of the application of a domestic law that led to the imposition of the death penalty for crimes that do not fall into the category of 'most serious'. The Court had 'abstained from evaluating the possibility that some of those condemned to death could have committed crimes which are considered "most serious," because the aforementioned law has been applied to all of them, and this necessitates, without question, a declaration of a violation of Article 2 of the

5.5.5 Conclusion on halting executions and the expected obligations on the merits and reparation

The Inter-American Commission has made explicit its motivation for precautionary measures to halt an execution by pointing out that if the State were to execute the petitioner before an assessment on the merits could take place, any later decision of the Commission would be ‘ineffective in providing potential remedies and that this would cause him irreparable harm’.⁴⁸¹ In addition the Inter-American Court has made clear that once a violation has been found, the obligations of the State include as a minimum a ‘permanent injunction’ against the execution of the victims.⁴⁸²

The HRC has been less clear in its case law on this issue. In cases involving a finding of a violation of the right to a fair trial (Article 14 ICCPR), and thereby a violation of the right to life (Article 6 ICCPR), it always indicates that the State party is under an obligation to provide the victim with an effective remedy, ‘including commutation’. Yet in the past, in its decisions on the merits, it has failed to refer to the obligation not to execute the victims of violations of the ICCPR not involving Article 6.

An unequivocal statement by the HRC that the pre-requisite of any form of compensation for any type of violation of the ICCPR is that the petitioner remains alive, would provide a convincing rationale for the use of provisional measures in all death penalty cases.⁴⁸³ An execution would then deprive the petitioner of the most essential form of reparation and would result in irreparable harm to persons.

5.6 Conclusion on the relation of provisional measures to cessation, assurances of non-repetition and reparations

As discussed more closely in the Conclusion to this Part (Part II Purpose) the harm to be prevented pending the proceedings and subsequent to the finding of a violation should be harm to persons rather than just harm to the claim.

Convention’. Concurring Opinion of Judge de Roux-Rengifo, IACHR Hilaire, Constantine and Benjamin et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago, Judgment of 21 June 2002. By way of reparation for immaterial harm, the Court ordered Trinidad to pay the widow of Joey Ramiah $50,000 USD to support her in bringing up their son and assist in his education. It also ordered the State to pay his mother $10,000 USD. In addition, as reimbursement for the expenses incurred in bringing the case before the Court, the State had to pay the representatives of the victims the sum of $13,000 USD. Furthermore the Court referred to earlier jurisprudence on the general obligations of the State under Article 2 ACHR. These obligations include the adoption of measures to suppress laws and practices in violation of the Convention and the adoption of laws to effectively protect its guarantees. Under customary international law States must introduce the necessary modifications to their domestic law to ensure compliance with the obligations assumed under the human rights treaties they ratified. This general obligation, laid down in Article 2 ACHR, implies that the measures of domestic law must be effective: the principle of effet utile. IACHR Hilaire, Constantine and Benjamin et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago, Judgment of 21 June 2002, §213, referring to ‘The Last Temptation of Christ’ case (Olmedo Bustos et al.), Judgment of 5 February 2000, §§85 and 87.

⁴⁸¹ See e.g. CIDH Annual Report 2000, §§45-46.

⁴⁸² IACHR Hilaire, Constantine and Benjamin et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago, Judgment of 21 June 2002, §215.

⁴⁸³ This would then be independent of the question whether an execution would constitute a further violation of the right to life in Article 6 ICCPR because of a violation of the right to a fair trial in Article 14 ICCPR.

In human rights cases provisional measures could be used also to prevent irreparable harm to rights collateral to the claim, as long as these rights involve the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment. This would be the case when the provisional measures are ordered to protect the witnesses in a case, rather than the alleged victims. An example of a case of provisional measures protecting rights collateral to the claim, but involving the alleged victim rather than other beneficiaries would be when someone appeals to an adjudicator claiming to be the victim of an arbitrary detention, and meanwhile there is reason to fear ill treatment. Pending the determination of the issue whether or not this detention is arbitrary, the adjudicator may indicate to the State concerned that it should take the provisional measure of preventing, or ending, the alleged ill treatment. Here the specific measure requested is not provisional in the sense that such ill treatment may be resumed after determination of the legal question, but it is in the sense that it is a form of collateral protection applicable while the case is pending.

In other situations the claim pending before the international adjudicator relates to the threat itself of irreparable harm to life and physical integrity. This is often so in the Inter-American cases involving threats to human rights defenders. In such cases the provisional measures may still be collateral to the claim if they also aim to protect persons other than the alleged victims.

The claim itself could also involve something else, but family members of the alleged victims, witnesses or others are receiving death threats. In such cases persons other than the alleged victim(s) involved in the main claim risk irreparable harm. These persons are being threatened because they are somehow related to the alleged victim, for instance as family members or co-workers or as witnesses, judges or counsel in the international or domestic proceedings.⁴⁸⁴ In these cases too the provisional measure should not go further than the eventual form of reparation could. The difference is that the eventual remedy is hypothetical in the sense that it relates to violations perpetrated against persons other than the alleged victim(s). In other words, the criterion is irreparable harm to persons rather than the link between the object of the complaint and the provisional measures. Still, there must be a relationship between what form of reparation the adjudicator could have suggested on the merits, had the main claim been about the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment of these persons. They should be protected against irreparable harm to their life and personal integrity pending the proceedings in the case of the alleged victim, exactly because they are being threatened in relation to that case. In order to obtain an eventual (financial) remedy, however, as part of a judgment on the merits, these persons must institute their own proceedings. In sum, what the petitioner needs to show, for purposes of provisional measures, is the threat of irreparable harm to persons and the relationship of these persons to the alleged victim. The adjudicator needs to take into account also whether the provisional measures would go no further than the eventual remedy would have, if the persons involved had been the alleged victims.

Yet being overly strict about the relationship between the main claim and the request for provisional measures is inappropriate in the context of irreparable harm to persons. Of course the adjudicator could continue to use provisional measures without hinting at the rights involved. It is possible that it does not relate its concept of irreparable harm to specific articles of the applicable treaty, but uses independent concepts of life, dignity and personal integrity, all part of the underlying rationale of protecting the existence of individuals and indigenous peoples. Yet in order to enhance transparency and the authority of their provisional measures it would be useful if the adjudicators would indicate the rights involved.

The link between halting an execution pending a case and ordering commutation or a new trial as part of the decision on the merits so as to prevent a violation of the right to life is evident. With regard to ordering a State to protect a person against threats, the aim of the Court's authority seems to be identical in provisional measures and judgments on the merits and reparations. The specific order to investigate and punish violations can also be found both as part of the Court's judgment and as part of its provisional measures. In this case, though, as part of provisional measures 'investigate and prosecute' solely aim at preventing further threats, while 'investigate and prosecute' as a form of reparation aims not only at prevention of further violations but also as a form of moral satisfaction. Possibly, the drafters of the American Convention had already foreseen this, as they put in the same article both the power to order provisional measures and the power to order reparation (Article 63 ACHR). The 1998 Protocol to the African Charter, establishing an African Court of Human and Peoples' Rights, was inspired by this provision and equally combines provisional measures and reparation in one provision (Article 27 of the 1998 Protocol). Unfortunately this direct relationship is lost in the Protocol on the African Court of Justice and Human Rights (2008), which refers to reparation in a separate provision.

⁴⁸⁴ See also section 4 on the group of beneficiaries.

Indeed there should be a correlation between the measures required pending and concluding the procedure. In the context of the right to culture, for instance, if the HRC would never refer to cessation, such as a permanent halt to certain destructive developments, then provisional measures that would require a temporary halt to such developments would not be of much use. In fact the provisional measures would then go further than the eventual action or abstention required.⁴⁸⁵ If a violation is indeed found, the subsequent obligations, including reparation, should correspond to the provisional measures earlier taken. An obligation aimed at restoring the situation as much as possible or at least at preventing further degradation would justify the type of provisional measure taken pending the proceedings.

The State must provide for cessation and assurances of non-repetition, thereby preventing irreparable harm to persons that would otherwise constitute a further violation of the human rights treaty. It must also provide for exactly the form of reparation indicated in so far as this represents the most essential form of reparation (e.g. the prerequisite for the enjoyment of any form of compensation).⁴⁸⁶

Provisional measures have several different general purposes. One would be to enable the adjudicator to make a determination on the merits that makes sense in light of the human rights treaty. This is the case, for instance, when the aim of the claim is to prevent a violation of the right to life. This purpose would be applicable in cases where a human rights claim includes cessation or a request for restitution in kind such as a retrial in conformity with the right to a fair trial. An adjudicator could use provisional measures in all cases to prevent that an impending act by the government concerned (or its omission in relation to impending acts by third parties), which would result in the death of the petitioner, would make fulfilment of that claim impossible. Another aim of a claim could be that the adjudicator would declare that commutation of the death penalty would be warranted as a remedy for a past violation, rather than in order to prevent a new violation. In both cases (life as a right and life as a remedy) the general purpose of the provisional measure is to safeguard a final determination that makes sense in the light of the human rights treaty.

⁴⁸⁵ See e.g. the discussion of HRC Lubicon Lake Band, 26 March 1990 in Chapter X (Culture).

⁴⁸⁶ If the remedy is more compensatory than aimed at prevention of a further violation, any specific directions of the HRC must be considered seriously, but are not necessarily binding. Nevertheless the State should not act such as to make impossible the petitioner's enjoyment of some form of compensation. It is argued that this means that at least the precondition must be fulfilled that the victim is alive to enjoy the compensation awarded. On the legal status of provisional measures see Chapter XVI.

6 CONCLUSION: PROTECTING THE BENEFICIARY AGAINST IRREPARABLE HARM

This chapter discussed several issues involving protection. The first three were the type and specificity of the protective measures and the group of beneficiaries and addressees. The last issue involved the link between the protection required as part of provisional measures and the protection required on the merits (cessation, assurances of non-repetition) and as part of a judgment on reparation.

Human rights adjudicators have all used provisional measures so as to prevent irreparable harm to persons pending the proceedings. Yet the protection required in provisional measures takes various forms. An element of positive action is present in most provisional measures and should be made explicit in cases involving ongoing situations such as adverse detention conditions, recent disappearances and death threats. Protection against death threats involves the right to life and protection of personal integrity. They are core rights whose violation causes irreparable harm to persons. Such violations must therefore be prevented even if this entails that the State must take positive measures pending the proceedings.

Compared to the European and African systems (and the Geneva systems) the Inter-American system appears to be more responsive to the particular situations it faces. Often provisional measures indicate the required result, such as to refrain from executing a death sentence or to protect persons against threats. Sometimes they are also more precise as to how the State should achieve this result, or at least they rule out certain activities that do not qualify as compliance. Thus, in the Inter-American system the provisional measures have become increasingly specific, partly in light of the experiences of the Commission and Court with certain States. In fact they provide insight into the ways States could or must protect persons under their jurisdiction against threats by paramilitary groups or other groups operating with the acquiescence of (certain factions of) the army, the police, or other authorities. They show that protection against threats means that the State must protect the beneficiaries in the area in which they live and work, rather than banishing them to 'safe areas', claiming that this would absolve it from taking protective measures. Providing effective protection against death threats is not divorced from other human rights obligations, which means that States must assist internally displaced persons to return safely and allow human rights defenders or journalists to continue the activities that had triggered the threats in the first place. Generally speaking the States involved do not appear to find fault with this approach, possibly also because at the core the provisional measures concern the most basic of rights: the right to life and the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment.

Similarly to the practice in the Inter-American system it is argued that international adjudicators should also incrementally specify their provisional measures, so as to provide clarity to States on what is expected of them, but they should do so even more gradually than the regional systems. This gradual approach is warranted exactly because of the less cohesive nature of an international as opposed to a regional monitoring system and the diminished possibility of collecting and interpreting information. Another aspect that might play a role is the sensitivity of some States and the way these States would base their disagreement with certain provisional measures on regional doctrine, or insist on sovereignty over protection of human rights. The discussion on subsidiarity (and on the related margin of appreciation in the interpretation of treaty obligations) is more important in some systems than in others and plays out differently in each system. Especially with regard to core rights the provisional measures taken by the other human rights adjudicators could at least give some direction to an adjudicator regarding what the State is expected to do or to abstain from doing in order to prevent irreparable harm to persons.

Apart from the type (action or abstention) and specificity of provisional measures, in order to truly ensure the protective nature of provisional measures it must be clear who is included as a beneficiary, even if not mentioned by name, and whether and how the beneficiaries have been consulted about the measures intended to protect them.

In the European system the tables have sometimes been turned by addressing the alleged victim under the Rule on provisional measures. It does not appear appropriate to address an order for provisional measures to the alleged victim instead of to the State.

Both as to purpose and as to substance the provisional measures should be consistent with similar measures already taken in order to increase their credibility and avoid discriminatory application vis-à-vis various beneficiaries and addressees. Yet in the face of irreparable harm to persons adjudicators should not balance the basic rights of the intended beneficiaries with the general interest. At the same time, in order to uphold the legitimacy of provisional measures it is vital to adhere to principles of procedural fairness. In this regard it is important to make sure that the State's positions and arguments are duly taken into account.

In case of a group of beneficiaries, is there a need for the beneficiaries of provisional measures to be mentioned individually? The practice developed in the Inter-American system of using provisional measures to protect the members of a defined community, or people working at human rights organisations, as well as all other persons visiting the premises is appropriate. While they are not identified by name, the beneficiaries of the required protective measures are clear to the State.

Sometimes beneficiaries may live in remote areas or be otherwise difficult to reach. In such cases it should not be required to establish written consent of each beneficiary, as long as there are indications that they are likely to agree and as long as there are no (subsequent) indications of disagreement. While consultation of the beneficiaries proves to be difficult at times, the Inter-American Commission and Court do appear to strive for it, more than the other adjudicators.

The wider impact of provisional measures also deserves attention. A good faith implementation of the obligations under the human rights treaty warrants a pro-active stance of the State to ensure the underlying rationale to a provisional measure is being met. This may include general measures that protect others in a situation similar to that of the specific beneficiary.

The final issue discussed in this chapter was the link between the protection required as part of provisional measures and the protection required on the merits (cessation, assurances of non-repetition) and as part of a judgment on reparation. The general purpose of the provisional measure is to safeguard a final determination that makes sense in the light of the human rights treaty. Therefore there should be a correlation between the measures required pending and concluding the procedure, in case a violation is indeed found. Without such correlation the question arises whether the object of the provisional measure was simply to postpone the suffering until after the expected finding. This would be an unsatisfactory approach to the concept of provisional measures.

An obligation aimed at restoring the situation as much as possible or at least at preventing further degradation would justify the type of provisional measure taken pending the proceedings to prevent irreparable harm to persons.

It is argued that this would apply as well to situations in which the alleged victim and the beneficiary do not coincide. As noted, persons who are not the alleged victims may still receive protection as beneficiaries of provisional measures, for instance because they are receiving threats as witnesses in this case. What the petitioner needs to show, for purposes of such provisional measures, is the threat of irreparable harm to persons and the relationship of these persons to the alleged victim. In order to make sure that the action or abstention required of the State remains credible, the petitioner also needs to show that the provisional measures would go no further than the eventual remedy would have, if the persons involved had been the alleged victims. Yet in order to obtain an eventual (financial) remedy as part of a judgment on the merits, persons other than the alleged victims must institute their own proceedings.

Both in provisional measures and on the merits the ultimate aim is to prevent irreparable harm to persons. The substance of the protection required is often similar as well. What is different is the function of the protection required: at the provisional measures stage reference is made to this protection in order to ensure the possibility of an effective decision on the merits in case a violation is found on the merits. At the merits stage, on the other hand, reference is made to this protection because it is indeed necessary in order to prevent irreparable harm to persons.

CONCLUSION

1 INTRODUCTION

It is not always evident from the case law how the human rights adjudicators perceive the purpose of provisional measures. After all, apart from the Inter-American Court and, to some extent, the Inter-American Commission, they normally do not motivate their use of these measures. Outside of the Inter-American context jurisprudence on why provisional measures were or were not used in a given case is hardly available at all. Because the adjudicators do not motivate their provisional measures they are also unclear about the question under which provision they take them.¹ If they indeed take provisional measures on the basis of a theory, they do not indicate this to the State or the petitioners.

Is their rationale for the use of provisional measures similar to that of the ICJ? To the extent that their provisional measures aim to ensure a meaningful outcome of the case before the adjudicator the answer has to be in the affirmative. In death penalty cases, for instance, a meaningful outcome of a case is not ensured when one of the parties (i.e. the State party) inflicts irreparable harm on either the person of the petitioner, or on the fairness of the procedure.

Three requirements for the use of provisional measures that have been mentioned in the various human rights systems are risk, immediacy and irreparable harm. Of those, irreparable harm is indicative of the purpose of provisional measures and were discussed in this Part, while immediacy and risk are indicative of urgency and therefore are discussed in Part III, Chapter XV. Apart from the European system, all human rights systems specifically refer to the prevention of irreparable harm. The European system, on the other hand, provides for a very general rule on provisional measures, similar to that in the ICJ Statute, referring to the interests of the parties. Different from the ICJ Statute the Rule also mentions, as an alternative, the interests of the ‘proper conduct’ of the proceedings before it. Yet in practice the ECtHR uses the criterion of preventing irreparable harm just like other human rights adjudicators do.

Only in the Inter-American system there are some specific statements about the purpose of provisional measures. In his Order for urgent measures in the Peace Community case, for instance, the President of the Inter-American Court pointed out that in national legal systems the purpose of provisional measures generally is to preserve the rights of the parties in a dispute. This would guarantee that any future decision on the merits would not be harmed by their actions pendente lite. In international human rights law, on the other hand, the purpose of provisional measures went beyond this because, next to their essentially preventive character, they effectively protect fundamental rights to the extent that they prevent irreparable harm to persons.² The Court repeated this when it confirmed the President’s Order.³

Apparently the President and the full Court distinguish between the more traditional preventive character of provisional measures on the one hand and the newer protective nature on the other. At the same time this protection takes place in order to prevent ‘irreparable harm’. In other words, the main difference seems to relate to the type of obligation. With the term ‘prevention’ the President seems to refer to the negative obligation of ‘refraining from action’ and with the term ‘protection’ to positive obligations as well.

¹ They may even consider that provisional measures are not necessarily related to specific rights.

² IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order of 9 October 2000 (President).

³ IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order of 24 November 2000.

From the practice of the various adjudicators other than in the Inter-American system it is not always apparent to whom or what the harm is irreparable. The various human rights bodies have only haphazardly offered clues as to how they define irreparable harm. Thus, while in most complaints it is not so difficult to establish the immediacy (or imminence) of the risk,⁴ the examination of the practice of the human rights adjudicators shows that their use of the concept of irreparable harm is not always clear.

One criterion did appear in the case law. This is the requirement that for provisional measures to be used an act or omission should have irreversible consequences. While this is not further explained, examples are easily imaginable. In fact, irreversible means that restitutio in integrum would be impossible.

Moreover, in practice the general attitude of the human rights adjudicators seems to be that provisional measures are meant to be exceptional.⁵ The ECtHR, for instance, has pointed out that the grounds on which it applies provisional measures are not set out in the Rules of Court. Instead the Court has determined these in its case law. Just like the European Commission did prior to the entry into force of Protocol 11 (1998), the Court only applies provisional measures ‘in restricted circumstances’ or ‘limited spheres’.⁶ There must be an imminent risk of irreparable damage.

“While there is no specific provision in the Convention concerning the domains in which Rule 39 will apply, requests for its application usually concern the right to life (Article 2), the right not to be subjected to torture or inhuman treatment (Article 3) and, exceptionally the right to respect for private and family life (Article 8) or other rights guaranteed by the Convention. The vast majority of cases in which interim measures have been indicated concern deportation and extradition proceedings”.⁷

The ECtHR has considered that ‘in the light of the general principles of international law, the law of treaties and international case-law, the interpretation of the scope of interim measures cannot be dissociated from the proceedings to which they relate or the decision on the merits they seek to protect’.⁸ This statement about the scope of provisional measures is significant. It shows that the ECtHR now recognises as well that in the context of such measures procedural and substantive law meet.

In Mamatkulov (2005) the ECtHR observed that ‘the ICJ, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights, the Human Rights Committee and the Committee against Torture of the United Nations, although operating under different treaty provisions to those of the Court, have confirmed in their reasoning in recent decisions that the preservation of the asserted rights of the parties in the face of the risk of irreparable damage represents an essential objective of interim measures in international law. Indeed it can be said that, whatever the legal system in question, ⁴ See Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

⁵ See also Garry (2001), p. 410, discussing the European system: “As the Commission and Court have had to rely on the good faith of the Member State in complying with the interim order, they have issued them only in extreme cases where there is an ‘apparent real and imminent risk of irreparable harm’”.

⁶ ECtHR Grand Chamber Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 4 February 2005, §§103-104.

⁷ Id., §104.

⁸ Id., §123.

the proper administration of justice requires that no irreparable action be taken while proceedings are pending'.⁹

As noted in the Introduction to this part of the book (Part II), irreparable harm to persons may be interpreted in various ways. A distinction could be made between three interrelated types of irreparable harm: to the claim, to the procedure and to persons. To prevent harm to the claim provisional measures could be taken in a wide range of cases. After all, preventing such harm could relate to any claim under the human rights treaty involved, as long as the consequences would be irreversible. Provisional measures to prevent harm to the procedure are hardly ever taken in isolation. Generally there also is a risk of harm to the claim or to persons.¹⁰

Human rights adjudicators generally take a dynamic approach, acutely aware of the vulnerable position of the individual vis-à-vis the State. Yet with regard to the range of situations in which provisional measures have been taken often their practice seems to be more limited than that of international adjudicators not focusing on human rights. This may be due to their exercise of adjudicatory caution based on the idea that if the constitutive document instituting an individual complaint procedure does not explicitly refer to the authority to use provisional measures it may be wise to start out using them only in the most serious of circumstances.

It is argued that in order to make the system of interim protection work it is necessary to draw the line somewhere. Part II of this book and in particular this Conclusion, aims to provide a conceptual motivation on where to draw the line. This conclusion to Part II addresses the question whether provisional measures to prevent irreparable harm involve any type of human rights violation (harm to the claim only) or only particularly fundamental rights (harm to the claim as well as to persons). A related question is whether a provisional measure to prevent harm to the proceedings is ultimately linked to harm to the claim or to harm to persons and whether the protective measures required coincide with those that may be required on the merits and reparation.

2 COMMON CORE AND OUTER LIMITS OF THE CONCEPT

2.1 Introduction

This book distinguishes between the wider category of provisional measures to prevent irreversible harm to the claim or procedure and the more limited category, which forms part of it, of provisional measures to prevent or halt irreparable harm to persons. As discussed below, it is argued that the latter provisional measures belong to the common core, while provisional measures that do not aim to prevent irreparable harm to persons, but nevertheless do aim to prevent irreversible harm to the claim or procedure, are still within the outer limits of the concept.

All human rights adjudicators have used provisional measures to protect against irreparable harm to persons involving the right to life and the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment. Most of them have done so to halt the execution of death sentences, to halt expulsion or extradition in the context of non-refoulement and to protect against death threats and harassment. There have been several other situations in which provisional measures have been used in one system or another. These range from cultural survival and the destruction of a painting to the payment of a fine. In the previous chapters an attempt was made to find the rationale for the use of provisional measures in all these situations.

⁹ Id., §124.

¹⁰ See EComHR Ennslin, Baader and Raspe v. FRG, 8 July 1978 (inadm.), §44 for an example of provisional measures to preserve the evidence. In that sense they were clearly aimed at preventing harm to the procedure. Still, any harm to the procedure would somehow cause harm to the rights claimed as well. See also Chapter XII (Other situations), section 2.9.

After a more general discussion of the common core of the concept of provisional measures, as it relates to the purpose, this section deals with the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment. It subsequently focuses on two situations in which provisional measures could be used, one involving the rights of indigenous peoples and religious minorities and one involving mass expulsion and internal displacement. The first situation, about indigenous culture and religious minorities, already has an established practice in the Inter-American and African systems, in the international Optional Protocol system and in the practice of the Bosnia Chamber.¹¹ The other situation relates to provisional measures involving protection against mass expulsion, introduced by the Inter-American Commission and Court.¹² It is proposed that provisional measures are indeed feasible in such situations. The last part of section 2 addresses other situations in which provisional measures have been used and attempts to determine the underlying rationale for this use. This culminates in a discussion of the outer limits of the concept.

2.2 Common core: preventing irreparable harm to persons

2.2.1 Introduction

It seems that a convergence has taken place in the approaches of adjudicators dealing with comparable obligations, making possible the identification of a common core. This is not surprising given the similarities in the object and purpose of the various human rights treaties and their emphasis on the imperative character of certain rights. It is suggested that provisional measures are based on underlying rationales that are equally similar, although normally not explicitly discussed by the human rights adjudicators.¹³

In some situations provisional measures have not just been used by one regional adjudicator, but also by the HRC, as the only international adjudicator monitoring a general human rights treaty. For lack of explanation by the adjudicators themselves about their use of provisional measures, assumptions about the rationale of the measures must be made on the basis of the adjudicators' decisions on the merits. If several adjudicators have in common certain reasoning on the merits in situations in which they previously used provisional measures, it is assumed that these situations have now come to belong to the common core of the concept of provisional measures in human rights adjudication. At present the core that the approaches of all adjudicators have in common is the protection of persons against irreparable harm to their lives and personal integrity. Sections 2.2.3 and 2.2.4 also discuss what could be the rationale for the expansions by the various adjudicators of the use of provisional measures within the framework of protecting existence itself. It suggests two expansions found in one or two systems that would also be feasible in other human rights systems.

Certain principles seem to underlie the practice of all human rights adjudicators with regard to provisional measures. In human rights cases involving an individual and a State party, the power is concentrated in the State party, triggering obligations of action and abstention. Provisional measures, therefore, should either serve to shield the individual against abuse of power by the State resulting in irreparable harm or should serve to invoke the core obligations of the State to protect individuals against irreparable harm caused by other individuals or entities. Thus, the purpose of provisional measures normally is not ‘in the interest of the parties’ in the same way as cases before the ICJ, which concern conflicts between States. This is mainly relevant in the face of arguments such as ‘balance of convenience’ that are applicable more in relations between equal parties. At the same time the practice of the human rights adjudicators with regard to the purpose of provisional measures seems to be more limited than that of the ICJ. Indeed, if they would take provisional measures in all cases involving irreparable harm to the claim this might diminish the importance of provisional measures. It also might lessen the persuasive force of the follow-up by adjudicators in cases of non-compliance.¹⁴

¹¹ See Chapter X (Culture).

¹² See Chapter XII (Mass expulsion).

¹³ Yet see the opinion recently expressed by Judge Cançado Trindade that the 'absolute and peremptory prohibition in any circumstances whatsoever', of torture and other atrocities, 'a prohibition of jus cogens – in contemporary international law' has 'a direct bearing on the issue of the indication of provisional measures'. ICJ Questions relating to the Obligation to Prosecute or Extradite (Belgium v. Senegal), Order of 28 May 2009, Dissenting Opinion Judge Cançado Trindade, §49.

One could argue that any harm to the claim in human rights cases results in irreparable harm to the victims of human rights violations or to other persons involved. After all, human rights violations are, as such, attacks on personal integrity. Such attacks should be prevented if the result would be irreversible. In that sense harm to the claim and harm to persons coincide. On the other hand, the specific references in the texts of the treaties or rules of procedure to harm to the victim or to persons and to ‘irreparable’ rather than ‘irreversible’ harm could refer to a more limited category of extreme human rights violations. This would be violations for which reparation by financial compensation would be particularly inappropriate, rather than simply irreversible harm to all claims.

Immediacy¹⁵ and irreversibility always play a role. In addition, in order to remain authoritative, provisional measures must be taken in exceptional cases only.¹⁶ Clearly, provisional measures should be taken to prevent irreversible situations in the sense that measures that are reversible cannot be irreparable. If legislation and acts of implementation would have results that could indeed be reversed, they do not trigger irreparable harm. Thus, irreversibility is a threshold criterion for the use of provisional measures. At the same time measures that are irreversible are not necessarily irreparable. The term ‘irreparable’ connotes a relationship with the concept of reparation. Not only would restitutio in integrum be impossible without provisional measures (irreversibility), but forms of reparation other than restitutio in integrum would be unacceptable. They will be manifestly inadequate exactly because the consequences of the violation are so serious as to be incapable of being erased. A decision by a State to allow a certain act or omission when the adjudicator has indicated that prevention is the only appropriate remedy, constitutes a grave violation of international law.¹⁷

Indeed, the references in the applicable text to irreparable harm to the victims of the alleged violations, and even more so the references to irreparable harm to persons, combined with the exceptional nature of provisional measures, argue for an approach that initially is limited to preserving the most fundamental rights. Violations of rights causing irreparable harm must be prevented since a return to the status quo ante is impossible after the irreversible has taken place, while the nature of the harm implies that such violations can never be repaired by forms of reparation other than restitutio in integrum. In human rights cases the relevance of this traditional reason for using provisional measures is particularly striking.

In several systems, including that of the ICCPR, the reference to provisional measures is only made in the rules of procedure but not in the constituent text. Although the power to use provisional measures is derived from the inherent function of adjudicators, in light of an effective ¹⁴ On follow up by the adjudicators see Chapter XVIII.

¹⁵ See Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

¹⁶ See also e.g. Buergenthal (1994), p. 93.

¹⁷ If such violation nevertheless takes place, other measures, including forms of reparation, – however inadequate – are still warranted. At least public statements of acknowledgement, validation of the victims, investigation and prosecution of the perpetrators and, more generally, assurances of non-repetition would help prevent similar violations as well as restore some measure of dignity to the survivors. See Chapter XIII (Protection).

right of individual complaint, they seem to invoke them mainly in the context of rights singled out in the treaty for their particularly fundamental nature. Indeed, the references to irreparable harm to the victims of the alleged violations in the treaties or rules of procedure, and even more so the references to irreparable harm to persons argue for an approach that initially is limited to preserving the most fundamental rights. This approach is confirmed by the statements by human rights adjudicators about the exceptional nature of provisional measures, probably in order to ensure that they remain authoritative. They have distinguished certain rights on the basis of their fundamental nature and it is in the context of these rights that all human rights adjudicators have used provisional measures.

Hence, under general international law provisional measures may be taken in a wide range of cases. Yet the minimum level approach proposed in this book, with regard to provisional measures in human rights cases that are not based on an explicit treaty provision, is based on the premise that provisional measures should remain exceptional. In other words, in light of the fact that several adjudicatory systems do not include an explicit reference to provisional measures, it is proposed that at least in universal systems of adjudication provisional measures should only involve rights essential for the very existence of persons and of indigenous peoples.

Adjudicators have referred to core rights that are so fundamental that States may not make reservations because this would be contrary to the object and purpose of the treaty. They have also referred to core rights that may not be derogated from even in times of emergency. The provisions on non-derogable rights specifically included in most human rights treaties, or referred to in the jurisprudence of the adjudicators, give some indication of the rights recognised for their fundamental nature within the relevant treaties.¹⁸ Judge of the Inter-American Court Cançado Trindade has referred to ‘the formation of a universal nucleus of non-derogable fundamental rights’ and a ‘true international regime against torture, forced disappearances of persons, and summary, extra-legal and arbitrary executions’.¹⁹

¹⁸ The ECHR was concluded before the ICCPR and includes the most limited list of non-derogable rights. The ACHR, on the other hand, was concluded after the ICCPR and provides a more extensive list of such rights. The ACHPR does not include a provision on states of emergency with a list of non-derogable rights. Article 15 ECHR refers to the right to life, the prohibition of torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, the prohibition of slavery or servitude and freedom from ex post facto laws. Article 4 ICCPR refers to the same rights but adds the prohibition of imprisonment on the ground of inability to fulfil a contractual obligation, the right to recognition as a person before the law and the freedom of thought, conscience and religion, including the right to manifest religion or belief. Except for the prohibition of imprisonment on the ground of inability to fulfil a contractual obligation, Article 27 ACHR equally refers to the foregoing rights. Moreover, it adds the rights of the family, the right to a name, the rights of the child, the right to a nationality, the right to participate in government and ‘the judicial guarantees essential for the protection of such rights’. See generally on the human rights dimension of hierarchy in international law e.g. Seiderman (2001). See also Orakhelashvili (2006). This book does not deal with the prohibition of slavery for lack of practice by the adjudicators of dealing with such cases and using provisional measures. In HRC Dissanayake, Mudiyansele Sumanaweera Banda v. Sri Lanka, 22 July 2008, the petitioner had requested provisional measures to the effect that he be granted respite from the execution of the sentence of hard labour. In March 2005 the Special Rapporteur denied this request ‘on the ground that working in a print shop did not appear to come within the terms of article 8, paragraph 3(b)’, §1.2.

¹⁹ IACHR Bámaca Velásquez v. Guatemala, 25 November 2000, Separate Opinion Cançado Trindade, §§25 and 26. He concludes: “All this points to the prevalence of the safeguard of the non-derogable rights in any circumstances (in times of peace as well as of armed conflict). The normative and interpretative convergences between the International Law of Human Rights and International Humanitarian Law (...) contribute to place those non-derogable rights, – starting with the fundamental right to life itself, – definitively in the domain of jus cogens”, §27. See also

This book draws on the ICCPR in order to determine a minimum level approach. The rights recognised under the ICCPR for their particularly fundamental character are also recognised as such under the ACHR. The latter treaty is even more extensive in its recognition of non-derogable rights than the ICCPR. The African Charter (ACHPR) does not provide for derogation in times of emergency.²⁰ While the ECHR is more limited with regard to non-derogable rights than the other treaties, all State parties to it have also recognised the ICCPR. Moreover, the ECHR itself recognises in Article 53 that no provision in the treaty will be interpreted to limit fundamental rights recognised in any other treaty ratified by the member States. The ICCPR is the treaty most generally applicable and all State parties to regional human rights treaties, apart from the Comores, have also ratified the ICCPR.²¹ Thus, it makes sense to use the universal system and its approach to rights of a particularly fundamental nature as a point of departure.²²

Thus in this book the ICCPR is taken as a model for the discussion of rights recognised for their fundamental character. The HRC has stated that while it is not its function to review State parties' conduct under other treaties,²³ it does have the competence to take these other international obligations into account when it considers whether the ICCPR allows the State to derogate from specific provisions.²⁴ In order to clarify the underlying rationale for the use of provisional measures by the HRC its General Comments often provide more information than the case law on the merits. The Committee considers that provisions representing 'customary international law (and a fortiori when they have the character of peremptory norms) may not be the subject of reservations'. While it does not distinguish between the norms of customary law and norms of ius cogens it has listed certain rights that may not be subjected to reservations because this would be contrary to the object and purpose of the Covenant. In other words, it singles out these norms for their particularly fundamental nature. The HRC has called the right to life the 'most essential' right in the ICCPR²⁵ or, more generally, the 'most fundamental' right.²⁶ Moreover, it has referred to the right to be free from torture as 'one of the highest values protected by the Covenant'.²⁷

CIDH Guantanamo Bay, Precautionary measure of 12 March 2002, p. 3 noting that human rights and humanitarian law may complement and reinforce each other 'sharing as they do a common nucleus of non-derogable rights and a common purpose of promoting human life and dignity'. See further e.g. Van Boven (2006), p. 95.

²⁰ See e.g. ACHPR Commission Nationale des Droits de l'Homme et des Libertés v. Chad, October 1995: "The African Charter, unlike other human rights instruments, does not allow for States parties to derogate from their treaty obligations during emergency situations. Thus, even a civil war in Chad cannot be used as an excuse by the State violating or permitting violations of rights in the African Charter", §21. On the other hand, the text of the Charter does confront the Convention organs with the problem of the so-called claw-back or limitation clauses. Yet the Commission has pointed out: "The reasons for possible limitations must be founded in a legitimate state interest and the evils of limitations of rights must be strictly proportionate with and absolutely necessary for the advantages which are to be obtained. Even more important, a limitation may never have as a consequence that the right itself becomes illusory". Media Rights Agenda and Others v. Nigeria, 31 October 1998, §§69-70. Generally see Naldi (2000).

²¹ Moreover, the Comores signed the ICCPR in September 2008.

²² See section 2 of the Introduction.

²³ This is different from the African Court and the Inter-American Commission. Moreover, the Inter-American Court can review the conduct of State parties under other treaties as part of its advisory function.

²⁴ See HRC General Comment 29 on states of emergency (Article 4), 24 July 2001, §10.

²⁵ See e.g. HRC Ng v. Canada, 5 November 1993, §14.1.

²⁶ See e.g. HRC Judge v. Canada, 5 August 2003.

²⁷ HRC Mansour Ahani v. Canada, 29 March 2004. See also e.g. ACHPR Zimbabwean Human Rights NGO Forum v. Zimbabwe, May 2006, §86 (referring to the right to life as 'the fulcrum of all other rights').

Conclusion

Even if not all rights mentioned in Article 4 ICCPR as non-derogable are argued to have been included because of their particularly fundamental nature,²⁸ nevertheless the non-derogable rights enumerated in Article 4 ICCPR could be seen ‘partly as recognition of the peremptory nature of some fundamental rights ensured in treaty form in the Covenant (e.g., Articles 6 and 7)’.²⁹ In this respect Article 8 on the prohibition of slavery, slave trade and servitude could be added. This right is enumerated as a recognition of its peremptory nature, just as Articles 6 and 7 on the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment and torture. Thus far, provisional measures have not yet been used in the context of (modern) slavery, but this would be feasible if a State that could be held (partly) responsible has in fact recognised an international individual complaint procedure.

The HRC has pointed out that Article 4(1) ‘requires that no measure derogating from the provisions of the Covenant may be inconsistent with the State party’s other obligations under international law, particularly the rules of international humanitarian law’. In this respect it also refers to Article 5(2) stipulating that the ICCPR cannot be used to justify restrictions upon or derogations from fundamental rights recognised in other legal instruments ‘on the pretext that the Covenant does not recognise such rights or that it recognises them to a lesser extent’. The HRC is competent to take into account a State party’s other international obligations when it considers whether a State may derogate from specific provisions of the ICCPR. It notes that States parties ‘should duly take into account the developments within international law as to human rights standards applicable in emergency situations’.³⁰

²⁸ The HRC acknowledges that some articles are mentioned as non-derogable ‘because it can never become necessary to derogate from these rights during a state of emergency (e.g., articles 11 and 18)’. See General Comment 29 on states of emergency (Article 4), 24 July 2001, §11. Article 11 concerns the prohibition of imprisonment because of inability to fulfil a contractual obligation and Article 18 concerns the freedom of thought, conscience and religion. Because of the different purpose of the non-derogatory character assigned to them they do not qualify as rights to be protected by provisional measures to the same extent as the right to life, the prohibition of cruel, torture and slavery, made non-derogable in light of their inherent priority character. The two remaining non-derogable rights listed in the ICCPR are Article 15, laying down the principle of legality in the field of criminal law and Article 16 on the recognition of everyone as a person before the law. Equally it cannot become necessary to derogate from these rights during a state of emergency, which may be a reason for their inclusion in the list of non-derogable rights. On the other hand, Article 15 also seems particularly fundamental in relation to the right to life and Art. 16 both in relation to the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment and torture. With regard to Article 15 the HRC itself indicated this when it mentioned it in the context of the discussion of the procedural guarantees necessary to protect the right to life. See General Comment 29 on states of emergency (Article 4), 24 July 2001, §§11 and 15 (obviously referring to Article 14 as well).

²⁹ See HRC General Comment 29 on states of emergency (Article 4), 24 July 2001, §11.

³⁰ Id., §§9 and 10. Among others it referred to the ILA Paris Minimum Standards of Human Rights Norms in a State of Emergency, 1984; the Siracusa Principles on the Limitation and Derogation Provisions in the ICCPR, the final report of Despouy, Special Rapporteur of the Sub-Commission on human rights and states of emergency, E/CN.4/sub.2/1997/19 and Add.1; the Guiding Principles on Internal Displacement, E/CN.4/1998/53/Add.2; the Turku (Åbo) Declaration of Minimum Humanitarian Standards (1990), E/CN.4/1995/116; and reports of the Secretary General to the Commission on Human Rights on fundamental standards of humanity, see e.g. E/CN.4/2001/91. The codification of crimes against humanity in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court is relevant in the interpretation of Article 4 ICCPR. The fact that certain human rights violations are defined as such crimes underscores the priority character of these rights. The Committee pointed out, among others, that Article 7 of the Rome Statute, on crimes against humanity, not only covers practices relating to Articles 6, 7 and 8 ICCPR but also

The question arises whether the ICCPR contains other rights of a particularly fundamental nature that are not enumerated in Article 4. The HRC has indeed singled out additional rights as well. It pointed out that ‘the category of peremptory norms extends beyond the list of non-derogable provisions’ of Article 4(2) ICCPR. States may not invoke this article as a justification for acting in violation of humanitarian law or ius cogens, ‘for instance by taking hostages, by imposing collective punishments, through arbitrary deprivations of liberty or by deviating from fundamental principles of fair trial, including the presumption of innocence’.³¹

The HRC has mentioned some ‘illustrative’ examples of elements of rights not enumerated in Article 4(2) on safeguards during times of emergency that still could not be made subject to lawful derogation under that article. For instance, the fundamental obligation to provide an effective remedy for violations of the ICCPR ‘constitutes a treaty obligation inherent in the Covenant as a whole’. This obligation should also be respected during states of emergency. This remark may be seen as indicative for the importance of the concept of provisional measures as well.³²

In short, the HRC has argued that several of the non-derogable rights enumerated as such in the ICCPR, as well as certain other rights that have come to be seen as non-derogable, have been distinguished as such because of their particularly fundamental nature. The other adjudicators do not contradict this approach or they confirm it. They distinguish similar rights on the basis of their particularly fundamental nature: the right to life, the prohibition of cruel treatment and torture, slavery and discrimination, certain rights of indigenous peoples and the (procedural) rights necessary to ensure these rights.

It is suggested that in order to meet the criterion of exceptionality the common core of provisional measures is limited to these rights. It aims at protecting the very existence (in dignity) of persons and indigenous peoples. The subsequent subsections on protecting the right to life and preventing torture and cruel treatment on the one hand and protecting cultural survival on the other discuss this more closely.

2.2.2 Protecting the right to life and preventing torture and cruel treatment

Provisional measures to protect the right to life and prevent cruel treatment and torture may be illustrated by the following examples. The most obvious situation is that involving the death penalty.³³ If a petitioner is facing execution the adjudicator uses a provisional measure to halt this. Clearly, execution would result in irreparable harm to persons. Another example is the use of provisional measures to halt expulsions or extraditions in the context of non-refoulement. If such forms of removal relate to a real risk to the life of the alleged victim or of torture or cruel treatment in the receiving or requesting State this would then trigger the responsibility of the sending State. Thus pending the proceedings provisional measures are used to prevent irreparable harm.³⁴

There are other situations as well in which provisional measures have been used to prevent irreparable harm to persons: lack of medical attention to detainees, disappearances and incommunicado detention. These situations all relate to personal security. In the case of incommunicado detention provisional measures are warranted when there is a risk of irreparable harm to the person in question due to lack of access to court and counsel. After all the right to personal security is closely related to the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment and torture. In a way the right to personal security, together with the purpose of preventing disappearances, explains the those relating to Articles 9, 12, 26 and 27. HRC General Comment 29 on states of emergency (Article 4), 24 July 2001, §12 (footnote 7).

³¹ HRC General Comment 29 on states of emergency (Article 4), 24 July 2001, §11.

³² See Chapters XIII (Protection) and XVI (Legal status).

³³ See also Harrington (2003), p. 86 pointing out about the HRC that it, ‘by definition’ only uses provisional measures ‘when there is a risk of irreparable harm to an individual’s life or limb’.

³⁴ About assessment of material urgency see Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

importance of the right to access to court and counsel.³⁵ It is submitted that the few provisional measures that have been taken to ensure access to court and counsel may indeed be justified because these rights are accessory to the protection against ill-treatment and torture and against threats to life. The HRC has referred to the right of all persons deprived of their liberty to be treated with humanity and respect for their inherent dignity (Article 10) as expressing a norm of general international law not subject to derogation. It noted that this was supported by the close connection between Articles 7 and 10 and by the reference to the inherent dignity of the human person in the preamble to the ICCPR.³⁶ It also referred to the absolute nature of the prohibition of taking hostages, abducting people or unacknowledged detention.³⁷

The right to personal security comes into play in relation to threats to life and integrity outside of the detention context. Not only the right to personal security but also the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment and torture imply positive obligations. Chapter XIII on the protective measures required more closely discussed this aspect of provisional measures.

On the basis of established jurisprudence on positive obligations in the context of detention, arguments based on resource limitations are not accepted. All human rights adjudicators have used or could use provisional measures to ensure access to health care in detention. On the other hand, sometimes there is a threat of irreparable harm to the health or even the lives of persons not in detention, because they have no access to basic services, such as HIV medication. Provisional measures to order such access could then assist in halting cruel treatment and preventing deaths. In a regional system involving States in circumstances that are more or less similar as well as a monitoring system including the possibility of conducting on site visits, negotiations and hearings, an adjudicator may be bolder in taking an incremental approach than in an international system. A regional adjudicator could, as the Inter-American Commission has done, at some point order a State to make available such services. In an international system, on the other hand, it may not yet be feasible to require such a reallocation of resources already pending the proceedings. Nevertheless, international adjudicators might indeed intervene pending the proceedings when there is evidence of widespread discrimination excluding persons from basic services and thereby exacerbating illnesses and even causing deaths, while these services are indeed available for other segments of the population. An obvious example is blocking access to food aid to certain ethnic groups.³⁸ In such cases (as in others) provisional measures certainly are not a cure-all remedy.³⁹

³⁵ See also Chapter VIII on procedural rights to protect the right to life and prevent cruel treatment and torture.

³⁶ See HRC General Comment 29 on states of emergency (Article 4), 24 July 2001, § 13(a). In the three regional systems the right to humane treatment in detention is indeed part of the prohibition of inhuman or degrading treatment and torture or is mentioned as part of a provision that, as such, is non-derogable (see Article 5(2) ACHR: 'All persons deprived of their liberty shall be treated with respect of the inherent decency of the person', see also Articles 3 ECHR and 5 ACHPR).

³⁷ HRC General Comment 29 on states of emergency (Article 4), 24 July 2001, §13(b).

³⁸ See e.g. HRC General Comment 6 on Article 6 ICCPR, 30 April 1982, §5 on infant mortality and the right to life and several reports by UN thematic Rapporteurs of the Commission and sub-Commission and the current Human Rights Council. In April 2008 the UN Working Group on the Optional Protocol International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights adopted by consensus a draft for an Optional Protocol to this Covenant and sent it for consideration to the Human Rights Council. This draft also includes an Art. 5 on interim measures, which refers to the discretion of the supervisory committee to 'transmit to the State Party concerned for its urgent consideration a request that the State Party take such interim measures as may be necessary in exceptional circumstances to avoid possible irreparable damage to the victim or victims of the alleged violations'. If there would be an individual complaint system to the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights the adjudicator should certainly be able to use provisional measures in relation to discrimination in access to adequate water, food and shelter causing irreparable harm. However, given the core content of the right to an adequate standard of Nevertheless, in some situations a very focused and well-motivated provisional measure could assist their representatives in their endeavours to change the situation. Still, some situations may be so complex and politicised that international adjudicators would prefer not to get involved. We have seen this in relation to complaints about nuclear tests before various international adjudicators.

The prohibition of torture, from which the principle of non-refoulement is derived, is a peremptory norm of international law or ius cogens.⁴⁰ As long as the adjudicator would be likely to find a violation on the merits of the prohibition of cruel treatment and torture, irreparable harm to persons refers not only to harm to physical integrity, but also to psychological and moral integrity.⁴¹ The risk of the latter category of irreparable harm may vary depending on the vulnerability of the persons involved. This is also the rationale of, for instance, the rule that minors in detention should be separated from (unrelated) adults. Because of the risk of irreparable harm to a minor detained together with adults an international adjudicator would be justified in using provisional measures ordering a State to detain this minor in a safer environment.⁴² Similarly, in some situations an adjudicator could use provisional measures to halt a deportation if the receiving State would be unable to provide the requisite care for persons with a serious handicap, life-threatening (or even terminal) illnesses or for unaccompanied children. Certain acts or omissions, moreover, living (Article 11 ICESCR) and the right to health (Article 12), in specific circumstances the use of provisional measures may be warranted to prevent irreparable harm to the life and physical integrity of persons, also without obvious indications of discrimination. In such cases petitioners should present a prima facie case of misallocation of resources and of policy decisions insufficiently taking into account risks of irreparable harm to persons. It is also feasible that the adjudicator would use provisional measures on behalf of children who are being denied access to primary education. To a certain extent this right is auxiliary to the aforementioned articles just like the right of a detainee to access to court and counsel is auxiliary to the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment. In certain cases respect for these rights could help prevent irreparable harm to persons, although the connection in time is more remote. Moreover, for children realisation of their right to education is necessary for the full development of their personality (see Article 13). See further on these issues the General Comments of the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, as authoritative statements regarding the minimum norms in the Convention. If the approach would be taken that the implied power to use provisional measures is triggered not only to prevent irreparable harm to persons but to prevent such harm to all claims (an approach not advocated in this book), for this treaty another example would be the use of provisional measures to protect the right to benefit from the protection of the moral and material interests resulting from one's own scientific, literary or artistic productions (Article 15(1)(c) ICESCR). Of course this applies only if the petitioner could show that a violation would be irreversible.

³⁹ See e.g. Chapter XVII (Official responses).

⁴⁰ See e.g. ICTY Prosecutor v. Furundzija, case IT-95-17/I-T, 10 December 1998, 38 ILM 317 (1999), §§144-154; Prosecutor v. Delacic and Others, case IT-96-21-T, 16 November 1998, §454; Prosecutor v. Kunarac, cases IT-96-23-T and IT-96-23/1, §466; ECtHR Case of Al-Adsani v. the United Kingdom, Judgment of 21 November 2001, §61; HRC General Comment 29 (under 11); IACHR Cantoral Benavides v. Peru, Judgment of 18 August 2000 and Maritza Urrutia v. Guatemala, Judgment of 27 November 2003 ('The absolute prohibition of torture, in all its forms, is now part of international ius cogens', §92); Cartagena Declaration, Conclusion 5, which calls the non-refoulement principle itself a rule of ius cogens; see also e.g. O'Boyle (1977) p. 687; Burgers/Danelius (1988), p. 12; Verdross/Simma (1984), p. 819; Bassiouni (1996), p. 68; Alleweldt (1996), p. 1; Seiderman (2001), p. 275 and Smeulers (2002), p. 87.

⁴¹ Generally on psychological torture see e.g. IACHR Maritza Urrutia v. Guatemala, Judgment of 27 November 2003, §89.

⁴² See Chapter VII (Detention).

are more likely to cause irreparable harm in cases involving children exactly because they could irreparably harm their development. These acts or omissions could therefore constitute cruel treatment even though they would not necessarily be qualified as such if the victims were older than eighteen.

A very serious problem involving the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment is that of death threats against witnesses, family members, human rights defenders and others. Intervention against death threats both inside and outside of the detention context would also prevent irreparable harm to persons. The Inter-American Commission and Court have used provisional measures requesting States to ensure protection many times. The other human rights adjudicators have also done so by now. In their case law on the merits all adjudicators have in common an underlying principle that States have positive obligations to ensure respect for personal security, the right to life and the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment. Moreover, threats against human rights defenders, lawyers, journalists and witnesses take place with impunity in all regions of the world. Thus, it may be expected that the above adjudicators will increase their use of provisional measures in this respect. The ECtHR as well could respond to threats on an incremental basis, starting with a convincing case of a petitioner who is threatened because of his complaint, or of threats to witnesses (of an event about which the petitioner complains), preferably involving a State that is known for its failure to prevent threats in other cases. At first such intervention could even take place informally. It would be an intervention to suggest looking into the situation, informing the State of the adjudicator's awareness and at the same time reminding the State of the fact that if it knows about a threat and does nothing about it, it violates the right to security of person and often the right to life or the prohibition of cruel treatment as well. All these situations involve the right to life or the prohibition of cruel treatment and torture. In such situations the risk of irreparable harm to persons should trigger the use of provisional measures.

2.2.3 Protecting cultural survival

About the protection of the rights of persons belonging to minorities the HRC has noted that there were elements that must be respected in all circumstances. It noted that this was reflected not only in the prohibition of genocide but also in the inclusion of a non-discrimination clause of Article 4(1) and in the non-derogable nature of Article 18 ICCPR.⁴³ In addition, in the context of other rights, such as the right not to be discriminated against, minority rights must be protected also during states of emergency exactly because of their particularly fundamental nature. Related to the non-discrimination clause is Article 20 stipulating that State parties cannot invoke a state of emergency to justify incitement to discrimination, hostility or violence. The HRC determined that this prohibition has a peremptory nature under the ICCPR.⁴⁴

Another peremptory right mentioned by the HRC is the protection against forced displacement 'by expulsion or other coercive means from the area in which the persons concerned are lawfully present'. The Committee has pointed out that the Rome Statute of the ICC also confirms that such deportation or forcible transfer of population constitutes a crime against humanity.⁴⁵ As a norm recognised by the HRC for its fundamental nature, the use of provisional measures to prevent or halt violations of this right could be warranted.

The right to life and the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment clearly necessitate the use of provisional measures because violations result in irreparable harm to persons threatening their very existence. What about the situation of a group threatened in its very existence, even if the lives of the individual members are not threatened? As discussed, several adjudicators have indeed used provisional measures in cases involving indigenous culture (Chapter X). If international adjudicators should only use provisional measures to prevent irreparable harm to persons, the violation of the right claimed would not only have to be irreversible and result in irreparable harm to the rights claimed, but it should also be established that such a violation would result in irreparable harm to the (group of) persons involved. In the face of threats to the natural habitat, one question would be that of irreversibility and the assessment of risk.⁴⁶ Another question would be whether there was a risk of irreversible harm to possible claims of individuals as part of a group. Finally, the question would have to be dealt with whether this would also result in harm to the person's life and physical integrity, as seems to be the implicit criterion in most provisional measures, or whether that criterion has been expanded to encompass irreparable harm to the survival of an indigenous group as well.⁴⁷

⁴³ HRC General Comment 29 on states of emergency (Article 4), 24 July 2001, §13(c).

⁴⁴ Id., §13(e).

⁴⁵ Id., §13(d).

If it would be required to establish that the threats to the natural habitat or otherwise to the cultural survival of an indigenous group would cause harm to the person's life and integrity, it would be necessary to specify that personal integrity means not only physical but also mental integrity and that this would include sense of identity. Donders has described cultural identity as a broad and dynamic concept with both an individual and a collective dimension. She has noted that 'the suppression or limitation of the development and expression of cultural identity can make people feel alienated, which seriously affects their human dignity'.⁴⁸ Indeed, in that sense the concept of cultural identity is related to that of physical, psychological and moral integrity. Thus one could argue that the interest of survival as an indigenous group could be subsumed under an expanded interpretation of the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment to include collective aspects of these rights for members of indigenous groups. Nevertheless, while the concepts are clearly related, the prohibition of cruel treatment would lose its independent meaning if it included not only the concepts of physical, psychological and moral integrity, but also that of cultural integrity (as the counterpart of cultural identity).⁴⁹ The use of provisional measures in cases involving threats to culture should not be subsumed under the limited category of preventing cruel treatment.

Given the special position of indigenous peoples, however, adjudicators may consider using provisional measures not only in the face of threats to personal integrity and life, but in the face of threats to the cultural survival of an indigenous people as well.⁵⁰ This could mean that they would

⁴⁶ See Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

⁴⁷ Yet another question is what is an indigenous group. It has been suggested that it is very problematic to define 'indigenous peoples' as a distinctive legal category or 'a global abstraction capable of working across different types of society with intricate identity politics and rapid cultural and economic change'. See e.g. Kingsbury (2001), p. 245. See in general about the discussion on the definition of minorities and indigenous peoples: Meijknecht (2001), Chapters III (in particular pp. 115-118) and IV; Donders (2002), pp. 169-171 and pp. 204-205; and Thornberry (2002), pp. 33-60.

⁴⁸ Donders (2002), pp. 327-328. She noted: "Cultural identity is an important value for communities and individuals, since it concerns their belonging, their 'roots', way of thinking, feeling and acting. Most people consider their cultural identity as essential to their life, and value the choice they have made to belong to a certain cultural community because these communities give them valuable life options".

⁴⁹ Obviously certain measures involving religious or cultural issues would indeed constitute cruel or degrading treatment, such as forcing devout Muslims to eat pork or devout Hindus to eat beef. Destruction of the natural habitat or of sites of cultural importance, on the other hand, relates to collective rights and is covered by Articles 1 and 27 rather than 7 and 10 ICCPR.

⁵⁰ See e.g. ILO Convention 169 affirming, as Anaya (1996), p. 106 puts it, 'that indigenous peoples as groups are entitled to a continuing relationship with lands and natural resources according to traditional patterns of use or occupancy'. See e.g. Articles 13(1) and 14(1) of this Convention. See also Agenda 21 (Chapter 26) of the UN Conference on Environment and Development, Rio de Janeiro, 13 June 1992, A/CONF.151/26 (Vol. 3), Annex 2 (1992), Operational Directive 4.20 use provisional measures in the context of the right to life, the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment and of the right to culture. The special position of indigenous peoples and the importance of collective aspects of the right to culture may be explained by various factors. In domestic law land rights have regularly been dealt with on the basis of property rights. Yet it is often difficult for indigenous peoples to prove ownership and this approach does not take into account traditional occupancy. Moreover, domestic law in relation to property often considers financial compensation an appropriate remedy for expropriation. In relation to indigenous peoples, however, an appropriate remedy should take into account their cultural integrity and survival. Their very existence may be at stake. In other words, 'the requirement to provide meaningful redress for indigenous land claims implies an obligation on the part of states to provide remedies that include for indigenous peoples the option of regaining lands and access to natural resources'.⁵¹ Acts precluding this option would be irreversible and, in the sense that financial compensation alone would not constitute meaningful redress, would be irreparable as well. Pending the proceedings provisional measures could prevent such irreparable harm.

There have been two types of claims about the right to culture in which petitioners have asked provisional measures: those relating to threats to the natural habitat and, for instance, religious sites on the one hand and those relating to exclusion from an indigenous group on the other. Only in the first type of cases have adjudicators used provisional measures.⁵² Given the nature of the individual complaint system, technically both types of claims involve the individual right to live as members of an indigenous group taking part in indigenous culture. An important aspect of the right to culture relates to the dignity of an individual self-identified member of a minority or indigenous people as opposed to the rights of the members of the group collectively. This is an individual right to respect for this person's cultural identity. Often this right is materially related to the right to equality and non-discrimination. Nevertheless, the consequences of a violation in this context normally are not irreversible in the sense that it is possible to reverse a decision to exclude a person from a group. While the harm that is done in the meantime can be serious, this equally applies to other reversible decisions resulting in a violation of a human rights treaty. Detention of a person who later turned out to be innocent is but one example.⁵³

Hence, rather than to protect the individual aspects of the right to culture in relation to exclusion adjudicators have only used provisional measures to protect the collective aspects, as claimed by individual victims. The reason for this is that the irreparable consequences relate exactly to the collective and not to the individual aspects of the right to culture.

The question arises whether and how this use of provisional measures fits one of the types of irreparable harm to be prevented. Once the criteria of immediacy and irreversibility are fulfilled this type of provisional measure may be seen to belong clearly to the broader second category of preventing irreversible harm to the rights claimed. It also comes quite close to the category of preventing irreparable harm to persons. In this particular context 'persons' may refer as well to a group or collectivity as such. 'Survival' may refer not only to the right to life but also to the survival of a culture. After all, indigenous peoples have a special position in substantive international law, but no satisfactory recourse to implement their rights. If their cultural survival is at of the World Bank (1991) and the UN Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples adopted by the General Assembly in 2007. The rights recognized in the Declaration 'constitute the minimum standards for the survival, dignity and well-being of the indigenous peoples of the world' (Article 43).

⁵¹ Anaya (1996), p. 107.

⁵² See Chapter X (Culture).

⁵³ In some instances arbitrary detention can be so closely related to the risk of torture or disappearances that intervention in the form of provisional measures could be warranted, see Chapters VIII (Procedural rights) and XII (Other situations).

stake this is a convincing reason to take into account the collective aspects of rights claimed by members of indigenous groups, through individual complaint systems.

An example of a very important right for indigenous peoples is the right to self-determination. If individual complaint systems do not allow claims based directly on this right (as is the case with the ICCPR), other rights relevant to indigenous peoples must be read in light of the concept of self-determination, emphasising also the collective aspects of these rights. In this respect the right to culture (as laid down or implied in human rights treaties) is, as Nowak has put it, the individual right to enforcement of the collective right.⁵⁴ Indeed, procedurally only individuals can claim to be the victim of a violation, but substantively the HRC gives priority to the collective aspects of the right to culture.⁵⁵ This certainly applies to the use of provisional measures in cases involving culture. Another reason why adjudicators may be inclined to use provisional measures to prevent irreparable harm to indigenous culture, apart from the special position of indigenous peoples, is that such measures may at the same time prevent environmental degradation. The ICJ itself has pointed out that 'the environment is not an abstraction but represents the living space, the quality of life and the very health of human beings, including generations unborn'.⁵⁶ The ITLOS, to give an example of an adjudicator specifically dealing with the law of the sea, has the authority to use provisional measures to preserve the respective rights of the parties to the dispute, but also to prevent serious harm to the marine environment (Article 290 UNCLOS).⁵⁷ The human rights adjudicators have sometimes addressed environmental issues in the context of the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment or in context of the right to family life, but these issues may also play a role in their decision-making in cases involving indigenous culture.

In light of the right to self-determination and the inability for indigenous groups to otherwise receive protection against threats to their cultural survival and in light of the principle of environmental protection, the criterion of irreparable harm to persons could be extended to include irreparable harm to indigenous groups. Not only would some threats to the collective aspects of the right to culture have irreversible consequences but, given the seriousness of the harm, any financial remedy would clearly be inappropriate because the indigenous group would not exist as such anymore. The only appropriate remedy would be halting the industrial activities that may constitute a violation and putting a stop to violations already determined, that threaten the survival of the group.

The HRC has pointed out that States may not make reservations to the freedom of religion or to the right of minorities to enjoy their own culture and profess their own religion.⁵⁸ As noted it has also pointed out that 'the international protection of the rights of persons belonging to minori-⁵⁴ See Nowak (1993), p. 499. Nowak pointed this out in the context of Article 27 ICCPR and made an analogy with the freedom of religion of Article 18(1).

⁵⁵ See Chapter X (Culture). Meijknecht (2001), pp. 131-139, focusing on the ICCPR, raises the question whether it is the individual's, the group's or the culture's existence needing protection. She notes that Article 27 is basically formulated as a right bestowed upon the individual. She considers that 'the construction as applied in Article 27 suggests that the tension between the individual and the collectivity can be avoided by denying a legal status and rights to the collectivity, and by attributing rights exclusively to individuals'. The formulation 'in community with other members of their group', she acknowledges, 'suggests some sort of compromise between the individual and collective approach', but this, she points out, 'does not change the fact that the rights in question are bestowed upon individuals'. Certainly, from the perspective of the international personality of indigenous peoples Article 27 denies legal status to the collectivity. In its interpretation of the article, however, the HRC seems to attach rights to collectivities at the cost of the individual.

⁵⁶ ICJ, Advisory Opinion on the Legality of the threat or use of nuclear weapons, 8 July 1996, §29.

⁵⁷ See Chapter I.

⁵⁸ HRC General Comment 24 on reservations, 4 November 1994, §8.

ties includes elements that must be respected in all circumstances'.⁵⁹ Provisional measures to protect the existence of indigenous peoples have been used in (sub-)regional contexts as well as under the ICCPR, the only international complaint system involving a range of human rights. It is argued that they could be used in all systems.⁶⁰ This type of provisional measure can be considered an expansion of the common core of the concept of provisional measures in human rights cases.

Most provisions in human rights treaties refer to one individual only, although they assume, of course, the interaction with other people. Next to the right to culture there are some other rights that clearly belong to a group as well as to the individuals making up this group, even though under most treaties only individual victims are able to claim these rights.⁶¹ These are religious rights, the right of peaceful assembly and the right to freedom of association (including the right to form and join trade unions). Still, it is mainly with regard to the collective aspects of the right to culture that provisional measures could serve a purpose in preventing irreparable harm, exactly because what is at stake is the existence itself of an indigenous group and its cultural integrity.

At present the use of provisional measures to protect collective rights should be limited to protecting indigenous culture.⁶² Violation of the other more or less collective rights normally is not irreversible and, even if such a violation would be irreversible, this would not be of a similar magnitude as destruction of the natural habitat threatening the existence of an indigenous group. Even if State authorities would close a trade union and prohibit its members to form a new one, for instance, this action may have long-term pervasive effects but is still reversible. As part of a judgment finding a violation the adjudicator may indicate that the trade union should be restored and its assets returned. Often, of course, other acts related to the closure of such trade union, taking place pending a case, are indeed irreparable. Obvious examples are the murder and ill treatment of trade unionists.

Desecration of a religious site would be different from acts prohibiting the freedom of religion or peaceful assembly in that this would not only raise the collective aspect of the right but such act is not fully reversible either. This situation could fall under both the right to culture and the right to religious expression. Possibly, particularly if the treaty involved does not contain a provision on the right to culture, or this provision does not apply, petitioners may invoke the right to religion and the adjudicator may equally decide to use provisional measures to protect against threats to cultural survival that can be shown to be related to the right to religion.

As noted, acts resulting in violations of individual rights to access, in the face of exclusion, normally can be reversed. If there is a threat to the collective aspects of the right to culture, however, this may often be irreversible because the acts to be halted threaten to encroach on the envi-

⁵⁹ HRC General Comment 29 on states of emergency (Article 4), 24 July 2001, §13(c).

⁶⁰ This could be so as long as these systems cover a range of rights including, explicitly or implicitly, cultural rights.

⁶¹ An exception is the collective complaint procedure for the European Social Charter. This Charter, however, does not include a right to culture nor a possibility for provisional measures. In the Inter-American system the petitioners may be the NGOs acting on behalf of victims. They do not need to be victims themselves. Nevertheless they have to indicate clearly the group of beneficiaries involved. Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4 on the group of beneficiaries.

⁶² Possibly in a specific system the context allows the adjudicator to go further than this. As discussed in Chapter X, in the context of the post-conflict situation in Bosnia the provisional measures ordered by the Bosnia Chamber under the Dayton Peace Agreement to respect Muslim sites, including cemeteries, seem particularly appropriate. They aim to address serious and pervasive discrimination relating, moreover, to issues involving respect for religion, for the dead and their community as well as to access to religious sites and protection against deletion of a suppressed group from the history of the region, all affecting to the core the dignity of the group at issue.

ronment and, thereby, the natural habitat of certain indigenous peoples. In such cases the first question is whether the act would have an irreversible impact on the environment and the second whether this would result in irreparable harm to the culture of an indigenous group because this group depends on this environment for its culture and livelihood. Other acts might not be related to the natural environment but would equally be irreversible as well as irreparable. An example would be the destruction and desecration of an ancient burial site or of a work of art essential to the culture of an indigenous people.

Halting the destruction of works of art essential to the culture of an indigenous people may at the same time protect cultural heritage in general. An example would be if a State plans to allow the destruction of a Maya site. On the other hand, human rights adjudicators cannot use provisional measures solely to protect the cultural heritage of mankind if there is no specific link between the alleged victim and the culture of an indigenous group.⁶³ In any case, other organisations, such as UNESCO, would be better suited to deal with situations of large-scale threats to cultural heritage. Moreover, even if the States involved have ratified an individual complaint procedure and the petition would not constitute actio popularis, such threats often take place during civil wars or when there is no central government to be contacted. Even if the adjudicator could take into account international humanitarian law it would not be easy to establish state responsibility.

Another situation that conceivably concerns culture is the threat that a painting will be destroyed. Again, except when this painting would be shown to be essential to an indigenous group, this would either concern the common heritage of mankind (an example could be a government plan to paint over Van Gogh's Sunflowers) or it would concern freedom of expression. In the first case the above comment on the specific link to the alleged victim would apply and in the second the victim would be the artist. The result would be irreversible even if a photograph had been made of the original painting. Clearly it would cause irreparable harm to the rights claimed (freedom of expression). It would also violate the artist's personal dignity in the broad sense of the term. Nevertheless, lacking a specific treaty provision on provisional measures to the contrary, in an international human rights system such situation should not trigger the use of provisional measures because the category of irreparable harm to survival or personal integrity, in the more limited sense, would not apply.⁶⁴

2.2.4 Protecting against mass expulsion, internal displacement and forced eviction

The Inter-American Commission and Court have used provisional measures to intervene in a situation of mass-expulsion.⁶⁵ The Bosnia Chamber has sometimes intervened to halt forced eviction.⁶⁶ The question is whether these situations could qualify as part of the common core proposed for the use of provisional measures in international human rights adjudication.

In some contexts provisional measures may indeed assist in alleviating the situation even of potentially large groups of people.⁶⁷ Presently, it is already clear that not only the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment are rights singled out in each treaty for their exceptional nature, but the prohibition of racial discrimination is as well. Moreover, it is one of the few human rights

⁶³ Hypothetically an inter-State complaint would be possible but, thus far, this procedure has been used very rarely and only in the European system have provisional measures been used in this context.

⁶⁴ See further section 2.3 of this Conclusion on provisional measures within the outer limits of the concept, but not within the common core.

⁶⁵ See Chapter XI (Mass expulsion).

⁶⁶ Ibid.

⁶⁷ See Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4 (beneficiaries).

specifically mentioned in the UN Charter and referred to by the ICJ for its character erga omnes.⁶⁸ Under Article 4(1) ICCPR derogations may only be justified on condition that they 'do not involve discrimination solely on the ground of race, colour, sex, language, religion or social origin'. The HRC has noted that while Article 26 and other rights related to non-discrimination have not been listed specifically among the non-derogable provisions in Article 4(2) ICCPR 'there are elements or dimensions of the right to non-discrimination that cannot be derogated from in any circumstances'.⁶⁹

In this light, international adjudicators might be justified in using provisional measures to order the halting of mass expulsion and internal displacement, especially because the victims are being expelled or displaced on a discriminatory basis and are often threatened and harassed in the process as well. Moreover, there are often children involved and for them the context of mass expulsion or displacement may be particularly traumatic.⁷⁰ Finally, apart from the discrimination and the traumatic effects on children, it is also unlikely that large groups of persons, after it is determined that they have been arbitrarily expelled, will be allowed to return. The State is less likely to allow the return of all persons arbitrarily expelled than just the return of some individuals. Thus the issue of irreversibility becomes relevant as well. Mass expulsion (and internal displacement) must be prevented exactly because the causes may be endemic (e.g. based on religious or ethnic grounds) and the consequences may be extremely long-lasting for a large group of people.

Given the hardships suffered by the victims of mass or arbitrary expulsion and forced eviction and the interrelatedness between the rights at stake, including the particular impact on the basic rights of children, and in light of the special responsibility of the adjudicators involved to address the prohibition of discrimination, this type of provisional measure is clearly moving towards the common core. There are some cases where the human hardship involved would be particularly abrasive and where appropriate redress would be impossible. There are some cases where it will be impossible to appropriately redress the situation after the fact, justifying a shift to the common core given the seriousness of the harm resulting from the combination of pervasive discrimination and mass expulsion or internal displacement. This applies in particular when a range of interrelated rights is involved, and especially the rights of children.⁷¹ Thus, if the Inter-American Commission and Court were to expand their practice in this respect and more adjudicators were to start following their lead, together with the precedent of the Bosnia Chamber's provisional measures in forced eviction cases, this might indeed lead to an expansion of the common core. Similarly, it is possible that the human rights adjudicators would determine that certain kinds of treatment (such as rounding up persons in vans and dumping them across borders in unknown territory without due process or without allowing them to contact their families; or refusal to register a birth, and a denial to access primary education as well as a constant threat of expulsion) triggered by racist motives, would have such an impact of humiliation that they would come down to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment.⁷² If the case law of the adjudicators were to ⁶⁸ See e.g. Article 1(3) UN Charter (a purpose of the UN is to achieve international cooperation in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights 'for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion'). See also Articles 13(1)(b) and 55(c); and ICJ Barcelona Traction case (Belgium v. Spain), second phase, ICJ reports 1970, 3 §§33-34 referring to 'basic rights of the human person' as obligations erga omnes (concerns of all States), mentioning as examples the protection from slavery, racial discrimination and genocide.

⁶⁹ See HRC General Comment 29 on states of emergency (Article 4), 24 July 2001, §8.

⁷⁰ Being in a process of development that may irreparably stunted as a result of the mass eviction.

⁷¹ In many cases persons are also being threatened and harassed, see Chapters IX (Death threats) and XIII (Protection).

⁷² See e.g. CAT Hajrizi Dzemailj et al. v. Yugoslavia, 21 November 2002 and ECtHR Moldovan et al. v. Romania, 12 July 2005, discussed in Chapter XI (Mass expulsion).

converge in this respect, provisional measures to halt mass expulsion or forced eviction in such circumstances would belong to the common core simply by virtue of preventing such treatment.

In other words there is an accumulation of reasons (the interrelated rights at stake, the hardship on particularly vulnerable groups, the impact on the rights of groups uprooted and forcibly removed across the region, the possible evolution of the case law on racist acts constituting cruel treatment) why the common core of provisional measures in international human rights adjudication may be shifting to include ordering a halt to certain situations of mass expulsion or forced eviction.

Nevertheless, apart from the conceptual issue there is also the practical difficulty that international adjudicators may not be able to collect sufficient information to assist the potential beneficiaries with provisional measures that are sufficiently focused. Thus, while the use of provisional measures in cases of mass expulsion and internal displacement may be justified normatively, in practice such use of provisional measures does not seem to be immediately possible. If at all, in an international system such provisional measures might only be used incrementally on the basis of clearly established case law on the merits as well as an ongoing exchange of thoughts with the particular State in question and the alleged victims. Regional systems with a monitoring presence or at least the capacity of making country visits and organising hearings may have a better chance in this respect.⁷³ Nevertheless, rather than using provisional measures directly on this issue, international adjudicators may in any case specify their provisional measures taken in the context of protection against death threats and harassment by indicating that displaced persons should be allowed to return.

2.3 Outer limits: preventing irreversible harm to the claim or procedure

It appears from the foregoing that the common core of provisional measures in human rights adjudication is the protection of the very existence of persons and groups. Yet it is possible that some adjudicators consider that in the context of their own system their protective role implies the use of provisional measures in a less limited set of circumstances than only to protect survival and physical integrity. If so, it should be possible to identify the rationale of these measures. One rationale could be that the use of provisional measures should be extended to prevent irreversible harm to the rights claimed and to the eventual forms of reparation rather than to prevent irreparable harm to persons as discussed above. As noted, this is a broader category preventing all irreversible harm. An example would be that of halting the destruction of a work of art as a form of freedom of expression. The HRC has used provisional measures once exactly for this purpose.⁷⁴ In addition it has used provisional measures in a family life case involving deportation by a State of someone who had lived in that State since childhood.⁷⁵ In this case the HRC argued that the consequences of deportation were irreversible. This means that the case fits into the category of preventing irreversible harm to the claim. On the other hand, in later cases involving family life the HRC noted that, if it would find a violation, it could still order the return of victim. Thus, while the likelihood that this would indeed happen seems remote, clearly the situation is not as irreversible as irreparable harm to persons (e.g. execution and cruel treatment) or irreparable harm to the claim (e.g. the destruction of a work of art). The aim of the provisional measure in this case seems to be to prevent ‘undue hardship’ to the person rather than to prevent ‘irreparable harm’ to either the person or the claim. An attempt could be made to fit this measure in the third category of preventing irreversible harm, namely harm to the procedure. In my view, however, provisional measures should not be used to prevent irreversible harm to the procedure in all situations, but mainly as a collateral purpose in death penalty and non-refoulement cases involving claims relating to the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment or the right to life. After all, once a person has been deported to a State in which there is a fear for his physical integrity and even his life, the State has not only hindered the right of individual complaint and the proceedings under the treaty in question, but also exposed him to a real risk of violations of the right to life and personal integrity. Both dangers are closely interrelated because the individual complaint procedures were initiated to prevent irreparable harm to persons at minimum and to allow the petitioner to present evidence and substantiate claims of a real risk of such harm. If he would be returned nevertheless, he would not only risk irreparable harm. The return would also hinder the chance of contacting him. In fact the chance of completing the proceedings under the relevant treaty in an appropriate manner would be even slimmer than in deportation cases involving family life.

⁷³ See Introduction and Chapter II.

⁷⁴ See Chapter XII (Other situations), section 2.10.

⁷⁵ See Chapter XII (Other situations), section 3.2.

The use of provisional measures to refrain from action causing undue hardship rather than irreparable harm seems less appropriate in a universal system, at least until such use has been firmly established in more than one regional system. Especially in a universal system lacking sufficient cohesion, a more cautious approach may be warranted in which provisional measures must remain exceptional, clearly aiming at the prevention of irreparable harm to persons or procedure. In regional systems, on the other hand, tighter links between States may lead to a higher degree of pressure to comply even with provisional measures in less serious situations.

As discussed in Chapter I, scholars have discerned a so-called ‘humanization’ of international law.

There seems to be a convergence, rather than divergence of jurisprudence on provisional measures that ties in with this humanization. This may be explained even if the adjudicators are not aware of each other’s jurisprudence, simply by the fact that all the human rights adjudicators examined in this book are dealing with similar treaty provisions, for instance on the right to life and the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment and on the right of individual petition. It could also be explained exactly by this awareness of each other’s jurisprudence, sometimes evident from conscious cross-referencing of jurisprudence, as was seen in the ECtHR judgment in Mamatkulov.⁷⁶

At the same time some provisional measures seem typical to a certain region. The most particular adjudicator dealt with in this book, the Bosnia Human Rights Chamber, may serve as an example. The Bosnia Chamber was a hybrid and non-permanent body that may be assumed to have been rather specific in its approaches to provisional measures, closely adapting its practice to the exigencies of the post-war situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Chamber had to deal with the aftermath of a four year war with ethnic cleansing and discriminatory practices that were still pervasive after the war. It had to deal with only three addressees (the State of BiH and its constituent parts: the Federation of BiH and the Republica Srpska), all from the same geographical region. The Secretariat of the Chamber was based in the area concerned and the Chamber held its sessions there. Although it was a sui generis body rather than a constitutional court, its case law clearly is – and should be – more context-specific than that of an international adjudicator like the HRC.

Apart from the Bosnia Chamber as a sui generis adjudicator, on the one hand, and the HRC as the international human rights adjudicator operating with regard to the widest range of human rights, on the other hand, there are also the regional systems. In the context of the Inter-American system it is noteworthy that according to some (former) Judges of the Inter-American Court provisional measures can apply to all rights.⁷⁷ Moreover, the requirements for precautionary meas-

⁷⁶ About the latter see also Pasqualucci (2005).

⁷⁷ See e.g. IACHR Matter of Capital El Rodeo I and El Rodeo II Judicial Confinement Center, Order of 8 February 2008, Separate Opinion Judge García Ramírez, §12 and Cançado Trindade (2003), p. 165, as well as in his Introduction to the third volume of the Court’s provisional ures by the Inter-American Commission are less rigorous and less regulated than those for the provisional measures of the Inter-American Court. Until 1999 the Court only acted when personal security was involved while the Commission acted upon all the rights of the Convention. The Commission's criterion has always been that there was some urgency, some imminent danger. The informal beginnings of the Commission's practice may explain this.⁷⁸ In light of the Commission's other activities, such as taking part in country visits and drafting country reports, moreover, the Commission has more of a hands-on experience of the actual human rights situations in the Americas. This may also explain its more flexible use of precautionary measures.

Commissioner Juan Mendez had noted that the practice of the Commission with regard to precautionary measures started with disappearances, but it was never limited to that. Moreover, there was never a time in which the Commission limited itself to taking precautionary measures to situations where life and limb were threatened. There have been cases, for instance, in which the Commission took precautionary measures when someone was under an arrest warrant and was to be detained at any time. Under the new Rules of Procedure the Commission has crystallized its practice over a long period of time. Mendez stated that they have made very broad the possibility to take precautionary measures. This would be basically in any situation that needs immediate attention according to the Commission. Its criterion is that when there is no harm in waiting to resolve the issue at the merits stage, then it will not intervene, but otherwise it will.⁷⁹ According to Mendez any right threatened by an immediate violation or irreparable harm may warrant a precautionary measure, but it would have to be a right spelled out under the Convention or the Declaration. For instance, a threat to the 'project of life' by definition deals with a situation that is prolonged, such as prolonged administrative detention and, he considers, by definition something that is urgent is not very prolonged. Although he finds it difficult to imagine when the 'project of life' issue would come up in the context of precautionary measures, he notes, there is no reason to say it should not. Generally, however, if it would come up this would be at the stage of reparations, not at the stage of provisional measures or even precautionary measures.⁸⁰ It must be borne in mind, though, that provisional measures have in fact been used in ongoing cases, e.g. involving detention situations or death threats, meaning it is not necessarily contradictory for the project of life to play a role.⁸¹

The criterion that the right must be 'spelled out' under the American Convention or the Declaration before the Commission may take precautionary measures, paradoxical as it may sound, must not be taken literally. After all, the first precautionary measures almost all dealt with recent disappearances in which a composite of articles is applicable. Of course it is true that these articles, such as the right to life, in themselves are indeed very clearly spelled out under both the Convention and the Declaration. In my view it is not entirely impossible to use project of life argument in the context of provisional measures, although in the first instance it might sound contradictory, as this is a thing that can only take place over a long stretch of time. At the same time, if it is clear that certain illegal acts or abstentions result in obstacles to the project of life and possible irreparable harm to it, it makes more sense to intervene timely than just to pronounce on reparations (including compensation) afterwards. I believe this could also be the case in situations measures, §21 and interview by author with President Cançado Trindade, San José, Costa Rica, November/December 2001. But see Buergenthal (1994), p. 77 referring to the wording and the legislative history of Article 63(2), noting that these 'make clear that its sole purpose is to protect human beings against the loss of life or extreme physical or mental abuse when there is a very strong likelihood that they are in imminent danger and there exists a corresponding urgency for protective action'.

⁷⁸ Interview by author with Commissioner Juan Mendez, Washington D.C., 17 October 2001.

⁷⁹ Id.

⁸⁰ Id.

⁸¹ On the project of life see also Chapter XII (Other situations), section 2.1.

where access to a project of life (to even think about embarking on such a project) is blocked.⁸² In other words, in particular cases in which government action can create this access, provisional measures might order a government to actually do so. Thus in some specific cases provisional measures could indeed be used in economic and social rights cases, especially in relation to children.

Formally the Inter-American Court has continued to adhere to the exceptional nature of provisional measures, but it is doubtful whether it has always adhered to this principle in practice. If the Court only orders provisional measures in exceptional cases, it is difficult to understand why it also does so to protect someone's good name, especially since an incorrect registration in the criminal records can be repaired. It is unlikely that the good name of a journalist will suffer irreparable harm from a temporary registration in such records for having published an article. The same applies to several of the precautionary measures taken by the Commission in freedom of expression cases, possibly with the exception of curtailment of freedom of expression previous to, or during, an election period.⁸³ In any case, even when it is possible to establish that these rights would be irreversibly harmed without the Commission's or the Court's intervention, it concerns rights other than the right to life and dignity. If the Commission and the Court emphasize the factor of urgency rather than that of irreparable harm, this would be an evolutive interpretation of the Convention requiring clear motivation.

The more adverse the impact of certain measures is likely to be on the well-being of people, facing a situation that would be intolerable, the more reason adjudicators have for the use of provisional measures pending the proceedings, particularly if the task of the adjudicator specifically relates to this issue or if the problem in question is endemic in that region.

The use of provisional measures as taken by just one adjudicator, for instance by the Inter-American Commission and Court to protect freedom of expression, can often be explained in the context of problems occurring in a specific region or because of opportunities arising in that region (e.g. a powerful lobby of press agencies, the special respect an adjudicator commands in a given State at a given moment, the scope of the provision on provisional measures in the applicable treaty or Rule of Procedure) or simply because they are based on the provisions of a specialised treaty (e.g. those of CEDAW or ICAT). Such measures may presently be within the outer limits of the concept but beyond the common core because they do not deal with preventing irreparable harm to persons.

In some cases the provisional measures seem to have been taken in error. The concept of provisional measures in human rights adjudication does not allow for the use in situations in which a violation could later be repaired through financial measures alone. For instance, using provisional measures to postpone payment of a fine is beyond the outer limits of the concept. Thus in some situations the use of provisional measures is inappropriate, as they aim to prevent harm that would mostly be reversible. An example could be a single action hindering the freedom of expression or the independence of the judiciary. Yet in a climate of harassment against journalists or the judiciary, it is no longer possible to speak of reversible harm to the claim. In such a context it could be appropriate for regional adjudicators to order provisional measures to prevent irreversible harm to the claim. Moreover, such a climate of harassment would probably involve death threats and harassment against the personal integrity of the intended beneficiaries as well, bringing the provisional measures within the common core of the concept to the extent that they aim to protect the life and personal dignity of the person involved, while also specifying that this person should be able to continue his or her activities (journalist, judge, witness, human rights defender, etc.).

⁸² Such as in the case of street children, see Chapter XII (Other situations), section 2.1.

⁸³ See Chapter XII (Other situations), section 3.3.

For the time being it may be a bridge too far for a supervisory body to an international treaty without a specific treaty provision on provisional measures to expand the use of provisional measures to issues other than those involving the survival and physical integrity of persons. This does not mean it is impossible conceptually, or that it is not important from the perspective of the individuals involved, but just that it may not be very wise from the perspective of expected compliance. Use of provisional measures with regard to any type of irreversible harm to the claim would be better suited in a regional or even in a constitutional approach by a hybrid court such as the Bosnia Chamber. Yet at some point in the future, once it has been firmly established by regional bodies, the international adjudicator might consider similar expansions.

3 PROTECTIVE MEASURES, MERITS AND REPARATION

An element of positive action is present in most provisional measures and should be made explicit in cases involving ongoing situations such as adverse detention conditions, recent disappearances and death threats. The discussion on subsidiarity plays out differently in each system but, like the Inter-American Commission and Court, the other human rights adjudicators should also incrementally specify their provisional measures, so as to provide clarity to States on what is expected of them, especially with regard to core rights. This way States have at least some direction of what they are expected to do or to abstain from doing in order to prevent irreparable harm to persons.

The European Commission and Court have directed provisional measures to petitioners who were on hunger strike to protest against adverse prison conditions, lack of access to medication or arbitrary detention. None of the other adjudicators have used provisional measures to the effect that petitioners should stop a hunger strike. Here, again, the question arises whether the aim of preventing irreparable harm to persons is independent of the claim or related to the claim. If related to the claim, it would be inappropriate for the adjudicator to turn around and direct a provisional measure to the petitioner. Nevertheless, this is what the European Commission and Court did. In these circumstances they took provisional measures proprio motu directed against the petitioner rather than against the State. They took a very traditional approach of using provisional measures ‘in the interests of the parties’. They appear to lean towards preventing irreparable harm to the procedure. While this clearly agrees with the text of the Rules of Procedure, in a dynamic and purposive approach it seems contrary to the Convention to assume that both parties are on equal footing. In human rights cases involving an individual and a State party the power is concentrated in the latter. Provisional measures, therefore, should serve to shield the threatened individual or group against abuse of power by the State or make the State act against abuse of power by others.⁸⁴

It is argued that the Inter-American practice of using provisional measures not just to protect persons mentioned by name, but also to protect the members of a defined community, or people working at human rights organisations, as well as all other persons visiting the premises is indeed appropriate. While they are not identified by name, the beneficiaries of the required protective measures are clear to the State. Obviously there must be no indications of disagreement by beneficiaries with their inclusion in an order for provisional measures. Moreover, provisional measures may even protect a larger group than that mentioned in the provisional measures. After all a good faith implementation of the obligations under the relevant human rights treaty warrants a pro-active stance of the State to ensure that the underlying rationale to a provisional measure is being met.

⁸⁴ See Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4.

Sometimes petitioners may have as their main aim to obtain a provisional measure rather than a decision on the merits. In the context of the ICJ this has occasionally been criticised.⁸⁵ Even if this tendency may be criticized vis-à-vis States, in human rights cases the situation is different, especially if the purpose of the main claim coincides with the purpose of the provisional measures, both aiming at preventing irreparable harm to persons. In the practice of the human rights adjudicators the use of provisional measures may trigger a State's attempt to solve the issue, sometimes making it possible to strike out the case.

Also if the purpose of provisional measures is to prevent irreparable harm to persons rather than to the claim, when using provisional measures the adjudicator should refer to the rights involved. It is possible that some adjudicators have used independent concepts of life, dignity and personal integrity without relating the concept of irreparable harm to specific articles of the relevant treaty. In view of the fact, however, that they may have to declare subsequently, on the basis of previous case law, that there was no violation, the question arises whether the object of the provisional measures was simply to postpone the suffering until after the expected finding. This would be an unsatisfactory approach to the concept of provisional measures. After all, if it would not be possible to achieve a similar result as part of the merits (and reparation) phase, achieving it temporarily, as part of provisional measures, would serve no purpose in the long run. Provisional measures should go no further than the eventual obligation could.

When dealing with a request for provisional measures the Inter-American Court equally notes that the case is only before it for the purpose of provisional measures. A decision to order such measures, or the President's decision to request urgent measures, does not imply a decision on the merits of the dispute between the petitioners and the State.⁸⁶ By adopting urgent measures, for instance, the President was simply guaranteeing the Court's ability to exercise faithfully its conventional mandate.⁸⁷ As noted, if in a request by petitioners for provisional measures the facts complained of relate to other aspects of the main case, not directly constituting a situation of urgency, the adjudicator will declare (this part of) the request for provisional measures inadmissible. The Inter-American Court has emphasized that it may not examine 'any arguments other than those which are directly and strictly related to situations of extreme gravity and urgency which require the adoption of protection measures to avoid irreparable damage to persons. Any other arguments or facts may only be examined and determined by the Court when considering the merits of contentious cases brought before the Court'.⁸⁸ Apart from the usual statement that the decision on provisional measures does not prejudice the merits, specific practice of the other adjudicators, such as the HRC, with regard to the approach to the issue of prejudice in the use of provisional measures currently is unavailable. Undoubtedly they have considered the issue in their decision-making, but generally they have not publicly elaborated on it.

The remark by Judge Gros, in his dissent to the Order for provisional measures in the Nuclear Test (1973) cases, that it is contrary to the nature of interlocutory proceedings if they enable the dispute to be disposed of, may already be disputed in the context of the ICJ's judgments and provisional measures.⁸⁹ At any rate it does not apply to human rights cases. The protective function of provisional measures to prevent irreparable harm to persons often coincides so much with ⁸⁵ See Mani (1973), p. 262 and Sztucki (1983), p. 260.

⁸⁶ See e.g. IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order of 24 November 2000.

⁸⁷ See e.g. IACHR James and others, Orders of 27 May, 29 June, 13 and 22 July 1998, 11 May and 19 June 1999.

⁸⁸ IACHR Matter of Adrián Meléndez-Quijano et al (El Salvador), Order of 26 November 2007, 9th 'Considering' clause, referring to various cases including Matter of Luisiana Ríos et al. (Venezuela), Order of 3 July 2007, 9th 'Considering' clause.

⁸⁹ See Chapter I (ICJ).

the protection required if the claim on the merits is granted that these measures cannot be seen simply as ‘an accessory element’ of the dispute. This is shown in the practice of several human rights adjudicators, for instance because provisional measures caused the State to seek a solution and resulted in the withdrawal of cases and in the decision to strike them from the list of pending cases.

The authority to order provisional measures and the authority to order action or abstention on the merits, as well as reparations are closely related. In some cases it would be particularly unacceptable to await the harm and then award pecuniary damages. Prevention (or putting a halt to ongoing violations) would be the only appropriate measure exactly because the harm is irreparable. Clearly, any form of financial compensation would be insufficient in relation to the harm done. In such cases the reason for using provisional measures would be so pressing that States would normally feel especially embarrassed to ignore them.

The link between halting an execution pending the proceedings and ordering commutation or a new trial as part of the decision on the merits is evident. With regard to ordering a State to protect a person against threats, the aim seems to be identical in provisional measures and on the merits. Thus if in the final determination of the case the HRC does not recommend at least the preservation of the life of the victim it seems that its provisional measures to prevent harm to persons serve little purpose. In other words, the aim of preventing harm to the claim and ensuring an adequate remedy is a prerequisite to preventing harm to the person.⁹⁰

While the ICJ’s power to use provisional measures normally must maintain its ‘proper subordination to the main judgment’,⁹¹ this is different in cases involving irreparable harm to persons. Clearly, because they aim at preventing such harm they must be in accordance with the pre-existing jurisprudence on the right to life, the prohibition of cruel treatment, the right to culture of indigenous peoples and the prohibition of mass expulsion and internal displacement on ethnic grounds.

At the same time, the protective measures required cannot go further in substance than an eventual decision on the merits and reparations would. This means that decisions on provisional measures already give an indication on substantive law. The ‘rule’ of non-anticipation by the adjudicator (rather than the parties) of the decision on the merits simply is a corollary to the customary statement that a decision to take provisional measures does not prejudice the eventual legal determination of the main conflict. The requirement not to prejudice the eventual legal determination, it is argued, is related to the assessment of risk.⁹²

Often it is already established that if an adjudicator finds sufficient evidence (on the merits stage) it will find a violation. Sometimes, however, the adjudicator has not yet dealt with the meaning of a certain provision in the situation at hand, or there are clear indications that it may change its case law. On occasion provisional measures have been taken pending the proceedings in such cases.⁹³ This might be seen as anticipating the eventual determination. Yet, in light of the risk of irreparable harm to persons, in human rights cases such risk of anticipation should not

⁹⁰ See Chapter XIII (Protection).

⁹¹ Merrills (1995), p. 106.

⁹² See further Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

⁹³ See e.g. in corporal punishment cases (Chapter IV) non-refoulement cases involving lack of proper care (Chapter V) and in cases involving indigenous culture (Chapter X). See also e.g. the use of provisional measures to halt destruction of IVF embryos and the subsequent decision on the merits finding that such destruction would not result in a violation of the Convention, Chapter XII (Other situations), section 2.5.

hinder the use of provisional measures.⁹⁴ What is important is that upon final determination the adjudicator is not led by the fact that pending the proceedings provisional measures were taken.⁹⁵

Violations of rights causing irreparable harm must be prevented since a return to the status quo ante is impossible after the irreversible has taken place (irreversibility), while the nature of the harm implies that such violations can never be repaired by financial compensation (irreparability). In human rights cases the relevance of this traditional reason for using provisional measures is particularly striking.

In a case where one party (the State) threatens to execute a death sentence imposed on the other party and that party claims that this would violate his right to life, an execution before the case is finally determined would amount to an irrevocable anticipation of the adjudicator's decision by the State party. This action would make impossible the fulfilment of the requirements claimed on the merits. These requirements would have constituted, first and foremost, the prevention of a further violation of the right to life. Next to cases in which there is precedent for the measures claimed on the merits, there may also be cases in which case law on the specific remedy claimed is not yet available. In some of these cases execution of the petitioner may inflict irreparable harm as well. In all such situations provisional measures have been used to prevent irreparable harm to persons.

A similar approach applies to the prevention of corporal punishment and of refoulement. Intervention in cases of disappearances or in detention situations involving lack of access to medical treatment equally prevents irreparable harm to persons. At the same time the intervention is justified by the fact that, once a violation is found, adjudicators have indicated the action or abstention required on the merits and recommended forms of reparation corresponding to the protective measures required pending the proceedings. Evidently, without the provisional measures there could be no appropriate decision on the merits nor form of reparation.

Adjudicators often deem warranted remedies for violations that have already taken place, in addition to those preventing (further) violations. In death penalty cases it would also be an option to use provisional measures to halt an execution because the victim could not enjoy the requested form of reparation, once executed, even if such reparation in itself does not refer to release or commutation, but to an unspecified (and possibly only monetary) remedy. Nevertheless, if the case law indicates that a remedy such as commutation is never recommended in relation to certain findings, the State itself is unlikely on its own motion to consider life a prerequisite for the enjoyment of any form of reparation. This already indicates that there are death penalty cases in which provisional measures eventually would not help prevent irreparable harm to persons because a link with the eventual obligations on the merits and reparation is lacking.

In death penalty cases an adjudicator should not use provisional measures simply to express an abolitionist stance in cases where he or she could expect the adjudicator would not recommend commutation. Provisional measures used in such circumstances do not truly prevent irreparable harm to persons because the eventual measures on the merits will not. Of course there is still a rationale to the use of provisional measures in such cases, namely to prevent irreversible harm to the procedure. The execution of the petitioner pending the proceedings hinders irreversibly the right of individual complaint. Such an execution causes irreversible harm to the fairness of the proceedings before the adjudicator and, thereby, the integrity of the individual complaint procedure under the treaty in question. Clearly, when one party in a conflict kills the other party during the course of legal proceedings instituted in order to settle their conflict, that party, rather than the adjudicator, settles the conflict. Such a course of action, moreover, is not conducive to the principle of equality of arms. This principle is a prerequisite to any legal proceedings aiming at being fair. The HRC, for instance, attaches great importance to it. This is evident both from its references to this principle in the examination of cases and from its own emphasis on the importance of making all information available to the State and the petitioner, giving both of them the opportunity to reply to each other's submissions and deciding the case on the basis of all the information before it, often sending reminders to the parties for more information. Execution of the petitioner by the State party is the ultimate example of inequality of arms. This form of irreversible harm to the proceedings is so serious that the use of provisional measures to prevent it could be justified even if there is no clear link with an eventual requirement on the merits preserving the life of the victim. Nevertheless, this approach is less satisfactory from the perspective of logic and the right to life than, for instance, in the case law of the HRC, the improvement and specification of references to 'an appropriate remedy' would be, by including to preservation of the life of the victim. The latter would ensure a correlation between the provisional measure and the eventual obligations on the merits and forms of reparation. In this approach the provisional measures would serve to prevent irreparable harm to persons.

⁹⁴ Thus in my view the ECtHR could have used provisional measures in Ireland v. UK, Judgment of 18 January 1978, as discussed in Chapter VII (Detention), section 2.2.

⁹⁵ See also Chapter III (Executions), section 3.2 on prejudgment and see Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk) and XVIII (Follow-up). It should be the other way around: at the provisional measures stage the adjudicator should take into account the likelihood of finding a violation that would require an action or abstention necessitating a similar action or abstention already pending the proceedings.

Even if the purpose of provisional measures is to prevent irreparable harm to persons rather than simply irreversible harm to the claim, when using provisional measures the adjudicator should indeed refer to the rights involved. It is possible that some adjudicators have used independent concepts of life, dignity and personal integrity without relating the concept of irreparable harm to specific articles of the relevant treaty. In view of the fact, however, that they may have to declare subsequently, on the basis of previous case law, that there was no violation, or that there was, but no action or abstention is required to prevent irreparable harm to persons at the merits stage, the question arises whether the object of the provisional measures was simply to postpone the suffering until after the expected finding. In order to prevent this, provisional measures should go no further than what could be required on the merits. If the provisional measures aim to ensure that a possible judgment on the merits will not be pre-empted, it should be established that the result hoped for, in the judgment on the merits, by the party requesting the provisional measures is at least feasible. In other words, if it is not feasible that the adjudicator would determine an outcome anywhere close to that hoped by the party requesting the provisional measure, pending the proceedings the adjudicator should not use it in the form requested. This simply requires a very initial prima facie assessment of feasibility.

In human rights cases provisional measures could be used also to prevent irreparable harm to rights collateral to the claim, if these rights involve the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment. After all, apart from direct complaints about death threats and harassment the issue of threats can also be collateral to the original claim. In such cases other persons than the alleged victim(s) involved in the main claim are at risk of irreparable harm. These persons are being threatened because they are somehow related to the alleged victim, for instance as family members or co-workers or as witnesses, judges or counsel in the international or domestic proceedings. In these cases too the provisional measure should not go further than the eventual decision on the merits could. The difference is that the latter is hypothetical in the sense that it relates to violations perpetrated against persons other than the alleged victim(s). In other words, the criterion is irreparable harm to persons rather than the link between the object of the complaint and the provisional measures. Still, there must be a relationship between what decision on the merits (prevention, non-repetition, reparation) the adjudicator could have suggested on the merits had the complaint itself been about the death threats. Thus, what the petitioner needs to show, for purposes of provisional measures, is the threat of irreparable harm to persons and the relationship of these persons to the alleged victim. It is also useful to show that violations have been found in similar cases in the past and that the provisional measures would go no further than the eventual decision on the merits would have, if the persons involved would have been the alleged victims.

In sum, human rights adjudicators should use provisional measures in cases in which they consider, prima facie, that the petitioners have shown not only immediacy of the harm and irreversibility of the act or omission⁹⁶ but also the risk of irreparable harm to persons, including in ongoing situations. The latter should normally be established by a two-prong test of (1) irreparable harm to persons and (2) irreversible harm to the rights claimed, including the possibility of reparation.

Only if persons other than the alleged victim(s) are risking irreparable harm the situation is different. Then the third type of irreversible harm, harm to the procedure, may play a role as well. This is the case when witnesses, counsel or family members of the alleged victim are harassed and receive death threats. In such cases there is no need to establish a relationship with the main claim. Here the test is (1) irreparable harm to persons and (2) irreversible harm to the integrity of the complaint procedure.⁹⁷ In relation to the purpose of provisional measures this is the core common to all international and regional human rights systems. This again illustrates the interrelated nature of procedural and substantive aspects of the concept of provisional measures.

4 CONCLUSION

Under universal treaties provisional measures are normally reserved for the prevention of irreparable harm to persons. Such provisional measures are taken in a limited set of circumstances, mainly involving claims about the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment. This constitutes the core common to provisional measures used by international adjudicators in human rights cases. Sometimes it concerns irreparable harm to the environment if this would result in irreparable harm to the cultural life or the psychological existence of an indigenous group (or of a persecuted minority). Thus, presently provisional measures to prevent irreparable harm to persons relate to ensuring survival of persons (and groups) and personal integrity.

Adjudicators in human rights cases have taken most provisional measures in relation to the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment and torture. These fundamental rights are considered non-derogable in all treaties under examination exactly because their violation, even during a state of emergency, would defeat the whole purpose of the treaty. The exceptional nature of these non-derogable rights is also confirmed by the fact that their violation may constitute a crime against humanity. In that sense there is a hierarchy in international human rights law.⁹⁸

Even if the treaty in question does not explicitly provide for the use of provisional measures, the duty to protect against threats to life and personal integrity requires the State to take positive measures also pending international proceedings. The right to personal security, the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment and torture imply positive obligations. In that light, rather than abstention alone, provisional measures should imply action as well. An obvious example is a provisional measure to prevent irreparable harm to persons by protecting them against death threats and harassment.

⁹⁶ See Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk) and Chapter XIII (Protection: prevention and reparation).

⁹⁷ In addition, as noted, preventing irreparable harm to the proceedings (the integrity of the complaint procedure) could be seen as a collateral purpose in death penalty and non-refoulement cases. The execution of a petitioner, for instance, pending the proceedings causes irreparable harm to the fairness of the proceedings before the adjudicator and, thereby, the integrity of the individual complaint procedure under the treaty in question.

⁹⁸ The HRC has noted that ‘while there is no hierarchy of importance of rights under the Covenant, the operation of certain rights may not be suspended, even in times of national emergency’. “This underlines the great importance of non-derogable rights”. General Comment 24 on reservations, 4 November 1994, §10. In this context it refers to peremptory norms and to rules of customary international law in general. See also its General Comment 29 on states of emergency, 24 July 2001. See in general about this issue Seiderman (2001). See also Simma (1995), p. 230.

Irreparable harm to persons refers not only to harm to physical integrity, but also to psychological and moral integrity, as long as the adjudicator would be likely to find a violation on the merits of the prohibition of cruel treatment and torture. Moreover, as noted, the risk of irreparable harm may vary depending on the vulnerability of the persons involved. It is submitted that the few provisional measures that have been taken to ensure access to court and counsel are equally justified because in the context in which they were used these rights were accessory to the protection against ill treatment and torture and against threats to life.⁹⁹

The example of the Inter-American Commission and Court to protect alleged victims, witnesses and other persons against death threats has been followed by most other adjudicators. While these have not yet built an extensive practice in this regard, their decision to intervene in these circumstances may be explained by the importance attached in all human rights systems to preventing irreparable harm to life and physical integrity.¹⁰⁰ At some point it may be expected that the ECtHR will use provisional measures in situations of death threats and harassment more robustly as well.

The right to life and the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment clearly necessitate the use of provisional measures because violations result in irreparable harm to persons threatening their very existence. Yet there are situations not involving the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment and torture in which human rights adjudicators have used provisional measures that have by now become part of the common core. Adjudicators have considered using provisional measures not only in the face of threats to personal integrity and life, but in the face of threats to the cultural survival of an indigenous people as well. This may be explained by the special position of indigenous peoples and other minorities in a particularly vulnerable position. After all, an appropriate obligation on the merits or form of reparation for violations of the right to culture and religion should take into account cultural integrity and survival. Financial compensation alone would not constitute meaningful redress because the very existence as a people may be at stake. Pending the proceedings provisional measures could prevent such irreparable harm, but at present their use to protect collective rights has been limited to protecting indigenous culture.¹⁰¹

Irreparable harm results from the violation of rights crucial to a person's or a group's basic existence or crucial to a person's dignity.¹⁰² In some contexts provisional measures may assist in alleviating the situation even of potentially large groups of people. Combined with pervasive discrimination, mass expulsion or internal displacement may indeed be so serious as to constitute not just undue hardship, but irreparable harm to the very existence of people. Such harm must be prevented rather than only redressed following the mass expulsion or displacement. Mass expulsion (and internal displacement) must be prevented exactly because the causes may be endemic (e.g. based on religious or ethnic grounds) and the consequences may have extremely long-term effects for a large group of people. The protection against forced displacement 'by expulsion or other coercive means from the area in which the persons concerned are lawfully present' is another norm recognised by the HRC for its fundamental nature.¹⁰³ The use of provisional measures to prevent or halt such violations could be warranted although at the same time international

⁹⁹ See Chapter VIII (Procedure).

¹⁰⁰ See Chapter IX (Threats).

¹⁰¹ See Chapter X (Culture).

¹⁰² Of course the terms 'basic existence' and dignity as used here, are themselves open to interpretation and one may wonder what aspects of the right to 'live' are included, apart from the right to 'life' per se. This includes the very initial discussion in the Inter-American system on the concept of 'project of life', see Chapter XII (Other situations), section 2.1.

¹⁰³ See Chapter XI (Mass expulsion).

adjudicators may not be able to collect enough information to assist the potential beneficiaries with provisional measures that are sufficiently focused.

It is argued that particularly in systems not providing for them in the text of the constitutive document, provisional measures should remain exceptional.¹⁰⁴ If the authority of human rights adjudicators to use provisional measures is not based on the constituent document but derived from their function (and based on the rules of procedure),¹⁰⁵ the importance of preventing irreparable harm requires that they are limited to situations threatening the very existence of persons. They should not be used to prevent human rights violations that ‘simply’ cause undue hardship rather than irreparable harm. This is not because this would not be possible conceptually, but because it risks devaluating the system, especially if used abruptly and without sufficient explanation and discussion.

Still the rule that provisional measures are only to be used to prevent irreparable harm to persons should be applied with a certain measure of flexibility, taking into account, for instance, the developmental rights of children and their ensuing special right for protection. If the beneficiary is a young child one might indeed speak of prevention of irreparable harm to persons in some cases that would otherwise cause undue hardship short of irreparable harm.¹⁰⁶

In any case in order for provisional measures to remain exceptional any expansion of their use should only involve other rights essential for the very existence of persons and indigenous peoples. As noted, these rights may coincide with rights recognised for their particular fundamental nature within the treaty.

When provisional measures presently belong to the common core the adjudicator may be expected to use them, whether the system is regional or international, and whether it is based on an explicit treaty provision on provisional measures or not. On the other hand, when provisional measure do not belong to the common core adjudicators could still decide to take them, so long as their aim and the protection required are not beyond the outer limits of the concept. Whether such use of provisional measures is advisable would depend on the context. One relevant factor is the international, regional or ‘constitutional’ nature of the complaint system. Regional systems with a monitoring presence or at least the capacity of making country visits and organising hearings are likely to have a better chance to collect sufficient information and focus the provisional measures on the specific needs. This applies even more to the provisional measures of more ‘constitutional’ or hybrid adjudicators, such as the Bosnia Chamber. Another relevant factor is whether the adjudicator was introduced in order to deal with a range of rights (HRC, CIDH, IACHR, EComHR, ECtHR, Bosnia Chamber) or with one issue in particular (CAT, CEDAW, CERD).¹⁰⁷ In general, a useful approach for all adjudicators would be to expand their use of provisional measures, as much as possible, on an incremental basis connected to pre-existing notions and practices.

¹⁰⁴ For a different approach, see e.g. Haeck/Burbano Herrera/Zwaak (2003), pp. 60-61.

¹⁰⁵ See further Chapter XVI (Legal status).

¹⁰⁶ See also Chapter XII (Other situations).

¹⁰⁷ See also Chapter II (Systems).

PART III

IMPACT OF THE IRREPARABLE NATURE OF THE HARM

INTRODUCTION

Part III examines the consequences that flow from the conclusions drawn in Part II on the common core and outer limits of provisional measures in relation to their purpose. In other words, has the irreparable nature of the harm risked to persons, involving their very existence and personal integrity, had an impact on the approach by the adjudicators with regard to other aspects of the concept of provisional measures?

Chapter XIV deals with the relationship of provisional measures in human rights adjudication with jurisdiction and admissibility on the merits. Chapter XV examines the issue of immediacy or temporal urgency on the one hand and risk or material urgency on the other. Chapter XVI is devoted to the legal status of provisional measures.

CHAPTER XIV

JURISDICTION AND ADMISSIBILITY

1 INTRODUCTION

There has only been one case in which the ICJ used provisional measures because it considered it had prima facie jurisdiction on the merits, but in which it subsequently determined – during the stage of preliminary objections – that it lacked such jurisdiction.¹ In the practice of the human rights adjudicators provisional measures have been used more often in cases later declared inadmissible. It appears that the adjudicators have taken a more flexible approach, taking into account the irreparable nature of the harm faced by the petitioners and the inequality between the parties. There are even cases in which the HRC has maintained provisional measures beyond declaration of inadmissibility. The IACHR, moreover, has used them after having made a finding on the merits and reparation.

This chapter discusses the relevance of the criteria for admissibility and jurisdiction on the merits for the decisions of the respective human rights adjudicators on provisional measures.²

The adjudicator clearly has no competence to use provisional measures if the Addressee State has not ratified the individual complaint procedure, because in such cases the adjudicator clearly has no jurisdiction. Yet other questions are not that easily answered. What, for instance, is the role of reservations to the individual complaint procedure, or of reservations to the rights on which the request for provisional measures is based? In the context of provisional measures, have human rights adjudicators treated reservations to their jurisdiction on the merits the same way as the ICJ has?

While admissibility and jurisdiction are two distinct concepts, inadmissibility is one factor depriving the adjudicator of jurisdiction to deal with a case. In human rights cases the issue of prima facie admissibility of the claim is important, including the relationship between the obligation to exhaust domestic remedies and their suspensive effect. Human rights adjudicators have often declared inadmissible cases in which they previously used provisional measures. The question arises what is the relationship between provisional measures and inadmissibility in these cases. At the same time decisions by adjudicators declaring claims admissible or inadmissible do not provide many clues about their approach to expected (lack of) jurisdiction or (in)admissibility and the use of provisional measures. In addition, to fully understand the approach of the adjudicators it would be necessary to have a record of cases in which they refused to use provisional measures. Such information, however, is not available. Nevertheless, an attempt is made to derive information from the admissibility decisions in cases in which adjudicators have used provisional measures. The practice of the HRC serves as a point of departure.

First this chapter refers to jurisdiction and provisional measures, with a focus on the significance of reservations for the use of provisional measures and on the use of provisional measures beyond inadmissibility or beyond judgments on the merits or reparation (section 2). Following this, it refers to admissibility and provisional measures, focussing on the issue of exhaustion of domestic remedies (section 3).

¹ ICJ Anglo-Iranian Oil Co., Order of 5 July 1951. See also Chapter I.

² This relates to admissibility of the case in order to be able to deal with it on the merits, as distinct from the admissibility of the petitioner's provisional measures request itself. Chapter II referred to the competence of the respective human rights adjudicators to use provisional measures.

2 JURISDICTION AND PROVISIONAL MEASURES

2.1 Introduction

When dealing with requests for provisional measures in cases where the State contests the adjudicator's jurisdiction to deal with the case on the merits, the irreparable nature of the harm faced by the petitioners should be taken into account.

Indeed the human rights adjudicators appear to have done so. This is most clearly the case with the Inter-American Court in its practice of ordering provisional measures to protect against death threats. In the Peace Community case, for instance, the Court simply referred to the fact that Colombia is a State Party and has recognised the competence of the Court. Following this, it reproduced the texts of Article 63(2) ACHR and Article 25(1) Rules of Procedure, both on the competence to order provisional measures.³ While the Court did not specify why this meant that it need to examine jurisdiction on the merits, in their concurring opinion judges Abreu Burelli and García Ramírez noted that the text of the Convention itself, in Article 63(2) ACHR, justified the Court's anticipation of its normal jurisdiction, at the request of the Commission, in order to provide adequate and immediate protection ('amparo') to persons. In this light they noted that the Convention only requires fulfilment of certain objective conditions for the adoption of provisional measures: one being extreme gravity and urgency because of possible harm to fundamental rights and the other the imminence of such harm. Article 63(2) does not have other requirements that could delay or impede the Court's decision to take such measures and, thereby, put at grave risk the human rights it aims to protect.⁴

In some cases other adjudicators also appear to have taken into account the irreparable nature of the harm faced by the petitioners. Before determining whether it had jurisdiction on the merits (ratione temporis), for instance, the Bosnia Chamber used provisional measures not to interfere with any burials in the Muslim Town Cemetery of Prnjavor carried out by or with the authority of the Islamic Community.⁵

This section deals with some other cases involving provisional measures and contested jurisdiction, in particular involving doubts with regard to the addressee of the provisional measures,

³ IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Orders of 24 November 2000 and 18 June 2002.

⁴ IACHR Concurring Opinion of Judges Abreu Burelli and García Ramírez, Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Orders for provisional measures, 24 November 2000, §2.

⁵ The Chamber subsequently discussed whether it had jurisdiction ratione temporis to examine the complaint about discrimination in the enjoyment of the freedom of religion. The domestic ordinance providing for the closure of the Cemetery was taken prior to entry into force of the Framework Agreement, which does not have retroactive effect. Nevertheless, in this case the ordinance formed the legal basis for the decision prohibiting the burial that was taken after the entry into force of the Agreement. This decision affected the members of the Islamic Community in Prnjavor because it gave rise to a continuing prohibition to bury their dead in the Cemetery. The Chamber noted that 'in considering whether the decisions affecting the applicant were discriminatory' it was relevant to consider the ordinance providing for the closure of the Muslim Town Cemetery as well. Bosnia Chamber The Islamic Community in Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Republika Srpska, 11 January 2000 (adm. & merits).

including the issue of extraterritoriality, reservations, and the use of provisional measures beyond inadmissibility or beyond judgments on the merits and reparation.

Most discussion involves the jurisdiction of adjudicators to deal with cases in the face of reservations made by States to substantive or procedural treaty obligations.

2.2 Addressees and extraterritoriality

As in the aforementioned case involving interference with burials, in an elections case the Bosnia Chamber also ordered provisional measures in a borderline case of prima facie lack of jurisdiction. Yet while this was a serious case, it did not involve irreparable harm to persons in the sense of (cultural) survival. In March 1998 the President of the Chamber ordered the State BiH and Republika Srpska to secure the ballot papers for the 1997 Elections to the National Assembly of the Republika Srpska.⁶ She also directed the Registrar of the Chamber to transmit copies of the decision to the Office of the High Representative and the Organisation of Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE). In fact the OSCE seemed to be the true addressee of the provisional measures and the case was later declared inadmissible for lack of jurisdiction ratione personae.⁷ When the addressee of an order for provisional measures clearly is not a party to the treaty invoked, ordering provisional measures would be inappropriate.⁸ Yet when there are doubts as to state responsibility, jurisdiction ratione personae and loci, it would indeed be appropriate to order provisional measures, taking the risk of a later finding of a lack of jurisdiction rather than that of irreparable harm to persons.

⁶ These were specified as those ballot papers received in Vienna before 5 December 1997, but posted after 24 November 1997.

⁷ The complaint related to the fact that the votes of the petitioners were not counted as valid 'due to the failure of the procedures adopted by the OSCE in relation to the administration of out-of-country voting' of the Provisional Election Commission (the "PEC"). This Commission was established under Article III of Annex 3 to the General Framework Agreement. Previously the Ombudsperson had indicated to the respondent parties that it was desirable to ensure that these ballots were safeguarded. She had done so on 11 December 1997, under Rule 16 of her Rules of Procedure. Later she adopted a report concluding that there had been a violation of Art. 3 of Protocol 1 ECHR and that the respondent Parties 'although not directly involved in the organisation of the elections at issue ... (were) responsible therefor [sic] under Annex 3 to the (General Framework Agreement)'. The fact that the Chamber did use provisional measures may indicate that at the stage of provisional measures it does not closely examine its jurisdiction on the merits. In its subsequent decision on admissibility the Chamber stated at the outset that 'any actions taken by the OSCE are, as such, outside the competence of the Chamber ratione personae', §36. It then examined whether this applied as well to its actions 'in pursuance of its role under Annex 3', §36. It pointed out that the actions of neither the High Representative nor the International Police Task Force were subject to any review with regard to how they carried out their functions under the General Framework Agreement. Equally, 'the nature of the functions carried out by the OSCE under Annex 3, which in substance is the management of elections in Bosnia and Herzegovina is not such as to be subject to review, except as specifically provided for in Annex 3', §41. The Agreement did 'not provide for the intervention of either respondent Party in the conduct of the elections'. The Chamber found that a breach of the rights of the petitioners under Article 3 of Protocol 1 ECHR (free elections) may have occurred but that 'the impugned acts do not come within the responsibility of the respondent Parties' and were outside the competence of the Chamber. It declared the petition inadmissible and considered that the order for provisional measures was no longer appropriate and should be withdrawn. Bosnia Chamber Adnan Suljanović, Edita Čišić and Asim Lelić v. State BiH and Republika Srpska, 14 May 1998, (inadm.). See also Bosnia Chamber Srpska Radikalna Stranka v. State BiH, 8 December 2000 (inadm.), §§12-13 (provisional measures refused, §6).

On occasion issues regarding the jurisdiction of States to deal with cases involving actions of their agents extraterritorially have come up at the stage of provisional measures. Given the range of counter-terrorism measures applied worldwide, the number of requests for provisional measures in this context is likely to increase.

In the range of precautionary measures taken by the Inter-American Commission on behalf of the persons detained by the US at Guantanamo Bay (Cuba), the Commission was able to refer to its previous case law on the merits regarding the extraterritorial application of the human rights obligations under the American Declaration, as part of the OAS Charter, and under the ACHR.⁹ The main criterion is that the detainees are under the ‘authority and control’ of US agents.¹⁰ The Inter-American Commission was not alone in taking this approach on the merits. The HRC has emphasized the responsibility of States for actions of their agents outside of their borders since the early 1980s.¹¹ The ICJ has confirmed this case law.¹²

In its General Comment on Article 2 ICCPR, dating from 2003, the HRC takes a rather extensive approach to extraterritorial application. After confirming that Article 2(1) ICCPR requires a State party to respect and ensure the rights laid down in the ICCPR ‘to anyone within the power or effective control of that State Party, even if not situated within the territory of the State Party’, it stated:

“This principle also applies to those within the power or effective control of the forces of a State Party acting outside its territory, regardless of the circumstances in which such power or

⁸ See e.g. the requests for provisional measures denied by the Bosnia Chamber in Čavić v. B&H, 18 December 1998 (inadm.), §13 (the request for provisional measures by the petitioner concerned invalidation of the decision by the High Representative in B&H, Carlos Westendorp, based on the Dayton Peace Agreement and various UN Security Council resolutions, to remove the petitioner as a member of the newly elected National Assembly of the Republika Srpska and barring him indefinitely from holding further official positions in B&H; the case was subsequently declared inadmissible for lack of jurisdiction ratione personae); see also Bosnia Chamber Municipal Council of the Municipality South-West Mostar v. the High Representative, 9 March 2000 (inadm.), §§5-6 (the petitioner had requested the Chamber to order a provisional measure annulling the decision of the Acting Head of a regional office of the High Representative to instantly replace the Head of a Housing Commission (and subsequently the Head of the Municipality itself for failure to carry out this order) for obstructing the return of displaced persons; this case was subsequently declared inadmissible for obvious lack of jurisdiction ratione personae).

⁹ CIDH Detainees at Guantanamo Bay, precautionary measures of 12 March and 23 July 2002; 18 March 2003; 29 July 2004 and 28 October 2005.

¹⁰ See e.g., CIDH Coard et al. v. US, 29 September 1999. See further Medina Quiroga (2005), pp. 12-14.

¹¹ HRC López Burgos v. Uruguay, 29 July 1981 and Celiberti de Casariego v. Uruguay, 29 July 1981.

¹² See ICJ Legal consequences of the construction of a wall in the occupied Palestinian territory (Advisory Opinion), 9 July 2004, holding that the ICCPR is applicable in respect of ‘acts done’ by a State in the exercise of its jurisdiction outside its own territory, §§107-113 and Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (Congo v. Uganda), judgment of 19 December 2005, §§178-180 and 216-217.

effective control was obtained, such as forces constituting a national contingent of a State Party assigned to an international peace-keeping or peace-enforcement operation".¹³

This extensive approach on the merits may mean that the Committee is willing to order provisional measures with regard to any situation claimed to involve such power and control.

As suggested by Scheinin 'the correct approach in the ICCPR is based on the universal nature of human rights, irrespective of whether the country where the alleged extraterritorial violations occur is a party to the ICCPR'.¹⁴ Indeed in 2004 the ICJ also considered that the ICCPR was 'applicable in respect of acts done by a State in the exercise of its jurisdiction outside its own territory'.¹⁵ It referred to the object and purpose of the ICCPR, the constant practice of the HRC (invoking its case law and quoting from its Concluding Observations) and the travaux of the ICCPR.¹⁶

The European Court takes a more cautious approach. Its initial case law¹⁷ appeared similar to that of the Inter-American Commission and the HRC, but then, in Bankovic, it introduced the controversial concept of the 'espace juridique' of the ECHR.¹⁸ In effect this resulted in excluding from monitoring by the ECtHR any action by agents from European States undertaken outside the territory of States making up the Council of Europe. Nevertheless, subsequent cases appear to argue away this concept.¹⁹ In November 2004, for instance, the Court published its judgment in Issa v. Turkey (2004), in which it considered that Turkey could be answerable under the Convention for its actions in Iraq, despite Bankovic.²⁰

¹³ HRC General Comment 31 on Article 2 ICCPR, the nature of the general legal obligation imposed on States parties to the Covenant, 21 April 2004, §10. See also HRC Concluding Observations to US report, CCPR/C/USA/CO/3, 15 September 2006 and CAT Concluding Observations to US report, CAT/C/USA/CO/2, 25 July 2006.

¹⁴ Scheinin (2004b), p. 77.

¹⁵ ICJ Legal consequences of the construction of a wall in the occupied Palestinian territory, Advisory Opinion of 9 July 2004, §111.

¹⁶ Id., §§109-110. See also ICJ Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (Congo v. Uganda), judgment of 19 December 2005, §§179-180 and ICJ Case concerning the application of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (Georgia v. Russia), Order for provisional measures of 15 October 2008, §109. Article 2 ICAT refers to the responsibility of a State 'in any territory under its jurisdiction'. Article 3 of the Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance stipulates that 'each State shall take effective legislative, administrative, judicial or other measures to prevent and terminate acts of enforced disappearance in any territory under its jurisdiction'. The UN Working Group on Enforced Disappearances has emphasized that this provision calls for action by States 'in any territory' under their jurisdiction. E/CN.4/1995/38, 15 January 1996, §49.

¹⁷ ECtHR Cyprus v. Turkey, 10 May 2001 and Loizidou v. Turkey, 23 March 1995.

¹⁸ ECtHR Bankovic et al v. Belgium and 16 other States, 12 December 2001 (inadm.). For a criticism see e.g. Lawson (2004), pp. 83-123. For a different perspective see O'Boyle (2004), pp. 125-139 and Caflisch/Cançado Trindade (2004), p. 36.

¹⁹ In fact the reason for declaring Bankovic inadmissible may have been more the factual situation of high altitude bombing rather than the fact that Serbia was not within the 'legal space' of the Convention.

²⁰ ECtHR Issa v. Turkey, 16 November 2004; see also, e.g., Ilaşcu and Others v. Moldova and Russia, 8 July 2004. It turns out that, after all, in light of the criterion of effective control the Court finds important the type of action (e.g. high altitude bombing does not bring the victims 'within the jurisdiction', as opposed to arresting or detaining a person). See e.g. Öcalan v. Turkey, 12 May 2005; see also Pad et al. v. Turkey, 28 June 2007 (inadm. for non exhaustion) ("Accordingly, a State may be held accountable for violations of the Convention rights and

At the time when lawyers requested the Court to order provisional measures on behalf of Saddam Hussein, however, the Court had not yet decided these cases. In June 2004 lawyers acting on behalf of Saddam Hussein asked the ECtHR ‘to permanently prohibit the United Kingdom from facilitating, allowing for, acquiescing in, or in any other form whatsoever effectively participating, through an act or omission, in the transfer of the applicant to the custody of the Iraqi Interim Government unless and until the Iraqi Interim Government has provided adequate assurances that the applicant will not be subject to the death penalty’.²¹ They relied on Articles 2 and 3 ECHR and on Protocols 6 (abolition in times of peace) and 13 (abolition in all circumstances) to the Convention, arguing that the UK ‘has an obligation to ensure individuals are not subject to the death penalty and therefore not to surrender legal or physical custody of individuals to a country or jurisdiction where they would face such consequences and other breaches of the Convention’. The ECtHR decided not to grant this request.²² Press agency Reuters, observing that the decision was not motivated,²³ noted that a spokesperson for the Court had indicated to it that it only takes provisional measures if it is convinced that there is a risk of physical harm that is very important, irreversible and imminent.²⁴ Obviously in earlier cases the Court already considered the death penalty to involve both important and irreversible harm. Thus it is unclear in this case what was the exact reason for the European Court not to order provisional measures.²⁵ The fact that it denied the request could be attributed to the fact that, five months before its decision in Issa, it still considered that Iraq was not within the ‘espace juridique’ of the ECHR and therefore prima facie it had no jurisdiction to order provisional measures. In 2006 it declared the Hussein case inadmissible, not based on an ‘espace juridique’ argument, but because it considered that the US and not the UK had control over Saddam Hussein for the purpose of handing him over.²⁶

The later case of Behrami and Behrami v. France (2007) was not declared inadmissible based on an ‘espace juridique’ argument either. The Court did exclude actions undertaken extra-territorially as part of a collective action and authorized under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, freedoms of persons who are in the territory of another State which does not necessarily fall within the legal space of the Contracting States, but who are found to be under the former State’s authority and control through its agents operating – whether lawfully or unlawfully – in the latter State”, §53) and Isaak et al. v. Turkey, 28 September 2006 (adm.) (‘even if the acts complained of took place in the neutral UN buffer zone, the Court considers that the deceased was under the authority and/or effective control of the respondent State through its agents’, §2(b) (ii), also confirming the HRC and CIDH case law under 2(b) (1), General principles). On Issa see also e.g. Leach (2005) and Mole (2005).

²¹ ECtHR Press Release 337, ‘European Court of Human Rights rejects requests for interim measures by Saddam Hussein’, 30 June 2004.

²² Ibid.

²³ See also Chapter II, section 8.3.

²⁴ See Reuters, ‘Conseil de l’Europe: pas de “mesures provisoires” pour Saddam Hussein’, 30 June 2004 (‘n’impose à un État des «mesures provisoires», en vertu de l’article 39 de son règlement, que lorsqu’elle est «convaincu qu’il y a un risque de préjudice physique très important, irréversible et imminent»’), posted on <www.peinedemort.org> (accessed on 13 August 2004).

²⁵ See also Chapter V (Expulsion), speculating on the possibility that the ECtHR wrongly assumed that the moratorium on the death penalty would not be lifted. In that respect the Court could have considered that Hussein was not facing irreversible harm (at least not imminently). In fact the moratorium was lifted, and Saddam Hussein was sentenced to death and executed. Political reasons may have played some role as well, because of the person involved, or for policy reasons, fearing a flood of new submissions regarding extraordinary renditions, although the latter seems too cynical, despite the heavy case load the Court is dealing with.

²⁶ ECtHR Saddam Hussein v. Albania, UK et al., 14 March 2006 (inadm.).

reminding States of the best way to act extraterritorially without effective monitoring by the European Court.²⁷

As noted in Chapter V,²⁸ the ECtHR has now used provisional measures vis-à-vis a State operating outside the Council of Europe, e.g. to halt transfer of detainees by UK authorities in Iraq to the Iraqi authorities.²⁹

In the face of a practice, developed by several States after the September 11th 2001 terrorist attacks, of making use of so-called extraordinary renditions, and the factual activities of States outside their own borders, for instance in the context of international organisations, a more coherent approach by the ECtHR towards extraterritorial application of the ECHR to the acts of Council of Europe member States, taking into account relevant case law developed by other international adjudicators, is indeed particularly warranted.³⁰ This may also be helpful in the Court's treatment of requests for provisional measures ordering States to act or refrain from acting outside their borders and in addressing misunderstandings by domestic courts in this respect.³¹

²⁷ ECtHR Behrami and Behrami v. France, 2 May 2007. Children were playing outside when a cluster bomb detonated that had been dropped by NATO during the Kosovo war, leaving one child dead and another crippled. Their family complained against France, whose local KFOR troops were aware of the cluster bombs, but had not marked the area. The ECtHR declared the case inadmissible. The international presence mandated by a binding UN Security Council decision has effective control over Kosovo. The UN had 'ultimate authority and control' over KFOR even though NATO had operational control and in fact the Troop Contributing Nations had a great level of autonomy. The ECtHR did not explain why it did not use the criterion of 'effective control' in Article 5 of the 2004 ILC Draft Articles on the Responsibility of International Organisations, but instead introduced a criterion of 'ultimate' authority and control. In any case it found that the Convention could not be interpreted in a manner that would subject the acts and omissions of Contracting Parties to the scrutiny of the Court in this case because that could interfere with the fulfillment of the UN's key mission to secure international peace and security. Operations under Chapter VII UN Charter were fundamental to this mission and they relied for their effectiveness on support from member States. For a discussion of this case, see e.g. Bulterman (2007) and Lawson (2008). Distinguishing this case from the situation in Iraq, see e.g. House of Lords R (Al-Jedda) v. Secretary of State for Defence, 12 December 2007, [2007] UKHL 58.

²⁸ See Chapter V (Non-refoulement), section 3.4.

²⁹ Provisional measures in case of Faisal al-Saadoon and Khalef Mufdhi v. UK, 30 December 2008 (by the Acting President of the Fourth Section). A scan of the ECtHR letter to counsel confirming its use of provisional measures was posted at <<http://humanrightsdoctorate.blogspot.com/2009/01/uk-breaches-provisional-measures.html>>; the measure was ignored by the UK in reference to a decision of a domestic court. See further Chapter XVII (Official responses).

³⁰ For an excellent analysis see further Gondek (2005), pp. 349-387 as well as Cerone (2006) and Cerna (2006). For a discussion of extraterritorial application of various human rights treaties see Coomans/Kamminga (2004).

³¹ See e.g. the UK Court of Appeal decision in the above Faisal al-Saadoon and Khalef Mufdhi v. UK case: R (Al-Saadoon) v. Secretary of State for Defence, [2009] EWCA Civ 7, appeal dismissed on 30 December 2008, motivated and published on 21 January 2009, <<http://www.bailii.org/ew/cases/EWCA/Civ/2009/7.html>>.

2.3 Reservations and denunciation and provisional measures halting executions

2.3.1 Introduction

Both the HRC and the Inter-American Court have had to deal with the withdrawal of Trinidad and Tobago from the OP and the ACHR, respectively. This triggered issues relating to the compatibility of reservations, the jurisdiction of the adjudicators ratione temporis and the question whether a case that was pending before the Inter-American Commission could already be registered (and provisional measures be granted) by the HRC.³² This section deals with the case law developed by the HRC and the Inter-American Court in this respect. Their approach is set off against that of the ICJ.

2.3.2 HRC

In Bethel v. Trinidad and Tobago (1999)³³ the petitioner had petitioned the Inter-American Commission, ‘in accordance with the guidelines issued by the State party in October 1997, which set out a strict timetable to be adhered to by applicants’. The petitioner had instructed his counsel to submit the case to the HRC as well, in case his petition to the IACHR would be unsuccessful. In May 1998, however, Trinidad denounced the OP. It re-acceded with the following reservation:

“The Human Rights Committee shall not be competent to receive and consider any communications relating to any prisoner who is under sentence of death in respect of any matter relating to his prosecution, his detention, his trial, his conviction, his sentence or the carrying out of the death sentence on him and any matter connected herewith”.³⁴

Trinidad issued new ‘instructions’ as well about the time periods that should apply to petitions in relation to prisoners sentenced to death between the date of denunciation (26 May 1998) and the date on which the denunciation would become effective (26 August 1998). Counsel considered that the petitioner would not be able to present a communication to the HRC after 26 August 1998 when the State’s re-accession to the OP would become effective with a reservation excluding death row inmates from the right of petition. By the time the Inter-American Commission would adopt its decision the denunciation of the OP by Trinidad and Tobago would have become effective.³⁵ Yet the petitioner had had a reasonable expectation to pursue his right of access to the HRC since October 1997. He claimed that the State party’s denunciation constituted a breach of Article 1 OP and Article 26 ICCPR. At the same time he requested the HRC to already register the case in order to guarantee his right to petition if his application to the Inter-American Commission would be rejected.

According to the State party the petitioner had the choice between submitting an application to the IACHR or to the HRC. It argued that splitting petitions between two human rights bodies was an abuse of the right of submission. It considered that the HRC ‘should not condone a situa-

³² While the latter is an issue involving other grounds for inadmissibility (‘same matter’) discussed in section 3, it is so closely linked to the others that it is discussed here.

³³ HRC Christopher Bethel v. Trinidad and Tobago, 31 March 1999.

³⁴ As reproduced in e.g. A/53/40, Chapter I and Christopher Bethel v. Trinidad and Tobago, 31 March 1999, §2.3.

³⁵ HRC Christopher Bethel v. Trinidad and Tobago, 31 March 1999.

tion where a petitioner seeks to submit some complaints to the IACHR and reserves others for the Committee'.³⁶

Surprisingly, the HRC considered that the right of access to the HRC is not a right protected by the Covenant and declared the case inadmissible. This is puzzling since the HRC could have argued proprio motu that the reservation attached to the re-accession violated the object and purpose of the individual complaints procedure under the Optional Protocol and the object and purpose of the Covenant itself, including the principle of non-discrimination of Article 26.³⁷

In any case before declaring the case inadmissible the HRC had used provisional measures in Bethel. On this issue Pocar and Scheinin attached a concurring opinion. They considered that the HRC should have declared the case inadmissible not because the right of access to the HRC is not a right protected by the Covenant, but instead for non-exhaustion of domestic remedies. They referred to the practice of upholding the request for provisional measures cases of non-exhaustion in light of the possibility of review. They noted that the Committee's provisional measures should have been upheld and 'the inadmissibility decision should have been made subject to a possibility of review when the obstacle for inadmissibility has been removed'.³⁸

They pointed out that the HRC had stated its position about the reservation in the Annual Report to the effect that it would 'deal with the validity and legal effect of the reservation by Trinidad and Tobago in due course and in the concrete context of such individual cases related to the death penalty that have been submitted after 26 August 1998'.³⁹ They emphasised that the reservation in question could 'not be seen to bar, in abstracto, access by the author or any other prisoner under the sentence of death, to the Committee in its functions under the Optional Protocol'.⁴⁰

In their discussion in Bethel Scheinin and Pocar anticipated the Committee's decision in Kennedy v. Trinidad and Tobago (2002).⁴¹ This decision is directly relevant to the question about the relationship between the general jurisdiction of the HRC to deal with complaints and its jurisdiction to take provisional measures.⁴² The Committee considered that the aforementioned reser-

³⁶ Id., §6.2.

³⁷ Later, in HRC Kennedy v. Trinidad and Tobago (2002), the HRC did so. HRC Rawle Kennedy v. Trinidad and Tobago, 26 March 2002 (merits) and public admissibility decision of 2 November 1999, see infra.

³⁸ Concurring opinion Pocar and Scheinin in HRC Christopher Bethel v. Trinidad and Tobago, 31 March 1999. "This course of action would have made it clear to the author, his counsel and the State party that the State party's withdrawal and re-accession accompanied by reservation, of the Optional Protocol, dated 26 May 1998 and effective 26 August 1998, does not constitute an obstacle for the future consideration of the author's case by the Committee".

³⁹ Concurring opinion Pocar and Scheinin. In HRC Christopher Bethel v. Trinidad and Tobago, 31 March 1999.

⁴⁰ Ibid. This statement is also the only reference to the fact that the Special Rapporteur had used provisional measures earlier in the proceedings. In fact his counsel had requested this as part of the initial submission and the Rapporteur had transmitted the case and used provisional measures on 17 September 1998 (on file with the author).

⁴¹ HRC Rawle Kennedy v. Trinidad and Tobago, 26 March 2002.

⁴² Almost three months after the Committee's provisional measures in this case the State replied, referring to the new reservation attached to its accession to the OP of 26 May 1998. It pointed out that the HRC was not competent to consider the petitioner's communication and it considered that the HRC had 'exceeded its jurisdiction by registering the communication and purporting to impose interim measures'. Thus, its 'actions in respect of this communication were void and of no binding effect', HRC Rawle Kennedy v. Trinidad and Tobago, 26 March 2002, §4.2. The petitioner referred to the general principle of international law that 'the body to whose vation to the OP could not be deemed compatible with the object and the purpose of the Protocol and declared the case admissible despite the fact that it was submitted after Trinidad's denunciation became effective.⁴³ Four members dissented because they considered that the communication was inadmissible.⁴⁴ Nevertheless they did agree that it had been within the Committee's compejurisdiction a purported reservation is addressed decides on the validity and effect of that reservation', HRC Rawle Kennedy v. Trinidad and Tobago, 26 March 2002, §5.

⁴³ Because of the importance of the issue the HRC decided to make public this admissibility decision. HRC Rawle Kennedy v. Trinidad and Tobago, admissibility decision of 2 November 1999. One member, Henkin (US), attached a concurring opinion simply pointing out that he concurred with the result.

⁴⁴ The dissenters pointed out the difficulties for the State party, given constitutional restraints. Even if the HRC would later find no violation, they noted, the State party may be prevented from carrying out the sentence. It is not clear whether this remark applies only to those cases in which the HRC has taken provisional measures or whether they already anticipated the later decision, in HRC Dante Piandiong, Jesus Morallos and Archie Bulan (deceased) v. the Philippines, 19 October 2000, that the fact itself that a case is pending before the HRC implies that the State must not execute the petitioner. See Chapter XVI on legal status. They also pointed out that if they had accepted the majority's view that the reservation was invalid they 'would have had to hold that Trinidad and Tobago is not a party to the Optional Protocol'. This would, they pointed out, equally make the communication inadmissible. Individual opinion Ando, Bhagwati, Klein and Kretzmer in HRC Rawle Kennedy v. Trinidad and Tobago, admissibility decision of 2 November 1999, §17. In an individual opinion attached to the final View Ando, Klein and Kretzmer referred to their dissenting opinion to the admissibility decision in this case: "Our view was not accepted by the Committee, which held that it was competent to consider the communication. We respect the Committee's view as to its competence and so have joined in the consideration on the merits". Individual opinion Ando, Klein and Kretzmer (this time not joined by Bhagwati), HRC Rawle Kennedy v. Trinidad and Tobago, 26 March 2002. In Xavier Evans v. Trinidad and Tobago, 21 March 2003, Wedgwood, who has been the US member of the HRC subsequent to Henkin's retirement, attached an individual opinion in order to express her view about this issue. She dissented to the admissibility of this case, referring to the opinion of Ando, Klein and Kretzmer in Kennedy. Wedgwood also considered that 'the failure of the State party to cooperate with the Committee in the examination of the merits in this case and in the earlier case of Kennedy v. Trinidad and Tobago may bear some relation to the disregard of this reservation'. While this may indeed partially explain the attitude of the State (although the State already failed to co-operate in many cases previous to the HRC decision in Kennedy), it seems that Wedgwood considers this attitude justified. The petitioner's death sentence had been commuted in 1994, several years before his initial submission of 16 November 1999. According to Wedgwood this did 'not evidently displace the effect of the reservation'. If one considers, like Wedgwood, that the HRC should respect State party reservations, even when contrary to object and purpose, it is still not evident that the reservation in question would apply to the petitioner. The reservation declared the HRC incompetent 'to receive and consider communications relating to any prisoner who is under sentence of death in respect of any matter relating to his prosecution, his detention, his trial, his conviction, his sentence or the carrying out of the death sentence on him and any matter connected herewith'. This formulation included a large group of persons, but it did not say 'any person who is or was under sentence of death'. After all, Evans was no longer under sentence of death when he submitted his complaint. The HRC had previously discussed the issue of reservations in a General Comment that had triggered criticism from a few States. HRC General Comment 24 on reservations to the ICCPR or the Optional Protocols, 4 November 1994. Clearly, under both customary international law and the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties States parties are entitled to make reservations, but only if they are not contrary to the object and purpose of the treaty in question. This, however, was not the dispute that arose following the tence to register the communication and take provisional measures ‘so as to allow the Committee to consider whether the State party’s reservation to the Optional Protocol makes the communication inadmissible’.⁴⁵ This, once more, underlines that all Committee members consider that there is no need to determine jurisdiction before using provisional measures.

In R. S. v. Trinidad and Tobago (2002)⁴⁶ the HRC confirmed its majority View in Kennedy that Trinidad’s reservation was incompatible with the objective of the OP and complaints by death row inmates were admissible. In other words it was not precluded from considering the case. Trinidad has now fully withdrawn from the OP,⁴⁷ but in cases involving, for instance, Guyana, which has attached the same reservation to its re-accession,⁴⁸ or Tajikistan, a resumption of issuance of the General Comment. Some States made objections relating to the question whether supervisory committees to human rights treaties may not only determine whether a reservation is contrary to the object and purpose of the treaty they supervise, but also the consequences of such a reservation, such as severability. ILC Rapporteur Pellet has also referred to this Comment as ‘controversial’, Report of the International Law Commission on the work of its 48th session, 2 May-26 July 1996, §116. See Observations by France, 4 International Human Rights Report 6 (1997); Observations by the UK 3 International Human Rights Report 262 (2006); Observations by the US 3 International Human Rights Report 265 (2006). For an analysis of the discussion see e.g. Redgwell (1997), pp. 390-412; Goodman (2002), pp. 531-560; Higgins (2007), p. 747; Kamminga (2008), §3.2 and Ziemele (2004) and the contributions therein (see in particular Scheinin, pp. 41-58, also explaining, at pp. 50-51, why dissenting opinions generally are less complete in their argumentation than the HRC majority view or concurring opinions).

⁴⁵ HRC Rawle Kennedy v. Trinidad and Tobago, admissibility decision of 2 November 1999, dissenting opinion by Ando (Japan), Bhagwati (India), Klein (Germany) and Kretzmer (Israel).

⁴⁶ HRC R. S. v. Trinidad and Tobago, 2 April 2002.

⁴⁷ It withdrew on 27 March 2000. This became effective on 27 June 2000.

⁴⁸ Guyana denounced the OP on 5 January 1999 and re-accessed to it on the same date with a reservation related to the competence of the Committee to examine death penalty cases. This reservation became effective on 5 April 1999. Subsequent to this date the HRC used provisional measures several times in order to halt an execution. Yet in these cases the initial submission was made before the date on which the reservation became effective and rather than referring to the incompatibility of the reservation and its severability, the HRC simply noted that the initial submission predated this reservation. See e.g. Hazerat Hussain and Sumintra Singh v. Guyana, 25 October 2005 (initial submission of 16 March 1999 and provisional measure of 22 April 1999); Smartt v. Guyana, 6 July 2004 (initial submission on 28 March 1999; provisional measure on 28 April 1999); Deolall v. Guyana, 1 November 2004 (initial submission of 5 January 1999; provisional measures of 7 February 2000. In §4.5 the Committee explicitly discusses admissibility in this respect: “The Committee notes that the communication was submitted prior to Guyana’s denunciation of the Optional Protocol on 5 January 1999 and its re-accession to it with a reservation related to the competence of the Committee to examine death penalty cases. It concludes therefore that its jurisdiction is not affected by this denunciation. The Committee can find no reasons to consider this communication inadmissible and proceeds to a consideration of the merits”; Lawrence Chan v. Guyana, 31 October 2005 (initial submission of 15 September 1998; provisional measures of 7 February 2000; in her individual opinion Wedgwood considered that the HRC had ‘assumed in this matter that it is the date of an author’s initial submission of a communication, rather than the date of its formal registration and transmission to the state party for reply, that is the decisive date for judging admissibility ratione temporis’. After referring to some previous case law she notes that ‘(t)hough this is a debatable conclusion, within reasonable limits, I am willing to accept the Committee’s view’); See also Raymond Persaud and Rampersaud v. Guyana, 21 March 2006 (in this case the provisional measures were prior to the re-accession with reservation, on 9 April 1998; ‘On 16 or 17 July 1998, warrants of execution the old practice of maintaining provisional measures in the face of non-exhaustion, as suggested by Pocar and Scheinin, would seem warranted.⁴⁹

2.3.3 IACHR

As noted, Trinidad also withdrew from the ACHR. The Inter-American Court was faced with two issues, the incompatibility of this State's previous reservations to the ACHR and the applicability of the Convention ratione temporis given the withdrawal.

When this Court orders provisional measures, the State's recognition of its jurisdiction is the first issue it deals with. The first Order of the Inter-American Court for provisional measures to halt an execution (June 1998) mentioned that Trinidad and Tobago had been a State Party to the ACHR since May 1991 and had accepted the Court's jurisdiction. In addition it noted that this jurisdiction extended to the application of Article 63(2), the article on provisional measures. It pointed out that the Court's jurisdiction as such was based on Article 62(3) ACHR, stipulating that it was empowered to hear 'all cases concerning the interpretation and application' of the provisions of the Convention.⁵⁰ In its subsequent provisional measures the Court continued to refer to the fact that Trinidad had been a State Party from 28 May 1998 until 26 May 1999.⁵¹

Particularly interesting is its decision to order provisional measures requested after Trinidad's denunciation of the Convention became effective. It argued that the denunciation did not release the State from its obligations with respect to acts occurring prior to the effective date of denunciation. It pointed this out not only in its decision on preliminary objections,⁵² but also in its provisional measures. In an Order for provisional measures issued the day before the denunciation became effective the Court stated that 'pursuant to Article 78(2) of the American Convention, the denunciation does not have the effect of releasing the State from its obligations with respect to acts occurring prior to the effective date of denunciation which may constitute a violation of the said Convention'.⁵³ were mistakenly issued and read to the authors, because the Office of the President had not been notified that interim measures had been granted by the Committee. The warrants were withdrawn and the authors subsequently received letters of apology for the mistake' (§2.2)".

⁴⁹ See also section 3.4 of this Chapter.

⁵⁰ IACHR James, Briggs, Noel, Garcia and Bethel, Order of 14 June 1998, 1st 'Considering' clause.

⁵¹ See IACHR James et al., Order for provisional measures, 26 November 2001. For other references to the fact that Trinidad had accepted the jurisdiction of the Court see e.g. 25 May 1999, 27 May 1999 and 25 September 1999. Trinidad's withdrawal of 26 May 1998 became effective on 26 May 1999.

⁵² See the three IACHR Judgments of 1 September 2001 in the cases of Hilaire, Constantine and Benjamin et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago, as discussed infra.

⁵³ See e.g. IACHR James et al., Order of 27 May 1999, 3rd 'Considering' clause. Subsequently the Commission noted that it had received two additional petitions on the day before Trinidad's denunciation would become effective. It requested the Court to include the petitioners as new beneficiaries in the James et al. Order. It argued that the State's denunciation of the Convention 'should not be considered to affect the jurisdiction of either the Court or the Commission to entertain these matters', §5e. The President and later the Court itself ordered their inclusion in the provisional measures, simply noting again that the denunciation did not release the State from its obligations with respect to acts that occurred prior to the effective date of denunciation. See IACHR James et al., Order of the President for urgent measures, 19 June 1999. The President subsequently amplified the provisional measures also with regard to five petitions the Commission received between November 2000 and April 2001, in other words after the denunciation became effective. In this case the Commission had argued as well that the State's

The Court has clearly stated that Trinidad's denunciation of the Convention 'does not affect the jurisdiction of either the Court or the Commission to consider the alleged acts, occurring in whole or in part, before May 26, 1999, the day in which the State's denunciation of the Convention entered into force'.⁵⁴ This applied even though the petitions were received after that date.⁵⁵ Clearly, if the Court is still able to deal with the petition on the merits at a later stage there is no doubt either that it can order provisional measures in the meantime.

An examination of Trinidad's attitude may shed light on some of the Court's criteria vis-à-vis its jurisdiction but also on the State's insistent strive to free itself from the Court's supervision.⁵⁶ In its follow-up reports Trinidad expressed jurisdictional objections against the Court's Orders for provisional measures. These were the same objections subsequently expressed during the preliminary objections phase of the Hilaire, Constantine et al. and Benjamin et al. cases. It referred to its reservation to the ACHR with regard to its recognition of the Court's compulsory jurisdiction under Article 62. According to this reservation its recognition was applicable 'only to such extent' that it was 'consistent with the relevant sections of the Constitution of the Republic of Trinidad and Tobago; and provided that any judgment does not infringe, create or abolish any existing rights or duties of any private citizens'.⁵⁷

The State claimed that the provisional measures requested by the Commission concerned matters falling within its reservation. Thus, it did not recognise the Court's jurisdiction and considered the Orders 'ultra vires and void'.⁵⁸ Evidently, the Court did not agree as it ratified the President's Order. Apart from the linguistically puzzling matter how a judgment can create existing rights, the question arises whether Trinidad's reservation to the provision on the Court's compulsory jurisdiction is permissible in light of the Convention's object and purpose. The Court did not discuss this issue in its Order for provisional measures but subsequently, in its Judgments on preliminary objections, it determined that the State's declaration (that its recognition is only valid to the extent that it is consistent with the relevant sections of Trinidad's Constitution) can lead to numerous interpretations but that it 'cannot be given a scope that would impede this Tribunal's ability to judge whether the State had or had not violated a provision of the Convention'.⁵⁹ With regard to the second part of Trinidad's 'purported restriction' aimed at limiting the Court's compulsory jurisdiction to judgments that do not 'infringe, create or abolish any existing rights or duties of any private citizen' it pointed out that, while the precise meaning of this condition was unclear, without a doubt it could not be utilized for the purpose of suppressing 'the jurisdiction of the Court to hear and decide an application related to an alleged violation of the State's conventional obligations'.⁶⁰ denunciation 'should not be considered to affect the jurisdiction of either the Court or the Commission to entertain these matters, for the events complained of in the petitions are alleged to have occurred in whole or in part prior to May 26, 1999', IACHR James et al., Order of 26 November 2001, 'Having seen' clause 4a. In reference to the Commission's statements, the President confirmed that 'pursuant to Article 78(2) of the American Convention, the denunciation does not have the effect of releasing the State from its obligations with respect to acts occurring, in whole or in part, prior to the effective date of denunciation, which may constitute a violation of the said Convention'. IACHR James et al., Order of 26 November 2001, 3rd 'Considering' clause.

⁵⁴ IACHR James et al., Order of 25 May 1999.

⁵⁵ IACHR James et al., Order of 26 November 2001.

⁵⁶ See generally on official State responses Chapter XVII.

⁵⁷ IACHR James et al., Order of 29 August 1998. See also Chapter XVII (Official responses).

⁵⁸ See IACHR James et al., Order of 25 May 1999 (submission of the State of 19 May 1999).

⁵⁹ IACHR Constantine et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago, 1 September 2001 (Preliminary Objections), §77.

⁶⁰ Id., §77.

According to Trinidad the Convention permits States to accept the Court's jurisdiction under Article 62 subject to restrictions. It considered that such restriction did not affect the enjoyment of the rights in the Convention. Because its reservation did not deny the exercise of any of the rights in the ACHR, it could be considered compatible with its object and purpose. The State contended that 'in accordance with universally recognized principles of International Law, the exercise of the jurisdiction by an international court with respect to a State is not a right but a privilege only exercisable with the express consent of the State'. In the event that the Court would nevertheless declare Trinidad reservation incompatible with the Convention's object and purpose, Trinidad put forward, 'the effect of such a determination would be to render the State's declaration accepting the Court's compulsory jurisdiction null and void ab initio'.⁶¹

"If the 'reservations' of the State were, for any reason, considered invalid, it would not mean that the State declared its unlimited acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court. On the contrary, it is clear that the State never intended to accept, in its totality, the jurisdiction of the Court. If the 'reservation' is invalid, then the declaration was invalid, and the State never made a declaration".⁶²

The Inter-American Commission, on the other hand, argued that the State's reservation should be considered invalid because it was impossible to determine its exact nature and scope. It referred to the UN Human Rights Committee's statement that reservations to human rights treaties must be specific and transparent. The Commission pointed out that the reservation was not permitted because it was contrary to the Convention's object and purpose as well as to general principles of international law. The State's interpretation limited the ability of the Court to interpret and apply the Convention in cases against Trinidad because it would only be able to apply the Convention rights 'to the extent that such rights are protected in the State's Constitution'.⁶³ Thus, the State's position ignored the fact that it was the responsibility of the Court and not of the State to determine whether domestic laws were consistent with the Convention. The State interpreted its declaration in such a way that the Court would be prevented from considering the specific aspects of the 'mandatory death penalty'. Such interpretation 'would effectively permit the State to violate the Convention with respect to the alleged victims in this case', in contravention of Article 29(a) ACHR.⁶⁴ The Commission underlined the importance of a purposive interpretation in human rights cases in which the human rights systems would be strengthened rather than weakened. In that light:

"Severing the impugned term from the State's declaration of acceptance, instead of annulling the declaration in toto, serves to guarantee the fundamental human rights of the alleged victims and those of individuals in similar situations who would not otherwise have effective domestic remedies of protection".⁶⁵

⁶¹ Id., §48.

⁶² Id., §51. This statement obviously indicates the attitude of Trinidad and Tobago vis-à-vis the Court's provisional measures in this case. See further on the attitudes of addressee States Chapter XVII.

⁶³ Id., §54.

⁶⁴ Id., §63.

⁶⁵ Id., §66.

It suggested that the Court could follow the reasoning of the ECtHR in Loizidou v. Turkey, ‘which declared that ratione loci restrictions could be severed from the declaration of acceptance leaving intact the acceptance of the optional clauses’.⁶⁶

One common feature in the approach of the human rights adjudicators to this issue is their emphasis on arguments about the object and purpose of human rights treaties as instruments of public order and collective enforcement. In Loizidou, for instance, the ECtHR stated that the European Convention is a constitutional instrument of the European public order.⁶⁷ It noted that the Convention comprised ‘more than mere reciprocal engagements between contracting states. It creates over and above a network of mutual, bilateral undertakings, objective obligations, which, in the words of the Preamble (of the ECHR) benefit from a collective enforcement’.⁶⁸ Equally, with regard to the ACHR the Inter-American Court has considered that recognition of its binding jurisdiction ‘is an ironclad clause to which there can be no limitations except those expressly provided for in Article 62(1) of the American Convention. Because the clause is so fundamental to the operation of the Convention’s system of protection, it cannot be at the mercy of limitations not already stipulated but invoked by States Parties for internal reasons’.⁶⁹

“The States Parties to the Convention must guarantee compliance with its provisions and its effects (effet utile) within their own domestic laws. This principle applies not only to the substantive provisions of human rights treaties (in other words, the clauses on the protected rights), but also to the procedural provisions, such as the one concerning recognition of the Tribunal’s contentious jurisdiction (footnote omitted). That clause, essential to the efficacy of the mechanism of international protection, must be interpreted and applied in such a way that the guarantee that it establishes is truly practical and effective, given the special nature of human rights treaties (...) and their collective enforcement”.⁷⁰

The case law of the human rights adjudicators appears to indicate that once a State has pre-committed itself to human rights obligations and supervisory mechanisms, it cannot easily move backwards anymore. From the moment a State has accepted the Court’s compulsory jurisdiction, this jurisdiction had become an intrinsic component of the guarantees available to individuals in that State.

The Inter-American Court has pointed out, among others in Benjamin et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago (2001), that the restrictions included in the instrument of acceptance, in the terms proposed by the State, would lead to a situation where the Court would have the Inter-American Convention only as a subsidiary parameter of reference and the Constitution of the State as the first parameter. This would result in a fragmentation of the international legal order for the protec-

⁶⁶ Id., §68.

⁶⁷ ECtHR Loizidou v. Turkey, judgment of 23 March 1995. See also. e.g. Oellers-Frahm (2001b), pp. 82-83.

⁶⁸ ECtHR Ireland v. UK, judgment of 18 January 1978, §239. In general on the movement of the ECtHR towards an approach that is more conducive to an effective protection of human rights and the fact that this also applies to the analysis of the notion of jurisdiction, Cohen-Jonathan (2005c).

⁶⁹ IACHR Constitutional Court case (Peru) 24 September 1999 (Competence), §35; Ivcher Bronstein, Judgment of 24 September 1999 (Competence), §36; see also Blake v. Guatemala (Reparations), Judgment of 22 January 1999, Concurring Opinion of Judge A.A. Cançado Trindade, §§23 and 27-28.

⁷⁰ IACHR Constitutional Court case (Peru) 24 September 1999 (competence), §36.

tion of human rights and make illusory the object and purpose of the Convention.⁷¹ This was manifestly incompatible with the object and purpose of the Convention as a whole.⁷²

It has noted that ‘as with any court or tribunal’ it has the inherent authority to determine the scope of its own competence. It emphasised that it ‘must give an interpretation to the declaration of the State, as a whole, that is in accordance with the canons and practice of International Law in general, and with International Human Rights Law specifically’.⁷³ In this respect the balance should be tipped by the law awarding the greatest degree of protection to the human beings under its guardianship’.⁷⁴ This prerogative it could not abdicate, ‘as it is a duty that the American Convention imposes upon it, requiring it to exercise its functions in accordance with Article 62(3) thereof’.⁷⁵ Like the HRC, the ECtHR and Inter-American Commission, it opted for a severability approach.⁷⁶

With regard to interpretation methods and its jurisdictional role the Inter-American Court has noted:

“Interpreting the Convention in accordance with its object and purpose the Court must act in a manner that preserves the integrity of the mechanism provided for in Article 62(1) of the Convention. It would be unacceptable to subordinate said mechanism to restrictions that would render the system for protection of human rights established in the Convention, and, as a result, the Court’s jurisdictional role, inoperative”.⁷⁷

It also mentioned its earlier jurisprudence on the principle of effet utile that applied not only to the substantive provisions of human rights treaties but to their procedural provisions as well. In that light, the provision concerning recognition of the Court’s contentious jurisdiction, a provision ‘essential to the efficacy of the mechanism of international protection’, was to be ‘interpreted and applied in such a way that the guarantee it establishes is truly practical and effective, given the special nature of human rights treaties and their collective enforcement’.⁷⁸

2.3.4 Distinguishing the ICJ approach to jurisdiction

It is clear that allegations of lack of competence on the merits do play a role in the considerations of adjudicators faced with a request for provisional measures. At the same time it is noteworthy that in their determination of prima facie jurisdiction at the stage of provisional measures the human rights adjudicators have taken into account the irreparable harm faced by the petitioners. The HRC’s provisional measures in Kennedy (1999) provide a clear example. While some of the ⁷¹ IACHR Judgment of Benjamin et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago (competence), 1 September 2001, §84. See also the cases Hilaire et al. and Constantine et al. of the same date.

⁷² Id., §79.

⁷³ IACHR Constantine et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago, 1 September 2001 (Preliminary Objections), §70.

⁷⁴ Id., §70.

⁷⁵ Id., §71.

⁷⁶ See also, e.g., IACHR Caesar v. Trinidad & Tobago, 11 March 2005, Concurring Opinion of Judge A.A. Cançado Trindade, §§21-46, with a literature overview with regard to reservations and stressing the convergence of approaches by the supervisory bodies on the one hand, and the fragmentation resulting from the traditional approach based on the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, on the other.

⁷⁷ Id., §73.

⁷⁸ Id., §74, referring to Constitutional Court case, Judgment of 24 September 1999 (Competence), §36 and Ivcher Bronstein case, Judgment of 24 September 1999 (Competence), §37.

Committee members dissented as to the jurisdiction of the Committee to deal with the case – because they did not believe that incompatible reservations could be severed from the ratification –, they specifically pointed out that they did agree with the prior decision to take provisional measures.⁷⁹

Even if the ICJ is less likely than human rights adjudicators to order provisional measures in the face of doubts about its jurisdiction, there are indications that some members of the Court are open to the severability approach of the human rights adjudicators, as an appropriate development of international law when dealing with fundamental human rights.⁸⁰ If the ICJ's approach to this issue would be likely to change, it is possible that it would order provisional measures despite reservations to compromissory clauses in treaties involving human rights.

As Judge Cançado Trindade has pointed out, the case law of the Inter-American Court had 'discarded an analogy with the permissive practice of the States' under Art. 36(2) ICJ Statute (the optional clause of the ICJ's compulsory jurisdiction).⁸¹ After all, while the optional clauses recognising the compulsory jurisdiction of the Inter-American Court and the ECtHR (before Protocol 11) were inspired on the optional clause of the ICJ, these adjudicators had interpreted the 'rationale of the application of the optional clause (...) in a fundamentally distinct way'.⁸² In light of their protective function of these human rights courts, he noted, they have taken a human rights perspective, where 'considerations of ordre public' prevail over the traditional State voluntarism. In this context States cannot count on the same level of discretion they have reserved for themselves in the traditional context of the purely interstate contentious proceedings.⁸³ After all human rights treaties are aimed at 'the accomplishment of a common goal, superior to the individual interests of each Contracting party'.⁸⁴ In fact, he noted, even at the purely inter-State level the optional clause of the compulsory jurisdiction has become dated. The ICJ is now faced with an arrangement from the 1920s that became stratified by the decision to copy it from the PCIJ to the ⁷⁹ HRC Kennedy v. Trinidad and Tobago, admissibility decision of 2 November 1999, dissenting opinion by Ando (Japan), Bhagwati (India), Klein (Germany) and Kretzmer (Israel).

⁸⁰ See Chapter I (ICJ) and the individual opinion in ICJ Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (new application: 2002) (Congo v. Rwanda), Judgment on jurisdiction of the Court and admissibility of the application of 3 February 2006, Separate Opinion Judges Higgins, Kooijmans, Elaraby, Owada and Simma, e.g. §16: "The practice of such bodies is not to be viewed as 'making an exception' to the law as determined in 1951 by the International Court; we take the view that it is rather a development to cover what the Court was never asked at that time, and to address new issues that have arisen subsequently".

⁸¹ IACHR Judgment on preliminary objections in Constantine et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago, 1 September 2001, Separate Opinion of judge Cançado Trindade, §3, referring to Constitutional Court and Ivcher Bronstein.

⁸² Id. §4.

⁸³ Id., §20. In addition, he noted, States cannot sustain the argument that that which is not prohibited is permitted. This approach, he stated, would be equal to the traditional and outdated attitude of laissez faire, characteristic of an international legal order fragmented by subjective State voluntarism. In legal history such voluntarism inevitably favoured the most powerful. Thus in the field of human rights it is the reverse logic that must prevail: what is not permitted is prohibited, §24. Cançado Trindade stressed the importance of the nature of the treaty involved when considering the meaning and scope of a statement of acceptance of an optional clause laying down compulsory jurisdiction. This nature, he wrote, corresponds to the second element forming the general rule of interpretation of treaties (Article 31 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties): context, §31.

⁸⁴ Id., §4. See also ECtHR Loizidou v. Turkey, 23 March 1995 (preliminary objections), §70, referring to a system of collective enforcement of human rights.

ICJ Statute, yet international law as such has gradually evolved away from traditional State voluntarism.⁸⁵ He noted that obviously the ‘distorted and incongruous practice’ developed under Article 36(2) of the ICJ Statute cannot be taken as an example or model to be followed by States parties to human rights treaties with regard to the extent of their jurisdictional basis.⁸⁶

In this respect the question arises of the relevance to the ICJ of the practice of human rights adjudicators to use provisional measures also in the face of objections with regard to their jurisdiction (e.g. based on a State’s reservations). While the ICJ seems to have been inspired by the developments in international human rights law that have taken place in the last decades and should indeed consult the jurisprudence of human rights adjudicators if it is dealing with requests for provisional measures, it is arguable that, given Article 36(2) ICJ Statute, the developments with regard to jurisdiction cannot easily be transferred to the jurisprudence of the ICJ. Nevertheless, especially with regard to its jurisdiction based on the compromissory clauses in human rights-related treaties (such as the legality of reservations to the compromissory clause in the Genocide Convention), it could certainly draw inspiration from the developments in human rights jurisprudence, away from state voluntarism.⁸⁷ This would be warranted by the effet utile of these treaties.⁸⁸

Like the power to decide on contested jurisdiction, the power to use provisional measures equally is essential to the efficacy of the system of international protection. The two are interrelated and both require an interpretation taking into account the effet utile of the treaty system.⁸⁹ For the use of provisional measures the prima facie jurisdiction of the Court is sufficient.

2.4 The Inter-American Court’s jurisdiction to maintain provisional measures in matters that will never be brought to it on the merits

The Inter-American Court, like the other adjudicators, often points out that its use of provisional measures does not imply a prejudgment on the merits, but rather is based on the State’s procedural obligations under the Convention. This remark could be relevant to explain the use of provisional measures in cases with which – at a later stage – the Court will not be able to deal. An argument based on the separate jurisdiction of Article 63(2) ACHR could apply to cases that the Commission failed to bring before the Court in time for it to deal with them on the merits. The Court could be considered to have jurisdiction because the State’s procedural obligations are not limited to the proceedings on Preliminary Objections, merits and reparation but are also based on the Court’s provisional measures ordered under Article 63(2) ACHR.

In this respect a particularly striking issue that the Inter-American Court has had to deal with was the execution by Trinidad and Tobago of Mr. Briggs. In its Order of 25 May 1999 the ⁸⁵ IACHR Judgment on preliminary objections in Constantine et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago, 1 September 2001, Separate Opinion of judge Cançado Trindade, §13.

⁸⁶ Id., §12.

⁸⁷ See also Chapter I (ICJ), section 4, under the heading ‘The development of international law and Article IX Genocide Convention as a jurisdictional basis for provisional measures’.

⁸⁸ On effet utile/the principle of effectiveness see e.g. ECtHR Soering v. UK, 7 July 1989, §87; Loizidou v. Turkey, 23 March 1995 (preliminary objections), §70; Mamatkulov v. Turkey, 4 February 2005 (Grand Chamber), §123; and IACHR Constitutional Court case, September 1999, (judgment on competence), §23. These cases make clear that the ECtHR and IACHR also apply this principle to the interpretation of standards generally referred to as ‘procedural’. This is not surprising as substantive and procedural human rights law cannot be artificially separated, see also Chapter XVI (Legal status).

⁸⁹ See also Chapter XVI (Legal status).

Court decided to maintain the provisional measures ordered on behalf of Mr. Briggs ‘until such time as the Court, having previously considered the reports concerning the present status of his Case, issues a decision on this matter’.⁹⁰ The Commission had previously requested the Court to order provisional measures on his behalf and the Court had done so. In the meantime, the Commission had issued a final report in his case, but had failed to bring the case itself before the Court.⁹¹

In response, Trinidad had argued that the Court had no longer any competence to maintain the provisional measures.⁹²

In the aforementioned Order the Court refuted this argument and maintained the measures. It did not specify, however, their duration other than ‘until such time as the Court (...) issues a decision on this matter’.⁹³ For lack of explanation in the Order itself, it is necessary to resort to the concurring opinions dealing with the issue. Judge Cançado Trindade pointed out that the Court only had a few hours to decide on the subject but that, in his understanding, its decision contributed to ‘the fulfilment of the object and purpose’ of the ACHR, preserved ‘the integrity of the mechanism of supervision’ of the Convention and reflected ‘the juridical nature of the provisional measures of protection, complying with the basic and indispensable requisite of juridical security’.⁹⁴ With regard to the competence of the Court he pointed out that the subject fell under its jurisdiction from the moment the Court received the Commission’s initial request for provisional measures.

“The fact that, subsequent to its request, the Commission came to adopt, in the specific case pertaining to Mr. Anthony Briggs, the Reports under Articles 50 and 51, respectively, of the

⁹⁰ IACHR James et al., Order for provisional measures, 25 May 1999.

⁹¹ The Commission had brought the case, which was then still pending before it, before the Court for the purpose of obtaining provisional measures of protection. It had found a violation of Article 7(5) ACHR because Trinidad failed to bring the petitioner to trial within a reasonable time. Briggs had been in pre-trial detention for three years and three months. The Commission recommended the State to compensate him and give consideration to his early release or commutation of the sentence. It did not bring this case before the Court to deal with it on the merits within the period of three months from the date of the transmittal to the State. Instead, it published its opinions and conclusions in this matter. CIDH Anthony Briggs v. Trinidad and Tobago, 15 April 1999. (One interesting response by the State was the following: “As regards the possible breach of Article 6(6), it is submitted that the punishment to be inflicted on the petitioner under the laws of Trinidad and Tobago does not consist of deprivation of liberty, but death by hanging. Accordingly, the reform and social readaptation of the petitioner is irrelevant at this time”). Later the Commission affirmed its report and made it public (15 April 1999). The next day Trinidad rejected the Commission’s recommendations and declared that ‘the law should take its course’. IACHR James et al., Order for provisional measures, 25 May 1999, ‘Considering’ clause 1(f).

⁹² Early February 1999 Trinidad requested the Court to ‘confirm’ that its Order of August 1998 was ‘discharged in so far as it relates to [him]’. IACHR James et al., Communication of the State of 5 February 1999 in: Order for provisional measures, 25 May 1999, ‘Considering’ clause 1(d). A month later the State requested the Court once more to confirm that its Order for provisional measures with regard to Mr. Briggs was now discharged.

⁹³ Judge De Roux Rengifo attached a concurring opinion to the Order referring to the problem of duration but not fully addressing it: he spoke of a ‘reasonable length of time’. IACHR James et al., Concurring Opinion of Judge De Roux Rengifo, Order for provisional measures, 25 May 1999.

⁹⁴ Presumably this is a reference to legal certainty for the petitioner, as the vulnerable party in human rights adjudication.

American Convention, does not mean that the examination of the case is already concluded under the inter-American system of protection of human rights".⁹⁵

He pointed out that while the Commission had concluded its examination of the case, the matter remained pending under the jurisdiction of the Court, 'as the supreme organ of interpretation and application of the American Convention'.⁹⁶ This understanding, he wrote, found support in the Court's Order of August 1998 to take all necessary measures to preserve the life and physical integrity of, among others, Mr. Briggs, so as 'not to hinder the processing of their cases before the inter-American system'.⁹⁷ In other words the Court did not refer to the Commission alone, but to 'the inter-American system' as a whole. The case must be pending before the Commission for it to be able to request the Court to order provisional measures, but this requirement only applies with regard to the moment triggering the Court's jurisdiction. Once set in motion it 'cannot be affected in any way by the subsequent conduct or action by the parties (in contentious matter), or of the requesting State or organ (in advisory matter), or of the Commission as the organ requesting provisional measures of protection'.⁹⁸

He pointed out that nothing in Article 63(2) ACHR made the consideration of the subject by the Court dependent on the proceedings before the Commission. A contrary interpretation would make the Court's power to continue considering a given matter, in which it was competent to supervise its own provisional measures, conditional upon the subsequent conduct of the organ requesting such measures, in this case the Commission.⁹⁹ The Court's inherent power to determine the extent of its own competence applied to its advisory and contentious jurisdiction as well as to its competence to order provisional measures. He reiterated that the Inter-American Court is guardian and master of its own jurisdiction and the American Convention has given it an important role in the construction of an Inter-American ordre public for the protection of human rights.¹⁰⁰

Judge De Roux Rengifo added the following arguments in support of the Court's decision to 'maintain, for at least a reasonable length of time, the provisional measures ordered on behalf of Anthony Briggs'.¹⁰¹ Pointing out that the circumstances of the Briggs case were unique, he referred to the fact that the Commission had already submitted the 'reports to which articles 50 and 51 of the American Convention on Human Rights refer'. 'One would have thought', he said, 'that provisional measures would have become superfluous once the reports in question were issued', in particular the Article 51 Report.

"But matters are not so simple. Were the Court to call for the measures to be lifted immediately, it would be disregarding the absolutes that follow from a full and balanced interpretation of the provisions of chapters VI, VII and VIII of the Pact of San José, which define the structure of the inter-American system for the protection of human rights and legislate the membership and functions of the organs of that system, which must work in tandem to accomplish the system's

⁹⁵ IACHR James et al., Order for provisional measures, 25 May 1999, Concurring Opinion of Judge Cançado Trindade, §3.

⁹⁶ Id., §4.

⁹⁷ Id., §4., referring to the 2nd 'Decisional' clause.

⁹⁸ Id., §5.

⁹⁹ Id., §6.

¹⁰⁰ Id., §§7-8.

¹⁰¹ IACHR James et al., Order for provisional measures, 25 May 1999, Concurring opinion of Judge De Roux Rengifo.

purposes. Had it not prolonged the life of the provisional measures, the Court would have been disregarding the combined scope of articles 50, 51 and 63(2) of the Convention”.¹⁰²

He referred to the Court’s Judgment in the Loayza Tamayo case, holding that if a State ratifies an international treaty, especially on human rights, ‘it has the obligation to make every effort to apply the recommendation of a protection organ such as the Inter-American Commission’ in accordance with the principle of good faith as laid down in Article 31(1) of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties.¹⁰³ This obligation has ‘multiple ramifications’.

“Clearly the State must take a constructive attitude towards those recommendations, carefully and deliberately study the steps and measures it must take to comply with them, find ways to sort out any obstacles that might prevent it from taking the measures in question, and apply the measures to the fullest should the obstacles prove not to be insurmountable”.¹⁰⁴

In this light ‘the Court could hardly deny the protection of its provisional measures to anyone whose rights had been protected by express recommendations of the Inter-American Commission, right from the time those recommendations became final’.¹⁰⁵ He then proceeded with the following argument:

“When articles 50, 51 and 63.2 are read in combination, it becomes clear that the proper course of action is to prolong those measures for a reasonable period, so as to ensure that a timeframe can be established during which the State truly makes “every effort to apply the recommendations [...] of the Inter-American Commission” before any irreparable harm is done (which in the instant case means before Anthony Briggs is executed)”.¹⁰⁶

In light of the concurring opinions attached to the Order of the Court it is possible to interpret the Court’s order as follows: by maintaining the provisional measures on behalf of Mr. Briggs, the Court in fact confirms the Commission’s approach to follow-up (‘seguimiento’) of its cases.¹⁰⁷ A case is not closed until it has been complied with. In matters in which the Commission requested the Court to order provisional measures, these measures continue to apply even when the Commission has published an Article 51 Report and has not sent the case to the Court for consideration on the merits. As long as the case was indeed pending before the Commission at the time it requested the Court’s provisional measures, the Court maintains its jurisdiction to continue its provisional measures under Article 63(2), despite the fact that the case did not and will not reach it for a determination on the merits. Cançado Trindade explained this by pointing out that once the Court’s jurisdiction has been established, it cannot be taken away by acts or omissions of others. De Roux Rengifo added that the case would still be pending until there had been some form of follow-up by the State on the Commission’s recommendations, justifying maintenance of provisional measures.

A domestic Court believed differently. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (London) considered that the Inter-American Court had no jurisdiction to maintain its provisional

¹⁰² Ibid.

¹⁰³ IACHR Loayza Tamayo case, Judgment of 17 September 1997, §80.

¹⁰⁴ IACHR Concurring Opinion of Judge De Roux Rengifo, James et al., Order for provisional measures, 25 May 1999. See also Chapter XVI (Legal Status).

¹⁰⁵ IACHR James et al., Order for provisional measures, 25 May 1999, Concurring opinion of Judge De Roux Rengifo.

¹⁰⁶ Ibid.

¹⁰⁷ See also Chapter XVII (Official responses).

measures on behalf of Mr. Briggs once the Commission had published its Report on the merits in his case. The Privy Council expressed its expectation that national courts would give ‘great weight to the jurisprudence of the Inter-American Court’. At the same time it would be ‘abdicating’ its duty if it ‘were to adopt an interpretation of the Convention’, which it considered ‘untenable’. In this respect the Judicial Committee considered that the Court had no power to adopt provisional measures once the proceedings were complete. “Once the processing of the case was complete, the order automatically expired”. The Commission had made its findings of fact and it had made ‘recommendations with which the State has not complied, but it is not bound to do so’. The Commission had failed to bring the case before the Court and there was ‘no longer any lis’.¹⁰⁸ Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead dissented. He pointed out that by acceding to the Convention the State ‘intended to confer benefits on its citizens. The benefits were intended to be real, not illusory. The Inter-American system of human rights was not intended to be a hollow sham or, for those under sentence of death, a cruel charade’. He criticised the State’s position that the Inter-American Court had no jurisdiction to make its Order of May 1999 and emphasised that the jurisdiction of the Inter-American Court ‘is a matter within the sole jurisdiction of that court’. “Thus, it is not for the courts of the State parties to the Convention to decide the scope of the Inter-American Court’s jurisdiction”.¹⁰⁹

During the subsequent proceedings before the Inter-American Court, mainly involving the other persons covered in the provisional measures, Trinidad also gave its position on the execution of Briggs despite the Court’s provisional measures. It pointed out that ‘after the Commission decided to publish its Article 51 report, there was no matter pending before the Commission, nor any matter pending before the Court, nor any other matter capable of being submitted to the Court’. It concluded its argument with the statement that ‘after the Commission so decided, the Court had no power to adopt provisional measures. The Court’s purported Order of 25 May 1999 was made without jurisdiction and, therefore, was null’.¹¹⁰ The Court did not comment any further on the issue of its jurisdiction to maintain its provisional measures in these circumstances. It simply pointed out that under Article 68(1) ACHR States Parties undertake to comply with the judgment of the Court in any case to which they are parties, that they should fully comply with all the provisions of the Convention in good faith and that States must refrain from taking action that may frustrate restitutio in integrum.¹¹¹

Yet on subsequent occasions it has interpreted the phrase ‘case not yet submitted to the Court’ in Article 63(2) ACHR ‘to imply, at least, the possibility of bringing the issue that is the subject-matter of the provisional measures to the adjudicatory jurisdiction of the Court’.¹¹²

Obviously it is the Court itself that determines its own competence, not a State or a domestic Court. The Court has the inherent power to determine the scope of its own competence (compétence de la compétence/Kompetenz-Kompetenz) both in its Orders and in its decisions on admissibility, merits and reparation. It is not allowed to subordinate the mechanisms foreseen in the ¹⁰⁸ JCPC Briggs v Cipriani Baptiste (Commissioner of Prisons) and Others (Trinidad and Tobago) [1999] UKPC 45 (28 October 1999). See further Chapter XVII (Official responses).

¹⁰⁹ JCPC Dissenting Opinion by Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead, Briggs v Cipriani Baptiste (Commissioner of Prisons) and Others (Trinidad and Tobago) [1999] UKPC 45 (28 October 1999).

¹¹⁰ IACHR James et al., Order for provisional measures, 16 August 2000, 13th ‘Having seen’ clause.

¹¹¹ Id., 11th ‘Considering’ clause.

¹¹² See e.g. IACHR Matter of García Uribe et al. (Mexico), Order of 2 February 2006, 3rd ‘Considering’ clause; Matter of Capital El Rodeo I & El Rodeo II Judicial Confinement Center (Venezuela), 8 February 2008, 5th ‘Considering’ clause and Tyrone Dacosta Cadogan (Barbados), Order of the President of 4 November 2008, 4th ‘Considering’ clause.

ACHR to restrictions that undermine the function of the tribunal and, for that matter, the protective system laid down in the Convention.¹¹³

In another context the court has also distinguished between on the one hand the preventive nature ('cautelar') of provisional measures in international adversarial cases, aimed at the preservation of the proceedings and at the eventual execution of the decisions on the merits, and on the other hand the protective nature ('tutelar') of its measures.¹¹⁴ This implies a transformation of its provisional measures into a 'true judicial guarantee' of a preventive nature, 'since they protect human rights inasmuch as they are intended to avoid irreparable harm to persons'.¹¹⁵ It has pointed out that 'in view of the protective nature of the provisional measures the Tribunal may order such measures even when there is not exactly an adversarial case in the Inter-American system, in situations that, prima facie, may result in a serious and urgent impairment of human rights'.¹¹⁶ This means that the Court must make 'an assessment of the proposed problem, the effectiveness of the State measures regarding the described situation and the degree of lack of protection in which the people requesting the measures would be if such measures are not adopted'. For an appropriate assessment the Court depends for a great deal on the information provided by the Commission. Thus it has pointed out that it is essential that the Commission 'submits a sufficient ground to comprise the already mentioned criteria and that the State fails to show, in a clear and sufficient way, the effectiveness of the specific measures adopted within the domestic jurisdiction'.¹¹⁷

In his separate opinion Judge García Ramírez notes that the distinction between the preventive and the protective nature of the Court's provisional measures is more a matter of emphasis and in each case there is both 'a protective (protection of human rights) and cautionary (preservation of the suit at law) purpose'.¹¹⁸ He points out, correctly that also when the Court orders provisional measures in matters that are still before the Commission there is a preventive as well as a protective function to these provisional measures. After all, they aim to protect 'the suit at law that eventually will be brought before the Court, as well as the effect of the final decision resulting from such case', but apart from that also simply the proceedings before the Commission itself that would become ineffective if faced with violations.¹¹⁹

¹¹³ See e.g. IACHR Cases Liliana Ortega et al.; Luisiana Ríos et al.; Luis Uzcátegui; Marta Colomina and Liliana Velásquez (Venezuela), Order for provisional measures of 4 May 2004, 8th 'Considering' clause, referring e.g. to Hilaire, Constantine and Benjamin et al., Judgment of 21 June 2002, §19.

¹¹⁴ IACHR Matter of Capital El Rodeo I and el Rodeo II Judicial Confinement Center, Order of 8 February 2008, 7th 'Considering' clause (see Spanish text).

¹¹⁵ See e.g. IACHR Matter of Capital El Rodeo I and el Rodeo II Judicial Confinement Center, Order of 8 February 2008, 8th 'Considering' clause (paraphrased part is derived from the Spanish text rather than the translation).

¹¹⁶ IACHR Matter of Capital El Rodeo I and el Rodeo II Judicial Confinement Center, Order of 8 February 2008, 9th 'Considering' clause.

¹¹⁷ Ibid.

¹¹⁸ IACHR Matter of Capital El Rodeo I and el Rodeo II Judicial Confinement Center, Order of 8 February 2008, separate opinion Judge García Ramírez, §9 (Spanish text, not the translation).

¹¹⁹ IACHR Matter of Capital El Rodeo I and el Rodeo II Judicial Confinement Center, Order of 8 February 2008, separate opinion Judge García Ramírez, §10 (paraphrased text is derived from the Spanish text).

2.5 Use of provisional measures beyond inadmissibility or beyond judgments on the merits and reparation

The HRC has occasionally maintained provisional measures beyond inadmissibility and CAT has done so once too. To start with the latter, in B. M'B. v. Tunisia CAT took provisional measures in April 1994 'to ensure that no harm is done to the author's family, the alleged victim's family or the witnesses and their families'.¹²⁰ It later declared the case inadmissible because the petitioner had not submitted sufficient proof to establish his authority to act on behalf of the victim. At the same time it maintained its provisional measures.

As to the practice of the HRC, in some of its early death penalty cases the HRC maintained provisional measures beyond the inadmissibility decision. In the period July 1988 to July 1994 it declared many cases inadmissible, but at the same time referred to the possibility of review.¹²¹ In the meantime it requested the State party not to execute the petitioners before they had had a reasonable time, after completing the effective domestic remedies available to them, to request the Committee to review the previous decision in their case. In general, in these cases provisional measures were used twice, both before deciding on admissibility and as part of the inadmissibility decision. Those cases about which the HRC specifically noted that they were open to review dealt with exhaustion of local remedies. In such cases the Committee maintained its provisional measures beyond the inadmissibility decision in order to enable the petitioners to re-submit the case upon exhaustion of local remedies.¹²²

In total, the HRC maintained its provisional measures following inadmissibility declarations in twenty cases between July 1988 and July 1994. In several of these cases it requested the State

¹²⁰ CAT B. M'B. v. Tunisia, 5 May 1994, §5(c).

¹²¹ Under Rule 92(2) of the Rules of Procedure.

¹²² In ten cases between July 1988 and July 1990 it maintained the provisional measures by explaining that it could review the inadmissibility decision, under Rule 92(2) of its rules of procedure, 'upon receipt of a written request by or on behalf of the author to the effect that the reasons for inadmissibility no longer apply'. It requested the State, 'taking into account the spirit and purpose' of its Rule on provisional measures, 'not to carry out the death sentence against the author, before he has had reasonable time after completing the effective domestic remedies available to him to request the Committee to review the present decision'. Five inadmissibility decisions of 26 July 1988, one of October 1989 and four of 13 July 1990: HRC O.W. v. Jamaica, 26 July 1988; C.J. v. Jamaica, 26 July 1988; L.C. et al. v. Jamaica, 26 July 1988, annex VIII, section J (pp. 269-271); L.G. v. Jamaica, 26 July 1988; L.S. v. Jamaica, 26 July 1988; A.A. v. Jamaica, 30 October 1989; L.R. and T.W. v. Jamaica, 13 July 1990; D.B. v. Jamaica, 13 July 1990; C.B. v. Jamaica, 13 July 1990 and N.C. v. Jamaica, 13 July 1990. Four years later it returned to this formulation in the last cases in which it maintained its provisional measures until the petitioner would have had reasonable time, after completing the available remedies, to request the HRC to review its inadmissibility decision. HRC Denzil Roberts v. Barbados, 19 July 1994 and Peter Bradshaw v. Barbados, 19 July 1994. Between October 1990 and July 1992 equally maintained its provisional measures in these cases but during this period it simply referred to its provisional measures without reference to the spirit and purpose of Rule 86. HRC W.W. v. Jamaica, 26 October 1990; R.M. v. Jamaica, 26 October 1990; E.B. v. Jamaica, 26 October 1990; A.H. v. Trinidad and Tobago, 31 October 1990; D.D. v. Jamaica, 11 April 1991; M.F. v. Jamaica, 21 October 1991; M.F. v. Jamaica, 17 July 1992, 335/1988 (not the same author as M.F. in 233/1987) and R.W. v. Jamaica, 21 July 1992. Apart from this the formulation was the same.

to provide the petitioner with the relevant court documents in order to be able to exhaust domestic remedies.¹²³

In three non-exhaustion cases, however, it only pointed out that its decision was open to review, but it did not maintain its provisional measures.¹²⁴ The first case was when it declared inadmissible Guerra and Wallen v. Trinidad and Tobago (1995).¹²⁵ It deeply regretted that the State was 'not prepared to give the undertaking requested by the Committee' in its provisional measure, 'apparently because it considers itself bound by the conservatory order issued by the Court of Appeal on 29 April 1994'.¹²⁶ The HRC considered that, in fact, 'this situation should have made it easier for the State party to confirm that there would be no obstacles to acceding to the Committee's request; to do so would, in any event, have been compatible with the State party's international obligations'.¹²⁷ In view of the fact that the State was not prepared to respect the provisional measures taken pending the case,¹²⁸ the HRC could also have maintained them similar to the other non-exhaustion cases.

Equally, it could have done this in Hylton v. Jamaica (1994).¹²⁹ In this case the allegations under Article 14 related to the availability and the effectiveness of counsel. The claim based on Article 14 ICCPR clearly justified the HRC's use of provisional measures.¹³⁰ The petitioner had pointed out that he was notified of the date of the appeal and of the fact that a new lawyer had been assigned to him only two weeks before the hearing for his appeal. He claimed he immediately wrote to this lawyer 'explaining that he had never had the opportunity to discuss his case with his previous counsel, and that he would like to meet him prior to the hearing; if not, he would assume that counsel could not, or would not, represent him on appeal'.¹³¹ He did not receive a reply to his enquiries, but later found out that his appeal was dismissed. The HRC considered the complaint inadmissible because domestic remedies had not yet been exhausted. Within a fortnight after declaring the case inadmissible Hylton's petition to the JCPC was dismissed. Apparently, the Committee does not allow the petitioner to resubmit his claim in this respect, as it has done in earlier cases relating to non-exhaustion.

The third example is a case in which the HRC concluded that the delay could be attributed mainly to the petitioner. The Committee declared the case inadmissible for non-exhaustion but did not refer to the possibility of review nor maintained its provisional measures. One might conclude from this example that the HRC is unlikely to maintain its provisional measure beyond the admissibility declaration if the delay is attributable to the petitioner.¹³²

Finally, the HRC has also declared cases inadmissible in situations that did not lend themselves to review and did not involve the issue of exhaustion of domestic remedies either. Obviously, in such cases it did not maintain its provisional measures. While it declared one case inadmissible observing that this did not exclude humanitarian measures on behalf of the petitioner, ¹²³ See e.g. HRC L.R. and T.W. v. Jamaica, 13 July 1990; D.B. v. Jamaica, 13 July 1990; C.B. v. Jamaica, 13 July 1990; N.C. v. Jamaica, 13 July 1990; W.W. v. Jamaica, 26 October 1990; R.M. v. Jamaica, 26 October 1990; E.B. v. Jamaica, 26 October 1990 and D.D. v. Jamaica, 11 April 1991.

¹²⁴ See e.g. HRC C.F. v. Jamaica, 28 July 1992 and Guerra and Wallen v. Trinidad and Tobago, 4 April 1995 (while Wallen had since died, Guerra was still awaiting execution).

¹²⁵ HRC Lincoln Guerra and Brian Wallen v. Trinidad and Tobago, 4 April 1995.

¹²⁶ Id., §6.5.

¹²⁷ Ibid.

¹²⁸ See the discussion in Chapter XVII, section 2.2.2.

¹²⁹ HRC Dwayne Hylton v. Jamaica, 8 July 1994.

¹³⁰ See Chapter XIII on forms of reparation.

¹³¹ HRC Dwayne Hylton v. Jamaica, 8 July 1994, §2.5.

¹³² HRC N.A.J. v. Jamaica, 26 July 1990.

such as the commutation of his sentence,¹³³ in the majority of cases it did not add such an observation.¹³⁴

In sum, the HRC maintained its provisional measures beyond the decision declaring a case inadmissible for non-exhaustion of domestic remedies in cases in which court documents were missing that were necessary for domestic appeals. Moreover, it did so only for a limited period. In 1993 the HRC decided, in Collins v. Jamaica,¹³⁵ that in the absence of a written judgment from the Court of Appeal there was no reasonable prospect of success for applications to the JCPC. Hence it would no longer declare such cases inadmissible and it could simply maintain its provisional measures as part of its admissibility declaration rather than as part of its inadmissibility declaration.

Five years after it had last maintained provisional measures beyond its inadmissibility decision two members of the HRC suggested recycling this method of upholding the request for provisional measures given the possibility of review.

The Dayton Agreement (Article XI, 1(b) of Annex 6) grants the Bosnia Chamber the power ‘to include an order for provisional measures in its final decision on the merits of a case’. As discussed in Chapter II (Systems), at first sight this is a strange provision, because it grants the Chamber the power ‘to include an order for provisional measures in its final decision on the merits of a case’. Yet the Chamber seems to have found a way to interpret the provision: “This power might be used to regulate the position of the parties before the decision becomes final and binding, or pending the full implementation of the decision”.¹³⁶ As noted in Chapter II, it may often be useful pending implementation to follow up on the situation of the victims in order to make sure that nothing happens that could prevent further implementation.¹³⁷

In the Inter-American system the competence of the adjudicator is at issue in a circumstance different from that of maintaining provisional measures beyond inadmissibility in order to make sure that a petitioner is able to renew his petition upon exhaustion. The Inter-American Commission and Court often maintain their provisional measures for a long time, but what is remarkable is that these measures may be maintained, or ordered for the first time, after a judgment on the merits or reparation.¹³⁸ This is done to protect persons against death threats. In situations in which the Inter-American Court specifically orders the maintenance of provisional measures, it usually notes that the situation of ‘extreme gravity and urgency’ of the beneficiaries of the provisional ¹³³ See G. J. v. Trinidad and Tobago, 5 November 1991.

¹³⁴ A.W. v. Jamaica, 8 November 1989; G.S. v. Jamaica, 8 November 1989; N.A.J. v. Jamaica, 26 July 1990, (246/1987) (not the same petitioner as N.A.J. in 351/1989); D.S. v. Jamaica, 11 April 1991, (304/1988) (not the same petitioner as D.S. in 234/1987); D.S. v. Jamaica, 8 April 1991, (234/1987/Rev.1) (not the same petitioner as D.S. in 304/1988); N.A.J. v. Jamaica, 6 April 1992, (351/1989) (not the same petitioner as N.A.J. in 246/1987); E.E. v. Jamaica, 23 October 1992; N.P. v. Jamaica, 5 April 1993; R.M. v. Trinidad and Tobago, 29 October 1993; Errol Simms v. Jamaica, 3 April 1995; Lloyd Rogers v. Jamaica, 4 April 1995 and Christopher Bethel v. Trinidad and Tobago, 31 March 1991.

¹³⁵ Trevor Collins v. Jamaica, 25 March 1993.

¹³⁶ See Bosnia Chamber Annual Report 2000 (under the heading ‘provisional measures’).

¹³⁷ The Inter-American Court only considers a case closed once the State has fully implemented it. Before such time it may maintain provisional measures, for instance to protect witnesses. See also Chapter XVIII on follow-up.

¹³⁸ For the Commission’s precautionary measures as part of a decision on the merits see e.g. CIDH Rudolph Baptiste v. Grenada, 13 April 2000 (merits), §31.

measures is continuing and that this makes 'it imperative to require the State to maintain the provisional measures necessary to preserve their life and physical integrity'.¹³⁹

Normally one would assume that provisional measures are provisional exactly because they are issued pending a case (pendente lite) and not after the case has been closed. The Inter-American Court, however, does not consider a case closed until the State has fully implemented its judgment on the merits and its judgement on reparations. Meanwhile such cases are still 'pending'. This again shows the link between the substance of judgments on reparation, the stage of supervision and provisional measures.¹⁴⁰ In other words some of the protection offered in the Inter-American system in the form of provisional measures, is ordered while the case is not yet decided on the merits while other protection is ordered following the finding of a violation. This is so because victims or witnesses in the case in which the Court already issued a judgment may still be exposed to threats, for instance by paramilitary groups.

This approach by the Court, not considering a case closed until it has been implemented, appears to have been developed in light of the rationale behind the system of protection created under the American Convention, in the context of the cases of death threats and harassment that the Commission and Court are faced with and of the lack of actual monitoring by the OAS political organs. Again the Inter-American Court took into account the irreparable nature of the harm faced by the petitioners.

An example showing an extended duration of provisional measures involves a case that was not even pending before the Court. This is the Colotenango case. Since 1994 the Court used provisional measures on behalf of Juan Chanay Pablo and others.¹⁴¹ Meanwhile the Commission had brokered a friendly settlement in 1997.¹⁴² Nevertheless the persons involved were still receiving death threats, indicating that the case before the Commission was not yet closed, and therefore Court's provisional measures were again maintained in 2001.¹⁴³

Yet six years later the Court decided to lift the measures. While doing so it observed that 'on various occasions the State failed to present its reports or did not provide sufficient information, making it difficult for the Court to determine the actual circumstances of the beneficiaries of the measures ordered. This creates a situation of uncertainty that is incompatible with the preventative and protective nature of provisional measures'.¹⁴⁴ Nevertheless, it pointed out, 'after 13 years of having ordered the provisional measures, the main point of controversy in regards to these remains the potential danger to the beneficiaries if the apprehension orders against the former patrol officers, who escaped from prison in April 1999, are not enforced. Furthermore, the reports from the State as well as the comments from the Commission and the representatives have revolved around the investigation into the facts which gave rise to the current provisional measures as well as the effectiveness of the implementation of security measures directed towards the beneficiaries, particularly in regards to the frequency in which foot and vehicle patrols have or have ¹³⁹ See IACHR James et al., Orders for provisional measures, 16 August 2000 and 24 November 2000. In general, the Commission petitions the Court to order a stay of executions 'until such time as the Commission has had the opportunity to examine and decide these cases pursuant to the Convention and the Commission's Regulations', James et al., Order of 29 August 1998. At other times the Commission specifies this by adding 'and until the situation of extreme gravity and urgency no longer persists in relation to these individuals'. See e.g. James et al., Orders of 27 May 1999 and 25 September 1999.

¹⁴⁰ See Chapter XIII (Protection).

¹⁴¹ See Colotenango case (Guatemala), Orders of 22 June 1994 until 5 September 2001.

¹⁴² CIDH Juan Chanay Pablo v. Guatemala, 13 March 1997 (Friendly Settlement).

¹⁴³ See IACHR Colotenango case, Order of 5 September 2001.

¹⁴⁴ Id., 8th 'Considering' clause.

not occurred, in order to protect the boundaries of the community”.¹⁴⁵ It considered that the Commission was to monitor this as part of the obligations entered into in the Friendly Settlement agreement brokered by it. The Court did observe that removing the provisional measures did not mean that the State had complied with its obligations under the ACHR.¹⁴⁶

Thus on the one hand the Court does not consider a case closed until its judgment on reparations has been fully implemented. In this light it has sometimes maintained some of its Orders for provisional measures. This use of provisional measures during the stage of monitoring compliance with its judgments is a significant extension of the traditional concept of provisional measures. On the other hand, more recently it has referred situations that it previously dealt with through provisional measures, to its supervision of compliance procedure, issuing orders on State’s compliance with its judgments.¹⁴⁷ Moreover, in the above Colotenango case, that never made it to the Court on the merits, after 13 years it decided to lift the provisional measures and refer the petitioners to the Commission for supervision of compliance with the Commission’s Report in that case. While doing so it did not say it was changing its approach to its jurisdiction to use provisional measures until after a judgment on the merits or reparation. Its recent practice simply indicates that, in the absence of concrete and recent information on death threats, it will deal with these matters through its procedure on supervision of compliance with judgments instead.¹⁴⁸

While the practice of the Inter-American Court and the HRC is triggered in different legal contexts (making sure there is no gap in treaty protection between exhaustion and submitting a case; making sure the judgments are fully implemented and meanwhile the petitioners or others involved are not receiving death threats), their underlying rationale appears to be the same. The irreparable nature of the harm to persons triggered an inventive approach to jurisdiction in particular, well-defined, circumstances.

¹⁴⁵ Id., 11th ‘Considering’ clause.

¹⁴⁶ Id., 14th ‘Considering’ clause.

¹⁴⁷ See e.g. IACHR Case of Comunidad Indígena Sawhoyamaya v. Paraguay, Order of 2 February 2007 on supervision of compliance, 9th and 12th ‘Considering’ clause.

¹⁴⁸ Yet see Order on supervision of compliance of the IACHR cases Fermin Ramírez v. Guatemala and Raxcacó Reyes v. Guatemala and on the request to expand the provisional measures in Raxcacó Reyes y otros, 9 May 2008, in which the Court does appear to make a strict division; it argues that because Article 62(2) ACHR referred to cases of prima facie urgency while the risk of irreparable harm in these cases related to violations that have already been established by judgments of the Court that have res iudicata status, the Court did not order provisional measures but it ordered the State simply to comply with its judgment, adding specifications and noting that it would continue to monitor the situation. This reasoning does not apply, of course, to situations where witnesses and others in cases that have already been decided on the merits, or even reparations, are still being threatened. See e.g. IACHR Bámaca Velásquez v. Guatemala, Order of 27 January 2009, declaring Guatemala’s partial compliance with the Judgment on Reparations, declaring to keep open its monitoring process until full compliance is achieved and maintaining its provisional measures of 11 March 2005 (Provisional Measures and Monitoring Compliance with Judgment).

3 ADMISSIBILITY AND PROVISIONAL MEASURES

3.1 Introduction

Apart from the lack of jurisdiction on the merits there are other reasons for inadmissibility as well.¹⁴⁹ This section examines whether such inadmissibility criteria hinder the use of provisional measures in human rights adjudication.

When drafting its rules of procedure, the HRC specifically discussed the relation between admissibility of the case on the one hand and the use of provisional measures on the other (section 3.2). The Inter-American Commission sometimes uses provisional measures prior to formally opening a case, which indicates the importance it attaches to preventing irreparable harm, but at the same time may at times have undermined the stature of the measures (section 3.3). The main criterion for admissibility of a case that is relevant in the context of decision-making on the use of provisional measures is that of exhaustion of domestic remedies (section 3.4). Other admissibility criteria that could be relevant at the stage of provisional measures include the question whether the ‘same matter’ is or has been pending before another adjudicator and the question of compatibility with the treaty (section 3.5).

3.2 The HRC’s discussion on the relation between admissibility and provisional measures

While other adjudicators have also dealt with death penalty cases, relevant information with regard to the relation between admissibility of the case and the use of provisional measures in human rights adjudication is mainly found in the practice of the HRC.

Article 5(2) OP stipulates that the HRC shall declare a case inadmissible if domestic remedies have not been exhausted or if the same matter is being examined under another procedure of international investigation or settlement.

During the drafting of the rules of procedure in 1977 the issue came up whether it was necessary to determine the admissibility of the case before using provisional measures. The Rules of Procedure of CERD, the first treaty body established, stipulate that provisional measures may be used after a case has been declared admissible. In its current Rules of Procedure, Rule 94(3) still refers to the possibility of provisional measures under the heading ‘method of dealing with admissible communications’.¹⁵⁰ Thus far CERD has never used provisional measures. In any case, the requirement may be considered an anomaly.¹⁵¹ While the proposal for a rule on provisional measures by the HRC was probably inspired by the rules of CERD, it became clear during the discussions in 1977 that several members of the HRC did not wish to copy the admissibility requirement found in CERD’s Rules of Procedure.¹⁵² At the same time the HRC decided to leave open this ¹⁴⁹ CAT even explicitly notes in its Annual Reports that it has ‘conceptualized the formal and substantive criteria’ applied by its Rapporteur when granting or rejecting requests for provisional measures, pointing out that the basic admissibility criteria set out in Article 22 (1)-(5) ICAT must be met, although the requirement of exhaustion can be dispensed with in some circumstances (see section 3.4 of this Chapter). See e.g. CAT Annual Report A/61/44 (2005/2006), §61.

¹⁵⁰ CERD/C/35/Rev.3, 1 January 1989.

¹⁵¹ If at one point CERD would consider using provisional measures it may be expected that it will adapt its Rules in order to make effective use of such measures.

¹⁵² Sir Vincent Evans (UK) expected that the procedure for determining admissibility would take time and he hoped that the rule on provisional measures (then rule 86) ‘would enable the question. Subsequently it did use provisional measures in advance of declaring a case admissible, as members like Opsahl and Uribe Vargas had proposed. Uribe Vargas had referred to the purpose of provisional measures, noting that the text of the rule envisaged ‘an exceptional or emergency situation in which irreparable damage to the victim might be involved’.¹⁵³ It seems that he argued from the perspective of preventing irreparable harm to persons.¹⁵⁴ In addition, Committee member Opsahl had pointed out that Article 5(2) OP ‘did not mean that the Committee should ignore such communications but only that it should not consider them on their merits until the conditions indicated in that article had been met’.¹⁵⁵ In other words, the HRC would be able to use provisional measures in advance of its determination of admissibility. His remark may imply that he considered it possible for the HRC to maintain provisional measures after declaring a case inadmissible.¹⁵⁶

Committee to deal with urgent matters on a priority basis, inasmuch as the possible need for interim measures might of itself be grounds for urgency’. Opsahl (Norway) believed that provisional measures should not be dependent on an admissibility declaration. He pointed out that the second sentence of the proposal (the requirement to inform the State that the provisional measure did not imply a determination on the admissibility or substantive validity of the claim) already made it clear that provisional measures would not prejudice the determination of admissibility or the validity of a communication. Lallah (Mauritius) suggested the replacement of the words ‘substantive validity’ with the word ‘merits’. He also suggested the replacement of the word ‘necessary’ with ‘desirable’. He noted that ‘(a) peculiar situation might arise in which a State received no hearing, and he felt that care should be taken to avoid a situation in which views might be expressed without recourse’. It is not fully clear what he meant with this remark, because also without hearings, both Parties subsequently have the opportunity to argue for or against the continuation of the provisional measures. In the sense the State does have recourse. In any case his remark does show that during the drafting of the HRC’s Rules of Procedure the issue of hearings already came up in relation to provisional measures. Summary records of the meetings of the first session, 13th meeting, 29 March 1977 and 17th meeting, 31 March 1977, Yearbook of the HRC 1977-1978, Vol. I, CCPR/1, pp. 44-46 and p. 54.

¹⁵³ Ibid.

¹⁵⁴ See Conclusion Part II with the conceptual framework proposed in this book, discussing the purpose of provisional measures in human rights adjudication.

¹⁵⁵ Summary records of the meetings of the first session, 13th meeting, 29 March 1977 and 17th meeting, 31 March 1977, Yearbook of the HRC 1977-1978, Vol. I, CCPR/1, pp. 44-46 and p. 54.

¹⁵⁶ Opsahl noted that Uribe Vargas (Colombia) ‘had correctly stated the intentions of the Protocol as a whole’. According to Uribe Vargas the HRC should view the rule ‘in the light of all the articles of the Protocol rather than just article 5’. The text of the rule envisaged ‘an exceptional or emergency situation in which irreparable damage to the victim might be involved’. He considered that a ‘human rights committee established to guarantee the implementation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights could not wait for the implementation of a rule of procedure when humanitarian questions were involved’. Given the context it can be assumed that he meant the ICCPR and not the Universal Declaration. Agreeing after all with Uribe Vargas and Opsahl, Ganji (Iran) considered that there was ‘no inconsistency between rule 86 and the Protocol’. In his view the conditions in Article 5(2) made it especially important to have a rule dealing with emergency situations ‘involving the possibility of irreparable damage’. He had initially expressed some reservations with respect to the proposed rule ‘because it might be incompatible with the conditions for the consideration of a communication by the Committee’ under Article 5(2) OP. Sir Vincent Evans suggested that they could leave open the question whether the HRC ‘might indicate the need for interim measures, prior to a determination of admissibility’. For that purpose, he proposed to replace the phrase ‘at any time’ with ‘prior to forwarding its final views’. Chairman Mavrommatis (Cyprus) suggested an amended text to incorporate this suggestion.

In any case, from the start the HRC used provisional measures in advance of determining the admissibility of the case. By appointing a Special Rapporteur, first on death penalty cases and later on New Communications, to take provisional measures between sessions it confirmed that there was no need to determine the admissibility of a case.

In 1986 the HRC used provisional measures for the first time in order to halt an execution.¹⁵⁷ It published this decision.¹⁵⁸ The next year it published separately one other provisional measure decision as well.¹⁵⁹ The texts of these decisions already show a relationship between provisional measures and the issue of admissibility. The HRC considered that it needed further factual information, in one case from the State, in the other from the petitioner, before it could examine the question of the admissibility of the case. It pointed out that it was relying on the willingness of the government of the State in question (not identified in the publication) to cooperate with it 'at this early stage in the consideration of the subject-matter'.¹⁶⁰ It requested the State party, under its Rule on provisional measures (at the time Rule 86), not to carry out the death sentence before the HRC had had 'an opportunity to consider further the question of the admissibility' of the case. In its request for information from the petitioner it posed nine specific questions about the conduct of the trial, to be answered under its Rule on the transmission of cases to the State. At least one of the questions clearly related to the issue of admissibility.¹⁶¹

In none of its inadmissibility decisions, in which it initially used provisional measures did it say anything about its earlier use of these measures. It simply used them initially and eventually declared the case inadmissible. Yet when inadmissibility is already very clear at an early stage the HRC apparently does not use provisional measures. This applies in particular to situations in which a case is likely to be declared inadmissible for lack of substantiation or failure to bring a claim (Article 2 OP and Rule 90(b) of the Rules of Procedure) or even abuse of the right of petition. Reasons for such inadmissibility include that the case is incompatible with the terms of the treaty or clearly based on incorrect interpretations of its provisions or on facts not within the scope of the treaty.

The HRC (as well as CAT) has tried to expedite proceedings by dealing with admissibility and merits together rather than consecutively. Initially Jamaica, which has long been the main addressee of the provisional measures to halt executions, often contested the Committee's admissibility decisions, usually for non-exhaustion of domestic remedies. The HRC reviewed its decisions, and usually confirmed them. Later, from early 1995 on, Jamaica and Trinidad and Tobago

Summary records of the meetings of the first session, 13th meeting, 29 March 1977 and 17th meeting, 31 March 1977, Yearbook of the HRC 1977-1978, Vol. I, CCPR/1, pp. 44-46 and p. 54. This amended text, with some minor changes, was eventually included in the HRC's first Rules of Procedure and is still applicable.

¹⁵⁷ HRC X v. S., Rule 86/91 decision of 21 July 1986. From the decision on the merits it appears this is Earl Pratt v. Jamaica.

¹⁵⁸ See its Selected Decisions vol. II, under the heading 'interlocutory decisions', CCPR/C/OP/2.

¹⁵⁹ HRC X. v. S., Rule 86/91 decision of 13 November 1987. The HRC later declared the communication inadmissible for non-exhaustion of local remedies, C.J. v. Jamaica, 26 July 1988 (inadm.), but maintained the provisional measure.

¹⁶⁰ HRC X. v. S., Rule 86/91 decision of 13 November 1987.

¹⁶¹ It dealt with the requirement of exhaustion of local remedies. This was the question whether the authorities had offered the petitioner legal aid during his trial and appeal and whether legal aid was now available for petitioning for leave to appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (JCPC). Legal aid indeed became one of the main issues in the cases before the HRC during the next few years. The other questions posed also were relevant to the issue of admissibility, to the extent that the answers could clarify compatibility with the provisions of the Covenant.

changed their attitude towards the proceedings before the HRC. Rather than arguing against admissibility and failing to submit comments on the merits, in fact they immediately commented on the merits and requested a joint examination on admissibility and merits in order to expedite the procedure. This way these States could go ahead with an execution before a specific deadline would be triggered that had been set by the domestic case law (developed by the JCPC) on the death row phenomenon causing a violation of the Constitution's prohibition of cruel treatment. Otherwise this deadline would prevent these States permanently from executing the petitioner.¹⁶²

3.3 Provisional measures and opening a case in the Inter-American system

Until May 2001 the Inter-American Commission often used precautionary measures separately from the main case. Some of them were taken independent of a specific case pending before it. If the situation was not solved, the Commission could formally open a case.¹⁶³ In August 1997, for instance, the Inter-American Commission requested Paraguay to inform it about the implementation of the precautionary measures it took to protect the lives of two attorneys and a judge who were involved in the case of Napoleon Ortigoza pending before it. The Commission explicitly mentioned that it took precautionary measures 'without opening a specific case'.¹⁶⁴ This example, however, was remarkable because the Commission normally did not explicitly note that it did not yet open a case. Moreover, the threats seemed to have been made in relation to a case already pending before the Commission. It would therefore have been possible to treat the precautionary measures as part of the Napoleon Ortigoza case until such time when the Commission would ¹⁶² Following this change the HRC often decided to consider admissibility and merits together in cases in which the State party had explicitly waived its right to invoke non-exhaustion of domestic remedies and had addressed the merits of the communication. See e.g. HRC Conroy Levy v. Jamaica, 3 November 1998 and Clarence Marshall v. Jamaica, 3 November 1998. It would recall Article 4(2) OP, stipulating that the State shall submit its written observations on the merits of a communication within six months of the transmittal of the communication. This period may be shortened in the interests of justice, if the State party so wishes. See e.g. HRC Clement Francis v. Jamaica, 25 July 1995; Errol Johnson v. Jamaica, 22 March 1996; Michael Adams v. Jamaica, 30 October 1996; Anthony McLeod v. Jamaica, 31 March 1998; Tony Jones v. Jamaica, 6 April 1998 and Errol Smith and Oval Stewart v. Jamaica, 8 April 1999. In some cases the HRC decided nevertheless to issue a separate admissibility decision, since the information before it was not sufficient to enable it to adopt a decision on the merits. See e.g. HRC Clive Johnson v. Jamaica, 20 October 1998 and Samuel Thomas v. Jamaica (in this case the petitioner had objected to the joint consideration of admissibility and merits because the State party had failed to address all the issues raised in the complaint). In other cases it decided to deal with admissibility and merits together despite the request of the petitioner not to do so, '(a)s both parties have had the full opportunity to comment on each other's merits submissions'. See e.g. HRC Desmond Taylor v. Jamaica, 2 April 1998. In HRC Peter Blaine v. Jamaica, 17 July 1997. Scheinin disagreed with such a decision because he considered that the petitioner had not been given the opportunity to comment on the merits. As stipulated in (then) Rule 91(2) of the rules of procedure the situation is now as follows. The HRC examines admissibility and merits together in order to expedite the procedure under the OP. Only in exceptional cases the Committee, the Working Group or the Special Rapporteur on New Communications will initially request the State only to respond to the issue of admissibility.

¹⁶³ It did so when, prima facie, petitions met the procedural requirements for processing. See e.g. CIDH Annual Report 2000, Chapter III.B (Statistics) under c.

¹⁶⁴ CIDH Annual Report 1997, Chapter III(a).

open a new case. Obviously this would require precautionary measures on behalf of certain beneficiaries initially to be taken in the context of one and subsequently in that of another case.

In cases involving the death penalty, the Inter-American Commission developed the practice of always opening a case and assigning a case number immediately upon receipt of a submission requesting precautionary measures to halt an impending execution. This differed from other matters pending before it where it would also take precautionary measures before actually opening a case and assigning a communication number.

As of May 2001, Rules 26 to 30 of the new Rules of Procedure govern the requirements for opening a case. The Commission processes, through its Executive Secretariat, the petitions that contain all the information required under Rule 28. The Commission provides a form for presenting petitions on human rights violations. It is prepared by its Executive Secretariat and is aimed at assisting victims, their families, civil society organisations and others in presenting a petition. In its instructions accompanying this form the Executive Secretariat points out:

“In cases where the life or physical integrity of a person or group of persons is in imminent danger despite having approached appropriate domestic authorities, you may submit the pertinent information to the Commission even if information concerning the exhaustion of domestic remedies is not currently available”.¹⁶⁵

With its new Rules of Procedure (2000) the Inter-American Commission aims at integrating the examination of individual complaints under both the ACHR and the Declaration. It must now issue a formal admissibility decision in all petitions transferred to the State. Previously an admissibility declaration was not necessary.¹⁶⁶ At present, only in exceptional circumstances the Commission may open a case but defer its treatment of admissibility until the debate and decisions on the merits.¹⁶⁷ Upon the adoption of the admissibility report¹⁶⁸ the Commission shall register the petition as a case and initiate procedures on the merits.¹⁶⁹ Admissibility requirements are now more specifically listed and this applies to time limits as well.

In other systems it is not necessary to declare a case admissible before ordering provisional measures. The only requirement is prima facie admissibility. It is not clear, however, what the Inter-American Court will do in extremely urgent cases because the new Rules seem to require the Commission to declare a case admissible before it can appeal to the Court to order provisional measures. Of course the requirement to declare a case admissible before using precautionary measures does not apply when the situation is so urgent that irreparable harm would otherwise result. Similarly there may be cases where the issue of admissibility is very intricate and the Commission needs the view of both parties before it can decide on it. Meanwhile it should be able to use provisional measures.

¹⁶⁵ Form for presenting petitions on human rights violations, <<http://www.cidh.org/Basicos/English/Basic24.Petition%20Form.htm>> (consulted 8 February 2008).

¹⁶⁶ See on this issue Gómez (2001).

¹⁶⁷ Article 37(3) CIDH Rules of Procedure.

¹⁶⁸ Upon a decision based on Article 37(3) of the CIDH Rules of Procedure.

¹⁶⁹ Article 37(2) CIDH Rules of Procedure.

3.4 Exhaustion of domestic remedies

3.4.1 Introduction

Sometimes States have argued that provisional measures are not appropriate because domestic resources have not yet been exhausted.¹⁷⁰ Indeed the requirement of exhaustion of local remedies¹⁷¹ may be relevant in the choice to take or maintain provisional measures. The HRC has stated that the mere affirmation by the State party that a remedy exists is not sufficient for it to consider it an effective remedy that needs to be exhausted for purposes of the OP. According to its consistent jurisprudence only those domestic remedies that are effective and available must be exhausted.¹⁷²

The Inter-American Court had already noted in 1989 that:

“Thus, when certain exceptions to the rule of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies are invoked, such as the ineffectiveness of such remedies or the lack of due process of law, not only is it contended that the victim is under no obligation to pursue such remedies, but, indirectly, the State in question is also charged with a new violation of the obligations assumed under the Convention. Thus, the question of domestic remedies is closely tied to the merits of the case”.¹⁷³

This section first discusses the requirement of exhaustion in the context of death threats, the right of habeas corpus and patterns of violations, then in the context of non-refoulement and more generally in light of the absence of legal aid in the domestic proceedings. Subsequently it deals with the approach of the HRC to exhaustion in death penalty cases, as well as the availability of a ¹⁷⁰ The following case before the CIDH serves as an example. In December 1997 Peru sent a response to precautionary measures that had been addressed to it on behalf of members of a human rights organisation and of petitioners who were threatened in a case (case 11.811) pending before the Commission. Peru stated that an investigation into the ‘presumed threats noted in the request for precautionary measures’ was already underway before the petitioners filed a case with the Commission. It believed it ‘inappropriate and inadmissible’ for the Commission to take precautionary measures ‘that would duplicate in most cases the processing of personal guarantees that petitioners have been seeking in the domestic courts’. CIDH Annual Report 1997, Chapter III(a), under ‘Peru’. Adjudicators have also refused to take provisional measures in cases subsequently declared inadmissible for non-exhaustion, see e.g. CAT L.Z.B. on her own behalf and on behalf of her daughter J.F.Z. v. Canada, 8 November 2007 (inadm.).

¹⁷¹ On this requirement in general international law, see e.g. Second report on diplomatic protection, by ILC Special Rapporteur John Dugard, A/CN.4/514, 28 February 2001 (among others noting that the distinction between primary and secondary rules has served its purpose in the field of state responsibility, ‘it is a distinction that cannot be too strictly maintained in a study on exhaustion of local remedies in the context of diplomatic protection, as the concept of denial of justice is intimately connected with the exhaustion of remedies rule’. This rule may be seen ‘both as a secondary rule, excusing recourse to further remedies (...) or as a primary rule giving rise to international responsibility’, §10).

¹⁷² See e.g. HRC Clive Smart v. Trinidad and Tobago, 29 July 1998.

¹⁷³ IACHR Velásquez Rodríguez, Judgment of 26 June 1987, §91. As Buergethal (1994), p. 76 has pointed out with regard to the Inter-American Court, ‘(t)he fact that a case at some stage of the proceedings be determined by the Court to be inadmissible will not affect its power to grant provisional measures so long as it has jurisdiction over the parties. If that were not so, it would make no sense whatsoever to authorize the Court to issue provisional measures in cases not yet referred to it which, at that stage, would ipso facto be inadmissible under Article 61(2) of the Convention’.

written judgment for the decision by the HRC to maintain provisional measures beyond admissibility. Finally this section notes the approach of the HRC in cases involving threats to indigenous culture.

3.4.2 Exhaustion and threats

Death threats may also make domestic remedies unavailable and ineffective. In Neptune v. Trinidad and Tobago (1996), for instance, in March 1995 the HRC declared admissible a claim about degrading conditions of detention ‘in the absence of information from the State party about effective domestic remedies available to the author and noting the author’s claim that he had been threatened with death for making complaints’.¹⁷⁴ The latter claim was not further discussed. Several years previously, in December 1992, the HRC had used provisional measures in this case. It did so to halt the execution of the death sentence against the petitioner, not to put a stop to the death threats.¹⁷⁵

A decision to declare a case inadmissible could also have repercussions for the persons who have appeared as witnesses. This triggers the question of what happens to the local investigators, and others who are not themselves the petitioners, when a case has been declared inadmissible while previously the Inter-American Court had used provisional measures on their behalf. Presumably, in a situation like this, the Inter-American Commission would have to open a new case specifically dealing with threats against witnesses or human rights defenders involved in the case at the local level and immediately request the Court to take provisional measures.

3.4.3 Habeas corpus and patterns of violations

The Inter-American Commission has found that swift action is necessary to ensure the effectiveness of the remedy of habeas corpus. There is no need to exhaust petitions for habeas corpus if they are ‘powerless to compel the authorities’ (a reference to the Court’s jurisprudence in the Honduran cases)¹⁷⁶ to ‘ensure proper protection within a reasonable period of time in order to ¹⁷⁴ HRC Clyde Neptune v. Trinidad and Tobago, 16 July 1996, §4.4.

¹⁷⁵ See also Chapter IV on detention situations and death threats and harassment. Zwaak/Haeck (2008), p. 128, have suggested, appropriately, that in the context of severe acts of intimidation apparently aimed at deterring recourse to available domestic remedies, the European Court ‘could consider waving the requirement of exhaustion of internal remedies systematically, until the situation in the region has improved’.

¹⁷⁶ IACHR Velásquez Rodríguez, Judgment of 28 July 1988, §§66-68; Godínez Cruz, Judgment of 20 January 1989, §§69-71; Fairén Garbí and Solís Corrales, Judgment of 15 March 1989, §§91-93 (‘A remedy must also be effective – that is, capable of producing the result for which it was designed. Procedural requirements can make the remedy of habeas corpus ineffective: if it is powerless to compel the authorities; if it presents a danger to those who invoke it; or if it is not impartially applied. On the other hand, contrary to the Commission’s argument, the mere fact that a domestic remedy does not produce a result favorable to the petitioner does not in and of itself demonstrate the inexistence or exhaustion of all effective domestic remedies. For example, the petitioner may not have invoked the appropriate remedy in a timely fashion. It is a different matter, however, when it is shown that remedies are denied for trivial reasons or without an examination of the merits, or if there is proof of the existence of a practice or policy ordered or tolerated by the government, the effect of which is to impede certain persons from invoking internal remedies that would normally be available to others. In such cases, resort to those remedies becomes a senseless formality. The exceptions of Article 46 (2) would be fully prevent the consummation or worsening of the human rights violation that was the object of the complaint'.¹⁷⁷ It has equally applied an exception to the rule of exhaustion of local remedies because 'amparo' proceedings had 'not proven effective in responding to the claims of alleged violations of human rights'.¹⁷⁸ applicable in those situations and would discharge the obligation to exhaust internal remedies since they cannot fulfill their objective in that case").

¹⁷⁷ CIDH Minors in detention v. Honduras, 10 March 1999, §65. As evident already from the Honduran cases, the issue of disappearance is relevant as well in the context of exhaustion. The following case is puzzling in its failure to use precautionary measures. In June 1990 CEJIL and CEAPAZ petitioned the Commission on behalf of Mr. Ramos Diego who had disappeared in Peru the previous month. In such case it could have been useful to take precautionary measures as the disappearance was recent. The Commission, however, rejected this petition for failure to exhaust domestic remedies. It is not clear whether the petitioners also had requested the Commission to take precautionary measures in order to be able to locate the disappeared person. In July 1992 CEJIL presented a new complaint and strongly urged the Commission to open a case. Clearly, at this time the disappearance was no longer recent and a precautionary measure would have been futile. The complaint is mentioned in CEJIL case docket 1997. Mr. Ramos had disappeared on 7 May 1990. It was more than two years later, in July 1992, that the Commission opened his case. It subsequently decided to process six disappearance cases together. These cases related to the same region and period, 'were attributed to soldiers, and followed a pattern of behavior indicating a State policy'. The other cases were opened between one month after the disappearance and two years afterwards. The Commission referred to the Court's holding that 'the proper remedy in the case of the forced disappearance of persons would ordinarily be habeas corpus, since those cases require urgent action by the authorities'. IACHR Velásquez Rodríguez, 21 July 1988 §65; Caballero Delgado and Santana, 21 January 1994 (Preliminary Objections), §64. Habeas corpus is 'the normal means of finding a person presumably detained by the authorities, of ascertaining whether he is legally detained and, given the case, of obtaining his liberty'. IACHR Caballero Delgado and Santana, 21 January 1994 (Preliminary Objections), §67. The Commission further referred to the Court's ruling that domestic remedies 'must be capable of producing the results for which they were intended'. Velásquez Rodríguez, 21 July 1988, §68. The Commission found that, during the period in question, 'there existed in Peru a practice or policy of disappearances, ordered or tolerated by various Government authorities'. This 'practice rendered writs of habeas corpus completely ineffective in cases of disappearances'. Thus, it was not necessary to attempt this or any other remedy. The exceptions mentioned in Article 46(2) ACHR were fully applicable. CIDH Juan de la Cruz Núñez Santana et al. v. Peru, 13 April 1999, §57. In this light the Commission's earlier decision to declare the case of Samuel Ramos Diego inadmissible is surprising, especially since the applicable case law of the Court predates this decision. At the time the disappearance was very recent and precautionary measures by the Commission could have served some purpose. As noted, it is not clear whether the Commission took such measures before it rejected the petition. In one of the other six cases the Commission processed the case within a month of the disappearance. It is possible that it took precautionary measures, but the report on the merits does not provide information in this respect. More generally on effective remedies by the Inter-American Court see e.g. Medina Quiroga (2005), pp. 372-380.

¹⁷⁸ See e.g. CIDH Jorge Odir Miranda Cortez et al. v. El Salvador, Report 29/01, 7 March 2001, §§40-41 ('Almost two years have elapsed since the petition was filed and no final decision has been handed down by the Salvadoran Supreme Court') and §42 ('that in this case, after almost two years, a final ruling has not been handed down regarding the claim of the petitioners in El Salvador, and has determined that an unjustified delay has occurred in terms of domestic remedies'). An example of an issue that was not brought before the Commission exactly because the local NGO, together with CEJIL had been able to resolve the urgent situation is that of the

In the case of the ‘unlawful combatants’ detained by the US at Guantanamo Bay after 9/11 the CIDH took precautionary measures for the first time early 2002, when the beneficiaries had been detained incommunicado and without charge for several months. Several years later the US argued that there were ‘avenues of potential domestic relief’ available, which were ‘effective and timely’.¹⁷⁹ Thus, it concluded, the case was inadmissible for failure to exhaust domestic remedies.

“Nevertheless, in a spirit of cooperation, the United States has to date made six numerous lengthy and detailed submission to the Commission and attended every scheduled hearing in this matter. At this point, while into the fourth year of this proceeding, the United States intends to defer further formal participation until the international law requirement of exhaustion of domestic remedies has been fulfilled”.¹⁸⁰

However, the CIDH observed that nearly half of the detainees had not been granted effective access to counsel. It considered that the urgent situation continued to exist and had been exacerbated. It maintained its precautionary measures.¹⁸¹

The African Commission has taken an approach that is similar to that of the Inter-American Commission. In situations of gross human rights violations, local remedies (Article 56(5) ACHPR) need not be exhausted. It has even been pointed out that given the absence of effective juridical procedures, in many cases this has resulted in the ‘Commission somehow becoming the court of first instance in many of the claims that have come before it, thus negating the whole essence of the local remedies rule’.¹⁸² Thus, it ‘has been able, only at the stage of admissibility, to expose realities of the human rights situations in what have hitherto been Africa’s foremost dictatorial regimes’.¹⁸³ In two arbitrary deportation cases, in which it had equally used provisional measures, the African Commission noted that because of the deportation the petitioner had been prevented from exhausting domestic remedies. It declared the case admissible.¹⁸⁴ In the face of imminent irreparable harm it is likely that the Commission will continue to use provisional measures and subsequently find that the domestic remedies are ineffective.

Another situation in which provisional measures have been used while domestic remedies were not yet exhausted, is in the context of extreme detention conditions or lack of medical treat-village El Hornito in the state of Zulia in Venezuela. For more than 15 years the state petrochemical company ‘El Tablazo’ had disposed chemical waste in the lake on the edge of which this village was located. This resulted in a contamination of the town and a diminished air quality. This, in turn, affected the health conditions of the inhabitants. PROVEA, Physicians for Human Rights and CEJIL were trying to relocate them, to obtain guaranteed medical attention and redress for the harm suffered. Action at the local level achieved improvement in their situation, CEJIL case docket 1997 (on file with the author)

¹⁷⁹ CIDH Guantanamo Bay, Response of the US government of 19 October 2005, pp. 12-13, available at <www.ccr-ny.org> (consulted 20 September 2006).

¹⁸⁰ Ibid.

¹⁸¹ See CIDH Guantanamo Bay case, precautionary measures of 23 July 2002, 18 March 2003, 29 July 2004 and 28 October 2005. CIDH Resolution 1/06 in Press Release 27/06, ‘Inter-American Commission urges to close Guantanamo without delay’, 28 July 2006, available at <<http://www.cidh.org/Comunicados/English/2006/27.06eng.htm>> (consulted 6 October 2006). See further Chapter VIII (Ensuring procedural rights) and XVIII (Follow-up).

¹⁸² Onoria (2003), p. 29.

¹⁸³ Ibid.

¹⁸⁴ See ACHPR Amnesty International (on behalf of William Banda and John Chinula) v. Zambia, 212/98, 5 May 1999. See also Modise v. Botswana decided in 1997. See also Chapter XI (Mass or arbitrary expulsion).

ment. The ECtHR, for instance, has used provisional measures and also ‘put a question to the parties asking whether there existed within the Georgian prison system an administrative practice consisting of keeping detainees in unsatisfactory conditions, an/or a structural problem underlying the lack of medical treatment in prison. Were this to be the case, the applicant would be exempted from the requirement laid down by Article 35§1 to exhaust domestic remedies for the purposes of his complaints under article 3 of the Convention’.¹⁸⁵

3.4.4 Exhaustion and suspensive effect in non-refoulement cases

When there is a risk of irreparable harm, in order for a case to be declared admissible there is no need to exhaust domestic remedies without suspensive effect. CAT has been particularly clear on this with regard to the protection against refoulement in Article 3 ICAT.¹⁸⁶

At the same time, when domestic remedies clearly do not appear to have been exhausted while their effectiveness has not been challenged, CAT refuses requests for provisional measures.¹⁸⁷ In the European system the approach is similar. Petitioners before the ECtHR must provide copies of all domestic decisions exactly because for provisional measures to be used domestic proceedings must be exhausted. Yet an exception is made when the domestic proceedings do not have suspensive effect. In such cases the Court can indeed use provisional measures.¹⁸⁸

¹⁸⁵ ECtHR Ghvaladze v. Georgia, 42047/06, provisional measures (‘to admit the petitioner to a hospital setting where he could receive the appropriate care’) and communicated, Case Law Information Note 100, 30 September 2007, p. 10.

¹⁸⁶ See e.g. CAT Josu Arkauz Arana v. France, 9 November 1999 (an appeal against the ministerial deportation order issued in respect of the complainant on 13 January 1997 would not have been effective or even possible, since it would not have had a suspensive effect and the deportation measure was enforced immediately following notification thereof, leaving the person concerned no time to seek a remedy. The Committee therefore found that article 22, paragraph 5 (b), did not preclude it from declaring the communication admissible’, §6.1); Iratxe Sorzabal Díaz v. France, 3 May 2005 (an appeal against the ministerial deportation order issued in respect of the complainant on 31 August 1999 but served on the very day of her expulsion, at the same time as the order indicating the country of destination, would not have been effective or even possible, since the deportation measure was enforced immediately following notification thereof, leaving the person concerned no time to seek a remedy, §6.1); and Nadeem Ahmad Dar v. Norway, 11 May 2007 (the remedies suggested by the State party as effective remedies to be exhausted did not have suspensive effect and the complainant might face irreparable harm if returned to Pakistan and provisional measures were used; petitioner was nevertheless deported to Pakistan, which constituted a violation of Article 22 (individual complaint); this breach was remedied by granting a residence permit for three years upon return to Norway and the issue whether the deportation constituted a violation of Article 3 ICAT had become moot because the petitioner had been able to return to Norway). See also its Annual Reports, e.g. A/61/44, §61. The HRC has taken a similar approach. See e.g. HRC Simalae Toala et al. v. New Zealand, 2 November 2000, (‘It was not apparent to the Committee that any remedies that might still be available to the authors would be effective to prevent their deportation’, §6.4). See also HRC Jagjit Singh Bhullar v. Canada, 31 October 2006 (inadm.) (provisional measures were used pending the proceedings). See also Ominayak v. Canada, 26 March 1990.

¹⁸⁷ See e.g. CAT L.Z.B. and her daughter J.F.Z. v. Canada, 8 November 2007 (inadm.).

¹⁸⁸ When a petitioner complains that his removal would expose him to treatment contrary to Article 3 ECHR a remedy that does not suspend execution of his expulsion order is not ‘effective’ within the meaning of Article 35(1) ECHR and does not have to be used. See e.g. ECtHR Sultani c. France, 20 September 2007 (provisional measures of 20 December 2005 and 5 January 2006) (see §50: ‘Par ailleurs, lorsqu’un individu se plaint de ce que son renvoi l’exposerait à un

Moreover, the ECtHR has explicitly confirmed that an effective remedy in expulsion cases must include suspensive effect. Lack of such effect results in a violation of Article 13, sometimes combined with Article 3 ECHR.¹⁸⁹ Obviously, prior to an admissibility decision involving a traitement contraire à l'article 3 de la Convention, les recours sans effet suspensif ne peuvent être considérés comme efficaces au sens de l'article 35 §1 de la Convention (voir mutadis mutandis et parmi beaucoup d'autres X. c. Allemagne, no 7216/75, décision de la Commission du 20 mai 1976, Décisions et rapports (DR) 5, p. 137; M. c. France, no 10078/82, décision de la Commission du 13 décembre 1984, DR 41, p. 103)). For the practice of the former Commission see e.g. EComHR Barir and Amuur et al. v. France, 18 October 1993, noting that already in the 1980s it had pointed out that petitioners claiming that their expulsion would expose them to a grave danger could not be expected to exhaust domestic remedies without suspensive effect) partly struck from the list. Its provisional measures were of 27 March 1992. Other examples are EComHR A. v. France, 27 February 1991 (inadm.), p. 335; Z. v. The Netherlands, 14 May 1984 and L. v. France, 10 December 1984 (no provisional measures). In B. v. France, 22 January 1987 (inadm.), the Commission initially used provisional measures but later concluded that the petitioner did have a national remedy. He could bring an application before the Conseil d'État to set aside the extradition order. It observed 'that an application of this kind may be accompanied by an application for a stay of execution which, although it does not in itself have suspensive effect, is intended to ensure that the administrative court will very speedily conduct an initial examination of the extradition order and, if appropriate, order a stay of execution'. It pointed out that the general practice, as indicated by the Government, was that it refrained from implementing the order until the Conseil d'État has considered the petition. In Becker v. Denmark (1976) the (former) European Commission had used provisional measures to delay the repatriation of a large group of Vietnamese children. Subsequently there was discussion about whether or not domestic remedies had been exhausted. The State had acknowledged that the available remedy had no suspensive effect, see Becker v. Denmark, 3 October 1975 (inadm.), Yearbook XIX, p. 228. Thus, the Commission considered that it would not be an effective remedy, see p. 233. See also Denmark, Norway, Sweden and The Netherlands v. Greece (First Greek case), 24 January 1968, pp. 770-774 with an interesting discussion on admissibility, administrative practice and effective and sufficient remedies.

¹⁸⁹ See e.g. ECtHR Sultani v. France, 20 September 2007, §50; Gebremedhin v. France, 16 April 2007, §58; Conka v. Belgium, 5 February 2002, §83 and Jabari v. Turkey, 11 July 2000, §50. See also Guideline 5 of the Committee of Ministers "twenty guidelines on forced return", 4 May 2005 ("1. In the removal order, or in the process leading to the removal order, the subject of the removal order shall be afforded an effective remedy before a competent authority or body composed of members who are impartial and who enjoy safeguards of independence. The competent authority or body shall have the power to review the removal order, including the possibility of temporarily suspending its execution. 2. The remedy shall offer the required procedural guarantees and present the following characteristics: – the time-limits for exercising the remedy shall not be unreasonably short; – the remedy shall be accessible, which implies in particular that, where the subject of the removal order does not have sufficient means to pay for necessary legal assistance, he/she should be given it free of charge, in accordance with the relevant national rules regarding legal aid; – where the returnee claims that the removal will result in a violation of his or her human rights as set out in guideline 2.1, the remedy shall provide rigorous scrutiny of such a claim. 3. The exercise of the remedy should have a suspensive effect when the returnee has an arguable claim that he or she would be subjected to treatment contrary to his or her human rights as set out in guideline 2.1. [real risk of being executed, or exposed to torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment; real risk of being killed or subjected to inhuman or degrading treatment by non-state actors, if the authorities of the state of return, parties or organisations controlling the state or a substantial part of the territory of the state, including international organisations, are unable or unwilling to provide appropriate and

State's argument of non-exhaustion of non-suspensive remedies, the human rights adjudicator may use provisional measures.¹⁹⁰

Moreover, in the European system the practice has developed of informing the Court ahead of time of a request for provisional measures, including the submission of all relevant information, so that the Court may order provisional measures immediately upon exhaustion. The European Court (and previously the Commission) may sometimes itself anticipate exhaustion of domestic remedies by taking provisional measures that are conditional on such exhaustion. It has done so on some occasions when there would be insufficient time for the petitioner to request provisional measures to prevent expulsion or extradition immediately upon exhaustion of domestic remedies.¹⁹¹

In K.C. v. Canada (inadm. 1992) counsel had requested the HRC to use provisional measures because extradition of the petitioner to the US 'would deprive the Committee of its jurisdiction to consider the communication, and the author to properly pursue his communication'.¹⁹² The HRC did use them, but later it declared the complaint inadmissible because of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies. It also specifically set aside the provisional measures earlier indicated. In this respect the inadmissibility decision in this extradition case differs from the aforementioned death penalty cases against Jamaica in which the HRC maintained provisional measures beyond the inadmissibility decision, pending exhaustion of local remedies and pending a renewed application to the Committee. The Committee did point out that the petitioner could bring the issue again after exhausting local remedies. The petitioner did this in Cox v. Canada (1994). It was able to do effective protection; other situations which would, under international law or national legislation, justify the granting of international protection)]".

¹⁹⁰ In CIDH Cheryl Monica Joseph v. Canada, 6 October 1993, the petitioners had unsuccessfully requested the Inter-American Commission to take precautionary measures. They had requested these measures 'in order to avoid irreparable damage to Mrs. Joseph, that she be granted temporary permission to remain in Canada, and that the deportation order be stayed', §II, 2. Later, the Commission declared the case inadmissible for non-exhaustion of domestic remedies. It considered she could have used a domestic procedure that had suspensive effect, but did not do so within the deadline. If there had been special reasons for not having done so in time, a later application would have been possible. She would also have had the right to counsel to represent her in this 'application for leave' to start proceedings against the removal order. While declaring the case inadmissible, the Commission, 'bearing in the mind the humanitarian aspects' of the case, invited Canada 'to give favourable consideration to the possibility of permitting Mrs. Joseph to remain in Canada until the completion of the court actions brought in connection with the estate of her late husband', §31. The Commission did not explain its refusal to take precautionary measures but it may have considered, already at this stage, that the petitioner could have used domestic remedies that would have had suspensive effect. This would suggest that the Commission takes into account prima facie admissibility in its use of precautionary measures. It is also possible, however, that the Commission simply considered that the petitioner's removal to Trinidad prima facie would not cause irreparable harm to her life and physical integrity. The Commission's exhortative remark ('give favourable consideration') when it declared the case itself inadmissible reminds one of certain statements by the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination. See e.g. CERD Lacko v. Slovakia, 9 August 2001, although this was not in the context of provisional measures. See also HRC Hendriks v. the Netherlands, 27 July 1988.

¹⁹¹ See e.g. EComHR Yeung Yuk Leung v. Portugal, 27 November 1995. See further Norgaard/Krüger (1988), p. 115, equally referring to the possibility of conditional request by the (then) European Commission under Rule 36 (provisional measures), pending the decision of the domestic authorities or courts.

¹⁹² HRC K.C. v. Canada, 29 July 1992 (inadm.), §2.5.

so as the State had not extradited him in the meantime.¹⁹³ In this case counsel explained why he chose to submit the case and apply for provisional measures prior to discontinuing the domestic appeal:

“This move was taken because I presumed that a discontinuance of the appeal might result in the immediate extradition of Mr. Cox. It was more prudent to seize the Committee first, and then discontinue the appeal, and I think this precaution was a wise one, because Mr. Cox is still in Canada”.¹⁹⁴

This strategy of counsel seems to be a response to Canada’s actions in the previous extradition cases Kindler and Ng who were both extradited immediately upon the final decision of the domestic court and despite the Committee’s provisional measures.¹⁹⁵

The Committee’s use of provisional measures in E.G. v. Canada (disc. 1997) shows that it aims to take provisional measures that have the potential to be effective.¹⁹⁶ While domestic remedies had not yet been exhausted, counsel had pointed out that the State had extradited fugitives ‘within minutes or hours of a judgement by the Supreme Court of Canada, allowing no time for defendants to pursue any domestic or international remedies aimed at obtaining a stay’. For this reason, counsel noted, it was ‘imperative’ that the HRC would address the issue of provisional measures in advance of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada on the application for leave to appeal. “(F)ailure to consider the issue of interim measures prior to the Supreme Court of Canada decision will in effect render applicant’s recourse to the Human Rights Committee completely illusory and ineffective”.¹⁹⁷ She recalled that the HRC used provisional measures subsequent to the decision of the Supreme Court in the abovementioned cases Kindler and Ng. Yet, Canada extradited these petitioners within a few hours of the judgment.¹⁹⁸ Later, in Judge v. Canada (2003) the HRC did not have the chance to order provisional measures.¹⁹⁹ In Bakhtiyari family v. Australia (2003) the Special Rapporteur, in May 2002, adjusted his request to halt the deportation of the children and their mother ‘to be conditional on an adverse decision on the application by the High Court’. In other words, if still necessary the provisional measures would apply immediately upon exhaustion of domestic remedies. Later, when the Committee considered the admissibility of the case, it responded to the State’s argument of non-exhaustion by referring to its practice to decide on this question ‘at the point of the consideration of the communication, not least for the reason that a communication in respect of which domestic remedies had been

¹⁹³ HRC Cox v. Canada, 31 October 1994.

¹⁹⁴ Id., §8.1.

¹⁹⁵ See Chapter XVII on the official responses of Addressee States. See also Chapter XV on assessment of temporal urgency.

¹⁹⁶ HRC E.G. v. Canada, 17 November 1997 (disc.); 738/1997; initial submission 5 January 1997 (received 7 January 1997), provisional measures of 17 January 1997; withdrawal of provisional measures on 28 April 1997; petitioner’s request to withdraw the case of 26 May 1997; on 17 November 1997 the HRC informed the petitioner that it had discontinued the case (on file with the author).

¹⁹⁷ HRC E.G. v. Canada, 17 November 1997 (disc./on file with the author).

¹⁹⁸ Initial submission of 5 January 1997 in HRC E.G. v. Canada (on file with the author). See also Chapter XV on prompt decision-making and assessment of temporal urgency, discussing the requirement of immediacy.

¹⁹⁹ HRC Judge v. Canada, 5 August 2003. See Chapter XV on prompt decision-making and assessment of temporal urgency.

exhausted after submission could be immediately resubmitted to the Committee if declared inadmissible for that reason'.²⁰⁰

Sometimes the State's non-exhaustion arguments are rather disingenuous. In Olaechea Cahuas v. Spain (2006) the petitioner was extradited despite a provisional measure ordered by the ECtHR. The State had argued that the case was inadmissible for non-exhaustion of domestic remedies. The Court dismissed this argument as the domestic recourse suggested by the State did not have suspensive effect. In other words the recourse suggested was incapable of halting the extradition, as became clear by the extradition. Thus it could not be regarded as an effective remedy.²⁰¹ Indeed it was rather ironic for the State to argue non-exhaustion while it had itself extradited the petitioner in violation of the Court's provisional measures.²⁰²

In Weiss v. Austria (2003) the State party had extradited the petitioner in contravention of the HRC's provisional measures and subsequently argued that he had not exhausted domestic remedies. The Committee pointed out that it takes provisional measures because of the possibility of irreparable harm to the victim.

"In such cases, a remedy which is said to subsist after the event which the interim measures sought to prevent occurred is by definition ineffective, as the irreparable harm cannot be reversed by a subsequent finding in the author's favour by the domestic remedies considering the case. In such cases there remain no effective remedies to be exhausted after the event sought to be prevented by the request for interim measures takes place; specifically, no appropriate remedy is available to the author now detained in the United States should the State party's domestic courts decide in his favour in the proceedings still pending after his extradition".²⁰³

It is not surprising that adjudicators have expressed themselves emphatically on a State's argument of non-exhaustion after it has deported the petitioner despite a provisional measure. CAT has pointed out that 'when it called for interim measures of protection such as those that would prevent the complainant from being deported to Algeria, it did so because it considered that there was a risk of irreparable harm. In such cases, a remedy which remains pending after the action which interim measures are intended to prevent has taken place is, by definition, pointless because the irreparable harm cannot be averted if the domestic remedy subsequently yields a decision favourable to the complainant: there is no longer any effective remedy to exhaust after the action which interim measures were intended to prevent has taken place. In the present case, the Committee felt no appropriate remedy was available to the complainant now he had been deported to Algeria, even if the domestic courts in the State party were to rule in his favour at the conclusion of proceedings which were still under way after the extradition'.²⁰⁴ In such case for the ²⁰⁰ HRC Bakhtiyari family v. Australia, 29 October 2003, §8.2. It observed that the proceedings brought in the High Court had meanwhile been adversely concluded.

²⁰¹ ECtHR Olaechea Cahuas v. Spain, Judgment of 10 August 2006 (5th Section), §35.

²⁰² See also Bosnia Chamber Boudellaa et al. v. BH and Fed.BH, 3 September 2002 (adm. and merits), §152 (the domestic appeal of petitioner Lahmar was still pending and the Chamber noted that the execution of the decision to expel him should have been stayed. "The argument made by Bosnia and Herzegovina hence appears not to apply to him as the applicant has exhausted all possible remedies").

²⁰³ HRC Sholam Weiss v. Austria, 3 April 2003, §8.2.

²⁰⁴ CAT Mafhoud Brada v. France, 17 May 2005, §7.7. In this case the petitioner was deported to Algeria on a flight to Algiers on 30 September 2002 and had been missing since, §2.7. CAT also noted that the State party had enforced the order for the deportation of the complainant to Algeria after communicating its comments on the admissibility of the complaint, §7.5. See also CAT Adel Tebourski v. France, 1 May 2007.

State the consequence of ignoring the adjudicator's provisional measures is that the case is declared admissible because exhaustion is no longer effective. It noted:

"The essential purpose of the appeal was to prevent the deportation of the complainant to Algeria. In this specific case, enforcing the deportation order rendered the appeal irrelevant by vitiating its intended effect: it was inconceivable that, if the appeal went in the complainant's favour, he would be repatriated to France. In the circumstances, in the Committee's view, the appeal was so intrinsically linked to the purpose of preventing deportation, and hence to the suspension of the deportation order, that it could not be considered an effective remedy if the deportation order was enforced before the appeal concluded".²⁰⁵

In other words: returning the petitioner despite the provisional measures 'and before the admissibility of the complaint had been considered made the remedies available to the complainant in France pointless, and the complaint was accordingly admissible'.²⁰⁶

Only when a petitioner in a non-refoulement case has not yet been deported, the addressee State can properly prevent him from exposure to irreparable harm to his life or personal integrity in the receiving State. Once the petitioner has been deported the addressee State can only use diplomatic means to gain access to this person in detention and monitor his treatment in order to remedy to some extent, the wrong done.²⁰⁷ Strictly speaking the question whether exhaustion of domestic remedies is required when the petitioner has already been deported, is unrelated to the (earlier) question of provisional measures. Nevertheless, the statements on the illusory nature of such domestic remedies are relevant exactly because they illustrate the need for respect for provisional measures.

One other issue with regard to non-refoulement involves the consequence of compliance by a State with a provisional measure for the admissibility of a case. Such compliance does not automatically deprive a petitioner of his or her victim status.²⁰⁸ In other words, a State cannot just argue that a case is inadmissible because it has complied with a provisional measure. Otherwise it could subsequently be tempted to quickly expel the person in question as there is no longer a case pending before the Court.

3.4.5 Absence of legal aid

In 1990 the Inter-American Court issued an Advisory Opinion on the issue of the exhaustion of domestic remedies (Article 46(2) ACHR). It found, in reference to the language of Article 46(2)

²⁰⁵ CAT Mafhoud Brada v. France, 17 May 2005, §7.8.

²⁰⁶ Id., §7.9.

²⁰⁷ See also Chapter XVIII (Follow-up).

²⁰⁸ See e.g. ECtHR Gebremedhin v. France, 16 April 2007, noting in §56 that 'a decision or measure favourable to the applicant is not in principle sufficient to deprive him of his status as a victim unless the national authorities have acknowledged, either expressly or in substance, and then afforded redress for, the alleged breach of the Convention. It is quite clear in the instant case that those conditions have not been met in relation to the complaint under Articles 13 and 3 taken together. The fact that the applicant was not removed to Eritrea and was eventually able to enter France to lodge an asylum application appears to have been due to his not being issued with a laissez-passer by the Eritrean embassy and then to the application by the Court of Rule 39. Furthermore, the Court observes in this regard that the administrative authorisation to enter the country and the safe conduct issued on 20 July 2005, and also the decision of the Conseil d'Etat of 11 August 2005, referred expressly to Rule 39 and to the interim measure taken in accordance with that provision'.

jo. Articles 1(1), 24 and 8 ACHR, that ‘if it can be shown that an indigent needs legal counsel to effectively protect a right which the Convention guarantees and his indigency prevents him from obtaining such counsel, he does not have to exhaust the relevant domestic remedies’.²⁰⁹ In addition, ‘where an individual requires legal representation and a generalized fear in the legal community prevents him from obtaining such representation, the exception set out in Article 46(2)(b) is fully applicable and the individual is exempted from the requirement to exhaust domestic remedies’.²¹⁰ It stated that under Article 46(1) ACHR ‘and in accordance with general principles of international law’, it was for the State asserting non-exhaustion of domestic remedies to prove that such remedies in fact existed and that they had not been exhausted.²¹¹

In the African system there is an even greater problem with regard to access to legal aid, but in light of the fact – in the absence of a victim requirement – that most petitioners are NGOs, the African Commission has not considered this to excuse non-exhaustion.²¹²

The HRC has dealt with the availability of legal aid as well, in particular for constitutional motions by death row inmates. In its considerations of this issue it also took into account the length of proceedings. It pointed out that ‘in capital punishment cases, legal aid should not only be made available; it should also enable counsel to prepare his client’s defence in circumstances that can ensure justice’.²¹³ With regard to Jamaica, the Addressee in most early death penalty cases dealt with by the HRC, the absence of legal aid could excuse non-exhaustion of local reme-

²⁰⁹ IACHR Advisory Opinion OC-1190 on Exceptions to the Exhaustion of Domestic Remedies (Article 46(1), 46(2) and 46(2)(b) ACHR), 10 August 1990, §31.

²¹⁰ Id., §35.

²¹¹ It is only ‘once a State Party has shown the existence of domestic remedies for the enforcement of a particular right guaranteed by the Convention’ that the burden of proof shifts to the complainant, who must then demonstrate that the exceptions provided for in Article 46(2) are applicable, whether as a result of indigency or because of a generalized fear to take the case among the legal community or any other applicable circumstance. Of course, it must also be shown that the rights in question are guaranteed in the Convention and that legal representation is necessary to assert or enjoy those rights’. See IACHR Advisory Opinion OC-1190 on Exceptions to the Exhaustion of Domestic Remedies (Article 46(1), 46(2) and 46(2)(b) ACHR), 10 August 1990, §41. The Inter-American Commission has stressed the importance of access to legal representation for asylum seekers. In its Special Report on Canada (2000) it noted: ‘(g)iven the nature of the refugee determination process and the interests at stake for the claimant, it is obviously in his or her interest to be represented by competent legal counsel’. Not only in reference to its own doctrine on the exhaustion of domestic remedies, in which it had addressed the question of when legal aid must be provided, but also in reference to the right of access to judicial protection under Article XVIII American Declaration, it pointed out that legal aid is required ‘in order to effectively vindicate a fundamental protected right under the American Declaration or the Constitution or laws of the country concerned’. According to the Commission this flowed from the rights to equal protection of the law but even more ‘from the principle that rights must be implemented in ways that give them proper effect’. It summarised the issue as follows: “States have an obligation to make the right to judicial protection effective. Distinctions in the availability or coverage of legal aid provided by the provinces which have the effect of depriving claimants requiring such services to ensure their access to judicial protection of fundamental rights necessary [sic] implicate the responsibility of the State”. CIDH Canada Report 2000, §127.

²¹² See e.g. ACHPR Africa Legal Aid v. the Gambia, 11 May 2000. Yet there is no victim requirement in the Inter-American system either. In general the African Commission does take a wide interpretation of Article 56(5) ACHPR. On exhaustion see, e.g., Udombana (2003), pp. 1-37.

²¹³ See e.g. HRC Willard Collins v. Jamaica, 1 November 1991.

dies not only for constitutional motions to the Supreme (Constitutional) Court, but also for the appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (JCPC) in London, the ultimate domestic appeal at the time.²¹⁴

In the period between 1989 and 1991 the HRC was awaiting clarification of the domestic situation in Jamaica and had not yet firmly determined whether a constitutional motion, following the rejection by the JCPC of a petition for leave to appeal, was an effective remedy for purposes of exhaustion. The State party failed to respond to requests for clarifications about constitutional motions before the Supreme (Constitutional) Court.²¹⁵ Some death row inmates requested their counsel to withdraw their communication to the HRC and file a constitutional motion instead, possibly on the assumption that a favourable HRC decision would not mean that the State would release them, while a constitutional motion would. They may have assumed it was necessary to withdraw their complaint and first seek such a motion.²¹⁶

Later the domestic situation was clarified and the HRC also established its own position on the issue. It determined that the considerations governing the application of Article 5 (2)(b) OP are the impact of the length of judicial proceedings and the availability of legal aid. There is no need to exhaust domestic remedies that have been unreasonably prolonged,²¹⁷ nor to complete ²¹⁴ See e.g. HRC Robinson LaVende v. Trinidad and Tobago, 29 October 1997. In this case the HRC not only declared the case admissible but also found violations of Article 14(3)(d) and 14(5) ICCPR because of the denial of legal aid for an appeal to the JCPC.

²¹⁵ Section 25(2) of the Constitution of Jamaica stipulates that the Supreme (Constitutional) Court shall not deal with such motions if it believes that other means of redress have been available.

²¹⁶ Information obtained at Secretariat in Geneva, October 1998. In the case of Carlton Reid v. Jamaica, 20 July 1990, the HRC not only discussed the prospect of success but also already discussed the availability of legal aid for constitutional motions. In a number of interlocutory decisions the HRC had requested the State party to clarify whether the Supreme (Constitutional) Court had had the opportunity to determine a question that had long been unclear. This was the question whether an appeal to the Court of Appeal and the JCPC constituted 'adequate means of redress' within the meaning of Section 25(2) of the Constitution of Jamaica. The State party had replied that the Supreme Court had not yet done so. Given this reply the HRC declared the case admissible: "Taking into account the State party's clarification, together with the absence of legal aid for filing a motion in the Constitutional Court and the unwillingness of Jamaican counsel to act in this regard without remuneration, the Committee finds that recourse to the Constitutional Court under Section 25 of the Jamaican Constitution is not a remedy available to the author with in the meaning of Art. 5, paragraph 2(b), of the Optional Protocol". It clarified this by referring to the State's acknowledgment that the Supreme Court had not yet determined whether an appeal to the Court of Appeal and the JCPC constituted adequate means of redress under the Jamaican Constitution, thereby blocking recourse to the Supreme Court. The HRC added another reason why recourse to the Constitutional Court was not an available remedy under the OP: the absence of legal aid for filing such a motion and the unwillingness of Jamaican counsel to act pro deo. See also Michael Sawyers and Michael and Desmond McClean v. Jamaica, 11 April 1991 and Clifton Wright v. Jamaica, 27 July 1992. In this case Jamaica had challenged the HRC's admissibility findings by stating that its reasoning reflected a 'grave misunderstanding' of the relevant Jamaican law. It referred to its earlier statement that 'the decision of the Committee would render meaningless and nugatory the hard earned constitutional rights of Jamaicans (...) by the failure to distinguish between the right to appeal against the verdict and sentence of the Court in a criminal case, and the 'brand new rights' to apply for constitutional redress granted in 1962'.

²¹⁷ See e.g. HRC Raphael Henry v. Jamaica, 1 November 1991; Aston Little v. Jamaica, 1 November 1991; Leroy Simmonds v. Jamaica, 23 October 1992; Randolph Barrett and Clyde Sutcliffe v. Jamaica, 30 March 1992; Clifton Wright v. Jamaica, 27 July 1992; Carlton Linton v. Jamaica, 22 October 1992 and Lenford Hamilton v. Jamaica, 21 March 1994.

constitutional motions if the petitioner is indigent but the State is unwilling or unable to provide legal aid for filing these motions.²¹⁸

3.4.6 Exhaustion, availability of a written judgment and maintaining provisional measures beyond inadmissibility

As noted in section 2.5, the HRC developed a most remarkable practice with its decisions to maintain provisional measures to halt an execution not until, but beyond its inadmissibility decision. In the early 1990s the HRC declared inadmissible several petitions because ‘while expressing concern about the unavailability, so far, of relevant court documents in the case’ it did not consider that a petition to the JCPC would be ‘a priori ineffective’. In other words, it expected the petitioners to exhaust this remedy before resorting to the HRC.²¹⁹ Yet the Committee maintained its provisional measures beyond the inadmissibility declaration.²²⁰ The only exception was a case in which it considered that the delays could be attributed mainly to the petitioner. In its inadmissibility decision to that case it did not mention the possibility that the decision could be reviewed upon exhaustion of effective domestic remedies.²²¹

In Trevor Collins v. Jamaica (1993)²²² the HRC finally determined that, in the absence of a written judgment it should declare a complaint admissible. It noted that domestic counsel could objectively have assumed that any petition for leave to appeal to the JCPC would have failed on account of the unavailability of a written judgment from the Court of Appeal. Thus, such petition ²¹⁸ See e.g. HRC Willard Collins v. Jamaica, 1 November 1991; Raphael Henry v. Jamaica, 1 November 1991; Aston Little v. Jamaica, 1 November 1991; Leroy Simmonds v. Jamaica, 23 October 1992; Randolph Barrett and Clyde Sutcliffe v. Jamaica, 30 March 1992; Clifton Wright v. Jamaica, 27 July 1992; Carlton Linton v. Jamaica, 22 October 1992; Lenford Hamilton v. Jamaica, 21 March 1994; Dwayne Hylton v. Jamaica, 8 July 1994; Anthony Currie v. Jamaica, 29 March 1994 and Clive Smart v. Trinidad and Tobago, 29 July 1998.

²¹⁹ See e.g. HRC E.B. v. Jamaica, 26 October 1990; A.A. v. Jamaica, 30 October 1989 and R.M. v. Jamaica, 26 October 1990. Previously, during the last two sessions of 1989 and the first session of 1990 the HRC declared certain petitions admissible because the petitioner’s counsel had been unable to obtain copies of the reasoned judgment of the Court of Appeal. Without such judgment a petition for special leave to appeal to the JCPC would objectively have no prospect of success. Irvine Reynolds v. Jamaica, 8 April 1991 (eventually the HRC found no violations for lack of sufficient evidence); see also Barrett and Sutcliffe v. Jamaica, 30 March 1992 (determining that, in the absence of legal aid and bearing in mind the delay, recourse to the Supreme (Constitutional) Court was not required; declaring the case admissible, but finding, after examination of the evidence, that the Court of Appeal ‘rapidly produced its written judgment and that the ensuing delay in petitioning the Judicial Committee is largely attributable to the authors’; it did find violations of Articles 7 and 10(1)); M.F. v. Jamaica, 21 October 1991 (on 15 March 1990 the HRC declared the case admissible under Article 14 because in the practice of the JCPC all petitions unsupported by the relevant court documents had been dismissed; this is why the HRC considered ‘that if a petition for leave to appeal was to be considered an available and effective remedy, it had to be supported by the judgment from which leave to appeal was sought’). Paul Kelly v. Jamaica, 8 April 1991 (also a violation of Article 14(3)(c) and 14(5) because of the absence of a written judgment by the Court of Appeal); Trevor Collins v. Jamaica, 25 March 1993 (also a violation of Article 14(3)(c) and 14(5) because of the absence of a written judgment by the Court of Appeal).

²²⁰ See e.g. HRC A.H. v. Trinidad and Tobago, 31 October 1990; M.F. v. Jamaica, 17 July 1992, and Peter Bradshaw v. Barbados, 19 July 1994.

²²¹ HRC N.A.J v. Jamaica, 26 July 1990.

²²² HRC Trevor Collins v. Jamaica, 25 March 1993.

would not have had a real prospect of success. It was true that the Judicial Committee had heard several petitions concerning Jamaica in the absence of a written judgment of the Court of Appeal, but, on the basis of the information available to the Committee, all of these petitions were dismissed because of the absence of such a judgment. Thus it would henceforth declare such complaint admissible. On the merits the HRC determined that the absence of a written judgment by the Court of Appeal constituted a violation of Article 14(3)(c) and 14(5) ICCPR.

Thus it was during the years preceding its eventual determination that the unavailability of a written judgment by the court of appeal would in fact excuse non-exhaustion of domestic remedies that the HRC developed a practice of maintaining provisional measures beyond inadmissibility. During these years it used provisional measures both prior to a determination of admissibility, and subsequent to a determination of inadmissibility. It did so in order to prevent irreparable harm to persons. Once the Committee's case law was clarified with regard to the unavailability of a written judgment by the domestic court, provisional measures would be used in advance of a determination about the effectiveness of domestic remedies, but no longer beyond a declaration of inadmissibility.

3.4.7 Exhaustion in death penalty cases not relating to the availability of a written judgment

The HRC has considered that a petition to the Governor General for a stay of execution is not a domestic remedy that should be exhausted under the OP.²²³ This situation is different with regard to a petition to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (JCPC). In Guerra and Wallen v. Trinidad and Tobago (1995)²²⁴ the Committee had first used provisional measures and then declared the case inadmissible for non-exhaustion of domestic remedies, because a petition for leave ²²³ HRC Trevor Ellis v. Jamaica, 28 July 1992. The State had argued that the complaint was inadmissible because the petitioner had not exhausted domestic remedies. It noted that the petitioner 'has petitioned the Governor General for a stay of execution'. It also noted that the JCPC had recommended to the Governor General to grant a stay of execution 'pending the outcome of the representations made on his behalf'. Counsel had pointed out that the State failed to indicate whether the Governor General had indeed adopted the JCPC's recommendation of a stay. It was not clear whether a stay of execution was indeed in force. Counsel also submitted that he had not yet received a reply to his petition to the Governor General, requesting a stay of execution pending the outcome of several similar cases before the JCPC.

²²⁴ HRC Lincoln Guerra and Brian Wallen v. Trinidad and Tobago. The situation in this case was as follows. An earlier petition for special leave to appeal to the JCPC had been dismissed a few days previously. The initial submission was of 25 March 1994, the day of their planned execution. The Special Rapporteur took provisional measures a month later. In its first submission, 23 June 1994, the State argued that the petitions were inadmissible because the petitioners had also submitted their case to the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (nr. 11279). On 10 November 1994 counsel informed the HRC, including documentary evidence, that Mr. Guerra had withdrawn his case before the Inter-American Commission, as it was under consideration by the HRC. By submission of 23 June 1994 and 7 September 1994 the State argued non-exhaustion of domestic remedies. In the latter submission it referred to the JCPC's conservatory order of 25 July 1994. Counsel responded that the State's argument was inconsistent with its clearly manifested intention to execute the petitioners 'on merely 17 hours' notice, within three days after the confirmation of their conviction, irrespective of their desire to make representations to the Mercy Committee for commutation of their death sentences, to apply to the courts of Trinidad for relief staying their execution and to apply to the Human Rights Committee'.

to appeal before the JCPC was still pending and the JCPC had ordered a stay of execution.²²⁵ It declared the case inadmissible but pointed out that this decision could be reviewed upon exhaustion. Yet it did not maintain the provisional measures, as it had done in cases involving unavailability of legal documents.²²⁶ This seems to indicate that it is only when non-exhaustion could be attributed to the State's failure to make available legal documents that it maintains its provisional measures beyond its inadmissibility declaration. Nevertheless, in this case the HRC could have maintained its provisional measures as an indication to the State that it should not execute the death sentence of the petitioner immediately upon exhaustion when there is still a possibility of review by the HRC upon exhaustion.

After the State had issued an execution warrant the petitioners had submitted the case to the HRC and the JCPC as well as to the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights. This shows that in urgent cases petitioners may resort to various international and domestic bodies. In my view this does not necessarily conflict with rules on exhaustion of local remedies, on the one hand, and on non-submission of the 'same matter' to different international bodies, on the other hand,²²⁷ as long as this is only done at the early stages of the proceedings, in order to prevent irreparable harm to persons.

In the context of Bethel v. Trinidad and Tobago (1999)²²⁸ the State referred to the rules on exhaustion and subsidiarity. Among others, it pointed out that domestic remedies had not been pursued and exhausted. The appeal was pending before the Court of Appeal and the remedies available could include 'the power to quash his sentence or to order a retrial'. In its reasoning the State brought up the subsidiarity principle.

"The competence of the Committee is subsidiary to that of the domestic legal system of the state. For the Committee to be seized of this case while legal proceedings are continuing before the domestic courts of the State party is a direct challenge to the balanced relationship between the international protection of human rights and the domestic jurisdiction of States parties".²²⁹

Yet the State did not explain how the obligation to exhaust of domestic remedies without suspensive effect would satisfy the subsidiarity criterion. After all, the whole point is that international organisations and adjudicators may not interfere in situations that can adequately be dealt with at ²²⁵ One of the petitioners in this case (Wallen) had died four months after the initial submission and one month after the provisional measure. Counsel argued that the State's determination to execute the other petitioner (Guerra), 'irrespective of undetermined violations of the author's constitutional rights or rights under the Covenant', was 'demonstrated by the events surrounding the execution of Glenn Ashby in July 1994' (see also Chapter XVI (Legal status) and Chapter XVII (Official State responses)) after his case had been submitted to the HRC. The HRC concluded, however, that a petition to the JCPC could not be considered ineffective in this case, meaning that domestic remedies had not yet been exhausted. This had not prevented it from using provisional measures initially.

²²⁶ See section 2.4 of this Chapter.

²²⁷ For a case brought first to the Inter-American Commission and then to the HRC, see e.g. HRC Clifton Wright v. Jamaica, 27 July 1992, §2.8. The case had been submitted to the CIDH on 13 February 1984, registered as no. 9260, hearing of 24 March 1988 and resolution 29/88 of 14 September 1988. On 4 November 1988 Jamaica challenged this resolution. Two months later the case was submitted to the HRC.

²²⁸ HRC Christopher Bethel v. Trinidad and Tobago, 31 March 1999. Provisional measures of 17 September 1998 (on file with the author).

²²⁹ Further submission of the Government of Trinidad and Tobago of 9 February 1999 in the case of Bethel (830/1998) (on file with the author).

the level of the State. The State should have the first opportunity to remedy alleged violations. Yet if a State would have the ultimate say on what constitutes adequacy this would not reflect subsidiarity, but rather absolute national sovereignty.²³⁰

The relationship between provisional measures and exhaustion of domestic remedies is illustrated in Ashby v. Trinidad and Tobago (2002).²³¹ According to the State the petitioner had not exhausted available domestic remedies for his right to life claim (Article 6 ICCPR). Counsel responded that since the petitioner ‘was executed unlawfully while he was pursuing judicial remedies, the State party is estopped from claiming that further remedies remained to be exhausted’.²³² In light of the State’s disrespect for its provisional measures, the HRC declared admissible the complaint under Article 6. It was not necessary for counsel first to exhaust domestic remedies in respect of her claim that her client was arbitrarily deprived of his life. It observed the following about this issue:

“[I]t was to prevent ‘irreparable harm’ to Mr. Ashby that the Committee’s Special Rapporteur issued, on 13 July 1994, a request of a stay of execution pursuant to rule 86 of the rules of procedure; this request was intended to allow Mr. Ashby to complete pending judicial remedies and to enable the Committee to determine the admissibility of Mr. Ashby’s communication”.²³³

In the context of its admissibility decision the HRC specifically referred to the prevention of irreparable harm to Ashby, in other words, irreparable harm to a person. At the same time it referred to the aim of enabling it to determine admissibility. In this respect it noted that the provisional measure was to ensure and reinforce the suspensive effect of the domestic remedies that were still being pursued.²³⁴

The Inter-American Commission has included the issue of exhaustion of domestic remedies in its arguments to convince the Inter-American Court to take provisional measures on behalf of alleged victims who had been sentenced to death. It pointed out that the alleged victims had not been able to effectively challenge the compatibility of their death sentences with the rights under the Convention. In other words, effective domestic remedies did not appear to be available.²³⁵ The Court itself, though, has not dealt with this issue in the context of halting executions.

The African Commission has been faced with non-exhaustion arguments with regard to persons who had already been executed. In the Ken Saro-Wiwa case it noted that in ‘light of the fact that the subjects of the communications are now deceased, it is evident that no domestic remedy can give the complainants the satisfaction they seek’.²³⁶ Indeed this is particularly so because the Commission had used provisional measures that had been ignored. Only when the complaint would have been made by family members subsequent rather than prior to the execution, it should have been examined first whether effective domestic remedies were available.²³⁷

²³⁰ On subsidiarity see also Carozza (2003). See further Chapter XVII on the official responses by addressee States.

²³¹ HRC Glenn Ashby v. Trinidad and Tobago, 21 March 2002.

²³² Id., §7.4.

²³³ Id., §5.7.

²³⁴ Following the HRC’s decision on admissibility the State repeated its argument that proceedings were still pending before the domestic courts in relation to Mr. Ashby’s execution. See also Chapter XVII on the official responses by Addressee States.

²³⁵ See IACHR James et al., Order of the President for urgent measures, 19 June 1999.

²³⁶ ACHPR Ken Saro-Wiwa v. Nigeria, October 1998, §77.

²³⁷ See also the above discussion, under the heading ‘Exhaustion and suspensive effect in non-refoulement cases’, on the disingenuous arguments by some States in non-refoulement cases.

3.4.8 Suspensive effect and cultural survival

In Sara et al. v. Finland (1994) the HRC had initially used provisional measures to help ensure cultural survival.²³⁸ The case shows that the Committee's provisional measures in cases involving cultural survival no longer apply once the HRC considers domestic remedies have not yet been exhausted. In this case the HRC, which had previously used provisional measures, took the opportunity to expand on its earlier admissibility findings in light of the State's argument that the petitioners could still avail themselves of local remedies in respect of road construction activities in the residual area.²³⁹ It declared the case inadmissible. Different from certain death penalty cases,²⁴⁰ this also terminated the provisional measure.

The case of the Lubicon Lake Band (1990), submitted by Chief Ominayak, shows the relationship between provisional measures, exhaustion of domestic remedies and the question whether such remedies have suspensive effect.²⁴¹ The HRC confirmed that if domestic remedies are delayed and have no suspensive effect they cannot prevent irreparable harm. The petitioner claimed that Government officials and representatives of energy corporations were using the domestic political and legal process 'to thwart and delay the Band's actions until, ultimately, the Band becomes incapable of pursuing them, because industrial development at the current rate in the area, accompanied by the destruction of the environmental and economic base of the Band, would make it impossible for the Band to survive as a people for many more years'.²⁴² Since 1975 the Lubicon had already taken various actions domestically to assert title over their lands and prevent oil and gas developments destroying their cultural and economic basis. These actions included a request for a 'caveat', a declaratory judgement and an interim injunction.²⁴³ More than ²³⁸ See Conclusion Part II.

²³⁹ HRC Sara et al. v. Finland, 23 March 1994 (inadm.). It noted that Article 27 ICCPR had seldom been invoked before the local courts, while the Finnish judicial authorities, on the other hand, had become increasingly aware of the domestic relevance of international human rights standards. In this light the doubts of the petitioners about the readiness of domestic courts to deal with claims based on Article 27 ICCPR did not justify their failure to resort to domestic remedies. It did not consider that a recent judgment of the Supreme Administrative Tribunal should be seen as a negative precedent for the adjudication of the case just because it made no reference to Article 27.

²⁴⁰ See section 2.4 of this Chapter.

²⁴¹ HRC Bernard Ominayak, Chief of the Lubicon Lake Band v. Canada, 26 March 1990.

²⁴² See HRC Bernard Ominayak, Chief of the Lubicon Lake Band v. Canada, 26 March 1990, §3.2.

²⁴³ Chief Ominayak explained that, in 1975, the Band filed a request for a 'caveat' with the appropriate authorities, 'which would give notice to all parties dealing with the caveated land of their assertion of their aboriginal title'. A year later the Attorney General of Alberta requested a postponement of the case pending resolution of a similar case and the provincial Supreme Court granted this application. In 1977, however, an amendment to the Land Title Act was passed, introduced by the Attorney General, precluding the filing of caveats. This amendment was made retroactive to January 1975, predating the caveat filed on behalf of the Lubicon Lake Band. As a result, the Supreme Court's hearings were dismissed as moot. In 1980 members of the Band requested a declaratory judgment of the Federal Court of Canada for the protection of the rights to their land and the use of the natural resources. This Court dismissed the claim against the provincial government and all energy corporations except Petro-Canada. The claim against this one energy corporation and against the federal government still stood. In 1982 the Band requested an interim injunction 'to halt development in the area until issues raised by the Band's land and natural resource claims were settled'. The petitioner noted that the main purpose of the injunction was to prevent the provincial government of Alberta and the oil companies 'from further destroying the traditional hunting and trapping territory of the Lubicon people'. The

a year after initial submission and more than two months after the Supreme Court of Canada refused leave to appeal, Canada responded to the petitioner's submission before the HRC and argued that the legal actions in the federal and provincial court were still pending. It explained that the Band's request for an interim injunction had been dismissed on the basis of previous jurisprudence in which the following criteria had been set out for the use of such injunctions: the issue is serious, without the injunction irreparable harm will be suffered prior to trial and, finally, 'the balance of convenience between the parties favours relief to the applicant'.²⁴⁴ The dispute was mainly about whether the Band 'could be adequately compensated in damages if it was ultimately successful at trial'. The petitioner explained his reason to resort to the HRC as follows:

"The Lubicon Lake Band is not requesting a territorial rights decision. Rather, the Band requests only that the Human Rights Committee assist it in attempting to convince the government of Canada that: (a) The Band's existence is seriously threatened by the oil and gas development that has been allowed to proceed unchecked on their traditional hunting grounds and in complete disregard for the human community inhabiting the area; (b) Canada is responsible for the current state of affairs and for co-operating in their resolution in accordance with article 1 of the Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights".²⁴⁵

He argued that the only effective remedy in this case was to seek an interim injunction. He noted that 'without the preservation of the status quo, a final judgment on the merits, even if favourable to the Band, would be rendered ineffectual'.²⁴⁶

"[A]ny final judgement recognizing aboriginal rights, or alternatively treaty rights, [could] never restore the way of life, livelihood and means of subsistence of the Band".²⁴⁷

In reference to its established case law that only effective and available remedies must be exhausted, the HRC found that there were no effective remedies still available to the Band.²⁴⁸ It was only at this time, in 1987, that the HRC also used provisional measures to avoid irreparable harm. It did so in light of the seriousness of the claim that the Band was on the verge of extinction.²⁴⁹

The fact that the HRC declared the case admissible shows that it did not consider the domestic remedies effective in saving or restoring the 'cultural livelihood' of the Band. It confirmed this following the State's request for a review.²⁵⁰ This may mean that at the time it still assumed provincial court, however, 'did not render its decision for almost two years, during which time oil and gas development continued, along with rapid destruction of the Band's economic base'. It eventually denied the request. They appealed this decision to the Court of Appeal of Alberta, which dismissed it more than a year later. Finally, the Band requested leave to appeal from the judgment of the Alberta Court of Appeal, but the Supreme Court of Canada refused this in March 1985.

²⁴⁴ See Supreme Court of Canada Erickson v. Wiggins Adjustments Ltd. (1980) 6 W.R.R. 188.

²⁴⁵ HRC Lubicon Lake Band, 26 March 1990, §12.

²⁴⁶ Id., §13.2.

²⁴⁷ Id., §13.2.

²⁴⁸ Id., §13.2.

²⁴⁹ See Chapter X on protecting cultural survival of indigenous peoples.

²⁵⁰ Wennergren submitted an individual opinion considering the communication inadmissible because of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies. "To my mind, it is not compatible with international law that an international instance consider issues which, concurrently, are pending before a national court". He did not specifically discuss the availability of domestic remedies that its decision on the merits, if it would find a violation, would at least suggest an effective remedy.²⁵¹ In light of the absence of suspensive effect of the domestic proceedings, the use of provisional measures was appropriate.²⁵² However, they would have been more functional had they been taken earlier in the proceedings.²⁵³ The Committee's decision only to use provisional measures in this case once it declared it admissible, may be explained by the fact that in 1987 it did not yet have an extensive practice with regard to provisional measures, let alone with regard to their use to protect of cultural survival of indigenous peoples.

3.4.9 Conclusion

In sum, the above cases indicate that human rights adjudicators have determined that for the same reason there is no need to fully determine admissibility for the use of provisional measures, there is no need to exhaust domestic remedies that do not have suspensive effect. This reason is the overriding aim of protecting persons against irreparable harm in death penalty, non-refoulement and cultural survival cases.

Given the fact that for the use of provisional measures what is required is, at most, prima facie admissibility, it is obvious that they may be used when domestic remedies clearly have been determined as ineffective in previous cases. In addition provisional measures are sometimes even used when those domestic remedies that could be effective are not yet exhausted, but might be at any moment.²⁵⁴

3.5 Provisional measures and the likelihood of inadmissibility for reasons other than non-exhaustion

3.5.1 Introduction

To what extent does possible inadmissibility for reasons other than non-exhaustion play a role in the decision of the human rights adjudicator to take provisional measures?²⁵⁵ This section first refers to the fact that many claims are declared inadmissible as manifestly unfounded and some as an abuse of process. Then it deals with inadmissibility because the same matter has already been with suspensive effect, nor the Committee's previous case law on the effectiveness of domestic remedies.

²⁵¹ See further on this case Chapter X (Culture) and Chapter XIII, section 5 on beneficiaries and section 4 on forms of reparation.

²⁵² They made little sense, however, in light of the remedy suggested immediately upon upholding the admissibility decision. This remedy did not amount to much, as is discussed in Chapter XIII on the relationship between provisional measures and reparation.

²⁵³ See also Chapter XV on immediacy and risk.

²⁵⁴ See also Chapter II (the sections on promptness in the various systems).

²⁵⁵ The HRC, for instance, has regularly declared cases inadmissible for incompatibility with the ICCPR. It has also dealt with arguments that petitions were inadmissible as an abuse of the right of submission, for instance in light of consecutive claims by the same petitioner. In addition it has declared cases inadmissible as they cannot claim to be a 'victim' of a violation. Cases involving Article 6 (right to life) and risks to health of environmental pollution are often considered to constitute actio popularis and are declared inadmissible as the petitioners cannot show they are or will be victims themselves in the foreseeable future. In such cases the HRC has decided not to use provisional measures. See also Chapter XII (Other situations) and Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

dealt with by another international adjudicator ('same matter'). Finally it refers to the Bosnia Chamber's discussion of its jurisdiction ratione temporis under the Dayton Peace Agreement.

3.5.2 Manifestly unfounded or an abuse of process?

Many cases are declared inadmissible as manifestly unfounded. In death penalty cases provisional measures have nevertheless been used. An example of an inadmissibility decision for reasons other than non-exhaustion is R.M. v. Trinidad and Tobago (1993).²⁵⁶ The HRC declared inadmissible many claims in relation to Art. 14(1), especially when they involve claims of inadequate evaluation of the evidence or inadequate jury instructions by the trial judge.²⁵⁷

In Hylton v. Jamaica (1996) the State had argued that the communication was inadmissible as an abuse of the right of submission (Article 3 OP).²⁵⁸ The Committee stated that although the petitioner should display due diligence in the presentation of claims, and although 'it is conceivable that the sequential introduction, in the course of consideration of a case, of claims which could have been formulated at the time of the initial submission may constitute an abuse of process, this does not apply if the petitioner of a case whose examination is concluded subsequently raises new claims which he could not have raised in the context of the previous complaint. In the Committee's opinion, issues of res judicata do not arise in the latter hypothesis'.²⁵⁹ The 'death row phenomenon'-claim brought in the second case was not at issue in the first case.

²⁵⁶ HRC R.M. v. Trinidad and Tobago, 29 October 1993 (submission of 16 July 1989; provisional measure of 29 January 1990; transmission of 13 August 1991; inadmissible (evaluation of the evidence and jury instructions generally for the domestic courts; insufficient evidence of inadequate time and facilities) (on file with the author). According to the cover page the Special Rapporteur used Rule 91 (on transmission of cases) only, but in fact the previous Rapporteur had already used Rule 86 (provisional measures). The HRC later declared this case inadmissible for failure to substantiate and lack of jurisdiction ratione materiae. The State party had raised no objections to the admissibility of the claim. The only matter that remained pending in court was a constitutional motion, filed in July 1986, seeking a 'declaration that should an order for the execution be made', the petitioner 'must be given five days notice'. The State added that it had given assurances not to execute R.M. pending the determination of the motion, although it pointed out that the motion itself was 'unnecessary' because the question had already been solved in the affirmative in another case.

²⁵⁷ The HRC never intended to function as a so-called 'fourth instance' and in two early inadmissibility decisions (1989) it pointed out that it was for the appellate courts of States parties to evaluate facts and evidence. It was beyond the scope of application of Article 14 for the HRC to review generalised claims of bias or specific jury instructions. Chanet attached individual opinions to these decisions, considering that in this formulation the HRC seemed to take away too much from its task of monitoring compliance with Article 14 (fair trial). HRC A.W. v. Jamaica, 8 November 1989 and G.S. v. Jamaica, 8 November 1989. Chanet noted that while it was within the competence of national courts to assess the fairness of the conditions in which a trial takes place, this competence could not exclude that of the HRC in the implementation of the ICCPR. The HRC modified its formulation during the next session in March 1990. Since then the expression has been: "It is not in principle for the Committee to review specific instructions to the jury by a judge in a trial by jury, unless it can be ascertained that the instructions to the jury were clearly arbitrary or amounted to a denial of justice". See e.g. HRC D.F. v. Jamaica, 26 March 1990 (not a death penalty case; no provisional measures).

²⁵⁸ HRC Dwayne Hylton v. Jamaica, 16 July 1996.

²⁵⁹ Id., §6.3.

“Given that he had been detained on death row for slightly over two years when he submitted his initial complaint, he could not have argued with any reasonable prospect of success that the length of his detention on death row was, at that time, contrary to articles 7 and 10 paragraph 1”,²⁶⁰

In October 1994, when he submitted his second case, his factual situation had changed.

“In these circumstances, the present complaint does not amount to an abuse of process; nor does the Committee consider that it ‘unnecessarily prolongs’ the judicial process, as the claim at issue in the present communication has never been adjudicated”.²⁶¹

Thus, the communication was declared admissible in so far as it concerned the length of detention on death row. The HRC later dismissed the claim on the merits.²⁶² In this type of consecutive claim the use of provisional measures would be justifiable. This would be different with regard to a clear case of abuse of process.²⁶³

3.5.3 Same matter

In some cases the petitioner first petitions to a regional and subsequently to an international adjudicator. In Wright v. Jamaica (1992) the HRC declared a case admissible because it was no longer under examination by the Inter-American Commission.²⁶⁴ Just like the IACHR the HRC found that the State had violated the fundamental right to a fair trial.²⁶⁵

In the first expulsion case dealt with by the HRC (1978) it did draw the petitioner’s attention to the State party’s observation that the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights was examining the ‘same matter’. It decided ‘that it should be explained to the petitioner that this is not a decision on the admissibility of his communication,’ but it used provisional measures.²⁶⁶ This again shows that the HRC is rather safe than sorry initially.

²⁶⁰ Id., §6.4.

²⁶¹ Ibid.

²⁶² Thus far it has virtually always dismissed claims relating to the death row phenomenon either on the merits or already in the admissibility phase. See for two possible exceptions the discussion of the death row phenomenon in Chapter III (Halting executions).

²⁶³ The question arises what would be the use of taking provisional measures to halt an execution pending the case in relation to a death row phenomenon claim alone, if the HRC is intent on maintaining its present approach towards such claims.

²⁶⁴ HRC Clifton Wright v. Jamaica, 27 July 1992, §2.8. The case had been submitted to the CIDH on 13 February 1984, registered as no. 9260, hearing of 24 March 1988 and resolution 29/88 of 14 September 1988. On 4 November 1988 Jamaica challenged this resolution. Two months later the case was submitted to the HRC.

²⁶⁵ It had declared that ‘since the conviction and sentence are undermined by the record in this case, and that the appeals process did not permit for a correction, the Government of Jamaica has violated the petitioner’s fundamental rights’ under Article 25 ACHR. This is a rare case in which the HRC found a violation of Article 14(1) for a denial of justice. See Chapter XV on assessment of risk.

²⁶⁶ HRC O.E. v. S., 26 July 1978. On 27 October 1978 the HRC decided to discontinue consideration of the case. A few weeks previously the petitioner had requested this in light of the submission of the same matter to the Inter-American Commission. O.E. v. S., 27 October 1978. See also e.g. HRC Alzery v. Sweden, 25 October 2006. Yet see also CAT A.R.A. v. Switzerland, 30 April 2007 (inadm.). The case was declared inadmissible for dealing with the same matters as one before the ECtHR. Previously a request for provisional measures had been denied.

Related to the issue of consecutive claims before the same adjudicator, is the issue of the same matter brought before a different adjudicator. Uruguay had contested the admissibility of several early detention cases before the HRC arguing that the ‘same matter’ was pending before the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights. It appears that any prima facie inadmissibility on this ground did not prevent the HRC from inquiring about the health of the alleged victims. A combination of the urgency involved and the fact that the petitioners could easily remedy any possible inadmissibility by withdrawing the complaint before the Inter-American Commission in advance of any decision by the HRC, could explain this approach.

It is unlikely that the HRC already considered the possible inadmissibility in Sendic v. Uruguay (1981)²⁶⁷ when it transmitted the case to the State and requested information on the state of health of Mr. Sendic. After all, it was only after Uruguay contested the admissibility of the case that the Committee checked with the Secretariat of the Inter-American Commission whether the ‘same matter’ might already be pending before that Commission. Upon inquiry the Secretariat of the Inter-American Commission explained that a third party had submitted the case to which the State referred.²⁶⁸

By contrast, when the HRC enquired about the health of the alleged victims in Lafuente Penarrieta et al. v. Bolivia (1987)²⁶⁹ it had already ascertained that the Inter-American Commission had not registered the same matter. Still, this may be attributed to the fact that, at the time, the HRC could only decide on (informal) provisional measures during sessions, as there was no Special Rapporteur yet.²⁷⁰ In Polay Campos v. Peru (1997)²⁷¹ the HRC used informal provisional measures only when it declared the case admissible. By that time it had contacted the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights to find out whether the same matter was already pending before another international adjudicator. The Inter-American Commission had registered a case²⁷² on behalf of Polay Campos but it had no plans to prepare a Report on it within the next 12 months. In this light the HRC considered it was not precluded from considering the case before it. Nevertheless, the reason the Committee did not use (informal) provisional measures before it decided on admissibility is probably due to an oversight rather than based on the view that admissibility must be determined before provisional measures could be used.²⁷³

3.5.4 Dayton and jurisdiction ratione temporis

The Dayton Peace Agreement entered into force on 14 December 1995. The Bosnia Chamber does not have jurisdiction ratione temporis over violations prior to that date. It declared admissible several cases involving violations originating before that date but continuing until afterwards. In Islamic Community in BiH v. Republika Srpska (Muslim Town Cemetery in Prnjavor), for instance, the Chamber first established that the violation was ongoing and it had jurisdiction ratione temporis and subsequently took the view that it was ‘not necessary to assess whether at ²⁶⁷ HRC Sendic Antonaccio (submitted by his wife Violeta Setelich) v. Uruguay, 28 October 1981.

²⁶⁸ Later the petitioner also sent the Committee a copy of the request by this third party to the Commission to discontinue the case before it ‘so as to remove any procedural uncertainties’ about the HRC’s competence to deal with the case.

²⁶⁹ HRC Lafuente Penarrieta, Rodriguez Candia, Ruiz Caceres and Toro Dorado v. Bolivia, 2 November 1987.

²⁷⁰ See Chapter XV on prompt decision-making and assessment of temporal urgency.

²⁷¹ HRC Polay Campos (submitted by his wife Espinoza de Polay) v. Peru, 6 November 1997.

²⁷² Case 11.048.

²⁷³ It was Committee member Prado Vallejo (Ecuador) who suggested the use of such provisional measures in July 1996, just before the adoption of the admissibility decision. Letter of Prado Vallejo to the Geneva Secretariat, 2 July 1996 (on file with the author).

the time when the alleged violation began, a remedy effective in theory and practice would have been available to the applicant'. It was satisfied that the remedy indicated by the respondent Party was 'currently not available' and had not been available since the entry into force of the Agreement.²⁷⁴

In Matanović (1997) Nowak pointed out that the fact that most missing persons in Bosnia and Herzegovina disappeared before the entry into force of the Dayton Peace Agreement did not preclude it from considering such cases 'if there is presumptive evidence that they were still held in detention' after the entry into force. He referred to Article 17 (1) of the UN Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from enforced Disappearance stipulating that 'as long as the perpetrators continue to conceal the fate and the whereabouts of persons who have disappeared and these facts remain unclarified' the act of enforced disappearance constitutes a 'continuing offence'.²⁷⁵

The Chamber has pointed out that 'evidence of detention prior of the entry into force of the Agreement may well be relevant to the question whether the person concerned has been in custody since'.²⁷⁶ The weight to be attached to such evidence varies with the circumstances, 'including the length of time which has elapsed since the person concerned was last shown to have been in custody'. Normally 'it would be essential that there should be some other evidence (even circumstantial or presumptive evidence), pointing to the detention having continued after the Agreement came into force, before the Chamber could conclude that the Agreement had been violated'.²⁷⁷ While doubts on jurisdiction ratione temporis may not be an obstacle to the use of provisional measures, at the same time it is clear that it is more likely that disappeared persons will return alive if provisional measures are taken shortly after the disappearance.²⁷⁸

3.6 Admissibility criteria and the two kinds of provisional measures in the new Convention against Disappearances

In urgent cases the supervisory committee that will be instituted under the International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance²⁷⁹ may use either provisional measures proper, with regard to States that have recognized the individual complaint procedure under Article 31,²⁸⁰ or an alternative type of provisional measure, based on Article 30. This article introduces the possibility for the Committee to intervene upon a request 'by relatives of the disappeared person or their legal representatives, their counsel or any person authorized by them, as well as by any other person having a legitimate interest' that 'a disappeared person should be

²⁷⁴ Bosnia Chamber Islamic Community in BiH v. Republika Srpska (Muslim Town Cemetery in Prnjavor), 11 January 2000, §93.

²⁷⁵ Bosnia Chamber Josip, Božana and Tomislav Matanović v. Republika Srpska, 6 August 1997 (merits), concurring opinion Manfred Nowak, §7.

²⁷⁶ Bosnia Chamber Grgić v. Republika Srpska, 5 August 1997, §18.

²⁷⁷ See Bosnia Chamber Grgić v. Republika Srpska, 5 August 1997, §18 and Matanović v. Republika Srpska, 6 August 1997, §32.

²⁷⁸ See also Chapter VI (Locating and protecting disappeared persons).

²⁷⁹ Adopted in 2006, but not yet entered into force.

²⁸⁰ Article 31 provides for an optional individual complaint procedure. Its section 4 stipulates: "4. At any time after the receipt of a communication and before a determination on the merits has been reached, the Committee may transmit to the State Party concerned for its urgent consideration a request that the State Party will take such interim measures as may be necessary to avoid possible irreparable damage to the victims of the alleged violation. Where the Committee exercises its discretion, this does not imply a determination on admissibility or on the merits of the communication".

sought and found'. In fact when it considers that a range of procedural requirements is met, it 'shall request the State Party concerned to provide it with information on the situation of the persons sought, within a time limit set by the Committee'. It appears to be a very circumscribed treaty based 'urgent action'. The procedural requirements are stricter than those applied by the other adjudicators. The reason for including the list of procedural requirements (exhaustion etc.) that are generally relevant mainly for declaring a case admissible, and not already at the state of provisional measures, may be that the States wished to circumscribe the new power of the treaty body introduced in this treaty. After all it can intervene also with regard to States that have not recognized the individual complaint procedure. Nevertheless these requirements are mentioned in the context of the Committee's obligation to intervene ('shall'). The Committee could argue that it still has the discretionary power to intervene also in other cases, especially in circumstances in which all other adjudicators, as well as the UN special procedures, consider this warranted.

In any case this strict approach should not be read into Article 31(4) on provisional measures proper. Such interpretation would be a retreat from the practice of the other treaty bodies and contrary to the object and purpose of the treaty, including the reference to 'admissibility' in the sentence in Article 31(4) noting that the use of provisional measures, based on a discretionary power, 'does not imply a determination on admissibility or on the merits of the communication'. Like in the other systems, only when inadmissibility or lack of jurisdiction is evident, provisional measures should be refused.

4 CONCLUSION

What is the standard for assuming the competence to use provisional measures in light of the likelihood of jurisdiction on the merits? The rules discussed in Chapter I on traditional international law seem to apply in human rights cases as well, but in those cases the adjudicator appears more flexible, not requiring prima facie admissibility. Rather, only if the case were prima facie inadmissible an adjudicator would have no competence to use provisional measures.²⁸¹ In other words there is no need to determine admissibility and jurisdiction on the merits other than at very first glance.

If the State has not ratified the individual complaint procedure, the adjudicator clearly has no jurisdiction on the merits and therefore no competence to use provisional measures. In other cases, for purposes of provisional measures, the adjudicator is normally assumed to be competent to deal with the case. Generally speaking the human rights adjudicators are not reticent on this issue. The HRC and the Inter-American Court have used provisional measures in cases involving disputed recognition of their authority. They reserved determination of a dispute, e.g. on the significance of certain reservations, to the phase of preliminary objections or admissibility. One case by the HRC involving a dispute about its competence to deal with complaints despite the reservations by the State concerned serves as an example. In that case those members disagreeing with the majority's position that it had such jurisdiction still emphasised that the HRC had nevertheless acted legitimately in using provisional measures.²⁸² More than the ICJ, human rights adjudicators have confirmed the principle that there is no need to finally establish their jurisdiction before using provisional measures.

²⁸¹ The only exception is Rule 94(4) of the CERD Rules of Procedure, discussing the possibility of using provisional measures only with regard to 'admissible communications'.

²⁸² See individual opinion Ando, Bhagwati, Klein and Kretzmer in HRC Rawle Kennedy v. Trinidad and Tobago, admissibility decision of 2 November 1999.

One example in which this principle also applies, or should apply, is in the context of the extraterritorial application of human rights treaties. Most adjudicators, including the ICJ, have recognized that States may have obligations under human rights treaties with regard to acts (and sometimes omissions) by their agents outside of the national borders. Some human rights adjudicators have already been faced with requests for provisional measures in this context and this may increasingly be the case in the future. While the case law is yet to fully crystallize, the adjudicators should not shrink from using provisional measures, if otherwise warranted, simply because they might later declare themselves incompetent to deal with such an ‘extraterritorial’ petition.

As to the duration of provisional measures, human rights adjudicators sometimes indicate that they apply until a given date, until ‘further notice’ or until a decision on admissibility has been made. In those cases, if there would still be urgency, they will extend the provisional measures just before expiry of the previous date, or upon declaring the case admissible. At other times they note that the provisional measures apply ‘pending the case’, meaning throughout the proceedings. One remarkable practice of the HRC has been to maintain its provisional measures upon declaring the case inadmissible. It did so in death penalty cases where the inadmissibility declaration related to non-exhaustion and was open to review. In its decision it reminded the State, under its Rule on provisional measures, not to execute the petitioner in the period between exhaustion and a renewed petition to the HRC. Thus if it declares a death penalty case inadmissible for non-exhaustion of domestic remedies, it may maintain provisional measures to cover the period between inadmissibility and the resubmission of the case following exhaustion. If the State would execute the petitioner before he would have a chance to renew his submission, this would in fact pre-empt the use provisional measures.²⁸³ In such cases it operates from the perspective that the case is still pending. This shows the importance the HRC attaches to the protective function of its provisional measures to protect against irreparable harm. As compared to the ICJ it seems to have developed a sui generis approach to jurisdiction for purposes of provisional measures, based on this protective function. If irreparable harm could otherwise take place it is indeed appropriate for adjudicators dealing with human rights cases to maintain their provisional measures in cases susceptible to review.

The Inter-American Court has determined that, if necessary, its provisional measures remain applicable even beyond its judgment on reparations because it considers cases closed only once they are fully implemented. Therefore it appears to view its jurisdiction as extending until that moment. In a similar vein, the HRC has sometimes followed up its decision on the merits, urgently communicating to the State, in the face of an execution date, that at the very least its findings of a violation meant that the death sentence should not be executed.²⁸⁴

With regard to general international law the argument has been made that because provisional measures primarily serve the legal interests of those requesting them, ‘the principle of equality of parties before justice requires that the balance be restored by restraint in the practice of granting interim protection and by allowing the benefit of doubt to serve the respondent’.²⁸⁵ Obviously this argument does not apply in cases involving risk of irreparable harm to persons. In such cases it is clearly not necessary nor warranted, in light of the urgency concerned, to wait

²⁸³ See also the discussion in Chapter XVI (Legal status) on the case law of the HRC to the effect that a good faith application of the ICCPR and its Optional Protocol means that States are to halt executions once they are informed that a petition has been brought before the HRC, in other words, already before the HRC has taken provisional measures.

²⁸⁴ In fact this is a follow-up to its final View, finding a violation of Article 14 and, therefore, Article 6 ICCPR. On the official responses of States and the follow up of provisional measures see Chapters XVII and XVIII.

²⁸⁵ Sztucki (1983), pp. 258-259.

until jurisdiction and admissibility are fully determined before using provisional measures.²⁸⁶ Within the conceptual framework proposed in this book, and consonant with the practice of the HRC and Inter-American Court, it is suggested that if the State has withdrawn from the individual complaint procedure and different interpretations are possible about the competence (e.g. ratione temporis) of the adjudicator to still deal with the case, this should be examined as part of the decision on preliminary objections or admissibility and not already at the stage of provisional measures. As noted by the ICJ in its Order in the Nuclear Test cases (1973) it should be sufficient that there is no a priori lack of jurisdiction.²⁸⁷ As noted, in light of the principle of effective protection against irreparable harm to persons²⁸⁸ in human rights adjudication there should be no need to determine prima facie admissibility. Only if the case were prima facie inadmissible an adjudicator would have no competence to use provisional measures. In such cases it could be worthwhile for UN treaty body adjudicators to forward to other appropriate UN bodies or special mechanisms urgent cases for which they have no prima facie jurisdiction. In the alternative they could inform the petitioners about other possibilities.

From the analysis of the wider issue of admissibility (not just involving jurisdiction on the merits) in cases in which provisional measures were used, it is clear that at the stage of provisional measures there is no need for full evidence about admissibility. This appears from the fact that the human rights adjudicators use provisional measures before they declare cases (in)admissible. Yet the case law does not explicitly say whether some measure of prima facie evidence for admissibility is required for the use of provisional measures. It would not be unreasonable for them to require, in a flexible manner, that the case is not prima facie inadmissible, as the ICJ does.

In urgent cases petitioners may resort to various international and domestic adjudicators at the same time. This does not necessarily conflict with rules on exhaustion of local remedies on the one hand and non-submission of the 'same matter' to different international adjudicators on the other hand, as long as this is done only at the early stages of the proceedings, in order to prevent irreparable harm to the persons involved. Subsequently the petitioner needs to withdraw one of the petitions. This means that the other case will not result in inadmissibility and therefore does not affect the possibility to use provisional measures.

If the applicable remedies have no suspensive effect, exhaustion of domestic remedies is not necessary before granting provisional measures. In decisions on admissibility human rights adjudicators have made clear that domestic remedies must only be exhausted to the extent that they have suspensive effect. If they do not have such effect, resort is warranted to an international adjudicator who can also use provisional measures before determining that the domestic remedies indeed lack suspensive effect. After all, it is exactly in situations in which the domestic remedies do not prevent irreparable harm, that provisional measures are warranted. In this approach the international adjudicator would equally have competence to use provisional measures if the domestic proceedings are theoretically capable of halting certain measures, in other words, have suspensive effect, but not in practice – for instance because of a domestic theory of 'balance of convenience', whereby the interest of the petitioner is balanced with those of the State (or 'the general interest'). As noted, this balancing is inappropriate in relation to those rights singled out in the human rights treaties for their fundamental nature, not allowing for derogation even in times of emergency.²⁸⁹ With such domestic approaches remedies may not have suspensive effect in practice and the use of provisional measures may be warranted. This is not contrary to the text ²⁸⁶ In this respect Rule 94(3) of the CERD Rules of Procedure is an anomaly.

²⁸⁷ ICJ Nuclear Tests case (New Zealand v. France), Order of 22 June 1973.

²⁸⁸ See Conclusion Part II and Chapter XVI (Legal status).

²⁸⁹ See Chapter XIII, section 4 on the beneficiaries of provisional measures.

of the respective provisions on exhaustion, while it corresponds with the principle of effective protection of persons against irreparable harm.²⁹⁰ In addition, if a complaint is submitted to more than one international adjudicator, provisional measures could initially be requested by the petitioner and used by both adjudicators. The petitioner should subsequently indicate which claim he maintains. Any provisional measures used by the other adjudicator should then be withdrawn. In some instances, if the case would later be declared inadmissible, the petitioner could bring a renewed claim to the other adjudicator.²⁹¹

In general, human rights adjudicators, like other international adjudicators, consider provisional measures terminated upon inadmissibility declaration or final judgment.

Yet they often deal with extreme situations of threats to life and physical integrity. In some cases this warrants an approach to jurisdiction and admissibility that is different from that taken by other adjudicators, dealing with non-human rights cases.

Even without formally maintaining or taking provisional measures, if there is still a threat following final determination, the follow-up proceeding could specifically indicate that the case would only be closed once resolved.²⁹² At minimum, the adjudicator should commit actively to follow up the final decision not only through regular follow-up proceedings but also through emergency proceedings and press releases. In exceptional cases it could also decide proprio motu to ask the petitioner whether she wishes to re-institute a case and take new provisional measures. A final option would be to 'maintain' the provisional measures formally. This last option would be feasible after an adjudicator has built up a considerable practice of using provisional measures aiming to protect witnesses, human rights defenders and others against death threats and harassment, as is the case in the Inter-American system. Provisional measures could then become a tool to some extent operating independently from the main proceedings. Thus far, the Inter-American system, which is the only system maintaining provisional measures even beyond the judgments on the merits or reparations, is also a system that includes a provision on provisional measures in the treaty itself. Different from systems where the authority to use provisional measures is implied, this explicit presence may justify such 'free-standing' provisional measures. Such measures protect against irreparable harm to persons by treating a case as pending so long as it has not yet been implemented. On the other hand, if the authority is implicit the irreparable harm to persons must be linked to the case on the merits, either because of irreparable harm to the claim or because of irreparable harm to the procedure. In any case, whether the authority to order provisional measures is implicit or explicit, awareness of the irreparable nature of the harm has been reflected in the case law of the human rights adjudicators.

²⁹⁰ See Conclusion Part II on the purpose of preventing irreparable harm to persons and Chapter XVI on legal status.

²⁹¹ This depends on whether the system allows it and the State concerned has not made a reservation to this option.

²⁹² See also Chapter XVIII (Follow-up).

CHAPTER XV

IMMEDIACY AND RISK

1 INTRODUCTION

Just like the ICJ human rights adjudicators will abstain from using provisional measures if there is no urgency. This applies to both the immediacy, or imminence, of the risk (temporal urgency) and to the likelihood of the risk (material urgency).¹ This Chapter will discuss both imminence and the likelihood of risk.

The ICJ has pointed out that ‘imminence’ is synonymous with ‘immediacy’ or ‘proximity’ and goes ‘far beyond’ the concept of ‘possibility’.² This does not exclude ‘that a “peril” in the long term might be held to be “imminent” as soon as it is established, at the relevant point in time, that the realisation of that peril, however far off it might be, is not thereby any less certain and inevitable’.³ Yet in Pulp mills on the river Uruguay (Argentina v. Uruguay), it denied Argentina’s request for provisional measures (2006), among others, for lack of imminence, because ‘the threat of any pollution is not imminent as the mills are not expected to be operational’ before the summer of 2007 and that of 2008, respectively.⁴

In cases not involving the environment imminence sometimes is easier to pinpoint. When the ICJ ordered provisional measures to halt the execution of the death penalty in Avena (2003) it did not do so on behalf of all 52 Mexican nationals on death row in the US, but just on behalf of three of them for whom an execution date was imminent because they had exhausted domestic remedies.⁵

The other aspect of urgency involves the likelihood of risk. Adjudicators do apply some evidentiary requirements for showing risk at the stage of provisional measures. In addition the manner in which they assess the evidence is important for the question whether they will use such measures. The manner in which they assess this evidence has an impact on the timing of provisional measures as well. As seen in Chapter II, this timing, in turn, partly determines the impact the provisional measure will eventually have.

¹ The importance of the value to be protected was discussed in Part II on the purpose of provisional measures. As noted in Chapter I the phrase ‘temporal urgency’ or ‘urgency in the temporal sense’ is taken from Judge Treves (ITLOS) who distinguishes between the ‘temporal dimension of the requirement of urgency’ and the ‘qualitative dimension’. See ITLOS Separate Opinion of judge Treves in the Southern Bluefin Tuna cases, Order of 27 August 1999.

² ICJ Gabcikovo-Nagymaros (Hungary v. Slovakia), Judgment of 25 September 1997, §54 (no provisional measures because of an agreement between the parties).

³ ICJ Gabcikovo-Nagymaros (Hungary v. Slovakia), judgment of 25 September 1997, §54.

⁴ ICJ Pulp mills on the river Uruguay (Argentina v. Uruguay), Order of 13 July 2006 (denying provisional measures, among others because ‘the threat of any pollution is not imminent as the mills are not expected to be operational before August 2007 (Orion mill) and June 2008 (CMB mill)’, §75).

⁵ ICJ Avena and other Mexican nationals (Mexico v. US), Order of 5 February 2003, Avena and other Mexican nationals (Mexico v. US), Judgment of 31 March 2004), §21. On the issue of exhaustion see also Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction and admissibility).

At the stage of provisional measures the adjudicators do not indicate their criteria for assessment of risk. Clarifying their approach with regard to evidentiary requirements on the merits is the first step to understanding their approach towards the risk required for the use of provisional measures. Very often decisions on the merits in human rights cases turn on evidentiary requirements rather than the legal interpretation of the scope of substantive rights. This applies in particular to cases involving the death penalty, expulsion and extradition and threats to indigenous culture and it is relevant as well in the context of requests for provisional measures. Addressee States often contest provisional measures exactly on factual issues, for instance denying the existence of a ‘real risk’.

Adjudicators indeed try to assess risk before they use provisional measures. Without this the credibility and persuasive force of such measures would be limited. Yet do the adjudicators take into account the inequality between the parties and the irreparable nature of the harm faced by the petitioners? Similar to the link between the importance attached to preventing irreparable harm and the issue of jurisdiction and admissibility, discussed in the previous chapter, there appears to be a link between this importance and the issues of temporal urgency and risk.

This chapter first addresses the issue of temporal urgency (section 2). Then it refers to statements on evidentiary requirements found in decisions on the merits, paying attention to some of the pitfalls in the case law of the human rights adjudicators. It is assumed that deciding whether provisional measures are warranted depends on the available information on likelihood of risk at that stage (section 3). It also examines criteria suggested in the context of the precautionary principle to see whether they could be of use to understand assessment of risk in human rights cases (section 4).

2 ASSESSMENT OF TEMPORAL URGENCY

2.1 Introduction

Before human right adjudicators decide to use provisional measures they generally determine whether the material risk, discussed in the next section, is imminent.⁶ Do the human rights adjudicators take an approach to temporal urgency that is as strict as that of the ICJ in its refusal to order provisional measures in Pulp Mills? Or have they taken a more flexible approach, taking into account the irreparable nature of the harm faced by the petitioners and the inequality between the parties?⁷

2.2 Immediacy in death penalty cases

Provisional measures to halt an execution only serve a purpose when they are used prior to an execution date. They should preferably be known to the relevant authorities well in advance of ⁶ See also Van Boven (2006), p. 99.

⁷ They did take such a flexible approach with regard to jurisdiction and admissibility, discussed in Chapter XIV. It is important to keep in mind as well that Pulp Mills may have depended more on doubts on the irreparable nature of the harm, which was the other reason for the Court’s refusal to order provisional measures. See Chapter I on ICJ and ITLOS, as well as Conclusion Part II, on the Purpose of provisional measures in human rights adjudication.

this date. After all, a busy prison phone could result in an execution for someone who just received clemency.⁸

Attitudes have differed within the HRC about the need to use provisional measures if the execution is not imminent.⁹ Some members have considered provisional measures should be used in such cases as well, simply as a matter of principle.¹⁰

In the submission to the HRC in Yasseen and Thomas v. Republic of Guyana (1998),¹¹ counsel noted that the petitioners could not be expected to wait until their final claim had been heard before resorting to the HRC. Given the nature of the situation, ‘the authors will be pursuing all legal procedures until the very last minute.’ If they would wait until their final claim would have been heard they would have to wait ‘until a moment dangerously close to their execution before invoking their rights under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights’.

⁸ NRC Handelsblad, ‘executie wegens drukke telefoon’, 26 June 1999 (reporting about the failed attempt of the President of the Philippines to cancel an execution, because the telephone lines of the prison were busy). In relation to halting corporal punishment one of the provisional measures decisions was taken within eleven days and the other within a year. In Osbourne v. Jamaica, 15 March 2000, the complaint was submitted on 12 June 1997 (the case file mentions 6 June which would mean 17 rather than 11 days) and it appears from the files in Geneva that the HRC used provisional measures on 23 June 1997. In Higginson v. Jamaica, 28 March 2002, the initial submission was on 20 January 1997 while the Special Rapporteur only transmitted its provisional measures decision to the State on 14 January 1998, almost a year later. While the Committee published its View in Matthews v. Trinidad and Tobago, the first case dealing with corporal punishment, on 31 March 1998, and its first use of provisional measures to halt corporal punishment dates from 23 June 1997 (on behalf of Osbourne) and its second dates from 14 January 1998 (on behalf of Higginson), it is unlikely that it already used provisional measures in Matthews. His complaint was of 11 October 1993 and the Committee declared it admissible, also with regard to the corporal punishment issue, two years later. Indeed the file does not indicate the use of provisional measures.

⁹ While before 1989 the full Committee decided to use provisional measures on behalf of all petitioners awaiting execution, the first two Special Rapporteurs on New Communications decided to intervene only in the face of an execution date. There was a decrease in the use of provisional measures by the HRC from 1989 until early 1993. This could to some extent be explained by a different attitude of the Committee towards the immediacy of the threat. In many cases the HRC does not indicate the date on which it used provisional measures.

¹⁰ See e.g. interview by author with Special Rapporteur Scheinin, Geneva, April 2003. See the discussion of transparency or obscurity in Chapter II (Systems). While its promptness is unclear in these cases (at least on the basis of publicly available information), the discussion in the View may still provide some information relevant to the issue of urgency and exhaustion of local remedies.

¹¹ HRC Abdool Saleem Yasseen and Noel Thomas v. Republic of Guyana, 30 March 1998. On 1 February 1996 a warrant of execution was read to them. The next day they submitted the case to the HRC. That week the HRC used provisional measures and it sent reminders twice (on file with the author). “On Thursday 1 February 1996 at 3:00 p.m., warrants were read to the authors for their execution at 8:00 a.m. on Monday 5 February 1996. The normal practice is for warrants to be read on a Thursday for the execution to take place the following Tuesday. The authors’ families were informed of the execution through an anonymous telephone call at 10:00 p.m. on Thursday 1 February”. An application for a stay of execution was heard on Saturday 3 February 1996 and a conservatory Order was requested to allow a hearing to take place. This conservatory order was denied but an appeal against this denial was granted to the full Court of Appeal. At this point a seven-day stay of execution was granted. Yasseen and Thomas were informed on 7 February that the Court of Appeal would hear the merits of their case the next day.

Counsel considered it highly unlikely that the particular domestic proceeding (a conservatory motion) would succeed. Yet he did not wish to refrain from taking all possible courses of action in the domestic courts. The HRC did use provisional measures in this case.¹²

Sometimes the Rapporteur may decide not to use provisional measures immediately, exactly because some domestic proceedings are still pending, meaning both that there is no immediate risk of execution and that proceeding with the case before the HRC could result in having to declare the case inadmissible.¹³

There are also some cases in which the Rapporteur waited with the use of provisional measures until an execution date was imminent. These cases do indicate the approach of some Rapporteurs and the importance they attached to fulfilling the criterion of temporal urgency in using provisional measures.¹⁴

¹² See Chapter XIV on the relationship with admissibility.

¹³ In HRC Junior Leslie v. Jamaica (564/1993) the initial submission was of 9 October 1993. Transmission under Rule 91 was on 3 December 1993. Yet the Special Rapporteur only used provisional measures on 8 February 1995. It appears from the case file that the Rapporteur may have decided to postpone use of provisional measures until she would receive information that the petitioner was formally classified as a capital offender under a review procedure. By submission of 3 February 1995 counsel informed the HRC that their client's appeal against his classification as a capital offender would be heard on 13 February 1995. "We understand that if that appeal fails (and the Court of Appeal has already given a preliminary indication that it will) then Mr Leslie is in real and immediate danger of a Warrant of Execution being issued and it being carried out before the Committee can consider Mr Leslie's communication on issues of admissibility or on the merits". In that context counsel requested the HRC to take provisional measures. Five days later and five days before the abovementioned hearing, the HRC sent a note verbale to the minister of foreign affairs (with a copy to the Permanent Mission) to that effect (on file with the author). In some cases it is clear why the HRC did not use provisional measures. In HRC Errol Smith and Oval Stewart v. Jamaica, 8 April 1999 (transmitted under Rule 91 on 15 November 1995), for instance, the petitioners' death sentences were already commuted, not only before registration of the case but also before submission. In other cases the HRC only registered the complaint several months after initial submission when the death sentences had already been commuted. See e.g. HRC Desmond Amore v. Jamaica, 23 March 1999. In this case provisional measures were not used, but it is not clear from the View or the case file why not. On 17 January 1995 counsel did request provisional measures (on file with the author). Four months later the State commuted the death sentence and only subsequently the HRC transmitted the case to the State. This means that when the Secretariat made the case summary the petitioner was still awaiting execution. See also McCordie Morrison v. Jamaica, 3 November 1998. The petitioner submitted the case, including an Art. 14 claim, in November 1994, before commutation of his sentence (on file with the author). See also Adams v. Jamaica, 30 October 1996.

¹⁴ See e.g. HRC McCordie Morrison v. Jamaica, 3 November 1998. The initial submission was of 25 November 1994, but the Rapporteur did not use provisional measures in this case, and she transmitted the case a year after initial submission. The fact that the claim included Art. 14 but that the Rapporteur nevertheless did not use provisional measures must mean that she had a reason unrelated to preservation of the eventual form of reparation. She may have considered that execution was not imminent. See also Victor Francis v. Jamaica, 24 March 1993. This is an unclear case. The Working Group transmitted the complaint in October 1988, but while the claim included Article 14(3)(c) and (5) the HRC did not use provisional measures. Death penalty cases in which the HRC did not use provisional measures may also clarify the Committee's approach. It appears, however, that there is almost no information available about such cases. In HRC V.B. v. Trinidad and Tobago, 26 July 1993 (inadm.), initially it seemed provisional measures were not Yet this seems to have changed. After all, following Piandiong et al. v. the Philippines (2000) States must be aware that they cannot execute a person after they have been informed of a submission to the HRC.¹⁵ In other words, they cannot quickly execute a petitioner in an attempt to avoid a specific request by the Committee to halt the execution pending the proceedings. This means that for future cases States must take into account that the obligation to halt the execution pending the proceedings is triggered once they are informed of the submission of the case rather than once the case is formally registered. It also means that, once a case is pending before the HRC, in death penalty cases a specific request for provisional measures is not necessary (although still desirable as a clear statement by the HRC) because the irreversible nature of capital punishment in itself requires the State to halt an execution.

The HRC has continued to use provisional measures in these cases. Once, prior to Piandiong, it even used them in advance of the pronouncement of a death sentence rather than in advance of the execution itself. In Domukovsky and three others v. Georgia (1998)¹⁶ the HRC used provisional measures when it was not yet clear whether a death sentence would be imposed or not. The case is interesting because the person concerned, Domukovsky, had not yet been sentenced to death when the HRC used provisional measures. Four days later he was sentenced to fourteen years imprisonment. It is the first example of the use of provisional measures already where a death sentence is threatened ('to defer the execution of an eventual death sentence') rather than only in cases where someone has already been sentenced to death.¹⁷ The decision to take provisional measures at this stage may relate to the abolitionist stance of the Rapporteur in question and simply be a statement of principle. It is also possible that she assessed that there was indeed a real risk of imposition of the death penalty that would, in itself, result in irreparable harm used, but if appears from the files that they were in effect used on 25 August 1992 (initial submission of 28 November 1991).

¹⁵ HRC Dante Piandiong, Jesus Morillos and Archie Bulan (deceased) (submitted by Alexander Padilla and Ricardo III Sunga) v. the Philippines, 19 October 2000. See also Anton Bondarenko and Natalia Schedko (submitted by the latter on behalf of her deceased son and herself) v. Belarus, 3 April 2003 and Igor Lyashkovich and Mariya Staselovich (submitted by the latter on behalf of her deceased son and herself) v. Belarus, 3 April 2003.

¹⁶ HRC Victor Domukovsky, Zaza Tsiklauri, Petre Gelbakhiani and Irakli Dokvadze v. Georgia, 6 April 1998.

¹⁷ The HRC used provisional measures on 2 March 1995 on behalf of Domukovsky (only Rule 91 for Tsiklauri). Note verbale transmitting the case and using provisional measures, 2 March 1995. See also fax of 2 March 1995 to Head of State Shevardnadze accompanying the two notes verbales addressed to his government transmitting the cases of Domukovsky and Tsiklauri and noting the provisional measures 'to defer the execution of an eventual death sentence against Mr. Domukovsky, for the period during which the Committee is examining his communication'. On behalf of the other two petitioners the Special Rapporteur took provisional measures a few days after they had been sentenced to death. A separate admissibility decision was made on 5 July 1996. It again referred to provisional measures in relation to Dokvadze and Gelbakhiani. The State party was requested not to carry out the death sentence against them while their communication was under consideration by the Committee (on file with the author). Domukovsky claimed that he and a co-defendant, Gelbakhiani, were kidnapped from Azerbaijan and illegally arrested in April 1993. Domukovsky was sentenced to 14 years imprisonment on 6 March 1995. Gelbakhiani was sentenced to death on 6 March 1995. Dokvadze was arrested on 3 September 1992 and sentenced to death on 6 March 1995. Tsiklauri claimed he was arrested without a warrant on 7 August 1992 and that a warrant was shown to him only a year later. He was sentenced to five years imprisonment on 6 March 1995. By decree of the President of Georgia of 25 July 1997 54 persons were pardoned and their death sentences were replaced by twenty years imprisonment. Gelbakhiani and Dokvadze were among these 54 persons.

even if not executed, e.g. because it was likely to be based on an unfair trial. In the alternative, she could have assessed that there was a real risk that execution would follow soon after imposition of the death penalty. The file shows that the latter may be the case.

All Special Rapporteurs of the HRC have dealt with requests for assistance by death row inmates or with information to the effect that their execution is impending as requests to use provisional measures on their behalf, even if they did not explicitly ask for provisional measures.

In 2003 Special Rapporteur Scheinin indicated that in Eastern European cases he had also used provisional measures already at this stage, although the Committee might not use them in cases involving States that always have long delays.¹⁸ At the same time provisional measures have been used in relation to Zambia, which de facto has not executed death row prisoners for a long time.

It seems that two factors play a role: the urgency on the one hand and on the other the principle that the State should at least be informed of the Committee's position that persons sentenced to death and awaiting execution must not be executed pending the proceedings before it. Once a case gets so far as to be registered, the Rapporteur believes it would be 'strange' not to indicate the Committee's position on this point.¹⁹

The President of the Inter-American Court has also ordered urgent measures in cases in which the precise execution dates were not known, but the executions were planned on an unspecified date the next month.²⁰ In the case of Baptiste the President ordered urgent measures the day after he received the Commission's application, despite the fact that a warrant of execution had not yet been issued.²¹ Concern about the State's internal instructions in death penalty cases may explain this sense of urgency.²² In its Order in Boyce and Joseph v. Barbados the Court decided to maintain its provisional measures despite the fact that the execution ceased to be imminent because of a temporary stay of execution by the High Court of Barbados.²³ In other words, the Inter-American Court and the HRC have used provisional measures not just in the face of an execution date, but already earlier in the proceedings. This betrays a more flexible approach than that taken by the ICJ, indeed taking into account the inequality between the parties and the irreparable nature of the harm that would be faced once the risk would become immediate.

2.3 Immediacy in expulsion and extradition cases

More than in death penalty cases, in non-refoulement cases the HRC has insisted on the immediacy of the risk. On occasion it has focussed on formal lack of immediacy rather than practical immediacy. In fact the lack of imminence was more apparent than real. Domestic legislation was ¹⁸ Interview by author with Special Rapporteur Scheinin, Geneva, April 2003.

¹⁹ Id.

²⁰ IACHR James et al. cases, Order for provisional measures, 29 August 1998.

²¹ Id. (Reference to the Commission's observations of 2, 17 and 30 July 1998).

²² There were indications that an execution day was impending because the six month period set forth under the State's internal Instructions for Death Penalty Applications expired on 16 July and the State may give very short notice of an impending execution, even as little as five days. It appears from the Court's summary of the Commission's observations with regard to its requests to amplify the Order with new beneficiaries that it considered the short time frame of only five to seven days between the issuance and reading of an execution warrant and the execution as an impediment to the Court's ability to issue effective provisional measures. It is also possible to explain the swiftness in this case, or the lack thereof in others, in light of the situation at the Secretariat at a given time and by its communication channel with the President.

²³ IACHR Boyce and Joseph v. Barbados, Order of 25 November 2004.

such that in practice the petitioner could be expelled at very short notice and might not have sufficient time to petition the HRC again upon receipt of information about the date and time of removal.²⁴

In E.G. v. Canada (disc. 1997)²⁵ counsel submitted the case before exhaustion of domestic remedies by referring to the fact that in other cases²⁶ extradition took place ‘literally within minutes’ of the Supreme Court’s ruling and pointed out that the State should not attempt to deny an effective remedy before the HRC.

“If the Canadian Government is prepared to commit itself to allow a reasonable period of time subsequent to an unfavourable decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in petitioner’s case, we will admit that the application is premature”.²⁷

The next year this argument returned, again with regard to Canada. In a family life case – in which the HRC did not use provisional measures – counsel made an argument involving the assessment of temporal urgency. In J.P.A.F. v. Canada (disc. 1998)²⁸ counsel mentioned the manner in which the Immigration Department removed another petitioner ‘without any advance notice’.²⁹ She referred to the publicity surrounding deportation of ‘foreign criminals’ and noted that, in this light, she fully expected that her client would be removed from Canada as soon as the Immigration Appeal Division had rendered a negative decision, ‘likely on only a few hours notice to him, and no advance notice to us as his counsel’. She pointed out that domestic proceedings that could be taken subsequently would have no suspensive effect.³⁰ She noted that she was not sure whether the Committee could respond to prevent removal before it takes place and that it appeared that it would take some time for a decision on provisional measures to be made. Hence, she requested the HRC to consider the request now ‘so that in the event the appeal is denied, your office may be in a position to act immediately, if Rule 86 measures can be invoked’. She requested the HRC to use provisional measures immediately upon her notification to it that her client’s appeal had been denied.³¹ This is in fact comparable to the approach taken by the ²⁴ HRC Hamid Reza Taghi Khadje v. the Netherlands, 31 October 2006 (inadm.) (very formally concluding that ‘no order has in fact been made for his forcible return to Iran. It is not an inevitable consequence of a failed application for asylum that a deportation will take place’, §6.3, without taking into account the practice of expelling upon very short notice). Apparently no provisional measures were used pending the proceedings. This case is different from S.B. v. the Netherlands, 30 March 2005 (nadm.) as in that case the petitioner did not expect to be expelled, §6.2.

²⁵ HRC E.G. v. Canada (738/1997). Initial submission 5 January 1997 (received 7 January 1997), provisional measures of 17 January 1997; withdrawal of these measures on 28 April 1997; petitioner’s request to withdraw the case itself of 26 May 1997. On 17 November 1997 the HRC informed the petitioner that it had discontinued the case (on file with the author).

²⁶ HRC Kindler v. Canada, 30 July 1993 and Ng v. Canada, 5 November 1993.

²⁷ Letter by the petitioner in HRC E.G. v. Canada (738/1997), 21 April 1997, disc. on 17 November 1997 (on file with the author).

²⁸ HRC J.P.A.F. v. Canada (disc. 1998), 620/1995 (on file with the author).

²⁹ This was a reference to HRC Canepa v. Canada, 3 April 1997.

³⁰ This was the case in particular because apparently they could not use the Committee’s admissibility decision in Stewart to ‘attempt to establish a serious constitutional issue on the matter of family separation’. The decision on the merits in Stewart had not yet been published at the time. See further Chapter XII (Other situations).

³¹ Submission of 12 July 1994 in HRC J.P.A.F. v. Canada (disc. 1998) (620/1995) (on file with the author). Counsel in A.B. v. Canada (disc. 1998) referred to the HRC’s expression of concern

ECtHR.³² In other cases involving a threat of immediate refoulement upon exhaustion, the HRC has now used conditional provisional measures before remedies were fully exhausted.³³

The Committee decided not to use provisional measures in J.C.A. v. Costa Rica (disc. 2000),³⁴ probably because of the (lack of) immediacy of the risk.³⁵ There was no decision yet about a deportation, let alone a deportation date.³⁶ during the 42nd session about expulsion of aliens in Canada and the lack of suspensive effect of appeals against expulsion or deportation orders. She requested the HRC to take its decision on the use of provisional measures prior to 1 November 1994, which was the date on which the petitioner was scheduled to be deported. In fact she noted that the deportation was scheduled for 17:45 and also provided the address, telephone and fax numbers of the immigration officer responsible for his removal. Submissions of 25 and 26 October 1994 on behalf of A.B. v. Canada (622/1995) (on file with the author).

³² In situations where the implementation of an expulsion order is expected immediately upon a decision by domestic court of last instance, petitioners should ask the ECtHR to anticipate on a possible negative decision and prepare a provisional measure in advance. This applies in particular if there is a risk of immediate expulsion after business hours, during the weekend or during French holidays, when there is limited or no presence of relevant staff in Strasbourg. In such cases it would be too late to approach the Court in Strasbourg only upon exhaustion of domestic remedies.

³³ See e.g. HRC Steven Romans v. Canada, 9 July 2004 or D. and E. and their two children v. Australia, 11 July 2006 (in the latter case requesting the State, on 12 February 2002, to 'provide information to the Committee, on an urgent basis, of whether the authors are under a real risk of deportation while their communication is being considered by the Committee', adding that it trusts the State 'will not deport the authors before the Committee has received such information and had an opportunity to consider whether the request for interim measures should be granted', §1.2). This could be seen as a more 'procedural' and temporary provisional measure, in fact explicitly asking the State to provide more information and to halt an expulsion until it provides the Rapporteur with information that no irreparable harm would result.

³⁴ HRC J.C.A. v. Costa Rica (725/1996), initial submission 26 October 1996, discontinued at 69th session in July 2000 (on file with the author).

³⁵ This is an example of a case that was later discontinued. Counsel had requested provisional measures in October 1996, in order to halt the Basque petitioner's return to Spain. The representatives of three NGOs submitted a letter to the HRC supporting the request for provisional measures. They referred to the risk to the life and physical and psychological integrity of the petitioner, in particular when considering the use of torture and violence in Spain against persons suspected of links with the ETA. The Rapporteur transmitted the case to the State without using provisional measures. Subsequently counsel repeated his request for provisional measures. Again the Special Rapporteur decided that they were not necessary. In this case the State had contested the admissibility of the complaint. Among others, it pointed out that it aimed to prevent 'a hypothetical and eventual expulsion' and was brought before the Committee with the obvious intention that it would use provisional measures. Until then, there had been no decision of the competent authorities to expel him. The petitioner, noted the State, hoped that the HRC would use provisional measures to prevent an eventual decision to expel him. The State argued that the submission constituted an abuse of the right of petition. It pointed out that the petitioner referred to a hypothetical decision and that he asked the Committee to substitute its own actions for those of the Costa Rican authorities. This way the petitioner wished to make sure in advance that the domestic legal bodies would not be able to decree an eventual expulsion. In September 2000 the HRC informed his counsel that it had decided to discontinue its consideration of the case for lack of information. HRC J.C.A. v. Costa Rica (725/1996), disc.

2.4 Immediacy of the risk in cases involving death threats

The Chipoco case is an example of a failed request by the Inter-American Commission to the Inter-American Court to order provisional measures.³⁷ One may argue that the alleged threat was not imminent because the intended beneficiary was in the US at the time. Chipoco originally was a human rights defender from Peru. He spent several years in the US and during that time he took part in litigation by Human Rights Watch against Peru within the Inter-American human rights system.³⁸ When he was about to return to Peru, the Fujimori government issued a black list of persons accused of denigrating the honour of the nation by litigating cases before the Inter-American Court of Human Rights. In fact, however, the judiciary was not acting upon this list and no warrant had yet been issued for his arrest. In any case, upon his return he ran for Congress and won a seat and the Government did not dare to jail him.

Nevertheless, even without a specific (execution or expulsion) date, the situation is imminent once there is evidence of recent threats.³⁹

2.5 Immediacy in cases involving indigenous culture

More difficult to pinpoint is the urgency in cases involving threats to indigenous culture. This applies both to temporal urgency, as discussed here, and to risk, as discussed in the next section.

When does the HRC consider a risk involving indigenous culture to be imminent? What is the role of suspensive effect in domestic proceedings? A case involving culture hinting at the immediacy of the threat is Sara et al. v. Finland (inadm. 1994).⁴⁰ The HRC declared part of the claim inadmissible because the petitioners had not yet been affected by an administrative measure 2000 (on file with the author). It is not clear why the petitioner did not resort to the Inter-American Commission in Washington D.C. It may be that counsel expected the HRC to be more forthcoming in its use of provisional measures, but in that case he was disappointed.

³⁶ In HRC Ngoc Si Truong v. Canada, 28 March 2003 (inadm.) the HRC apparently did not use provisional measures either. It appears from a note in the file that the petitioner did not seem to be under immediate threat of deportation and counsel did not request the use of provisional measures. In Samira Karker on behalf of her husband Salah Karker v. France, 26 October 2000, it is not evident from the text of the View why the HRC used provisional measures. This expulsion did not appear to be imminent. The HRC used provisional measures half a year after the initial submission of 18 September 1998. It appears from the case file that the provisional measure was to halt his expulsion to Tunisia pending the examination of the case. In other words, the Rapporteur decided to use this provisional measure just in case his expulsion would become imminent after all.

³⁷ IACHR Chipoco (Peru), Order of 27 January 1993 (denying a request for provisional measures).

³⁸ Carlos Chipoco accompanied the Commission to Court hearings, e.g. as an advisor in the IACHR Neira Alegria case (Peru), Judgment of 19 February 1995.

³⁹ IACHR Evidence of threats must include examples of recent occurrences, see e.g. Miguel Castro Castro Prison (Peru), Order of 29 January 2008 (denying a request for provisional measures), 5th 'Considering' clause. (denying the provisional measures requested by the petitioners- a request not supported by the Commission – because the facts complained of were not recent and there was no evidence of a persisting situation endangering the life or personal integrity of the intended beneficiaries and therefore the requirement of 'urgency' was not met, also referring to the Court's previous denial of a request of 30 January 2007)

⁴⁰ HRC Sara et al. v. Finland, 23 March 1994 (inadm.) (initial submission of 18 December 1990, Rule 91 of 12 February 1991, Rule 86 probably on 9 July 1991 together with initial admissibility decision).

implementing the disputed legislation. At the same time it found a causal link between the continuation of road construction in a certain area and the entry into force of this legislation. It declared the claim admissible in this respect.⁴¹ At this point it also used provisional measures.⁴² Yet later it set aside its provisional measures as well as its admissibility decision and declared the case inadmissible because it considered there was no imminent threat.⁴³ When the petitioners submitted their new complaint the activities had already taken place.⁴⁴

In Länsman I the request for provisional measures to halt the quarrying of stone in traditional herding areas failed.⁴⁵ The HRC considered that the use of provisional would be premature but that the petitioners retained the right to repeat their request.⁴⁶

⁴¹ In HRC Sara et al. v. Finland (inadm. 1994) the petitioners feared that the Central Forestry Board would 'approve the continuation of road construction or logging by the summer of 1991, or at the latest by early 1992, around the road under construction and therefore within the confines of their herding areas'. According to the State the petitioners had failed to demonstrate how their concerns about irreparable harm 'purportedly resulting from logging in the area designated by them' would translate into actual violations of their rights. It considered 'they are merely afraid of what might occur in the future'. "While they might legitimately fear for the future of the Sami culture, the 'desired feeling of certainty is not as such protected under the Covenant. There must be a concrete executive decision or measure taken under the Wilderness Act', before anyone may claim to be the victim of a violation of his Covenant rights". The HRC observed that the complaint related both to 'expected logging and road construction activities within the Hammastunturi Wilderness and ongoing road construction activities in the residual area located outside the wilderness'. With regard to the expected activities it considered the claim inadmissible because the petitioners had not yet been affected by an administrative measure implementing the Act.

⁴² This was the second time the Committee used provisional measures to halt actions affecting the natural habitat. The first time was in the Lubicon Lake Band case, because the domestic appeal still pending was without suspensive effect. HRC Lubicon Lake Band, 26 March 1990. See also Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction and admissibility and section 4 of this Chapter (On material urgency).

⁴³ HRC Sara v. Finland, 23 March 1994 (inadm.). It did so after receipt of information about a delay until the finalisation of the implementation plan for the disputed activities. The HRC referred to counsel's comment that the petitioners were expecting a delay until 1996 for the finalisation of the Central Forestry Board's implementation plan and understood this 'as an indication that no further activities in the Hammastunturi Wilderness and the residual area will be undertaken by the State party while the authors may pursue further domestic remedies'. In other words, the HRC assumed no immediate threat. The provisional measure was applicable from July 1991 until the inadmissibility decision. It seems that the HRC implicitly reminds the State that it should not undertake further activities while the petitioners are pursuing domestic remedies. After all, an expected delay of activities until finalisation of an implementation plan is not the same as a commitment to suspend activities until domestic remedies have been undertaken and certainly not until the petitioners have been enabled to submit a new complaint to the HRC. The HRC took this as an indication that the State party would not undertake further activities while the petitioners were pursuing domestic remedies. If the HRC had expected the State to take this reminder seriously, it was let down.

⁴⁴ The State did in fact undertake further activities. Two of the petitioners submitted a new complaint to the HRC more than three years later, in November 1997. See Anni Äärelä and Jouni Näkkäläjärvi v. Finland, 24 October 2001. In that case the HRC did not use provisional measures because the events complained of had already occurred.

⁴⁵ HRC Ilmari Länsman v. Finland (Länsman I), 26 October 1994.

⁴⁶ In another case the request may have been too late, because the acts to be prevented had already proceeded and a request by the HRC – pending the proceedings before it – for the State to return

The Committee considered that the claims under Article 27 had been sufficiently substantiated for purposes of admissibility, but it agreed with the State that the use of provisional measures would be premature at this stage.⁴⁷ It pointed out that ‘the authors retained the right to address another request under rule 86 to the Committee if there were reasonably justified concerns that quarrying might resume’.⁴⁸ The file shows that the petitioners submitted a renewed request for provisional measures in February 1993.⁴⁹ As this failed, six months later the petitioners submitted to the status quo ante would be too far reaching in the circumstances (viz. Vakoumé et al. v. France, 31 October 2000 (inadm.)). This first case, Ilmari Länsman v. Finland (Länsman I), 26 October 1994, involving the areas of Angeli and Inari, was initially submitted in June 1992 by 75 members of the Muotkatunturi Herdsmen’s Committee and members of the local community of Angeli. They were all reindeer breeders of Sami origin challenging the decision of the Central Forestry Board to sign a contract with a private company. This contract would allow quarrying of stone in an area covering ten hectares on the flank of the mountain Etelä-Riutusvaara. They argued that this contract would ‘not only allow the private company to extract stone but also to transport it right through the complex system of reindeer fences to the Angeli-Inari road’. They pointed out that the ownership of lands traditionally used by the Samis was disputed between the State and the Sami community. While they conceded that the economic value of the stone to be quarried was considerable, they emphasised that the village of Angeli was ‘the only remaining area in Finland with a homogenous and solid Sami population’ and that the ‘quarrying and transport of anorthosite would disturb their reindeer herding activities and the complex system of reindeer fences determined by the natural environment’. They also observed that the mountain was a sacred place of the old Sami religion. Together with the initial submission they requested the HRC to adopt provisional measures, as they feared that further quarrying was imminent. The petitioners had seen the precedents of the Lubicon Lake Band, with provisional measures in July 1987 and Sara with provisional measures in July 1991. See the discussion in §4.2 of the View. The State party had submitted that the request for provisional measures by the petitioners was ‘clearly premature’ because only test quarrying had been carried out on the contested site.

⁴⁷ In fact, in the initial submission the petitioners had pointed out that the private company ‘may be unwilling or even financially incapable to make the investments necessary for starting the actual quarrying as long as it does not have a permanent contract with the land owner’. They pointed out that the present contract only allowed for extraction of stone until the end of 1993. ‘The authors would hope that the Central Forest Board, being an governmental body, does not make a new contract before the Human Rights Committee has had a possibility to consider their communication under the Optional Protocol’. Petitioners’ submission of 10 June 1992 (on file with the author).

⁴⁸ See §6.3 of the View. In the View the HRC specifically discussed the petitioners’ request for provisional measures. It noted the State’s argument that interim protection under Rule 86 ‘would be premature, as only limited test quarrying in the area of Mount Etelä-Riutusvaara has been carried out’ and it explained its decision not to use provisional measures ‘at this juncture’. It appears from the Committee’s admissibility decision that the Special Rapporteur transmitted the case under Rule 91 two months after initial submission, on 25 August 1992. See Admissibility decision of 14 October 1993, CCPR/C/49/D/511/1992, 3 November 1993 (on file with the author). In the View it did not address further their statement that even the limited test quarrying carried out already had left ‘considerable marks’. The petitioners had alleged that, because of climatic conditions the marks would remain in the landscape for hundreds of years. They also reiterated that the location of the quarry and the road leading up to it were crucial to the activities of the Muotkatunturi Herdsmen’s Committee.

⁴⁹ They pointed out that the government’s contention that no actual quarrying had taken place since the initial submission was incorrect. On an unspecified date in the summer of 1992 the actual quarrying had started and by early September 1992 ‘the company had taken some 30 cubic metres (approximately 100.000 kilograms) of stone from the quarry and transported it through the a request for urgent consideration at the October session in order to determine the admissibility of their claim. They explained why they considered the case urgent, referring to ‘the fact that the provisional land lease contract for the quarrying company expires at the end of this year and negotiations on a longer land lease contract are at present going on’.⁵⁰ It is clear that the petitioners resorted to a request for urgent consideration of the case because their requests for provisional measures had failed. Apart from being the only case in which the HRC motivated its refusal to use provisional measures, Länsman I is also the predecessor of the cases Länsman II and III. In those cases the HRC did use provisional measures.⁵¹

3 THE LIKELIHOOD OF RISK

3.1 Introduction

The use of provisional measures does not imply a determination on the merits.⁵² In Weiss v. Austria (2003) the HRC determined that a decision to take provisional measures does not constitute an ‘examination’ of the case. This already indicates that at this stage the assessment of risk should be considerably less strict than the evidentiary requirements on the merits.⁵³ reindeer herding area of the authors’. They noted that the present contract was valid only until the end of 1993 and they requested the HRC to recommend, under Rule 86, that the government ‘firstly, take appropriate measures to at least temporarily prevent the company from further quarrying within the year 1993, and, secondly, refrain as the landowner from concluding a new contract on land lease with the company as long as the communication is pending before the Committee’. Petitioners’ submission of 5 February 1993 (on file with the author).

⁵⁰ In his submission of 31 August 1994 counsel for the petitioners pointed out that the State party had indeed confirmed that the lease contract was valid until the end of 1993. ‘This implies that no contractual obligations would be breached if the Human Rights Committee were to find that any further quarrying would be unacceptable in the light of article 27’. HRC Ilmari Länsman v. Finland, 26 October 1994, §8.2. ‘After a new contract is made, the private company in question intends to make considerable investments, including road construction. The authors remind the Committee of the fact that also in the Government submission of 27 October 1992 a position was taken that no urgency was involved as long as there was only a provisional land lease contract’. Petitioners’ submission of 16 August 1993 (on file with the author).

⁵¹ HRC Jouni E. Länsman et al. v. Finland, 30 October 1996 (Länsman II) (initial submission of 28 August 1995, provisional measures of 15 November 1995); decision of 14 March 1996 to set aside its provisional measures (together with admissibility declaration). With regard to the immediacy of the threat in Länsman II the petitioners noted that the Central Forestry Board had started its activities late October 1994. While the Supreme Court put a stop to this in November 1994, it withdrew the injunction in June 1995. The petitioners noted, moreover, that a representative of the Central Forestry Board had ‘recently’ stated that logging and road construction would resume before the winter, in October or November 1995 and was therefore imminent. In November 1995 the Rapporteur used provisional measures. On the three Länsman cases, see Chapter X (Culture).

⁵² HRC Lloyd Reece v. Jamaica, admissibility decision of 30 March 1989, CCPR/C/35/D/247/1987, 3 April 1989 (on file with the author). This remark, which has now become customary, was not yet made in the Committee’s earlier decisions.

⁵³ HRC Sholam Weiss v. Austria, 3 April 2003, § 3.7. In this case the State claimed that the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) had already dealt with the same matter and referred to its reservation to the OP. The HRC noted that Austria’s reservation to Article 5(2)(a) OP

Like the ICJ and ITLOS, with regard to the assessment of the likelihood of risk for the use of provisional measures the human rights adjudicators have not developed clear criteria, but a common denominator seems to be that of ‘prima facie’ evidence. This cannot be defined in the abstract. It depends on the circumstances of the case and the context of the legal system.

Using provisional measures may sometimes be a matter of acting first and asking later. This means adjudicators could withdraw or adapt a provisional measure taken on the basis of the responses and new information provided by both parties. Still, it seems reasonable to assume that cases that would be inadmissible at face value, or in relation to claims (factual situations and interpretation of rights) for which previous case law has never found a violation, would not warrant a provisional measure.

In order to examine how assessment of risk at the stage of provisional measures differs from that at the stage of decisions on the merits, this chapter discusses the practice of the HRC with regard to the death penalty, non-refoulement, health in detention and indigenous culture. In addition some observations are made from the perspective of CAT and the ECtHR with regard to expulsion and extradition cases and some about death threats from the perspective of the Inter-American system.

Have the human rights adjudicators indeed taken an approach to assessment of the likelihood of risk for the use of provisional measures that is more flexible than that of the ICJ and ITLOS, taking into account the irreparable nature of the harm faced by the petitioners and the inequality between the parties?

3.2 The practice of the human rights adjudicators

3.2.1 Introduction

In this section the practice of the adjudicators with regard to assessment of risk for purposes of provisional measures is discussed by way of examples of situations in which provisional measures have been used. In case of corporal punishment, for instance, the petitioner need bring no more evidence for the decision on the merits than the fact that he has been sentenced to corporal punishment and that this sentence has not yet been executed. In most other situations the evidentiary requirements on the merits are much more difficult to meet or an argument must still be made that certain acts or omission indeed constitute a violation, which has already been confirmed in the case of corporal punishment.⁵⁴ involved claims submitted to the European Commission on Human Rights. The ECtHR had taken provisional measures but had never examined the case. It had accepted withdrawal before it had even considered the case for admissibility. “Assuming arguendo that the reservation does operate in respect of complaints received, in place of the former European Commission, by the European Court of Human Rights, the Committee refers to its jurisprudence that where the European Court has gone beyond making a procedural or technical decision on admissibility, and has made an assessment of the merits on the case, then the complaint has been ‘examined’ within the terms of the Optional Protocol, or, in this case, the State party’s reservation”. See §8.3. The HRC referred to Linderholm v. Croatia, 23 July 1999 (inadm.). In order to accept withdrawal the ECtHR simply needs to decide that this would not be contrary to ordre public. The HRC considered that ‘a decision that a case is not of sufficient importance to continue its examination after an applicant’s action to withdraw the complaint, does not amount to a real assessment of its substance’. In other words, the complaint had not been ‘examined’ by the ECtHR and Austria’s reservation did not preclude the HRC from considering the claims.

⁵⁴ See Chapter IV (Halting corporal punishment).

The subsequent sections are presented by type of situation in which the HRC has used provisional measures: death penalty; non-refoulement; detention; death threats; cultural survival and nuclear tests. To the extent that this further clarifies assessment of risk, references are made to the practice of the other adjudicators as well. Before discussing these situations, first the contours are sketched of assessment of risk for the use of provisional measures.

3.2.2 Sketching the contours of the assessment of risk for the use of provisional measures

The contours of the assessment of risk for the use of provisional measures may be sketched in relation to the general approach of the adjudicator to the evidentiary requirements on the merits of cases. The term ‘evidentiary requirements’ is used here to refer to the criteria to be met in order to prove a case as well as to the standard and burden of proof. These issues are interrelated and normally adjudicators do not clearly distinguish between them. Apart from the issue of evidentiary requirements there is also the issue of how the adjudicators evaluate this evidence: the standard of review.⁵⁵

Thus far academic research has not distinguished between evidentiary requirements during various stages of the proceedings on the merits, at the stage of decision-making on jurisdiction and admissibility and at the stage of decision-making on provisional measures. It is suggested that while it may not be possible to indicate the precise requirements for these different stages of international adjudication, the significance of these stages warrants specific attention. The strictest requirements can be found exactly in relation to the merits. In relation to admissibility the evidentiary requirements are less strict and, given the limited time available for decision-making as well as the serious nature of the harm risked, in relation to provisional measures the adjudicator should be very lenient.

With regard to the serious nature of the harm risked the adjudicators have also acknowledged that the level of scrutiny of State acts and omissions must be higher in those cases involving the most extreme violations. The practice of the ECtHR, which is generally more restrictive in this respect than that of the other human rights adjudicators,⁵⁶ serves as an example. While in Bazorkina v. Russia (2006) this Court noted it was ‘sensitive to the subsidiary nature of its role’ and recognised ‘that it must be cautious in taking on the role of a first-instance tribunal of fact, where this is not rendered unavoidable by the circumstances of a particular case’, it pointed out that: ‘Nonetheless, where allegations are made under Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention the Court must apply a particularly thorough scrutiny (...) even if certain domestic proceedings and investigations have already taken place’.⁵⁷

As to the relation between the alleged facts and the rights explicitly claimed, the ECtHR has noted that it is ‘master of the characterisation to be given in law to the facts of the case’. It has ‘considered of its own motion complaints under Articles or paragraphs not relied on by those appearing before it and even under a provision in respect of which the Commission had declared the complaint to be inadmissible while declaring it admissible under a different one. A complaint is characterised by the facts alleged in it and not merely by the legal grounds or arguments relied on’.⁵⁸ In particular it has pointed out: ‘In the light of the importance of the protection afforded by Article 2, the Court must subject deprivations of life to the most careful scrutiny, taking into ⁵⁵ This book uses the phrases standard of review as well as level of scrutiny.

⁵⁶ See e.g. Chapter VI (Locating and protecting disappeared persons).

⁵⁷ ECtHR Bazorkina v. Russia, 27 July 2006 (1st section) §107.

⁵⁸ ECtHR Akdeniz v. Turkey, 31 May 2005, §88.

considerations not only the actions of State agents but also all the surrounding circumstances”.⁵⁹ While these remarks were made as part of the assessment on the merits, the argument of the importance of the protection afforded equally applies at the provisional measures stage.

The ECtHR examines Article 3 ECHR cases proprio motu, given the absolute nature of the protection offered by that article and in light of the supervisory nature of its task as an international human rights court.⁶⁰ If the State does not respond sufficiently, the HRC will equally examine the complaint proprio motu. It may use sources of information not provided by the parties,⁶¹ but in practice it hardly ever does so. Even when reading additional claims in the facts as alleged by the petitioners, the human rights adjudicators have often interpreted their mandates to be strictly limited to the examination of the submissions by the parties.⁶² Yet it is submitted that at the stage of provisional measures all adjudicators should be able to take into account information derived from publicly available reports by authorities such as UN Special Rapporteurs or by reputable NGOs. Subsequently they must of course ensure that both parties are able to react to this information.⁶³

The adjudicators take a flexible approach as to the types of evidence that must be brought by the individual petitioner and if the State party does not respond satisfactorily or not at all the adjudicators may draw negative inferences and take into account circumstantial evidence.⁶⁴ After all the State has the duty to cooperate with the adjudicator within the individual complaint procedure established in the respective human rights treaties.⁶⁵ Obviously the duty to cooperate is even stronger in situations where the adjudicator depends on information provided by the Parties and cannot conduct in situ investigations and hearings, as is the case with, for instance, the HRC.

Yet before ordering provisional measures there is often insufficient time to consult the State. Given the serious nature of the harm risked the adjudicators may already take into account circumstantial evidence and negative inferences even though the State has not yet had a chance to cooperate in this particular case. The negative inferences are then based on previous dealings of the adjudicator with the same State. After the first use of provisional measures the State may provide information prompting the adjudicator to withdraw them.

⁵⁹ Id., §95.

⁶⁰ See ECtHR Sheekh v. the Netherlands, 11 January 2007, §136: “In respect of materials obtained proprio motu, the Court considers that, given the absolute nature of the protection afforded by Article 3, it must be satisfied that the assessment made by the authorities of the Contracting State is adequate and sufficiently supported by domestic materials as well as by materials originating from other reliable and objective sources such as, for instance, other Contracting or non-Contracting States, agencies of the United Nations and reputable non-governmental organisations. In its supervisory task under Article 19 of the Convention, it would be too narrow an approach under Article 3 in cases concerning aliens facing expulsion or extradition if the Court, as an international human rights court, were only to take into account materials made available by the domestic authorities of the Contracting State concerned, without comparing these with materials from other reliable and objective sources”. See also e.g. Ryabikin v. Russia, 19 June 2008, §111.

⁶¹ See Zwart (1994), p. 12.

⁶² See also Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction and admissibility).

⁶³ CEDAW does mention, in Rule 72(2), that it may receive information from UN organisations and bodies through the Secretariat of the Office of the High Commissioner, so long as both parties are offered the opportunity to react to this information.

⁶⁴ See e.g. Pasqualucci (2003), pp. 208-210, discussing the Inter-American Court’s use of presumptions and circumstantial evidence.

⁶⁵ See e.g. IACHR Rules of Procedure (2001), Article 44. See in general on the duty to cooperate e.g. Medina Quiroga (2005), pp. 26-27.

The State generally has the monopoly of power vis-à-vis the individual. In addition it usually also has a monopoly on information, especially in the context of disappearances and torture.⁶⁶ Exactly given this unequal situation between the two, both as to the consequences and in light of the possibility to obtain evidence, on the merits the standard of proof in cases between unequal parties should be higher if the initial burden is on the State (e.g. in a criminal trial). It should be lower if the initial burden is on the individual (e.g. in disappearance or torture cases claiming state responsibility). In the latter case the burden shifts from the individual to the State once the individual has made a prima facie case. After all the individual claims human rights violations of a very serious nature often involving the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment while the consequences for the State if a violation is found would simply involve refraining from acting, providing access, releasing a person, providing compensation, etc. Moreover, the State is able to retrieve and make disappear information and evidence and therefore is in a much stronger position than the individual claiming a human rights violation. In cases involving claims of disappearances, ill treatment in detention, or the risk of cruel treatment or torture in a third State the importance attached to the prohibition of torture and ill-treatment in itself warrants particular scrutiny of the behaviour of the State.

In particular the HRC and the Inter-American Commission and Court have acknowledged the importance of the factual inequality between the parties and the difference in the consequences of finding or not finding a violation on the merits for the petitioner and the State. These factors are all relevant already at the stage of provisional measures.

The standard phrase of the HRC is that the burden of proof ‘cannot rest on the author of the communication alone, especially considering that the author and the State party do not always have equal access to the evidence and that frequently the State party alone has access to relevant information’. It then continues with: ‘It is implicit in article 4(2) of the Optional Protocol that the State party has the duty to investigate in good faith all allegations of the violation of the Covenant made against it and its authorities, and to furnish to the Committee the information available to it’.⁶⁷ The Inter-American Court has explicitly confirmed this approach.⁶⁸

The Inter-American Commission’s doctrine and the Court’s jurisprudence both establish that, different from criminal cases, in a situation where one of the parties in a conflict has a monopoly of power and a consequent monopoly on information, the burden of proof shifts to that party (the State). The situation of an individual petitioner in detention is particularly illustrative. As the Commission has noted, inmates are ‘defenceless and under the absolute control and in the exclusive custody of the State’.⁶⁹ It bases itself on the principle established by the Court that the silence of the State or ‘elusive or ambiguous answers on its part’ may be interpreted ‘as an acknowledgement of the truth of allegations made, so long as the contrary is not indicated by the record or is not compelled as a matter of law’.⁷⁰ The Commission may note, for instance, that in a given case ‘the State’s silence and the lack of diligence in defending itself aside, the evidence still tends to corroborate many of the facts alleged’.⁷¹ It may also point out that the State has supplied no evidence refuting the petitioners’ allegations, or that the information it has supplied is incomplete and confined to generalities.⁷²

⁶⁶ See also e.g. ICJ Corfu Channel (UK v. Albania), 9 April 1949.

⁶⁷ See e.g. HRC Bleier v. Uruguay, 29 March 1982, §13.3.

⁶⁸ See IACHR Bámaca Velásquez (Guatemala), Judgment of 25 November 2000, §153, quoting Hiber Conteris (submitted by Ilda Thomas on behalf of her brother) v. Uruguay, 17 July 1985, §§182-186.

⁶⁹ See e.g. CIDH Minors in Detention v. Honduras, 10 March 1999, §95.

⁷⁰ See e.g. IACHR Velásquez Rodríguez case, Judgment of 29 July 1988, §138.

⁷¹ CIDH Minors in Detention v. Honduras, 10 March 1999, §96.

⁷² See e.g. CIDH Minors in Detention v. Honduras, 10 March 1999, §92.

In urgent actions by UN Special Rapporteurs the procedure is not accusatory but humanitarian and the Rapporteur simply requests the State to take action in case the allegations are true. The Inter-American Commission and the African Commission's function seems to be in between that of a Special Rapporteur and that of a Court or the UN treaty bodies.⁷³

Aside from this shift in burden of proof, the Commission also expects a certain standard of proof to be met. It has not defined this standard but it requires, first of all, that petitioners substantiate their claims.⁷⁴ Indications for risk include that the information should be sufficiently specific and concrete with regard to the petitioner as well as information about the general human rights situation in the State in question.⁷⁵

Evidence used by the Commission normally includes materials provided by the State and the petitioner, statements taken from witnesses or obtained from documents, records or official publications. It may also include the information collected during an on-site investigation. The Commission has found, with the Court, that press clippings cannot be regarded as documentary evidence per se. On the other hand it has referred to the Court's statement that 'many of them contain public and well-known facts which, as such, do not require proof; other are of evidentiary value as has been recognized in international jurisprudence in so far as they reproduce public statements, especially those of high-ranking members (...) of the Government, or even of the Supreme Court of Honduras'.⁷⁶

The Commission considers that press articles have some evidentiary value 'to the extent that they can be used to draw consistent and undisputed conclusions about facts that were public and well known at the time they occurred. These clippings, furthermore, serve to corroborate the evidence submitted with the statements of testimony, and in many cases serve to compensate for the silence and evasive responses of the State which, by themselves, would have been sufficient grounds to presume the alleged facts to be true'.⁷⁷

Ironically, with regard to allegations of future facts in another State all adjudicators show deference to the sending State even in cases involving allegations of a real risk of torture in the receiving State. Further, if the claim involves torture or ill treatment that has already taken place the adjudicators seem to make a difference between cases involving violations that are alleged to have taken place in pre-trial detention and allegations following conviction. In the latter case there usually is no testimony in Court about the violation, which means that the international adjudicator cannot consult a trial transcript. In such case the international adjudicator shows less deference to the State's submissions. On the other hand, if the alleged ill treatment or torture took place during pre-trial detention the adjudicators normally assume that counsel should have brought it up during the trial and if he did, but the court dismissed it, they will normally defer to the decision by the domestic court.

⁷³ In this respect the function of the Working Group on Arbitrary Detention seems to be similar to that of the Inter-American Commission in that it specifically makes use of an accusatory procedure. It is a thematic mechanism that uses a procedure to deal with individual complaints that more closely resembles a judicial procedure than that employed by the other thematic mechanisms.

⁷⁴ See also Pasqualucci (2003), p. 213 discussing the flexible approach to the standard of proof taken by the Inter-American Court, depending on the violation to be proved.

⁷⁵ This criterion is also used by UN Special Rapporteurs.

⁷⁶ CIDH Minors in Detention v. Honduras, 10 March 1999, §184, referring to IACHR Velásquez Rodríguez case, judgment of 29 July 1988, §146. The Court took judicial notice of those facts reported in newspaper clippings that, while they did not constitute documentary evidence, nevertheless contained 'public and well-known facts which, as such, do not require proof'.

⁷⁷ CIDH Minors in Detention v. Honduras, 10 March 1999, §185.

The standard of review depends on the importance accorded to the right. In particularly striking situations involving the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment, international adjudicators should apply, to borrow a term from American constitutional law, ‘strict scrutiny’.

In Ahani v. Canada (2004) the HRC observed that ‘where one of the highest values protected by the Covenant, namely the right to be free from torture, is at stake, the closest scrutiny should be applied to the fairness of the procedure to determine whether an individual is at a substantial risk of torture’.⁷⁸ It emphasised that its provisional measures in this case had highlighted this risk.

This type of cases, in which on the merits the adjudicator uses (or should use) the strictest level of scrutiny, coincides with the type of cases in which provisional measures may be warranted as well.⁷⁹ In the face of the serious and irreparable nature of the harm risked by the petitioner, the strict approach must be vis-à-vis the State rather than vis-à-vis the petitioner. In other words, in particular at the stage of provisional measures the nature of the harm risked and the inequality between the parties should be reflected in the manner in which the likelihood of risk is assessed. The question is whether this is indeed the case.

3.2.3 Death penalty cases and assessment of risk

3.2.3.1 INTRODUCTION

This section deals with the evidentiary requirements of the HRC for finding a violation of Article 14 ICCPR and their relevance to its decision on provisional measures.⁸⁰ After all it has been pointed out that:

“In all capital punishment cases considered by the Committee in which the complainant had substantiated his allegations in such a way as to warrant a thorough examination of his case, the Committee, through its Special Rapporteur for New Communications, requested the State party not to execute the petitioner while his case was under consideration by the Committee”.⁸¹

The question arises whether the HRC has indeed used provisional measures in all such cases.

One factor that confirms this statement is the fact that at times HRC Special Rapporteurs have used provisional measures even when they considered that there was insufficient information from the petitioner for purposes of transmitting the case to the State.⁸² This indicates that ⁷⁸ HRC Mansour Ahani v. Canada, 29 March 2004, §10.6.

⁷⁹ See Conclusion Part II on the purpose of provisional measures.

⁸⁰ Case law on the death penalty is discussed in Chapters III (Halting executions) and XIII (On the relationship with forms of reparation).

⁸¹ Ando (Japan), the Chairman of the HRC, Summary Record of the 1352nd meeting: Trinidad and Tobago, 26 July 1994 (public meeting held in response to the execution of Glenn Ashby), CCPR/C/SR/1352, 31 July 1996, §3.

⁸² Normally Rapporteurs use provisional measures at the same time they transmit the case to the State. Sometimes, however, a Rapporteur initially considered there was insufficient information from the petitioner for purposes of transmitting the case to the State. She would send a Note Verbale to the State only on the basis of the Rule on provisional measures, without mentioning the Rule on the transmittal of cases. Instead, she would request the petitioner, not the State, to provide more information. Rapporteurs have done this on several occasions in which there was an immediate risk of execution. See e.g. HRC Collins v. Jamaica (356/1989), provisional measures of 25 May 1989; G.S. v. Jamaica (369/1989), provisional measures of 15 September 1989; there is no strict assessment of risk for the use of provisional measures. Still, if there were no risk at all the HRC probably would not use them.⁸³ What is clearly problematic, moreover, is that the HRC very often is not in a position to thoroughly assess certain claims on the merits and consequently does not find a violation. Any executions may then go ahead as planned. Before discussing the suitability of using provisional measures in cases involving such claims, the next subsections first illustrate the HRC's case law on the merits on these claims.

3.2.3.2 RIGHT TO COUNSEL

The quality of counsel in the domestic proceedings is of crucial importance for defendants in capital cases. Counsel before the HRC often notes that 'the legal aid given by the State party is at such a meagre level that it is most often inexperienced counsel who take death row cases'. '(B)ecause of the level of remuneration counsel will almost inevitably reduce the time he spends in preparation of the case'.⁸⁴ The criteria developed by the HRC for ineffective legal assistance on Lennon Stephens v. Jamaica (373/1989), provisional measures of 15 September 1989 and R.M. v. Trinidad and Tobago (384/1989), provisional measures of 29 January 1990 (all by Rapporteur Higgins). See also Denzil Robberts v. Barbados (504/1992), provisional measures of 2 July 1992 (by Rapporteur Lallah) and Zephinah Hamilton v. Jamaica (616/1995), provisional measures of 31 January 1995 (by Rapporteur Chanet). On 24 July 1991 the Committee adopted revised terms of reference for the mandate of the Special Rapporteur on New Communications. This included 'to issue rule 86 requests, whether coupled with a request under rule 91 or not' and 'to inform the Committee at each session on action taken under rules 86 and 91'. Annex X, Mandate of the Special Rapporteur on New Communications, revised terms of reference adopted at the 1087th meeting, 24 July 1991, A/46/40, 10 October 1991, in: Official Records of the Human Rights Committee 1990/1991, Vol. II, CCPR/10/Add. 1. As noted, at the time Rule 86 was the Rule on provisional measures and Art. 91 was the Rule on the transmittal of cases to the State.

⁸³ From spring 1987 until summer 1988 (five sessions) the HRC would register all complaints involving the death penalty. Information obtained at Secretariat, Geneva, October 1998. Some of these cases offered very little information at the time of registration. During the first seven sessions dealing with death penalty cases (from early 1987 until March 1989) the HRC registered more than sixty communications involving the death penalty in Jamaica. This research uncovered more than fifty cases in which the HRC used provisional measures to halt an execution during this period. In the other 16 cases the HRC may not have used them because the death sentence was already commuted. It is also possible that they were used, but not mentioned, or that they were used in cases that were later discontinued. By contrast to the large number of death penalty cases registered during the first three years, between April 1989 and January 1991 the newly appointed Special Rapporteur for New Communications only registered 18 such cases. Information obtained at Secretariat, Geneva, October 1998. In this period the HRC took a more cautious approach to the registration of complaints containing little information. Before registering them the Rapporteur asked the Secretariat to request additional information, for instance when it was unclear what steps were taken to exhaust domestic remedies or when the submission did not yet seem to make a prima facie case under the ICCPR. Hence, the Rapporteur did not yet authorise the Secretariat to transmit the case to the State under Rule 91 (current Rule 97). She did, on the other hand, authorise it to transmit some cases solely for the purpose of provisional measures. HRC G.S. v. Jamaica, 369/1989, provisional measures of 15 September 1989; Lennon Stephens v. Jamaica, 373/1989, provisional measures of 15 September 1989 and R.M. v. Trinidad and Tobago, 384/1989, provisional measures of 29 January 1990.

⁸⁴ HRC Peter Blaine v. Jamaica, 17 July 1994. Counsel from the London law firm Allan & Overy in Lewis v. Jamaica, also of 17 July 1997, used the same argument. Peter Blaine and Neville appeal include: the petitioner was not informed beforehand on who would represent him at the appeal; he was not informed of the date of the hearing; or counsel for the petitioner did not argue the appeal on his behalf without consulting him.⁸⁵

Nevertheless, the HRC usually cannot address the problems arising from poor quality of counsel. The HRC considers that the State party cannot be held accountable for alleged errors made by a defence lawyer 'unless it was or should have been manifest to the judge that the lawyer's behaviour was incompatible with the interests of justice'.⁸⁶ It appears, however, that the fact

Lewis were co-defendants. Blaine's lawyer was David Stewart of S.J. Berwin and Co. In Anthony Finn v. Jamaica, 31 July 1998. The State party had observed that, in relation to the allegation of the violation of Article 14 (3)(b), 'it is unfair to hold the State party accountable for the professional conduct of legal aid counsel'. However, it is the State that appoints counsel to cases and that is responsible for very low remuneration. It is interesting that the State uses the term 'unfair' in a situation where it seems evident that many petitioners were sentenced to death, at least partly, due to the inadequacy of their defence at trial. Usually, this inadequacy can no longer be remedied at a later stage. For the HRC this is part of 'counsel's professional judgment' except in a case where counsel's behaviour has been such as to be 'incompatible with the interests of justice'.

⁸⁵ See e.g., HRC Neville Lewis v. Jamaica, 17 July 1997. States must take measures to ensure that counsel, once assigned, provides effective representation in the interests of justice. This includes consulting with, and informing, the accused if he intends to withdraw an appeal or to argue before the appellate instance that the appeal has no merit. See e.g. HRC Trevor Collins v. Jamaica, 25 March 1993; Lloyd Grant v. Jamaica, 31 March 1994; George Graham and Arthur Morrison v. Jamaica, 25 March 1996 and Silbert Daley v. Jamaica, 31 July 1998. See also Spronken (2001), pp. 447-449. With regard to the right to appeal the HRC is not in a position to question counsel's professional judgment itself that there was no merit to such an appeal.

⁸⁶ See e.g., HRC Beresford Whyte v. Jamaica, 27 July 1998. An example of a questionable attitude by counsel that the HRC was unable to address can be found in Clive Smart v. Trinidad and Tobago, 29 July 1998. The petitioner had claimed that counsel had failed to properly consult with him in the case before the Court of Appeal. She had not pursued two of the grounds of appeal prepared by a different counsel, had not given the petitioner any explanations and denied him the possibility of clarifying the matter. The State party had contended that there was no merit to this allegation. It submitted an affidavit from the petitioner's counsel in Trinidad and Tobago. Subsequently (at the time of the HRC View) this counsel was sitting on the High Court of Trinidad and Tobago. The latter stated that she 'reviewed all the grounds and adopted and incorporated those with which the law and I were in agreement'. She 'did not explain this decision to Mr. Smart since these were matters exclusively within the purview of an Attorney-at-law. Mr. Smart could make no useful input in respect of such matters'. While the HRC may have been correct in concluding that there had been no violation of Article 14(3)(b) ICCPR, the case does serve as an illustration of the wide range of behaviour that still falls within 'professional judgment'. The Committee does not consider itself in a position to ascertain 'whether the alleged failure of the representatives to call witnesses who might have corroborated the authors' testimonies was a matter of professional judgment or of negligence'. HRC Michael Sawyers and Michael and Desmond McClean v. Jamaica, 11 April 1991. See also Byron Young v. Jamaica, 4 November 1997 and Earl Pratt and Ivan Morgan v. Jamaica, 6 April 1989. It is not explicit in distinguishing between the accountability of States parties in relation to privately retained and assigned counsel but, apparently, it does attach importance to distinguishing between the two. In that respect, it has considered relevant the fact that counsel was initially privately retained. In Michael Sawyers and Michael and Desmond McClean v. Jamaica, 11 April 1991, for instance, it noted that privately retained counsel had represented all three petitioners during trial and the same privately retained counsel had represented two of them on appeal. It also noted that a that on the merits the HRC is unlikely to find violations in this respect has not hindered the use of provisional measures pending the proceedings.

The HRC tolerates many choices with possibly disadvantageous effects for the petitioner as falling within counsel's professional judgment.⁸⁷ If counsel made allegations during the trial, and protested occasionally, the HRC normally assumes that the domestic court has properly dealt with the claim.⁸⁸ At the same time, if counsel did not protest during trial, this was his professional judgment.

different counsel represented Mr. Sawyers. This counsel withdrew before the appeal was concluded. It then noted, between brackets, that instead a legal aid lawyer, a Queen's counsel, was appointed. "Any shortcomings regarding time for consultation and preparation of the defence cannot, therefore, be attributed to the State party". It is not clear whether the period when Mr. Sawyers had a legal aid lawyer had any significance. See also Abduali Ismatovich Kurbanov (submitted by his mother Safarmo Kurbanova) v. Tajikistan, 6 November 2003.

⁸⁷ For finding a violation of Article 14(3)(b) (adequate time and facilities to prepare a defence) there must always be a request for an adjournment that was then disallowed by the judge. Generally, the HRC analyses the material before it to find out whether either the petitioner or his counsel complained to the trial judge that the time or facilities were inadequate. If they did not do so the inadequate time and facilities could not be attributed to the State. Alternatively the petitioner must prove that counsel's decisions could not have been based on the exercise of his professional judgment. Sometimes the HRC points out that it could not ascertain whether the domestic court 'actually denied counsel adequate time for the preparation of the defence' or whether defence counsel's failure to call witnesses on behalf of the petitioner was a matter of counsel's professional judgment or the result of intimidation. See e.g. HRC Raphael Henry v. Jamaica, 1 November 1991 and Delroy Prince v. Jamaica, 30 March 1992. Normally the HRC considers the choices of counsel to remain within the confines of his professional judgment. Thus, when it seems to have been counsel, and not the State party, who has obstructed the preparation of the defence, it finds no violation of Article 14(3)(b). See e.g. HRC Christopher Brown v. Jamaica, 23 March 1999 and Alrick Thomas v. Jamaica, 31 March 1992.

⁸⁸ The principle of equality of arms is laid down in Article 14(3)(e), although not in express terms. It also underlies other aspects of Article 14. One of the issues discussed under this principle is the examination of witnesses. The HRC does not easily find violations in this respect. On this issue too it generally has faith in counsel's professional judgment. It has determined that Article 14(3)(e) 'protects the equality of arms between the prosecution and the defence in the examination of witnesses, but does not prevent the defence from waiving or not exercising its entitlement to cross-examine a prosecution witness during the trial hearing'. HRC Glenmore Compass v. Jamaica, 19 October 1993. In the absence of material disclosing whether the petitioner or his counsel complained to the trial judge that potential defence witnesses were subjected to intimidation, the HRC has considered it is 'not in a position to ascertain whether the failure of the defence to call witnesses on the author's behalf was a matter of counsel's professional judgment or the result of intimidation'. HRC Delroy Prince v. Jamaica 30 March 1992. Only occasionally it has found a violation of Article 14(3)(e). See e.g. HRC Garfield Peart and Andrew Peart v. Jamaica, 19 July 1995; Lloyd Grant v. Jamaica, 31 March 1994 and Anthony McLeod v. Jamaica, 31 March 1998. Claims often relate to counsel's failure to follow instructions, failure to request additional time to prepare the defence, failure to call alibi witnesses or general inexperience and related situations impacting on the principle of equality of arms. In such cases the HRC generally finds no indication that counsel's acts or omissions were not made in the exercise of his professional judgment. The State party normally is not responsible for the actions of counsel.

3.2.3.3 DISPUTES ABOUT FACTS AND EVIDENCE

It is also very difficult for petitioners to prove violations based on disputes about facts and evidence or claims about inadequacy of counsel. They are often facing very serious situations, with fatal consequences, that the HRC nevertheless cannot always address on the merits. The Committee is not a fourth instance of appeal and it normally dismisses such claims.⁸⁹ Again the question arises what is the function of provisional measures used in such cases.

The Committee often simply is not in a position to deal with issues arising from problematic jury behaviour and other matters of factual evidence.⁹⁰ As long as the judge has brought certain ⁸⁹ See e.g. HRC Daniel Pinto v. Trinidad and Tobago, 20 July 1990 (after a discussion on the merits); subsequently it dismissed these claims already in the admissibility phase; Anthony Finn v. Jamaica, 31 July 1998; Raphael Henry v. Jamaica, 1 November 1991 and Beresford Whyte v. Jamaica, 27 July 1998. In his individual opinion in McTaggart v. Jamaica (1998) Committee member Scheinin discussed the dilemma of how the HRC should deal with the lack of cooperation by some States. HRC Deon Mc Taggart v. Jamaica, 31 March 1998. In this case the petitioner had submitted substantive documentation but the State had submitted only a reply of a few pages. The HRC declared inadmissible the petitioner's Art. 14(1) claim. The Committee's dilemma, according to Scheinin, was a result of the failure by the State to respond. In such case the Committee must choose either to find violations of the Covenant on the basis of the petitioner's allegations or examine 'the extensive documentation submitted on behalf of the author in order to make an autonomous investigation of the merits of each allegation'. He argued that '[b]oth of these approaches are untenable and bear the risk of errors which, in death penalty cases, may be lethal in the literal meaning of the term'. "The only alternative to these two approaches would be to request additional information and clarifications from the parties, an option the Committee is unwilling to take both because of its extremely scarce resources and because of the fully justified aim of expeditious handling of death penalty cases". He drew attention to an important issue for adjudication: the impact of the manner in which the facts are presented on the actual determination of a case. The narrative presented by the Committee 'appears coherent but represents only a reconstruction of what might have happened at the scene of the crime'. After discussing the reliability of the trial testimony by the only witness who identified the petitioner, he pointed out that '[i]t is obvious to me that the trial testimony by David Morris is unreliable and that the Committee should not have altered the 'narrative' of the events in order to add coherence to the case of the prosecution'. He agreed that it was for the domestic appeals courts to review jury instructions by the judge and the conduct of the trial, but his argument here was that the prerequisites of a fair trial had been denied. HRC Deon Mc Taggart v. Jamaica, 31 March 1998.

⁹⁰ See e.g. HRC Byron Young v. Jamaica, 4 November 1997. See also the case of co-defendant Samuel Thomas v. Jamaica, 31 March 1999. The third co-defendant was Hixford Morrison, see Hixford Morrison v. Jamaica, 31 July 1998. Counsel had argued that irregularities in the course of the jury deliberations constituted a violation of Article 14. Two jurors had come forward with sworn affidavits stating that only three of twelve jurors found the man guilty, but it was getting late and the jury foreman was pressuring them so they told him just to do what he wanted. It was argued that the judge had had a responsibility in this because he had pressured for a unanimous verdict and had sent the jury back several times. In Young HRC member Bhagwati apparently questioned the reliability of the affidavits in question, because of the immoral character of these two jurors. It is equally possible that these jurors came forward now because they had the courage to admit that they had acted under pressure, while the other jurors who did not come forward have erased this from their memories. The fact still remains of course, as Bhagwati pointed out, that 'jurors cannot be required to disclose which way they voted in the verdict. There is an obligation of confidentiality upon them. The State could not have therefore enquired from the other jurors as to what was their verdict'. In Thomas Solari Yrigoyen dissented, taking a position quite different from that of Bhagwati expressed two years previously. He noted that it is the State issues, such as medical evidence, to the attention of the jury, the fact that the jury chooses to ignore this does not constitute a violation of the right to a fair trial. Neither does the short time the jury takes for deliberations (such as seventeen minutes).⁹¹

The HRC usually does not sustain complaints about the jury instructions and the attitude of the judge, especially when counsel failed to object during the trial.⁹² In one case the petitioner had claimed, among others, that the trial judge fundamentally erred in directing the jury that it was 'safer and better' to convict on the basis of circumstantial evidence. Still, the HRC considered that the material before the Committee did not show that the jury instructions were clearly arbitrary or amounted to a denial of justice.⁹³ It is generally beyond the Committee's competence to evaluate jury instructions. It normally declares these claims inadmissible.⁹⁴ It makes an exception, however, vis-à-vis claims that these instructions were clearly arbitrary or amounted to a denial of justice or that the judge manifestly violated his obligation of impartiality.⁹⁵ In such cases, the Committee examines the claim in order to find out whether the jury instructions were indeed party's responsibility to provide for competent, independent and impartial courts of justice established by law to produce a determination of any criminal charge, in accordance with Article 14. He considered that the sworn statements of the two jury members, which were not rebutted by the State party, showed that the foreman acted irregularly by pressuring the members of the jury to deliver a unanimous verdict when nine of them believed that the petitioner was not guilty and only three believed the opposite. The change made in the announcement of the verdict showed that the petitioner did not enjoy the due process accorded by Art. 14 to defendants in criminal cases. "This circumstance is particularly serious in view of the fact that the verdict announced as having been reached by the jury amounts to a death sentence for the convicted person".

⁹¹ See e.g., HRC Leaford Smith v. Jamaica, 31 March 1993 and Beresford Whyte v. Jamaica, 27 July 1998.

⁹² HRC Willard Collins v. Jamaica, 1 November 1991 (Chanet, Herndl, Aguilar Urbina and Wennergren would have found a violation of Article 14(1) because of bias of the judge).

⁹³ HRC Everton Morrison v. Jamaica, 27 July 1998 and Clarence Marshall v. Jamaica, 3 November 1998. See also Trevor Bennett v. Jamaica, 25 March 1999. In this case the Committee referred to the Court of Appeal's review of the judge's instructions, while it had previously noted, under "the facts as submitted by the author" that the Court of Appeal of Jamaica had refused the application for leave to appeal. A refusal of an application for leave to appeal, presumably, is not the same as the review of the appeal itself. If this review did not take place, it is not clear how the Committee could have noted it.

⁹⁴ See e.g. HRC R.M. v. Trinidad and Tobago, 29 October 1993 (inadm.). Like the HRC the Inter-American Commission considers that it is generally for the domestic courts to review the factual evidence in a given case. In Sankofa v. US, however, it found that the treatment of identification and ballistic evidence amounted to a denial of justice contrary to the fair trial and due process standards of the American Declaration. CIDH Shaka Sankofa (Gary Graham) v. US, 29 December 2003, §§42-49.

⁹⁵ See e.g., HRC Daniel Pinto v. Trinidad and Tobago, 20 July 1990; Carlton Reid v. Jamaica, 20 July 1990; Paul Kelly v. Jamaica, 8 April 1991; Michael Sawyers and Michael and Desmond McClean v. Jamaica, 11 April 1991; Aston Little v. Jamaica, 1 November 1991; Raphael Henry v. Jamaica, 1 November 1991; Glenford Campbell v. Jamaica, 30 March 1992; Clifton Wright v. Jamaica, 27 July 1992 (an unusual case in which the HRC found a violation of Article 14(1) for a denial of justice); George Graham and Arthur Morrison v. Jamaica, 25 March 1996; Clifford McLawrence v. Jamaica, 18 July 1997; Byron Young v. Jamaica, 4 November 1997; Deon Mc Taggart v. Jamaica, 31 March 1998; Anthony McLeod v. Jamaica, 31 March 1998; Anthony Finn v. Jamaica, 31 July 1998; Beresford Whyte v. Jamaica, 27 July 1998; Dole Chadee et al v. Trinidad and Tobago, 29 July 1998; Christopher Brown v. Jamaica, 23 March 1999; Samuel Thomas v. Jamaica, 31 March 1999 and Mohammed Ajaz and Amir Jamil v. Korea, 13 July 1999.

clearly arbitrary or did indeed amount to a denial of justice or in order to find whether it was indeed demonstrated that the judge manifestly violated his obligation of impartiality.⁹⁶ The HRC takes into account information derived not just directly from the facts as stated by either the petitioners or the State party but also from the domestic court's judgments and the trial transcript.⁹⁷ Sometimes the result is favourable to the petitioner,⁹⁸ but often to the State, because of the Committee's reliance on the facts and evidence as established domestically. The HRC may acknowledge that the allegations and the trial transcript suggest deficiencies in the evidence, but normally it does not consider that this amounts to arbitrariness or a violation of the obligation of impartiality.⁹⁹ It usually concludes, on the basis of the trial transcripts, that the conduct of the trial or the ⁹⁶ See, e.g., HRC Carlton Reid v. Jamaica, 20 July 1990. The HRC also found violations of Art. 14(1) in cases against Guyana and Tajikistan. In Lallman Mulai and Bharatraj Mulai (submitted by their sister Rookmin Mulai) v. Republic of Guyana, 20 July 2004, for instance, it noted that it was 'not in the position to establish that the performance and the conclusions reached by the jury and the foreman in fact reflected partiality and bias' against both petitioners. It appeared that the Court of Appeal did deal with the issue of possible rights. Nevertheless, the court 'did not address that part of the grounds of appeal that related to' the right before the courts, 'on the strength of which the defence might have moved for the trial to be aborted'. In Abduali Ismatovich Kurbanov (submitted by his mother Safarmo Kurbanova) v. Tajikistan, 6 November 2003, it found a violation because the State had not provided 'any explanation as to why the trial was conducted, at first instance, by the Military Chamber of the Supreme Court'. 'In the absence of any information by the State party to justify a trial before a military court' the trial and death sentence of the petitioner's son, who was a civilian, did not meet the requirements of Article 14(1). In Gaibullozhon Ilyasovich Saidov (submitted by his wife Barno Saidova) v. Tajikistan, 8 July 2004 the HRC noted the petitioner's claim that her husband's right to a fair trial was violated, among others 'by the fact that the judge conducted the trial in a biased manner and refused even to consider the revocation of the confessions made by Mr. Saidov during the investigation'. 'No explanation was provided by the State party for the reasons of that situation'. Thus, 'on the strength of the material before it', it found a violation of Article 14(1). With regard to these confessions it is noteworthy that the HRC found that due weight must be given to the claim that the confession had been extracted under torture, since the State had failed to either indicate how the court had investigated these allegations or to provide copies of any medical reports. The Committee found violations of Articles 7 and 14(3)(g) because his conviction was based on a confession obtained under duress. Finally, in Bakhrom Khomidov (submitted by his mother Saodat Khomidova) v. Tajikistan, 29 July 2004 it found violations of Article 14(1) and (3)(e) and (g). In the absence of any pertinent information by the State party it found that the court did not fulfil its obligation of impartiality and independence. Moreover, the judge denied the request by counsel to call witnesses and to have his client examined by a doctor.

⁹⁷ See e.g. HRC Anthony Finn v. Jamaica, 31 July 1998. See also Clarence Marshall v. Jamaica, 3 November 1998.

⁹⁸ For an example see HRC Collin Smartt (submitted by his mother Daphne Smartt) v. Republic of Guyana, 6 July 2004. In this case the HRC noted proprio motu, when it was considering the admissibility of the case, 'that the trial documents submitted by the author reveal that her son was not represented by counsel during the committal hearings'. It also noted with concern 'that, despite three reminders addressed to it, the State party has failed to comment on the communication'. The petitioner was not represented by counsel in her petition to the HRC.

⁹⁹ See e.g. HRC Anthony McLeod v. Jamaica, 31 March 1998. It does not automatically find a violation if the State party does not contest the claim. It considers the material before it in order to ascertain whether the petitioner has sufficiently substantiated his allegation. If the prosecutor, for instance, successfully challenged the claim in court, the HRC finds itself unable to conclude a violation of Articles 7 and 14(3)(g). See e.g., Paul Kelly v. Jamaica, 8 April 1991 and Glenford judge's instructions to the jury were not 'clearly arbitrary' and did not amount to a denial of justice, or it concludes that the judge had not manifestly violated his obligation of impartiality.¹⁰⁰

Maybe if the State plays it procedurally correct at the domestic and international level, there is simply not much international bodies can do about claims of improper jury instructions and similar issues. It would mainly be the NGOs and media that could achieve change if court cases systematically result in irreparable harm to individuals or groups. They could investigate and

Campbell v. Jamaica, 30 March 1992. Another example is when the judge had examined the claim at the trial during a voir dire and found it lacking in substance. See e.g., Errol Johnson v. Jamaica, 22 March 1996. See also the individual opinions of Solari Irigoyen and Scheinin in Terrence Sahadeo (submitted by his sister Margaret Paul) v. Republic of Guyana, 1 November 2001. Scheinin noted that it appeared from 'the incomplete materials submitted to the Committee that when presenting the evidence related to the credibility of Mr. Sahadeo's testimony that he signed the confession statement under ill treatment, the presiding judge used language that was prejudicial to the defendant. For instance, he referred to Mr. Sahadeo's colour of skin as basis for an inference that ill treatment would have left marks that would have been visible in the medical inspection that took place afterwards, in addition to the bruise on the toe that was recorded. As the court, consequently, did not address the issue of the possible coercion and ill treatment in a proper way in a case that led to the imposition of capital punishment, I find that there has been a violation of articles 7 and 14 of the Covenant'. Moreover, 'the mere fact that no allegation of torture was made in the domestic appeal proceedings can not as such be held against the alleged victim if it is proposed, (...) that such an allegation was in fact made during the actual trial but was neither recorded nor acted upon'. In such case due weight must be given to the allegations, in light of the details given by the petitioner, the unavailability of a trial transcript and the absence of any further explanations from the State party. HRC Abduali Ismatovich Kurbanov (submitted by his mother Safarmo Kurbanova) v. Tajikistan, 6 November 2003.

100

Even in a case in which the State initially failed to make available the trial transcripts and domestic judgments and later only provided copies of English translations of these judgments, but not the originals nor the trial transcripts, the HRC did not shift the burden of proof to the State. HRC Mohammed Ajaz and Amir Jamil v. Korea, 13 July 1999. In reply to the Committee's request for the trial transcripts and the judgments in the case, Korea stated that it maintained as a rule "[t]hat it is not allowed to peruse, photocopy and transmit the records of closed cases in order to protect the safety of victims and witnesses and the repute of defendants". Later the State party did provide copies of English translations of the courts' judgments. Apparently the originals were not provided, nor the file transcripts. From these translations, the Committee concluded that it appeared, among others, "that the District Court considered the voluntariness of the statements made by the defendants, but that in the light of the testimonies it found no sustainable reason to doubt the voluntariness of the statements". Thus, the Committee noted that the applicants' claims that the evidence to convict them was insufficient, that they had been tortured in order to force them to confess, and that mistakes occurred in the translations of their statements, were examined by the court of first instance and the court of appeal. Both Courts rejected their claims. The Committee reiterated that it was not for the Committee, but for the courts of States parties, to evaluate the facts and evidence in a specific case, unless it could be ascertained that the evaluation was clearly arbitrary or amounted to a denial of justice. It did regret that the State party did not provide a copy of the trial transcript, for this had prevented the Committee from examining fully the conduct of the trial. However, after consideration of the judgments of the District Court and the High Court, and in particular their evaluation of the claims subsequently made to the Committee, the Committee did not find that those evaluations were arbitrary or amounted to a denial of justice or that the authors had raised before the Committee any issues beyond those so evaluated by the domestic courts. The Committee concluded that none of the articles of the ICCPR had been violated.

report on the question whether there is true equality of arms and whether courts are sufficiently informed and aware of certain issues and not just go through the motions.

Yet the HRC and the Inter-American Commission did not just use provisional measures in cases that, already at that stage, clearly appeared to be arbitrary or amounted to a denial of justice. Many provisional measures used in cases that included claims of an unfair trial in violation of Article 14 ICCPR, but in which the HRC did not find a violation of this article, have performed no function relating to the claim on the merits other than postponing the execution for the sake of postponement.¹⁰¹ In these cases the Committee found that the facts before it did not disclose any violation of the provisions of the Covenant, that there was insufficient evidence of a violation or that the claim dealt with facts and evidence in a particular case and it was not for the Committee to evaluate these.¹⁰² In other cases the HRC did find violations, but not of Article 14. At the time of submission, it made sense to use provisional measures, as there was a possibility the Committee would conclude a violation of Art. 14 meaning that the remedy would be commutation.¹⁰³

In my view the type of violation claimed is more significant for a decision to use provisional measures than the extent of the evidence available at the stage of provisional measures. What should be the most important criterion for using provisional measures is the Rapporteur's expecta-

¹⁰¹ In a few of these cases the death sentence had already been commuted, but in others the petitioners were still awaiting execution. After the finding of no violation the State can execute the petitioner as planned.

¹⁰² HRC Michael Sawyers and Michael and Desmond McClean v. Jamaica (provisional measures in pre-Rapporteur period); Irvine Reynolds v. Jamaica, 8 April 1991 (idem). The HRC concluded that there was no violation of Art. 14 'after considering those parts of the judge's instructions that were made available to it'. It seems that in this case the State was rewarded for general unresponsiveness and for providing an incomplete trial transcript; Dole Chadee et al v. Trinidad and Tobago, 29 July 1998. Scheinin's dissent related to both the prison conditions and the fairness of the trial. The partial dissent of Klein and Kretzmer related to the quality of the water provided in jail. Pocar, who had been the Special Rapporteur deciding on the provisional measure was not present in July 1998 when the Committee decided the case. Dante Piandiong, Jesus Morillos and Archie Bulan (deceased) (submitted by Alexander Padilla and Ricardo III Sunga) v. the Philippines, 19 October 2000. Three persons had been executed while the case was still pending, despite a provisional measure. See Chapter XVII for a discussion of the State party's official responses towards these provisional measures and the response by the HRC. It did point out that the substance of the claim appeared to raise important questions. One of these was 'whether or not the crime for which they were convicted was a most serious crime as stipulated by article 6(2). Another was 'whether the re-introduction of the death penalty in the Philippines is in compliance with the State party's obligations under article 6(1) (2) and (6) of the Covenant'. It considered, however, that it was not in a position to address the issues in this case because neither counsel nor the State had made submissions in this respect. Apparently this was different from the situation in which it considered issues proprio motu. In short, it could not make a finding of a violation of any of the articles of the ICCPR. At the same time it reiterated its conclusion that 'the State committed a grave breach of its obligations under the Protocol by putting the alleged victims to death before the Committee had concluded its consideration of the Communication'. Evatt and Medina Quiroga dissented on the issue of fair trial, considering that the alleged defects in the identification parade left serious questions about the fairness of the trial. Chanet considered that the accused should have been provided with a lawyer during the line-up identification. As this was not done, the HRC should have found violations of Articles 14(3)(b) and (d) and 6. Scheinin, finally, considered that the State should have provided legal assistance during the 6-8 months of pre-trial detention.

¹⁰³ See Chapter XIII on the relationship with forms of reparation.

tion of the remedy the Committee would recommend if it would find a violation.¹⁰⁴ The HRC takes seriously its subsidiary role in the system of human rights protection. It assumes that the domestic courts ‘have got it right’. Despite the difficulty of proving violations of Art. 14 there is always a remote possibility that the HRC will find a denial of justice or clear arbitrariness in the court’s or jury’s handling of the facts and evidence or in the judge’s instructions to the jury.

In its case law the HRC has not clarified what are the criteria to assess the risk for the use of provisional measures. It would be virtually impossible for the petitioner to provide information indicating, for instance, a violation of Article 14 ICCPR amounting to a denial of justice, already when he requests the HRC to take provisional measures halting an execution. More than some prima facie evidence of a claim should not be required.

As the HRC has not indicated that it requires a certain level of evidence before it would use provisional measures to halt an execution, the Rapporteur correctly uses provisional measures also in all cases involving claims of a violation of Article 14. Given the difficulty in establishing such a violation, combined with the importance of the right to life, it would be unreasonable to require the petitioner to already do so at the stage of provisional measures. Hence, if there is a possibility that the HRC finds a violation, even if remote, the HRC, in my view, is justified in its use of provisional measures to halt an execution.¹⁰⁵

3.2.4 Non-refoulement cases and assessment of risk

3.2.4.1 INTRODUCTION

Internationally, both the HRC and CAT have dealt with cases involving claims that the expulsion or extradition of the petition would result in a violation of the principle of non-refoulement. In addition, the European system has dealt with the issue of non-refoulement very often as well. An important factor in their case law has been that of the evidentiary requirements for a ‘real risk’ on the merits.¹⁰⁶

Certain States, such as Australia and Canada, have put pressure on the individual complaint systems of the ICCPR and the Convention against Torture.¹⁰⁷ At times the supervisory Committees to both treaties may have felt inclined to take a rather limited approach, certainly to the evidentiary requirements on the merits,¹⁰⁸ but also to the use of provisional measures. They may use them more sparingly and in fewer situations than legally might be possible. This is relevant in the context of the type of cases in which provisional measures are used, but particularly in the context of the assessment of evidence.

This section first deals with the assessment of risk by CAT and the HRC. It also examines the approach to assessment of risk in the European system. It singles out the issue of the evidence required for lifting provisional measures and the issue of diplomatic assurances.

¹⁰⁴ See Chapter III (Halting executions) and Chapter XIII (Protection) on the relationship with reparation.

¹⁰⁵ This depends of course on the obligations on the merits and forms of reparation required by it, as discussed in Chapter XIII (Protection).

¹⁰⁶ See in general on this issue e.g. Battjes (2006).

¹⁰⁷ Interview of author with HRC Special Rapporteur Martin Scheinin, Maastricht 20 September 2002.

¹⁰⁸ CAT has recalled ‘that it is normally for the complainant to present an arguable case and that the risk of torture must be assessed on grounds that go beyond mere theory and suspicion’. C.A.R.M. v. Canada, 18 May 2007, §8.10; M.Z. v. Sweden, 12 May 2006, §9.3; M.A.K. v. Germany, 12 May 2004, §13.5; and S.L. v. Sweden, 11 May 2001, §6.3.

3.2.4.2 ASSESSMENT OF RISK BY CAT

In 1997 CAT devoted a General Comment on its assessment of risk on the merits. It noted that ‘the burden is upon the author to present an arguable case’ of a violation of Art. 3 on the merits. This means that ‘there must be a factual basis for the author’s position sufficient to require a response from the State party’.¹⁰⁹ The ‘risk of torture must be assessed on grounds that go beyond mere theory or suspicion. However, the risk does not have to meet the test of being highly probable’.¹¹⁰ The petitioner must show ‘substantial grounds’ for his or her belief to be in danger of being tortured and this danger must be ‘personal and present’.¹¹¹ Pertinent information would include, and the Committee has noted that this list is non-exhaustive, evidence of a consistent pattern of gross, flagrant or mass violations of human rights; the fact that the petitioner has been ‘tortured or maltreated by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity’ in the (recent) past; any medical or other independent evidence to support a claim by the petitioner in this respect. CAT would also consider as pertinent information to the effect that the situation has since changed; that the petitioner has ‘engaged in political or other activity within or outside the State concerned which would appear to make him/her particularly vulnerable to the risk of being placed in danger of torture were he/she to be expelled, returned or extradited to the State in question’; ‘any evidence as to the credibility of the author and any relevant factual inconsistencies in the petitioner’s claim’.¹¹² These criteria all appear relevant already at the stage of provisional measures.

In its General Comment CAT noted that ‘Bearing in mind that the Committee against Torture is not an appellate, a quasi-judicial or an administrative body, but rather a monitoring body created by the States parties themselves with declaratory powers only, it follows that: (a) Considerable weight will be given, in exercising the Committee’s jurisdiction pursuant to article 3 of the Convention, to findings of fact that are made by organs of the State party concerned; but (b) The Committee is not bound by such findings and instead has the power, provided by article 22, paragraph 4, of the Convention, of free assessment of the facts based upon the full set of circumstances in every case’.¹¹³

‘Complete accuracy’ cannot be expected from victims of torture. Contradictory submissions presented by the petitioner do not necessarily make a complaint unfounded, particularly when it has been shown that the petition suffers from a post traumatic stress syndrome.¹¹⁴ Yet a complaint involving risk of violation of Article 3 should be detailed sufficiently or there should be sufficient circumstantial evidence for a shift in the burden of proof.¹¹⁵

¹⁰⁹ CAT General Comment 1 of 21 November 1997 on Communications concerning the return of a person to a State where there may be grounds he would be subjected to torture (Article 3 in the context of Article 22), §5.

¹¹⁰ Id., §6.

¹¹¹ Id., §7.

¹¹² Id., §8.

¹¹³ Id., §9. See also Bruin (1998), pp. 145-150. A more recent example is C.T. and K.M. v. Sweden, 17 November 2006.

¹¹⁴ See e.g. CAT Alan v. Switzerland, 28 May 1996 and Tala v. Sweden, 15 November 1996. See also, more recently, V.L. v. Switzerland, 20 November 2006.

¹¹⁵ This also includes plausible explanations for and the story of the petitioner’s flight, e.g. S.P.A. v. Canada, 7 November 2006, §7.5 (“the Committee deems that the complainant has not submitted sufficient details or corroborating evidence to shift the burden of proof. In particular, she has not adduced satisfactory evidence or details relating to her detention or escape from detention. Further, she has failed to provide plausible explanations for her failure or inability to provide certain details which would have been of relevance to buttress her case, such as her stay for over

At the admissibility stage the petitioner already must provide evidence indicating that the petition is not manifestly unfounded.¹¹⁶ On the merits the risk faced by the petitioner must be ‘fore-seetable, real and personal’.¹¹⁷ It is normally for the petitioner ‘to present an arguable case’. The risk of torture ‘must be assessed on grounds that go beyond mere theory and suspicion’. The risk does not need to meet the test of ‘highly probable’, but the petitioner must provide ‘sufficiently reliable evidence’ which would ‘justify a shift of the burden of proof to the State party’.¹¹⁸

After the first few years dealing with individual complaints CAT became rather strict in its interpretation of what constitutes ‘personal risk’, although more recently it appears at times to return to a more critical approach to the arguments of the State.¹¹⁹

CAT has ‘conceptualized the formal and substantive criteria applied by the Rapporteur for new complaints and interim measures in granting or rejecting requests for interim measures of protection’.¹²⁰ In this respect it has noted that for the Rapporteur to use provisional measures a petition ‘must have a substantial likelihood of success on the merits for it to be concluded that the alleged victim would suffer irreparable harm in the event of his or her deportation’.¹²¹ This statement refers both to evidentiary requirements and to the applicable substantive law.¹²² three months in Kermanshah and the names of those who helped her to escape. Finally, the Committee deems that she has failed to provide plausible explanations for her subsequent journey through seven countries, including some asylum countries, prior to finally claiming refugee status in Canada”).

¹¹⁶ See e.g. CAT I.A.O. v. Sweden, 6 May 1998 (inadm.: no ‘substantial grounds’).

¹¹⁷ See e.g. CAT A.R. v. The Netherlands, 21 November 2003, §7.3 and S.S. and S.A. v. the Netherlands, 11 May 2001 (no violation).

¹¹⁸ See e.g. CAT M.A.K. v. Germany, 12 May 2004, §13.5. CAT is not always consistent in its phrasing, see e.g. Gamal El Rgeig v. Switzerland, 15 November 2006 and JV 2006, 160 annotated by Spijkerboer.

¹¹⁹ In the period covered by its Annual Report 2000 it discussed nine cases involving non-refoulement claims. In one case it found a violation. In the other cases it did not. Five times because it considered there were no ‘substantial grounds’; twice because it considered that the risk was limited given the considerable time that had passed; once because the petitioner, who had been expelled pending the proceedings before CAT, in practice was not tortured upon return and once because the complaint was not convincing. In the period covered by its Annual Report 2005 it found violations in four of the nine non-refoulement cases. In the period covered by its Annual Report 2006, on the merits CAT dealt with the issue of non-refoulement nine times. On one occasion it did find a violation of Article 3 but in the other cases it did not. In its Annual Report 2007 (covering the Fall 2006 and Spring 2007 sessions), in 12 non-refoulement cases it found no violation and in seven cases it did find a violation. Its more critical approach is reflected in particular in its discussion of diplomatic assurances, see infra.

¹²⁰ See CAT Annual Report 2005, §135; Annual Report 2006, §61; Annual Report 2007, §70.

¹²¹ Ibid.

¹²² As to the relevance of the latter, see Chapter V (Non-refoulement). Since CAT adapted its practice with regard to provisional measures there was an expectation that more petitioners would resort to the HRC in expulsion cases. Interview by author with HRC Special Rapporteur Martin Scheinin, Maastricht 20 September 2002. By April 2003, however, there was no evidence of this yet. Interview by author with HRC Special Rapporteur Martin Scheinin, Geneva, April 2003. Of the 33 Views referred to in its Annual Report 2006, A/61/44, 1 November 2006, discussing the follow up on CAT’s findings of violations ‘up to the thirty-fourth session’, 21 related to Article 3 (non-refoulement). In 20 of the 21 cases provisional measures were used pending the proceedings. In the one case in which they were not, the removal had taken place before the petitioner could apply to CAT (Agiza v. Sweden). Until 2003 it took provisional measures more than 80 times. These approximate numbers in themselves also indicate that CAT is considerably

CAT is considerably less strict in its use of provisional measures than it is on the merits. Given the absence of consistent publication of information on the use of provisional measures, including statistics, it is difficult to assess to what extent their use decreased upon the Committee's adoption of guidelines as to the use of provisional measures. In fact it must be kept in mind that both before and after the adoption of these guidelines, there have been occasions on which it refused to take provisional measures in non-refoulement cases, but at the same time it has continued to use them in the majority of cases.¹²³

3.2.4.3 ASSESSMENT OF RISK BY THE HRC

The HRC has not discussed the evidence required on the merits, let alone that required at the stage of provisional measures, to the same extent as CAT. Yet it has also dealt with the issue of non-refoulement in expulsion and extradition cases. In fact the question which test to apply to establish real risk is one of the main questions arising on the merits in non-refoulement cases under the ICCPR. This question may be expected to play a role as well at the provisional measures stage.¹²⁴

As discussed in the context of the evidence required for the use of provisional measures to halt the execution of the death penalty, in the practice of the HRC we see that the Rapporteur transmits the case to the State once there is a certain amount of evidence and, possibly, once there are some questions to be posed to the State. It is also at this stage that the Rapporteur normally less strict in its use of provisional measures than it is on the merits. Yet since the introduction of a Rapporteur to deal with requests for provisional measures, the latter would ask the secretariat to make a quick assessment on the substance of the complaint and whether there was prima facie evidence of risk. Reportedly, this resulted in the use of provisional measures in a lower percentage of cases. About 60 to 70 % according to an estimate made at the secretariat in Geneva in October 2003.

¹²³ See e.g. the following cases in which provisional measures were used, but in which subsequently no violation was found for failure to substantiate: CAT E.R.K. and Y.K. v. Sweden 30 April 2007; T.A. v. Sweden, 22 November 2007; Z.K. v. Sweden, 9 May 2008 and R.K. et al. v. Sweden, 16 May 2008. In one case in which no violation was found on the merits the Rapporteur decided not to use provisional measures (decision of 30 January 2007): M.X. v. Switzerland, 7 May 2008, §1.2. Another case, in which provisional measures were used, was subsequently declared inadmissible as the claim did not 'rise to the basic level of substantiation required for purposes of admissibility', see K.A. v. Sweden, 16 November 2007 (inadm.) §7.2. In this case the Rapporteur added that his request for provisional measures, of 24 November 2006, was made on the basis of the information contained in the petitioner's submissions and could be reviewed at the request of the State in light of information and comments from the State and the petitioner, §1.5. Following this request, on 5 December 2006, the Swedish Migration Board decided to stay the enforcement of the expulsion orders, §1.6. On official responses see Chapter XVII.

¹²⁴ As in the other systems, provisional measures have been used in cases in which subsequently no violation was found on the merits, or in cases that were later declared inadmissible as insufficiently substantiated. See e.g. HRC Daljit Singh v. Canada, 30 March 2006 (inadm.). In this case the Rapporteur had initially used a qualified provisional measure on 5 November 2004, requesting the State not to deport the petitioner 'before it provides the Committee with information as to whether it intends to remove' him to India, and before providing the Committee with its observations on the communication. Following a request for clarification the Committee requested the State, on 9 November 2004, 'not to deport Mr. Daljit Singh to India before the State party has made its observations either on admissibility or the merits of the author's allegations and the Committee has acknowledged receipt'. §1.2.

uses provisional measures, although there are exceptions. There have been instances in which the Rapporteur used provisional measures before he or she ordered the Secretariat to transmit the petitioner's submission to the State for comment. In other words, while the HRC generally seems to use the same criterion for prima facie evidence for decisions to transmit the case and for decisions to use provisional measures, there are situations in which material and temporal urgency warrant the use of provisional measures even though the Rapporteur considers that insufficient information is available to transmit the case to the State.

From the perspective of non-refoulement the main difference between extradition and other forms of removal is that it is easier for the alleged victim to show that his extradition is likely to expose him to torture or ill treatment than his expulsion, exactly because in cases of extradition it is certain he faces detention upon return. This applies even more to the situation in which he is facing a punishment in the requesting country that would violate the obligations of the sending country.¹²⁵

The HRC's first expulsion case, dating from 1978, gives some indication of the assessment of risk at the stage of provisional measures. It used provisional measures and decided to inform the petitioner that unless he provided the information requested, within certain time limits, the HRC might conclude that he no longer wished it to continue consideration of the case.¹²⁶ Obviously if this failure to provide further information could result in a discontinuation of the case, it could also result in withdrawal of the provisional measures.

In extradition cases the HRC decided that a test of 'necessary and foreseeable' consequences of the removal to the petitioner was to be applied in its decisions on the merits.¹²⁷ However, this ¹²⁵ In connection with a possibly conflicting obligation under an extradition treaty, invoked by Canada, the HRC stated: "A State party to the Covenant is required to ensure that it carries out all its other legal commitments in a manner consistent with the Covenant". HRC Kindler v. Canada, 30 July 1993, §13.1. See in general about this issue Smeulers (2002), pp. 11-73.

¹²⁶ HRC O.E. v. S., 26 July 1978.

¹²⁷ See e.g. HRC Ng v. Canada, 5 November 1993, §6.2. It pointed out that the State's duty under Article 2 ICCPR 'would be negated by the handing over of a person to another State (whether a State party to the Covenant or not) where treatment contrary to the Covenant is certain or is the very purpose of the handing over'. As an example, the HRC mentioned that the State party would violate the ICCPR 'if it handed over a person to another State in circumstances in which it was foreseeable that torture would take place'. Given the example, it seems that certainty is not required but rather foreseeability. Accordingly, the 'foreseeability of the consequence would mean that there was a present violation by the State party, even though the consequence would not occur until later on'. With regard to the assessment of risk the HRC recalled the following: "(a) California had sought the author's extradition on charges which, if proven, carry the death penalty; (b) the United States requested Ng's extradition on those capital charges; (c) the extradition warrant documents the existence of a prima facie case against the author; (d) United States prosecutors involved in the case have stated that they would ask for the death penalty to be imposed; and (e) the state of California, when intervening before the Supreme Court of Canada did not disavow the prosecutors' position". Ng v. Canada, §13.5. Committee member Aguilar Urbina briefly referred to the State's argument that the petitioner could not be considered a victim because the allegations were derived from assumptions about 'possible future events, which may not materialise and which are dependent on the law and actions of the United States'. He pointed out that the 'foreseeability' of a future event referred to the question 'whether, according to common sense, it may happen, in the absence of exceptional events that prevent it from occurring'. At the same time 'necessity' referred to future events that 'will inevitably occur, unless exceptional events prevent it from happening'. He agreed with the views of the majority, finding that the petitioner 'would necessarily and foreseeably be executed'. Ng v. Canada, dissenting opinion Aguilar Urbina, §5. On the issue of necessary and foreseeable consequences test may be too difficult to meet for petitioners even in extradition cases. In addition, the HRC takes a narrow view of what is 'necessary and foreseeable' and has pointed out that it is not a fourth instance of appeal, meaning that it is not within its competence to review sentences of domestic courts.¹²⁸ Generally it does not consider itself competent to review facts and evidence already decided on by domestic courts. This leads exception if the petitioner can show arbitrariness or a 'denial of justice'.¹²⁹

Of course there are cases where a finding of a risk in an extradition case would appear self-evident given the type of information available at that stage, also with a test of 'necessary and foreseeable'. When the prosecutor is seeking the death penalty this indicates a real risk in itself.¹³⁰ In light of the practice in the US, the fact that accomplices did not receive the death penalty gives no indication about the fate of the petitioner. Such results depend on the quality of the defence, on what the prosecutor has invested in the domestic case, as well as other circumstances. Obviously in such cases provisional measures have been used.¹³¹

E.G. v. Canada (disc. 1997)¹³² is relevant with regard to assessing risk in the context of the credibility of assurances against the death penalty at the stage of the merits as well as provisional measures. At the time the HRC did not consider that Canada was under an obligation to request assurances of the US that the death penalty would not be sought, but in this case Canada apparently did request them. Counsel for the petitioner referred to a report from a Florida newspaper about another person who had been extradited from Canada 'under essentially the same circumstances'.¹³³ In that case Florida prosecutors had given assurances that the death penalty would not be imposed, but once he was extradited they suggested they were not bound by this undertaking. 'Given the ambivalence of Florida prosecutors' about such undertakings, he noted, there was a real risk that the petitioner would be exposed to the death penalty by electrocution. Moreover, he pointed out that the federal government gave no assurances against the death penalty.¹³⁴ Initially Committee member Lallah has considered that it was sufficient that the offence for which the petitioner faced trial in the US in principle carried the death penalty. He was thus facing a charge placing his life in jeopardy. The fact that one petitioner had already been tried and sentenced to death when the HRC adopted its Views, while another had not, made no material difference. Cox v. Canada, 31 October 1994, dissenting opinion Lallah. See also Kindler v. Canada, 30 July 1993.

¹²⁸ HRC Ng v. Canada, 5 November 1993, §15.2.

¹²⁹ See e.g. HRC Agabekova v. Uzbekistan, 16 March 2007. For exceptional (death penalty) cases in which it did dispute the approach by the domestic court see e.g. Clifton Wright v. Jamaica, 27 July 1992; Mulai v. Guyana, 20 July 2004 and several cases against Tajikistan, e.g. Khomidova (on behalf of her son Khomidov) v. Tajikistan, 29 July 2004.

¹³⁰ The group of persons protected under Article 6 ICCPR would otherwise be extremely limited. Only people like Kindler who have already been sentenced to death and have somehow been able to escape from the US to another State would run a 'real risk' of the death penalty upon extradition to the US.

¹³¹ See e.g. the aforementioned HRC cases Kindler, Ng and Cox v. Canada.

¹³² HRC E.G. v. Canada, 738/1997, disc. 17 November 1997; initial submission 5 January 1997, received 7 January 1997 with newspaper clipping of the Orlando sentinel of 18 September 1996, provisional measures of 17 January 1997; discontinued November 1997, including withdrawal of provisional measures (on file with the author).

¹³³ Ibid.

¹³⁴ HRC E.G. v. Canada, 738/1997, disc. 17 November 1997, "While it is true that your petitioner is not now charged with a capital offence, this can change simply by increasing the quantity of marijuana in the charge. There is nothing in international extradition law to confirm that this would violate the rule of specialty and extradition treaties, such as the Canada-US treaty, which affirm this rule". While the petitioner was reassured by a comment in the Canadian response the HRC used provisional measures,¹³⁵ but it appears from the file that the State party was keen on their withdrawal and the Rapporteur decided that there was no need to maintain them. He had made his decision ‘after careful consideration and upon reflection’ and ‘on the basis of the assurances obtained by the Canadian Government from United States authorities, to the effect that the death penalty will not be sought against and imposed on’ the petitioner.¹³⁶

Sometimes a risk of the death penalty has also played a role in expulsion cases. In G.T. v. Australia (1997)¹³⁷ the petitioner feared he would be arrested upon return to Malaysia and tried for a drug-related crime that carried the death penalty. Pending the proceedings the HRC used provisional measures, but on the merits it found that the death penalty was not a foreseeable and necessary consequence of G.T.’s deportation.¹³⁸ Thus Australia was free to expel T. Effectively, stating that ‘in other words, Canada is not prepared to consent to the imposition of the death penalty’, he noted nevertheless that the signals sent to him directly were far less encouraging. He referred to the Minister’s decision of October 1994 that a request for assurances was not necessary and a letter of November 1994 in which Senior Counsel for the Minister ‘felt it necessary’ to ‘reaffirm that Canada did not seek any formal assurances under Article 6 of the Treaty in this case’. The petitioner, on the other hand, sought binding assurances by both federal and State authorities that the death penalty would not be imposed. “As things stand, although there is an undertaking from the Florida prosecutor, it does not bind the United States Government because it has not been sought under Article 6 of the treaty. Furthermore, there is no undertaking with respect to the federal charges”. Finally, counsel explained that his client ‘strongly resents the suggestions of abusive behaviour’. Thus, his client had instructed him to inform both the HRC and the Canadian Government that if the Minister would provide credible assurances against the death penalty the petitioner would formally renounce all remedies within Canada and accept his extradition to the US.

¹³⁵ On 17 January 1997.

¹³⁶ HRC Note verbale by the Special Rapporteur to the Permanent Mission of Canada in E.G. v. Canada (738/1997), 28 April 1997 (on file with the author). In the letter sent by the Secretariat to counsel it was noted that the Rapporteur was ‘satisfied that the Government of Canada has obtained the appropriate assurances from the United States authorities, both at the Federal and at the State level’. Letter by the Secretariat to the petitioner’s counsel, 28 April 1997 (on file with the author). In May 1997 the petitioner withdrew his communication before the HRC. “The answers provided by Canada in response to the communication have helped to clarify his legal situation and he feels that the assurances are now sufficient that the death penalty will not be imposed”. Letter by counsel to the HRC, 26 May 1997; In November 1997 the HRC decided to discontinue examination of the case, letter by the Secretariat to counsel informing about the decision, taken at the 61st session, to discontinue the case, 17 November 1997 (on file with the author).

¹³⁷ HRC Mrs. G.T. v. Australia, 4 November 1997.

¹³⁸ The State had considered that the HRC should use the ‘necessary and foreseeable consequence test’ also for expulsion cases. It noted that the Committee’s ‘necessary and foreseeable consequence test’ was stricter than the ‘real chance test’ used by domestic courts and that it placed a higher evidential burden on the petitioner than the test of ‘well-founded fear of persecution’ under the Refugee Convention. The petitioner was required to demonstrate that a prospective violation could be foreseen and was inevitable and that there was a clear causal link between the decision of the expelling State and a future violation by the receiving State. See HRC Mrs. G.T. v. Australia, 4 November 1997, §5.8 and the submission by the State on the admissibility and merits in this case, May 1997, submitted on 3 June 1997 (on file with the author). In effect, in this approach the petitioner would hardly ever be able to show such consequence other than in extradition cases. The State argued, moreover, that there was no real risk of prosecution of the petitioner in Malaysia and, in the alternative, there was insufficient the provisional measure came to an end with its decision on the merits. This case not only indicates that evidentiary requirements on the merits are very strict,¹³⁹ but also that for the use of provisional measures the requirements for assessment of risk are not. It is clear that while the HRC considered there was insufficient evidence to find a violation, there was sufficient evidence for it to use provisional measures.¹⁴⁰ evidence that, if prosecuted and convicted, he would be subjected to caning or an ‘unreasonable period of detention on death row’. It is clear that it based its reasoning on Kindler v. Canada and also ignored the fact that, different from Canada, Australia is a party to the Second OP (on the abolition of the death penalty). It referred to information received from its Mission in Kuala Lumpur and noted ‘it is the considered view of our interlocutors that there is nothing notably inhumane or unusually harsh about the conditions of those placed in Malaysia’s death row’. The petitioner submitted that her husband’s family had made inquiries and found that his name was placed on the Malaysian computers for arrest. See §6.6 of the View. Moreover, he had been convicted of importing 240 gram of heroine into Australia and it may be assumed that he had this ‘under his control’ when he left Malaysia. Malaysia carries the mandatory death penalty in such circumstance.

¹³⁹ Three members dissented and argued that in this case there was a real risk that the alleged victim would be subjected to the death penalty. They argued that, different from A.R.J. v. Australia (1997), in this case Malaysia would apply its law, under which the death penalty is mandatory. In fact, this difference meant that Australia had the burden to ‘refute the assumption that Malaysian law will be applied’ rather than that the petitioner had to prove an intention of the Malaysian authorities to prosecute her husband. In that respect they noted that they ‘cannot ascribe much weight to the oral confirmation of the Royal Malaysian Police (...) that they do not institute criminal proceedings for trafficking in drugs against a person returned to Malaysia’. They pointed out that even if Malaysia would not prosecute the petitioner’s husband for acts for which he had already been convicted in Australia, it could still prosecute him for possession of drugs in Malaysia or for exporting drugs from Malaysia. ‘As these acts carry a mandatory death sentence under Malaysian law something stronger than a vague oral confirmation is required to refute the assumption that the Malaysian authorities will indeed enforce their law’. The dissenters pointed out that, contrary to the positive evidence Australia had provided in the other case, to the effect that persons in a similar situation had not been charged in Iran, it had only presented negative evidence in this case, to the effect that it knew of no cases of executions of persons in similar circumstances. They considered this evidence to be ‘insufficient to refute the assumption that Malaysian law will be applied in T.’s case’. They equally considered insufficient the oral confirmation of the Royal Malaysian Police. For that reason they were ‘forced to conclude that there is a real risk that T. will face a death sentence if he is deported to Malaysia’, in violation of the State’s obligation to ensure his right to life under Article 6 ICCPR. Mrs. G.T. v. Australia, 4 November 1997. Dissent by Klein and Kretzmer. Scheinin agreed. He also considered that the HRC should have taken a separate decision declaring the case admissible and requesting comments on the merits, at least in relation to Articles 17 and 23. He pointed out that the petitioner had not specified which Covenant articles she invoked, which meant that the merger of admissibility and merits gave Australia the possibility to determine the substantive issues. In his view, the communication raised ‘more issues under the Covenant than those to which the State party replied’. In particular, the State had ‘failed to address the issue of whether the reasons justifying the deportation of a person who has fully served his criminal sentence and who has already been able to re-establish his family life are weighty enough to legitimize the adverse consequences for the family life of the person and his closest ones’.

¹⁴⁰ A related question is whether this test is a factual test, for instance whether or not the death penalty is a necessary and foreseeable consequence of an extradition or expulsion, or already a test whether or not there has been a violation of the Covenant. Herndl obviously focuses on the

In Judge v. Canada (2003) the HRC overturned its case law on extradition without assurances against the death penalty.¹⁴¹ Before 2003 it considered that Canada was allowed to extradite without such assurances. In Judge the petitioner had been deported before the HRC could use provisional measures, but its decision on the merits to the effect that assurances against the death penalty must be provided before a petitioner may be extradited, provides a firm basis for the use of provisional measures in new cases.¹⁴² To request provisional measures in order to halt an extradition, petitioners only need to show either that the State did not request assurances or that the assurances provided by the requesting State are insufficient. The expulsion case A.A.T. v. Hungary (disc. 1994) illustrates that the HRC does expect a certain level of information before it takes provisional measures. In this case it only took them after having received additional information.¹⁴³ In the expulsion case A.R.J. v. Australia (1997)¹⁴⁴ the HRC did use provisional measures, but subsequently, drawing on the information and arguments provided by the State,¹⁴⁵ it resorted to the definition of a 'real risk' it had used earlier in extradition cases (rather than expulsion cases). It considered that such a risk existed when a violation of rights under the Covenant would be a 'necessary and foreseeable consequence' of the deportation.¹⁴⁶ Accordingly, it found no violation, allowing the petitioner's return to Iran.

Ahani v. Canada (2004) specifically dealt with the information available to the petitioner in the domestic expulsion proceedings. The original complaint stated that the 'discretion of the Minister of Immigration in directing a person's return to a country may be affected by considerations adverse to human rights concerns, including negative media coverage of a case'.¹⁴⁷ The petitioner added that the Minister's role in the expulsion process was 'neither independent nor impartial' and that instead a tribunal should make such a decision.¹⁴⁸ He noted that he could not rebut the Minister's submissions as he was unaware of their contents. "The absence of any rea-question whether or not the death penalty will be imposed rather than whether or not this would result in a violation. Cox v. Canada, 31 October 1994, dissenting opinion Herndl, §§6-8.

¹⁴¹ HRC Judge v. Canada, 5 August 2003.

¹⁴² It may have been influenced by the changed attitude of the Canadian Supreme Court, emphasising aspects relating to the judicial system and wrongful convictions in the requesting State.

¹⁴³ HRC A.A.T. v. Hungary, 543/1993 (disc. 1994). The initial communication was of 10 August 1992. Early September 1992 the Secretariat contacted the Special Rapporteur. Later that month the Special Rapporteur requested some additional information. In January 1993 the Secretariat informed the petitioner that the case could now soon be brought to the attention of the Special Rapporteur, but some additional information was still necessary about exhaustion of domestic remedies and contact information for his lawyers (so that they could provide a complete file). Eventually, following some informal interventions, the Rapporteur used provisional measures on 2 June 1993.

¹⁴⁴ HRC A.R.J. v. Australia, 28 July 1997. The HRC used provisional measures on 3 April 1996.

¹⁴⁵ The State party, submitting its comments six months after the HRC used provisional measures, argued that the petitioner could not pass the 'necessary and foreseeable consequence' test in this case. A retrial for drug trafficking offences upon expulsion was not 'certain' nor 'the purpose' of returning him to Iran.

¹⁴⁶ It is puzzling that the HRC only refers to Art. 6 and not to the Second Optional Protocol, to which Australia is a party. For the use of the 'necessary and foreseeable consequence' criterion see also e.g. HRC Dawood Khan v. Canada, 25 July 2006, §5.4.

¹⁴⁷ HRC Mansour Ahani v. Canada, 29 March 2004, §3.1.

¹⁴⁸ Ibid. See also Smeulers (2002).

sons provided in the decision makes judicial review of the decision against the submissions made to the Minister impossible”,¹⁴⁹

‘Recalling its own limited role in the assessment of facts and evidence’ the HRC did not discern ‘any elements of bad faith, abuse of power or other arbitrariness’ on the domestic court record. It also observed that the ICCPR ‘does not, as of right, provide for a right of appeal beyond criminal cases’.¹⁵⁰ On the other hand, with respect to the subsequent decision by the Minister that Ahani could be deported the HRC did find violations of the ICCPR. It observed that ‘where one of the highest values protected by the Covenant, namely the right to be free from torture, is at stake, the closest scrutiny should be applied to the fairness of the procedure to determine whether an individual is at a substantial risk of torture’. It emphasised that its provisional measures in this case had highlighted this risk.¹⁵¹

The Committee pointed out that the Canadian Supreme Court had held in *Suresh*¹⁵² that the process of the Minister’s determination of the risk and the balancing with national security grounds ‘was faulty for unfairness’ because the individual in question ‘had not been provided with the full materials on which the Minister based his or her decision and an opportunity to ¹⁴⁹ HRC Mansour Ahani v. Canada, 29 March 2004, §3.2. With regard to the expulsion process followed by the State party counsel noted that the initial security certification was made by two Ministers without any input from the petitioner. The Federal Court hearing only determined whether the Ministers’ assessment was reasonable and the Crown evidence was put forward ‘in camera and ex parte, without being tested by the court or supported by witnesses’. She argued that ‘the conclusion of a national security threat, which was subsequently balanced at the removal stage by one elected official (a Minister) against the risk of harm, was reached by an unfair process’. She pointed out that Canadian security agencies had destroyed their evidence and provided only summaries and that the evidence ‘could have been tested as is the case before the Security Intelligence Review Committee, where an independent counsel, cleared on security grounds could call witnesses and cross-examine in secret hearing’. She noted that the basis of the Supreme Court’s decision was that the petitioner ‘had not made out a prima facie risk of torture’ but that ‘the entire premise of a fair process is that an accurate determination of precisely this question can be made’. Instead, the petitioner only received ‘a post-decision judicial review on whether it was “reasonable” to so conclude’. She pointed out that this was ‘an inappropriately low standard for a decision that could result in torture or loss of life’. See §§6.2-6.4. She argued that the State was ‘in error’ with regard to both of its alleged claims ‘that (i) he is not at risk of torture, and (ii) even if he were, he may be expelled on the grounds of threat to national security’, §3.5. She pointed out that Iran had been monitoring his case and that the details of cooperation and the (confidential) information he provided to the Canadian authorities, and his resistance to deportation could ‘very likely constitute treason in Iran’, §3.6. With regard to the risk to Ahani she noted that the press had extensively referred to him as a defector and that the Government of Iran was fully aware of the nature of his case. The Supreme Court of Canada had decided that the decision of the minister in Ahani was ‘largely fact-based’. “The inquiry into whether Ahani faces a substantial risk of torture involves considerations of the human rights record of the home state, the personal risk faced by the claimant, any assurances that the claimant will not be tortured and their worth and, in that respect, the ability of the home state to control its own security forces, and more. Such issues are largely outside the realm of expertise of reviewing courts and possess a negligible legal dimension. Considerable deference is therefore required”. Supreme Court of Canada Ahani v. Canada, 208 D.L.R. (4th) 57, 2002 SCC 2, §17. See also Macklin (2002) discussing the court’s deferential stance.

¹⁵⁰ HRC Mansour Ahani v. Canada, 29 March 2004, §10.5.

¹⁵¹ Id., §10.6.

¹⁵² Supreme Court of Canada Ahani v. Canada, 208 D.L.R. (4th) 57, 2002 SCC 2.

comment in writing thereon' and further because this decision was not reasoned.¹⁵³ The Committee considered that the decision by the State not to provide Ahani with the procedural protections deemed necessary in the domestic Suresh case, because Ahani 'had not made out a prima facie risk of harm', failed to meet the requisite standard of fairness. It observed that the argument was circuitous in that the petitioner 'may have been able to make out the necessary level of risk if in fact he had been allowed to submit reasons on the risk of torture faced by him in the event of removal'.¹⁵⁴ It found a violation of Article 13 in conjunction with Article 7 ICCPR for the failure to provide the petitioner with 'the procedural protections afforded to the plaintiff in Suresh on the basis that he had not made out a risk of harm'. After all in Article 13 the State is obliged to allow the petitioner to submit reasons against his removal and to have his 'submissions reviewed by a competent authority, entailing a possibility to comment on the material presented to that authority'.¹⁵⁵ Here risk assessment at the stage of provisional measures was subsequently confirmed on the merits.¹⁵⁶

¹⁵³ HRC Mansour Ahani v. Canada, 29 March 2004, §10.6.

¹⁵⁴ Ibid.

¹⁵⁵ HRC Mansour Ahani v. Canada, 29 March 2004, §10.8 (Ando dissenting). The HRC considered that because Article 13 'speaks directly to the situation in the present case and incorporates notions of due process also reflected in article 14 of the Covenant', it would be 'inappropriate in terms of the scheme of the Covenant to apply the broader and general provisions of article 14 directly'. See §10.9. In HRC Byahuranga v. Denmark, 1 November 2004 the HRC took note of the petitioner's 'detailed account as to why he fears to be subjected to ill-treatment at the hands of the Ugandan authorities' and it concluded that he 'made out a prima facie case of such a risk', §11.2. It noted that the State party sought to 'refute the alleged risk of treatment contrary to article 7 merely by referring to the outcome of the assessment made by its own authorities, instead of commenting the author's fairly detailed account on why such a risk in his opinion exists', §11.3. In the light of the State party's 'failure to provide substantive arguments' in order 'to rebut the author's allegations', the HRC found that due weight must be given to his detailed account of the existence of a risk of treatment contrary to Article 7. Id., §11.4. Wedgwood and Yalden attached a dissenting opinion pointing out that if the Committee had wished to have the petitioner's full immigration file 'or any other documents within it, it could easily have asked the State party'. "Denmark has been wholly cooperative with the Committee while this complaint was pending, holding in abeyance the author's deportation at the Committee's request, and releasing him on parole to his family". They pointed out that '(a)t a minimum, the Committee should have given the State party an opportunity to provide any additional documents it wished to inspect'.

¹⁵⁶ See also, e.g. HRC Blanca Lilia Londoño Soto, Oscar Alberto Teran Cano, Maria Hercilia Cano Bedoya, Lina Marcela Teran Londoño, and Lilia Andrea Teran Londoño v. Australia, 1 April 2008 (inadm.), in which the Special Rapporteur denied the petitioners' request for provisional measures on 20 September 2005 and subsequently the Committee declared the Article 7 claim inadmissible for failure to sufficiently substantiate. In this respect the Committee noted the finding by the Refugee Review Tribunal that a real risk could not be established for lack of credibility of the petitioners. In addition the Committee noted that the petitioners had not demonstrated the existence of a real risk of being deprived of their life or exposed to torture or cruel treatment.

3.2.4.4 ASSESSMENT OF RISK IN THE EUROPEAN SYSTEM

Much has been written on the assessment of risk in judgments on the merits by the ECtHR in the context of refoulement.¹⁵⁷ In N. v. Finland (2005), for instance, the Court interviewed the petitioner and witnesses on a fact-finding mission. Eventually it found that the petitioner's return to Congo (DRC) would violate Article 3.¹⁵⁸ As to the general credibility of a petitioner's statements the Court has observed, in Said v. the Netherlands (2005), that firstly, the statements in this case had been 'consistent', and, secondly, that he had submitted 'persuasive argument to rebut the Government's claim that his account lacked credibility'.¹⁵⁹ In Salah Sheekh v. the Netherlands (2007) the Court found that the Netherlands could not ensure the safety of a Somali national. Among others, the Dutch government had no way to monitor his treatment upon return.¹⁶⁰

The Court applies a 'rigorous examination', in which the petitioner, as the Court put it in Saadi v. Italy (2008), must 'adduce evidence capable of proving' substantial grounds for a real risk of violation of Article 3 through removal. What is interesting is that in it uses the phrase 'capable of proving' rather than 'proving'.¹⁶¹ Once the petitioner has provided such evidence, the burden shifts to the State. When does the State have the obligation to take away any doubt? In other words: when has the petitioner offered evidence capable of proving that his removal would violate Article 3? According to Spijkerboer this comes down to the 'arguability' criterion used by the Court in the context of admissibility and in its case law on Article 13.¹⁶²

In cases of suspected terrorists or convicted criminals, States have sometimes argued that 'the examination of possible irreparable harm should be a rigorous one, particularly when the individual concerned was found to represent a threat'.¹⁶³ Yet obviously when there is a real risk, this cannot become less real simply because the person at risk is a convicted criminal or a suspected terrorist.

¹⁵⁷ Often referring to the early case ECtHR Vilvarajah et al v. UK, 30 October 1991.

¹⁵⁸ ECtHR N. v. Finland, 6 July 2005.

¹⁵⁹ ECtHR Said v. the Netherlands, 5 July 2005, §51. In addition, in her concurring opinion Judge Thomassen noted that 'a conclusion that an asylum-seeker's account is not credible should (...) be based on a thorough investigation of the facts and be accompanied by adequate reasoning'. She pointed out that this obligation flows directly from Articles 2 and 3 ECHR. She would 'draw a parallel with other procedural aspects which, under the Court's case-law, can be derived from these provisions, such as the obligation to conduct an effective investigation into a homicide or into a credible assertion that someone has been subjected to treatment contrary to Article 3'.

¹⁶⁰ ECtHR Salah Sheekh v. Netherlands, 11 January 2007, §§46 and 143. See also, e.g., Terlouw (2007); Vermeulen (2007); Woltjer (2007).

¹⁶¹ ECtHR Saadi v. Italy, 23 February 2008 (Grand Chamber), §129 (this phrasing may have been inspired by that of the domestic court in this case, see §18). See also e.g. Ryabikin v. Russia, 19 June 2008, §112, repeating the phrase 'capable of proving', referring to N. v. Finland, 26 July 2007, §167, which does not yet use this phrase.

¹⁶² Spijkerboer (2008), p. 1015, also noting that this would be in line with ECtHR Sheekh, 11 January 2007, §136, with the fact that it will collect evidence proprio motu if doubts arise as to the accuracy of the information provided by the State and with the argumentation used by the Court in Mamatkulov for the obligations of States under the right of individual complaint to respect the Court's provisional measures (maintain status quo; ensure the object of the complaint; prevent irreparable harm). These are all phrases that are linked to the idea that once the Court is dealing with a serious case, a rigorous examination is warranted and meanwhile the petitioner may not be removed.

¹⁶³ See e.g. CAT T.P.S. v. Canada, 16 May 2000, §§8.5 and 8.3. See also Chapter XVII (Official responses).

NA. v. UK (2008) relates to various aspects of establishing risk on the merits that are already relevant also at the stage of provisional measures. One is the Court's practice of assessing the evidence ex nunc if the petitioner has not yet been removed. In other words, in such cases 'the relevant time will be that of the proceedings before the Court'.¹⁶⁴ "A full and ex nunc assessment is called for as the situation in a country of destination may change in the course of time. Even though the historical position is of interest in so far as it may shed light on the current situation and its likely evolution, it is the present conditions which are decisive and it is therefore necessary to take into account information that has come to light after the final decision taken by the domestic authorities".¹⁶⁵

The Court has acknowledged circumstances at which risk may be established by providing evidence of group persecution as such without having to show further special distinguishing features. It has noted that it 'has never excluded the possibility that a general situation of violence in a country of destination will be of a sufficient level of intensity as to entail that any removal to it would necessarily breach Article 3 of the Convention'. Yet it 'would adopt such an approach only in the most extreme cases of general violence, where there was a real risk of ill-treatment simply by virtue of an individual being exposed to such violence on return'.¹⁶⁶ It has pointed out:

"Exceptionally, however, in cases where an applicant alleges that he or she is a member of a group systematically exposed to a practice of ill-treatment, the Court has considered that the protection of Article 3 of the Convention enters into play when the applicant establishes that there are serious reasons to believe in the existence of the practice in question and his or her membership of the group concerned (...).¹⁶⁷ In those circumstances, the Court will not then insist that the applicant show the existence of further special distinguishing features if to do so would render illusory the protection offered by Article 3. This will be determined in light of the applicant's account and the information on the situation in the country of destination in respect of the group in question".¹⁶⁸

Thus

"The Court may take account of the general situation of violence in a country when determining whether it should or should not insist on further special distinguishing features. It considers that it is appropriate for it to do so if that general situation makes it more likely that the authorities (or any persons or group of persons where the danger emanates from them) will systematically ill-treat the group in question".¹⁶⁹

In addition the Court has considered that 'due regard should also be given to the possibility that a number of individual factors may not, when considered separately, constitute a real risk; but when taken cumulatively and when considered in a situation of general violence and heightened security, the same factors may give rise to a real risk'.¹⁷⁰ If the general situation in a country or region, ¹⁶⁴ ECtHR NA. v. UK, 17 July 2008, §112. On this case see Terlouw (2008). See also Saadi v. Italy, 23 February 2008 (Grand Chamber), §133.

¹⁶⁵ ECtHR NA. v. UK, 17 July 2008, §112 also referring to Salah Sheekh, 11 January 2007, §136.

¹⁶⁶ ECtHR NA. v. UK, 17 July 2008, §115.

¹⁶⁷ Here the Court refers to Saadi v. Italy, 23 February 2008 (Grand Chamber), §132.

¹⁶⁸ ECtHR NA. v. UK, 17 July 2008, §116 referring to Salah Sheekh, 11 January 2007, §148.

¹⁶⁹ ECtHR NA. v. UK, 17 July 2008, §117, among others referring to Salah Sheekh, 11 January 2007, §148 and Saadi v. Italy, 23 February 2008 (Grand Chamber), §§132 and 143. See also Ryabikin v. Russia, 19 June 2008, §114.

¹⁷⁰ ECtHR NA. v. UK, 17 July 2008, §130.

systematic violence against certain groups and cumulative individual factors may be determinative on the merits, this clearly is the case at the stage of provisional measures.

The domestic courts normally are positioned closer to the situation and seem better placed to assess personal risk. This is different with regard to the issue of the consistent pattern. On this issue international adjudicators are probably better placed than the State (and its courts) in those situations where the State predominantly bases itself on embassy reports, especially when domestic courts defer to the minister. In fact, while on the merits the risk must be personal, at the stage of provisional measures it may be argued that the consistent pattern is crucial and only when the State can show that there is no specific risk to the petitioner, a provisional measure may be withdrawn.¹⁷¹

Important is also the ongoing discussion on the standard of proof. As submitted previously, the use of a standard of proof ‘beyond a reasonable doubt’ is inappropriate outside of the context of criminal law.¹⁷² It is necessary to establish criminal culpability, but, as Judge Bonello expressed it in one of his dissenting opinions, ‘in other fields of judicial enquiry, the standard of proof should be proportionate to the aim which the search for truth pursues: the highest degree of certainty, in criminal matters; a workable degree of probability in others’.¹⁷³ Thus, the ECtHR is obliged to establish ‘(1) on whom the law places the burden of proof, (2) whether any legal presumptions militate in favour of one of the opposing accounts, and (3) “on a balance of probabilities”, which of the conflicting versions appears to be more plausible and credible. Proof “beyond reasonable doubt” can, in my view, only claim a spurious standing in ‘civil’ litigation, like the adversarial proceedings before this Court. In fact, to the best of my knowledge, the Court is the only tribunal in Europe that requires proof ‘beyond reasonable doubt’ in non criminal matters’.¹⁷⁴

Expecting those who claim to be victims of torture to prove their allegations “beyond reasonable doubt” places on them a burden that is as impossible to meet as it is unfair to request. Independent observers are not, to my knowledge, usually invited to witness the rack, nor is a transcript of proceedings in triplicate handed over at the end of each session of torture; its victims cower alone in oppressive and painful solitude, while the team of interrogators has almost unlimited means at its disposal to deny the happening of, or their participation in, the gruesome pageant. The solitary victim’s complaint is almost invariably confronted with the negation ‘corroborated’ by many’.¹⁷⁵

In NA v. UK (2008) the Court also discussed the use of materials, at the merits stage, to establish risk. This discussion may also shed light on the materials it takes into account at the stage of provisional measures, although it may be expected it is less strict there, having less time to await, examine and compare all materials. It noted that it has often attached importance to the information in recent reports by independent human rights NGOs such as Amnesty International, or governmental sources including the US State Department.¹⁷⁶ Criteria for the assessment of such materials include the ‘independence, reliability and objectivity’ of the source. Thus ‘the authority and reputation of the author, the seriousness of the investigations by means of which they were compiled, the consistency of their conclusions and their corroboration by other sources

¹⁷¹ See also the ECtHR approach in regard to the petitions by Somalians in the Netherlands e.g. in Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4 (beneficiaries).

¹⁷² See also Chapter VI (Disappearances).

¹⁷³ ECtHR Sevtap Veznedaroğlu v. Turkey, 11 April 2000, individual partly dissenting opinion Judge Bonello, §12.

¹⁷⁴ Id., §13.

¹⁷⁵ Id., §14.

¹⁷⁶ ECtHR NA. v. UK, 17 July 2008, §119 referring to Saadi v. Italy, 23 February 2008 (Grand Chamber), §131.

are all relevant considerations'.¹⁷⁷ The Court also takes into account whether the author of the material has been present in the country in question and what were its reporting capacities. In that respect is observed that States 'through their diplomatic missions and their ability to gather information, will often be able to provide material which may be highly relevant to the Court's assessment of the case before it' and this applies a fortiori to UN agencies 'particularly given their direct access to the authorities of the country of destination as well as their ability to carry out on-site inspections and assessments in a manner which States and non-governmental organisations may not be able to do'.¹⁷⁸

The question arises how the Court's assessment of risk in judgments on the merits has impacted on its approach to the evidence required for the use of provisional measures. This involves both the types of evidence and the manner in which evidence is being weighed. Time permitting, the President or Acting President of the ECtHR could request more research before taking a decision on the use of provisional measures.¹⁷⁹ Yet time does not often permit. What then does the Court do in the face of the imminent removal of a petitioner and claims of irreparable harm to persons? It has used provisional measures in many cases in which it later found no violation, or which it declared inadmissible.¹⁸⁰ On the other hand, it uses provisional measures in a minority of the situations in which petitioners have requested them.

How did the European Commission on Human Rights deal with evidentiary requirements in urgent non-refoulement cases? In Lynas v. Switzerland (1976) it already emphasised that it only made use of provisional measures 'in urgent and exceptional circumstances where it appeared at first sight that steps entailing irreversible consequences were about to be taken'.¹⁸¹ In this case it had taken such measures, but subsequently it declared the case inadmissible as manifestly ill-founded. It did not consider that the 'uncorroborated declarations constitute satisfactory prima facie evidence'.¹⁸² This implies that the Commission did see prima facie evidence for taking provisional measures. Subsequently, when deciding on admissibility, it reconsidered its view about prima facie evidence and concluded that it was not there.

In the European system a petitioner must show a risk of a violation of the ECHR which prima facie would cause irreparable harm. Both the risk of a violation of the Convention and the prima facie risk of irreparable harm that this violation would cause must be shown on a lower threshold. The petitioner must indicate a 'probability' of such violation and of the irreparable harm it would cause.¹⁸³

Indeed, a substantial number of cases in which provisional measures were used are subsequently declared inadmissible. This in itself may indicate that the Commission and Court do apply a lower threshold at the provisional measures stage.¹⁸⁴

¹⁷⁷ ECtHR NA. v. UK, 17 July 2008, §120 referring to Saadi v. Italy, 23 February 2008 (Grand Chamber), §143.

¹⁷⁸ ECtHR NA. v. UK, 17 July 2008, §121.

¹⁷⁹ Nørgaard (1994), p. 281.

¹⁸⁰ For a recent case, see e.g. ECtHR Nyanzi v. UK, 8 April 2008 (provisional measures of 10 July 2006 and granted priority under Rule 41 on 11 July 2006).

¹⁸¹ EComHR Lynas v. Switzerland, 6 October 1976 (inadm.), p. 160.

¹⁸² Id., p. 165.

¹⁸³ See Garry (2001), p. 410 referring to her interview with Judge Pellonpää, section IV, Strasbourg 28 June 2000.

¹⁸⁴ See also Garry (2001), p. 410. Buquicchio-de Boer (1998), pp. 229-236 pointed out that 55 percent of all cases in which the Commission ordered provisional measures 'were eventually declared inadmissible'. As Nørgaard (1994), who was President of the Commission from 1981 until 1995, has noted the President of the Court or Commission examines the credibility of the request for provisional measures. In this respect the presentation, at this stage, of information

The former European Commission also often refused to take provisional measures, referring to the short decision-making period and lack of adequate information to meet the threshold test of risk under Article 3 ECHR. The Commission did not wish to cause the delay of a 'legitimate' deportation.¹⁸⁵ In some cases it did decide to depart from its usual time-table and expedite the case.¹⁸⁶ The present Court has also done so under Rule 41 of its Rules of Court.

The Commission and Court have also informed a State that they were considering using provisional measures in cases in which such an approach on its own would already bring about the desired result. These could be called informal provisional measures. The Commission also used informal provisional measures when its Rules of procedure did not yet contain a formal rule on provisional measures.¹⁸⁷

Invoking Rule 41 on expediting the proceedings, on the other hand, seems more of an intermediate approach to urgency taken if the Court is not willing to use provisional measures but nevertheless considers that there is some urgency involved. The cases involving complaints by terminally ill petitioners about past violations serve as an example. The Commission and Court were not asked to intervene in an ongoing situation, but they decided to accelerate examination of the case so that there would be a decision by the Commission or a judgment by the Court before the death of the petitioner.¹⁸⁸

According to Buquicchio-de Boer, the Commission and Court take into account 'all the circumstances' of the case, including 'foreseeable consequences' given the country conditions and the 'personal circumstances' of the petitioner.¹⁸⁹ She also notes that certain allegations have been considered 'insufficient to demonstrate risk of a clear violation of Article 3'. As examples she mentions the 'mere belonging to a minority group or opposition movement in the country of destination' and the 'risk of criminal prosecution for refusal to undertake military service or desertion'.¹⁹⁰ Yet judge Pellonpää, member of the Court since 1999, noted in 2000 that at the stage of provisional measures a lower threshold of proof is required and the petitioner does not need 'solid evidence of a direct personal link; general background documents from Amnesty International or UNHCR may at times be sufficient'.¹⁹¹

What the Convention organs have considered a prima facie case for the use of provisional measures is a prior decision by the Government or the UNHCR to grant the petitioner refugee status. Reasons why the Commission or Court decided not to use provisional measures may be a 'lack of specific background evidence corroborating the specific claim' or 'general lack of credibility in the request'.¹⁹² Garry also mentions a change of conditions in the receiving or requesting State that may equally 'have weight in the decision' not to take provisional measures. Moreover, 'illegal stay in a Member State and failure to pursue rigorously some kind of residence status is another factor'. "Commission of crimes in a Member State and especially recidivism may have negative bearing".¹⁹³ This of course is unrelated to the risk of irreparable harm. In other words, it should not, as such, be a factor in the assessment of risk.

documenting county conditions or, for instance, medical evidence has played a role in the decision to use provisional measures, p. 284.

¹⁸⁵ For references see e.g. Nørgaard (1994), p. 287.

¹⁸⁶ See Rules 27 and 28 of the Commission's Rules of Procedure.

¹⁸⁷ See Chapter II (Systems).

¹⁸⁸ Ibid.

¹⁸⁹ Buquicchio-de Boer (1998), p. 231. See also Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4 (beneficiaries).

¹⁹⁰ Buquicchio-de Boer (1998), p. 233.

¹⁹¹ See Garry (2001), p. 411, interview with Judge Pellonpää, section IV, Strasbourg 28 June 2000.

¹⁹² See Garry (2001), p. 411.

¹⁹³ Garry (2001), p. 412. As discussed in Chapter II unfortunately most adjudicators do not specifically indicate their criteria for using provisional measures. The reference to Garry is made

The President of the Section follows a ‘checklist’ for the use of provisional measures, ‘looking at such criteria as: grounds of fear; evidence submitted; Convention issue or Article invoked; reasons for leaving home country; whether applicant applied for political asylum and decision made as to it; date of arrival in Member State; decisions by the Member State administrative or judicial bodies on expulsion/extradition of the petitioner; availability of any other domestic authority to stop the impending expulsion/extradition; suspensive effect of domestic remedies; government assurances given by the state to be expelled or deported to; and involvement of UNHCR and decisions made by that body’.¹⁹⁴

While some of these criteria relate to the purpose of provisional measures (Convention issue or Article invoked)¹⁹⁵ or the relevance of admissibility (exhaustion of domestic remedies and suspensive effect),¹⁹⁶ or immediacy of the risk,¹⁹⁷ most of them indeed relate to the assessment of risk.

What is clear is that the Court is not just sparse in its use of provisional measures in that, rather than in a range of situations, it uses them predominantly in non-refoulement cases, but also in that it grants only a small percentage of requests for provisional measures in these non-refoulement cases. It is only in a very small number of non-refoulement cases that the ECtHR orders provisional measures. The Registrar of the Court indicated in a Press Release at the end of 2007 that during that year alone the Court had received 1,060 requests for provisional measures, but it had only granted such request in 252 cases.¹⁹⁸

While several refusals may be based on frivolous claims involving rights in the context of which the Court has never used provisional measures, to the extent that they relate to non-refoulement claims, the refusal to take provisional measures must be based on an absence of risk. In a concurring opinion Judge Zupančič noted that a provisional measures should be ordered once there is ‘a shadow of a doubt’. Then the burden shifts to the State.¹⁹⁹ Given the risk faced by the petitioner it is difficult to disagree with this statement. Yet in light of the fact that most provisional measures requested and most of them granted involve non-refoulement cases, it appears that the Court is rather stricter.

3.2.4.5 THE INTER-AMERICAN COURT AND MASS EXPULSION

The Inter-American Court thus far has not dealt with the issue of non-refoulement. It has dealt with the issue of assessment of risk in the context of a mass expulsion case. It makes a clear disbecause this author drafted a report at the European Court during a two month visit in 2000. During this time she was able to consult with one of the judges and several staff members of the Court. It may be assumed that her remarks about reasons for not taking provisional measures are inspired by conversations with these persons.

¹⁹⁴ Garry (2001), p. 414.

¹⁹⁵ See Part II (Purpose).

¹⁹⁶ See the discussion on exhaustion in Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction and admissibility).

¹⁹⁷ See section 2 of this Chapter on temporal urgency.

¹⁹⁸ Press release issued by the Registrar, ‘Inappropriate use of interim measures procedure’, 21 December 2007. See also Minutes of Meeting between Court and organisations representing applicants and/or intervening as third parties, 10 April 2006, p. 6, in which it was indicated that in 2005 it only used provisional measures in 49 cases, while it had received requests for such measures in 453 cases.

¹⁹⁹ ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Saadi v. Italy, 28 February 2008, concurring opinion Judge Zupančič. Spijkerboer (2008), p. 1015 agrees, although he considers that the criterion ‘shadow of a doubt’ may be rather too light.

inction between the proof required for admissibility and merits and the prima facie evidence necessary for taking provisional measures. The Haitian case illustrates the problems the Inter-American Commission faces when persons find themselves in adverse circumstances in remote areas at the border between two States. If the Commission is unable to contact the victims, it may be unable to convince the Court to take provisional measures.²⁰⁰

In reference to the hearing it held on the Inter-American Commission's request for provisional measures in the Haitian case the Court pointed out that (at that stage) a State policy of deportations and mass expulsions in violation of the Convention had not been proven, but that the testimonies had enabled it to establish a 'prima facie assumption of the occurrence of cases where individuals are subject to abuse'.²⁰¹ The President of the Court considered that 'the standard of prima facie appreciation of a case and the application of presumptions in face of the needs for protection have prompted this Court to order provisional measures at different times'.²⁰²

²⁰⁰ Particularly if the Court takes the approach that the group of beneficiaries needs to be clearly identifiable, see also Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4 on beneficiaries.

²⁰¹ IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic, Order of 18 August 2000, 5th 'Considering' clause. The next month, with regard to five of the seven persons specifically identified by the Commission, the Court's President found sufficient prima facie evidence of a situation of extreme gravity and urgency as to the rights to life, personal integrity, special protection for children in the family, and to residence and movement, 4th 'Considering' clause. With regard to the other two persons it postponed their inclusion as beneficiaries, in light of the diverging statements of the Commission and the State about their situation. It required the Commission to 'urgently report in detail' about their situation while it ordered the State to investigate their situation, apparently with less urgency. The Commission explained that one of these two persons was not living in his own community for fear of being deported again without being given the chance to prove his Dominican nationality. He was also afraid for his life because of his complaint to the Commission. Regarding the other person about whom the State had protested that he had not been registered as deported, the Commission noted again that the State did not keep adequate record of its deportations. Based on this information the President ordered the Dominican Republic to refrain from deporting or expelling one of them and to allow the immediate return of the other, making it possible for him to meet with his son. President IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic, Decision on urgent measures, 14 September 2000, 'Decisional' clauses 1-3.

²⁰² President IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic, Decision on urgent measures, 14 September 2000. The Court's English translation of the original Order in Spanish speaks of circulation, in a literal translation of 'circulación'. In the official English version of Article 22 ACHR this is obviously referred to as 'freedom of movement'. Two months later the Court confirmed the President's expansion of the provisional measure to include these two persons. Once again it considered that the information submitted by the Commission showed prima facie a situation of extreme gravity and urgency with regard to 'the rights to life, to humane treatment, to the special protection of the child by its family, and to the freedom of movement and residence of the beneficiaries of these measures'. IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic, Order for provisional measures, 26 May 2001. The Court decided not to order provisional measures on behalf of members of 'bateyes' that were not known by name. See Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4 on beneficiaries. It did include a statement about the necessity of obtaining additional information on the situation of the members of bordering communities or 'bateyes' whose inhabitants, according to the information provided at the public hearing, were subjected to forced repatriations, deportations or expulsions. IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic, Order of 18 August 2000.

Another interesting aspect of this case is the discussion on the witnesses to be summoned to the hearings of the Court dealing with the Commission's request for provisional measures. The Court's first Order responding to the Commission's request for provisional measures to halt arbitrary expulsion in the Haitian case was itself not a provisional measure, but it dealt with the Dominican Republic's objections against the Commission's offer of expert witnesses for the hearing that would be held on the provisional measures requested.²⁰³ The State had objected that one of them was the Director of an organisation that had been the main source of information for the petitioners and the Commission. It pointed out that she had appeared as a petitioner in another case pending before the Commission and that she was known as an activist on behalf of Haitian immigrants. The Commission had proposed these expert witnesses so that they could provide information on the frequency, form and consequences of the expulsions and deportations. This would 'furnish the Court with elements of special informative value to acquire a better understanding of the context within which the request for provisional measures has been made'.²⁰⁴ The Court considered that the purpose of the testimonies of the two witnesses proposed by the Commission 'bears no relationship to technical or specialized items with respect to which this Tribunal would request the opinion of experts'.²⁰⁵ It noted, however, that Art. 44 (1) of its Rules provides that it may 'obtain, on its own motion, any evidence it considers helpful. In particular, it may hear as a witness, expert witness, or in any other capacity, any person whose evidence, statement or opinion it deems to be relevant'.²⁰⁶ Judging from the information provided by the Commission as well as the State, both persons had worked with the alleged victims and had directly perceived the circumstances in which they were living. For this reason, the Court ordered them to appear before it in their capacity as witnesses. The Court pointed out that 'the fact that a person has a direct interest in the outcome of a proceeding or may have taken part as a petitioner in a case before the Commission, is not a cause for hindrance to deposing before this Court which, in practice, has even admitted statements from the victim and her or his relatives'.²⁰⁷ The Court also ordered the Dominican Republic to 'facilitate the exit from and entry into its territory' of these witnesses. It noted that the Commission, as the party requesting the production of the evidence, was to pay the costs involved.²⁰⁸

²⁰³ IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic, Order on the summoning of witnesses, 7 August 2000.

²⁰⁴ Id., 'Having seen' clause 5b. The State also objected to the other expert witness proposed, stating he was, among others, a founding member of another organisation that had acted on behalf of these immigrants. Thus, it argued, they were no independent technical advisors or experts who could 'offer totally objective and impartial information and opinions'. It referred to Article 49 of the Court's Rules of Procedure (old) and Article 19 of the Court's Statute, 'Having seen' clause 6c.

²⁰⁵ Id., 2nd 'Considering' clause.

²⁰⁶ Id., 3rd 'Considering' clause.

²⁰⁷ The Court referred here to various cases where it had done so: Loayza-Tamayo Case. Judgment of 17 September 1997; Castillo-Páez Case. Judgment of 3 November 1997; Suárez-Rosero Case. Judgment of 12 November 1997; Blake Case, Judgment of 24 January 1998; Paniagua-Morales et al., Judgment of 8 March 1998; Villagrán-Morales et al., Judgment of 19 November 1999.

²⁰⁸ The Court referred to Article 45 of its Rules of Procedure (old). This is an interesting situation because, in fact, the Commission had requested them as expert witnesses but the Court ordered them to appear as witnesses 'on its own motion'. See further Chapter IX (Threats) on subsequent threats against these witnesses and Order for provisional measures on their behalf.

3.2.4.6 DIPLOMATIC ASSURANCES AND LIFTING PROVISIONAL MEASURES

Adjudicators may extend or withdraw their provisional measures.²⁰⁹ Particularly relevant in the context of evidentiary requirements in non-refoulement cases is CAT's approach to the possibility of lifting its provisional measures. With the introduction of Article 108(6) of its Rules of Procedure it has formalized the general possibility to lift provisional measures. The Special Rapporteur for new complaints and interim measures has also developed 'working methods' regarding the withdrawal of provisional measures. "Where the circumstances suggest that a request for interim measures may be reviewed before the consideration of the merits, a standard sentence is added to the request, stating that the request is made on the basis of the information contained in the complainant's submission and may be reviewed, at the initiative of the State party, in the light of the information and comments received from the State party and any further comments, if any, from the complainant".²¹⁰ CAT has noted that some States parties 'have adopted the practice of systematically requesting the Rapporteur to withdraw his request for interim measures of protection'. Yet the Rapporteur 'has taken the position that such requests need only be addressed if based on new information which was not available to him when he took his initial decision on interim measures'.²¹¹

In its Annual Reports CAT has also expressed its awareness of the concern by 'a number of States parties' that it has used provisional measures 'in too large a number of cases, especially where the complainant's deportation is alleged to be imminent, and that there are insufficient factual elements to warrant a request for interim measures'. It has noted that 'it takes such expressions of concern seriously and is prepared to discuss them with the States parties concerned'. "In this regard it wishes to point out, that in many cases, requests for interim measures are lifted by the Special Rapporteur, on the basis of pertinent State party information".²¹² On several occasions CAT has indeed lifted its provisional measures. In C.A.R.M. v. Canada (2007), for instance, it had used provisional measures in June 2006 and the State had immediately informed it of its compliance. Three months later the State requested the Committee to lift its provisional measures and within a month the special Rapporteur decided to 'suspend' them.²¹³

In recent years both the HRC and CAT have stressed that diplomatic assurances as such do not remove the risk of refoulement.²¹⁴ UN experts have equally expressed themselves negatively about the use of such assurances.²¹⁵

²⁰⁹ See e.g. HRC Youni E. Länsman e.a. v. Finland, 30 October 1996.

²¹⁰ See e.g. CAT Annual Report 2006, §60.

²¹¹ See e.g. Annual Report 2006, §60. The first time Germany ever received a request for provisional measures by CAT it immediately requested their withdrawal; See e.g. CAT M.A.K. v. Germany, 12 May 2004, §13.5. The provisional measures was of 11 September 2002 and the motion by Germany to withdraw the provisional measures of 11 November 2002; the Rapporteur decided not to withdraw them, §1.3.

²¹² See CAT Annual Report 2006, §62 and Annual Report 2007, §71.

²¹³ CAT C.A.R.M. v. Canada, 18 May 2007, §1.3. On the merits CAT found no violation of Article 3 (insufficient substantiation).

²¹⁴ See e.g. HRC Mohammed Alzery v. Sweden, 25 October 2006 and CAT Ahmed Hussein Mustafa Kamil Agiza v. Sweden, 20 May 2005. See further Van Boven's annotation (2006) of Agiza, critically discussing the issue of diplomatic assurances. In this case the Committee considered it appropriate to observe that its decision reflected a number of facts that 'were not available to it when it considered the largely analogous complaint' of Hanan Attia v. Sweden, 17 November 2003, 'where, in particular, it expressed itself satisfied with the assurances provided', §13.5. CAT confirmed its critical stance on assurances in Pelit v. Azerbaijan: "While a certain degree of post-expulsion monitoring of the complainant's situation took place, the State party has not supplied

By contrast, the European Commission and Court appear to have been more willing to accept diplomatic assurances, but the case law in this respect generally is less recent. Altun v. Germany (1984) warrants special attention as an early case dealt with under the ECHR indicating the approach of the former European Commission towards assurances by requesting States in the context of extradition and the impact such assurances may have on its decision to maintain provisional measures.²¹⁶ The Commission initially took provisional measures but, following a request by Germany, it decided not to maintain them.²¹⁷

The petitioner, Cemal Altun, had been partly brought up by his elder brother Ahmat Altun. His brother was politically active and, at the time of submission, lived in France with a status of political refugee. The petitioner himself also became politically active and left Turkey after proceedings were instituted against him as one of the founders of a banned student party. He requested political asylum in Germany in 1981. The next year Turkey requested his extradition, initially for incitement to the murder of a Minister, later on charges of harbouring criminals and suppression of evidence in connection with this murder. In February 1983, following court decisions authorizing this, the German Government decided to extradite him. In 1983 Altun petitioned the European Commission, which took provisional measures and subsequently it declared the case the assurances to the Committee in order for the Committee to perform its own independent assessment of their satisfactoriness or otherwise (see its approach in Agiza v. Sweden), nor did the State party detail with sufficient specificity the monitoring undertaken and the steps taken to ensure that it both was, in fact and in the complainant's perception, objective, impartial and sufficiently trustworthy. In these circumstances, and given that the State party had extradited the complainant notwithstanding that it had initially agreed to comply with the Committee's request for interim measures, the Committee considers that the manner in which the State party handled the complainant's case amounts to a breach of her rights under article 3 of the Convention", Pelit v. Azerbaijan, 1 May 2007, §11.

²¹⁵ See e.g. Special Rapporteur against Torture (Theo van Boven), A/59/324, 1 September 2004, §40 and Special Rapporteur against Torture (Manfred Nowak), E/CN.4/2006/6, 23 December 2005, §§28-33 (pointing out that diplomatic assurances are not legally binding; '(i) it is therefore unclear why States that violate binding obligations under treaty and customary international law should comply with non-binding assurances'; moreover it is the question whether the authority providing the assurances has the power to enforce them; post-return monitoring mechanisms are no guarantee against torture; the individual has no recourse if the assurances are violated; normally they do not contain any sanctions in case of violation; both sending and receiving State have a common interest in denying that returned persons were subjected to torture; if independent organisations have been identified to undertake monitoring functions under the return agreement, these may experience undue political pressure, especially where one is funded by either the sending or the receiving State; in sum, he argued. 'diplomatic assurances with regard to torture are nothing but attempts to circumvent the absolute prohibition of torture and refoulement'); see also UN Independent Expert on counterterrorism and human rights (Martin Scheinin), E/CN.4/2006/98, 28 December 2005, §56(b); Human Rights Watch, "Empty promises", diplomatic assurances no safeguard against torture, 14 April 2004 and Human Rights Watch, Still at risk: diplomatic assurances no safeguard against torture, April 2005 (Vol. 17, No. 3(D)). See further Smeulers/De Vries (2003).

²¹⁶ The importance attached by the Commission to the fact that the State of return had recognized the individual complaint system under the ECHR must be kept in mind.

²¹⁷ EComHR Cemal Kemal Altun v. The Federal Republic of Germany, 3 May 1983 (adm.), §8, p. 228.

admissible.²¹⁸ It could not ‘rule out immediately the possibility of a violation’ of Art. 3. Thus, it had to determine whether there was a ‘certain risk of prosecution for political reasons which could lead to an unjustified or disproportionate sentence being passed on the applicant, and, as a result, inhuman treatment’.²¹⁹ At this stage of the proceedings it was ‘not possible to rule out with sufficient certainty the danger that the criminal proceedings instituted against the applicant have been falsely inspired’.²²⁰ Subsequently the Turkish Embassy assured the Ministry of Foreign Affairs that Turkey would respect the principle of specialty in the event of an extradition. In a message to the Turkish government Germany pointed out that ‘assurances that in the event of the applicant’s extradition a representative of the German Embassy in Ankara could visit the applicant without supervision at frequent intervals, could be useful for proceedings before the Commission and would be taken into consideration when reaching a decision on the enforcement of the extradition order’.²²¹ In July Turkey informed Germany ‘that it had decided to apply the relevant regulations to enable a representative of the German Embassy in Ankara to visit the applicant in the event of his extradition’.²²²

Meanwhile domestically a decision was made on the request for asylum.²²³ It was decided that because of circumstances occurring after his departure from Turkey he could not now be required to return to his country. The media had widely reported his case – even, contrary to normal practice, quoting his full name.²²⁴ The Turkish authorities were aware of this.²²⁵

In July of 1983 Germany sent the Commission a memorial requesting it to cancel its provisional measures ‘on the ground that the Turkish Government had given the Government of the Federal Republic an assurance that in the event of the applicant’s extradition, the principle of specialty would be observed and that a representative of the German Embassy in Ankara could visit the applicant in prison’. Thus, Germany considered that it had done everything necessary to ensure that the petitioner would not be exposed to treatment contrary to Article 3 of the Convention upon his extradition to Turkey. Germany considered that the visits by an Embassy representative it had promised to arrange would guarantee the petitioner the possibility to pursue his application before the Commission. Its embassy would be able to verify the petitioner’s state of health, ²¹⁸ It also directed provisional measures to Altun himself so that he would not abscond upon release. Id., §8, p. 229. He did not and reported to the police station upon request. There he was detained once more. See also Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4 (beneficiaries and addressees).

²¹⁹ EComHR Cemal Kemal Altun v. The Federal Republic of Germany, 3 May 1983 (adm.), §8, p. 233.

²²⁰ The risk of pressure being used upon him incompatible with Article 3 could not be ruled out. EComHR Cemal Kemal Altun v. The Federal Republic of Germany, 3 May 1983 (adm.), §10, p. 233.

²²¹ EComHR Cemal Kemal Altun v. The Federal Republic of Germany, 7 March 1984 (struck out), §9, p. 4. About the official responses by addressee States with regard to provisional measures see Chapter XVII.

²²² EComHR Cemal Kemal Altun v. The Federal Republic of Germany, 7 March 1984 (struck out), §9, p. 4.

²²³ In June 1983 the Bundesamt für die Anerkennung ausländischer Flüchtlinge (Federal Office for the Recognition of Foreign Refugees) indeed decided to grant him political asylum.

²²⁴ The petitioner himself took no direct part in this publicity.

²²⁵ 7 March 1984 (struck out), §10, p. 5. “The measures that the petitioner must expect in Turkey could at the very least be termed political prosecution. As a result the Federal Office was convinced that in the event of his return to Turkey the petitioner would very probably be the subject of a prosecution relating to the right of asylum (asylheblliche Verfolgung)”. Id., §18, p. 9.

and discuss any questions of fact or law relating to his application with him. “The fact that the Embassy representative could attend the hearing before the court was an additional guarantee”.²²⁶

In fact, according to Germany ‘there was no need in principle to request specific undertakings’ since ‘the Federal Republic and Turkey are Contracting Parties to the European Convention on Extradition’. It pointed out that it had nevertheless obtained additional guarantees on compliance with the specialty rule, ‘at the request of the Commission’. Germany reiterated that ‘the fact that the right to asylum was granted did not have a direct bearing on extradition proceedings’. Moreover, it considered that pending interstate cases against Turkey did not prevent extradition either because these cases concerned the internal situation in Turkey ‘and not automatically the situation of a presumed criminal under the particular protection of the requested State’.²²⁷

In response the petitioner considered that the assurances mentioned by the Government were insufficient. “In the past, information given by the ministry of Foreign Affairs concerning the situation in Turkey had been criticised as being contradictory. He referred to a question raised in the Bundestag and to judgments by the administrative Courts and the Federal Constitutional Court”.²²⁸ The Commission subsequently decided not to maintain its provisional measures, taking into account the undertaking given by the German Government ‘based on assurances given by Turkey, which were intended to safeguard the applicant’s position after his extradition to Turkey’.²²⁹

“When informing the parties of this decision the Commission noted that it was based on the idea that the discussions envisaged between a representative of the German Embassy in Ankara and the applicant in prison would take place in the absence of third parties. The Commission requested the Government to inform it about the possible execution of the extradition and, in this event, to keep it informed of the applicant’s situation as regards his conditions of detention and criminal proceedings”.²³⁰

In August 1983 the petitioner attended a domestic court hearing, which was due to resume on 30 August 1983. On that day the petitioner had been led into the courtroom by the guard. After his handcuffs had been taken off he was seated beside his lawyer and an interpreter, awaiting the entrance of court personnel. Mr Altun then ‘rushed over towards an open window and threw himself out. Having fallen from the sixth floor where the courtroom was situated, he died shortly afterwards in an ambulance sent to the spot’.²³¹

²²⁶ EComHR Cemal Kemal Altun v. The Federal Republic of Germany, 7 March 1984 (struck out), §18, p. 9.

²²⁷ EComHR Cemal Kemal Altun v. The Federal Republic of Germany, 7 March 1984 (struck out), §24, p. 12.

²²⁸ EComHR Cemal Kemal Altun v. The Federal Republic of Germany, 7 March 1984 (struck out), §19.

²²⁹ EComHR Cemal Kemal Altun v. The Federal Republic of Germany, 7 March 1984 (struck out), §20.

²³⁰ Ibid.

²³¹ EComHR Cemal Kemal Altun v. The Federal Republic of Germany, 7 March 1984 (struck out), §10, p. 4. The Commission noted that it was informed by counsel and government representatives on that same day that the petitioner had committed suicide, ‘although proceedings relating to his request for asylum were still pending and further discussions between the Federal Ministry of Justice and the applicant’s lawyer concerning extradition were in progress’. Germany had pointed out that the petitioner’s lawyer must have been assured that his client would not be extradited before he had been able to travel to Turkey in order to consult the criminal files against his client. The Government assumed that the lawyer notified the petitioner of this proposed plan.

The petitioner's brother, Ahmed Altun, then instructed counsel to ask the Commission to pursue the proceedings.²³² He believed continuation of the proceedings was necessary because there was a risk that similar cases might occur, given the formal extradition relations with Turkey.²³³ Nevertheless the Commission decided to strike out the case, finding that the decision to extradite the petitioner had lapsed and 'the particular nature' of the complaint could not be transferred to the heirs. It considered that 'the grounds relied on by the applicant's brother to pursue the application in his own name have no direct relation to the subject of the application'. Thus, the Commission considered that the petitioner's brother, 'who was not associated with the application instituting the proceedings', 'cannot now in the circumstances of the case claim to have a sufficient legitimate interest to justify proceeding with an examination of the application on his behalf'.²³⁴

As one of the reasons for striking out the case following the death of the petitioner the Commission pointed out that the administrative practice of torture and ill-treatment would also be addressed in the pending inter-state applications on the administrative practice of torture in Turkish prisons.²³⁵ This suggests that the Commission did not subscribe to Germany's view that the aforementioned inter-state proceedings were not relevant for the determination of the risks facing the petitioner. Indeed, the State's argument is surprising. The petitioner would have been extradited into exactly that 'internal situation' in Turkey that was the subject of these interstate cases against Turkey. Interstate cases do not discuss the 'internal situation', but the internal human rights situation. People live in this 'internal situation'. In deciding extradition cases it would be especially important, given such internal situation, to examine the particular situation of a 'presumed criminal'.

Yet by deciding to withdraw its provisional measures the Commission apparently attached more importance to the assurances by Turkey than to the fact that the petitioner had been granted asylum in Germany. Germany's argument that the granting of asylum 'did not have a direct bearing' on the extradition proceedings seems rather insufficient. Asylum is granted when the authorities find that there is a well founded fear of persecution. Hence it is not safe for that person to return to his/her country. In their decision they have taken into account the criminal proceedings against him. These proceedings may in fact even have been one of the reasons for believing him to be in danger and granting him asylum. Although, strictly speaking, the decisions are made by different organs with their own responsibilities, surely the fact that someone has been granted asylum has a relevant 'bearing' on his extradition proceedings.

The domestic decision to grant asylum apparently played no role in the Commission's decision. While it is true that domestic proceedings (with regard to arranging a consultation of the case file against the petitioner in Turkey) were still pending, in my view the fact that the petitioner was so desperate about his extradition to Turkey (which he apparently still expected) that ²³² In the admissibility decision it was stated that as a child the petitioner was partly brought up by his elder brother Ahmed Altun, after the death of their father; in the report striking out the case it was mentioned that the brother decided to pursue the proceedings after consulting his parents in Turkey, 3 May 1983 (adm.), §23, p. 10.

²³³ 'Furthermore, the applicant's family had an interest in counteracting the false information and defamation in the Turkish press following the applicant's death'.

²³⁴ EComHR Cemal Kemal Altun v. The Federal Republic of Germany, 7 March 1984 (struck out), §31, p. 14.

²³⁵ EComHR Cemal Kemal Altun v. The Federal Republic of Germany, 7 March 1984 (struck out), §32, p. 15. Indeed, the Commission declared admissible the inter-State case France, Norway, Denmark, Sweden and the Netherlands v. Turkey, 6 December 1983 (adm.) (relating to the allegation that during the period 12 September 1980 to 1 July 1982 there was an administrative practice of torture or ill-treatment of prisoners in Turkey).

he jumped out of a window of the courthouse would have been cause to maintain the case on the Commission's roll. It could be argued that the deceased petitioner's claims were indeed transferable to his older brother, with whom he had been very close since childhood, in light of the express wish of his brother to continue the case as well as the need to further investigate the Commission's own decision-making with regard to assurances and provisional measures.

Subsequently, in Chahal (1996) the European Court expressed some caution with regard to diplomatic assurances. It considered that in the circumstances of that case the State providing the assurances was indeed in good faith but that it did not have sufficient control over the members of the security forces responsible for torture in police custody. Thus, return of the petitioner to that State would be in violation of Art.3 ECHR. Pending the case it had also used provisional measures.²³⁶

Yet in for instance Shamayev (2005), the ECtHR withdrew its provisional measures upon receipt of information provided by the addressee State (Georgia) of some assurances by the receiving State (Russia) with regard to the treatment of the petitioner(s).

"The Court decided that, in the light of the undertakings given by the Russian authorities, which included guarantees of unhindered access for the applicants to appropriate medical treatment, legal advice and the Court itself, the Rule 39 interim measure could be lifted. The Russian authorities had further undertaken that the applicants would not face capital punishment and that their health and safety would be protected".²³⁷

The Court had actively sought information both from the State requesting extradition of the petitioners (Russia) and from the State planning to extradite them to the requesting State (Georgia), as both were members of the Council of Europe.

What is remarkable is that already at the stage of provisional measures the European Court let itself be convinced by Russia. It is mainly when provisional measures are initially taken that the standard of proof is lower. Subsequently, once the addressee State has been able to cast doubt on the risk claimed, the burden is on the petitioner to convince the Court to maintain its provisional measures. Yet in this case the Court could have ordered new provisional measures on its own motion. It could have appealed to Russia to report to the Court on the treatment and health of the suspects that had already been extradited to Russia.²³⁸

On the merits the European Court noted that subsequent to their extradition to Russia, the petitioners were unable to stay in touch with their representatives in the case before the Court.²³⁹ The weight the Court had attached to the assurances by Russia resulted in the withdrawal of the provisional measures and in the extradition. Subsequently the collection of evidence was seriously

²³⁶ ECtHR Chahal v. UK, 15 November 1996.

²³⁷ ECtHR press release of 26 November 2002 in the case Shamayev and 12 Others v. Georgia and Russia, which was at that point still ongoing.

²³⁸ See further Rieter (2003b).

²³⁹ Their representatives were unable to visit them despite an express indication by the Court that this should be made possible. ECtHR (Second Section) Chamaïev et autres c. Géorgie et Russie, 12 April 2005, §476. The Court itself had not been allowed to pay a research visit (under Article 38 §1a) either. The Court noted that this refusal by Russia could not be attributed to Georgia. It concluded that it had insufficient information to examine on the merits the claims against Russia, which had hindered the collection of evidence. ECtHR (Second Section) Chamaïev et autres c. Géorgie et Russie, 12 April 2005, §477.

hindered, but it does not appear that the Court was willing to take this into account in its judgment on the merits.²⁴⁰

In Mamatkulov (2004) the extradition took place despite the Court's provisional measures and the examination of evidence was on the merits was seriously hindered. Counsel before the ECtHR did not even have access to the petitioners upon their extraction to Uzbekistan. Here it does not appear that the Court was willing to take into account the fact that Turkey had ignored its provisional measures.²⁴¹ Again it appears to rely on assurances. At the same time the Court noted that a provisional measure 'means more often than not that the Court does not yet have before it all the relevant evidence it requires to determine whether there is a real risk of treatment proscribed by Article 3 in the country of destination'.²⁴² This statement does indicate that at the stage of provisional measures a much lower level of evidence is necessary for the assessment of risk at the merits stage.

Possibly the European Court will come to realize, as the UN bodies and experts did before it, that diplomatic assurances are simply unreliable in the context of allegations of torture and human rights adjudicators should not easily rely on them when deciding on the use or maintenance of provisional measures.²⁴³

3.2.5 Health in detention and assessment of risk

The monopoly of information by the State is particularly relevant with regard to treatment in detention. The HRC may often be able to consult the trial transcripts even if the State in question itself does not provide any information about the claim.²⁴⁴ Adjudicators such as the HRC normally defers to the approach of the domestic court as found in these transcripts.

Similarly, for complaints about detention situations there is a difference between claims of pre-trial ill treatment and claims of ill treatment of persons already convicted. Dealing with claims ²⁴⁰ Russia had reacted very strongly to the initial provisional measures and the relation between Russia and the Court became very strained. Currently it is still blocking the entry into force of the Protocol aimed at streamlining the Court proceedings, although this may be related also to the subsequent Chechnya cases and the fact that the Court is associated with the decision-making by the Council of Europe political bodies. See also Chapter XVII (Official State responses) and XVIII (Follow-up).

²⁴¹ See further Rieter (2003a) on the previous judgment by the first chamber and Rieter (2005b) on the Grand Chamber judgment. On the question how much importance adjudicators should attach on the merits to their decision that, at the stage of provisional measures, there was a real risk, when the State subsequently ignored the provisional measures, see also Chapter XVIII (Follow-up).

²⁴² ECtHR Grand Chamber Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §69.

²⁴³ See also e.g. Letsas (2003), p. 536. For a more critical approach by the Court see e.g. ECtHR Saadi v. Italy, 28 February 2008, §§147-148 pointing out that diplomatic assurances are not in themselves sufficient to ensure adequate protection where reliable sources have reported practices resorted to or tolerated by the authorities that are manifestly contrary to the principles of the Convention. See also Ryabikin v. Russia, 19 June 2008, §119 confirming this and, in this case, questioning the assurances from the Prosecutor General of Turkmenistan invoked by Russia. First of all, 'no copy of that letter has been submitted to the Court'. 'In any event, even accepting that such assurances were given', the Court noted that the reports it had previously cited pointed out that 'the authorities of Turkmenistan systematically refused access by international observers to the country, and in particular places of detention. In such circumstances the Court is bound to question the value of the assurances that the applicant would not be subjected to torture, given that there appears to be no objective means of monitoring their fulfilment'.

²⁴⁴ As seen in section 3.2 with regard to the right to fair trial and death penalty cases.

of pre-trial ill treatment, the HRC leans more towards the information contained in national court documents, as these claims supposedly have been dealt with during the trial. Once convicted, on the other hand, usually there are no national court documents on treatment in detention. The detainee often has fewer possibilities for an investigation of ill treatment, threats, lack of medical treatment or adverse prison conditions in general. If in such cases the petitioner has made very precise allegations relating to incidents, '[d]ue weight' should be given to his allegations, 'in the absence of any refutation by the State party'.²⁴⁵ It is in such cases that the HRC has also used provisional measures.

Vasilskis v. Uruguay (1983) illustrates the risk for detainees of talking to representatives of international organisations.²⁴⁶ The petitioner referred to the treatment of some of the prisoners following the visit of the Special Representative of the UN Secretary General, Mr. Rivas Posada, in January 1982. According to the testimony of the mother of one of the prisoners, they were beaten with clubs, items of their personal property were confiscated and their food was thrown on the floor.²⁴⁷ The HRC has inquired about the health and whereabouts of political detainees on several occasions.²⁴⁸

In Maleki v. Italy (1999) the petitioner's son, who represented him before the HRC, had complained that his father had a heart condition for which he was not receiving adequate treatment.²⁴⁹ In this case the HRC did not use (informal) provisional measures, possibly because it never considered the issue or otherwise because there was no history of failure to provide medical treatment by the State in question.²⁵⁰ The State party subsequently submitted 'a comprehensive file' 'showing that Mr. Maleki's medical condition was being closely monitored'.²⁵¹

While it is in the nature of provisional measures that the risk of irreparable harm must be assessed on an urgent basis, requiring a lower standard of proof, it is evident from the Uruguayan cases discussed in Chapter VII, relating to political detainees, that in the 1970s and 80s the HRC was unwilling to use formal provisional measures to intervene in ongoing violations.

²⁴⁵ HRC Michael Freemantle v. Jamaica, 24 March 2000.

²⁴⁶ HRC Vasilskis v. Uruguay, 31 March 1983.

²⁴⁷ This case equally indicates the HRC's approach towards the burden of proof. In its decision on the merits it regretted that it had not received any of the documents requested in its admissibility decision, including copies of the existing medical reports. This indicates a relationship between the Committee's request for information pending the proceedings and the standard and burden of proof it requires for the final determination of the case. With regard to the alleged victim's health, it pointed out that 'the author's precise allegations, which include allegations that her treatment in prison has contributed to her ill-health called for more detailed submissions from the State party'. In reference to earlier case law it pointed out that the burden of proof 'cannot rest alone on the author of the communication, especially considering that the author and the State party do not always have equal access to the evidence and that frequently the State party alone has access to relevant information'. It pointed out that the State party should have furnished the medical reports under Article 4(2) OP and found violations of Articles 7 and 10(1).

²⁴⁸ See Chapter VII (Health in detention).

²⁴⁹ HRC Ali Maleki v. Italy, 15 July 1999.

²⁵⁰ The petitioner was a 65-year-old Iranian citizen serving a ten-year prison sentence in Italy for drug trafficking. Prior to the initial submission the petitioner had been on a hunger strike to obtain a review of his conviction. The HRC transmitted the case under Rule 91 more than three months after initial submission.

²⁵¹ In August 1997 the HRC decided separately on admissibility. While it declared the case admissible it considered that the complaint about lack of medical treatment was insufficiently substantiated. In its View it found a violation of Article 14(1) requiring 'his immediate release or re-trial in his presence'.

The fact that it did not use provisional measures in the face of serious concerns about the health of political detainees may relate to the lack of practice during the initial stages of the Committee's existence rather than to the fact that the violations were ongoing and not simply 'imminent'. On the other hand, during the 1990s and beyond 2000 Rapporteurs equally have used a different type of provisional measure in ongoing cases.²⁵² Scheinin noted that the previous Rapporteur, Pocar, initiated the practice of using informal provisional measures, which he called 'quasi-interim measures' where the Rapporteur hints at provisional measures but does not formally invoke them. Instead his Note Verbale transmitting the case to the State simply contains a normal Rule 91 (current Rule 97) request for information, but in the last sentence the Rapporteur invites the State Party to provide information on the health of the petitioner.²⁵³ In fact this is similar to the earlier cases involving Uruguay. Scheinin points out that his cautious approach to provisional measures would not prevent him from using them formally, also in health cases. Apparently, the choice between formal and informal measures was determined by the evidence available. As he put it, when there was only an allegation of a threat to the health of a prisoner, he would opt for a 'quasi-interim measure' rather than a formal provisional measure under Rule 86 (current Rule 92).²⁵⁴

In December 1992 the President of the Inter-American Court decided not to take urgent measures in the Peruvian Prisons cases.²⁵⁵ He noted that the Commission itself had taken precautionary measures and also noted the accompanying documentation, but then he pointed out that 'some of those measures cannot properly be considered precautionary and provisional measures' within the meaning of Article 63(2) ACHR, 'given that they refer to the Government's authorization for the Commission to carry out on-site visits to several Peruvian prisons'. He considered that this situation was regulated by Articles 48(2) ACHR and 44(2) of the Commission's Regulations instead. This required the prior consent of the Government, which had not yet been granted, and ²⁵² See also Weiss v. Austria, 3 April 2003, discussed in Chapter IV, section 2.3, subheading extradition and the risk of life imprisonment.

²⁵³ Interview of author with HRC Special Rapporteur Martin Scheinin, Maastricht 20 September 2002.

²⁵⁴ Id.

²⁵⁵ The petition of the Inter-American Commission for provisional measures by the Court in the Peruvian Prisons case (Miguel Castro Castro and Santa Mónica in Lima, Cristo Rey in Ica and Yanamayo in Puno) was based on Peru's failure to comply with its precautionary measures of August 1992 on behalf of 'those persons deprived of their liberty for allegedly committing terrorist acts'. The Commission noted that there was 'credible evidence of a grave situation in the Peruvian prisons' posing 'an immediate danger to the right to integrity of the person of those accused and sentenced for terrorism because of the poor conditions in which they are imprisoned'. It had received information that there was a 'high incidence of diseases', loss of weight, overcrowding, isolation, and psychological and emotional problems among male and female prisoners in the prisons concerned. When the prisoners were transferred to those prisons, some of which were 'in very cold zones', they were 'mistreated, insulted, humiliated', some of them were wounded and only had their summer clothing. The prisoners could not receive visits by their relatives and the International Committee of the Red Cross was not authorized to inspect the prisons. The Commission pointed out that all of this lent 'a grave and urgent nature to the situation described'. Subsequently, early December 1992, the Secretariat of the Commission sent additional documentation to the Court containing a complaint. The Commission noted that 'a situation may be developing which could result in the violation of the rights of the women prisoners in the Santa Mónica Prison of Chorrillos, and if true, would increase the seriousness and urgency of the situation being considered by the Members of the Court'. IACHR Peruvian Prisons case, Resolution of the President of 14 December 1992, 6th 'Having seen' clause.

which could ‘not be remedied by measures ordered by the President’.²⁵⁶ The President then pointed out: “Insofar as the Commission’s request that the Government be asked to take the necessary provisional measures to stop the mistreatment and to provide medical assistance to the inmates of those prisons, the Commission does not provide any evidence regarding the truth of the allegations, which would probably depend on the observations the Commission might make in the visits it wants to carry out in those prisons, or other means of proof, which have not yet been submitted”. The President considered it more appropriate for the full Court to decide on the use of the provisional measures requested.²⁵⁷ In plenary session the Court decided not to order provisional measures. It pointed out that the case concerned a matter not yet before the Court, but still pending before the Commission. The latter had ‘not submitted information to the Court sufficient to support’ the adoption of provisional measures. This would have required the Commission ‘to have gathered preliminary evidence to support a presumption of the truth of the allegations and of a situation whose seriousness and urgency could cause irreparable harm to persons’. Thus the Court considered it inappropriate ‘at this time’ to adopt the provisional measures requested by the Commission.²⁵⁸ As Buergenthal has put it, this resulted in a Catch-22 situation since Peru did not allow the Commission to visit the detention centers, which would be necessary in order to collect the evidence required by the Court.²⁵⁹ He points out that it can be argued ‘that in situations where a Government obstructs all legitimate efforts by the Commission to gather evidence relating to allegations of violations of the right to life or physical or mental integrity, the Court might be justified in holding the Commission to a burden of proof that is less stringent than might be the case ordinarily’.²⁶⁰ The Court should have granted a hearing. Without a hearing, ‘and given the pressure of time, the Commission will often find difficult to make the strongest case possible for provisional measures’.²⁶¹

Fact-finding missions require the permission of the State concerned. Such missions have indeed been conducted in a context that would not just assist the adjudicator in its assessment on the merits, but already pending the proceedings with regard to requests for provisional measures. In September 2004, for instance, a delegation of judges of the ECtHR conducted a fact-finding mission in Turkey regarding petitions by about 50 detainees claiming to have developed Wer-

²⁵⁶ IACHR Peruvian Prisons case, Resolution of the President of 14 December 1992, 5th ‘Considering’ clause.

²⁵⁷ Id., 6th ‘Considering’ clause.

²⁵⁸ IACHR Peruvian Prisons case, Order of 27 January 1993, 2nd and 3rd ‘Whereas’ clause.

²⁵⁹ Buergenthal (1994), p. 80 pointing out that ‘to qualify for the Article 63(2) remedy’, the Commission ‘needed to obtain at least some credible evidence about conditions in these prisons, but it could get that evidence only by means of an investigation which the Government of Peru refused to permit in the proceedings pending before the Commission’. “Moreover, while the Commission might have been able to gather the requisite evidence from witnesses and other sources, it no doubt feared that the long time needed to accomplish this result would greatly increase the probable threat to the lives of the inmates of those prisons”. See further e.g. CIDH Hugo Juarez Cruzat et al. (Miguel Castro Castro Prison) v. Peru, 5 March 2001 and CIDH Polay Campos v. Peru, 10 March 2000 (inadm.). The Court has since dealt with the Miguel Castro Castro Prison case on the merits as well, Judgment of 25 November 2006 (referring the provisional measures denied in 1993, §13 and those denied by the President on 3 May 2006, §§67-68).

²⁶⁰ Buergenthal (1994), p. 81. He refers to the Court’s approach on the merits in Velasquez, 29 July 1988 and in Godinez Cruz, 20 January 1989 and points out that ‘of necessity’ this approach ‘presupposes the existence of at least some evidence to support the Commission’s contentions concerning the need for provisional measures’.

²⁶¹ Buergenthal (1994), p. 91.

nicke-Korsakoff syndrome in 2001.²⁶² They argued that their continued detention would be a violation of Articles 2 and 3 ECHR given their state of health.²⁶³ The Court also nominated three medical experts to examine the petitioners.²⁶⁴

3.2.6 Death threats and assessment of risk

3.2.6.1 INTRODUCTION

As it is mainly in the Inter-American system that provisional measures have been used to protect against death threats, this section sets out with a more general discussion of the evidentiary requirements applied in this system at the stage of provisional measures. The Inter-American Commission has often taken precautionary measures prior to requesting the Court's intervention. Hence, those matters reaching the Court are examples of cases where the Commission considered its own precautionary measures ineffective.²⁶⁵ As part of its considerations the Court usually refers to the fact that the State failed to respond to the Commission's precautionary measures.²⁶⁶ Indeed the Court considers that when the Commission's precautionary measures were ineffective and other threats have taken place since, this triggers a presumption that provisional measures are necessary.²⁶⁷ This relates to both risk and immediacy.²⁶⁸

3.2.6.2 EVIDENTIARY REQUIREMENTS FOR PROVISIONAL MEASURES IN THE INTER-AMERICAN SYSTEM

When it orders provisional measures the Inter-American Court explicitly uses a 'prima facie' norm. When it decides to use provisional measures it generally points out that the Commission's ²⁶² This is described by the Court as a 'brain disorder involving loss of specific brain functions caused by thiamine (B1) deficiency'.

²⁶³ See ECtHR Balyemez v. Turkey, 32495/03 and 52 other cases.

²⁶⁴ Press release ECtHR 412, 'Fact-finding mission to Turkey in hunger-strike cases', 6 September 2004, referring to this case and '52 other cases'. A report by the Human Rights Foundation of Turkey, September 2004, notes that the ECtHR delegation examined 54 prisoners at the hospital of Istanbul University. The report specifically named petitioners Yanick, Gençay, Balyemez, Kör, Kuruçay, Gürbüz, Uyan, Yıldız and Hun. With regard to Balyemez it noted that the Court had already taken provisional measures on 5 February 2004 to halt his re-imprisonment. See also provisional measures not to re-imprison in the cases of Hun Kuruçay, Gürbüz, Uyan and Yıldız, all following the fact-finding mission of September 2004, Report Human Rights Foundation of Turkey, <www.tihv.org.tr/report/2004_09/septprison.html>, §4.1. See also Chapter VII (Detention), section 2.5.4 (Protecting detainees on a hunger strike) and Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4.2 on beneficiaries and addressees (under the heading 'the petitioner as addressee').

²⁶⁵ They are examples because the Commission does not always resort to the Court for provisional measures in such cases. Moreover, in other cases the Commission might not even try its own precautionary measures and immediately resorts to the Court.

²⁶⁶ See, e.g. IACHR James, Briggs, Noel, Garcia and Bethel cases, Order for provisional measures, 14 June 1998, James et al. cases, Order of the President for urgent measures, 25 October 2001 and Order for provisional measures, 26 November 2001.

²⁶⁷ Pasqualucci (2003), p. 297.

²⁶⁸ See e.g. IACHR Digna Ochoa et al. (Mexico), Order of 17 November 1999, 6th 'Considering' clause.

presentations in the case in question ‘reveal prima facie a situation of extreme gravity and urgency, rendering it necessary to avoid irreparable damage to the right to life and physical integrity’.²⁶⁹ Apart from the phrase ‘prima facie’ the rest of the sentence is derived directly from Article 63(2) ACHR on the use of provisional measures.²⁷⁰

While the Inter-American Court is explicit in its use of a prima facie norm for the evidence required for the use of provisional measures, it nevertheless is not very clear about the evidentiary standard used at this stage. The same applies for the Inter-American Commission and its precautionary measures. In its new Rules of Procedure the Commission deleted the odd reference in the ²⁶⁹ See e.g. IACHR Boyce and Joseph v. Barbados, Order of 25 November 2004, 8th ‘Considering’ clause.

²⁷⁰ The first time he took urgent measures to halt executions, the President pointed out that the Commission had informed him that it had not yet had the opportunity to examine the complaints. ‘Consequently’, he noted ‘the situation as described by the Commission in its request constitutes a prima facie case of extreme gravity and urgency which could result in irreparable damage to persons’. The term ‘consequently’ is not immediately clear as a link to his previous statement that the Commission had not had the opportunity to examine the complaints. The Spanish version also uses the term ‘en consecuencia’. Together, however, with his preceding statement that Trinidad’s failure to respond to the Commission’s precautionary measures was ‘an exceptional circumstance’, his remark makes more sense. The State’s failure to respond to these precautionary measures may indicate its intent to proceed with the executions. Prima facie this constitutes a situation of extreme gravity and urgency, which ‘could result’ in irreparable harm. IACHR James, Briggs, Noel, Garcia and Bethel cases, Order of the President for urgent measures, 27 May 1998. See also James et al. case, Orders of the President for urgent measures, 29 June, 13 and 22 July 1998. The criterion of prima facie evidence is important for proving both the imminence and the risk of irreparable harm. The Court is clearer in its Order of June 1998 in its approach to evidentiary requirements for provisional measures by indicating that it was on the basis of the information presented by the Commission and the State that it could conclude that a situation of extreme gravity and urgency existed. IACHR James, Briggs, Noel, Garcia and Bethel cases, Order for provisional measures, 14 June 1998. It pointed out that, although the Commission had not completed its consideration of the cases, it had advised the Court that ‘[i]n each case the petitioner made a prima facie case alleging that the State violated one or more Articles of the American Convention to the detriment of the defendant’. There are two differences between the formulation of the Court and that of the President. In the first place, the Court refers to the Commission’s view that the petitioner made a prima facie case of violations of one or more articles of the ACHR. This indicates that while in a case of urgency it is not necessary to determine the case on the merits before ordering provisional measures, there must be prima facie evidence of such violations. This means that the evidentiary requirements not only relate to the threat of irreparable harm as such but that in this situation the Commission believes that the Court expects some links with the merits of the case. Different from the Court, the President speaks of a prima facie case of extreme gravity without reference to the merits or to the Commission’s allegations. In its Order of August 1998 the Court referred to the Commission’s statement that it had opened a case after having ‘established that the petitioners had presented elements sufficient to meet the requirements of the Convention and its regulations’. The Court also referred to the Commission’s statements during the public hearing of the previous day. These statements ‘demonstrated the urgency of the situations of the alleged victims, all of whom are still under imminent sentence of death and, therefore, at continued risk of irreparable damage’. Moreover, the Court noted the State’s refusal to take part in this hearing. ACHR James et al. cases, Order for provisional measures, 16 August 2000.

old Regulations to ‘in cases where the denounced facts are true’.²⁷¹ At the stage of precautionary measures it would indeed be difficult to expect anything more than prima facie credibility of the facts. In addition this would prejudge the merits of the case.²⁷² It seems that apart from showing prima facie evidence of a threat of irreparable harm the petitioner must show the existence, prima facie, of an issue under the American Convention (or the American Declaration). Yet obviously he need not show definitely, at that stage, that the denounced facts are ‘true’. After all, at the subsequent admissibility stage the Commission ‘must conduct a prima facie assessment to determine whether the complaint demonstrates an apparent or potential violation of a right protected by the Convention. This is a summary analysis, which does not imply any prejudgment as to the merits of the dispute’.²⁷³

The Inter-American Commission’s experience with the various country situations, visiting them and preparing country reports continues to provide contextual information that seems to play a role in the Commission’s decision making on precautionary measures as well.

From the perspective of the Commission the Court is seen as more legalistic, while the Commission itself is considered a more flexible organ. The Commission takes into account the track record of a human rights organisation bringing a claim. Some organisations may give unreliable information or tend to exaggerate. The information provided by a human rights organisation that is known to be credible and rigorous in terms of its fact-finding and other activities, even if brief, receives serious consideration by the Commission. Generally the Commission prefers to first ask information from the State to find out whether the situation cannot be resolved informally. Only if that is not possible it makes an independent determination on the basis of the evidence and continues dealing with the case. If the Commission receives very little information on an urgent human rights situation, it also takes into account its general knowledge about the human rights situation in that particular country or area as well as the general attitude of that State.

As noted, sometimes the Inter-American Court has refused to take provisional measures due to lack of information. Commissioner Goldman believes that the Court has emphasized the aspect of lack of information too much, possibly in a misplaced deference to the European system. He argues that this lies partly in the different experiences and functions of the Commission and Court, as well as their members. Members of the Court have tended to be constitutional lawyers, experts in criminal procedure, people who had been on the bench in their own country, while members of the Commission tend to have a more practical human rights experience. He considers the Commission to be the barometer of what is ‘going on’ in society. It is the Commission that starts receiving the complaints, the calls, the faxes and the e-mails.²⁷⁴

This section gives some examples of cases involving death threats that may provide some indications as to the approach of the Court with regard to evidentiary requirements.

In August 1991 the Court ratified its President’s provisional measures in the Chunimá case. The ‘possibility for injury’ was imminent and called for immediate action by the Court because five people had already been killed and the judges that issued the arrest warrants for the suspects had received death threats and were in hiding.²⁷⁵

²⁷¹ See Article 29(2) of CIDH former Regulations (dating from 1987). Article 25(1) of the CIDH 2001 Rules of Procedure simply uses the criterion ‘whenever necessary according to the information available’.

²⁷² See also Pasqualucci (1993), p. 803 and Pasqualucci (2003), p. 296.

²⁷³ See CIDH Teodoro Cabrera García and Rodolfo Montiel Flores v. Mexico, 27 February 2004 (adm.), §47.

²⁷⁴ Interview by the author with Commissioner Robert Goldman, American University, Washington College of Law, 26 September 2001.

²⁷⁵ Pasqualucci (2003), p. 302.

Yet the Court set out certain requirements that must be met before the Court can adopt provisional measures at the request of the Commission. It pointed out that the reference to ‘in cases where the denounced facts are true’ in Article 29(2) of the Commission’s old Regulations was ‘not a question of fully determining the truth of the facts; rather, the Commission must have reasonable basis for assuming them to be true’.²⁷⁶ It found, however, that the Commission had not fulfilled this requirement because its request ‘merely transcribes the facts reported by the petitioner’.²⁷⁷ The Court also referred to the acknowledgement by Guatemala of an ‘internal armed conflict’. “Such a blanket acknowledgement does not imply acceptance that the facts denounced are true; however, it does lead to the presumption that a situation exists which could bring about irreparable damage to persons”.²⁷⁸

The Court referred to the wording in Article 63(2), indicating ‘that we are dealing here with an extraordinary instrument, one which becomes necessary in exceptional circumstances’.²⁷⁹

It also pointed out that the request for provisional measures referred to a case ‘not yet submitted to the Court’. This meant ‘that the Court lacks information regarding the facts and circumstances surrounding the case, which information must be at the disposal of the Commission. The latter must, consequently, transmit such information together with the corresponding petition, in order to provide the Court with the facts necessary to enable it to arrive at a decision’.²⁸⁰ Despite its critical remarks the Court considered that provisional measures were warranted. In fact the measures taken on behalf of the persons listed in the President’s previous order²⁸¹ were to be extended, a position, the Court noted, ‘with which the Government concurred at the hearing’.²⁸² The Order remained into effect until December 1991.²⁸³ Subsequently the Commission re-established its own precautionary measures.²⁸⁴

²⁷⁶ IACHR Chunimá (Guatemala), Order of 1 August 1991, §6a.

²⁷⁷ Ibid.

²⁷⁸ Ibid.

²⁷⁹ IACHR Chunimá (Guatemala), Order of 1 August 1991, §6b.

²⁸⁰ Id., §7. See also IACHR Colotenango (Guatemala), Order of 1 February 1996, where the Court hoped the Commission would bring the case itself to the Court, rather than just its request for a prolongation or expansion of provisional measures, stating it ‘is incumbent on the Commission to take all necessary steps to examine the possibility of submitting to the jurisdiction of the Court any case in which circumstances of extreme gravity and urgency persist for a prolonged period of time, since the Court is not in possession of sufficient direct knowledge of the facts and of the surrounding circumstances to permit it to come to the most appropriate decision’, 5th ‘Considering’ clause. See also e.g. IACHR Millacura Llaipén y otros (Argentina), Order of the President of 21 June 2006.

²⁸¹ IACHR Chunimá (Guatemala), President’s Order for urgent measures of 15 July 1991. In this case the Court stressed the importance of distinguishing between the provisional measures the Court can adopt under Article 63(2) of the Convention and ‘the emergency measures that Article 23 (4) of the Rules empowers the President to order the parties in the interim, so as to permit any decision that the Court may eventually take to have the appropriate effect; in other words, so that the Court may not find itself facing a fait accompli’. IACHR Chunimá (Guatemala), Order of 1 August 1991, §5.

²⁸² IACHR Chunimá (Guatemala), Order of 1 August 1991, §8. See also Buergethal (1994), p. 79 noting that the Court did so ‘because the additional facts brought to its attention by the Government at the public hearing strengthened the Commission’s allegations’.

²⁸³ IACHR Chunimá (Guatemala), Order of 1 August 1991, 1st ‘Resolving’ clause.

²⁸⁴ CIDH Annual Report 1991, Chapter IVb. CEJIL notes that in an unprecedented decision, in March 1993, some of the perpetrators of the persecution were convicted and sentenced to prison terms. CEJIL case docket 1997 (in file with the author).

As noted, in its Orders for provisional measures in cases not yet pending before it the Court often refers to the fact that the Commission previously used precautionary measures to no avail. An example is the case of Father Vogt. He was threatened in relation to his pastoral work. Before the Court was in session its President ordered 'urgent measures' in April 1996 based, among others, on the consideration that the Commission had taken precautionary measures on three occasions and that these had not had the required effect. This had become 'a special circumstance making it incumbent on the President of the Court to request urgent measures'.²⁸⁵ He noted in his order for urgent measures of April 1996 that 'the background information presented in this case' effectively constituted 'a prima facie case of urgent and grave danger to Father Daniel Vogt's life and the integrity of his person'.²⁸⁶ By its Order of 27 June 1996 the Court confirmed the President's Order 'finding it to be consistent with the law and the merits of the proceedings'.²⁸⁷ In later cases the Court simply ratifies orders of the President without such statement. In 1997 the Court lifted its provisional measures in the Vogt case because the threats and harassment had diminished considerably as a result of the provisional measures.²⁸⁸

In August 1999 the Commission requested Colombia to protect the lives and personal integrity of a spokesman for Cartagena del Chairá in the region of Caquetá. It was alleged that a high-ranking official of the National Army of Colombia had publicly identified him as a spokesman for the guerrillas. Apparently he had been harassed and received threatening telephone calls 'of the type that usually precedes criminal attacks'.²⁸⁹

In his decision to order urgent measures in the Peace Community case (2000) the President of the Court, Judge Cançado Trindade, considered that the 'records produced by the Commission in its request demonstrate prima facie a situation of extreme seriousness and urgency as to the rights to life and personal integrity' of 193 persons.²⁹⁰ The Court used a similar phrase but without referring to prima facie evidence: 'the Commission has described a situation of extreme seriousness and urgency that conforms to the basis under Article 63(2) of the American Convention' with regard to these named persons.²⁹¹

The President had noted that the Commission had already taken precautionary measures but that these had not been able to stop the serious and continuous violence perpetrated against members of the Community.²⁹² During the hearing of November 2000 the Commission again referred to the precautionary measures it had used in 1997, in light of more than 40 summary executions and forced disappearances. It emphasised that almost three years later the Community was still under continuous threat and without adequate protection by the government. The last months the violence had increased.

²⁸⁵ IACHR Vogt case, Order of 27 June 1996, Compendium 1987-1996, p. 160.

²⁸⁶ Ibid.

²⁸⁷ Id., p. 172.

²⁸⁸ IACHR Vogt case, Order of 11 November 1997. Another example is the Court's decision to lift the provisional measures on behalf of four persons in the Carpio Nicolle case, Order of 19 June 1998 (case 1011-97). It continued them on behalf of two family members of Carpio Nicolle. Subsequently others were again added in the list of beneficiaries. At the end of 2008 the State again requested the Court to lift the provisional measures. See Order of the President of 18 November 2008 ordering a hearing for the beginning of 2009.

²⁸⁹ CIDH Annual Report 1999, Chapter 3.C.1, §21.

²⁹⁰ IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order of the President for urgent measures, 9 October 2000, 4th 'Considering' clause.

²⁹¹ IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order of 24 November 2000, 4th 'Considering' clause.

²⁹² IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order of the President for urgent measures, 9 October 2000, 5th 'Considering' clause.

“In spite of the active accompaniment of organizations such as the Peace Brigades, the interest of the foreign diplomatic representations in Colombia, and the Office of the High Commissioner of the United Nations, and, even, the actions of the Vice-presidency of the Republic, the members of the Community of Paz continue to be ‘prisoners of violence’ specially from paramilitary groups, and they remain to be without the effective protection of the State’s agents”.²⁹³

The Court ratified the President’s Order and expanded it to include all members of the Community.²⁹⁴ They were subsequently maintained and expanded several times.²⁹⁵

The Court has dismissed requests for provisional measures ‘on grounds of inadmissibility’ because it considered it ‘not possible to determine, on a prima facie basis, that the persons listed by the representative (...) are in a situation of extreme gravity and urgency, or that their lives and personal integrity are threatened and at serious risk’.²⁹⁶ After all, it pointed out, ‘provisional measures may be ordered as long as the background data submitted to the Court provide prima facie evidence that there exists a situation of extreme gravity and urgency and that irreparable damage to persons is imminent’.²⁹⁷

3.2.6.3 DENYING REQUESTS FOR PROVISIONAL MEASURES

The Inter-American Court has pointed out that ‘in a request for provisional measures it is not possible to consider arguments pertaining to issues other than those which relate strictly to the extreme gravity and urgency, and the necessity to avoid irreparable damage to persons’.²⁹⁸ Otherwise the provisional measures would conflict with the notion of non-anticipation. Hence the Court has sometimes considered that a request by petitioners for provisional measures did ‘not refer to a situation of extreme gravity and urgency warranting the adoption of provisional ²⁹³ See IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order of 24 November 2000, ‘Having seen’ clause 9b.

²⁹⁴ IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order of 24 November 2000. The Court pointed out that, because of the seriousness of the situation, it gave a detailed description of the facts stated in the Commission’s report. It noted that the State did not dispute the facts as described by the Commission, that it had examined the facts and circumstances that served as the basis for the President’s Order for urgent measures and ratified this decision because it found it to be in conformity with the law and the merits of the records. See IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order of 24 November 2000, 15th ‘Considering’ clause. The Spanish text speaks of ‘por encontrarla ajustada a derecho y al mérito de los autos’.

²⁹⁵ See e.g. IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order of the President for urgent measures, 9 October 2000, Orders for provisional measures, 24 November 2000 and 18 June 2002.

²⁹⁶ IACHR Case of Bueno-Alves (Argentina), Order of 2 February 2007 (denying request for provisional measures), 5th ‘Considering’ clause.

²⁹⁷ IACHR Case of Bueno-Alves (Argentina), Order of 2 February 2007 (denying request for provisional measures), 4th ‘Considering’ clause, referring to various cases including Case of the 19 Tradesmen, Order of 4 July 2006, 5th ‘Considering’ clause.

²⁹⁸ IACHR Case of the Miguel Castro-Castro Prison v. Peru, Order denying provisional measures of 29 January 2008, 10th ‘Considering’ clause. See also Matter of James et al. (Trinidad and Tobago), Order of 20 August 1998, 6th ‘Considering’ clause; Matter of “Globovisión” Television Station (Venezuela), Order of 29 January 2008, 10th ‘Considering’ clause and Matter of Luisiana Ríos et al. (Venezuela), Order of 3 July 2007, 9th ‘Considering’ clause.

measures to avoid irreparable damage to persons pursuant to Article 63(2) of the American Convention on Human Rights'.²⁹⁹ It explained that it would consider the implications of the facts reported to it 'if appropriate, at the stage, still pending, of oversight of compliance' with its judgment in the case in question.³⁰⁰

3.2.6.4 LIFTING PROVISIONAL MEASURES IN CASES OF DEATH THREATS

Petitioners consult with the beneficiaries of precautionary measures and may report to the Commission that the situation 'no longer requires the application of urgent measures'. If the Commission decides to lift then it often observes that it will continue watching over the situation closely and will seek to apply these measures once again if circumstances warrant it.³⁰¹

The Court has also lifted its provisional measures when it considers that a reasonable time had elapsed since the beneficiary had received any threats or intimidation.³⁰² In Alemán Lacayo (1996) the Court ordered provisional measures, noting "That in the instant case, independently of the fact that the merits of the matter are under consideration by the Commission, publicity in both the national and international Press, the death of one of Dr. Alemán-Lacayo's bodyguards, and the injuries sustained by others in his entourage, have invested the events on which the Commission bases its request for provisional measures with a high degree of notoriety and credibility".³⁰³ Subsequently, the Court heeded to the Commission's request to lift the provisional measures. The Commission had noted that "[T]he Nicaraguan people voted on October 20, 1996, to elect its Government. At that election Dr. Arnoldo Alemán-Lacayo was elected President of the Republic and is to assume the country's highest office today. As a consequence, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights considers that the provisional measures duly ordered by the Honorable Court attained its main purpose".³⁰⁴ It considered that 'the instant case, in view of Mr. Alemán's election as President of Nicaragua and, taking the Commission's request into account, the situation of "extreme gravity and urgency" which prompted the adoption of the provisional measures has ceased to exist, in itself making them no longer necessary'.³⁰⁵ In fact 'as the beneficiary of the measures is today President of the Republic of Nicaragua, it is inappropriate for an international body to adopt provisional measures to be instituted by a government on behalf of its own Head of State'.³⁰⁶

In May 1997 the Commission indicated to the Court that there was no information that the physical integrity of two beneficiaries of the Court's provisional measures in the Caballero ²⁹⁹ IACHR Case of the Miguel Castro-Castro Prison v. Peru, Order denying provisional measures of 29 January 2008, 11th 'Considering' clause.

³⁰⁰ IACHR Case of the Miguel Castro-Castro Prison v. Peru, Order denying provisional measures of 29 January 2008, 12th 'Considering' clause. See also Case of the Miguel Castro-Castro Prison v. Peru, Order of 30 January 2007 (denying a request for provisional measures). See also Miguel Castro-Castro Prison, Judgment of 25 November 2006.

³⁰¹ See e.g. IACHR Serech and Saquic, Order of 19 September 1997, 4th and 6th 'Having seen' clause for a similar statement in the context of cases in which the Court lifted its Order for provisional measures.

³⁰² See e.g. IACHR matter of Gallardo Rodríguez (Mexico), 11 July 2007.

³⁰³ IACHR Alemán Lacayo (Nicaragua), Order of 2 February 1996, §7.

³⁰⁴ IACHR Alemán Lacayo (Nicaragua), Order of 6 February 1997, 4th 'Having seen' clause (referring to the Commission's brief of 10 January 1997).

³⁰⁵ IACHR Alemán Lacayo (Nicaragua), Order of 6 February 1997, 2nd 'Considering' clause.

³⁰⁶ IACHR Alemán Lacayo (Nicaragua), Order of 6 February 1997, 3rd 'Considering' clause. On the beneficiaries of provisional measures see also Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4.

Delgado and Santana case continued to be threatened. It pointed out that the personal circumstances of these two persons had fundamentally changed and that one of them was even working as an official in the Administrative Security Department of Colombia. In this light, it was reasonable to lift the provisional measures on their behalf. In June 1999 the Court indeed decided to lift the provisional measures it had ordered for those two persons. It also decided to maintain its provisional measures ordered on behalf of the other three beneficiaries in this case.³⁰⁷

In Clemente Teherán (2000) the Commission and the State suggested that the Court would lift its provisional measures because the Commission had been unable to get in touch with the indigenous community that had initially reported the violations. At the same time the Commission suggested that the lack of contact was due to fear on the part of the petitioners. The Court refused to lift its provisional measures, arguing that it had not been provided with 'sufficient reasons to indicate that the 'situation of extreme gravity and urgency' has ceased'.³⁰⁸ It has been suggested that this decision 'may be frustrating to the Commission, which has limited resources for verifying the situations of petitioners', but is positive 'in that it may serve to minimize State attempts at intimidating petitioners to the Inter-American system to abandoning their petitions'.³⁰⁹

In January 1995 the Inter-American Commission had requested Mexico to take precautionary measures on behalf of the Director of the Miguel Agustín Pro Juárez Human Rights Centre (Centro Pro), an attorney and the Technical Director of the National Network of Human Rights Organisations 'Todos los derechos para todos'.³¹⁰ If the threats against Centro Pro indeed subsided, this was only temporarily. In September 1999 Centro Pro (PRODH) received three envelopes containing threats against the director and staff of the Centre. On 9 August 1999 unknown persons kidnapped Digna Ochoa, the Centre's attorney. Her kidnappers had taken certain personal items from her including her personal calling cards. One of these cards was later found in one of the envelopes the Centre received containing further threats against them. The Commission decided to take precautionary measures and requested Mexico to adopt specific measures to protect the lives and physical integrity of Digna Ochoa, the Director of Centro Pro and its members. On 21 September 1999 Mexico informed the Commission that its National Human Rights Commission (CNDH) had taken steps to protect the beneficiaries of the precautionary measures. It also noted that the Office of the Attorney General of the Federal District had initiated preliminary investigations of the threats and the kidnapping. Furthermore, it referred to the fact that the Hu-³⁰⁷ IACHR Caballero-Delgado and Santana (Colombia), Order of 3 June 1999. Several years later the State argued that certain remaining provisional measures should be lifted, 'since: i) they have been in force for more than 13 years, and in fact provisional measures should be exceptional in nature; ii) there is no evidence of new threats; iii) domestic law provides for effective mechanisms to protect a person who acts as trade union leader, as in the case of María Nodelia Parra and a person detained in a penitentiary, as in the case of Gonzalo Arias-Alturo'. Caballero-Delgado and Santana (Colombia), Order of 6 February 2008, 8th 'Having seen' clause. Yet the Court decided to maintain the provisional measures. It pointed out that it appreciated 'the information provided by the State in the sense that certain protection measures set forth in the domestic legislation could benefit both petitioners'. It considered that 'the State should address in its next report the domestic protection mechanisms that would apply to both beneficiaries. Particularly, the Court is keen on knowing the specific domestic protection measures that could be adopted regarding both beneficiaries; such measures would guarantee a protection level similar to that enjoyed by the beneficiaries of provisional measures contemplated herein'. IACHR Caballero-Delgado and Santana (Colombia), Order of 6 February 2008, 13th 'Considering' clause.

³⁰⁸ IACHR Clemente Teherán et al. (Guatemala), Order of 12 August 2000, 7th 'Considering' clause.

³⁰⁹ Pasqualucci (2003), p. 316. See also Chapter IX (Threats).

³¹⁰ CIDH Annual Report 1996, 14 March 1997, Chapter II, section 4a.

man Rights Commission of the Federal District had intervened as well. The Commission notes in its Annual Report of 1999 that the petitioners reported another serious attack against Digna Ochoa that took place within the time period the Commission had set for receiving comments. On 11 November 1999, upon receipt of this information, the Commission decided to request the Inter-American Court to take provisional measures.³¹¹ Provisional measures on behalf of Digna Ochoa remained in place for almost two years. In August 2001 they were lifted at the request of Mexico and without the opposition of the Commission. The State had argued that it was ‘an abuse of provisional measures to use them as a de facto substitute for prosecuting a case that should have sufficient merit to be heard before the Inter-American Court of Human Rights’.³¹² It was reported that Digna Ochoa and her colleagues considered that violence against them ‘could not happen in present day Mexico’.³¹³ Tragically two months later Digna Ochoa was murdered. Immediately the President of the Court ordered new provisional measures on behalf of her colleagues and family. A hearing took place discussing the circumstances, including the earlier decision to lift the provisional measures, after which the Court confirmed the President’s measures.³¹⁴

³¹¹ CIDH Annual Report 1999, Chapter III C.1, §44.

³¹² IACHR Digna Ochoa et al. (Mexico), Order of 28 August 2001, 3rd ‘Having seen’ clause.

³¹³ IACHR Miguel Agustín Pro Juárez Human Rights Center et al. (Mexico), Order of 30 November 2001, 8th ‘having seen’ clause.

³¹⁴ The Court refers to the statements, made at the hearing of 26 November 2001, by the Commission and the State with regard to the previous request to lift the provisional measures. “The statement of one of the Commission’s assistants on the factors that she had taken into account when she had agreed that the provisional measures ordered in favor of Digna Ochoa and others should be lifted: “When we took the decision to request that the measures should be lifted, we took various factors into consideration. The first was that the Attorney General had closed the investigation; according to the petitioners, this ended the possibility of terminating the impunity in this series of threats and harassment, at that time. I believe that [it is necessary to express a] public mea culpa; we underestimated the sword of Damocles that impunity represented for the physical safety of all of us, [...] the members of the PRODH Center, who agreed that the measures should be lifted, because there was no point in continuing to insist on investigations when the State was not undertaking them and refused to continue with them. The lawyer, Digna Ochoa, manifested her frustration with the ineffectiveness of the administration of justice and also, to a certain extent, her confidence that [...] acts [such as her homicide] could not happen in present day Mexico. I therefore believe that, in these circumstances, we, the representatives of the victims, and the victims themselves made an error in our calculations; we did not believe that impunity was a sword of Damocles and this error led to fatal consequences for ourselves and for our colleagues. We made a mistake owing to our frustration in the face of the response of the administration of justice and of the State of Mexico itself”, IACHR Miguel Agustín Pro Juárez Human Rights Center et al. (Mexico), Order of 30 November 2001, 8th ‘Having seen’ clause. “The statement of the State’s representative on the factors that had been taken into consideration in order to request that the provisional measures ordered in favor of Digna Ochoa y Plácido and others should be lifted: “the following factors were taken into consideration in the decision to request the lifting of the precautionary measures. First, the absence of complaints of threats by Digna Ochoa or the Miguel Agustín Pro Juárez Human Rights Center. The fact that, for several months, she had not had police protection, when she went to the United States and then returned [...] and there were no complaints or threats, which [...] led us to believe that the climate of intimidation and harassment had ceased. Lastly, the issue of the investigation, and in this case, I am referring to the investigation of the Office of the Attorney General: [...] the response of the Office of the Attorney General was always that there were no elements to continue with the investigation [...]. But, in any case, we felt that the measures had achieved their purpose.

3.2.7 Cultural survival and assessment of risk

On occasion the HRC has dealt with the issue of cultural survival. It appears that the threshold for a violation of Article 27 ICCPR is very high and the difference between provisional measures and the eventual finding on the merits can be found in the assessment of risk. The merits and the provisional measures coincide in the sense that the evaluation by the Rapporteur before provisional measures are used is a miniature of the analysis preceding a decision on the merits. Thus far, the HRC seems to consider that only when the cultural survival of the group is at stake it would find a violation.³¹⁵

The HRC practice with regard to provisional measures to protect cultural survival serves to illustrate how the difficulties in assessing the evidence have an impact not just on the decisions on the merits but also on the use of provisional measures. It also shows that the Committee is less inclined to consider on the merits that certain acts would result in irreparable harm to cultural survival. While sometimes it did use provisional measures pending the proceedings, it did so in a manner that was much feebler. It acted much less swiftly and with more circumscription, almost anticipating their subsequent decision to withdraw them.³¹⁶ If the adjudicator initially refuses to take provisional measures the petitioner may still be able to convince it at a later stage with new arguments and evidence of risk.³¹⁷

The stricter assessment of the evidence may have been based purely on the type of (conflicting) evidence available. Yet it is also possible that while the HRC has recognized in principle that certain measures may result in irreparable harm to cultural survival, in practice it attaches less importance to preventing this type of harm than to preventing irreparable harm to the life and personal integrity of individuals.³¹⁸

The excessive length of the proceedings in the case involving the Lubicon Lake Band (1990) has been explained elsewhere.³¹⁹ Yet, assuming that for the use of provisional measures an exhaustive and definitive examination of the evidence is not necessary, the fact that the HRC used provisional measures so late in the proceedings remains puzzling.³²⁰

Domestically the Band's requests for an interim injunction, a caveat and a declaratory judgment had failed. The domestic court cases clarified the concept of irreparable harm used by

Unfortunately, we were mistaken also and we agree with the petitioners that, this time, we cannot allow these facts to happen again, so we have implemented all the measures of protection requested of us. Consequently, we have set up a permanent dialogue with the petitioners, with the human rights defenders and, therefore, we submit ourselves to the Court, the Commission and to public opinion in everything related to these provisional measures", 10th 'Having seen' clause.

³¹⁵ See Chapter IX (Culture).

³¹⁶ See Chapter IX (Culture) and Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4 (group of beneficiaries).

³¹⁷ Sometimes, however, provisional measures are too late by that time, or in any case less effective in preventing irreparable harm.

³¹⁸ See Part II on the common core and outer limits of the concept of provisional measures. It appears that while ensuring cultural survival, while now belonging to the common core, nevertheless is not considered as important as ensuring the right to life and personal integrity.

³¹⁹ Schmidt (1992), pp. 651-652 has noted that 'the final decision was adopted on the basis of a total of 78 documents, fact sheets and conference room papers submitted by the parties or prepared by the Secretariat, as well as decisions adopted by the Committee'. He observes that the entirely written procedure, without oral hearings or independent fact-finding, had caused 'considerable delays in the consideration of many factually or legally complex communications, since the treaty body concerned was forced to engage in time-consuming exchanges of correspondence with either of the parties before disposing of the necessary information enabling it to adopt a decision'.

³²⁰ See also Chapter II (Systems), discussing prompt intervention.

Canadian courts and the manner in which the evidence was assessed. They employed the criterion of 'balance of convenience'. The Court of Appeal of Alberta considered that interim relief might be warranted if the defendants were attempting to force members of the Band from their dwellings, or to deny them 'access to traditional burial grounds or other special places, or to hunting and trapping areas'. The petitioner argued that the Band had, in fact, 'alleged denial of access to all of these areas, supporting its allegations with photographs of damage and with several uncontested affidavits'.³²¹

Thus, the dispute turned on an assessment of the evidence, which was linked to the court's approach to the concept of irreparable harm. The petitioner referred to the definition of irreparable injury by the Court of Appeal, which is an injury for which fair and reasonable redress in a court of law is not possible. To refuse an injunction to prevent such irreparable injury would be a 'denial of justice'.³²² Yet in this case the domestic court did not consider that the balance of convenience favoured relief to the Band. It considered that the Band would suffer no irreparable harm if resource development continued fully.³²³

According to the State this meant that interim injunctions were only used if the issue was serious, if without the injunction irreparable harm would be suffered and if the balance of convenience between the parties favoured relief to the applicant. It suggested that the HRC should take the same approach.³²⁴

As the domestic appeals that were still pending were without suspensive effect, their non-exhaustion was no obstacle to admissibility before the HRC. Moreover, the adjudicator could use provisional measures before finally determining the admissibility of a claim.³²⁵ However, the HRC took three years and five months to determine that the case was admissible and only then it took provisional measures. At that stage the HRC did assess the evidence for irreparable harm differently from the domestic court and used provisional measures. It did so in light of the seriousness of the claim that the Band was on the verge of extinction.

It would have been preferable had it made the assessment earlier in the proceedings. However, this was the first time the HRC used provisional measures in a case not involving irreparable harm to the life or personal integrity of individuals. At the time the HRC may not have been confident about the appropriateness of their use in the context of threats to the cultural survival of a group. Or possibly the case was so complex that its urgency escaped the attention of the Committee.

Sara et al. v. Finland (inadm. 1994) equally illustrates the difficulty of dealing with cases on an urgent basis when the evidence is conflicting.³²⁶ The Committee used provisional measures ³²¹ See HRC Lubicon Lake Band, 26 March 1990, §3.7. Ominayak submitted that the Band 'clearly met this test by demonstrating, with uncontested evidence, injury to their livelihood, to their subsistence economy, to their culture and their way of life as a social and political entity'.

³²² HRC Lubicon Lake Band, 26 March 1990, §3.8.

³²³ Like the lower court, the Court of Appeal of Alberta did consider that the Band's 'claim of aboriginal title to the land presented a serious question of law to be decided at trial,' but that, nevertheless, the Band would 'suffer no irreparable harm if resource development continued fully and that the balance of convenience, therefore, favoured denial of the injunction'. Chief Ominayak stated that the provincial government and the oil companies attempted to convince the Court that the Band had 'no right to any possession of any sort in any part of the subject lands, which, logically, included even their homes'. HRC Lubicon Lake Band, 26 March 1990, §3.7.

³²⁴ HRC Lubicon Lake Band, 26 March 1990, §§5.3, 5.7 and 21.3.

³²⁵ See also Chapter XIV on admissibility.

³²⁶ HRC Sara et al. v. Finland, 23 March 1994 (inadm.). The State had contended that the envisaged forestry operations, consisting merely of silvicultural logging, were in fact expected to contribute to the natural development of the forest. It referred to a report for the Ministry of Agriculture and only when it initially declared the case admissible. This was seven months after initial submission.³²⁷ By contrast, if it had been a death penalty or expulsion case it would probably have used provisional measures prior to declaring the case admissible.³²⁸ Eventually it declared the case inadmissible for non-exhaustion of domestic remedies and did not address the qualitative argument of the petitioner.³²⁹ While clearly the problem of conflicting evidence plays a role in the Committee's late use of provisional measures, it may also simply attach less importance to preventing irreparable harm to cultural survival than to life or personal integrity.

In the case following up the situation in Sara, the case of Äärelä and Näkkäläjärvi v. Finland (2001), the HRC did not use provisional measures because the events complained of had already taken place.³³⁰ On the merits it found no violation because it was 'unable to conclude'

Forestry by a professor of a Finnish university stating that 'no single forest or land use can on its own fulfil the income and welfare needs of the population' and schemes of multiple use were necessary. This advice seems not to relate to the environmental impact of this type of logging. Instead it is an economic assessment. It also noted that the petitioners could not be considered as 'victims' of a violation of the Covenant. It pointed out that the rationale of the Wilderness Act was in fact to enhance protection of the Sami culture and traditional nature based means of livelihood. The petitioners submitted the reports of two experts 'according to which (a) under certain conditions reindeer are highly dependent on lichen growing on trees; (b) lichen growing on the ground are a primary winter forage for reindeer; (c) old forests are superior to young ones as herding areas; and (d) logging negatively affects nature based methods of reindeer herding'.

³²⁷ It had transmitted the case in February 1991, two months after initial submission, but at that time it did not yet use provisional measures. Sara et al. v. Finland, 23 March 1994 (inadm.).

³²⁸ See Conclusion Part II (on the purpose of provisional measures).

³²⁹ The petitioners criticized the State's remark that practicing intensive reindeer husbandry was not incompatible with intensive logging. They noted that this only applied to the modern forms of reindeer herding using artificial feeding, while they used traditional methods for which the old forests in the area were essential. They gave the following example: "The winter 1991-1992 demonstrated how relatively warm winters may threaten traditional herding methods. As a result of alternating periods of temperatures of above and below 0 degree centigrade the snow was, in many parts of Finnish Lapland, covered by a hard layer of ice that prevented the reindeer from getting their nutrition from the ground. In some areas without old forests carrying lichen on their branches, reindeer have been dying from hunger. In this situation, the herding area designated in the communication has been very valuable to the authors". Sara et al. v. Finland, 23 March 1994 (inadm.), §7.9.

³³⁰ HRC Äärelä and Näkkäläjärvi v. Finland, 24 October 2001. The petitioners had argued about an area that was the last remaining natural wilderness for the Lappi Herdsmen's Committee and that for the Sallivaara Herdsmen's Committee formed 'one third of its best winter herding areas and is essential for the survival of reindeer in extreme climatic conditions'. Again they argued about the impact on the environment. They pointed out that snow and rainfalls were common in this area and the winter season was approximately one month longer than in other areas. "The climate has a direct impact on the area's environment, in particular the trees (birch and spruce), whose growth is slow; the trees in turn encourage the growth of the two types of lichen that constitute the winter diets for reindeer". They emphasised that 'even partial logging would render the area inhospitable for reindeer breeding for at least a century and possibly irrevocably, since the destruction of the trees would lead to an extension of the marsh, with the resulting change of the nutrition balance of the soil'. They also submitted that the 'silvicultural methods of logging (i.e. environmentally sensitive cutting of forest areas) advocated by the authorities for some parts of the wilderness areas used by the authors would cause possibly irreversible damage to reindeer herding, as the age structure of the forest and the conditions for the lichen growth would change'. They spoke of the strategic significance of certain lands and pointed out that other activities in whether the logging of trees in the area at issue rose to the threshold it had established earlier, namely whether the interference by the State party was so substantial as to fail to properly protect the right of the petitioners to enjoy their culture.³³¹

In Länsman II (1996) the HRC initially used provisional measures, but later set them aside without explaining why.³³² On the merits the HRC had to determine whether the logging that had already taken place, as well as the logging that had been approved for the future, was 'of such proportions as to deny the authors the right to enjoy their culture' in the area in question. The ensuing discussion turned on evidentiary matters about the consultation process and the impact of logging plans on the one hand and the Committee's deference to the interpretation of domestic courts on the other. Again, the HRC determined that it was 'unable to conclude that the activities carried out as well as approved constitute a denial of the authors' right to enjoy their own culture'. It pointed out that this was the result of a careful consideration of the material placed before it by the parties and that it had duly noted 'that the parties do not agree on the long-term impact of the logging activities already carried out and planned'.³³³

It then deferred to these courts' interpretation of Article 27 in noting that it was 'not in a position to conclude, on the evidence before it, that the impact of logging plans would be such as to amount to a denial of the authors' rights under article 27 or that the finding of the Court of Appeal affirmed by the Supreme Court, misinterpreted and/or misapplied article 27 of the Covenant in the light of the facts before it'.³³⁴ In other words, according to the Committee the logging activities did not appear to threaten the survival of reindeer husbandry.³³⁵ the area, 'including large-scale gold-mining, other mineral mining, large-scale tourism, and the operation of a radar station', had limited the possibilities for herding.

³³¹ The test the HRC applied was whether interference by the State party in reindeer husbandry, as an essential element of Sami culture, was so substantial that the State had failed to properly protect the right of the petitioners to enjoy their culture. The Committee considered that the requirement of consultation had been fulfilled. The State had indicated that, as required by the Committee's decision in Jouni Länsman, the plans had been developed in consultation with reindeer owners. Apart from finding that the requirement of consultation had been fulfilled, the HRC also referred to the partly conflicting expert evidence, which the District Court had assessed differently from the appellate court. It considered that 'it does not have sufficient information before it in order to be able to draw independent conclusions on the factual importance of the area to husbandry and the long-term impact on the sustainability of husbandry, and the consequences under article 27 of the Covenant', HRC Äärelä and Näkkäläjärvi v. Finland, 24 October 2001, §7.6.

³³² HRC Jouni E. Länsman et al. v. Finland, 30 October 1996. The HRC simply noted the State party's argument that the request for interim measures of protection should be set aside. Hence, from the publicly available information it is not clear on what basis it made this decision. See also Chapter X (Culture).

³³³ See also Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4 on the group of beneficiaries, discussing consultation and representation in cases involving indigenous peoples.

³³⁴ See also Schmidt (1997), p. 338.

³³⁵ The State party had indeed solicited deference by the HRC. It had recalled that the claims had been thoroughly examined by the domestic courts. These courts had had before them extensive documentation and Article 27 had been taken into account as well. It submitted that 'the national judge is far better positioned than an international instance to examine the case in all of its aspects'. In this case the petitioners had used an argument loosely based on the precautionary principle, although they did not use this terminology. See Chapter I, section 5.3.3 and section 4 of this Chapter. They submitted that if the government invoked 'the argument that the effects of selective cutting are milder than in the case of clear felling, the only conclusion should be that all further logging in the area in question should be postponed until objective and scientific findings

It considered that, on the basis of the available information, the fact that such traditional reindeer husbandry was an activity of low economic profitability was not 'a result of the encouragement of other economic activities by the State party in area in question, but of other, external, economic factors'.³³⁶ In light of its deference to the State party's arguments and the assessment by the domestic courts of the risks involved, on the merits the Committee could not confirm its earlier assessment of the risks that had resulted in the decision to take provisional measures and it found no violation.³³⁷

The petitioners noted that the State should support its argument for continuing the logging of trees by objective and scientific findings showing that the forest in the area already logged had indeed recovered. Their argument relies on the precautionary principle.³³⁸

The HRC did indicate that the cumulative effect of certain infringements could eventually constitute a violation of Article 27.³³⁹ In other words, the question arises at what point one can speak of irreparable harm and use provisional measures. This question applies particularly when the HRC takes a quantitative approach.³⁴⁰ If it would take a qualitative approach it would sometimes be easier to find that there was a threat of irreparable harm.

This could be so in case of prima facie evidence of threats to an area of religious or cultural significance. Establishing the qualitative importance of a certain area (however small) for traditional livelihood would still require specific evidence of the importance of that piece of land to maintain traditional livelihood. Tree logging or oil drilling or other actions could result in irreparable harm also if it involved only a small part of the traditional lands, if these parts are qualitatively essential for the collective as well as individual right to culture.

By contrast, the quantitative approach involves (incremental) threats to such a large area that this would equally make impossible cultural survival. In other words, depending on the ap-show that the forest in the area already logged-the Pyhäjärvi area-has recovered'. See §9.2. The petitioners had emphasised the fact that the past and future logging would exacerbate an already difficult situation. It appears from their submission of 28 August 1995 that they argued that 'the situation of the Sami in Finland, and in the Angeli area in particular, is very difficult already before any new interference with their way of life'. Because of this a threshold approach such as that used by the domestic courts would be inappropriate. The domestic courts had ruled that a certain 'threshold' was to be met before adverse effects on traditional minority activities would amount to a 'denial' of Article 27 (on file with the author).

³³⁶ See HRC Jouni E. Länsman et al. v. Finland, 30 October 1996, §10.6.

³³⁷ See also HRC Jarle Jonassen and members of the Riast/Hylling reindeer herding district v. Norway, 25 October 2002 (inadm.). The HRC considered that the application of domestic remedies had not been unreasonably prolonged because 'the period of time it has taken for the authors to obtain a remedy, may not be gauged from the time the Samis have litigated grazing rights, but from the time the authors themselves have sought a remedy' (§8.8). This shows again an emphasis on the individual right rather than its collective aspects. Committee members Henkin, Scheinin and Solari Yrigoyen dissented, considering, among others, that instituting expropriation proceedings to secure reindeer herding rights was not at all an effective remedy, that the proceedings were already unreasonably prolonged and that the petitioners would be subjected to legal sanctions if they continued to herd their reindeer in certain traditional areas, while the expropriation proceedings could not address this problem.

³³⁸ See HRC Jouni E. Länsman et al. v. Finland, 30 October 1996, §9.2. The relevance of the precautionary principle to human rights law is discussed later in this Chapter, in section 4. For a discussion on the precautionary principle in general, see Chapter I, section 5.3.3.

³³⁹ On this substantive issue see further Chapter IX (Culture), section 3, under the heading 'Land rights and collective aspects of the right to culture'.

³⁴⁰ Here evidentiary and substantive law issues again are clearly interrelated.

proach the petitioners would have to prove either that the specific area is of strategic importance to their culture or that the past and future infringements combined would result in a denial of the right to culture. The Committee's recognition of the cumulative effect of certain infringements should also take into account qualitative aspects to the right to land, next to the quantitative aspects.

The quantitative approach to culture currently taken by the HRC may sometimes give precedence to collective rights over individual rights.³⁴¹ Indeed, apart from the quantitative versus qualitative approach, there is also the tension between the collective dimension of the right to culture in Article 27 and the fact that it is an individual right. As discussed in Chapter X, the Committee's use of provisional measures is generally triggered by its awareness of the collective dimension of the right. An individual's 'cultural survival' is considered less important.³⁴² At the same time the quantitative approach may conflict with the collective right to culture as well exactly because a purely quantitative approach ignores the qualitative aspects of the right to land as part of the right to culture.

The way the HRC deals on the merits with the question whether certain developments would result in a denial of the right to culture is also relevant for its use of provisional measures pending the proceedings. Accepting that the cumulative effect of certain (industrial) developments may be an infringement of the right to culture, raises the question at what moment this infringement is triggered. The evidentiary requirements depend in part on the Committee's answer to questions such as whether only the extent of the measures or also the specific area that is at risk determines the risk of irreparable harm (i.e. the quantitative versus qualitative approach), and whether only the collective right is examined or also the individual right to culture. When a qualitative and individual rights approach is taken, risk of irreparable harm is assumed sooner than when a quantitative and collective approach is taken. In this respect the choice of evidentiary requirements appears based also on the importance attached to the right.³⁴³

Either the contested measures encroach upon the culture of an indigenous people so much that its survival is at stake or they encroach upon it to a lesser extent. In the first situation this would warrant provisional measures pending the proceedings and, in case of an eventual finding of a violation, a precise indication about the expected form of reparation. In the latter case, however, there may still be a violation (although the HRC has not yet found so), but provisional measures are simply not warranted and an appropriate form of financial compensation or, if possible, a return to the previous situation might be sufficient.³⁴⁴

3.2.8 Nuclear tests and assessment of risk

In Bordes and Temeharo v. France (1996) the petitioners claimed that the authorities had not been able to show that the underground nuclear tests did not constitute a danger to the health of the inhabitants of the South Pacific and to the environment.³⁴⁵ They requested the HRC to use ³⁴¹ Without the French declaration the HRC would likely have found a violation of Article 27 in Hopu. This would have been an example of a finding of a qualitative rather than quantitative encroachment of the right to culture.

³⁴² Again see the discussion on the substantive issue of irreparable harm in Chapter X and Conclusion Part II.

³⁴³ On preventing irreparable harm to cultural survival see Chapter X (Culture) and Conclusion Part II.

³⁴⁴ In general on the relation to reparation see Chapter XIII (Protection).

³⁴⁵ HRC Vaihere Bordes and John Temeharo v. France, 22 July 1996. See also Chapter XII (Other situations). Between September 1995 and early 1996 the French authorities carried out six underground nuclear tests. The State provided a detailed description of the geology of Mururoa provisional measures and ask France ‘not to carry out any nuclear tests until an independent international commission had found that the tests were indeed without risks and did not violate any of the rights protected under the Covenant’.³⁴⁶ Without calling it such, this seems an appeal to the HRC to take into account the precautionary principle in its use of provisional measures.³⁴⁷ The HRC decided not to grant the protection requested.³⁴⁸ Subsequently it declared the case inadmissible because it was not satisfied that the petitioners could claim to be victims within the meaning of Article 1 OP. About the claim that the tests ‘will further deteriorate the geological structure of the atolls on which the tests are carried out, further fissurate the limestone caps of the atolls, etc., and thereby increase the likelihood of an accident of catastrophic proportions’,³⁴⁹ it noted that ‘this contention is highly controversial even in concerned scientific circles; it is not possible for the Committee to ascertain its validity or correctness’.³⁵⁰ In other words, it did not and of the techniques developed to conduct the tests. Among others, it argued that the level of radioactivity at Mururoa, following earlier underground tests in the 1970s, was now identical to that at other islands and atolls in the South Pacific and less than that measured in, for instance, metropolitan France, where the emissions resulting from the nuclear accident in Chernobyl, Ukraine (1985) were still clearly measurable. About the risk to the food chain it pointed out that ‘all serious scientific studies on the environmental effects of underground nuclear tests have concluded that whatever radioactive elements reach the surface of the lagoon at Mururoa or Fangataufa, are subsequently diluted by the ocean to levels which are perfectly innocuous for the marine fauna and flora and, a fortiori, for human beings’. HRC Vaihere Bordes and John Temeharo v. France, 22 July 1996, §§3.2-3.5. The State also noted that, in the past, it had granted access to the testing area to several independent commissions of inquiry and that the Lawrence Livermore laboratory (California) and the International Laboratory of Marine Radioactivity in Monaco had confirmed that the monitoring of environmental effects had been serious and of high quality, §§3.2-3.5. The State argued that the petitioners should have requested compensation from the competent authorities ‘as the authors essentially invoke the potential risks which the tests entail for the health and the environment’. It is not clear from the State’s submission why a request for compensation should be considered a satisfactory alternative in the face of such potential risks. Finally, it argued that the claim was inadmissible ratione materiae. It considered that Article 6 ICCPR ‘only applies in the event of a real and immediate threat to the right to life, which presents itself with some degree of certainty’. Equally, Article 17 related to a real and effective interference with private or family life and not to ‘the risk of a purely hypothetical interference’, §3.9. Counsel for the petitioners responded that the risk of adverse effects of the tests already carried out since the initial submission to the HRC was real and serious. She deplored the absence of independent investigation into the impact of the tests already concluded and those that were still programmed. She criticised the lack of transparency in the actions of the French authorities and also noted that even the reports invoked by the State party itself contained passages cautioning about the real danger of escape of radioactive particles from the underground shafts, with the consequent contamination of the atmosphere. Counsel further referred to a report by Médecins sans Frontières, from July 1995, criticising the absence of medical supervision of the population of French Polynesia in the aftermath of the earlier nuclear tests, §§4.1-4.2.

³⁴⁶ HRC Vaihere Bordes and John Temeharo v. France, 22 July 1996, §2.3.

³⁴⁷ On the precautionary principle see section 4 of this Chapter.

³⁴⁸ It discussed the issue during both the 54th and the 55th sessions. HRC Vaihere Bordes and John Temeharo v. France, 22 July 1996, §§1-2.3.

³⁴⁹ HRC Vaihere Bordes and John Temeharo v. France, 22 July 1996, §5.6.

³⁵⁰ Ibid.

apply the precautionary principle.³⁵¹ In the European system provisional measures have been refused in similar circumstances.³⁵²

4 THE RELEVANCE OF THE PREVENTIVE AND PRECAUTIONARY APPROACH

4.1 Introduction

With regard to the assessment of risk for the use of provisional measures the human rights adjudicators have not developed clear criteria. Nevertheless, a common denominator seems to be that of ‘prima facie’ evidence. This cannot be defined in the abstract. It depends on the circumstances of the case and the context of the legal system. The question arises whether the discussion on the preventive and precautionary principle or approach in international environmental law (and EU health law) can be of some assistance in this respect. The precautionary principle is not to be confused with the precautionary measures taken by the Inter-American Commission. The latter are simply provisional measures by another name. The preventive and precautionary principles were discussed in Chapter I in the context of the practice of the ICJ and ITLOS.³⁵³

In light of the value attached to what is being protected it may be possible to draw an analogy with the precautionary principle or approach with regard to assessment of risk. The umbrella principle ‘better be safe than sorry’, often referred to in the context of the precautionary approach, is particularly applicable in human rights cases. This warrants a preliminary rather than a full assessment of all available evidence. Yet thus far human rights adjudicators do not seem to have used the precautionary principle in the strict sense.³⁵⁴

³⁵¹ Nevertheless, it wished to reiterate its observation in its General Comment on the right to life that ‘it is evident that the designing, testing, manufacture, possession and deployment of nuclear weapons are among the greatest threats to the right to life which confront mankind today’. Id., §5.9.

³⁵² EComHR Tauira et al. v. France, 4 December 1995 (inadm.).

³⁵³ See Chapter I (ICJ), section 5.3.3.

³⁵⁴ See e.g. the argument of counsel in the aforementioned HRC case involving Sami lands and cultural rights. See also counsel’s invocation of the principle in Brun v. France, 18 October 2006 (inadm.), §3.2. The HRC declared the case inadmissible considering that the petitioner could not be considered a victim as the facts did not show an actual or imminent threat of violation of his right to life and his right to privacy, family and home. See also e.g. ECtHR Balmer-Schafroth et al. v. Switzerland, 27 June 1997. The Court found that the petitioners had not established ‘a direct link between the operating conditions of the power station which were contested by them and their right to protection of their physical integrity, as they failed to show that the operation of Mühleberg power station exposed them personally to a danger that was not only serious but also specific and, above all, imminent. In the absence of such a finding, the effects on the population of the measures which the Federal Council could have ordered to be taken in the instant case therefore remained hypothetical. Consequently, neither the dangers nor the remedies were established with a degree of probability that made the outcome of the proceedings directly decisive within the meaning of the Court’s case-law for the right relied on by the applicants. In the Court’s view, the connection between the Federal Council’s decision and the right invoked by the applicants was too tenuous and remote’, §40. The dissenting opinion by Judge Pettiti, joined by Mr Gölcüklü, Mr Walsh, Mr Russo, Mr Valticos, Mr Lopes Rocha and Mr Jambrek, criticized the Court’s failure to find a violation of Article 6 ECHR. The Opinion noted that the ‘majority appear to have ignored the whole trend of international institutions and public international law towards protecting persons and heritage, as evident in European Union and Council of Europe

As noted in Chapter I the preventive principle applies when a causal relationship can already be established between the act or omission and serious or irreparable harm and when the probability of the risk can be established either quantitatively or qualitatively. The difference with the precautionary principle is that uncontroversial scientific evidence is available. Depending on the value attached to a certain right even evidence of a slight risk could be sufficient to trigger the preventive principle and halt the act or remedy the omission. The preventive approach certainly applies to decisions to take provisional measures in human rights cases if these aim at preventing irreparable harm to persons and the survival of indigenous groups. As discussed in the Conclusion to Part II certain rights are so fundamental that balancing them with other interests is not allowed under the human rights treaties. The evidentiary requirements for triggering a shift in the burden of proof are generally considered to be less strict in relation to risks of irreparable harm to such fundamental rights than in other cases. The preventive principle clearly applies to human rights cases because provisional measures aim to prevent human rights violations rather than redress them. The remark of Judge Treves, in the context of the law of the sea (rather than human rights law), that ‘a precautionary approach seems to me inherent in the very notion of provisional measures’ can be understood in this sense. He noted that it was ‘not by chance that in some languages the very concept of “caution” can be found in the terms used to designate provisional measures: for instance, in Italian, misure cautelari, in Portuguese, medidas cautelares, in Spanish, medidas cautelares or medidas precautorias’.³⁵⁵

This section briefly refers to the relationship between provisional measures and the preventive and precautionary principle or approach. It discusses why the precautionary approach is more relevant in human rights cases than the precautionary principle. It deals with existing criteria for the use of the precautionary principle that could also be useful in the precautionary approach warranted in human rights cases.

4.2 The relationship between provisional measures and the preventive and precautionary approach

Both in environmental law and in human rights law the adjudicator has to assess risks. The adjudicator has to ‘cope with uncertainty’ in the sense that he has to ‘reach decisions even if the available information is not entirely conclusive’.³⁵⁶ The human rights approach, just like the approach under environmental law, emphasises prevention. In human rights cases risk assessment takes place mainly in relation to complaints by petitioners claiming that they run a ‘real risk’ of being ill treated or executed upon expulsion and extradition on the one hand and complaints about irreparable harm to indigenous culture on the other. With regard to non-refoulement it is a question of how a person will be treated by the authorities of a third State in the foreseeable future.

instruments on the environment, the Rio agreements, UNESCO instruments, the development of the precautionary principle [references omitted] and the principle of conservation of the common heritage (...). Where the protection of persons in the context of the environment and installations posing a threat to human safety is concerned, all States must adhere to those principles’. Judge Pettiti concluded that, together with his colleagues in the minority, he ‘would have preferred it to be the judgment of the European Court that caused international law for the protection of the individual to progress in this field by reinforcing the “precautionary principle” and full judicial remedies to protect the rights of individuals against the imprudence of authorities’.

³⁵⁵ Separate opinion of Judge Treves, ITLOS, Southern Bluefin Tuna cases (New Zealand v. Japan; Australia v. Japan), Order of 27 August 1999, §9.

³⁵⁶ Kamminga (1996), p. 171.

This is an area of fact-finding in which an adjudicator may feel more at ease than if the dispute relates to scientific facts.

Some scientific evidence relates to past facts and other to future facts or predictions. With regard to the latter the preventive and precautionary principles may sometimes be relevant. In all cases involving scientific evidence adjudicators have to assess and balance the authority and credibility of the evidence and the independence of the experts.

The precautionary principle as originally developed in the context of environmental law relates to the duty of States to take precautionary measures in the face of risks when scientific evidence is lacking or conflicting. It does not as such refer to the authority of international adjudicators to decide on precautionary measures. Given the difference between the roles of States and adjudicators different criteria may apply for the use of the precautionary principle by States and a precautionary approach taken by adjudicators.

It may be assumed that the use by an adjudicator of the precautionary principle as a rationale for the decision to take provisional measures or as a rationale for finding a violation on the merits is less far reaching than the State's discretion to take precaution based on the precautionary principle.

The principle is more established in the context of preventing serious harm to the environment in the face of scientific uncertainty than in the context of preventing health hazards. Yet if faced with a situation of scientific uncertainty the precautionary principle could be relevant to the adjudicator, whether or not it is dictated by a rule of customary international law.³⁵⁷ It is submitted that an international adjudicator should not be prevented, by lack of full scientific certainty, from imposing provisional measures to halt certain industrial developments threatening cultural survival or to take measures to prevent irreparable harm to persons. Moreover, apart from the direct application of the precautionary principle when deciding on the use of provisional measures, some of the criteria that have been developed for the use of the precautionary principle could also be helpful for the use of provisional measures in situations not involving scientific evidence.

Clearly, a precautionary or preventive approach underlies the use of provisional measures. Yet the precautionary principle (in a strict sense) in my view is not 'inherent in the very notion of provisional measures', at least not in human rights cases. In those cases at the merits stage the criterion applied for establishing future facts normally is that of 'real' risk rather than an 'uncertain', 'hypothetical' or 'negligible' risk. Thus, at the merits stage it is necessary to establish (qualitatively) the likelihood of irreparable harm, meaning that the adjudicators do not apply the precautionary principle in the strictest sense. At that stage the threshold is much higher exactly because of the role of the adjudicator, which is different from that of the State. States may decide to take precautionary measures if there is conclusive evidence of a very small risk to human or plant health only. In the face of a very small risk the international adjudicator is unlikely to find a violation in its decision on the merits. Nevertheless, its lowering of the standard at the provisional measures stage, not requiring conclusive evidence (of a real risk), clearly is based on a precautionary approach.

On the other hand, there are cases in which the precautionary principle could apply as such.³⁵⁸

Counsel, in cases pending before the HRC, has sometimes referred to this principle. They argued that lack of full scientific certainty about (the level of) environmental degradation could not be used as an excuse for allowing exploitation of natural resources.³⁵⁹

³⁵⁷ See Chapter I, section 6.3.3.

³⁵⁸ See e.g. Cançado Trindade (1992) and Kamminga (1996) discussing the responsiveness of human rights mechanisms to risk and uncertainty.

³⁵⁹ See e.g. HRC Jouni E. Länsman et al. v. Finland, 30 October 1996, §9.2.

Disputes of fact in which the precautionary principle could be relevant may relate to health risks, threatening irreparable harm to the right to life. In such cases the dispute could concern medical evidence about the impact on health. They could also relate to environmental risks, threatening cultural survival. The disputes may then concern evidence based on environmental sciences about the risk of environmental degradation. With regard to the next step of showing the impact on cultural rights and the way of life of certain groups this could involve depositions and testimonies by the people involved, e.g. indigenous peoples themselves, possibly reinforced by testimonies by anthropologists etc. about the impact of the level of environmental degradation on the traditional way of life and the possibility to maintain a culturally acceptable livelihood.

It could be argued that in human rights cases dealing with a lack of scientific certainty (normally involving environmental harm) adjudicators could apply the precautionary principle as an argument reinforcing the general principle that irreparable harm to persons must be prevented. After all it may not be possible to show the effects of certain actions or omissions immediately. The actions or omissions may relate to the environment or to long-term health effects.

Given the nature of the risk (to life or cultural survival) and the required level of protection under the human rights treaty, it seems particularly warranted, in the face of scientific uncertainty, to resort to the precautionary principle in the determination of provisional measures. Scientists may make conflicting predictions about the risk of irreparable harm to the environment or to people's health. Apart from the fact that this does not relate to the foreseeable future but to long-term effects, this type of scientific evidence is even more difficult to assess than that of the risk of ill treatment in a third State. In this respect the precautionary principle may be used as an argument to require certain action to be postponed pending full scientific evidence or, instead, to require the State to act to prevent (further) environmental degradation and risk to health. If human rights adjudicators make use of this principle provisional measures are the practical tools for requiring States to postpone certain industrial activities until more scientific information is available to determine the risk to the environment (or to determine health hazards).

4.3 Criteria for the precautionary approach in human rights cases

In the context of WTO and EU law and policy the question has arisen whether, and if so how, the precautionary principle also applies in relation to the safety of food and feed and the protection of consumer health. In this context the European Commission has published a Communication. It considers that the precautionary principle applies not just to protect the environment, but also to protect consumer's health.

As no clear criteria are available as of yet on the use of provisional measures by human rights adjudicators, let alone on the use of the precautionary principle, it may be useful to examine the aforementioned policy document published in the context of the system of the European Union to see whether some of the criteria for the use of the precautionary principle mentioned could be relevant in the context of human rights adjudication as well. After all, the rationale for both is a precautionary approach. As discussed, the precautionary principle itself does not necessarily apply in the context of human rights adjudication, but the reasons for the use of the precautionary principle and for the use of provisional measures in human rights cases are often similar.³⁶⁰

³⁶⁰ The criteria of the somewhat controversial Commission Communication have been developed specifically in relation to the safety of food and feed. The use of the precautionary principle in this context triggers disputes about protectionism and the impact on import and export. Yet it is one of the few official documents discussing criteria relevant in the application of the precautionary principle. It could be relevant, to some extent, to the discussion of provisional

Even if the European Court of Justice normally simply accepts the State's view that precaution was necessary, the aforementioned Communication does provide some insight in the EU Commission's theoretical approach to the principle. Obviously the criteria are not applicable in exactly the same way in human rights cases. First of all protectionism is not a central issue here. Different from the situation in which States invoke the precautionary principle against import of goods, in human rights cases there is little risk that recourse to the precautionary principle by petitioners (and ultimately the adjudicator) is a disguised form of protectionism. In these cases individuals invoke it against a State to prevent human rights violations that could cause irreparable harm to life or cultural survival.

Moreover, the main criterion for the use of provisional measures is stricter than that often used for recourse to the precautionary principle. The latter principle is invoked in the face of scientific uncertainty about serious or long lasting damage. Provisional measures in human rights cases normally aim to prevent irreparable harm only, rather than all serious or long lasting damage. On the other hand, provisional measures are also used in cases where there is no scientific uncertainty, constituting a range of cases that is much more extensive than that in which the precautionary principle applies.

Despite the differences, in situations involving the uses of the precautionary principle, issues often arise that could be relevant in the discussion on the use of provisional measures as well. Indeed some of the criteria the European Commission mentions in its Communication also have relevance in decision-making on provisional measures in human rights cases.

These are the criteria suggested by the Commission: measures based on the precautionary principle should, among others, be 'proportional to the chosen level of protection'; non-discriminatory; 'consistent with similar measures already taken'; 'based on an examination of the potential benefits and costs of action or lack of action'; 'subject to review in the light of new scientific data' and 'capable of assigning responsibility for producing the scientific evidence necessary for a more comprehensive risk assessment'.³⁶¹

In a precautionary approach State decisions for the protection of health or the environment normally are not based on such risks alone but also on other risks that must be balanced. Balancing also takes place with regard to the advantages and disadvantages of 'taking the risk'. These advantages and disadvantages are related to social values and often also to legal obligations. In such cases an essential step to take is to assess whether there is a hierarchy in values and legal obligations. In relation to rights of such a fundamental nature as the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment the level of uncertainty of the risk may be quite high while still justifying the use of provisional measures. Moreover, with regard to those rights, balancing with other interests is inappropriate.

Equally, one could argue that if indigenous peoples can make credible that serious harm to the environment would cause irreparable harm to their cultural survival, the level of protection measures in human rights adjudication. In its Communication the European Commission noted that the decision to invoke the precautionary principle is 'a decision exercised where scientific information is insufficient, inconclusive or uncertain and where there are indications that the possible effects on the environment, or human, animal or plant health may be potentially dangerous and inconsistent with the chosen level of protection'.³⁶⁰ The Communication provides some criteria, but stresses that 'it is for the decision-makers and ultimately the courts to flesh out the principle'. Commission of the European Communities, Communication from the Commission on the precautionary principle, 2 February 2000, COM (2000) 1, p. 10.

³⁶¹ Commission of the European Communities, Communication from the Commission on the precautionary principle, 2 February 2000, COM (2000) 1, pp. 18-20. For a commentary on these criteria see e.g. Wibisana (2008), discussing as questionable the distinction made between scientific risk assessment and non-scientific risk management, pp. 126-130.

required by the human rights treaties does not allow for balancing with other interests.³⁶² The chosen level of protection should necessarily be higher in human rights cases involving a real risk of irreparable harm to persons (including harm to cultural survival). Hence, while in these cases the proportionality criterion does apply as well, it applies in an adapted manner. The criterion would be as follows: provisional measures (including those taken on the basis of the precautionary principle) should not accomplish more than necessary to prevent the irreparable harm. In other words while the obligation to prevent irreparable harm to persons comes first the adjudicator must allow the addressee State to implement its obligations in a way that is least invasive to its other vital interests.³⁶³

Consideration of the potential benefits and costs of action or lack of action could be relevant for determining the type of measure required, for instance, a positive or a negative obligation.³⁶⁴ Moreover, provisional measures should be consistent with similar measures already taken in order to increase their credibility and avoid discriminatory application vis-à-vis beneficiaries and addressees. Comparable situations should be treated similarly and different situations should be treated differently.³⁶⁵

Inequality of arms or lack of scientific evidence may warrant a shift in the burden both on the merits and at the provisional measures stage. The provisional measures by the various human rights adjudicators have always been subject to review and clearly such review should also take into account relevant new scientific data. This could result in a withdrawal of provisional measures. Yet it is proposed that in human rights cases the general rule should be that very early in the proceedings the State proposing to allow a certain (industrial) development has the burden to prove that this would not cause irreparable harm to the cultural survival of indigenous groups. This rule would then also apply in the face of scientific uncertainty. In other words, different from the general rule applied by human rights adjudicators that on the merits the likelihood of irreparable harm must be established, in human rights cases involving the environment (mainly in relation to cultural survival, but also with regard to health risks) the precautionary principle should apply.

According to its Communication the Commission noted that 'the appropriate response in a given situation' is 'the result of a political decision, a function of the risk level that is "acceptable" to the society on which the risk is imposed'.³⁶⁶ To a certain extent the acceptable level of risk in human rights cases is determined already through adherence to human rights treaties. The adjudicators monitoring the compliance of States with their obligations under these treaties have the responsibility to decide whether or not to use provisional measures and whether or not to be guided by the precautionary principle. Nonetheless, the European Commission's emphasis on the level 'acceptable' to 'the society on which the risk is imposed' may be relevant in human rights adjudication as well to the extent that the subjective element, the views of indigenous peoples themselves on the risk to their cultural survival, should be included as a factor in an adjudicator's decision to invoke the precautionary principle.³⁶⁷

³⁶² See Conclusion Part II of this book, discussing the issue of cultural survival.

³⁶³ See also Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4.2 on the rights of the addressee of provisional measures.

³⁶⁴ See Chapter XIII (Protection).

³⁶⁵ See also Chapter II, section 8.2 on publication and motivation of provisional measures.

³⁶⁶ Commission of the European Communities, Communication from the Commission on the precautionary principle, 2 February 2000, COM (2000) 1, p. 16.

³⁶⁷ See also Chapter X (Culture) and Chapter XIII (Protection).

5 CONCLUSION

5.1 Assessment of temporal urgency

Before human right adjudicators decide to use provisional measures they generally determine whether the material risk is imminent. For the most part this approach is similar to that of the ICJ. If there is no immediate risk a provisional measure is premature.

In certain death penalty cases an exception has been made to the requirement of immediacy. With regard to some States the adjudicator may have the experience that once a person has been sentenced to death an execution follows soon after exhaustion of domestic remedies. In such cases the promptness requirement is more important than the requirement that a provisional measure is not taken prematurely. This applies similarly to deportation cases. Yet adjudicators sometimes have used provisional measures in death penalty case with no imminent risk of execution, maybe simply to express moral condemnation or because provisional measures are automatically used in all death penalty cases, which generally involve imminent execution dates.

Some adjudicators have also indicated, and this is a useful development given the risk of irreparable harm to persons, that once the State has been informed of a submission involving irreparable harm to life or physical integrity it must refrain from acting to cause such harm even when the adjudicator has not yet had a chance to use provisional measures.

5.2 Assessment of risk

5.2.1 Introduction

While the practice of the adjudicators examined for this book is not straightforward it does appear that on the merits they all use the standard of ‘real risk’. For purposes of admissibility many adjudicators look at prima facie evidence ratione materiae.

At the provisional measures stage, however, there must simply be prima facie evidence with regard to that part of the claim involving a risk of irreparable harm to persons. The term prima facie must be interpreted in light of the urgency of the situation. At the admissibility stage the adjudicator should not already determine whether there is sufficient evidence to find a violation. He can declare the case inadmissible if there is clearly a lack of substantiation and evidence of inadmissibility ratione materiae. Because there is no particular urgency involved at this stage, the requirement of prima facie evidence is stricter than at the stage of provisional measures. At the admissibility stage there must be sufficient evidence at first sight (prima facie). At the provisional measures stage there must be sufficient evidence at first – and urgent – glimpse. Hence, at the stage of provisional measures the addressee State may already be ‘required to answer’, by urgently preventing irreparable harm, at a lower level of prima facie evidence (prima prima facie).

Given the purpose of provisional measures, discussed in the Conclusion to Part II, the risk claimed must be shown to relate to irreparable harm to persons or to indigenous culture. This means that there is no need to assess the evidence in relation to claims involving other rights. At this stage only the aspects of the claim relating to irreparable harm need to be substantiated, not other parts of the claim unrelated to such harm. If the main claim relates to irreparable harm to persons, this claim must be sufficiently substantiated for purposes of provisional measures. If the alleged risk of irreparable harm to persons is collateral to the claim it is not necessary to substantiate the main claim for purposes of provisional measures. It is only necessary to provide information on the risk of irreparable harm to life or personal integrity. If at the admissibility stage the beneficiary is still in need of protection, next to the evidence for purposes of admissibility, the petitioner should again show prima facie evidence of irreparable harm in order to convince the adjudicator to maintain provisional measures.

For each human rights system it is important to determine whether the adjudicator is limited to using evidence submitted by the parties or, on the other hand, has wide fact-finding powers. Nevertheless, whatever these powers, the rule of the burden of persuasion always applies.³⁶⁸ As in general international law, in the field of human rights legal presumptions may cause a shift in this burden. One source of a legal presumption is the principle of effective human rights protection, taking into account that the consequences of a finding normally are more far reaching for the individual petitioner than for the respondent State. Another applicable principle is that of equality of arms and the need to take into account the difficulty for the individual petitioner of obtaining and presenting direct evidence of human rights violations by the State. This principle is related to the duty (of both parties) to cooperate with the adjudicator during the proceedings. Finally the principle of preventing irreparable harm to persons applies, as well as the related precautionary principle (in case of conflicting or insufficient scientific evidence) on environmental degradation. These principles combined may not only cause an early shift of the burden on the merits,³⁶⁹ but may also justify, at the provisional measures stage, a rather low standard of proof to be met by the person requesting such measures of protection against irreparable harm.

States have sometimes argued that rights and interests should be balanced, invoking principles such as ‘balance of convenience’. However, this principle should apply in relations between equal parties and is therefore more suitable to be applied in proceedings not involving a threat to the very existence of a person or to indigenous peoples.

5.2.2 Assessment of risk: right to life and prohibition of torture and cruel treatment

While domestic systems may choose to apply the preventive or protective principle any time there is sufficient evidence to establish some risk (even if negligible), this is not the case for international adjudicators dealing with expulsion and extradition cases. Given the fact that no adjudicator grants all requests for provisional measures by all petitioners claiming a real risk of irreparable harm, it is assumed that the likelihood of the risk must be determined at least to some extent. In fact the criterion most often surfacing is that of ‘real risk’. Because provisional measures are only used in very serious situations involving threats of irreparable harm to persons and because quick decision-making is required, it would be sufficient if petitioners were to make a credible case of the possibility of such harm. In this respect prima facie evidence of a real risk means a quick assessment of the then available evidence, at face value, finding indications of such a real risk. At the merits stage the adjudicator could then determine whether the risk was indeed real.

³⁶⁸ Kokott (1998), pp. 155-156.

³⁶⁹ See e.g. ICJ Corfu Channel case (Albania v. UK), 9 April 1949; HRC Bleier v. Uruguay, 29 March 1982, §13.3 and ECtHR Salman v. Turkey, Judgment of 27 June 2000, §100 (noting that the Court has generally applied the standard of proof ‘beyond reasonable doubt’, referring to Ireland v. UK, 18 January 1978, §161 but that ‘such proof may follow from the coexistence of sufficiently strong, clear and concordant inferences or of similar un rebutted presumptions of fact’. It then specifically addressed the monopoly by the State: “Where the events of an issue lie wholly, or in large part, within the exclusive knowledge of the authorities, as in the case of persons within their control in custody, strong presumptions of fact will arise in respect of injuries and death occurring during such detention. Indeed, the burden of proof may be regarded as resting on the authorities to provide a satisfactory and convincing explanation”); see also Avşar v. Turkey, Judgment of 10 July 2001, §392 repeating the second part of the statement, relating to the monopoly of information by the State.

If the likelihood of the risk is already clearly negligible at the provisional measures stage or cannot be determined at all, provisional measures are not used. The latter situation, in which the probability cannot be determined at all or only at a very low level shows that, while the preventive principle does apply to some extent, the precautionary principle does not.

As noted, it is possible that the standard in relation to past facts differs from that in relation to future facts. Provisional measures only relate to ongoing situations and future facts and the risk of irreparable harm. Nevertheless, often proof of past facts (torture, ill treatment and threats) plays a role in establishing risk. This may relate to risks in the addressee State itself, such as disappearance, death threats and harassment or ill-treatment in detention. Often there is concrete evidence in such cases. For instance, in detention situations medical evidence may be important.

Claims based on the principle of non-refoulement may require a different type of evidence. Human rights adjudicators that have dealt with this issue have referred to 'substantial grounds' of a 'real (and personal) risk'. They have interpreted the requirement of a 'real risk' either strictly (the violation would be a 'necessary and foreseeable consequence' of the extradition or expulsion) or more leniently (the violation would be 'more than a mere possibility').

In expulsion and extradition cases the standard of proof relates to the question of the likelihood of the risk triggering the responsibility of the sending State. On the merits there are several factors most adjudicators have referred to as playing a role in determining whether there is a real risk. First of all, the petitioner should personally be at risk. A clear indication of risk is previous torture or ill treatment of the petitioner in the State to which he would be returned. While not decisive in itself, a consistent pattern of human rights violations in this State is a relevant factor taken into account by most adjudicators to determine personal risk. Harassment of family or friends in the receiving State and political activities by the petitioner either in the receiving State or in the sending State may also play a role. Different from the merits stage, at the stage of provisional measures a consistent pattern of human rights violations in the receiving or the requesting State often is considered sufficient in itself.

The European Court has sometimes attached importance to the fact that the requesting or receiving State has ratified human rights treaties, especially if these include individual complaint proceedings. The argument is that such States must be presumed to be safe and, if not, the returned person could always appeal to an international adjudicator. The other human rights adjudicators do not seem to increase the burden on the petitioner for showing a real risk just because the receiving State is a party to human rights conventions. Their approach is more appropriate given that practice shows that the possibility of individual complaint does not always prevent irreparable harm.³⁷⁰

In the past the Committee against Torture appropriately pointed out that if a petitioner has submitted credible evidence that he has been tortured, inconsistencies and contradictory elements in his submissions claiming a real risk of renewed torture or ill treatment upon return should not immediately result in a negative assessment of the risk. As discussed, however, CAT subsequently took a rather restrictive approach, for an extended period hardly ever finding violations in non-refoulement cases.

While in some cases human rights adjudicators may also take into account the general interest, the text of the treaty provision in question should specifically allow this. In the context of non-refoulement it is important to note that the treaty provisions on the prohibition of torture and ill treatment in the various regional and international treaties do not allow for this, exactly because this prohibition is absolute. In the determination of whether the petitioner runs a real risk of ill treatment or torture the adjudicator should not allow any balancing with other interests. The standard of proof of a real risk should not be heightened for one specific case simply for policy reasons, for instance taking into account the fact that the petitioner is a suspected criminal (or terrorist) and the victims in the requesting State have a right to see him prosecuted there or the sending States wishes to protect its inhabitants.³⁷¹ In relation to the right to life and the prohibition of torture or ill treatment, which have been accorded a higher status in international proceedings, this type of balancing is inappropriate in both the main case and at the stage of provisional measures.³⁷²

³⁷⁰ See e.g. Smeulders/De Vries (2003).

Different from cases involving the impact on the environment and health the evidence relating to a real risk in cases about refoulement does not have to be 'scientific' but can be more traditional. In cases involving scientific evidence if a decision-maker cannot pinpoint the probability of a risk of irreparable harm, in the sense of cause and magnitude, he may still take temporary measures on the basis of the precautionary principle. In human rights cases, on the other hand, adjudicators normally apply the same criteria at both stages (merits and provisional measures), indicating the degree of probability required on the merits. Whatever information is available at the provisional measures stage is quickly examined to determine whether such provisional measures are warranted. The difference between the assessment of risk when deciding about the use of provisional measures and the assessment of the risk at the merits stage is simply a matter of degree in the standard of proof and evaluation.

In short, if in expulsion cases nothing can be said about the risk (negligible, small, real or clear and convincing) at the merits stage, not even qualitatively, no violation will be found. The same is relevant when the risk is considered to be small or negligible. This means that the precautionary principle does not apply. On the merits the question is whether there is a real risk. At the provisional measures stage it is whether there is sufficient indication of such a real risk. At the same time the evidentiary standard should certainly be relaxed in non-refoulement cases. In that sense an analogy with the precautionary approach could be made. At the stage of provisional measures it should not be necessary to already show personal risk, as long as there is persuasive evidence of a consistent pattern of gross human rights violations.

5.2.3 Assessment of risk: irreparable harm to indigenous culture

In one field the precautionary principle should indeed apply: that of indigenous culture. Different from non-refoulement cases, in some other cases, such as those involving the natural habitat, there may be conflicting scientific evidence of risk. The adjudicator should use provisional measures if there is some (non-negligible) indication of risk. Adjudicators should be able to consider the use of provisional measures even if the probability of environmental damage (threatening cultural survival) cannot be determined or if the evidence is conflicting. Cases of threats to cultural survival relate to conflicting scientific evidence (about causality and probability) exactly because of the argument of the risk of harm to the environment. In my view the international adjudicator could then take into account the precautionary principle, at least in its decision on provisional measures.

Thus, if there is uncertainty because of conflicting evidence (some of which is pointing to a real risk) or if there is inconclusive evidence the precautionary approach, as generally understood under international environmental law, could play a role.

³⁷¹ See e.g. ECtHR Chahal v. UK, 15 November 1996 and Saadi v. Italy, 28 February 2008 (Grand Chamber). See further e.g. Smeulers (2002), pp. 130-133 and p. 167; Van den Wyngaert (1990), p. 765; Vermeulen (1989), p. 239 and (1990), p. 331.

³⁷² Also for courts with a general jurisdiction (not limited to human rights), the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment should outweigh other rights or interests. See e.g. Hoge Raad (Dutch Supreme Court) 30 March 1990 RvdW 1990, 76, Nederlandse Jurisprudentie 1991, no. 249 (Short case).

Discussing the case law of the HRC Scheinin has distinguished between a quantitative and strategic approach to infringements on the right to culture. He emphasized the ‘strategic (qualitative) importance of the specific forest lands in question’ (italics in the original). If the adjudicator would only assess the industrial developments on a quantitative scale this would not do full justice to some cases brought by indigenous peoples. Still, the quantitative approach is important as well because it recognises that incremental developments with regard to land use could have the effect of eroding the economic basis for an indigenous community’s ‘traditional or otherwise typical means of livelihood’.³⁷³

The qualitative-quantitative distinction is more generally applicable to cases involving cultural rights, also in the context of regional systems. It could equally be relevant to the use of provisional measures. The assessment of risk is different depending on whether the approach taken is qualitative or quantitative. Applying Scheinin’s distinction between qualitative and quantitative infringements on the right to culture to the concept of provisional measures, it can be established that for both types of infringement prima facie evidence is required of threats to an area of religious or cultural significance, but in a qualitative approach the actual threat may be easier to prove because the moment triggering irreparable harm is easier to pinpoint than it is in an incremental approach.

Establishing the qualitative importance of a certain area (however small) for traditional livelihood would also require specific evidence of the importance of that piece of land to maintain traditional livelihood. In a qualitative approach to irreparable harm an adjudicator would look at the impact of industrial developments on sites of particular cultural importance. This would be less difficult to establish in relation to specific religious or cultural sites or objects than with regard to land and traditional livelihood where it would have to relate, for instance, to specific types of vegetation necessary for maintaining traditional livelihood.

The quantitative approach involves an examination of a progressive encroachment on traditional lands. In other words it involves incremental threats to such a large area that this would equally make impossible cultural survival.³⁷⁴ In that case the questions arise (1) whether the environmental harm would be serious and long lasting³⁷⁵ and (2) at what point one can speak of irreparable harm to indigenous culture and use provisional measures. In other words, at what point do State activities (or does State inaction) trigger irreparability?

The available practice shows that the HRC thus far has not opted for a qualitative approach.³⁷⁶

Even if the situation would be reversible in the long run, it could destroy cultural survival in the meantime. It would be possible to show the impact on the culture of an indigenous group by ³⁷³ Scheinin (2001), pp. 170-171.

³⁷⁴ See also the separate opinion of Judge Treves in ITLOS Southern Bluefin Tuna cases (New Zealand v. Japan, Australia v. Japan), Order for provisional measures of 27 August 1999. In his opinion he discussed incremental threats, which he called the ‘qualitative urgency’ requirement. He considered that this urgency concerned halting ‘a trend towards a collapse of the southern bluefin tuna stock’. He noted: “Each step in such deterioration can be seen as ‘serious harm’ because of its cumulative effects towards the collapse of the stock. There is no controversy that such deterioration has been going on for years. However, as there is scientific uncertainty as to whether the situation of the stock has recently improved, the Tribunal must assess the urgency of the prescription of its measures in the light of prudence and caution”.

³⁷⁵ This is a criterion derived from ITLOS. In my view the criterion is more appropriate than that of irreparable harm to the environment, exactly because the scientific evidence issues trigger the precautionary approach. Only as part of the next step, linking the serious environmental degradation to harm to indigenous culture, the criterion of irreparable harm is applicable again.

³⁷⁶ See the discussion in Chapter X (Culture).

statements of members of the group (and complemented by anthropological expertise). In order to assess the harm to the environment itself, however, scientific evidence about the probability of the risk could play a role.³⁷⁷ In this light it is argued that if there is uncertainty about the risk, there is a lower burden of proof to show a prima facie case before the burden shifts to the State to show that certain industrial developments will not result in irreparable harm to the environment and consequently to indigenous culture.

In the discussion about the precautionary principle reference is often made to risk assessment. In particular there is disagreement about the level of assessment that must have taken place before a decision-maker may invoke the precautionary principle as well as about the level of the risk assessment that must take place following the use of the precautionary principle. The requirements of notification and consultation are important for an appropriate use of the precautionary principle in environmental law, but also in environmental impact assessment by for instance the Inspection Panels instituted by the World Bank. These requirements also appear to have their counterparts in the jurisprudence of human rights adjudicators in relation to indigenous peoples. They may indeed come to play a role in the use of provisional measures.

The distinction between the qualitative and the quantitative approach to infringements on human rights, as discussed by Scheinin, clearly is important in the context of risk assessment. International public authorities not specifically dealing with human rights, such as the European Commission of the EU, seem to have acknowledged that risk assessment may also be based (partially) on qualitative rather than quantitative information.³⁷⁸

It is suggested that in certain circumstances adjudicators could take provisional measures immediately. This would be so if the petitioners of a complaint can show that the exploitation or economic developments are about to take place and could result in irreparable harm and there is some indication that those persons directly affected have not been consulted and/or the State has not performed an environmental impact assessment, taking into account cultural integrity and sustainability. Provisional measures could aim at halting such industrial development until the adjudicator considers that an appropriate environmental impact assessment has taken place, during which the indigenous groups affected have been consulted properly. Inspired by successful national agreements between indigenous peoples and State and provincial authorities on environmental impact assessment, the approach by the HRC may broker better results for the indigenous communities concerned than the approach taken thus far. The adjudicator may then be more informed and its decisions more practically relevant. This approach may be possible even through long-distance paper proceedings, although clearly it would be easier to realise in a regional system making use of on-site visits and hearings.

Of course, if the impact assessment in itself was appropriate but the State ignored any results favourable to the indigenous peoples, this may be a ground for the use of provisional measures as well. Hence, this approach requires a more in-depth analysis of what constitutes appropriate consultation. Without this, the adjudicator would not be able to deal with all cases in which consultation of the indigenous peoples and environmental impact assessments are little more than window dressing.

³⁷⁷ This issue is discussed in section 4.2.2 on the precautionary principle.

³⁷⁸ According to the European Commission the concept of risk assessment in the SPS Agreement 'leaves leeway for interpretation for what could be used as a basis for the precautionary approach'. It considers that the risk assessment on which a temporary measure is based 'may include non-quantifiable data of a factual or qualitative nature and is not uniquely confined to purely quantitative scientific data'. It has noted that the Appellate Body of the WTO had confirmed this in the Growth Hormones case. In this case it 'rejected the panel's initial interpretation that the risk had to be quantitative and had to establish a minimum degree of risk'. Commission of the European Communities, Communication from the Commission on the precautionary principle, 2 February 2000, COM (2000) 1, p. 12.

5.2.4 Conclusion on the assessment of risk at the stage of provisional measures

5.2.4.1 INTRODUCTION

In the practice of the human rights adjudicators there is indeed a link between the importance attached to preventing irreparable harm and the issue of temporal urgency.³⁷⁹ While conceptually a similar link would be expected between the importance attached to preventing irreparable harm on the one hand and assessment of risk on the other, in practice this does not always appear to be the case.

For provisional measures in human rights cases the risk to be prevented generally relates to irreparable harm to the life or physical integrity of persons and the cultural survival of indigenous groups. When the alleged risk is imminent quick action is to be preferred over lengthy deliberation about the existence of such risk. In cases where there is friction between lack of information and urgency, the standard of proof may have to be lowered. Given the overriding importance of protecting the very existence of people(s)³⁸⁰ this applies to the assessment of risk in human rights cases even more than it does to such assessment in other cases.³⁸¹ Yet in practice it seems that the human rights adjudicators sometimes take a rather restrictive approach in their use of provisional measures.

Looking at the specific situations in which provisional measures have been used in human rights cases it is evident that they related to future (or ongoing) facts. Nevertheless the level of evidence available may differ considerably. In some cases of ongoing harm very concrete evidence is available already at the stage of provisional measures to show the risk of irreparable harm. In other cases, involving future harm, the adjudicators have to determine at this stage whether there is a 'real risk'.

In all these cases the factors to be taken into account in the decision on the merits coincide with those relevant for an assessment at the stage of provisional measures. The difference lies in the difficulty of proving future facts. In non-refoulement cases involving claims of a risk to life or physical integrity in the receiving or requesting State if someone would be removed to that State, the facts necessary for a risk assessment are often difficult to obtain and are insufficient in themselves: a combination of those facts is usually required.

At the admissibility stage the standard of evidence to be shown by the petitioner is lower than at the merits stage. Among others, there must be prima facie evidence of admissibility ratione materiae. On the premise that provisional measures may be used in advance of the admissibility declaration the level of evidence required is again lower than that required at the admissibility stage. In other words, the petitioner must be able to show evidence of risk of irreparable harm at very first sight (prima prima facie).

Some examples illustrate the various situations in which petitioners have requested the use of provisional measures. With regard to requests for provisional measures to protect persons whose life is threatened concrete evidence of recent threats and harassment could be provided. In the eventual decision on the merits of claims involving death threats and harassment the evidence that must be provided is similar, but more definitive.

³⁷⁹ For a similar conclusion with regard to jurisdiction and admissibility see Chapter XIV.

³⁸⁰ See Conclusion Part II.

³⁸¹ See Chapter I (ICJ and ITLOS).

A situation in which the adjudicators have to attach great importance to circumstantial evidence is that of enforced disappearances.³⁸² In this case as well the factors taken into account on the merits are equally important in the assessment for the use of provisional measures. With regard to provisional measures, however, the adjudicator will additionally take into account the question whether the alleged disappearance is sufficiently recent to make the use of provisional measures worthwhile.

For provisional measures to put a stop to ongoing ill-treatment or ensure access to medical treatment in detention concrete evidence concerning ill-treatment may be provided as well. Again similar criteria of what has to be proved at the merits stage must be met.³⁸³ In relation to requests for provisional measures to halt corporal punishment or the execution of a death sentence it is even possible to provide very concrete evidence of material risk.³⁸⁴

In contrast, in expulsion or extradition cases the claims of irreparable harm are more uncertain because they deal with future facts. The criterion to be met on the merits is that there is a real risk of such harm. Here the risk assessment for decision-making on provisional measures equally coincides with the assessment of 'real risk' at the merits stage. Specific factors that may be relevant in this respect are the general human rights situation in the receiving State and, if available at the stage of provisional measures, evidence that petitioners have been ill treated in the receiving State, that they belong to a specific (ethnic) group that is being targeted, that they had been politically active (in the opposition) in the receiving State (or had subsequently been vocal about their State of origin in the sending State).

Particularly in urgent cases, all adjudicators should be able to consult and take into account information derived from publicly available reports by authorities such as UN Special Rapporteurs or by reputable NGOs, even when the parties did not provide it.

5.2.4.2 STANDARD OF PROOF AND SHIFTING THE BURDEN

The question arises to what extent evidence of real risk and prima facie evidence of such risk differ or, more generally speaking, whether and how the standard of proof on the merits could be relevant already in the assessment of risk of irreparable harm pending the proceedings.

The contours of the assessment of risk for the use of provisional measures may be sketched in relation to the various stages of decision-making. The strictest requirements can be found exactly in relation to the merits. In relation to admissibility the evidentiary requirements are less strict and in relation to provisional measures to prevent irreparable harm to persons the adjudicator should be very lenient.

In the various situations the type of evidence necessary to show a real risk is similar at the merits and provisional measures stages. Thus the type of evidence required on the merits coincides with that required for provisional measures. It is only the standard of proof that is lower at the stage of provisional measures.

At the provisional measures stage there must be sufficient evidence at first – and urgent – glimpse. Hence, at the stage of provisional measures the respondent may already be 'required to answer', by urgently preventing irreparable harm, at a lower level of prima facie evidence.

A full assessment of the evidence at the merits stage must be stricter than an assessment of risk at the stage of provisional measures. The latter concerns a prima facie assessment only. Moreover, this assessment concerns those claims alone that relate to irreparable harm. Hence, the assessment of the evidence pending the case for the purpose of provisional measures does not prejudice the eventual determination of the case.

³⁸² See Chapter VI.

³⁸³ Probably at the merits stage additional evidentiary criteria must be met as well.

³⁸⁴ Obviously a conviction and execution date equally provide evidence of temporal urgency.

Of course in all situations referred to (disappearances, threats, treatment in detention, expulsion) the State is in a position to cover up or withhold information. In general this warrants a lowering of the standard of proof required for the petitioner before the burden shifts to the State. Yet the question arises whether the issue of burden of proof is relevant already at the provisional measures stage. In this respect there is a difference between the provisional measures that are taken for the first time in a given case and those that are taken subsequently. Initially, when an adjudicator has to decide urgently on the use of provisional measures, this is often on the basis of an urgent evaluation of the credibility and sufficiency of the information provided by the petitioner alone. Yet when the adjudicator takes a provisional measure and subsequently is called upon to confirm, adapt or withdraw this measure, the burden of proof does play a role similar to that at the merits stage. If the State provides information to the effect that the petitioner is not (or no longer) facing irreparable harm, the petitioner wishing a continuation of the provisional measures, must bring evidence to convince the adjudicator that such continuation is necessary despite the information provided by the State.

5.2.4.3 SCRUTINY AND THE PRECAUTIONARY PRINCIPLE

In decisions on the merits the level of scrutiny applied by the adjudicator to the State's act or omission that is claimed to cause irreparable harm depends on the importance accorded to the right. The strictest level of scrutiny applies in the same type of cases, invoking particularly fundamental rights, in which provisional measures may also be warranted. In a similar vein the evidentiary requirements for triggering a shift in the burden of proof from the petitioner to the State are generally considered to be less strict in relation to risks of irreparable harm to such fundamental rights than in other cases.

One source of legal presumption in treaty interpretation is the principle of effective human rights protection, taking into account that the consequences of a finding normally are more far reaching for the individual petitioner than for the respondent State. Of course the principle of preventing irreparable harm to persons applies.³⁸⁵ Moreover, in case of conflicting or insufficient scientific evidence the related precautionary principle is relevant.

It is clear that the premise for using provisional measures in human rights cases is similar to the premise on which both the preventive and the precautionary principle are based: better be safe than sorry in the assessment of the risk involved. Thus, some discussion of these principles was thought necessary to assist the argument about the assessment of risk and the use of provisional measures. Normally adjudicators can simply deal with risks the traditional way, not involving scientific evidence. In expulsion or extradition cases the causality between the removal and irreparable harm in the receiving State is not as difficult to establish as is the causality between certain acts or omissions and harm to the environment. It is in the latter situation that the precautionary principle is applicable.

The precautionary principle (in the strict sense) in my view is not inherent in the very notion of provisional measures, at least not in human rights cases, because in those cases the criterion applied for establishing future facts normally is that of 'real risk'. This shows that it is necessary to establish (qualitatively) the likelihood of irreparable harm, meaning that the adjudicators do not apply the precautionary principle. Indeed, provisional measures are used in a wider range of cases, not just those involving lack of scientific evidence.

³⁸⁵ See Conclusion Part II.

On the other hand, there are cases in which the principle could apply. Scientists may make conflicting predictions about the risk of irreparable harm to the environment or to health. The precautionary principle may be used as an argument to require certain action to be postponed pending full scientific evidence or, instead, to require the State to act to prevent (further) environmental degradation and risk to health. If human rights adjudicators make use of this principle provisional measures are the practical tools for requiring States to postpone certain industrial activities until more scientific information is available to determine the risk to the environment (or to determine health hazards).

Given the nature of the risk (to life or cultural survival) and the required level of protection under the human rights treaty, it seems particularly warranted, in the face of scientific uncertainty, to resort to the precautionary principle in the determination of provisional measures.

An international adjudicator should be able to examine whether a State is using lack of full scientific certainty of harm as a reason for allowing certain industrial developments or for postponing taking measures to prevent irreparable harm to persons. It could be argued that in human rights cases dealing with a lack of scientific certainty (normally involving environmental harm) adjudicators could apply the precautionary principle as an argument reinforcing the general principle that irreparable harm to persons must be prevented even if the effect of certain actions or omissions will not be shown immediately but relate to the environment or long-term health effects. Different from States invoking the precautionary principle against import of goods, in such cases there is no risk that recourse to the precautionary principle by petitioners (and ultimately the adjudicator) is a disguised form of protectionism. In these cases individuals invoke it against a State to prevent human rights violations that could cause irreparable harm to life or cultural survival.

The main criterion for the use of provisional measures is stricter than that often used for recourse to the precautionary principle. The precautionary principle is invoked in the face of scientific uncertainty about serious or long lasting damage, while provisional measures in human rights cases normally aim to prevent immediate and irreparable harm only, rather than all serious or long lasting damage. At the same time, provisional measures clearly are used also in cases where there is no scientific uncertainty, constituting a range of cases that is much more extensive than that in which the precautionary principle applies. Nevertheless, despite the differences, in situations involving the use of the precautionary principle issues often arise that could be relevant in the discussion on the use of provisional measures as well.

With regard to scientific data the general rule should indeed be that the State proposing to allow, for instance, a certain industrial development has the burden to prove that this would not cause irreparable harm to the cultural survival of indigenous groups. This rule would then also apply in the face of scientific uncertainty. In other words, different from the general rule applied by human rights adjudicators that the likelihood of irreparable harm must be established, in human rights cases involving the environment (mainly in relation to cultural survival, but also with regard to health risks) the precautionary principle should apply. This means that the precautionary principle triggers a shift in the burden of proof from the party alleging irreparable harm to the respondent party.

The chosen level of protection, both at the stage of provisional measures and on the merits, should necessarily be higher in human rights cases involving a real risk of irreparable harm to persons (including harm to cultural survival). To a certain extent the acceptable level of risk in human rights cases is determined already through adherence to human rights treaties. The adjudicators monitoring State compliance with their obligations under these treaties have the responsibility to decide whether or not to use provisional measures and whether or not to invoke the precautionary principle.

As discussed the precautionary principle applies only in the context of doubtful scientific evidence. Yet the preventive principle applies in any case. Thus, conceptually one could argue that in the context of preventing irreparable harm to persons the human rights adjudicators should apply the preventive principle very strictly, already in the face of some slight risk of irreparable harm. Yet in practice they have applied the criterion of ‘real risk’ both on the merits and, to some extent, already at the stage of provisional measures. Thus, a hypothetical or slight risk is insufficient. This practice, which has manifested itself most clearly in the context of the case law on non-refoulement, may be explained by the awareness by the adjudicators of the fact that using provisional measures in all cases involving claims of a risk of irreparable harm upon expulsion, would make these measures less exceptional and authoritative in the eyes of the States.

5.2.4.4 RISK AND NON-ANTICIPATION

Provisional measures show that adjudicators believe the matter to be so urgent that measures should be taken, although they have not yet been able to evaluate all the evidence and arguments in relation to the main claim. The adjudicator simply tried to assess, on an urgent basis and when the case was pending, all the information available at that point of the risk of irreparable harm to the person involved.

In my view the requirement that provisional measures must not prejudice the eventual legal determination is related to the assessment of risk.³⁸⁶ If provisional measures are taken this does not mean a violation will eventually be found. This is so exactly because pending the case the adjudicator takes decisions on the basis of urgency, without being able to examine fully the evidence in relation to the main claim.

If the adjudicator did not use provisional measures, eventually it can still find a violation of, for instance, the right to life. If it did use provisional measures it can still declare the case inadmissible or find no violations. With regard to the evidence, in other words, the decision on provisional measures does not predetermine the decision on the merits.³⁸⁷

³⁸⁶ Chapter I discussed the issue of prejudgment and the provisional measures by the ICJ. Chapter II briefly dealt with the approach to this issue by human rights adjudicators.

³⁸⁷ The decision-making on provisional measures, being separate from that on admissibility and merits, has rightly been considered not to be part of the ‘examination’ of the case. See e.g. HRC Weiss v. Austria, 3 April 2003. If the case is discontinued or struck out (depending on the terminology used by the adjudicator) before consideration of admissibility, it is considered not to have been examined. Another international adjudicator may then deal with it also if a State has precluded examination of cases previously ‘examined’ by other international adjudicators. See also Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction and Admissibility).

What is important is that upon final determination the adjudicator is not led by the fact that provisional measures were taken pending the proceedings. After all, a full assessment of the evidence at the merits stage must be stricter than an assessment of risk at the provisional measures stage. The latter concerns a prima facie assessment only. Moreover, this assessment concerns those claims alone that relate to irreparable harm.³⁸⁸ ³⁸⁸ This should also be reflected in the motivation of provisional measures that this book argues for, see e.g. Chapter II (Systems).

CHAPTER XVI

THE LEGAL STATUS OF PROVISIONAL MEASURES IN HUMAN RIGHTS ADJUDICATION

1 INTRODUCTION

In its LaGrand judgment (2001) the ICJ finally determined that its provisional measures were legally binding. While the power to ‘indicate’ them is included in the ICJ Statute, neither the ICJ nor its predecessor, dealing with a similar text, had previously clarified the legal status of these measures. As has been noted, the arguments of ICJ Judges Ajibola and Weeramantry, made years previously,¹ in favour of the binding nature of the measures ordered, were indeed ‘particularly persuasive especially in cases where such orders involve matters of life or death such as preventing genocide or stopping expulsions as such acts will obviously cause irreparable damage to the parties and affect the outcome of the case on the merits’.² Yet in 2001, when the Court finally clarified the legal status of its provisional measures, it noted that they are legally binding in all cases. In other words its provisional measures are obligatory always, not just when they involve matters of life and death.³

While interpreting Article 41 ICJ Statute the ICJ in fact discussed a principle that has been accepted universally.

This chapter deals with the question whether the provisional measures used by human rights adjudicators are legally binding not only when the treaty refers to the authority to use them, but also when the treaty provisions establishing the individual complaint system do not explicitly refer to provisional measures. The latter is the case with regard to the provisional measures by the three regional human rights Commissions, the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) and three of the four UN supervisory bodies that have dealt with individual petitions.

It is only since 2005 that the ECtHR has developed case law recognizing the binding nature of its provisional measures. The other human rights adjudicators had stressed the binding nature of provisional measures already long before 2005.⁴ Yet some States have disputed this. Section 2 deals with the relevant treaty provisions or Rules of Procedure on provisional measures and the development of the case law by the adjudicators with regard to the binding nature of these measures. Section 3 discusses whether principles of treaty interpretation and general principles of law underlie the practice of the adjudicators, related to the awareness by the adjudicators of the irreparable nature of the harm at issue.

¹ In their individual opinions to the Order on Bosnia’s second request for provisional measures in the Genocide Convention case, Order of 13 September 1993. See Chapter I, section 6 on the legal status of provisional measures by the ICJ and ITLOS.

² Garry (2001), p. 406.

³ See Chapter I.

⁴ This is discussed in section 2 of the Chapter.

2 THE PRACTICE OF THE ADJUDICATORS WITH REGARD TO THE LEGAL STATUS OF PROVISIONAL MEASURES

2.1 Introduction

This section discusses the practice developed by the human rights adjudicators with regard to the legal status of provisional measures. Next to arguments that may be specific to the treaty system in question, the adjudicators have used arguments that appear to be based more on general principles of law and interpretation.⁵

Sometimes States have made the argument that provisional measures by the HRC are not legally binding because, in their view, the decisions of the HRC on the merits are not legally binding either. As this book does not concern the legal status of decisions on the merits, it does not analyse this issue in detail, but section 2.2 briefly addresses the argument.⁶

The remainder of the section focuses on the relevant case law involving the legal status of provisional measures, also in the absence of a specific treaty provision on this issue. Section 2.3 refers to the treaties that include a reference to provisional measures and discusses the case law of the Inter-American Court. Section 2.4 deals with the treaty systems in which a reference to provisional measures is found in the Rules of Procedure of the adjudicators, but not explicitly in the treaty text.

In their approach to the legal status of provisional measures do the adjudicators take into account the inequality between the parties and the irreparable nature of the harm faced by the petitioners?

2.2 The legal status of decisions on the merits by the HRC and its relevance to the legal status of the Committee's provisional measures

The UN individual complaint systems have followed the approach of ICERD, the first UN human rights treaty introducing an individual complaint procedure, of referring to decisions on the merits

⁵ This is further discussed in section 3 of the Chapter

⁶ See e.g. HRC Anthony Currie v. Jamaica, 29 March 1994; on 22 June 1995 the State responded to the Committee's Views, informing the Special Rapporteur on the follow-up on Views that it had sent them to the Jamaican Privy Council, which had decided 'that in the circumstances of the case it is unable to make a recommendation for release'. The letter did not mention whether the death sentence would at least be commuted. The State gave its view about the legal status of the Committee's decisions on the merits. "While it is clear that the Protocol does not impose any legal obligation on State Parties to implement the Views of the Committee, the Ministry has always acknowledged that there is a duty to give serious consideration to those Views; accordingly, the Views of the Committee have always been submitted to the Privy Council, which is established by the Jamaican Constitution to make recommendations to the Governor General on the exercise of the prerogative of mercy. The Ministry wishes to assure the Committee of its intention to continue to deal in good faith with the Views of the Committee" (on file with the author). See also Chapter XVII (Official responses). States have made similar arguments with regard to the other UN adjudicators and with regard to the former European Commission, the Inter-American and African Commission, but these are not discussed separately here.

as ‘views’. The status of decisions on the merits by the regional Commissions have not been referred to as ‘judgments’ either.⁷

This section singles out for discussion the complaint system under the ICCPR, as the international human rights system discussing the widest range of rights.

During the drafting process of the HRC’s Rules of Procedure Committee member Ganji (Iran) noted that ‘(a) request for interim measures would constitute very strong action on the part of the Committee, considering that ultimately all the Committee could do in connection with a case was to forward its views to the State and the individual concerned’.⁸

When the ICCPR and the Protocol were codified in 1966, the highest obtainable was a supervisory committee whose decisions would be called ‘Views’.⁹ Nevertheless, given the Commit-

⁷ In this respect a brief reminder with regard to the Inter-American Commission may also be useful, especially relating to its decisions on the merits based on the American Declaration. See Chapter II. The CIDH has invoked the Declaration vis-à-vis OAS member States, who have international obligations under the OAS Charter. Based on Article 20 of the Statute of the Inter-American Commission of Human Rights, approved by the OAS General Assembly in October 1979, this Commission monitors compliance with the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man for those States that have not yet ratified the ACHR. The Inter-American Commission’s competence to take action and examine individual complaints with respect to member States of the OAS that are not party to the ACHR is based on the OAS Charter and on the practice established by the Commission. The General Assembly’s adoption of the Statute of the Commission has confirmed this practice. In an Advisory Opinion of 1989, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights has held that the American Declaration has become a source of international obligations for all member States of the OAS. See IACHR Advisory Opinion OC-10/89, Interpretation of the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man within the Framework of Article 64 of the American Convention of Human Rights, 14 July 1989, Ser. A. No. 10 (1989), §§35-45. See also Separate Opinion Cançado Trindade in Blake v. Guatemala, judgment of 24 January 1998, §§35 and 36 and, for instance, CIDH Maya indigenous Communities v. Belize (2004), 12 October 2004, in which the CIDH specified that all OAS members have obligations under the Declaration and are answerable the Commission independent of their ratification of the ACHR. See also e.g. CIDH James Terry Roach and Jay Pinkerton v. US, 22 September 1987, §§46-49 and Mary and Carrie Dann v. US, 27 December 2002, §96. See further Tittmore (2006), pp. 382-283.

⁸ HRC Summary records of the meetings of the first session, 13th meeting, 29 March 1977 and 17th meeting, 31 March 1977, Yearbook of the HRC 1977-1978, Vol. I, CCPR/1 pp. 44-46 and p. 54.

⁹ Article 5 OP stipulates, among others, that the HRC shall consider communications in the light of all written information made available to it by the parties, after the individual has exhausted the available domestic remedies. Article 5(4) provides that it ‘shall forward its views to the State Party concerned and to the individual’. Originally these Views were not intended to be binding. The Committee itself initially appeared to take this approach until 1988. It seems the majority of the Committee agreed with, or did not notice the statement in the Report that its ‘decisions on the merits are non-binding recommendations’, Annual Report 1988, A/43/40, 28 September 1988, §645. This old approach towards the function of the HRC and the status of its decisions seems to have found its way even in the third publication of its Selected Decisions (2002). Whole paragraphs of the introduction have been copied from earlier versions. Of course this third volume only covers the period between July 1988 and July 1990. HRC Selected Decisions of the Human Rights Committee under the Optional Protocol, Volume 3 (July 1988-July 1990), CCPR/C/OP/3, p. 8. In 1993 the HRC noted that ‘the absence of an explicit provision in the Optional Protocol on enforcement may be considered a major shortcoming in the implementation machinery established by the Covenant’. In this context it still noted that its Views were ‘in the nature of recommendations on the basis of which States parties should endeavour to settle the tee's function and the developments since 1966, its Views have acquired legal authority and, and to some extent can now be regarded as legally binding. Indeed, it is evident from the Committee's practice with regard to follow-up that it expects its Views to be complied with.¹⁰ Also interesting case in question'. It did point out that States adhere to the OP on a voluntary basis and that 'it is reasonably assumed that they would accept and implement the Committee's recommendations'. Report of the HRC to the General Assembly, A/48/40 (Part I), 7 October 1993, Annex X 'Documents submitted to the Human Rights Committee on the World Conference on Human Rights' under B (Follow-up on Views), §2. Various scholars have taken this approach as well. See e.g. McGoldrick (1994), pp. 202-204 and Tomuschat (2003), p. 181. Naldi considers that the Views 'do not formally have the binding force of a ruling of a court of law but rather a persuasive quasi-legal authority'. Yet he adds that 'an expectation of compliance' nevertheless appears to 'have been engendered where the Committee finds a violation of the Covenant'. Naldi (2004), p. 446. Moreover, it has been argued that the 'opinions on the merits by the treaty bodies are increasingly considered as authoritative expressions and interpretations of the law and accordingly complied with by the large majority of States Parties'. Thus these opinions may assume 'the nature of binding decisions'. 'This also applies to the measures States Parties are expected to take as a matter of good faith cooperation in the framework of the treaty protection system'. Van Boven (1995), p. 97. See also e.g. Boerefijn (1999b) and Castan/Joseph/Schultz (2004). In its General Comment 33 (2008) the Committee itself appears rather cautious when it comes down to describing its function, but it does stress the obligations of States to comply. "While the function of the Human Rights Committee in considering individual communications is not, as such, that of a judicial body, the views issued by the Committee under the Optional Protocol exhibit some important characteristics of a judicial decision. They are arrived at in a judicial spirit, including the impartiality and independence of Committee members, the considered interpretation of the language of the Covenant, and the determinative character of the decisions". HRC General Comment 33, CCPR/C/GC/33, 5 November 2008 (Advance unedited version), §11. The Committee's views are an authoritative determination of the State's obligations under the OP and the Covenant and they 'derive their character, and the importance which attaches to them, from the integral role of the Committee under both the Covenant and the Optional Protocol', §13. The character of the Committee's views 'is further determined by the obligation of States parties to act in good faith, both in their participation in the procedures under the Optional Protocol and in relation to the Covenant itself. A duty to cooperate with the Committee arises from an application of the principle of good faith to the observance of all treaty obligations', §15. On the legal status of the findings of the African Commission see e.g. Viljoen/Louw (2004), pp. 1-22; Gumede (2003), pp. 142-143.

¹⁰ On follow-up to provisional measures see Chapter XVIII. Since 1990 the HRC requests the State, as part of its decision on the merits, to inform it of what action it has taken with regard to the Committee's finding of a violation. It points out that States that have ratified the OP have recognised the competence of the HRC to determine whether or not there has been a violation of the ICCPR. Moreover, under Article 2 ICCPR States have 'undertaken to ensure' to all individuals within their territory and subject to the jurisdiction the rights recognised in the Covenant. They have undertaken to provide an effective and enforceable remedy in case a violation has been established. See e.g. HRC Roger Judge v. Canada, 5 August 2003. Its wish to receive, within 90 days, information about the measures taken to give effect to its Views equally indicates that the HRC now takes the approach that States are bound to respect its decisions on the merits. It was in 1990 that the HRC created the mandate of a Special Rapporteur for follow-up on Views to monitor the compliance of States parties with its Views. See A/45/40, Vol. II, Annex XI. See also De Zayas (1991) and Schmidt (1992). The HRC further amended its guidelines for the preparation of State party reports under Article 40 ICCPR. In these reports States should provide information on follow-up as well. This information should be provided in addition to the responses as part of the follow-up procedure itself. See Consolidated Guidelines in the context of its authority to use provisional measures, the HRC has referred to the statement by the International Court of Justice 'that even in the absence of specific enabling powers, an international instance, may act in ways not specifically forbidden, so as to ensure the attainment of its purposes'.¹¹

The HRC is not a court, but rather a Committee supervising the ICCPR. Yet States parties are bound to respect the treaties they ratify, in this case the OP and the ICCPR. Despite the misleading name ('Views') given to its decisions at the time, in practice they concern judicial decisions determining a legal conflict, by a competent and independent body of experts.¹² for State Reports under the ICCPR, adopted July 1999 and amended October 2000, CCPR/C/66/GUI/Rev. 2, 26 February 2001, Guideline F1. See CCPR/C/5/Rev. 2, 28 April 1995, §5 for the earlier document, with amendments of July 1990, July 1991 and April 1995 (found on <www.pch.gc.ca>, consulted on 21 October 2004). More closely on follow up see Boerefijn (1999), pp. 101-112 and Ghandhi (1998), pp. 343-353.

¹¹ ICJ Certain Expenses (of the United Nations), Advisory Opinion of 20 July 1962, pp. 150-167 as referred to in Report of the HRC to the General Assembly, A/48/40 (Part I), 7 October 1993, Annex X 'Documents submitted to the Human Rights Committee on the World Conference on Human Rights' under B (Follow-up on Views), §5. During the spring session of 1993 the HRC decided that the information on its follow-up activities 'should in principle be made public', in the interest of the victims and because this could 'serve to enhance the authority of the Views and provide an incentive for States parties to implement them'. For the decision to make the follow-up activities public see CCPR/C/SR.1227/Add. 1. In April 1993 the Chairpersons of the UN human rights treaty bodies also proposed that 'views and recommendations expressed by the treaty bodies in relation to individual communications should be fully respected'. A/CONF.157/PC/62/Add.15, p. 8. The Committee noted that another desirable step would be to call upon States to accept the decisions of the treaty bodies on the merits as binding. It proposed a new paragraph to be added to Article 5 OP to the effect that 'States Parties undertake to comply with the Committee's Views under the Optional Protocol', see Report of the HRC to the General Assembly, A/48/40 (Part I), 7 October 1993, Annex X 'Documents submitted to the Human Rights Committee on the World Conference on Human Rights' under B (Follow-up on Views), §15. It also suggested to give the Special Rapporteurs on the follow-up of Views a fact-finding mandate (§16), to effectively utilise the tool of publicity (it noted that this could be done by including a chapter on follow-up in the Annual Reports of the respective Committees, §17, but did not mention press releases). Moreover, it suggested to extend some form of technical assistance (§18) and, finally, emphasised that the implementation of the follow-up mandate required 'appropriate human and material resources' (§19). In 1994 the Committee adopted a new Rule to its Rules of Procedure to the effect that the Special Rapporteur may 'make such contacts and take such action as appropriate for the due performance of the follow-up mandate'. It also decided to give publicity to its follow-up activities rather than deal with it confidentially, as it had done previously. Since that time it includes a discussion of follow-up activities and lists States that have not provided follow-up information. See also Klerk (2000), pp. 149-159. See Rule 101 for the HRC Special Rapporteur on Follow-up on Views. Since 2002 CAT also has a Rapporteur for Follow-up of decisions on complaints (Rule 114). See also CAT's Rule 112(5). See further CERD Rule 95, of 15 August 2005, §§6-7. The Rules of Procedure of CEDAW provide for the possibility of instituting a special rapporteur or working group (Rule 73), but currently the Committee appoints members each session in order to follow up specific Views.

¹² See also Harrington (2003), p. 65 noting that because of the personal standing of its members 'and their judicial qualities of impartiality, objectivity and restraint' the decisions of the HRC 'acquire persuasive authority'. The HRC decides cases 'in an adjudicative fashion, providing both the state and the individual complainant with an opportunity to fully present their case' and 'later makes a reasoned ruling on the issues in the complaint'. While she considers that the

Such individual complaint procedure, as recognised by the State, must indeed serve a function. Considering the Committee's Views as mere exhortatory remarks would deprive the right of individual complaint of any meaning.¹³ Instead, a State party must comply in good faith with its obligations under the OP and under the ICCPR itself and respect the Committee's decisions.

When domestic courts of States that have ratified the ICCPR are dealing with provisions of this treaty, either because the domestic legal system gives them direct effect or because they inform the meaning of domestic legal concepts, they must take into account the decisions and comments of the HRC as the most authoritative interpretation of ICCPR-law.¹⁴ In addition, State parties to the Optional Protocol have voluntarily recognised the right of individual complaint of everyone under their jurisdiction. By having accepted the individual complaint procedure States have recognised the HRC as the adjudicator in a legal conflict between a State and an individual. The obligation of good faith compliance with this procedure implies that the State is internationally bound to respect the contents of the View. State parties have the legal obligation to implement these Views and to redress the violations found by the Committee.¹⁵ The Committee's Views are legal decisions determining a concrete legal conflict. Indeed the practice of the HRC indicates that it considers States legally bound to respect and implement its Views.¹⁶

Committee's Views 'are not legally binding in the literal sense', she notes that this 'does not mean that they are without legal consequences'. 'If the Committee, as the body competent to do so by the terms of the ICCPR, has found a violation, then under article 2 of the ICCPR the state has a legal obligation to provide an effective remedy for that violation'. The above is not to say that members of the HRC have always shown impartiality, but indeed the HRC is generally well respected.

¹³ In HRC C. v. Australia, 28 October 2002, §7.3 the HRC considered that the complaint of the petitioner was admissible because those administrative remedies that had not been exhausted could 'not be described as ones which would, in terms of the Optional Protocol, be effective. The reason for this was the Committee's observation that any decision of the Common Wealth Ombudsman and the Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission (HREOC) 'would only have had recommendatory rather than binding effect, by which the Executive would, at its discretion, have been free to disregard'. With this statement the HRC also implies that its own decisions under the Optional Protocol are themselves something more than recommendations.

¹⁴ See also e.g. HRC General Comment 33, CCPR/C/GC/33, 5 November 2008 (Advance unedited version), §12.

¹⁵ Under international law, such redress includes the obligation to provide the victim of the violation with an effective remedy. This is also an explicit obligation under the ICCPR, where Article 2(3)(a) provides that each State party undertakes to ensure that any person whose rights or freedoms are violated shall have an effective remedy. See General Comment 31 on the nature of the general legal obligation imposed on States parties to the Covenant (Article 2), 29 March 2004. Moreover, the State party to the OP is under an obligation to ensure that similar violations do not occur in the future. In other words, this is the obligation, under international law, of non-repetition of an act declared to have been in violation of an international rule. See also Chapter XIII (Protection).

¹⁶ As part of its Views finding violations it normally points out that, pursuant to Article 2 ICCPR, the State party has undertaken to ensure to all individuals within its territory or subject to its jurisdiction the rights recognised in the Covenant. The State has undertaken as well to provide an effective and enforceable remedy in case a violation has been established. The HRC also wishes to receive from the State party, within 90 days, information about the measures taken to give effect to the Committee's Views. The Committee also requests the State to publish its Views. See e.g. HRC Rawle Kennedy v. Trinidad and Tobago, 26 March 2002; Silbert Daley v. Jamaica, 31 July 1998, and Anthony McLeod v. Jamaica, 31 March 1998. In relation to cases that were submitted after Jamaica's denunciation of the OP but before this denunciation became effective,

State parties are under an obligation to implement the Views of the Committee, in the sense that they cannot ignore the HRC's determination. At the same time, such violation determined by the Committee creates an entitlement on the part of the victim to an 'effective remedy'. State parties have a certain amount of discretion in deciding the type of reparation or the amount of compensation in cases that do not involve either a continued violation of the Covenant or the threat of a (further) violation of the Covenant.¹⁷

In human rights adjudication the substance of provisional measures, of friendly settlement agreements, of statements regarding the obligations of the State upon a finding of violation and of judgments on reparations often share a remarkable resemblance.¹⁸ This may be explained by the fact that while their function is different, their ultimate aim is the same: preventing irreparable harm to persons.¹⁹

It is submitted that States at minimum have direct obligations based on the Committee's Views when preventing irreparable harm is the aim of the reparation. Even if some other forms of reparation mentioned in the Committee's decisions on the merits are indeed mere suggestions, the obligation to prevent (further) violations, as determined by the Committee, must be respected at minimum.²⁰ Without this one cannot speak of good faith compliance with the treaty. In order to ensure that this irreparable harm to persons does not occur already pending the proceedings respect for provisional measures belongs to the minimum of what is required of States parties having recognised the individual complaint system.²¹ on 23 January 1998, the HRC customarily noted that in accordance with Article 12(2) of the OP Jamaica was subjected to its continuing jurisdiction. The HRC has stressed that its monitoring role is an 'essential element in the design of the Covenant, which is also directed to securing the enjoyment of the rights'. Thus, reservations purporting to evade this role are incompatible with the object and purpose of the ICCPR. "The Committee's role under the Covenant, whether under article 40 or under the Optional Protocols, necessarily entails interpreting the provisions of the Covenant and the development of a jurisprudence. Accordingly, a reservation that rejects the Committee's competence to interpret the requirements of any provisions of the Covenant would also be contrary to the object and purpose of that treaty". See General Comment 24 on reservations to the ICCPR or the Optional Protocols, 4 November 1994, §11. In its General Comment on Article 2 (2004) the HRC pointed out that States parties are required to give effect to the obligations under the ICCPR in good faith, pursuant to 'the principle articulated in' Art. 26 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (VCLT). Equally, under Article 27 VCLT ('may not invoke the provisions of its internal law as justification for its failure to perform a treaty') the obligations of the ICCPR in general and of Art. 2 in particular are binding on every State party as a whole. All branches of Government as well as 'other public or governmental authorities' may be in a position to engage the responsibility of the State party. While it is usually the executive branch that represents the State party internationally, this branch cannot relieve the State from responsibility for actions carried out by other branches of government. The General Comment also reminds States with a federal structure of the terms of Article 50 ICCPR, stipulating that the provisions of this treaty 'shall extend to all parts of federal States without any limitations or exceptions'. HRC General Comment No. 31 on the nature of the general legal obligation imposed on States parties to the Covenant (Article 2), 29 March 2004, §§3-4.

¹⁷ See e.g. HRC Beresford Whyte v. Jamaica, 27 July 1998.

¹⁸ See Chapter XIII (Protection).

¹⁹ See also Conclusion Part II.

²⁰ See Chapter XIII (Protection).

²¹ See also Harrington (2003), arguing that even if Views are not legally binding, provisional measures are. See also Letsas (2003), p. 537. See further Tomuschat (2003), p. 181, referring to the HRC reasoning to the effect that States are bound to comply with its provisional measures as

2.3 Systems referring to provisional measures in the treaty text

2.3.1 Introduction

This section first refers to the relevant treaty texts specifically dealing with provisional measures and then deals with some pertinent case law by the Inter-American Court indicating that this Court would consider its provisional measures binding even without an explicit reference to its authority to use them in the treaty text.²²

2.3.2 The treaty texts on provisional measures

Different from the other – older – international human rights treaties with an active individual complaint system,²³ Article 5 of the OP to the Women's Convention explicitly refers to the power to take provisional measures. Yet the text of this provision still is rather weak, only referring to a 'request that the State party take such interim measures as may be necessary to avoid possible irreparable damage to the victim or victims of the alleged violation'.²⁴ Article 31 of the new International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance²⁵ provides for an optional individual complaint procedure that includes a similar text.²⁶

'indeed sensible'. He notes that it could be argued that its provisional measures could have 'no higher degree of authoritativeness than the final result of a proceeding, which the OP-CCPR classifies as 'views' (Article 5(4), a term which according to general linguistic usage as well as according to current legal terminology designates an act which is not binding', yet on the other hand 'a proceeding which has been instituted and in which the respondent state is obligated to cooperate in good faith, loses its very raison d'être if that state during the course of the proceedings takes measures which settle the matter once and for all, making the subject matter moot'. In this respect he considers that, apart from preserving the alleged rights of the alleged victim, the provisional measures serve to preserve 'in the first place, the integrity of the procedure'. He adds that 'from a teleological viewpoint [the reasoning of the HRC] is persuasive. It is further buttressed by the case law of the ICJ' and, p. 182: 'it should not be overlooked that a powerful argument supporting the argumentation eventually chosen was the concern by the ICJ that legal relief cannot be provided in the form of half-hearted measures. This consideration applies also, and perhaps even a fortiori, to individual complaint procedures. More than states, which generally have other means at their disposal to defend their rights, individuals may be in dire need of a pronouncement of one of the relevant expert bodies in order to preserve the enjoyment of right that allow a life of physical integrity and dignity'.

²² Section 2.3.2 also refers to the treaty texts including a provision on provisional measures, but section 2.3.3 only discusses the case law of the Inter-American Court in this respect, as the other adjudicators have not discussed the issue separately.

²³ See section 2.4 of this Chapter.

²⁴ "1. At any time after the receipt of a communication and before a determination on the merits has been reached, the Committee may transmit to the State Party concerned for its urgent consideration a request that the State Party take such interim measures as may be necessary to avoid possible irreparable damage to the victim or victims of the alleged violation. 2. Where the Committee exercises its discretion under paragraph 1 of the present article, this does not imply a determination on admissibility or on the merits of the communication".

²⁵ Adopted 20 December 2006, not yet entered into force (by December 2008: 71 signatories and one ratification (Albania)).

²⁶ "4. At any time after the receipt of a communication and before a determination on the merits has been reached, the Committee may transmit to the State Party concerned for its urgent consideration a request that the State Party will take such interim measures as may be necessary

The Inter-American and African Courts and the Bosnia Chamber do have the explicit power to order provisional measures. Article 63(2) ACHR deals with provisional measures to prevent irreparable harm to persons:

“In cases of extreme gravity and urgency, and when necessary to avoid irreparable damage to persons, the Court shall adopt such provisional measures as it deems pertinent in the matters it has under consideration. With respect to a case not yet submitted to the Court, it may act at the request of the Commission”.

It appears from the last sentence that the Commission may request the Court to act with respect to a case not yet submitted to the Court.²⁷ Obviously the Commission cannot do this in relation to States that have not ratified the ACHR or States that have ratified the Convention but have not accepted the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court.²⁸

Buergenthal notes that Article 68(1), which in the English text refers to the undertaking to comply with the Court’s judgments, in the other authentic languages refers to the more inclusive term decision and that in fact neither the language nor the legislative history of the Convention is opposed to the conclusion that provisional measures are legally binding. Moreover, and here he points out something that is relevant as well with regard to the other human rights systems, the purpose of Article 63(2) ACHR ‘would appear to require that these decisions be deemed to be obligatory’. Given the function of the provisional measures to apply in exceptional circumstances in order to avoid irreparable harm to persons, and given the fact that the Convention is a human to avoid possible irreparable damage to the victims of the alleged violation. Where the Committee exercises its discretion, this does not imply a determination on admissibility or on the merits of the communication”. One of the innovative aspects of this treaty is that in urgent cases the supervisory Committee to this treaty may address even States parties that have not recognized the individual complaint procedure under Article 31. Article 30 introduces the possibility for the Committee to intervene upon a request ‘by relatives of the disappeared person or their legal representatives, their counsel or any person authorized by them, as well as by any other person having a legitimate interest’ that ‘a disappeared person should be sought and found’. In fact when it considers that a range of procedural requirements is met, it ‘shall request the State Party concerned to provide it with information on the situation of the persons sought, within a time limit set by the Committee’. On the procedural requirements see Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction and admissibility).

²⁷ The Statute of the Commission provides in Article 19 (c) that the Commission shall have the power ‘to request the Inter-American Court of Human Rights to take such provisional measures as it considers appropriate in serious and urgent cases which have not yet been submitted to it for consideration, whenever this becomes necessary to prevent irreparable injury to persons’, Statute of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, approved by Resolution N1 447 taken by the General Assembly of the OAS at its ninth regular session, held in La Paz, Bolivia, October 1997.

²⁸ The last sentence (‘a case not yet submitted’) could also be interpreted to imply that the Commission may only request provisional measures if it will later bring the case before the Court on the merits as well. On the other hand, the inclusion of the word ‘yet’ may also simply distinguish between cases already pending before the Court and those still pending before the Commission, without implying anything more than an assumption that, at a later stage, the latter will be submitted to the Court as well. In any case, the word does not justify lifting a provisional measure when the Commission has not yet submitted a case to the Court within a certain time frame. See also Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction and admissibility) and Chapter XVI (Official responses).

rights treaty, ‘it is difficult to support the proposition that Article 63(2) decisions should not be legally binding’.²⁹

Cançado Trindade refers to the ‘autonomous legal framework of provisional measures of protection’ in which the Inter-American Court’s provisional measures, in light of their conventional force, constitute an autonomous legal remedy.³⁰

Article 27(2) of the Protocol to the African Charter establishing the African Court on Human and Peoples’ Rights provides for this Court’s duty to order provisional measures.³¹ In the text of the Protocol there is no arrangement similar to that in Article 63(2) ACHR whereby the African Commission would request the Court’s provisional measures in cases that can be brought before the Court but at that time are still pending before the Commission.³² Article 35 of the Protocol on the Statute of the African Court of Justice and Human Rights (2008), merging the aforementioned Court with the African Court of Justice, equally includes an explicit power to order provisional measures.

The Bosnia Chamber, finally, active between 1995 and 2003, under Article X (1) of Annex 6 to the Dayton Peace Agreement also had the explicit power to order provisional measures.³³

2.3.3 The case law of the Inter-American Court

In its first order for provisional measures in Velásquez Rodríguez, in 1988, the Inter-American Court referred to Article 63(2) ACHR as the legal basis for its Order, as well as to Article 23(5) of its Rules of Procedure which provides that it may take provisional measures ex officio at any time. In this context the Court also noted the obligation of States Parties under Article 1(1) ACHR to respect and ensure the rights contained in the Convention.

²⁹ Buergenthal (1994), pp. 86-87.

³⁰ See IACHR Matter of the persons imprisoned in the "Dr. Sebastião Martins Silveira" Penitentiary in Araraquara, São Paulo (Brazil), Order of 30 September 2006, individual opinion Judge Cançado Trindade, §§24-25. See also IACHR Matter of Eloísa Barrios et al. (Venezuela), Orders of 25 June 25 and 22 September 2005, Concurring Opinions Judge Cançado Trindade.

³¹ “In cases of extreme gravity and urgency, and when necessary to avoid irreparable harm to persons, the Court shall adopt such provisional measures as it deems necessary”.

³² See Articles 2 and 8 Protocol to the African Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights.

³³ “The Chamber shall have the power to order provisional measures, to appoint experts, and to compel the production of witnesses and evidence”. Article VIII, 2(f) on the jurisdiction of the Chamber stipulates: “Applications which entail requests for provisional measures shall be reviewed as a matter of priority in order to determine (1) whether they should be accepted and, if so (2) whether high priority for the scheduling of proceedings on the provisional measures request is warranted”. See also Article XI (Decisions): “1. Following the conclusion of the proceedings, the Chamber shall promptly issue a decision, which shall address: (a) Whether the facts found indicate a breach by the Party concerned of its obligations under this Agreement; and if so (b) what steps shall be taken by the Party to remedy such breach, including orders to cease and desist, monetary relief (including pecuniary and non-pecuniary injuries), and provisional measures”. And Article XII (Rules and Regulations) “The Chamber shall promulgate such rules and regulations, consistent with this Agreement, as may be necessary to carry out its functions, including provisions for preliminary hearings, expedited decisions on provisional measures, decisions by panels of the Chamber, and review of decisions made by any such panels”. See also Bosnia Chamber Boudellaa, Lakhdar, Nechle and Lahmar v. BiH and Fed. BiH, 11 October 2002, §185 and D.K. v. Republika Srpska, 2 November 1999, §§33-37.

“The States Parties therefore are required to adopt such measures as are necessary to preserve the life and ensure the personal safety of those whose rights might be endangered, or the more so if these threats are linked to their participation in proceeding bearing upon the protection of human rights”.³⁴

With this the Court seems to imply that even without a provision on provisional measures in the Convention, States have the obligation to comply with the Court’s Orders simply on the basis of their human rights obligations in the Convention. As Buergenthal has noted, ‘the Court expressly recognized the existence of inherent powers without, however, spelling them out in any detail’.³⁵

In its next Order in this case the Court again referred to the basis of its authority to Order provisional measures. Here it did not only refer to Articles 63(2) ACHR and 23 of its Rules of Procedure but also to Articles 33 (on the competence of the Commission and Court) and 62(3) ACHR (the Court’s jurisdiction regarding all cases of interpretation and application of the ACHR submitted to it), Articles 1 and 2 of the Court’s Statute (on the nature and jurisdiction of the Court)³⁶ and ‘the judicial character of the Court and the powers derived therefrom’.³⁷

The reference to its judicial character clearly is a more general argument based on the principle that the ability to order provisional measures is simply part of the adjudicatory function.³⁸

In reference to Article 1(1) ACHR the Court has often pointed out the State’s responsibility to adopt security measures to protect everyone under its jurisdiction. In the Peace Community case the State must do so for all members of the Peace Community.³⁹

In their concurring opinion attached to the Court’s first Order in the Peace Community case, two of the Judges pointed out that provisional measures as laid down in Article 63(2) ACHR are a fundamental part of the effective protection (‘tutela’) of human rights.⁴⁰ They referred to Articles 1(1) and 2 ACHR and emphasised the latter’s reference to the duty to adopt other measures nec-

³⁴ IACHR Velásquez Rodríguez, Fairén Garbi/Solís Corrales and Godínez Cruz cases, Order of 15 January 1988, 3rd ‘Whereas’ clause.

³⁵ Buergenthal (1994), p. 83.

³⁶ Article 1 (Nature and Legal Organization): ‘The Inter-American Court of Human Rights is an autonomous judicial institution whose purpose is the application and interpretation of the American Convention on Human Rights. The Court exercises its functions in accordance with the provisions of the aforementioned Convention and the present Statute’. Article 2 (Jurisdiction): ‘The Court shall exercise adjudicatory and advisory jurisdiction: 1. Its adjudicatory jurisdiction shall be governed by the provisions of Articles 61, 62 and 63 of the Convention, and 2. Its advisory jurisdiction shall be governed by the provisions of Article 64 of the Convention’.

³⁷ IACHR Velásquez Rodríguez, Fairén Garbi/Solís Corrales and Godínez Cruz cases Order of 19 January 1988, 1st ‘Considering’ clause.

³⁸ See e.g. Buergenthal (1994), pp. 83-84.

³⁹ The Court continued to note that this duty becomes even more evident with regard to persons involved in proceedings before the supervisory organs of the ACHR. IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order for provisional measures, 24 November 2000, with references to Digna Ochoa y Plácido et al., Order for provisional measures, 17 November 1999; Constitutional Court case, Order for provisional measures, 14 August 2000.

⁴⁰ See IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order for provisional measures, 24 November 2000, Concurring Opinion of Judge Abreu Burelli and García Ramírez. They wrote that, apart from the considerations based on the progressive interpretation of Article 63(2) ACHR, the State had the broad duty in each case to respect the rights and freedoms recognised in the Convention. This duty justified actions on the part of the authorities on the one hand and legitimate expectations of individuals on the other.

essary to give effect to the rights in the Convention. Such measures should include urgent protective measures.⁴¹

The Court's position on state responsibility is that the State is responsible to adopt effective safety measures to protect all the persons who are subject to its jurisdiction and that this obligation is even more evident in relation to those who are involved in proceedings before the supervisory organs of the American Convention.⁴²

In Orders to halt an execution the IACHR considers that 'if the State were to execute the alleged victims, this would lead to an irreparable situation, as well as constitute conduct incompatible with the object and purpose of the Convention'.⁴³

The Court has emphasised that the principles of effectiveness and good faith are also applicable in the implementation of its provisional measures.⁴⁴ In its Orders for provisional measures in James et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago the Court determined that States 'must fully comply in good faith (pacta sunt servanda) with all of the provisions of the Convention, including those relative to the operation of the two supervisory organs of the American Convention; and, that in view of the Convention's fundamental objective of guaranteeing the effective protection of human rights (Articles 1(1), 2, 51 and 63(2)), States Parties must refrain from taking actions that may frustrate the restitutio in integrum of the rights of the alleged victims'.⁴⁵ This provides a rationale for arguing that States are legally bound to respect the precautionary measures of the Commission as well.

The Court has also added to the equation Article 51 ACHR, on the findings and recommendations of the Commission. In its first Order for provisional measures to halt executions, for instance, it pointed out:

"That States Parties must respect the provisions of the American Convention in good faith (pacta sunt servanda), including those that facilitate proceedings before the protective bodies of the Inter-American system and ensure the fulfilment of the goals of those provisions. In view of this, and of the Convention's fundamental objective of guaranteeing the effective protection of ⁴¹ Concurring Opinion of Judge Abreu Burelli and García Ramírez, IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order of 24 November 2000.

⁴² See e.g. IACHR case of Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic, Order for provisional measures, 26 May 2001.

⁴³ See e.g. IACHR James et al. Order of 26 November 2001, 12th 'Considering' clause; Raxcacó et al., 30 August 2004, 9th 'Considering' clause; Boyce and Joseph v. Barbados, 25 November 2004, 9th 'Considering' clause; see also the Court's judgment in this case, 20 November 2007, §113; sometimes the phrasing is somewhat more cautious ('as well as possibly constitute conduct incompatible with the object and purpose of the Convention'), Tyrone Dacosta Cadogan (Barbados), Order of the President of 4 November 2008, 10th 'Considering' clause.

⁴⁴ See e.g. IACHR James et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago, Order of 26 September 2001, 10th 'Considering' clause. It already stated this in early cases, see e.g. Caballero-Delgado and Santana (Colombia), Order of 6 February 2008, 15th 'Considering' clause: "That pursuant to Article 63(2) of the Convention, the State has a duty to adopt such provisional measures as this Court may order, insofar as the basic principle of the International Responsibility of States, supported by international case law, provides that States must fulfill their treaty obligations in good faith (pacta sunt servanda)".

⁴⁵ IACHR James et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago, Order of 21 May 1999, 9th 'Considering' clause. See also Chapter XIII on the relationship with reparation.

human rights (Articles 51 and 63(2)), States Parties must not take any action that will frustrate the restitutio in integrum of the rights of the alleged victims”.⁴⁶

It confirmed this in its later Orders, in which it not only referred to Articles 51 and 63(2) but also to Articles 1(1) and 2, as laying down obligations related to the fundamental objective of guaranteeing the effective protection of human rights.⁴⁷

The Court has also stressed that in light of the obligations under Article 1(1) ACHR, the State is ‘especially bound to guarantee the rights of persons in a risk situation and must advance the investigations necessary to establish the facts and, if it be the case, to punish those responsible’, all of this ‘regardless of the existence of specific provisional measures’.⁴⁸

In the context of provisional measures the Court has drawn attention to Article 68(1) ACHR as well, with the undertaking of the States Parties ‘to comply with the judgment of the Court in any case to which they are parties’.⁴⁹ In addition the Court has referred to Article 29 ACHR providing that no provision shall be interpreted as permitting the suppression of the enjoyment or exercise of the rights recognised in the Convention or their restriction to a greater extent than provided for in the Convention. Following this, the Court would point out:

“That, should the State execute the alleged victims, it would create an irremediable situation and this conduct would be incompatible with the object and purpose of the Convention by disavowing the authority of the Commission and adversely affecting the very essence of the Inter-American system”.⁵⁰

Clearly, the rationale for provisional measures is important to understand their legal status. In this respect the Court’s reference to restitutio in integrum in its death penalty cases is very relevant.⁵¹

In his Concurring Opinion to the Order of 25 May 1999, judge Cançado Trindade noted that considerations of ordre public underlie the ‘exercise of the advisory and contentious functions of the Tribunal in general’, and extend themselves ‘to the provisional measures of protection in particular’. He emphasised that these have a mandatory character: – ‘ordered as they are by an international tribunal like the Inter-American Court’.⁵² In light of his remarks about ordre public and the effective protection of human rights, all provisional measures arguably have a mandatory character, not just those by Courts but also those by the regional Commissions and the Geneva Committees.

⁴⁶ IACHR James, Briggs, Noel, Garcia and Bethel cases, Order for provisional measures, 14 June 1998.

⁴⁷ See e.g. IACHR James et al. cases, Order for provisional measures, 29 August 1998, 25 May 1999, 27 May 1999, 25 September 1999, 16 August 2000, 24 November 2000 and 26 November 2001.

⁴⁸ IACHR Álvarez et al. (Colombia), Order of 8 February 2008.

⁴⁹ IACHR James et al. cases, Order of 16 August 2000 and 24 November 2000.

⁵⁰ IACHR James, Briggs, Noel, Garcia and Bethel cases, Order of 14 June 1998. Similar statements, always in combination with the reference to Article 29, can be found in later Orders, e.g. 19 August 1998, 25 and 27 May and 25 September 1999. The President’s Order for urgent measures of 26 November 2001 refers to Article 29, ‘an irremediable situation’ and ‘incompatible with the object and purpose of the Convention’ but it does not proceed with ‘by disavowing the authority of the Commission and adversely affecting the very essence of the Inter-American system’.

⁵¹ See further Chapter XIII (Protection).

⁵² IACHR James et al. case, Order of 25 May 1999, Concurring Opinion of A.A. Cançado Trindade.

In Boyce and Joseph v. Barbados the Inter-American Court referred to ‘the well-established principles regarding international state responsibility, whereby States are required to comply in good faith with their treaty obligations (pacta sunt servanda)’. In this light ‘urgent measures ordered by the President of this Tribunal by virtue of the provisions of Article 63(2) of the Convention have an obligatory character. Consequently, Barbados is under the obligation to keep this Tribunal informed regarding the actions it has taken to comply with the Order of the President. The provision of such information is essential in order to permit the Court to evaluate the State’s degree of compliance with the said Order’.⁵³

The Court responded to the executions of Anthony Briggs and Joey Ramiah by pointing out that the State had a duty to preserve their life and physical integrity pursuant to its Orders for provisional measures. It referred to Article 68(1) ACHR, which provides that States Parties shall undertake to comply with the Court’s judgment in any case to which they are parties. As usual, it pointed out that States ‘should fully comply in good faith (pacta sunt servanda) with all of the provisions of the Convention, including those relative to the operation of the two supervisory organs of the American Convention’. It also pointed out that ‘in view of the Convention’s fundamental objective of guaranteeing the effective protection of human rights’ (Articles 1(1), 2, 51 and 63(2)) ‘States Parties must refrain from taking actions that may frustrate the restitutio in integrum of the rights of the alleged victims’.⁵⁴ This shows the Court’s view that the power to order legally binding provisional measures simply answers to the fundamental objective of guaranteeing the effective protection of human rights, even irrespective of a specific reference to provisional measures in the treaty itself.

2.4 Systems referring to provisional measures solely in the Rules of Procedure

2.4.1 Introduction

This section first deals with the relevant rules in the Rules of Procedure laid down by the human rights adjudicators adjudicating complaints based on treaties that do not explicitly refer to the authority to use provisional measures. Then it deals with the pertinent case law on the legal status of provisional measures developed by these adjudicators.

⁵³ IACHR Boyce and Joseph v. Barbados, 25 November 2004, §6. In the context of provisional measures ordered vis-à-vis Venezuela, the Court also pointed out that while this State is not a party to the VCLT, the international obligation of pacta sunt servanda is binding on it as a rule of customary international law. With regard to the Court’s provisional measures the addressee States must take all necessary measures to effectively protect the beneficiaries, in conformity with the Court’s instructions. This includes the obligation periodically to inform the Court of the implementation measures taken. IACHR Liliana Ortega et al.; Luisiana Ríos et al.; Luis Uzcátegui; Marta Colomina and Liliana Velásquez (Venezuela), Order of 4 May 2004, 7th ‘Considering’ clause. See also e.g. IACHR Matter of Liliana Ortega et al. (Venezuela), Order of 14 June 2005, 13th ‘Considering’ clause. See further Chapter XVII (Official State responses).

⁵⁴ IACHR James et al. case, Order for provisional measures, 25 September 1999. See also its Orders of 14 June and 29 August 1998, 25 and 27 May 1999, 16 August, 24 November 2000 and 26 November 2001. In the latter the Court noted that States Parties should refrain from taking actions that ‘may cause irreparable harm to persons by reason of the gravity of the possible consequences of said acts’ rather than from actions that ‘may frustrate the restitutio in integrum of the rights of the alleged victims’.

2.4.2 Rules of Procedure on provisional measures

Two of the three UN human rights adjudicators that have used provisional measures have done so on the basis of their own Rules of Procedure. The Optional Protocol establishing the right of individual complaint about violations of the ICCPR, for instance, does not contain a specific reference to provisional measures. Instead, the HRC has included a rule on such measures in its Rules of Procedure. Its current Rule 92 (previously Rule 86) stipulates:

“The Committee may, prior to forwarding its Views on the communication to the State Party concerned, inform that State of its view as to whether provisional measures may be desirable to avoid irreparable damage to the victim of the alleged violation. In doing so, the Committee shall inform the State Party concerned that such expression of its views on provisional measures does not imply a determination on the merits on the communication”.⁵⁵

Tomuschat has pointed out that ‘it is remarkable that the Committee, notwithstanding the difficult political context within which it was working, was eventually able to hammer out an agreed formula by consensus’. He described this political context as follows:

“A school of strict constructionists-mostly members from Eastern European countries-was opposed in that debate to a school of broad constructionists-mainly made up of members from Western Europe-who emphasized the need to take into account object and purpose of the Protocol as an instrument to secure effective procedural protection to individual rights”.⁵⁶

⁵⁵ In 1977, during the deliberations on the Rules of Procedure, Tomuschat (Federal Republic of Germany) noted that it was ‘clear that the power of any group established by the Committee would be limited to making recommendations’. Summary records of the meetings of the first session, 13th meeting, 29 March 1977 and 17th meeting, 31 March 1977, Yearbook of the HRC 1977-1978, Vol. I, CCPR/1 pp. 44-46 and p. 54. Espersen (Denmark) noted ‘it was a commonly accepted notion that bodies had such implied powers as were necessary to enable them to perform their functions in a reasonable manner’. This required a ‘stronger formulation of rule 86’. Thus, he proposed to replace the words ‘request the State Party concerned to take interim measures’ by the words ‘forward to the State Party concerned its views as to whether interim measures might be necessary’. Espersen explained that ‘(s)uch a change would be in conformity with the letter and spirit of the protocol and would ensure that the Committee would have the impact it was intended to have’. It is possible that the other members agreed with this change because the expression ‘forward to the State party concerned its Views as to whether interim measures might be necessary’ is sufficiently vague to be interpreted as both weaker and stronger than the previously proposed term ‘request’. Tomuschat wrote, almost two decades later, that ‘(t)he compromise finally reached consisted in attenuating the language of the Rule, in particular replacing the word ‘request’ by a more flexible phrase attuned to the formulation of Article 5(4)’. Tomuschat (1995), p. 625. The only change the Committee made to this part of the provision, at a later stage, was the replacement of the word ‘necessary’ by the word ‘desirable’, as suggested by Lallah (Mauritius). Summary records of the meetings of the first session, 13th meeting, 29 March 1977 and 17th meeting, 31 March 1977, Yearbook of the HRC 1977-1978, Vol. I, CCPR/1 pp. 44-46 and p. 54.

⁵⁶ Tomuschat (1995), p. 625. Nine Eastern European States were involved in the ICCPR system from the early stages, but none of them had recognised the individual complaint procedure. In 1988 Hungary was the first Eastern European country to ratify the OP. Between 1991 and 2002 more than 20 former communist States became a party to the OP. Four of the first members of the Rule 92 of its Rules of Procedure (previously Rule 86) refers to the HRC's authority to use provisional measures.⁵⁷ Rule 108 of CAT's Rules of Procedure refers to the latter's authority in this respect.⁵⁸

The European Commission on Human Rights was the first international adjudicator that resorted to provisional measures as part of the contentious proceedings pending before it. As discussed in Chapter II, in 1957 the former European Commission used informal provisional measures for the first time, urgently requesting the UK not to execute Nicolaos Sampson until the Commission had been fully informed of the circumstances of the case. The Commission stated it had decided to make this request in order to prevent "any irreparable act".⁵⁹ Yet in two less serious cases, decided in 1958 and 1963, the Commission refused to take provisional measures, considering that the Convention did not give it the competence to order them.⁶⁰ In 1964 it again took HRC nevertheless came from Eastern Europe. Apart from them five members came from Western Europe and Canada, three from Latin America and six from other regions.

⁵⁷ "The Committee may, prior to forwarding its Views on the communication to the State party concerned, inform that State of its Views as to whether interim measures may be desirable to avoid irreparable damage to the victim of the alleged violation. In doing so, the Committee shall inform the State party concerned that such expression of its Views on interim measures does not imply a determination on the merits of the communication".

⁵⁸ "1. At any time after the receipt of a complaint, the Committee, a working group, or the Rapporteur(s) for new complaints and interim measures may transmit to the State party concerned, for its urgent consideration, a request that it take such interim measures as the Committee considers necessary to avoid irreparable damage to the victim or victims of alleged violations. 2. Where the Committee, the Working Group, or Rapporteur(s) request(s) interim measures under this rule, the request shall not imply a determination of the admissibility or the merits of the complaint. The State party shall be so informed upon transmittal. 3. Where a request for interim measures is made by the Working Group or Rapporteur(s) under the present rule, the Working Group or Rapporteur(s) should inform the Committee members of the nature of the request and the complaint to which the request relates at the next regular session of the Committee. 4. The Secretary-General shall maintain a list of such requests for interim measures. 5. The Rapporteur for new complaints and interim measures shall also monitor compliance with the Committee's requests for interim measures". CERD was the first UN treaty body introducing provisional measures in its Rules of Procedure. Its Rule 94(3), which has never been used, is phrased as follows: "In the course of its consideration, the Committee may inform the State party of its views on the desirability, because of urgency, of taking interim measures to avoid possible irreparable damage to the person or persons who claim to be victim(s) of the alleged violation. In doing so, the Committee shall inform the State party concerned that such expression of its views on interim measures does not prejudice either its final opinion on the merits of the communication or its eventual suggestions and recommendation".

⁵⁹ See EComHR Application of the ECHR to the Island of Cyprus (Greece v. United Kingdom), Article 31 report of the Commission, No. 176/56, 26 September 1958, p. 24. This request was respected, see further Chapter III (Executions).

⁶⁰ EComHR X. v. Federal Republic of Germany, 22 March 1958 ("Whereas the Convention does not contain any such obligations binding upon the High Contracting Parties as invoked by the Applicant; whereas, moreover, the Convention does not contain any provision giving the Commission competence to order provisional measures; whereas it therefore appears that the application is in this respect incompatible with the provisions of the Convention; whereas it should, in pursuance of Article 27, paragraph 2, of the Convention, accordingly be rejected") and X. and Y. v. Belgium, 18 December 1963 ('whereas the fact that the Commission is dealing with a case does not have suspensive effect and the Commission is not empowered to order protective measures (see the decision on the admissibility of Application No. 297/57, Volume II, page 213);

informal provisional measures, this time to halt an extradition.⁶¹ Since that time an informal practice developed in which the Commission requested – and obtained – the cooperation of Governments in urgent cases pending before the Commission involving extradition or expulsion. In 1974 the Commission decided to formalize its practice of using provisional measures by including a provision on provisional measures in its Rule 36 of its Rules of Procedure.⁶² In 1982 the Court did as well. Presently the authority to use provisional measures can be found in Rule 39 of the Court's Rules of Procedure.⁶³

As noted, the ACHR explicitly authorizes the Inter-American Court to order provisional measures and it assigns the Inter-American Commission a task in this respect as well. In Article 25 of its Rules of Procedure the Inter-American Commission has introduced a reference to its authority to order its own precautionary measures as well. Vis-à-vis those States that have recognized the Inter-American Court it uses this mechanism when it considers it needs the flexibility of a swift and incremental approach before resorting to the Court. Vis-à-vis those States that have not recognized the Court, or have not even ratified the ACHR, the Commission's precautionary measures are the only mechanism to prevent irreparable harm pending the proceedings before the Commission based on its function of adjudicating petitions under the OAS Charter (as well as under the ACHR for those States that have ratified it, but did not recognize the Court).

The African Charter, finally, does not contain a specific article on provisional measures either. The African Commission has referred to its authority to do so in Rule 111 of its Rules of Procedure.⁶⁴ As noted, the Protocol introducing the African Court does refer to provisional measures.

whereas, far from obliging national courts to wait for the Commission to complete its work before they complete theirs, the Convention, in principle, provides for the opposite solution (Article 26) and assigns a mainly subsidiary role to the collective guarantee machinery set up by it).

⁶¹ EComHR X v. Austria and Yugoslavia, 30 June 1964 (inadm.); provisional measure on 14 February 1964. See also S.B. v. FRG, 19 December 1969 (struck off), provisional measure on 7 January 1965 and 24 April 1965.

⁶² Article 36 ECHR (pre-Protocol 11) stating that the Commission shall draw up its own rules of procedure. It did so on 13 December 1974. In its 1993 Rules of Procedure, Rule 36 was phrased as follows: "The Commission, or when it is not in session, the President may indicate to the parties any interim measure the adoption of which seems desirable in the interest of the parties or the proper conduct of the proceedings before it". Revised version as adopted by the Commission on 12 February and 6 May 1993 and entered into force on 28 June 1993.

⁶³ "1. The Chamber or, where appropriate, its President may, at the request of a party or of any other person concerned, or of its own motion, indicate to the parties any interim measure which it considers should be adopted in the interests of the parties or of the proper conduct of the proceedings before it. 2. Notice of these measures shall be given to the Committee of Ministers. 3. The Chamber may request information from the parties on any matter connected with the implementation of any interim measure it has indicated".

⁶⁴ "1. Before making its final views known to the Assembly on the communication [sic], the Commission may inform the State party concerned of its views on the appropriateness of taking provisional measures to avoid irreparable damage being caused to the victim of the alleged violation. In so doing, the Commission shall inform the State party that the expression on its views on the adoption of those provisional measures does not imply a decision on the substance of the communication. 2. The Commission, or when it is not in session, the Chairman, in consultation with other members of the Commission, may indicate to the parties any interim measure, the adoption of which seems desirable in the interest of the parties or the proper conduct

2.4.3 Pertinent case law on the legal status of provisional measures

2.4.3.1 INTRODUCTION

The adjudicators supervising treaties without an express reference to provisional measures in the treaty text consider respect for these measures as a necessary corollary to the obligations under the treaties.

This section deals with the approaches of the various human rights adjudicators in this respect.

2.4.3.2 HRC ON THE LEGAL STATUS OF ITS PROVISIONAL MEASURES

Some States have argued that the Committee's provisional measures are not legally binding because no such specific reference was made in the text of the OP, because the text of the Rule on provisional measures contains exhortatory language ('desirable') or, as noted, because they consider decisions on the merits to be non-binding as well.

On the other hand, the HRC itself has referred to the obligations under the ICCPR and the OP condemning executions, expulsion and extradition in contravention of its provisional measures. Apart from this it has always emphasised certain obligations of States with regard to the complaint proceedings.⁶⁵ Audiatur et alteram pars includes hearing and informing each party. Procedural equality (Article 14) applies also in cases pending before the HRC under the OP and not only in domestic cases. Lack of procedural equality may be said to cause irreparable harm to the proceedings before the Committee.

Certain general obligations and consequences became apparent early on in the activities of the HRC with regard to cases of political detainees and their health and whereabouts. The ability of detainees to communicate directly with the Committee is a prerequisite for the effective appliof the proceedings before it. 3. In case of urgency when the Commission is not in session, the Chairman in consultation with other members of the Commission, may take any necessary action on behalf of the Commission. As soon as the Commission is again in session, the Chairman shall report to it on any action taken". Rules of Procedure of 6 October 1995 (<www.achpr.org>). Previously this was Rule 109, Rules of Procedure, 1 February 1988, see Murray/Evans (2001), p. 161.

⁶⁵ It is the Committee that should set the deadlines for the proceedings, not the parties themselves. It is equally for the Committee to decide on the admissibility of a case, not for the Addressee State. The HRC always emphasises that it is implicit in Article 4(2) OP that a State party make available all the information at its disposal. Pending the proceedings Addressee States have several obligations under the OP. Their recognition of the OP implies that they must heed to the procedural orders of the HRC, such as answering questions, sending requested documentation or investigating claims. They must respect the procedure as set by the Committee, including deadlines and admissibility decisions. If they do not, they shall suffer the consequences, as the Committee may decide that due weight must be given to the petitioner's claims in the absence of information from the State party. Of course, the petitioner must also respect the procedure as set by the Committee and similarly suffer the consequences for not doing so. In this light it is self-evident that States are also expected to postpone action if the Committee considers that this action would result in irreparable harm. As the case may be, States may also have to take action to prevent third parties from causing irreparable harm to the alleged victim or to the proceedings before the Committee, if the Committee so indicates.

cation of the OP. Governments have no right to create obstacles to this communication. Such obstacles would, in many cases, render meaningless the individual complaint procedure.⁶⁶ This approach by the HRC is important for the procedural position of the parties.

The whereabouts of the person concerned should be known and he or she should be able to communicate with the HRC freely without fear for repercussions. The State's obligation under Article 4(2) OP includes providing information on the state of health of detainees. States that fail to provide information and clarifications, seriously hamper the HRC in discharging its responsibilities under the OP.⁶⁷

States must make available administrative mechanisms 'to give effect to the general obligation to investigate allegations of violations promptly, thoroughly and effectively through independent and impartial bodies'. After all, a 'failure by a State Party to investigate allegations of violations could in and of itself give rise to a separate breach of the Covenant'.⁶⁸

It has been on the occasion of executions of death sentences in defiance of its provisional measures that the HRC has expressed itself most strongly on the rationale of provisional measures and their legal status.⁶⁹ Over the years it has taken a stronger position on non-compliance.⁷⁰ It now condemns such executions as incompatible with the obligation to respect the Covenant in good faith and with the right of individual communication under the OP.

In Piandiong (2000) the HRC referred to the preamble and Article 1 OP and noted that the undertaking to co-operate with the Committee in good faith was implicit in a State's adherence to the OP. It pointed out that denying its provisional measures was incompatible with the obligations of the State not to hinder the Committee's task of examining the communication and determining the case on the merits under Article 5(1) and (4). The HRC pointed out that provisional measures are essential to the Committee's role under the OP.⁷¹ The Committee's reference to the obligation of States not to frustrate it in its consideration of a case may be classified as an obligation not to harm the procedure. Its reference to the obligation not to prevent it to express its Views may be classified as an obligation not to cause irreparable harm to the claim either. In other words, the HRC seems to allude to both rationales for the use of provisional measures.⁷²

⁶⁶ See e.g. HRC Sendic Antonaccio (submitted by his wife Violeta Setelich) v. Uruguay, 28 October 1981.

⁶⁷ See e.g. HRC Dave Marais v. Madagascar, 24 March 1984.

⁶⁸ HRC General Comment on the nature of the general legal obligation imposed on States parties to the Covenant (Article 2 ICCPR), 21 April 2004, §15. See further Chapter XIII (Protection).

⁶⁹ In the vast majority of death penalty cases States have respected the Committee's provisional measures. On these measures see Chapter III. See further Chapter XVII (Official State responses).

⁷⁰ See also Harrington (2003), p. 69 referring to a 'movement towards recognizing the binding nature of interim measures requests' as 'reflected' in the jurisprudence of the HRC. She notes that the Committee 'has taken an increasingly stronger stance' and 'what were once seen as mere "failures to cooperate" are now viewed as violations of a state's very obligations under the ICCPR regime'.

⁷¹ Already HRC Peter Bradshaw v. Barbados, 19 July 1994 (inadm.), §§2.9, 2.10, 4.2, 5.3; see also Denzil Roberts v. Barbados, 19 July 1994, §§2.6, 2.7, 6.3 the HRC established that the State party had accepted the legal obligation to make the provisions of the Covenant effective. It was under an obligation to adopt appropriate measures to give legal effect to the Committee's interpretation on the merits, but also to its provisional measures to avoid irreparable harm 'to the victim of the alleged violation' pending the proceedings. Further on the position of the HRC prior to 2000 see Chapter XVIII (Follow-up).

⁷² On these rationales, see Conclusion Part II.

The executions rendered examination by the HRC moot and the expression of its Views ‘nugatory and futile’. Flouting its provisional measures, ‘especially by irreversible measures such as the execution of the alleged victim’ undermined the protection of Covenant rights under the OP.⁷³ This means that the Committee emphasises the importance of provisional measures for the prevention of ‘irreversible measures’. Nevertheless, it found no violations of specific articles of the Covenant, only of the State’s legal obligations under the OP. It referred to Article 1 OP and to the object and purpose of the OP in general.

In Piandiong the HRC also pointed out that even when the HRC has not (yet) acted under Rule 86 the State’s obligation to co-operate with the HRC in good faith forbids the State party to execute the petitioners.⁷⁴ In other words, in death penalty cases the State party breaches its obligations under the OP when it executes an alleged victim while the petitioner had informed it that he had submitted a case to the HRC. In subsequent Views in relation to Sierra Leone and Trinidad and Tobago the HRC confirmed this approach. At the merits stage in Ashby v. Trinidad and Tobago (2002) it noted:

“The behaviour of the State party represents a shocking failure to demonstrate even the most elementary good faith required of a State party to the Covenant and the Optional Protocol”.⁷⁵

The State had breached its obligations under the OP ‘by proceeding to execute Mr. Ashby before the Committee could conclude its examination of the communication, and the formulation of its Views’. It found it ‘particularly inexcusable’ that the State had done so after the Committee’s use of provisional measures.⁷⁶

When States have failed to comply with its provisional measures, the HRC reserves a separate section of its decision on the merits to deal on this issue. These sections have had headings such as ‘State party’s failure to respect the Committee’s request for interim measures under rule 86’,⁷⁷ ‘Breach of the Optional Protocol’⁷⁸ or ‘Non respect of the Committee’s request for interim measures’.⁷⁹

Not only in death penalty but also in expulsion and extradition cases the HRC has found that States are bound to respect its provisional measures to prevent irreparable harm. It equally found States in breach of the Optional Protocol as well as of Article 2 ICCPR on the right to the ⁷³ See HRC Dante Piandiong, Jesus Morillos and Archie Bulan (deceased) (submitted by Alexander Padilla and Ricardo III Sunga) v. the Philippines, 19 October 2000, §§5.1-5.4. See also, e.g., Mansaraj et al., Gborie et al. and Sesay et al. v. Sierra Leone, 16 July 2001 and Glenn Ashby v. Trinidad and Tobago, 21 March 2002. See further press release, ‘Human Rights Committee deplores the execution of six individuals in Uzbekistan’, 24 July 2003. The petitioners who were executed were Muzaffar Mirzaev (case 1170/2003), Shukrat Andasbaev (case 1166/2003), Ulugbek Ashov (case 1165/2003), Ilkhon Babadzhanov and Maksud Ismailov (case 1162/2003), and Azamat Uteev (case 1150/2003). Furthermore see Barno Saidova v. Tajikistan, 8 July 2004.

⁷⁴ HRC Dante Piandiong, Jesus Morillos and Archie Bulan (deceased) (submitted by Alexander Padilla and Ricardo III Sunga) v. the Philippines, 19 October 2000.

⁷⁵ HRC Glenn Ashby v. Trinidad and Tobago, 21 March 2002, §10.9.

⁷⁶ Id., §10.10.

⁷⁷ See HRC Barno Saidova v. Tajikistan, 8 July 2004, §§4.1-4.4 and Maryam Khalilova on behalf of her son Validzhon Alievich Khalilov v. Tajikistan, 30 March 2005, §§4.1-4.4.

⁷⁸ HRC Davlatbibi Shukurova on behalf of her husband Dovud and his brother Sherali Nazriev v. Tajikistan, 16 March 2006, §§6.1.-6.4.

⁷⁹ HRC Roza Uteeva on behalf of her brother Azamat Uteev v. Uzbekistan, 26 October 2007, §§5.1-5.3. See also Shevkkhie Tulyaganova v. Uzbekistan, 20 July 2007, §§6.1-6.3.

effective remedy.⁸⁰ In Ahani v. Canada (2004) the HRC pointed out that action by a State party giving rise to a risk of irreparable harm, ‘as indicated a priori by the Committee’s request for interim measures, must be scrutinized in the strictest light’.⁸¹ The Committee’s Rules of Procedure have been adopted in conformity with Article 39 ICCPR and its provisional measures, taken pursuant to Rule 86, are ‘essential’ to its role under the OP. “Flouting of the Rule, especially by irreversible measures such as the execution of the alleged victim or his/her deportation from a State party to face torture or death in another country, undermines the protection of Covenant rights through the Optional Protocol”.⁸²

Strangely, the word ‘especially’ seems to imply that it could also use provisional measures to halt measures that are not irreversible. On the other hand, it specifically refers to provisional measures to halt executions or to such measures to halt expulsion in non-refoulement cases. Such measures in fact aim to halt not only that which is irreversible, but that which is irreparable as well.

In 2004 the Committee confirmed its approach to the obligation under the OP to respect its provisional measures in its General Comment on Article 2 ICCPR. It noted that failure to implement its provisional measures ‘should be regarded as incompatible with the obligation to respect in good faith the Covenant, in particular its article 2 and the right of individual communication under the Optional Protocol’.⁸³ It explicitly refers to the obligation to respect its provisional measures based on Article 2 of the Covenant rather than based only on the Covenant rights through the right of individual communication.⁸⁴

It pointed out that provisional measures may be required in certain circumstances because of the right to an effective remedy. In such cases States parties must ‘provide for and implement provisional or interim measures to avoid continuing violations and to endeavour to repair at the earliest possible opportunity any harm that may have been caused by such violations’.⁸⁵

⁸⁰ See HRC Sholam Weiss v. Austria, 3 April 2003, §7.2. See also the arguments of counsel in §§6.3 and 6.4. Some members of the Committee may consider that in extradition and expulsion cases when provisional measures have been ignored it should look at whether irreparable harm indeed followed. In other words, they may belong to the ‘after the fact’-school, to which the ECtHR adheres as well. If they believe that for finding a violation they have to take into account what comes later, they may wish to consider this in the determination of the gravity of certain decisions by States to ignore provisional measures. While it may be justified to take into account the most recent situation in cases in which the petitioner has not yet been expelled, it seems inappropriate to do so to justify the fact that the State has ignored the Committee’s provisional measures.

⁸¹ HRC Mansour Ahani v. Canada, 29 March 2004, §8.1.

⁸² HRC Mansour Ahani v. Canada, 29 March 2004, §§8.1 and 8.2. See also Alzery v. Sweden, 25 October 2006, §11.11.

⁸³ HRC General Comment 31 on the nature of the general legal obligation imposed on States parties to the Covenant (Article 2), 29 March 2004. It confirmed this in 2008 in its General Comment on the OP. “Failure to implement such interim or provisional measures is incompatible with the obligation to respect in good faith the procedure of individual communication established under the Optional Protocol”. HRC General Comment 33, CCPR/C/GC/33, 5 November 2008 (Advance unedited version), §19.

⁸⁴ See Chapter XIII (Protection) the relationship between provisional measures, the rights claimed and the eventual form of reparation. For a confirmation of its approach see also HRC Barno Saidova v. Tajikistan, 8 July 2004.

⁸⁵ HRC General Comment No. 31 on the nature of the general legal obligation imposed on States parties to the Covenant (Article 2), 29 March 2004, §§19, 17 and 12. It referred to ‘the provisional measures indicated by the Committee in cases under the Optional Protocol with a

Authorities other than the HRC have also stressed that States should comply with the Committee's provisional measures. The UN Rapporteur against Torture, for instance, did so in 2003 and 2004⁸⁶ and the Deputy UN High Commissioner for Human Rights equally urged respect for the Committee's provisional measures (2003). He emphasised the importance of respecting 'interim measures of protection ordered by Human Rights Treaty Bodies'.⁸⁷ With regard to executions of death sentences in violation of the provisional measures by the HRC he spoke of a 'grave breach' of the obligations under both the ICCPR and the OP.⁸⁸

While the case law of the HRC on the obligation to respect its provisional measures to halt irreparable harm seems to be firmly established, this fact has not yet found its way in much of the general literature on the HRC, most of which was published before Piandiong (2002) and before the General Comment on Article 2 (2004).⁸⁹

'The traditional view', it has been noted, 'based on a strict legalistic interpretation that considered procedural rules as non-binding, no longer seems adequate'. In this respect 'the Committee has demonstrated leadership' and 'its approach has since been adopted in the jurisprudence of other international human rights organs'.⁹⁰ The Committee's approach indeed is consistent with the dynamic treaty interpretation that human rights adjudicators now generally adhere to.⁹¹ The view to avoiding irreparable harm pending the Committee's consideration of a case'. Again, it did not specify whether it meant irreparable harm to persons, the claim or the procedure.

⁸⁶ See e.g. UN Special Rapporteur on Torture, mission to Uzbekistan of November-December 2002, E/CN.4/2003/68/Add.2. See also official statement by the Special Rapporteur on Torture, 13 September 2004, referring to the 'interim measures ordered by the Committee and urgent appeals dispatched by United Nations monitoring mechanisms regarding persons whose life and physical integrity may be at risk of imminent and irreparable harm'.

⁸⁷ Press release Deputy United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights Bertrand Ramcharan, 'Deputy Human Rights Chief ends visit to Uzbekistan with call for implementation of official commitments', 14 March 2003.

⁸⁸ See e.g. press release Acting High Commissioner for Human Rights Bertrand Ramcharan, 'Acting High Commissioner for Human Rights asks Uzbek government not to carry out death sentences in cases under international appeal', 4 July 2003 and 'Acting High Commissioner for Human Rights deeply concerned at executions in Uzbekistan', 25 July 2003.

⁸⁹ McGoldrick (1994), p. 128 considered that they are 'non-binding as a matter of law and depend totally on the cooperation and good faith of the State party concerned'. Robertson and Merrills (1996) noted that although they 'are not binding, they have a moral force', p. 57. Ghandhi (1998) wrote that 'it is clear that the Committee's view on the desirability of interim measures is not binding on the State Party concerned', p. 58. Castan/Joseph/Schultz (2004) do pay attention to the most recent case law, as do Harrington (2003) and Naldi (2004). Harrington considers that while the Views are not binding, the provisional measures are because the individual complaint system would otherwise be 'rendered meaningless'. 'By acceding to the Optional Protocol, Canada granted individual litigants the right to petition and ultimately to receive a non-binding view from the Human Rights Committee. Notwithstanding any concerns one might have about the inherent weaknesses of a non-binding view, Canada is therefore acting in bad faith with respect to its treaty commitments when it engages in acts that have the effect of preventing or frustrating the consideration of a communication by the Committee and rendering the outcome nugatory'. In this context Harrington notes that 'it must be acknowledged that many international instruments adopt language with a diplomatic flavour to avoid offence to the susceptibilities of states,' Harrington (2003), pp. 86 and p. 68 respectively.

⁹⁰ Naldi (2004), p. 454.

⁹¹ As provisional measures are central to the Committee's protective function, its 'reasoned justification for its conclusion, commensurate with the "dynamic and evolutive" approach appropriate to human rights treaties, must be considered correct, if only on the utilitarian ground approach of the HRC towards the legal status of its provisional measures is in accordance with the purpose of the OP and the aim of effective protection of the rights in the ICCPR.

2.4.3.3 THE ATTITUDE OF THE ADJUDICATORS TO FRUSTRATION OF THE RIGHT OF PETITION THROUGH PRE-EMPTION OF THE POSSIBILITY TO REQUEST PROVISIONAL MEASURES

As noted, in the context of the death penalty the HRC has pointed out that the obligation of good faith application of the Covenant and in particular of the right to an effective remedy (Article 2 ICCPR) presumes that a State postpones an execution once it knows (or should reasonably be expected to know) that the petitioner has brought a petition before the HRC, and not only once the HRC has been able to inform the State of its decision to take provisional measures.⁹² It is incompatible with the obligations under the OP when the State undertakes action hindering or frustrating the examination of a complaint and rendering futile any subsequent decision on the merits. Such State commits a grave breach of the right of individual petition. This breach is even more serious when this occurs contrary to a provisional measure.⁹³

If the State preempts the possibility of invoking Article 22 ICAT and of requesting the Committee to take provisional measures, by expelling the petitioner without giving him a reasonable opportunity to resort to the Committee, before execution of a final decision, this in itself constitutes a breach of the obligations under Article 22 ICAT.⁹⁴

Apart from the HRC, also CAT and the ECtHR have dealt with situations in which the State pre-empted the possibility for the petitioner to resort to the individual petition systems recognized by States under international treaties. They have stressed that the obligation not to do so applies as well in the context of non-refoulement. The petitioner should have a reasonable opportunity of sending a complaint to the Committee or ECtHR before the final decision of domestic authorities is being executed.⁹⁵

2.4.3.4 CAT ON THE LEGAL STATUS OF ITS PROVISIONAL MEASURES

According to CAT ratification of the treaty and recognition of the right of individual petition require a good faith cooperation with the Committee. Respecting its provisional measures is essential for the protection of the beneficiary against irreparable harm. Such harm would deprive the further proceedings of any sense.⁹⁶ of seeking to ensure maximum protection for people at risk'. Naldi (2004), p. 454, referring to ECtHR Wemhoff v. Germany, 27 June 1968 and IACHR, Advisory Opinion, Compulsory membership of journalist association, 13 November 1985.

⁹² HRC Ashby v. Trinidad and Tobago, 21 March 2002; Shukurova v. Tajikistan, 17 March 2006, Sultanova v. Uzbekistan, 30 March 2006; Uteeva v. Uzbekistan, 26 October 2007.

⁹³ See CAT Agiza v. Sweden, 20 May 2005 and ECtHR Al-Moayad v. Germany, 20 February 2007, §125 (acts or omissions aimed to prevent the Court from ordering provisional measures or from timely informing the government of such measures, could be in violation of Article 34 ECHR).

⁹⁴ CAT Agiza v. Sweden, 20 May 2005, §13.9.

⁹⁵ As noted, this relates to e.g. CAT Agiza v. Sweden, 20 May 2005; HRC Shukurova v. Tajikistan, 17 March 2006; Sultanova v. Uzbekistan, 30 March 2006; Uteeva v. Uzbekistan, 26 October 2007; ECtHR Al-Moayad v. Germany, 20 February 2007.

⁹⁶ CAT Núñez Chipana v. Venezuela, 16 December 1998 and T.P.S. v. Canada, 16 May 2000.

In T.P.S. v. Canada Canada ignored a provisional measure. It considered that a request for provisional measures was ‘a recommendation to a State to take certain measures, not an order’. “Support for this proposition may be found not only in the word employed (‘request’) in rule 108, paragraph 9 but also in the European Court of Human Rights decision in Cruz Varas and others v. Sweden.”⁹⁷ CAT responded by expressing deep concern about Canada’s deportation of the petitioner to India despite the Committee’s provisional measures. It pointed out that Canada had ratified the Convention against Torture and had voluntarily accepted the Committee’s competence to consider individual communications (Article 22). It had undertaken to cooperate with it in good faith in applying the procedure. “Compliance with the provisional measures called for by the Committee in cases it considers reasonable is essential in order to protect the person in question from irreparable harm, which could, moreover nullify the end result of the proceedings before the Committee.”⁹⁸

CAT has subsequently reinforced this approach.⁹⁹ The use of provisional measures is ‘vital to the role entrusted to the Committee’ under Article 22 ICAT. ‘Failure to respect that provision, in particular through such irreparable action as deporting an alleged victim, undermined protection of the rights enshrined in the Convention’.¹⁰⁰

Moreover the petitioner is ‘entitled to rely’ on its provisional measures.¹⁰¹ The expulsion of the petitioner ‘in the face of the Committee’s request for interim measures nullified the effective exercise of the right to complaint conferred by article 22, and has rendered the Committee’s final decision on the merits futile and devoid of object’.¹⁰²

In Agiza v. Sweden (2005) CAT referred to the procedural assessment of the substantive right not to be subjected to refoulement. It held that the principle of non-refoulement in Article 3 ICAT should be understood to encompass a remedy to prevent its breach.¹⁰³ It added that in the ⁹⁷ CAT T.P.S. v. Canada, 16 May 2000, §8.2. On ECtHR Cruz Varas and its subsequent overturn see infra.

⁹⁸ CAT T.P.S. v. Canada, 16 May 2000, §15.6. According to Committee member Camara (Senegal) the Committee’s authority to request provisional measures is a ‘logical attribute’ of its competence based on Art. 22. Ignoring the Committee’s provisional measures ‘renders Article 22 meaningless’.

⁹⁹ By recognizing the right of individual complaint ‘States parties implicitly undertook to cooperate with the Committee in good faith by providing it with the means to examine the complaints submitted’. CAT Mafhoud Brada v. France, 17 May 2005, §6.1.

¹⁰⁰ CAT Mafhoud Brada v. France, 17 May 2005, §6.2. In Brada v. France (2005) CAT observed that a domestic appeal was still pending at the time of the expulsion. It added: ‘(e)ven more decisively’ the Committee had indicated provisional measures to stay his execution ‘until it had had an opportunity to examine the merits of the case, the Committee having established, through its Special Rapporteur on Interim Measures, that in the present case the complainant had established an arguable risk of irreparable harm’. CAT Mafhoud Brada v. France, 17 May 2005, §13.3. On assessment of risk see Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

¹⁰¹ CAT Mafhoud Brada v. France, 17 May 2005, §13.3.

¹⁰² Id., §13.4. See also Elif Pelit v. Azerbaijan, 1 May 2007, §10.2. In Brada In this case it did not find a violation of Article 22 ICAT alone. The State ignored the fact that a domestic case was still pending, it ignored CAT’s provisional measures and it argued that the subsequent judgment of the Court of Appeal could not be regarded as ‘clearly arbitrary or tantamount to a denial of justice’. CAT noted the finding of the Court of Appeal that the expulsion occurred in breach of Article 3 ECHR and agreed that this finding could not be regarded as ‘clearly arbitrary or tantamount to a denial of justice’. It concluded that the expulsion was in breach of Article 3 ICAT. CAT Mafhoud Brada v. France, 17 May 2005, §13.6.

¹⁰³ CAT Ahmed Hussein Mustafa Kamil Agiza v. Sweden, 20 May 2005, §13.6. See on this case also Van Boven (2006), pp. 746-758.

context of non-refoulement the right to an effective remedy requires ‘an opportunity for effective, independent and impartial review of the decision to expel or remove, once that decision is made, when there is a plausible allegation that article 3 issues arise’.¹⁰⁴

CAT will find a breach of Article 22 based on a conception of ‘effective exercise’ of the right of individual petition that encompasses more than just access to the Committee. In Agiza it pointed out, once more, that by making the declaration under Article 22 ICAT the State ‘undertook to confer upon persons within its jurisdiction the right to invoke the complaints jurisdiction of the Committee. That jurisdiction included the power to indicate interim measures, if necessary, to stay the removal and preserve the subject matter of the case pending final decision’. It added that in order ‘for this exercise of the right of complaint to be meaningful rather than illusory’, the ‘individual must have a reasonable period of time before execution of a final decision to consider whether and, if so, in fact, seize the Committee under its article 22 jurisdiction’.¹⁰⁵ In Dar v. Norway (2007) CAT noted that Article 18 ICAT ‘vests it with competence to establish its own rules of procedure, which become inseparable from the Convention to the extent they do not contradict it’. Its Rule 108 on provisional measures was ‘specifically intended to give meaning and scope to articles 3 and 22 of the Convention, which otherwise would only offer asylum-seekers invoking a serious risk of torture a merely theoretical protection. By failing to respect the request for interim measures made to it, and to inform the Committee of the deportation of the complainant, the State party committed a breach of its obligations of cooperating in good faith with the Committee, under article 22 of the Convention’.¹⁰⁶ While in this case it did not find a procedural violation of Article 3 ICAT, in Tebourski v. France (2007) it did find a violation of both Article 22 and Article 3 ICAT. In this case it explicitly linked the right of petition in Article 22 to the substantive rights in Article 3 ICAT. It noted that ‘article 3 of the Convention offers absolute protection to anyone in the territory of a State party which has made the declaration under article 22’.¹⁰⁷ By expelling the petitioner to Tunisia ‘under the conditions in which it did and for the reasons adduced, thereby presenting the Committee with a fait accompli, the State party not only failed to demonstrate the good faith required of any party to a treaty, but also failed to meet its obligations under articles 3 and 22 of the Convention’.¹⁰⁸ In short, CAT has confirmed that disrespect for provisional measures negates the effective exercise of the right of petition.¹⁰⁹

2.4.3.5 INTER-AMERICAN COMMISSION ON THE LEGAL STATUS OF ITS PRECAUTIONARY MEASURES

In March 2005 the CIDH issued a resolution in which it emphasized the international obligation of OAS member States to comply with its precautionary measures.¹¹⁰ In its case law the Commis-

¹⁰⁴ CAT Ahmed Hussein Mustafa Kamil Agiza v. Sweden, 20 May 2005, §13.7. The Committee added: ‘that its previous jurisprudence has been consistent with this view of the requirements of article 3, having found an inability to contest an expulsion decision before an independent authority, in that case the courts, to be relevant to a finding of a violation of article 3’.

¹⁰⁵ CAT Ahmed Hussein Mustafa Kamil Agiza v. Sweden, 20 May 2005, §13.9.

¹⁰⁶ CAT Nadeem Ahmad Dar v. Norway, 11 May 2007, §16.3. See also Tebourski v. France, 1 May 2007, §8.6.

¹⁰⁷ CAT Tebourski v. France, 1 May 2007, §8.4.

¹⁰⁸ CAT Tebourski v. France, 1 May 2007, §8.7.

¹⁰⁹ CAT Brada v. France, 17 May 2005; Agiza v. Sweden, 20 May 2005; Singh Sogi v. Canada, 16 November 2007; Pelit v. Azerbaijan, 1 May 2007.

¹¹⁰ CIDH Resolution 1/05, 8 March 2005, §1.

sion equally stressed that States must comply with its precautionary measures in light of the fundamental role played by these measures in maintaining the effectiveness of the Commission's mandate. It does so in particular in death penalty cases.

In Beazley v. US (2003), for instance, it reiterated that 'its ability to effectively investigate and determine capital cases has frequently been undermined when states have scheduled and carried out the execution of condemned persons, despite the fact that those individuals have proceedings pending before the Commission'.¹¹¹ It pointed out that it uses precautionary measures exactly in order to prevent 'this unacceptable situation'. It emphasized that 'OAS member states, by creating the Commission and mandating it through the OAS Charter and its Statute to promote the observance and protection of human rights of the American peoples, have implicitly undertaken to implement measures of this nature where they are essential to preserving that mandate'.¹¹²

In its Order for provisional measures in James et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago the Inter-American Court has pointed out, based on the principles of effectiveness and good faith, that States were to respect not only its Orders for provisional measures but also the Commission's precautionary measures.¹¹³

The competence of the Inter-American Commission to adopt precautionary measures, as laid down in its rules of procedure, is also based on Articles 33 and 41 ACHR. Article 33 refers to the Commission as one of the competent bodies to monitor compliance with the obligations of States parties to the Convention. Article 41 establishes that the Commission may, in the exercise of its function to defend human rights, formulate recommendations for member States to adopt measures for the protection of human rights in the same way as measures applied to further the obligation to respect such rights.¹¹⁴

In the Vogt case the Court considered that 'in particular, the Commission has the obligation in every case to take measures to guarantee the life and physical integrity of all persons whose rights may be violated'.¹¹⁵ Whether this means that it should always immediately request the Court to order provisional measures in cases that can go to the Court and should reserve its precautionary measures for cases that cannot, is not specified. Yet in the past the Court has assumed that the Commission initially takes precautionary measures in all urgent cases.¹¹⁶

¹¹¹ CIDH Napoleon Beazley v. US, 29 December 2003, §51.

¹¹² "As the Commission has emphasized on numerous occasions, it is beyond question that the failure of an OAS member state to preserve a condemned prisoner's life pending review of his or her complaint undermines the efficacy of the Commission's process, deprives condemned persons of their right to petition in the inter-American human rights system, and results in serious and irreparable harm to those individuals. For these reasons, the Commission has determined that a member state disregards its fundamental human rights obligations under the OAS Charter and related instruments when it fails to implement precautionary measures issued by the Commission in these circumstances". CIDH Napoleon Beazley v. US, 29 December 2003, §52, referring to Juan Raul Garza v. United States, §117 and Fifth Report on the Situation of Human Rights in Guatemala, 6 April 2001, §§71-72.

¹¹³ IACHR James et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago, Order of 26 September 2001.

¹¹⁴ See also CEJIL, La Competencia de la CIDH, comunicado del Centro por la Justicia y el Derecho Internacional (CEJIL), in: La Nacion, 5 April 2001, <www.nacion.com> (consulted 2 April 2002).

¹¹⁵ IACHR Vogt case, Order of 27 June 1996.

¹¹⁶ Judge Cançado Trindade argues that the Commission should always refer requests for provisional measures to the Court, without first using its own precautionary measures. He considers that the latter 'lack conventional force'. IACHR Matter of the persons imprisoned in the "Dr. Sebastião Martins Silveira" Penitentiary in Araraquara, São Paulo (Brazil), Order of 30 September 2006,

The Commission uses terminology such as ‘requests’ and its Reports include recommendations. Still, State parties to the American Convention are bound not to violate the rights it contains and have accepted the Commission’s role in monitoring this. In any case, the fact that the Commission issues recommendations as to how to remedy a violation, does not detract from the binding character of its precautionary measures. After all there are situations where the Commission is the ultimate interpreter of a State’s obligations within the OAS system. It is argued that as part of the latter function, as it is the only adjudicator interpreting and determining a State’s obligations under the OAS Charter, its precautionary measures must be respected. Otherwise the individual complaint system developed by the Commission under the OAS Statute and American Declaration, as confirmed by the OAS political bodies, would be deprived of effectiveness exactly in the most pressing cases.¹¹⁷ The Commission does not distinguish the precautionary measures under the Convention from those made as part of the adjudicatory function assigned to it by the OAS States under the OAS Charter, monitoring compliance with the American Declaration. Indeed it would appear artificial to argue that in the former case they are not legally binding and in the latter they are. Moreover, with regard to its function under the Convention, where the Commission may also request the Court to order provisional measures, if it indeed does so, but before the Court’s staff in Costa Rica and the Court itself or its President has had the opportunity to deal with this request, the Commission’s precautionary measures are also binding by virtue of the binding nature of the Court’s provisional measures themselves. After all the State may not quickly pre-empt any decision by the Court to order provisional measures by taking irreversible action, in the face of the Commission’s decision to use precautionary measures and request the Court’s provisional measures. Finally, if the Commission fails to request the Court’s provisional measures and continues to use its own precautionary measures in a case in which it the State concerned has recognized the competence of the Court to deal with cases, this deserves criticism, but it does not absolve the State from complying in good faith with its obligations under the ACHR, an obligation brought to its attention specifically by the use of precautionary measures.

Separate Opinion Judge Cançado Trindade, §30. At the same time he argues for the Court’s power to order provisional measures in matters still pending before the Commission when the petitioners, rather than the Commission, request them, in such cases where the Commission does not motivate its denial. Such situation ‘legitimizes the potential victims, as subjects of international human rights law, to resort to the Court to seek the granting of these provisional measures; otherwise, there could be a denial of justice at the international level’, ibid. Yet it is submitted here that all human rights adjudicators have the inherent power to order provisional measures that are legally binding, unless this is explicitly excluded in their constituent document. The latter is the case with regard to dealing with requests for provisional measures by petitioners rather than the Commission in matters still pending before that Commission. While the Commission indeed must motivate its decisions and must make sure that individuals have access to the highest level of decision-making available within the system, this is unrelated to the lack of explicit conventional basis of its own precautionary measures. Moreover, as argued in this chapter, the absence of an explicit conventional basis does not mean that its precautionary measures, which are after all the only options in cases involving States that have not recognized the competence of the Court, are not legally binding.

¹¹⁷ See also e.g. Pasqualucci (2005), p. 25.

2.4.3.6 AFRICAN COMMISSION ON THE LEGAL STATUS OF ITS PROVISIONAL MEASURES

The African Commission has pointed out that it was one of its functions to assist States in the implementation of their obligations under the ACHPR. After the execution of Ken Saro-Wiwa the Commission found that Nigeria had violated its obligations under Article 1 ACHPR by ‘ignoring its obligations to institute provisional measures’. This article stipulates:

“The Member States of the Organisation of African Unity parties to the present Charter shall recognise the right, duties and freedoms enshrined in this Charter and shall undertake to adopt legislative or other measures to give effect to them”.

The Commission strongly condemned the execution:

“To have carried out the execution in the face of pleas to the contrary by the Commission and world opinion is something which we pray will never happen again. That it is a violation of the Charter is an understatement”.¹¹⁸

2.4.3.7 EUROPEAN COMMISSION ON THE LEGAL STATUS OF ITS PROVISIONAL MEASURES

In Mamatkulov (2005) the ECtHR Grand Chamber pointed out with regard to the practice of the former Commission: “Even before the provisions regulating the question of interim measures came into force, the Commission had not hesitated to ask respondent Governments for a stay of execution of measures liable to make the application pending before it devoid of purpose”.¹¹⁹ Later the Commission formally included a rule in its Rules of Procedure. Two old cases have some significance to the discussion on the legal status of provisional measures.

In October 1971 the Commission gave precedence to a complaint against eviction. Although it did not use provisional measures the ensuing domestic discussion about the obligation of States to enable the Commission to operate effectively is interesting for understanding the legal status of provisional measures. In the domestic proceedings counsel argued that the eviction of the petitioner should be postponed pending the proceedings before the Commission. He submitted that the eviction would render the Commission’s decision ineffective from the outset. In February 1972 the district court determined that the execution of its eviction order of April 1971 should be suspended until December 1972, provided that the petitioner paid compensation to the owner of the house for the use of the house and the settlement of arrears. It considered that Germany was required, under then Article 28, ‘to furnish to the Commission all necessary facilities for the effective conduct of the investigation’.¹²⁰ The domestic court also considered ‘of decisive influence’ that the Commission ‘must not be prevented by accomplished facts from investigating the application'.¹²¹ It noted that 'compulsory eviction, and the possible consequences thereof with regard to the debtor's state of health, would render it impossible for the European Commission of Human Rights, thereby faced with accomplished facts, to fulfil the tasks incumbent on it under Article 28 of the Convention'.¹²²

¹¹⁸ IACHPR International Pen, Constitutional Rights Project and Interights on behalf of Ken Saro-wiwa Jr. and Civil Liberties Organisation v. Nigeria, published in 7 International Human Rights Reports 274 (2000), §115.

¹¹⁹ ECtHR Grand Chamber Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §106.

¹²⁰ EComHR Raupp v. FRG, 5207/71, Decision of 1 June 1972, Collection of Decisions 42, May 1973; X v. FRG, 5207/71, 13 December 1971, Collection of Decisions 39, June 1972, p. 92: Decision of the District Court of Würzburg of 4 February 1972 (translation by the Council of Europe).

In the first Greek case, in which it had used provisional measures, the European Commission pointed out that it 'was established under Article 19 of the Convention with the task to ensure, together with the Court, the observance of the engagements undertaken by the High Contracting Parties in the Convention'.¹²³

The main cases in which the Commission had to deal with the legal status of provisional measures were those of Mansi and Cruz Varas. It argued that they were legally binding, but the ECtHR subsequently found that they were not. This situation continued for more than ten years until the judgment of the first section and later the Grand Chamber in the case Mamatkulov.

Mr. Cruz Varas, faced with an expulsion order, had petitioned the European Commission on Human Rights, claiming his expulsion by Sweden to Chile, at the time still under General Pinochet, would result in the breach of certain articles of the European Convention, most importantly the prohibition of torture, or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment (Article 3 ECHR). The Commission had used provisional measures, under Rule 36 of its Rules of Procedure, to stay the expulsion until the Convention organs had had a chance to examine the issue. Mr. Cruz Varas was forced to return to Chile notwithstanding this provisional measure.

As the Court put it, Sweden was the first ECHR Contracting State which chose not to respect a provisional measure.¹²⁴ In the Commission's view Sweden's behaviour was contrary to ¹²¹ EComHR Raupp v. FRG, 5207/71, Decision of 1 June 1972, Collection of Decisions 42, May 1973; X v. FRG, 5207/71, 13 December 1971, Collection of Decisions 39, June 1972, p. 93: "The European Convention on Human Rights and the Rules of Procedure of the European Commission of Human Rights do not, like Art. 572(3) of the Code of Civil Procedure, make provision for a temporary order granting a stay of execution of the disputed decision. However, Art. 572(2) of the Code of Civil Procedure is applicable mutatis mutandis; the principle underlying this provision, namely that the decision of a higher authority must not be anticipated, applies equally in respect of an individual application to the European Commission of Human Rights. The Federal Republic of Germany did not oppose the application mutatis mutandis of Art. 572(2) of the Code of Civil Procedure, for the reason that such application mutatis mutandis would, in the result, meet the obligation imposed upon the Federal Republic of Germany under Art. 25(1), in fine of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms".

¹²² Subsequently the Commission declared the case inadmissible for abuse of the right of petition. It noted that without good reason the petitioner had failed to comply with the terms of the stay of execution of the eviction order. It observed that her failure to pay compensation was 'not only contrary to repeated assurances previously given by her in the present proceedings; it also disregards the decision of the District Court which was taken under Art. 28(a) in fine of the Convention in order to facilitate the Commission's investigation of the present case'. Thus, it could only conclude that the petitioner was 'taking advantage of the proceedings before the Commission in order to evade her obligation under domestic law to pay compensation for the use of the house concerned', p. 90. It referred to the description by Senior Judge Spies of the District Court of Würzburg: 'she clearly believed that, because of the state of her health, she could live in someone else's house without paying compensation', p. 93.

¹²³ EComHR First Greek case, Denmark, Norway, Sweden and the Netherlands v. Greece, 3321-3323/67 and 3344/67, 24 January 1968.

¹²⁴ ECtHR Case of Cruz Varas and Others v. Sweden, Judgment of 20 March 1991, §121. This is not entirely correct. There had been a handful of cases in which there had been problems before, see e.g. EComHR Lynas v. Sweden, 6 October 1976 and S.I.G. v. the Netherlands, 10 October 1985 (inadm.). Non-compliance sometimes related to the timing of the provisional measure. For a case the spirit of the Convention, and to Article 25(1), now Article 34 ECHR, on the right of individual petition in particular. The Court, however, decided that States parties were not bound by the Commission's provisional measures, because no provision in the Convention itself dealt specifically with the issue, and neither Article 25, nor other rules of law could be interpreted as such.

The State had argued that the right of petition had so far been interpreted as exclusively procedural and the Commission's interpretation that it protected petitioners from irreparable harm 'found no support in the wording of the provision or in legal writing'.¹²⁵

The European Commission on Human Rights, by a 12-1 vote, concluded that Cruz Varas' expulsion resulted in a violation of the right of petition. It did not, however, regard the undertaking under that article to imply a general duty to suspend measures domestically or not to enforce domestic decisions in all cases where an individual had lodged an application with the Commission. There could, nevertheless, be special circumstances where the enforcement of a national decision could indeed be in conflict with the effective exercise of the right to petition. In the Commission's opinion this was particularly the case when the enforcement of such a national decision would result in serious and irreparable damage to the petitioner and when the Commission had used provisional measures indicating that it was desirable not to enforce that decision.¹²⁶ On the one hand, the Commission stated, an applicant is entitled, to the 'effective exercise' of his right to petition to the Commission, meaning that the Contracting State shall not prevent the Commission from making an effective examination of the application, and, on the other hand, an applicant claiming a violation of Article 3 (prohibition of torture and cruel or degrading treatment or punishment) is entitled to an effective examination of whether the intended extradition or expulsion would indeed be a violation of that article. In these circumstances provisional measures serve the purpose, as the Commission puts it, 'of enabling the Commission, and subsequently the Court or Committee of Ministers, to examine effectively an application and to ensure the effectiveness of the safeguard provided by Article 3'.¹²⁷ The deportation, in this case, was contrary to the spirit of the Convention and incompatible the right of petition.¹²⁸

The question could be raised whether the Court would have decided the way it did, had the petitioner, upon return to Chile, indeed been tortured, disappeared or executed. This happened to a Jordanian who was expelled by Sweden and who was tortured upon return in Jordan. In this case a friendly settlement was reached.¹²⁹ on non-compliance, if one can say so relating to a very early case, dating from before the introduction of a rule on provisional measures in the Commission's rules of procedure, X. v. Austria and Yugoslavia, 30 June 1964 (inadm.), where on 10 March 1964 a group of three members of the Commission had informally requested Austria not to return a person to Yugoslavia. After this request failed and the person was extradited, a phone call was made to the Permanent Delegation to inquire about the situation and subsequently, in plenary session, the Commission decided to give precedence to the case and to request details on the extradition.

¹²⁵ ECtHR Case of Cruz Varas and Others v. Sweden, Judgment of 20 March 1991, §92.

¹²⁶ Id., §118.

¹²⁷ Id., §120.

¹²⁸ Id., §122.

¹²⁹ EComHR Mansi v. Sweden, 9 March 1990 (friendly settlement). In this case, like in the case Cruz Varas, a provisional measure was used. The case was introduced and registered on 19 October 1989. On that same day the President of the Commission, in accordance with Rule 36, decided to indicate that it was 'desirable in the interest of the parties and the proper conduct of the proceedings before the Commission not to deport the applicant to Jordan until the Commission had had an opportunity to examine the application at its forthcoming session from 6 to 10 November 1989'. The petitioner was nevertheless expelled to Jordan on 21 October 1989. See admissibility decision of 7 December 1990. When the Commission heard this, it decided to

After Mansi's expulsion, contrary to the Commission's provisional measures, Mr Mansi had met with a representative of Amnesty International and a representative of the Swedish embassy at Amman. These reported he had been tortured and had required hospitalization.

The Commission considered that Sweden's failure to comply with the provisional measures of the Commission raised the question whether there had been a violation of Article 25 (1) ECHR (the present Article 34) in conjunction with Article 1 'in view of the special nature of the alleged violation of Article 3 of the Convention'. This question involved issues that, in the Commission's view, justified further examination.¹³⁰ In January 1990 the petitioner returned to Sweden. He reached a friendly settlement with the State.¹³¹ Consequently the case was struck out and only in the other case in which Sweden ignored the Commission's provisional measures a decision on the merits was reached. That case was subsequently brought before the Court.

2.4.3.8 ECtHR ON THE LEGAL STATUS OF PROVISIONAL MEASURES

In the aforementioned Cruz Varas case, different from the Commission, the Court, by a narrow majority, found that States parties to the ECHR were not legally bound to respect provisional measures.¹³² This judgment not only drew a strong dissenting opinion, but also many critical commentaries.¹³³ At the same time States, even from other continents, have referred to this case to justify non-compliance with provisional measures.¹³⁴ Years later, in an admissibility decision in Conka (2001) the Court's Third Section simply confirmed Cruz Varas without further discussion.¹³⁵

Yet in Mamatkulov first the Court's First Section (2003) and later the Grand Chamber (2005) found that under Article 34 ECHR States are obliged to respect its provisional measures.¹³⁶ In subsequent cases it explicitly stated that its provisional measures are legally binding.¹³⁷ take another provisional measure, namely that the Government of Sweden 'take measures which will enable the applicant to return to Sweden as soon as possible'. Eventually, the question whether the expulsion was in violation of the Articles 3 and 25 remained unresolved, since a friendly settlement was reached. Friendly settlement Report adopted by the Commission on 9 March 1990, pursuant to Article 28(2) ECHR.

¹³⁰ EComHR Mansi v. Sweden, 7 December 1989 (adm.), 'The Law' (2), 5th paragraph.

¹³¹ EComHR Mansi v. Sweden, 9 March 1990 (friendly settlement).

¹³² ECtHR Cruz Varas v. Sweden, 20 March 1991.

¹³³ MacDonald, for instance, argued that '(p)arties who submit to the jurisdiction of a court have the implied obligation not to act in such a way as to render the judgment of the court meaningless'. MacDonald (1992), p. 730. See further, e.g. the strongly critical comments by Cohen-Jonathan (1991), pp. 205-209 and Oellers-Frahm (1991), pp. 197-199.

¹³⁴ See e.g. CAT T.P.S. v. Canada, 16 May 2000, §8.2.

¹³⁵ ECtHR Conka v. Belgium, 13 March 2001 (adm.), §11.

¹³⁶ See Judgment of the First Section, 6 February 2003. Its finding on Article 34 had been made by six votes to one (with Türmen, the Turkish judge, dissenting). Turkey had requested the case to be referred to the Grand Chamber in April 2003 and a panel of the Grand Chamber decided to accept this request in May 2003. The composition of the Grand Chamber (17 members) was determined according to the provisions of Article 27(2) and (3) ECHR and Rule 24 of the Rules of Court. Mr. Türmen was the only member of the Chamber also participating in the Grand Chamber decision.

¹³⁷ ECtHR Aoulmi v. France, 17 January 2006, §112. See also Rieter (2007) and the discussion below.

While in Mamatkulov it only found a violation of Article 34 ECHR (effective exercise of the right of application), the Court did make a link with the ‘core rights’ under the Convention. It noted that ‘there is plausibly asserted to be a risk of irreparable damage to the enjoyment by the applicant of one of the core rights under the Convention’. In such cases ‘the object of an interim measure is to maintain the status quo pending the Court’s determination of the justification for the measure’. The provisional measure ‘goes to the substance of the Convention complaint’, ‘being intended to ensure the continued existence’ of the subject matter. The petitioner seeks the ‘preservation of the asserted Convention right before irreparable damage is done to it’. Thus, the ECtHR concluded that the provisional measure is sought by the petitioner and granted by the Court ‘in order to facilitate the “effective exercise” of the right of individual petition under Article 34 of the Convention in the sense of preserving the subject-matter of the application when that is judged to be at risk of irreparable damage through the acts or omissions of the respondent State’.¹³⁸

2.4.4 The status of provisional measures: Mamatkulov singled out

2.4.4.1 INTRODUCTION

The aforementioned Mamatkulov judgment of the Grand Chamber is discussed from three interrelated perspectives: the methods of treaty interpretation, the case law of other adjudicators and the issue of general principles of law. Finally the Court’s reasoning for the reversal of Cruz Varas (1991) is analysed.

2.4.4.2 MAMATKULOV AND TREATY INTERPRETATION

In its interpretation of Article 34 the ECtHR set out with a reference to the case Loizidou (1995):

“The Court has previously stated that the provision concerning the right of individual application (Article 34, formerly Article 25 of the Convention before Protocol No. 11 came into force) is one of the fundamental guarantees of the effectiveness of the Convention system of human-rights protection. In interpreting such a key provision, the Court must have regard to the special character of the Convention as a treaty for the collective enforcement of human rights and fundamental freedoms. Unlike international treaties of the classic type, the Convention comprises more than mere reciprocal engagements between Contracting States. It creates, over and above a network of mutual, bilateral undertakings, objective obligations which, in the words of the Preamble, benefit from a ‘collective enforcement’”.¹³⁹

¹³⁸ ECtHR Grand Chamber Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §108. While there is no specific provision in the Convention concerning the domains in which Rule 39 will apply, requests for its application usually concern the right to life (Article 2), the right not to be subjected to torture or inhuman treatment (Article 3) and, exceptionally the right to respect for private and family life (Article 8) or other rights guaranteed by the Convention. The vast majority of cases in which interim measures have been indicated concern deportation and extradition proceedings”. ECtHR Grand Chamber Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §104.

¹³⁹ ECtHR Grand Chamber Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §100, referring to Loizidou v. Turkey, 23 March 1995 (preliminary objections), §70.

It referred to the object and purpose of the Convention ‘as an instrument for the protection of individual human rights’. This required an interpretation and application of its provisions ‘so as to make its safeguards practical and effective’.¹⁴⁰ It reiterated that the undertaking not to hinder the effective exercise of the right of individual petition ‘precludes any interference with the individual’s right to present and pursue his complaint before the Court effectively’. In that context it is ‘of the utmost importance for the effective operation of the system of individual application instituted under Article 34 that applicants or potential applicants should be able to communicate freely with the Court without being subjected to any form of pressure from the authorities to withdraw or modify their complaints’. This ‘pressure’ included ‘not only direct coercion and flagrant acts of intimidation against actual or potential applicants, members of their family or their legal representatives, but also other improper indirect acts or contacts designed to dissuade or discourage applicants from pursuing a Convention remedy’.¹⁴¹

The Court found that the obligation set out in Article 34 required the Contracting States ‘to refrain not only from exerting pressure on applicants, but also from any act or omission which, by destroying or removing the subject-matter of an application, would make it pointless or otherwise prevent the Court from considering it under its normal procedure’.¹⁴² Its next step was to examine whether the extradition hindered the effective exercise of the petitioner’s right of application. The Court noted that the petitioners had ‘plausibly asserted’ that there was a risk of irreparable harm to ‘one of the core rights under the Convention’. In such cases ‘the object of an interim measure is to maintain the status quo pending the Court’s determination of the justification for the measure’. The Grand Chamber found that it ‘was prevented from properly assessing whether the applicants were exposed to a real risk of ill-treatment and, if so, from ensuring in this respect a “practical and effective” implementation of the Conventions safeguards, as required by its object and purpose’.¹⁴³

The Court noted that under the Convention system provisional measures, ‘as they have consistently been applied in practice’ equally ‘play a vital role in avoiding irreversible situations that would prevent the Court from properly examining the application and, where appropriate, securing to the applicant the practical and effective benefit of the Convention rights asserted’.

“Accordingly, in these conditions a failure by a respondent State to comply with interim measures will undermine the effectiveness of the right of individual application guaranteed by Article 34 and the State’s formal undertaking in Article 1 to protect the rights and freedoms set forth in the Convention”.¹⁴⁴

The Court’s provisional measures ‘permit it not only to carry out an effective examination of the application but also to ensure that the protection afforded to the applicant by the Convention is ¹⁴⁰ ECtHR Grand Chamber Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §101, adding that any interpretation had to be consistent with ‘the general spirit of the Convention, an instrument designed to maintain and promote the ideals and values of a democratic society’, see Soering v. UK, 7 July 1989, §87 and, mutatis mutandis, Klass and others v. Germany, 6 September 1978, §34.

¹⁴¹ ECtHR Grand Chamber Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, § 102, referring to Akdivar and others v. Turkey, 16 September 1996, §105; Aksoy v. Turkey, 18 December 1996, §105; Kurt v. Turkey, 25 May 1998, § 159 and Petra v. Romania, 23 September 1998, §43.

¹⁴² ECtHR Grand Chamber Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, § 102, referring to Akdivar and others v. Turkey, 16 September 1996, §105; Aksoy v. Turkey, 18 December 1996, §105; Kurt v. Turkey, 25 May 1998, § 159 and Petra v. Romania, 23 September 1998, §43.

¹⁴³ ECtHR Grand Chamber Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §108.

¹⁴⁴ Id., §125.

effective’.¹⁴⁵ Moreover, its provisional measures enable the Committee of Ministers to supervise the execution of the final judgment and thus the Addressee State ‘to discharge its obligation to comply with the final judgment of the Court, which is legally binding by virtue of Article 46 of the Convention’.¹⁴⁶ In other words, provisional measures ‘must be examined in the light of the obligations which are imposed on the Contracting States by Articles 1, 34 and 46 of the Convention’.¹⁴⁷

In this case ‘the applicants were hindered in the effective exercise of their right of individual application guaranteed by Article 34 of the Convention, which the applicants’ extradition rendered nugatory’.¹⁴⁸ The previous Section Judgment in Mamatkulov also used the word nugatory in the same context,¹⁴⁹ a term earlier utilised by the HRC with relation to the importance of respecting its provisional measures.¹⁵⁰ The Grand Chamber found a violation of Article 34 by 14 votes to three.¹⁵¹

Judge Cabral Barreto (Portugal) concurred in finding a violation of Article 34 ECHR but he would have wished to maintain Cruz Varas.¹⁵² He considered that only ‘if a refusal to comply with a request for interim measures has hindered the exercise of the right to application, the conclusion must be that there has been a violation of the obligations arising under Article 34 of the Convention’. This would be different if the applicant has nevertheless been able to exercise the right of petition effectively and the Court has been able to properly examine the case. He mentioned detention cases in particular. In such cases, he noted, ‘a person is suffering from an illness in conditions which may come within Article 3 of the Convention and are so bad as to justify interim measures being taken to bring the situation to an end’. He pointed out: “In such cases, the procedural aspects do not come into play”.

“While the government’s failure to comply with the Court’s request may entail a finding of a violation, even an aggravated violation, of Article 3, it will not give rise to a violation of Article 34 as the applicant has exercised his right of application and the Court duly examined the complaint”.

In his view provisional measures may be taken in detention cases, but these would not be legally binding because the procedural aspects of Article 34 do not come into play.¹⁵³

¹⁴⁵ ECtHR Grand Chamber Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §§125 and 126.

¹⁴⁶ Ibid.

¹⁴⁷ Ibid.

¹⁴⁸ ECtHR Grand Chamber Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §127.

¹⁴⁹ ECtHR (First section) Mamatkulov and Abdurasulovic v. Turkey, 6 February 2003, §109.

¹⁵⁰ HRC Piandiong v. Philippines, 19 October 2000, §5.2.

¹⁵¹ Wildhaber, President (Switzerland), Rozakis, Vice-President (Greece), Costa, Vice-President (France), Bratza, Section President (UK), Bonello, (Malta), Palm (Sweden), Tulkens (Belgium), Vajić (Croatia), Hedigan (Ireland), Pellonpää (Finland), Tsatsa-Nikolovska (FRY), Baka (Hungary) and Pavlovski (Moldova); Cabral Barreto concurring; Caflisch (Switzerland), Türmen (Turkey) and Kovler (Russia) dissenting.

¹⁵² He disagreed with the reasoning behind this finding of a violation of Article 34. He did not consider that such finding should result automatically any time a State would ignore the Court’s provisional measures. He considered that the Court was prevented from according binding force to provisional measures and imposing on the States obligations that they had always declined to accept. Concurring Opinion Judge Cabral Barreto, ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004.

¹⁵³ Another example he gave is when a Contracting State extradites a petitioner to a death penalty State despite the Court’s provisional measures. He considered that in such cases the person

Judges Caflisch (Switzerland), Türmen (Turkey) and Kovler (Russia) dissented with regard to the legal status of the Court's provisional measures. Their main conclusion was that the matter was one of legislation rather than judicial action.

“As neither the constitutive instrument of this court nor general international law allows for holding that interim measures must be complied with by States, the Court cannot decide the contrary and, thereby, impose a new obligation on States Parties. To conclude that this Court is empowered, de lege lata, to issue binding provisional measures is ultra vires. Such a power may appear desirable; but it is up to the Contracting Parties to supply it”.¹⁵⁴

They noted that while the Court's decision was ambiguous, not referring directly to the legal consequences of provisional measures under Rule 39, ‘it can be deduced from paragraph 128 of the Judgment that the majority wishes to attribute binding effect to such measures’. They pointed out that the judgment based the mandatory nature of provisional measures ‘essentially’ on Article 34 and asserted that this article could not serve as a basis for holding that the Court's provisional measures are binding.

“There certainly are cases where the Court has all the elements to examine the applicant's complaint despite non-compliance; and there are also cases where the Court applies Rule 39 to the applicant (for instance, in cases of hunger strike) and not to the government”.¹⁵⁵

Moreover, even if the Court could not properly examine the applicant's complaint because of non-compliance with provisional measures, the dissenters would not find a violation of Article 34.¹⁵⁶

The dissenters noted, first of all, that the text does not refer to provisional measures. Secondly, they saw ‘little reason’ to rely heavily on the object and purpose of the treaty, as the Court had done by invoking the ‘living instrument’ doctrine. They pointed out that in Cruz Varas the Court had not even expressly invoked the teleological method. They added that ‘nothing much has changed between the time at which that judgment was made and now’. They considered that: ‘binding interim measures were as desirable then as they are today yet they cannot be justified without an enabling provision in the Convention, the Court's constitutive instrument’.¹⁵⁷

The dissenters noted that the Court's judgment in Cruz Varas referred to the fact that a provision similar to Article 41 ICJ Statute was not included in the Convention despite proposals to extradited is able to present his complaint before the ECtHR ‘in better conditions’ because he has a lawyer in the State to which he has been extradited. Concurring Opinion Judge Cabral Barreto, ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004. He put it as follows: “However, the fact that the applicant was represented by a lawyer who worked in the requesting State meant had [sic] permitted useful contact between the applicant and his lawyer and, in a way, helped the applicant to present his complaint in better conditions”.

¹⁵⁴ Joint partly Dissenting Opinion judges Caflisch, Türmen and Kovler, ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §25.

¹⁵⁵ On this issue see Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4 on addressees and beneficiaries.

¹⁵⁶ Joint partly Dissenting Opinion judges Caflisch, Türmen and Kovler, ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §2.

¹⁵⁷ Ibid.

that effect.¹⁵⁸ This circumstance was ‘certainly not favourable to reading a power to issue binding provisional measures into the Convention’.¹⁵⁹

Resorting to the analysis in Cruz Varas they referred to ‘early unsuccessful attempts of Convention organs at adopting recommendations in the matter’.¹⁶⁰ They considered that there was no agreement of the parties regarding the interpretation of the Convention on the issue, as required by Article 31(3) (b) VCLT.¹⁶¹

The dissenters in Mamatkulov referred to the practice of the ECtHR itself: ‘[i]n the present case the Court itself considered its interim measures to be optional’. “This is evident from the wording of Rule 39, which uses the words ‘indicate’ and ‘should be adopted’, as well as from the text of the letter of 18 March 1999 addressed to Turkey, the respondent State”.¹⁶²

Finally they pointed out that the Judgment did not address the question whether the Court also considered legally binding its provisional measures in Inter-State cases:

“[I]f the binding character of interim measures could be derived from the necessity of giving full effect to the right of individual application enshrined in Article 34 of the Convention, what would the situation in inter-State cases be? Would measures indicated in such cases continue to be optional? Or would they be considered binding, by analogy, to give the fullest effect possible to Article 33 (inter-State cases) of the Convention?”¹⁶³

2.4.4.3 EVALUATION OF THE COURT’S TREATY INTERPRETATION

Judge Cabral Barreto seems to take a rather limited and technical approach to Article 34, not taking into account the individual complaint system as such. After all there are more situations than those involving refolement in which certain violations are impending or ongoing. If a human rights case is pending before it the adjudicator must be able to effectively intervene to prevent irreparable harm to the petitioners. Without this there cannot be an effective system of litigation.

¹⁵⁸ ECtHR Cruz Varas v. Sweden, 20 March 1991, §95.

¹⁵⁹ ECtHR Grand Chamber Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, Joint partly dissenting opinion judges Caflisch, Türmen and Kovler, §17.

¹⁶⁰ Id., §18, referring to Cruz Varas v. Sweden, 20 March 1991, §96.

¹⁶¹ They referred to the proposals of the European Commission on Human Rights (DH-PR (94) 2 and DH-PR (94) 4, 31 January 1994), the Court and the Swiss Delegation to include an article on legally binding provisional measures in Protocol 11, proposals that were rejected by the Government experts. They noted that the Committee of Ministers had subsequently also ignored a similar proposal by the Committee on Migration, Refugees and Demography. They referred to Draft Report AS/PR (1997) 2 by the Committee on Migration, Refugees and Demography, revised on 19 February 1997. “This can only mean that the widespread acceptance of the practice in question rests on courtesy, cooperation and convenience, but not an agreed interpretation”. ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, Joint partly dissenting opinion judges Caflisch, Türmen and Kovler, §19. They added that the Committee of Ministers had not ‘seen fit to suggest the introduction of binding provisional measures in Draft Protocol No. 14’. “Again this must have been so because there was no agreement on making such measures compulsory and not because the Committee thought it superfluous to do anything on the assumption that provisional measures were binding”. Ibid.

¹⁶² The dissenters quoted from this letter, emphasising the words ‘indiquer’ and ‘souhaitable’. ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, Joint partly dissenting opinion judges Caflisch, Türmen and Kovler, §20.

¹⁶³ Id., §7.

tion securing the protection of human rights. In fact, the Grand Chamber itself makes a link to the claims and reparation that Cabral Barreto overlooks.

The Court's practice of using provisional measures in the context of Article 3 has been extensive.¹⁶⁴ The Court seems to indicate that its provisional measures to maintain the status quo pending the proceedings are essential for the effective exercise of the right of petition only in cases involving 'core rights' and it has specified these as the right to life (Article 2) and the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment (Article 3).

Indeed, ignoring provisional measures may not only result in a violation of Article 34, but in a violation of the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment, which have been referred to by the Court as 'core rights'. It would be ironic if the Court's provisional measures to prevent irreparable harm to claims involving such core rights would not be binding because the link with the right of petition would be less obvious.¹⁶⁵

Thus, while under general international law the object of provisional measures may relate to the maintenance of the status quo in general, the ECtHR did specifically refer to risk of irreparable harm to one of the 'core rights' under the ECHR.¹⁶⁶ In other words, it made a link with the importance of the rights claimed. It may be assumed that it did so exactly because it wished to confirm the obligatory nature of those provisional measures it had used thus far. Article 15 ECHR distinguishes certain rights as non-derogable, including the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment.

The Court has been established 'to ensure the observance of the engagements undertaken by the High Contracting Parties' (Article 19 ECHR). In order to perform this function properly, also in light of the Preamble (e.g. 'securing the universal and effective recognition and observance' of the rights in the Convention) the Court necessarily has the authority, pending adjudication, to order contracting parties to prevent irreparable harm to the life and personal integrity of individuals within their jurisdiction. This preventive authority is implied by its function of ensuring the observance of the human rights obligations undertaken by the States.

Under Rule 39 it could also use provisional measures to prevent irreparable harm to any other claim under the ECHR as well, not involving the right to life and the prohibition of torture or cruel treatment. While ignoring such provisional measures would hinder the right of petition as well, the risks involved would be less serious. Thus far the Court has on the whole abstained from using provisional measures that are entirely unrelated to non-derogable rights.¹⁶⁷ Indeed, as noted, it has stressed its practice of interpreting Rule 39 narrowly, (almost) only using provisional measures in the context of Articles 2 and 3 ECHR, referring to these rights as 'core rights'. Thus the Court is unlikely to argue that only those provisional measures are legally binding that would hinder the right of petition in the limited sense of access to the Court.

¹⁶⁴ In particular in non-refoulement cases.

¹⁶⁵ While not explicitly, by the mere fact of having been taken the Court's provisional measures of September 2008 in the inter-State case of Georgia v. Russia, confirm this. After all, these measures cannot be linked to the right of individual complaint, but they clearly involve core rights. ECtHR Press release issued by the Registrar, 'European Court of Human Rights grants request for interim measures', 12 August 2008.

¹⁶⁶ ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §108.

¹⁶⁷ EComHR Ennslin, Baader and Raspe v. FRG, 8 July 1978 (inadm.) related to preventing irreparable harm to the procedure in the sense of preserving evidence but in the context of an Article 3 claim. The first provisional measure in the Öcalan case concerned access to counsel, but in the context of a death penalty case. Admittedly, private and family life and interference with property rights do not directly relate to non-derogable rights. Nevertheless, these cases seem to be an exception to the rule. See further Chapter XII (Other situations).

The dissenters saw ‘little reason’ to rely heavily on the object and purpose of the treaty and on the Court’s ‘living instrument’ doctrine. Yet, they did not clarify how this issue differed from others in which the living instrument doctrine did apply. They only pointed out that the matter was not invoked in Cruz Varas. As noted, Cruz Varas was a close decision and following that judgment the Court often invoked both the living instrument approach and that of effet utile. In addition the Court has observed the attitudes of other adjudicators affirming the binding nature of provisional measures equally based on interpretations involving effet utile.

With regard to the dissenters’ reliance on the wording of the provisional measures taken by the Court in Mamatkulov, it must be noted that this is not an approach intended by the words used in this particular case. It is customary to phrase letters to respondent States this way, maybe for diplomatic reasons, although it would indeed be desirable to adapt its wording.¹⁶⁸

In my view the arguments of the Court must extend to inter-State cases. Admittedly, Article 33 ECHR does not specifically include the undertaking not to hinder the effective exercise of the right of High Contracting Parties to refer alleged breaches of the Convention to the Court. Nevertheless, the undertaking by the Contracting Parties to secure the right to life and the prohibition of torture and inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment to everyone within their jurisdiction, together with the Court’s task to adjudicate inter-State cases, argues in favour of the Court’s implicit authority to order provisional measures that are indeed legally binding.

2.4.4.4 REFERENCE TO OTHER HUMAN RIGHTS SYSTEMS

The overview of relevant international law and practice provided in the Mamatkulov Grand Chamber judgment is almost identical to that in the earlier judgment by the first section. With regard to human rights petition systems in which the constitutive document does not explicitly refer to the power to order provisional measures it discussed the Rule on provisional measures adopted by the HRC as well as its decisions that flouting these measures undermines the protection of Covenant rights through the OP. It quoted extensively from the HRC decision in Pian-diong (2000). The Grand Chamber also referred to the relevant rule adopted by the Committee against Torture and the latter’s decisions that non-compliance could nullify the end result of the proceedings before it. After having discussed these two universal systems of human rights protection, it referred to the ICJ’s interpretation of the obligations under Article 41 ICJ Statute, quoting extensively from the LaGrand case (2001). Finally, it referred to the relevant Rule of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights and the provision in the American Convention on the power of the Court to order provisional measures, noting that in James et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago the Inter-American Court determined that States must refrain from taking actions that may frustrate the restitutio in integrum of the rights of the alleged victims (1999).¹⁶⁹ The Court ¹⁶⁸ In a report to the General Assembly the Special Rapporteur listed recommendations to States with regard to combating torture. The following remark may be useful in this respect. He pointed out that ‘(s)ince these recommendations are presented in the language of recommendations, the word ‘should’ is consistently used’. He stressed, however, that ‘it must be understood that whenever these recommendations are directly based on obligations contained in legal instruments, the wording of these recommendations in no way detracts from these obligations’. The reference of the dissenters to the use of Rule 39 vis-à-vis the petitioner is interesting, as it illustrates the problems involved in this practice, as discussed in Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4 on the Addressees of provisional measures. Can the petitioner be found in violation of the Convention? Can the Court refuse to intervene to prevent irreparable harm until the petitioner respects the proceedings? Would continuing a hunger strike constitute contempt of court?

¹⁶⁹ See Chapter XIII (Protection) about the relationship with reparation.

did not mention the African Commission's Statement following the execution of Ken Saro-wiwa.¹⁷⁰

With regard to human rights petition systems in which the constitutive document does explicitly refer to the power to order provisional measures, the Grand Chamber referred to decisions of the Inter-American Court and the ICJ, but not to the provisions in the Optional Protocol to CEDAW and the Protocol establishing the African Court of Human Rights authorising the CEDAW Committee and the African Court, respectively, to use provisional measures.

The Court acknowledged that it had previously considered that it could not infer the power to order legally binding provisional measures from Article 34 ECHR or from other sources.¹⁷¹ Then it pointed out that this time it would also have regard to 'general principles of international law and the view expressed on this subject by other international bodies' since its decision in Cruz Varas.¹⁷² '[I]n that connection' it reiterated that the ECHR should be interpreted in light of the rules set out in the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (VCLT). It referred to Art. 31(3)(c) VCLT stipulating that account must be taken of 'any relevant rules of international law applicable in the relations between the parties'. It must 'determine the responsibility of the States in accordance with the principles of international law governing this sphere, while taking into account the special nature of the Convention as an instrument of human rights protection'.¹⁷³ "Thus, the Convention must be interpreted so far as possible consistently with the other principles of international law of which it forms a part".¹⁷⁴

It noted that in international legal disputes 'the purpose of interim measures is to preserve the parties' rights, thus enabling the body hearing the dispute to give effect to the consequences which a finding of responsibility following adversarial process will entail'.¹⁷⁵ The Court extensively referred to decisions by other international adjudicators emphasising the importance of provisional measures to ensure the effectiveness of their decision on the merits.

It first noted that different rules apply for each adjudicator and then referred to the case law of the HRC, CAT, the Inter-American Court and the ICJ.

In its LaGrand judgment the ICJ referred to 'the basic function of judicial settlement of international disputes by binding decisions'.¹⁷⁶ Apart from the terms of Article 41 ICJ Statute (on provisional measures) when read in their context, it followed from the object and purpose of that Statute 'that the power to indicate provisional measures entails that such measures should be binding, inasmuch as the power in question is based on the necessity, when the circumstances call for it, to safeguard, and to avoid prejudice to, the rights of the parties as determined by the final judgment of the Court'.¹⁷⁷

The dissenters did not mention the jurisprudence of the HRC and CAT. They simply noted that the earlier case law of the ECtHR did not allow 'reading a rule asserting the binding force of ¹⁷⁰ ACHPR International Pen, Constitutional Rights Project and Interights on behalf of Ken Saro-wiwa Jr. and Civil Liberties Organisation v. Nigeria, 31 October 1998, §115.

¹⁷¹ ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §109, referring to Cruz Varas and others v. Sweden, 20 March 1991 and Conka et al. v. Belgium, 13 March 2001 (partly admissible).

¹⁷² ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §110.

¹⁷³ ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §111, referring to Golder v. UK, 21 February 1975, §29.

¹⁷⁴ ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §111, referring to Grand Chamber, Al-Adsani v. UK, 21 November 2001, §60. On Article 31(3) (c) VCLT see Chapter II, section 8.

¹⁷⁵ ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §113.

¹⁷⁶ ICJ LaGrand (Germany v. US), Judgment of 27 June 2001, §102.

¹⁷⁷ Ibid.

interim measures into the Convention’ and that the ICJ’s judgment could not be relied on because the ICJ interpreted a provision of its own constitutive treaty.

The dissenters considered the Court’s reliance on the ICJ’s judgment in LaGrand misguided because the ICJ was called upon to interpret a provision of its own constitutive treaty. In this case there was ‘a close relation between the enabling treaty provision and the purpose to be reached’.¹⁷⁸

“By contrast, no such provision can be found in the European Convention on Human Rights; and neither Article 26(d) of that Convention, empowering the Court to enact rules of procedure, nor Article 34, instituting the right of individual application, is sufficiently connected to the issue under consideration to fill a ‘gap’ in the Convention by instituting binding interim measures ex nihilo, thereby imposing on the States Parties to the Convention an obligation without their consent. To put it differently, there is a wide difference between the mere interpretation of a treaty and its amendment, between the exercise of judicial functions and international law-making”.¹⁷⁹

They also noted that ‘Cruz Varas was confirmed, regarding measures issued by the Court itself, in the Conka case, only three months before the LaGrand judgment of the ICJ’.¹⁸⁰

According to the dissenters the judgments Cruz Varas and Conka mean ‘in essence, that while the Court is entitled to interpret the provisions of the Convention, it may not – by way of interpretation or through the enactment of rules of procedure, or both – write new rules into the Convention, not even if there is a fairly widespread practice in the desired sense, as long as that practice is not uniform (see Belgium’s attitude in Conka or that of Turkey in the present instance), accompanied by a corresponding opinio juris’.¹⁸¹

Finally, they argued that the meaning attributed by the ICJ to the authority to ‘indicate’ provisional measures cannot have an impact on the ECtHR as long as the Convention contains no authorisation to ‘indicate’ them.¹⁸²

2.4.4.5 EVALUATION OF THE DISSENTERS’ POSITION ON THE REFERENCE TO THE PRACTICE OF OTHER ADJUDICATORS

It is likely that the European Commission and Court included the possibility to use provisional measures in their rules of procedure because they considered this possibility essential to their function as an adjudicator. It is also likely that they chose the wording of Article 41 ICJ Statute to make a connection with existing law on this issue. In this sense the meaning attributed by the ICJ to its authority to ‘indicate’ provisional measures certainly can have an impact on the European Court’s interpretation.

By referring to uniform practice the dissenters seem to allude here to the development of customary international law without, however, specifying its relevance for the interpretation of the Convention obligations and the function of the Court. At the same time they consider that State practice should be ‘uniform’. They consider that the practice is not uniform because both Turkey and Belgium ignored the Court’s provisional measures in one case. Yet the ICJ deter-

¹⁷⁸ ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, Joint partly dissenting opinion judges Caflisch, Türmen and Kovler, §9.

¹⁷⁹ Id., §11.

¹⁸⁰ ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §15.

¹⁸¹ Id., Joint partly dissenting opinion judges Caflisch, Türmen and Kovler, §7.

¹⁸² Id., §21.

mined in its Nicaragua judgment that State practice does not have to be uniform, as long as Contracting States generally comply.¹⁸³ Only in the context of customary law that developed within a short time period would it be necessary to show extensive and virtually uniform State practice.¹⁸⁴

2.4.4.6 MAMATKULOV AND GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF INTERNATIONAL LAW

The ECtHR pointed out that in its examination of the Mamatkulov case it would also have regard to ‘general principles of international law and the view expressed on this subject by other international bodies’ since its decision in Cruz Varas.¹⁸⁵ It noted that ‘in the light of the general principles of international law, the law of treaties and international case-law, the interpretation of the scope of interim measures cannot be dissociated from the proceedings to which they relate or the decision on the merits they seek to protect’.¹⁸⁶ It referred to Article 31(1) Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties stipulating that treaties must be interpreted in good faith in the light of their object and purpose ‘and also in accordance with the principle of effectiveness’.¹⁸⁷

In fact while the Court referred to general principles of law it did not specify which particular principles of international law it considered applicable.¹⁸⁸ Yet when looking at the judgment as a whole the Court does recognize a principle of law underlying the case law of the various adjudicators. It observed that the ICJ, the IACHR, the HRC and CAT, while obviously operating under different treaty provisions, all ‘have confirmed in their reasoning in recent decisions that the preservation of the asserted rights of the parties in the face of the risk of irreparable damage represents an essential objective of interim measures in international law’.

“Indeed it can be said that, whatever the legal system in question, the proper administration of justice requires that no irreparable action be taken while proceedings are pending”.¹⁸⁹

Moreover, the Court reiterated the importance of having remedies with suspensive effect in deportation or extradition proceedings.

¹⁸³ ICJ Case concerning Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. US), 27 June 1986, §186. The ICJ considered that ‘for a rule to be established as customary’ the corresponding practice did not have to be ‘in absolutely rigorous conformity with the rule’. It deemed it ‘sufficient that the conduct of States should, in general, be consistent with such rules, and that instances of State conduct inconsistent with a given rule should generally have been treated as breaches of that rule, not as indications of the recognition of a new rule’. To find a rule of customary international law the traditional approach is to look at opinio iuris and practice of States, not adjudicators and it is not clear whether States generally complied because they considered they were legally bound to do so or simply out of comity.

¹⁸⁴ See ICJ North Sea Continental Shelf (Germany v. the Netherlands), 20 February 1969, §74.

¹⁸⁵ ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §110.

¹⁸⁶ Id., §123.

¹⁸⁷ Ibid. Note that Article 31(1) Vienna Convention does not specifically refer to the principle of effectiveness. Instead the practice of international adjudicators have understood this as an interpretative principle related to object and purpose.

¹⁸⁸ With regard to the principle of effectiveness it probably meant a principle of treaty interpretation, not of law. See also section 4 of this Chapter.

¹⁸⁹ ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §124.

“The notion of an effective remedy under Article 13 requires a remedy capable of preventing the execution of measures that are contrary to the Convention and whose effects are potentially irreversible”.¹⁹⁰

It argued that the notion of an effective remedy mentioned in Article 13 ECHR is a principle inherent in the Convention, applicable not only to the domestic proceedings but also to the international proceedings before the ECtHR.

“It is hard to see why this principle of the effectiveness of remedies for the protection of an individual’s human rights should not be an inherent Convention requirement in international proceedings before the Court, whereas it applies to proceedings in the domestic legal system”.¹⁹¹

In that sense the Court appears to argue it is a general principle of law that remedies aiming to protect against (human rights) violations should be effective.¹⁹² Based on this principle, the Court’s provisional measures necessarily must be binding. After all, ‘under the Convention system, interim measures, as they have consistently been applied in practice’ (...) ‘play a vital role in avoiding irreversible situations that would prevent the Court from properly examining the application and, where appropriate, securing to the applicant the practical and effective benefit of the Convention rights asserted. Accordingly, in these conditions a failure by a respondent State to comply with interim measures will undermine the effectiveness of the right of individual application guaranteed by Article 34 and the State’s formal undertaking in Article 1 to protect the rights and freedoms set forth in the Convention’.¹⁹³

Provisional measures do not only permit the Court ‘to carry out an effective examination of the application but also to ensure that the protection afforded to the applicant by the Convention is effective; such indications also subsequently allow the Committee of Ministers to supervise execution of the final judgment. Such measures thus enable the State concerned to discharge its obligation to comply with the final judgment of the Court, which is legally binding by virtue of Article 46 of the Convention’.¹⁹⁴

The dissenting opinion provides the opportunity to further discuss some relevant issues. The dissenters challenged the argument that in order to meet the object and purpose of the right of individual complaint laid down in Art. 34 it is indispensable to accept the mandatory character of such measures. They considered that while this may be the case domestically, this is not so internationally. They advanced several reasons relevant to the discussion on general principles of international law. One is that ‘States are entirely free to accept or to refuse compulsory jurisdiction of international courts and, if they do accept it, to limit its scope, for instance by not including rules on the binding character of provisional measures’.¹⁹⁵ They contrast this to the domestic level, ‘where the principle of compulsory jurisdiction of the courts prevails’.¹⁹⁶

¹⁹⁰ Ibid., referring to Čonka and others v. Belgium, 5 February 2002, §79.

¹⁹¹ ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §124.

¹⁹² At the same time it is a general principle of interpretation that the provisions of a treaty should be interpreted so as to ensure their practical and effective implementation.

¹⁹³ ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §125.

¹⁹⁴ Ibid.

¹⁹⁵ ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, Joint partly dissenting opinion judges Caflisch, Türmen and Kovler, §16. In this respect the dissenters refer to Article 47 (arbitration procedure) of the Washington (World Bank) Convention on the Settlement of Investment Disputes (1965).

¹⁹⁶ Ibid.

Another reason they advanced involves the relationship between Article 34 ECHR and the Court's provisional measures. The majority found that by ignoring its provisional measures the State had hindered the effective exercise of the right of individual complaint. The dissenters point out that '[b]y providing for interim measures and, a fortiori, by not vesting them with binding force, the right of individual application is "hindered" in no way; and to say the contrary would stretch the interpretation of Article 34 to a point at which the Court ceases to interpret and assumes legislative functions'.¹⁹⁷

They added that the fact that 'this is so is shown by other instruments of dispute settlement: nowhere else have jurisdiction and the right of application been linked to the issuance and the binding force of interim measures'.¹⁹⁸

In this context they pointed out that the argument in LaGrand was based on Article 41 ICJ Statute and its reference to the Court's power to 'indicate' provisional measures. It was not based on Article 35 ICJ Statute, which was 'the approximate equivalent' of Article 34 ECHR. Moreover, Article 63(2) ACHR enabled the Inter-American Court to order provisional measures, but Article 34 ECHR could not serve as a 'reasonable legal basis for drawing a similar conclusion'.¹⁹⁹

The dissenters considered that 'there may well be a widespread rule on obligatory interim measures on the domestic level, based on the rule of compulsory jurisdiction applicable on that level'. On the other hand, 'that rule does not prevail on the international level, which is why it cannot be applied as such on that level'. "In other words, the principle cannot be transposed to the business of international courts".²⁰⁰ They concluded as follows:

"There must, however, be a customary rule allowing international courts and tribunals, even in the absence of a treaty provision, to enact Rules of Procedure, a rule which may include the power to formulate interim measures. But that rule cannot be taken to include the power to prescribe such measures".²⁰¹

2.4.4.7 EVALUATION OF THE DISSENTING OPINION WITH REGARD TO GENERAL PRINCIPLES

It seems that the dissenters recognise a general principle of domestic law that provisional measures are legally binding, but that they consider that this cannot be a general principle of international law because there is no rule of compulsory jurisdiction at the international level. Still, in my view once States have recognised an international adjudicator, the same principle of effectiveness applies that requires provisional measures to be binding on the domestic level.

In view of the fact that they start out by mentioning not only general principles of law, but also 'general international law', the reference of the dissenters to a 'customary rule' probably relates to customary international law. They consider that international courts and tribunals may ¹⁹⁷ Ibid. The third reason why they consider that on the international level the effectiveness argument does not apply is that 'one should not forget that for many years international tribunals such as the Permanent Court of International Justice (1920-1939) and its successor, the ICJ, for most of its existence (1946 to 2001), confined themselves to indicating provisional measures without specifying their binding character'.

¹⁹⁸ Ibid.

¹⁹⁹ Ibid.

²⁰⁰ ECtHR Grand Chamber Joint partly Dissenting Opinion judges Caflisch, Türmen and Kovler, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §22.

²⁰¹ Id., §23.

formulate provisional measures but not to prescribe them. They relate the power to formulate such measures to the ‘customary rule’ allowing adjudicators to enact Rules of Procedure.

The reference by the dissenters to the Washington Convention on the Settlement of Investment Disputes is not entirely clear. They mention this Convention to illustrate that States are free to limit the scope of compulsory jurisdiction by not including rules on the binding character of provisional measures. Article 47 of the Washington Convention on the Settlement of Investment Disputes stipulates:

“Except as the parties otherwise agree, the Tribunal may, if it considers that the circumstances so require, recommend any provisional measures which should be taken to preserve the respective rights of either party”.

The fact, however, that in one treaty States explicitly include the possibility for parties to agree that the Tribunal may not use provisional measures does not negate the general principle of the inherent power to use provisional measures in systems of adjudication in which this power is not explicitly excluded. Neither does the fact that the language with regard to provisional measures used in this treaty is rather weak. Moreover, this example is derived from a commercial law treaty, making the comparison with the ECHR less appropriate. After all, the object and purpose of a human rights adjudication system such as that established under the ECHR, even more clearly than an adjudication system such as that established under the ICJ Statute, with general jurisdiction,²⁰² requires the use of provisional measures to prevent irreparable harm to, at least, life and personal integrity.

The dissenters’ reliance on the fact that Article 63(2) ACHR explicitly enables the Court to order provisional measures and on the fact that the ICJ’s judgment in LaGrand was based on a provision of the ICJ Statute specifically dealing with provisional measures (Article 41 ICJ Statute) does not convince. The fact that these courts obviously also refer to the provisions that specifically relate to provisional measures does not mean that they consider that there is no inherent authority to use binding provisional measures. As discussed, the IACHR has not just referred to Article 63(2) ACHR as the basis for its authority to order provisional measures, but also to Article 62(3) ACHR on reparation, to Article 33 ACHR on the competence of the Commission and Court ‘with respect to matters relating to the fulfilment of the commitments’ by the States parties as well as to ‘the judicial character of the Court and the powers derived therefrom’.²⁰³ It has stressed ‘the Convention’s fundamental objective of guaranteeing the effective protection of human rights’ and pointed out that “States Parties must not take any action that will frustrate the restitutio in integrum of the rights of the alleged victims”.²⁰⁴

In LaGrand the ICJ referred to the object and purpose of the ICJ Statute and considered that the power to indicate provisional measures entailed ‘that such measures should be binding, inasmuch as the power in question is based on the necessity, when the circumstances call for it, to safeguard, and to avoid prejudice to, the rights of the parties as determined by the final judgment of the Court’.²⁰⁵ It also referred to the principle ‘universally accepted by the international tribunals and likewise laid down in many conventions (...) to the effect that the parties to a case must abstain from any measure capable of exercising a prejudicial effect in regard to the execution of ²⁰² See Chapter I (ICJ).

²⁰³ IACHR Velásquez Rodríguez, Fairén Garbi, Solís Corrales and Godínez Cruz cases, Order of 19 January 1988, 1st ‘Considering’ clause.

²⁰⁴ IACHR James, Briggs, Noel, García and Bethel, Order for provisional measures, 14 June 1998.

²⁰⁵ ICJ LaGrand (Germany v. US), Judgment of 27 June 2001, §102.

the decision to be given, and, in general, not allow any step of any kind to be taken which might aggravate or extend the dispute’.²⁰⁶

Aside from this general principle that States must refrain from causing prejudice to the ‘execution of the decision to be given’, the HRC and CAT, to which the ECtHR does refer, and the African Commission, to which it does not refer, have in fact linked jurisdiction, the right of petition to the obligation to respect their provisional measures, focussing on the obligation to ensure respect for the ‘core rights’ in the treaties. Specifically, the human rights adjudicators have made the link between the importance of the rights to be protected and the binding nature of their provisional measures.

The case law of the ECtHR confirms this. An indication of the importance it attaches to Articles 2 (right to life) and 3 ECHR (prohibition of torture and cruel treatment) is the fact that it has noted that in expulsion and extradition cases it is only with regard to these rights that the obligation under Article 1 ECHR applied to ensure the Convention rights to everyone under their jurisdiction. The far reaching obligation not to expel or extradite is derived from the special nature of these articles, requiring a reading in conjunction with Article 1 ECHR, implying the principle of non-refoulement.²⁰⁷

Similarly, it is in the context of the right to life and the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment that effective proceedings before an international adjudicator trigger the inherent power to order legally binding provisional measures. The system of adjudication (both individual complaint and inter-State) is undermined in particular by acts threatening the right to life and the prohibition of torture as shown in the relation between provisional measures and the right to reparation.²⁰⁸ It is exactly in such cases that States are legally bound to comply with provisional measures because without them the system of individual complaint itself is made nugatory, as the HRC calls it, and restitution in kind would be made impossible.

2.4.4.8 EXPLAINING THE REVERSAL

The ECtHR observed that in Cruz Varas it only determined the question whether the European Commission had power to order legally binding provisional measures. It noted that former Article 25 applied only to proceedings brought before the Commission, adding that it conferred upon the petitioner a right of a procedural nature distinguishable from the substantive rights in the Convention. “The Court thus confined itself to examining the Commission’s power to order interim measures, not its own”.²⁰⁹ The Grand Chamber emphasised that ‘unlike the Court and the Committee of Ministers, the Commission had no power to issue a binding decision that a Contracting State had violated the Convention’. “The Commission’s task with regard to the merits was of a preliminary nature and its opinion on whether or not there had been a violation of the Convention was not binding”.²¹⁰

²⁰⁶ ICJ LaGrand (Germany v. US), Judgment of 27 June 2001, §103, quoting from PCIJ Electricity Company of Sofia and Bulgaria, Order of 5 December 1939, p. 199.

²⁰⁷ See Chapter V (Halting expulsion and extradition).

²⁰⁸ See Chapter XIII (Protection).

²⁰⁹ ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §118.

²¹⁰ Id., §119.

With regard to Cruz Varas it stated that '[w]hile the Court is not formally bound to follow its previous judgments, in the interests of legal certainty and foreseeability it should not depart, without good reason, from its own precedents'.²¹¹

"However, it is of crucial importance that the Convention is interpreted and applied in a manner which renders its rights practical and effective, not theoretical and illusory. It is a living instrument which must be interpreted in the light of present-day conditions".²¹²

In addition, the Court stressed 'that although the Convention right to individual application was originally intended as an optional part of the system of protection, it has over the years become of high importance and is now a key component of the machinery for protecting the rights and freedoms set forth in the Convention'.²¹³ Moreover, since the entry into force of Protocol 11 'the right of individual application is no longer dependent on a declaration by the Contracting States'.

"Thus, individuals now enjoy at the international level a real right of action to assert the rights and freedoms to which they are directly entitled under the Convention".²¹⁴

The dissenters extensively quoted from Cruz Varas v. Sweden (1991) and noted that in Čonka v. Belgium (2001) the Court confirmed this decision in the context of its own provisional measures. Thus, they pointed out that the majority's interpretation in Mamatkulov that Cruz Varas concerned only the Commission's power to order provisional measures 'is not very persuasive in the light of the Čonka decision, where the Court reiterated the principles set out in Cruz Varas with regard to its own jurisdiction'. They considered that there had not been any change since Čonka that would justify the 'diametrically opposite conclusion' in Mamatkulov and reiterated that the Court 'should not depart, without good reason, from its own precedents'.²¹⁵

2.4.4.9 EVALUATION OF THE COURT'S EXPLANATION OF THE REVERSAL

Indeed the distinction the Court draws between the provisional measures of the Court and those of the Commission, so as to justify the revision of its case law, is not very convincing. Even if the Commission's task with regard to the merits 'was of a preliminary nature' it was the first adjudicator responsible for dealing with individual complaints. If the Contracting States were free to ignore the provisional measures by the Commission, the Court noted, in reference to the ICJ, it would be 'hampered in the exercise of its functions because the respective rights of the parties' to the dispute before it were not preserved.

²¹¹ Id., §121, referring to Tyrer v. UK, 25 April 1978, §31 and Christine Goodwin v. UK, 11 July 2002, §75. In Mamatkulov the Grand Chamber referred to, but did not discuss Čonka. ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §120. Two of the seven Judges of the Third Section that decided on admissibility in Čonka also took part in the Chamber decision. They were not among the dissenters. For Čonka see Conka et al. v. Belgium, Judgment of 13 March 2001 (partly admissible).

²¹² ECtHR Grand Chamber Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §121, referring to Tyrer v. UK, 25 April 1978, §31 and Christine Goodwin v. UK, 11 July 2002, §75.

²¹³ ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §122.

²¹⁴ Ibid.

²¹⁵ ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, Joint partly dissenting opinion judges Caflisch, Türmen and Kovler, §6.

Moreover, the arguments with regard to effectiveness and object and purpose invoked by the Grand Chamber, as well as by the various adjudicators it referred to in its judgment, seem to apply also to the Commission's provisional measures and must sound familiar to the members of the Commission and the dissenters in the Court's Cruz Varas judgment.

The distinction made between the legal status of the provisional measures by the Commission and the Court is a somewhat artificial attempt to pretend no shift in the case law has taken place. Even if the crucial element of Cruz Varas had indeed been the distinction between the Commission and the Court, as the Court seems to argue in Mamatkulov, the admissibility decision in Čonka v. Belgium clearly indicated that, based on Cruz Varas, the Court's provisional measures were not legally binding either. Čonka, of course, is not a very persuasive precedent, because the Third Section, in a composition of seven Judges deciding on admissibility, did not really discuss and analyse the issue. The fact that it summarily confirmed the controversial judgment in Cruz Varas, decided more than ten years previously, with the narrowest of margins, seems more of an oversight than anything else.

In that sense it would have been preferable had the Court explicitly acknowledged its shift from Cruz Varas and Čonka to Mamatkulov.²¹⁶

It did refer to its general case law on departing from earlier decisions regarding the interests of legal certainty and foreseeability and 'the orderly development of the Convention case-law' and to equality before the law.²¹⁷ Such concerns, however, 'would not prevent the Court from departing from an earlier decision if it was persuaded that there were cogent reasons for doing so. Such a departure might, for example, be warranted in order to ensure that the interpretation of the Convention reflects societal changes and remains in line with present-day conditions'.²¹⁸

"However, since the Convention is first and foremost a system for the protection of human rights, the Court must have regard to the changing conditions within the respondent State and within Contracting States generally and respond, for example to any evolving convergence as to the standards to be achieved".²¹⁹

In this context the Court has proposed to 'look at the situation within and outside the Contracting State to assess "in the light of present-day conditions" what is now the appropriate interpretation and application of the Convention'.²²⁰

"It is of crucial importance that the Convention is interpreted and applied in a manner which renders its rights practical and effective, not theoretical and illusory. A failure by the Court to ²¹⁶ See also Oellers-Frahm (2003), pp. 692-693 discussing the earlier Chamber decision in Mamatkulov (arguing that the positive step made by the Court to strengthen the effectiveness of the ECHR protection system could have been made explicit) and Tams (2003), p. 689 (considering that the Court's approach to precedent was deceptive because in Mamatkulov its conclusion was exactly the opposite of that in Cruz Varas. The Court's judgment would have been more convincing if it had explicitly acknowledged the change in the jurisprudence).

²¹⁷ See e.g. ECtHR Cossey v. UK, 27 September 1990, §35 (orderly development) and Chapman v. UK, 18 January 2001, §70, Goodwin v. UK, 11 July 2002, §74 and Stafford v. UK, 28 May 2002, §68 (equality before the law).

²¹⁸ ECtHR Cossey v. UK, 27 September 1990, §35. Subsequently the Court used the phrase 'good reason' (rather than 'cogent reasons'). See e.g. Goodwin v. UK, 11 July 2002, §74.

²¹⁹ See e.g. ECtHR Goodwin v. UK, 11 July 2002, §74, Stafford v. UK, 28 May 2002, §68 and Chapman v. UK, 18 January 2001, §70.

²²⁰ See e.g. ECtHR Goodwin v. UK, 11 July 2002, §75, Stafford v. UK, 28 May 2002, §69 and references therein.

maintain a dynamic and evolutive approach would risk rendering a bar to reform or improvement".²²¹

While the development to which the Court refers, including the now (since Protocol 11) obligatory respect for the right of petition, is indeed significant, the individuals petitioning the Court in the pre-Protocol 11 period equally enjoyed 'a real right of action' to assert their rights under the Convention. The fact that the Contracting State previously had taken the additional step of recognising the competence of the Court does not detract from the obligations of that State. Through its recognition of the competence of the Court the Contracting State had committed itself to preserve the rights claimed pending the proceedings and not to hinder the right of individual application. There was also good reason to now rule on the basis of the effectiveness approach generally used by the Court.

The Court's judgment generally has been welcomed.²²² Indeed, the prohibition of torture was part of the Convention from the outset, as was the idea that the Convention's substantive rights must be effectively ensured. Procedural rights intended to make effective substantive rights, such as the right not to be exposed to torture, must be interpreted so as to do just that. Procedural rights always assume the existence of substantive rights. Article 34 ECHR (and former Article 25 ECHR) refers to the obligation not to hinder the right of petition in any way. The open-ended phrase 'in any way' indicates that the drafters left it to the Court to fill in what this means in practice. Ignoring provisional measures appears to be a very good way to hinder the effective exercise of the right of petition.

The power to take provisional measures may be implied given the function of human rights adjudicators. In line with the principle of effectiveness applied in the interpretation of human rights treaties the binding nature of provisional measures is inherent to the effective exercise of this power.

The power to take such measures can be presumed to be implied in the task of judicial bodies supervising human rights treaties and the principle that these measures must be binding may be inherent in the concept of the protection of human rights. In any case it is implied in the State's recognition of the right of individual petition and of the substantive rights in the Convention.

It is, furthermore, doubtful whether a 'uniform legal rule' is necessary to prove the existence of a general principle. In my view such principle can be derived from national practices on provisional or interlocutory measures. These may be filled in differently in different places, but that only denies its existence as a 'uniform rule', not as a concept or general principle. The concept represented by these measures has been applied in general international law to provide for the possibility of provisional measures in cases of international contention. Provisional measures in national law are legally binding and must be so, in order to perform their judicial function. There is no reason to assume otherwise in international law.

The judgment of the Grand Chamber, in its conclusion, does not refer to the prevention of irreparable harm and does not make an explicit link between Article 34 and Article 3.²²³ On the other hand, earlier in the judgment it does refer to the 'core rights' under the Convention, irrepa-²²¹ See Stafford v. UK, 28 May 2002, §68. In fact the Court also used this argument in his decision in Mamatkulov, 15 December 2004, §121.

²²² Discussing the 2003 and/or 2005 judgments see e.g. Letsas (2003), pp. 527-538; Oellers-Frahm (2003), p. 689; Tigroudja (2003), p. 601 (disagreeing); Rieter (2004), pp. 73-87; Cohen-Jonathan (2005b), pp. 283-307; Cohen-Jonathan (2005d); Rieter (2005), pp. 320-324; Vermeulen/de Vries (2005); Barkhuysen (2005); Bruin (2005); Mowbray (2005), pp. 377-386 (somewhat critical).

²²³ See ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §§128-129.

rable damage and the fact that the petitioners in this case were asserting rights under Articles 2 and 3.²²⁴

2.4.4.10 DEVELOPMENTS SINCE MAMATKULOV

Since Mamatkulov the Court's case law has evolved. In Olaechea Cahuas v. Spain (2006) the ECtHR noted, referring to a jurisprudential evolution of the relevant principles, that in Mamatkulov it had removed itself from its earlier case law on provisional measures (e.g. Cruz Varas (1991) and Conka (2001)).²²⁵ It recalled that it applied Rule 39 strictly, ordering provisional measures only in a limited range of cases in which there is an imminent risk of irreparable harm.²²⁶ It further noted that in Shamayev et al. v. Georgia and Russia (2005) it had refined this conclusion with the statement that the fact that it was able to examine the case on the merits did not mean that Article 34 ECHR was not violated.²²⁷ Finally, it referred to Aoulmi, in which it stressed that the fact that the obligatory nature of its provisional measures had not yet been made explicit at the time of the expulsion did not detract from the obligations of the State under Article 34. It pointed out that this was the first time that the Court used the adjective 'obligatory' when referring to its provisional measures.²²⁸

In the cases Mamatkulov, Shamayev and Aoulmi the State had ignored the Court's provisional measures. Moreover, the Court had noted that, in addition, upon the extradition or expulsion of the petitioners their lawyers had lost all contact with their clients. It found violations of Article 34 ECHR. In Aoulmi, for instance, the Court first concluded, more generally, that 'the level of protection that the Court was able to afford the rights which he was asserting under Article 3 of the Convention was irreversibly reduced'. It then added that 'the gathering of evidence in support of the applicant's allegations' had 'proved more complex' as his lawyer had 'lost all contact with him since his expulsion'.²²⁹

Olaechea Cahuas v. Spain (2006) can be distinguished from the previous three cases to the extent that counsel was able to stay in touch with the petitioner after he had been extradited in violation of the Court's provisional measures. In this case the ECtHR pointed out that one question that still needed an explicit answer was whether the obligation of States to respect provisional measures was based on the finding ex post that the effective exercise of the right of petition was hindered upon removal. The Court considered that there was a clear difference with the previous cases and in that sense it could not conclude that the right to individual petition had been hindered.²³⁰ Nevertheless, this conclusion, based on information received subsequent to the use of

²²⁴ See ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §108. On this issue see also Tams (2003), p. 688.

²²⁵ ECtHR Case of Cruz Varas and Others v. Sweden, Judgment of 20 March 1991 and Conka et al. v. Belgium, Judgment of 13 March 2001 (partly admissible).

²²⁶ ECtHR Olaechea Cahuas v. Spain, Judgment of 10 August 2006 (5th Section), §72, referring to Mamatkulov, §§103-104 and 128.

²²⁷ ECtHR Olaechea Cahuas v. Spain, Judgment of 10 August 2006, §73.

²²⁸ Id., §74, referring to Mamatkulov, §111.

²²⁹ ECtHR Aoulmi v. France, Judgment of 17 January 2006 (4th Section), §104. See also Mamatkulov and Askarov, 15 December 2004, §127; Shamayev et al. v. Georgia and Russia, Judgment 16 September 2003 (2nd Section) (inadm.), §478 and Aoulmi, Judgment of 17 January 2006, §93.

²³⁰ ECtHR Olaechea Cahuas v. Spain, Judgment of 10 August 2006, §79. The Court expresses it as follows: "En conséquence, il n'est pas possible de conclure à l'existence d'une entrave, dans le sens des affaires précitées, au droit au recours effectif du requérant". In fact it may have meant provisional measures did not relieve the State from its obligation not to hinder in any way the effective exercise of the right protected by Article 34 ECHR. The ECtHR pointed out that Article 34 ECHR was in fact closely linked to the Rule on provisional measures laid down in Article 39 of its Rules. This Rule enabled the Court to consider whether the petitioner would run a risk of irreparable harm because of an act or omission by the State. It added that, consequently, Rule 39 enabled it to consider whether such act or omission would hinder the effective exercise of the right of petition.²³¹

More in particular the Court wished to point out that a provisional measure, by its nature, is provisional. Its necessity is evaluated at one particular moment in time by reason of the existence of a risk that could hinder the effective exercise of the right of petition in Article 34 ECHR. If the State party respects the provisional measure this risk is avoided and a future hindrance of the right of petition is eliminated. On the other hand, if the State does not respect the provisional measure, the risk of the obstruction of the effective exercise of this right continues and subsequent facts, as well as the State's non-compliance itself, determine whether the risk has become a reality or not. Yet even if it has not become a reality, the Court's provisional measure must be considered legally binding. Whether or not Article 34 ECHR is violated cannot depend on the eventual confirmation of the existence of the risk. The fact that a State fails to respect a provisional measure decided by the Court, in light of the existence of a risk, is in itself a grave hindrance, at that particular moment, of the effective exercise of the right of individual petition.²³² This was confirmed and specified in Paladi (2007) where the Court pointed out that a delay in the implementation of a provisional measure could also constitute a violation of Article 34 ECHR. It is not necessary to provide evidence of actual harm during the period of delay. Evidence of a risk of irreparable harm to one of the 'core Convention rights' is sufficient to trigger state responsibility.²³³

3 PRINCIPLES OF INTERPRETATION AND GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF LAW

The power to order provisional measures has been referred to as an inherent part of the judicial function.²³⁴ In addition, the PCIJ already noted in the Electricity Company of Sofia in Bulgaria case (1939) that Article 41 on provisional measures applied the principle 'universally accepted by international tribunals and likewise laid down in many conventions to which Bulgaria has been a party – to the effect that the parties to a case must abstain from any measure capable of exercising a prejudicial effect in regard to the execution of the decision to be given and, in general, not allow any step of any kind to be taken which might aggravate or extend the dispute'.²³⁵

In both national and international systems for the settlement of legal disputes, the power to use provisional measures is a necessary attribute of the judicial function and the obligation to that the right of petition was not hindered to the same extent as the cases mentioned previously. On Olaechea see also Woltjer (2006); Rieter (2007) and Haack/Burbano Herrera/Zwaak (2008).

²³¹ ECtHR Olaechea Cahuas v. Spain, Judgment of 10 August 2006, §80, referring to Mamatkulov, §108.

²³² ECtHR Olaechea Cahuas v. Spain, Judgment of 10 August 2006, §81.

²³³ ECtHR Paladi v. Moldova, 10 July 2007. See further Rieter (2007).

²³⁴ Judge Sir Gerald Fitzmaurice, in his Separate Opinion in the ICJ Northern Cameroons case, Judgment of 2 December 1963 (preliminary objections), p. 103 noted that it is 'really an inherent jurisdiction, the power to exercise which is a necessary condition of the Court or of any court of law-being able to function at all'. See also Judge Singh in the ICJ Nuclear Test cases, Order of 22 June 1973, p. 145 noting that Article 41 reflects an inherent power.

²³⁵ PCIJ Electricity Company of Sofia and Bulgaria (Belgium v. Bulgaria), Order of 5 December 1939, p. 199. See also Chapter I (ICJ).

respect them is necessitated by the effective protection of the right to life and the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment of those making use of the right of petition. After all the principle of effectiveness or effet utile is a principle of interpretation of particular relevance in human rights cases.²³⁶ Indeed, such provisional measures by international adjudicators 'must carry some connotation of obligation if they are to fulfil their function of ensuring some efficacy to the final outcome of the proceedings'.²³⁷

As discussed in Chapter II, it may be assumed that States have recognized supervisory mechanisms to human rights treaties in good faith, meaning that the human rights adjudicators established by these treaties have genuinely been assigned the task of monitoring compliance with, and therefore interpreting, the provisions of the treaty. Thus the practice developed by the human rights adjudicators arguably establishes the agreement of the parties regarding their interpretation, exactly because these adjudicators were created under the treaty in order to interpret it.²³⁸

As noted, apart from the relevance of the subsequent practice developed by the adjudicators to the interpretation of treaty provisions, 'judicial decisions' also constitute 'subsidiary means for the determination of international law'.²³⁹ These may be domestic or international judicial decisions. The phrase 'judicial decisions' is used, rather than 'court decisions', which potentially includes the decisions made in individual cases by treaty monitoring bodies.²⁴⁰

Thus, in light of their special protective function it is argued that human rights adjudicators have the implied power to order binding provisional measures. They are binding through legal interpretation, as the power to use them is necessarily implied in the task of bodies supervising human rights treaties and their binding nature is based on a principle inherent in the concept of the protection of human rights together with the explicit duty of State parties to co-operate in good faith with the supervisory bodies. Once a State recognizes an individual complaint system it is bound not to frustrate it.²⁴¹

While a general principle of law is a source of law and a general principle of interpretation is a method rather than a source, it is not always easy to distinguish between the two in concrete cases.²⁴² Both principles of interpretation and principles of law are developed and applied by ²³⁶ See e.g. IACHR Colotenango (Guatemala), Order of 5 September 2001, 5th 'Considering' clause; ECtHR (First Section) Mamatkulov and Abdurasulovic v. Turkey, Judgment of 6 February 2003, §109 and ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, Judgment adopted on 15 December 2004, published on 4 February 2005.

²³⁷ Harrington (2003), p. 58. See generally Elkind (1981), p. 169, who points out, p. 170, that provisional measures are not merely procedural and that the power to indicate them cannot be equated with the power to fix deadlines, admit counter claims or permit the intervention of third parties. In the context of human rights see e.g. Bernhardt (1994), p. 102. See also Pasqualucci (2005), p. 16 ('The argument that interim measures are essential to the competence granted to quasi-judicial enforcement bodies by the States and that such measures are, therefore, implied in the underlying treaty is compelling and necessary to the fabric of international law').

²³⁸ Of course States will sometimes argue that adjudicators overstepped their mark and tried to create rather than interpret the law. This is a discussion that cannot be avoided. It means in any case that adjudicators must motivate their findings, with a thorough and coherent legal analysis. See also Mahoney (1990), pp. 57-88, arguing, in the context of the practice of the ECtHR, that judicial activism and judicial self-restraint are two sides of the same coin.

²³⁹ Article 38(1)(d) ICJ Statute.

²⁴⁰ See further Chapter II (Systems), section 8.

²⁴¹ See also Harrington (2003), p. 63.

²⁴² It is not always self-evident whether, for instance, this functional approach is derived from the general principle of effectiveness as a general principle of law, or whether it is a method of adjudicators and, in this case, are quite interrelated as to contents (the general principle of law possibly triggering the choice of certain interpretation methods over others). This is why they are discussed together in this section.

The interpretative principle of effet utile applies to procedural standards as well, in particular the right of individual complaint and ‘the acceptance of the contentious competence of the judiciary organ of protection’.²⁴³ In the context of human rights treaties the principle of effet utile creates a presumption that the most protective interpretation is warranted.

General principles of (international) law are used by adjudicators in order to fill gaps left by treaty law and customary law. Some principles are derived directly from the concept of law or from legal logic. Others originate from the domestic law of many States. Examples are nullum crimen sine poena, the obligation to compensate for harm caused and procedural protection of criminal defendants. Other general principles of international law are derived directly from (developments in) international law. Examples are the principles of state responsibility, the notion that each violation requires a remedy, which may in turn include restitutio in integrum and the jurisdictional principle of compétence de la compétence.²⁴⁴ The principle of good faith application and interpretation of international obligations, for instance, is often seen as the ultimate general principle of law.²⁴⁵

Cohen-Jonathan, for instance, has pointed out that any proper administration of justice, whether internal or international, means to safeguard the rights invoked by the parties, and that this is the case with a particular vigilance and rapidity when there is a risk of irreparable harm to fundamental human rights.²⁴⁶ Ordering provisional measures is a power inherent to the function of each tribunal. This is in fact an expression of a general principle of international law in the sense of Article 38(1) (c) ICJ Statute.²⁴⁷

As discussed, human rights adjudicators, alleged victims, NGOs and States appear to have assumed, even if implicitly, the existence of the principle of effective protection to prevent irreparable harm to persons as a fundamental norm around which the human rights system is built.²⁴⁸

Several human rights adjudicators have been inspired by each other’s case law and have elaborated on and applied norms found in all human rights systems with regard to preventing interpretation in itself. I would argue, however, that it is a general principle of interpretation rather than a general principle of law as a source of law as it is always related to a substantive rule that must be applied such as to have the intended effect. Yet the reason for choosing the principle of effectiveness when interpreting the treaty obligations of States may be a general principle of law, as discussed infra.

²⁴³ IACHR Judgment on preliminary objections in Constantine et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago, 1 September 2001, separate opinion of judge A.A. Cançado Trindade, §15.

²⁴⁴ On general principles of (international) law as a source of international law, see e.g. Cheng (1953).

²⁴⁵ See e.g. treaty references in Article 2(2) UN Charter and Article 31 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties; see also ICJ Nuclear Test Cases (New Zealand v. France), Judgment of 20 December 1974, §46 (France was expected to live up to its unilateral declaration not to continue atmospheric testing: “Just as the very rule of pacta sunt servanda in the law of treaties is based on good faith, so also is the binding character of an international obligation assumed by unilateral declaration”) and Nuclear Test Cases (Australia v. France), judgment of 20 December 1974, §49. See ICJ Border and Transborder Armed Actions (Nicaragua v. Honduras), Judgment of 20 December 1988, §94 (the principle of good faith is an underlying principle, always linked to existing obligations).

²⁴⁶ Cohen-Jonathan (2005a), p. 434.

²⁴⁷ Cohen-Jonathan (2005a), p. 433.

²⁴⁸ See Chapter II (Systems).

irreparable harm to persons pending the proceedings before them. Indeed one might consider that this aspect of provisional measures in human rights cases can be seen in the practice of such a range of adjudicators and has obtained such a level of generality over such a period of time that it may indicate a general principle of law.

Thus the obligation to respect provisional measures may be considered to be based on a general principle of law that pending the proceedings irreparable harm should be prevented. It applies even more in the context of complaints about ongoing or impending violations of fundamental human rights. Not just any adjudicator, but morally speaking any actor has to take this principle into account when dealing with urgent situations that threaten to cause irreparable harm to persons.

For a human rights adjudicator to derive the existence of a general principle of international law, it is not State practice but the practice of other international adjudicators that is most relevant. There is a general principle for States not to cause harm to other States and to show due diligence in preventing such harm. It is argued that there is a corollary and even stronger principle of preventing irreparable harm to persons pending international litigation. This principle is based on the practices developed by the human rights adjudicators themselves, to which States had assigned this adjudicatory function. The principle also appears to have become part of the humanization of law that is seen in the approach of the ICJ to the use of provisional measures.²⁴⁹

In cases pending before them all human rights adjudicators have used provisional measures to prevent irreparable harm to persons. They used provisional measures in cases involving rights singled out for their particularly fundamental nature. All relevant human rights treaties have done so with the right to life and the prohibition of torture or cruel treatment and they all pay special attention to these rights in their proceedings.²⁵⁰ The commonality in the practices of the adjudicators appears to be based not just on the interpretative principle of effectiveness, but also on an implicitly recognized general principle of law aimed at the prevention of irreparable harm to persons. In fact this principle of preventing irreparable harm to persons underlies the decision-making of all international adjudicators.

4 CONCLUSION

This Chapter argues that the authority of human rights adjudicators to take binding provisional measures is derived from the core rights singled out in the treaties, in light of the practice developed of attaching particular importance to the protection of personal integrity and (cultural) survival, read together with the right of individual petition.²⁵¹ After all, the principles of effectiveness and of the prevention of irreparable harm have been used by the adjudicators, either explicitly or implicitly, when interpreting these provisions. In addition it is submitted that the prevention of irreparable harm is not just a principle of treaty interpretation, but has also developed into a general principle of law, which is, as such, binding on States (Article 38 (1)(c) ICJ Statute).

The human rights adjudicators do have in common an underlying interpretative approach, both with regard to their implied power to use provisional measures and as to the binding nature of provisional measures. In fact one can speak of an 'acquis humanitaire' based on the standards of protection that all human rights adjudicators have in common,²⁵² which also applies to the legal status of provisional measures.

²⁴⁹ See Chapter I (ICJ).

²⁵⁰ See Conclusion Part II.

²⁵¹ See also Conclusion Part II.

The text of the treaties must be interpreted in light of their context and object and purpose in a dynamic manner, taking into account that they must be interpreted so as to have effect. The principle of effectiveness flowing from the object and purpose indicates that the adjudicators instituted under these treaties must have the power to use provisional measures.

The ECtHR has considered that ‘in the light of the general principles of international law, the law of treaties and international case-law, the interpretation of the scope of interim measures cannot be dissociated from the proceedings to which they relate or the decision on the merits they seek to protect’.²⁵³ This statement about the scope of provisional measures shows that now the ECtHR too recognises that in the context of such measures procedural and substantive law meet. The emphasis on the decision on the merits that provisional measures seek to protect underscores the binding nature of these measures. After all, otherwise States would be allowed to cause irreparable harm to the claim on the merits, and, as the provisional measures generally relate to claims involving the survival and personal integrity, irreparable harm to persons.²⁵⁴

By accepting the jurisdiction of an international (including regional) adjudicator a State has committed itself to an international system of adjudication.²⁵⁵ Just like a domestic system of adjudication, an international system can, in my view, only be effective if the adjudicator has the power to order provisional measures that are legally binding. In this respect the main difference between domestic and international systems of adjudication is the all-inclusive nature of the former on the one hand and the fact that in most international systems States initially are free to accept or reject compulsory jurisdiction. This difference, however, loses much of its significance once a State has accepted the jurisdiction of an adjudicator. Even if a rule on the binding character of provisional measures is not included as such in a treaty text, by accepting the competence of an adjudicator to deal with conflicts between States or between individuals and States the State has accepted the adjudicator’s judicial independence and its power to deal with these conflicts effectively. The authority to use binding provisional measures is inherent to effective adjudication.

Even if the treaty in question does not explicitly provide for the use of provisional measures, the duty to protect against threats to survival and personal integrity requires the State to take positive measures also pending international proceedings. If it is the international adjudicator who recommends such positive measures, in the form of provisional measures, respecting them is also required as part of the obligations entered into by the State’s recognition of the complaint procedure.

It is argued that the human rights adjudicators have been correct to stress that the effet utile of the adjudicator’s decision on the merits necessitates respect for the provisional measures indicated by it. If decisions on the merits are not considered legally binding in all respects (such as certain recommendations for reparation), at least the State’s recognition of the substantive rights and its recognition of the individual complaint system require a basic level of action and abstention on the part of the State. With regard to the most fundamental rights in the treaty at issue they require at least the protection of the practitioner from irreparable harm, as well as the good faith cooperation with the relevant adjudicator.

²⁵² On the issue of convergence and divergence in general, see Chapter II, section 8. On the common core of the concept of provisional measures, see Conclusion Part II. Simma used the expression acquis humanitaire already in 1995, p. 173.

²⁵³ ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §123.

²⁵⁴ See also Conclusion Part II on the relation between irreparable harm to the claim and to persons.

²⁵⁵ See also Pasqualucci (2005), p. 49, noting that provisional measures must be considered binding when issued by both international judicial and quasi-judicial bodies.

An action or omission causing irreparable harm to persons (personal integrity and survival) is an aggravated breach of the human rights treaty. If a State has recognized the right of individual complaint (or inter-State complaint for that matter) and the adjudicator decided to use provisional measures to prevent such harm, ignoring these measures is an aggravated breach of the right of petition as well.

While not an aggravated breach, ignoring other provisional measures, which may not (yet) fall within the common core, is also contrary to the obligation to cooperate with the adjudicator in good faith.

Finally, a State may consider that the adjudicator was in error in using provisional measures. Also in such a case the State should respect the measures. In most such cases the State has a different assessment of the risk (urgency), but it is ultimately for the human rights adjudicator to decide on this. In addition, the State's belief that the adjudicator was in error may also be based on a genuine conviction that the risk is not irreversible, meaning that the provisional measures can be situated beyond the outer limits. Even then the State must respect the provisional measures based on its obligations under the system of individual complaint. At the same time the adjudicator must take care not to go beyond the outer limits, also for the sake of the sustainability of the individual petition system.

CONCLUSION

Part III showed that the serious nature of the harm risked has an impact on the approach of the human rights adjudicators to the requirements of prima facie admissibility and jurisdiction on the merits (Chapter XIV); on the requirements of immediacy and real risk (Chapter XV) and on the legal status of provisional measures (Chapter XVI).

In addition, when deciding on the use of provisional measures the human rights adjudicators have also taken into account the inequality between the parties. Together with their awareness of the serious nature of the harm risked, this inequality played a role in the more lenient attitude of the human rights adjudicators towards the requirements of prima facie admissibility and jurisdiction on the merits and of immediacy and real risk. It does not play a similar role in the discussion on the legal status of provisional measures.

To the extent that cases before the ICJ also involve the rights of individuals, the case law of the human rights adjudicators could be relevant to it as well. Strictly speaking the inequality between the parties is a criterion only applying in the context of individual complaints about human rights violations. Yet the serious nature of the harm risked to persons clearly applies in the inter-State context of the ICJ as well.

PART IV

RESPONSES

INTRODUCTION

This Part deals on the one hand with the official responses by the addressee States to provisional measures and on the other hand with the human rights adjudicators' follow up.

For the clarification and further development of a legal concept of provisional measures as used by the human rights adjudicators, the focus of this book was on the discussion of the common core and outer limits of the concept as applied by the adjudicators with regard to the purpose of these measures (Part II). Subsequently it dealt with the impact of the irreparable nature of the harm on the approach of the adjudicators to requirements of prima facie admissibility and jurisdiction, immediacy and real risk at the stage of provisional measures, as well as on the binding nature of these measures (Part III).

Another question with regard to provisional measures in human rights adjudication is whether (and how) they actually work. Yet the question of effectiveness is one of causality and an empirical question that falls outside the scope of this conceptual research. Nevertheless, the adjudicators address the States concerned with decisions on provisional measures with the express purpose of preventing irreparable harm to persons and ensuring the effectiveness of the individual petition system. Therefore it is useful to see what types of responses the addressee States have provided and how the adjudicators (and others) have followed up on (initial) non-compliance. This is what Part IV aims at.

The available case law provides some information on the official responses of addressee States and the follow-up by adjudicators. Chapter XVII gives examples of the former in order to indicate types of reasoning chosen by States to justify their failure to comply vis-à-vis the adjudicators. From the official responses available it is possible to identify various explanations for non-compliance with provisional measures. This is not to say that the reasons forwarded by States are the 'real' reasons. Nor do the reasons forwarded for non-compliance explain why in the majority of cases States have complied with provisional measures. Nevertheless these are the reasons that are publicly available, generally by studying the references to them in the decisions on the merits published by the adjudicators subsequent to any discourse between them and the States with regard to the need for provisional measures.

Chapter XVIII then deals with the related question of how the adjudicators have dealt with non-compliance with their provisional measures. The follow-up by the adjudicators may have an impact on compliance in the long run, not just vis-à-vis the State involved, but also vis-à-vis the other States that have recognized the right of individual petition in the human rights system at issue. In addition, the follow up by adjudicators and others to non-compliance by States provides an additional indication of the importance they attach to preventing irreparable harm to persons.

CHAPTER XVII

THE OFFICIAL RESPONSES OF ADDRESSEE STATES TO PROVISIONAL MEASURES

1 INTRODUCTION

Already in 1995 it was argued that ‘inasmuch as interim or provisional measures ordered by worldwide or regional treaty bodies are increasingly based on the expectation and on actual practice of compliance, such measures are becoming an integral part of the human rights legal protection system’.¹

Compliance with the provisional measures of the ICJ has improved over time, but still is not impressive.² Do the responses of addressee States towards the provisional measures by human rights adjudicators differ in this respect? This Chapter deals with the official responses of States to the provisional measures directed against them.

States seem to comply more often with the provisional measures of the human rights adjudicators than with their decisions on the merits.³ This may be due to the fact that what is required on the merits is permanent and often more detailed and extensive, resulting in more obstacles to a timely implementation than do provisional measures.⁴ Yet the general attitude of compliance with provisional measures may also be due to the realization that adjudicators generally take decisions on provisional measures in the most serious situations, in order to prevent irreparable harm to persons.⁵ Indeed the adjudicators themselves have been influenced in their decision-making on the use of provisional measures by the nature of the harm risked.⁶ The question arises whether compliance by States is also higher with regard to provisional measures aimed at protecting irreparable harm to persons than with regard to other provisional measures.

¹ Van Boven (1995), p. 106.

² See Chapter I (ICJ).

³ See also e.g. Rodríguez who points out that States have complied more with provisional measures than with judgments. He qualifies them as a very effective instrument of human rights protection, Interview with Victor Rodríguez, senior research fellow at the International Human Rights Law Institute of DePaul University, former staff member Court, San Jose, Costa Rica, November 2001.

⁴ In the admissibility decision in HRC Irving Phillip v. Trinidad and Tobago, 20 October 1998, for instance, the HRC specifically expressed its appreciation for the fact that the State had respected its provisional measures. Apparently the State’s attitude towards provisional measures was different from its attitude in general. After all, in the decision on the merits the Committee gave its usual remarks about the non-cooperation of the State with the proceedings in general, warranting a shift in the burden of proof from the petitioner to the State.

⁵ With regard to the ECtHR Cohen-Jonathan (2005), p. 782 also notes that the Court’s selection of situations in which it would use provisional measures has always been very strict and because of that the States have mostly cooperated with the Court.

⁶ Part III showed that the serious nature of the harm risked, together to some extent with the inequality between the parties, has an impact on the approach taken by the human rights adjudicators to the requirements of prima facie admissibility and jurisdiction on the merits; on the requirements of immediacy and real risk and on the legal status of provisional measures.

As discussed, in the concept of provisional measures procedural and substantive law meet. Compliance with provisional measures is based on a process that involves attitudes towards substantive issues as well. For the interpretation of the meaning of the concept of provisional measures a discourse takes place – sometimes consciously, sometimes not – between the various international adjudicators.⁷ For the implementation of the provisional measures domestically a discourse appears to take place as well. Internationally, apart from a discourse between the various adjudicators, it is mainly between the parties, on the one hand, and between the adjudicators and the parties, on the other. NGOs, the media, the other human rights adjudicators and authorities appointed within international systems, such as the UN or the Council of Europe, play a role as well. Domestically the discourse is mainly taking place between the parties, including the various branches of government, while media and NGOs play their part as well.

In this discussion not only (or even mainly) the attitudes towards the concept of provisional measures, and thereby to the substantive law at issue, appear to be relevant, but other factors as well. Some domestic decision-makers may indeed personally adhere to the same principles underlying the use of the provisional measures and become convinced by the arguments used by the international adjudicator. It also happens that they were convinced of the need for action or abstention already before the provisional measures were used. In such cases they may use the provisional measure as leverage in the domestic discourse.

Other decision-makers may not be convinced normatively, but may consider that apart from national interest factors advocating against the action or omission required by the provisional measure, there are national interest factors such as fear for the State's international reputation (international embarrassment and loss of prestige) that would warrant compliance nevertheless.

This book takes the approach that States that have recognized individual complaint procedures under human rights treaties have consented to a normative process.⁸ This means that further along in the process States should no longer invoke traditional State sovereignty and State voluntarism arguments in order to justify non-compliance with decisions of international adjudicators. The obligation to comply with decisions of these adjudicators is considered a given.

Obviously stating that this obligation exists does not as such effectuate compliance. States may have various reasons to deviate from legal commitments, including arguments that they are in fact not legally bound.⁹

As consistent information on the responses of States is lacking, this Chapter simply provides examples of compliance and non-compliance with provisional measures to protect against irreparable harm to the survival and personal integrity (within the common core) on the one hand and provisional measures in miscellaneous cases (within the outer limits) on the other.

The information on the responses by States to provisional measures is derived from the decisions on the merits that refer to them.¹⁰ Occasionally this is supplemented by other information. Obviously this information can do no more than indicate to some extent the compliance of States. An examination of effectiveness would require consistent information about what really happened to the beneficiaries of the provisional measures, together with additional information on causality. This would be within the realm of social science research.

Nevertheless it is assumed that other factors than the legal character of decisions, 'such as the political will and the authority of the organ in question' may often be more important to ex-

⁷ See Chapter II (Systems), section 8.

⁸ See generally about State consent to normative process, Hey (2003).

⁹ See also Chapter XVI (Legal status).

¹⁰ As the Inter-American Commission reserves a special section of its Annual Report to its practice with regard to precautionary measures and the Inter-American Court publishes its orders for provisional measures, references are made to these as well.

plain the responses of the addressee States and some references are made to such information.¹¹ This chapter simply aims to identify some levels of implementation, taking as example provisional measures to halt executions, as well as to identify some aspects that help explain compliance and non-compliance. If available, references are made to specific responses by adjudicators to justifications for non-compliance given by addressee States.¹²

2 COMPLIANCE

2.1 Introduction

The adjudicators generally note that non-compliance with their provisional measures only occurs occasionally. In Mamatkulov (2004), for instance, the European Court pointed out: “Cases of States failing to comply with indicated measures remain very rare”.¹³ Yet data on the level and manner of compliance are not generally compiled.

As discussed, generally the Inter-American system provides more information on the practice of the adjudicators with regard to provisional measures than the other systems.¹⁴ This applies as well to the information on compliance by States with these provisional measures.¹⁵ Nevertheless, in the Inter-American system too the nature of the State’s reply and the level of compliance often remain unclear.¹⁶ At the same time the Inter-American Commission has noted that States, ‘when formally approached’ sometimes show ‘different levels of responsiveness, diligence and efficiency of the IACHR’s requests’.¹⁷

There are various levels at which States may comply with the provisional measures taken by human rights adjudicators. This section provides some examples, first organised by different types of provisional measures and then in different types of responses.

¹¹ See Klerk (2000), p. 156. She points out that it ‘might be doubted whether compliance with views and judgments is much influenced by the extent to which they are binding’. See also Boerefijn (1999). On the legal status of provisional measures see Chapter XVI.

¹² Chapter XVII more generally discusses the follow up by adjudicators to non-compliance by States.

¹³ ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §105.

¹⁴ See Chapter II (Systems).

¹⁵ See the sections on transparency of information in Chapter II (Systems).

¹⁶ See e.g. precautionary measures of 11 May 2000, on behalf of Mr. Uribe, a well-known human rights defender and an active member of the ‘José Alvear Restrepo’ Lawyers Collective. Apparently a military intelligence report identified him as part of the ‘ELN support network’. Some persons mentioned in this intelligence report have been extra-judicially executed. Others have been the victims of forced disappearance, arbitrary detention, or constant threats forcing them to move of live in exile. There is no information on the response of the State. Annual Report 2000, §16.

¹⁷ CIDH Annual Report 1999, Chapter V – Colombia, §118.

2.2 A range of attitudes towards implementation of provisional measures

2.2.1 Introduction

States often prefer to remedy a situation in advance of a decision on the merits. In such cases it may be possible then to discontinue the case or declare it inadmissible.¹⁸ In addition, while in some cases they are so determined to act a certain way that they prefer to act quickly in order actually to prevent an adjudicator from taking provisional measures, in other cases they may wish to a remedy the situation to avoid the embarrassment of a provisional measure. In such situations the staff of the adjudicator may inform the State in question informally of its intention to take formal provisional measures. The State will then act accordingly and a provisional measure will no longer be necessary.¹⁹ This section gives some examples of the range of attitudes towards implementation, starting with State responses to provisional measures to halt the execution of a death sentence. Then the responses to provisional measures to halt expulsion and extradition are discussed, those to measures in the context of detention and disappearances, health care outside the detention context and death threats.

2.2.2 Various responses to provisional measures to halt executions

2.2.2.1 INTRODUCTION

This subsection focuses on the range of attitudes towards provisional measures to halt executions by the HRC, with some discussion of the Inter-American system as well. Some of the provisional measures by the African Commission to halt an execution have been ignored.²⁰ Those by the Bosnia Chamber,²¹ the European Commission²² and the European Court have been respected.²³

¹⁸ This is often the case in the European system.

¹⁹ Several cases of compliance may be explained by factors other than the provisional measures, e.g. by domestic court decisions that did not take into account these measures but nevertheless decided to halt an execution or expulsion.

²⁰ ACHPR See International Pen, Constitutional Rights Project, Interights on behalf of Ken Saro-Wiwa Jr. and Civil Liberties Organisation v. Nigeria, provisional measure somewhere between 2 and 9 November 1995 (secret execution 10 November 1995 and Interights et al. (on behalf of Mariette Bosch) v. Botswana, provisional measures of 27 March 2001 (execution on 31 March 2001).

²¹ Bosnia Chamber Sretko Damjanović v. Fed. BiH., provisional measure of 16 December 1996; Nail Rizvanović v. Fed.BiH., provisional measure of 2 September 1997 and Borislav Herak v. Fed. BiH., provisional measure of 10 November 1997.

²² In 1957 the UK respected the Commission's informal provisional measures in the Cyprus case (Greece v. UK) not to execute Nicolas Sampson. See EComHR Application of the European Convention of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms to the Island of Cyprus (Greece v. UK), report of the Commission, 26 September 1958, §34; in 1970 Greece, under the Colonels' regime, respected the Commission's provisional measures to halt the execution of 34 suspects. Partial Decision of the Commission as to the admissibility of the application, The Second Greek case (Denmark, Norway and Sweden v. Greece), 5 October 1970, §11.

²³ ECtHR Öcalan v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 March 2003 (provisional measure of 30 November 1999 respected. See also Grand Chamber Judgment 12 May 2005.

The great majority of the HRC's provisional measures to halt executions have been respected.²⁴ Only in some cases the Committee's decisions on the merits specifically refer to domestic decisions to stay an execution, possibly in part on the basis of the Committee's provisional measures. States normally give no reasons for compliance with provisional measures or with other decisions. It is only when they disagree that they may provide some arguments and that they may even decide not to comply with them altogether.²⁵ In light of the foregoing, the most obvious examples showing the attitude of the State party are cases of blatant disregard for the Committee's provisional measures. Trinidad and Tobago, Guyana, Sierra Leone, the Philippines, Uzbekistan and Tajikistan have executed petitioners despite provisional measures. In response, the HRC has expressed itself forcefully about the legal obligation of States under the OP to respect its provisional measures and to halt executions pending the proceedings before it.²⁶ Jamaica was the addressee of the majority of provisional measures. This State always respected the Committee's provisional measures, but it withdrew from the OP in 1997.²⁷ The responses of States to provi-

²⁴ During the period 1986-2004 information was examined about provisional measures to halt executions in cases against two Asian States (South Korea and the Philippines), against five States of the former Soviet Union (Georgia, Belarus, Uzbekistan, Tajikistan and Ukraine) and two African States (Sierra Leone and Zambia). The remainder of cases were all directed to Caribbean States: one to St. Vincent and the Grenadines, eight to Guyana, 24 to Trinidad and Tobago and 112 to Jamaica.

²⁵ In 1995 Trinidad and Tobago responded to the HRC that it would not respect its provisional measure because it was already respecting the conservatory order of the Court of Appeal. The HRC considered 'this situation should have made it easier for the State party to confirm that there would be no obstacles to acceding to the Committee's request; to do so would, in any event, have been compatible with the State party's international obligations', HRC Lincoln Guerra and Brian Wallen v. Trinidad and Tobago, 4 April 1995, §6.5.

²⁶ It has been very clear about the seriousness of the breach by these States of their obligations under the OP and the Covenant itself. It referred in particular to the obligation to cooperate with it in good faith, the obligation not to hinder its task to examine the case on the merits as well as to the obligations under Article 2 ICCPR. It has pointed out that the executions rendered examination by the HRC moot and the expression of its Views 'nugatory and futile'. It also pointed out that a State should not execute petitioners once it knows they have submitted a case to the HRC, even when the Committee has not (yet) used provisional measures. See also Chapter XVI (Legal status) and Chapter XVIII (Follow-up).

²⁷ It withdrew on 23 October 1997. This became effective on 23 January 1998. Jamaica has always respected the provisional measures by the Committee, although it did point out that they could sometimes amount to an indefinite stay of execution and could, therefore, obstruct its administration of justice. In January 1998 its withdrawal from the OP became effective. It withdrew exactly because it wished to be able to execute its prisoners within the deadline set by the JCPC. The withdrawal of Jamaica, followed by that of Trinidad and Tobago and Guyana, from the individual complaint system has been deplored internationally. The reason for the withdrawals related to the deadline set by the JCPC combined with the factor public opinion. Already in June 1994 the Jamaica Council for Human Rights provided the HRC with extracts of two speeches made to Parliament by the Minister of National Security and Justice, forewarning the 1997 withdrawal. In the first speech the Minister pointed out that appeals to the UN Human Rights Committee and to the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights had become the standard practice for persons sentenced to death whose appeals had been dismissed. "This in itself constitutes a source of considerable delay since a sentence of death could not be carried out whilst an appeal to one or other of these bodies is pending. To make matters worse the rules of these organisations not only permit but actually require that an applicant has to appeal to each of them in sequence. The proceedings cannot be shortened by simultaneous hearings". The Minister sional measures to halt executions have varied from explicitly positive, to silence and even blatant disregard. There seems to be a continuum between the above extremes, including granting a stay, conditional compliance (which could partially be attributed to the adjudicators' provisional measures), domestic courts refusing to take into account the adjudication and explicit refusal by State authorities to respect provisional measures, culminating in an execution.

2.2.2.2 EXPLICITLY POSITIVE RESPONSE BY THE STATE

In some cases the State expressly informs the HRC that it will comply with the provisional measures to halt the execution of a death sentence.²⁸ Of course while the international involvement, including the use of provisional measures, may play a role, this is not necessarily the case. Several cases of compliance with provisional measures halting executions of death sentences may also be attributed to the fact that there is a national policy of putting executions on hold,²⁹ or on the fact that a domestic court or an executive has decided to commute the death sentence of the petitioner.³⁰ Six days after using provisional measures to halt the execution of two noted that this had put Jamaica in an 'intolerable situation'. His Ministry and that of Foreign Affairs and Foreign Trade were 'in dialogue with the international organisations to get concrete implementation of the general assurances given to speed up the hearing'. This way they hoped to be able to enforce their 'own laws without depriving the convicts of their right to appeal to these international bodies'. "If a solution is not found, then we will have to take the serious but necessary step of curtailing the rights to appeal to one or other of these two bodies". He noted that the people of Jamaica had been calling for the resumption of hanging and that he wished to assure the public that 'this Government does not intend to abandon our sovereign right to implement our own laws'. "In this country death remains the penalty for capital murder and therefore must be carried out with as much efficiency and effectiveness as any other prescription in the judicial system". The other speech discussed certain steps to be taken to speed up the appellate process in Jamaica, but it also pointed out that there should be a strict time-table of 21 days for appealing to the JCPC in London, followed by a time-limit of 21 days for appeals to international human rights bodies. Letter of the Jamaica Council for Human Rights, 29 June 1994, with extracts of the Minister's speeches (on file with the author).

²⁸ See e.g. HRC Matlyuba Khudayberganova on behalf of her son Iskandar Khudayberganov v. Uzbekistan, 24 July 2007, §2.1: on 11 December 2003, the State party replied that the Supreme Court had deferred the execution, pending the Committee's final decision. States may fail to submit any observations on the admissibility or merits of a claim, showing a lack of co-operation generally, but still respond positively to the Committee's provisional measures. See also, e.g., HRC Bernhard Lubuto v. Zambia, 31 October 1995. The State confirmed that 'pursuant to the Committee's request, the appropriate authorities have been instructed not to carry out the death sentence against the author while his case is before the Committee'.

²⁹ This may be the case, for instance, with regard to Zambia.

³⁰ See e.g. HRC Trevor Ellis v. Jamaica, 28 July 1992; Karina Arutyunyan on behalf of her brother Arsen Arutyunyan v. Uzbekistan, 29 March 2004, §1.2; Abdulkarim Boimurodov on behalf of son Mustafakul Boimurodov v. Tajikistan, 20 October 2005, §2.7; Nazira Sirageva on behalf of her son Danis Siragev v. Uzbekistan, 1 November 2005, §1.2; Nadezhda Agabekova on behalf of her son Valery Agabekov v. Uzbekistan, 16 March 2006, §§1.2 and 4.2; Larisa Tarasova on behalf of her son Alexander Kornetov v. Uzbekistan, 20 October 2006, §§1.2.

petitioners the HRC received a response by the Chairman of the State Committee for Human Rights and Ethnic Relations of the Republic of Georgia.³¹

“The State Committee for Human Rights and Ethnic Relations of the Republic of Georgia regards as its obligation to ensure the full enjoyment by the convicted of all the rights that are granted to them by the Georgian legislation and international instruments. We will also do our best to help commute the death penalty to one of imprisonment”.³²

It is not clear what exactly is the function of this State Committee in the system of government in Georgia, but given the fact that the authority to provide the HRC with an official response was delegated to this State Committee, it may be assumed that the State would at least respect the provisional measures by the HRC and stay the execution upon exhaustion of domestic remedies. The State Committee, moreover, also committed itself to strive for a permanent stay of execution in the form of a commutation. Subsequently the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and not the State Committee on Human Rights informed the HRC of the Decree of the President of Georgia of July 1997 pardoning 54 persons and replacing their death sentences by twenty years imprisonment. It pointed out that Gelbakhiani and Dokvadze were among these 54 persons.³³

An interesting example of a case in which a stay was granted following receipt of provisional measures by the HRC is Marshall v. Jamaica (1998).³⁴ In this case London counsel submitted a complaint to the HRC in December 1996. The action by counsel had been triggered by a fax from the Secretary of the Governor-General of Jamaica, stating, among others, that the HRC had not yet registered Marshall’s case:

“[O]ur process for implementing the sentence imposed has commenced and only a request from the U.N. under Rule 86 will stop it, so I would suggest that as a matter of urgency you get your application fully in order so that that office can decide whether a Rule 86 request is merited”.

The fax ended with ‘D Day is December 12, 1996’. Counsel replied to this fax on the same day, expressing ‘extreme surprise’, referring to Marshall’s initial communication to the HRC of June 1995 and to an agreement with the Jamaican government’s solicitors in London that they would await the reclassification process before they would take further steps in Marshall’s case. They received a response on the same day, pointing out that other counsel did seem to realize that the reclassification process had been finalized two weeks previously. The Office of the Governor-General referred to the JCPC’s remark in Pratt and Morgan that ‘where nothing is done to pursue remedies it is up to the authorities to issue a writ and galvanize the prisoner and his legal ³¹ HRC Victor Domukovsky, Zaza Tsiklauri, Petre Gelbakhiani and Irakli Dokvadze v. Georgia, 6 April 1998. Provisional measures were used on behalf of Gelbakhiani and Dokvadze. Chairman of the State Committee for Human Rights and Ethnic Relations wrote that the convicted ‘and other interested persons’ had the right to appeal a death sentence. The Chairman of the Collegium of the Supreme Court on Criminal Cases would first examine such complaint. If he would refuse it, the Chairman of the Supreme Court could consider the appeal. The Prosecutor General also had the right to re-examine the case. If the death sentence would still remain in force, the execution would be deferred until the Pardon Commission had examined it. He also noted that Georgia had acceded to the OP in the previous year so that the HRC could examine the case.

³² Letter by the Chairman of the State Committee for Human Rights and Ethnic Relations, 16 March 1996 (on file with the author).

³³ Letter of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of 9 September 1997 (on file with the author).

³⁴ HRC Clarence Marshall v. Jamaica, 3 November 1998, Note Verbale of 5 December 1996, submission of 4 December 1996 (on file with the author).

representatives into action'. It reminded them that it 'need not have faxed you at all' and pointed out: "We await the views of the U.N. as to whether the application will merit a request under Rule 86".³⁵ Once it did receive a Note Verbale with a decision on provisional measures, the State informed the Committee that it 'stood down the warrants for the abovementioned persons'.³⁶

2.2.2.3 LEVEL OF COMPLIANCE BY TRINIDAD WITH PROVISIONAL MEASURES OF THE INTER-AMERICAN COMMISSION AND COURT

In the death penalty cases pending before the Inter-American Commission States often do not reply to the Commission's precautionary measures requesting a stay of execution. Trinidad, for instance, is not much inclined to comply with the Commission's precautionary measures. It may request for information on the case itself, but fail to reply to the precautionary measure as such. In the case of Mr. Baptiste the State simply informed the Commission again that the Instructions Relating to Applications from Persons under Sentence of Death issued by the Government of Trinidad and Tobago on 13 October 1997 also applied to his application.³⁷

From the end of 1998 for Trinidad and Tobago the pattern changed from (semi-)compliance to non-compliance, also with regard to the Court. In its Order of May 1999 the Court notes that the State had not complied with the obligation to submit periodic reports on the status of the appeals and regularly scheduled executions of the beneficiaries of the Court's provisional measures.³⁸ Only in the second half of 2000 the State showed some willingness again to comply with its reporting obligations.³⁹

³⁵ Information letter to the counsel by the State, 3 December 1996 (on file with the author).

³⁶ In his complaint of 4 December 1996 counsel pointed out that a warrant had been issued for the execution of his client on 12 December 1996. On 4 December the Secretariat had also received an anonymous telegram from Jamaica, possibly sent through information by other inmates: "Keith McKnight and Clarence Marshall are at gallows from 2nd December 1996 please contact relevant authority St. Catherine Dist Prison" (on file with the author). The next morning the Secretariat faxed Special Rapporteur Pocar. That same day, after Pocar had authorized it, the Secretariat sent a Note Verbale to the Minister of Foreign Affairs and Foreign Trade informing the State of the registration of the communication and requesting it to make submissions on the admissibility of the case (under Rule 91) and not to carry out the death sentence (under Rule 86) while the HRC was considering the communication. A copy was sent to the Permanent Mission of Jamaica in Geneva. On 11 December the Secretariat received a fax from the Jamaican Mission that the Office of the Governor-General had informed it that they had received the Committee's faxes in relation to three persons, including Marshall, whose cases were pending before it, and that they 'stood down the warrants for the abovementioned persons'. Note Verbale of 5 December 1996 transmitting the case under Rule 86/91 and fax by Permanent Mission of Jamaica to U.N. Centre for Human Rights, 11 December 1996 (on file with the author).

³⁷ See IACHR James et al. cases, Order for provisional measures, 29 August 1998.

³⁸ The Court also considered that 'neither the State nor the Commission has informed the Court immediately and sufficiently', as required by its Order of August 1998, 'of any significant developments concerning the circumstances' of the beneficiaries. James et al. cases, Order for provisional measures, 25 May 1999. Here the Court also reprimands the Commission, presumably in light of the developments surrounding Mr. Briggs, who was later executed.

³⁹ In its Order of 26 August 2000 the Court required the State to submit information on or before the end of that month on the circumstances that led to the execution of Joey Ramiah. The State did so on 4 September 2000. The Court also required the Inter-American Commission to submit, by the end of the month, detailed information on the status of the cases of five persons. The Trinidad and Tobago executed Mr. Briggs, arguing that the Court had no jurisdiction to maintain the provisional measures on his behalf.⁴⁰ The Court's other provisional measures to halt executions, used in the James and Others case have been considered to be among the most effective of its provisional measures.

With the respect shown by Trinidad for those provisional measures, as well as the respect by Jamaica for the provisional measures by the HRC halting executions, note must be made of the withdrawal of these States from the individual complaint system, which has been deplored internationally.⁴¹

2.2.3 Various responses to provisional measures to halt expulsion and extradition

2.2.3.1 INTRODUCTION

There is little information about the cases in which States complied with provisional measures in non-refoulement cases and about what role these measures played as compared to other factors

Commission did so on 31 August 2000. The Court had urged the State as well to report every two months on the status of the appeals and scheduled executions of all the beneficiaries. On 5 September 2000 the State informed the Court that 'pursuant to its Order' it was 'in the course of preparing its bi-monthly report on the status of the appeals and scheduled executions of James et al. and it would be forwarding the said report to the Court within the next fourteen days'. While this shows willingness again, on the part of the State, to comply with the Court's Orders, in October 2000 the Secretariat of the Court had to remind the State to submit its report and in November 2000 the Court considered that the State had failed to do so. IACHR James et al. cases, Order for provisional measures, 24 November 2000.

⁴⁰ The State considered that 'after the Commission decided to publish its Article 51 report, there was no matter pending before the Commission, nor any matter pending before the Court, nor any other matter capable of being submitted to the Court'. It concluded that the Court's 'purported Order of 25 May 1999 was made without jurisdiction and, therefore, was null'. IACHR James et al. cases, Order for provisional measures, 16 August 2000, 13th 'Having seen' clause.

⁴¹ Several States protested against the reservation by Trinidad and Tobago. With this reservation it purported to re-accede to the OP. They considered that obligations should not be watered down to such an extent that they become devoid of any meaning. Denmark, Norway and the Netherlands objected on 6 August 1999; Germany on 13 August, Sweden on 17 August, Ireland on 23 August, Spain on 25 August, France on 9 September and Italy on 17 September 1999, www.un.org (consulted on 7 October 2004). Clearly, the persons most likely to wish to make use of the individual complaint procedure have deplored this withdrawal. One death row inmate from Jamaica, for instance, wrote in June 2000: "People in this country, the Government of Jamaica don't know what he did when he withdraw from the United Nations, he just make a mistake, from that he keep on making mistake (...) this country is in a lot of danger at this time. (...) The prison is like a time bomb waiting to go off. Also the Governor General of Jamaica considered the United Nations for human rights recommendation, but they rejected them all. Also they did not let me know that they did this. (...) I went to the condemned cell at the gallows two time now and it was not easy over there. I don't want to go back over this place again. This place will mad any man. (...) At this time we don't have any more appeals to go through, we went through all the bodies. Also the Government of Jamaica is planning to withdraw from the Privy Council very soon. (...) Also please tell me what you think about the Caribbean Court? This Government is planning to carry out hanging in this country. Also most of the peoples of the Caribbean want to see hanging carried out". (on file with the author).

favouring a stay of expulsion or extradition. Most cases in which expulsion or extradition was stayed do not indicate the specific response of the State. It is mainly in the context of non-compliance that some information is available about the attitudes of States towards provisional measures.

This subsection first gives some examples of compliance and non-compliance. Then it discusses three strategies by States unwilling to respect provisional measures: the speed of deportation as a way to pre-empt the use of provisional measures; requesting the adjudicator to withdraw provisional measures and invoking contrary obligations under international law.

2.2.3.2 EXAMPLES OF COMPLIANCE AND NON-COMPLIANCE IN THE EUROPEAN SYSTEM AND UNDER THE ICCPR

Various cases in which the adjudicator took provisional measures are subsequently solved and struck out. It may well be that provisional measures trigger a renewed consideration of a decision to expel someone. Yet States may prefer not to acknowledge this formally. As part of a friendly settlement they tend to emphasize that their decision to allow a petitioner to remain in the country is based on strictly humanitarian reasons rather than a legal obligation under a human rights treaty. Sometimes they add that their decision should not be regarded as a precedent.⁴²

Ms. Jabari had appealed against an order of deportation because under Iranian law she would be subject to death by stoning, whipping or flogging. The European Commission used provisional measures to stay the deportation. After Protocol 11 entered into force the Court confirmed the provisional measures, under Rule 39, until further notice. Turkey complied with the provisional measure.⁴³ In Taspinar v. the Netherlands (1985) the European Commission had used provisional measures on behalf of a seven year old boy facing expulsion to Turkey. The State respected the provisional measures and subsequently informed the Commission that it no longer objected to his presence in the Netherlands.⁴⁴

Several types of non-compliance may also be observed. Interesting is the case of Muminov v. Russia (2008). On 24 October 2006 the Court had used provisional measures to prevent his expulsion to Uzbekistan. Later that day he was nevertheless expelled. Apart from the fact that this time the Court did find a violation of Article 3 – contrary to the case of Mamatkulov also involving a return to Uzbekistan⁴⁵ – in this case there was a lack of clarity about the moment of expulsion and the awareness by the authorities of the Court's provisional measures.⁴⁶ The Court's ⁴² See e.g. ECtHR Tatete v. Switzerland, 6 July 2000 (struck out).

⁴³ ECtHR Jabari v. Turkey, Judgment of 11 July 2000.

⁴⁴ EComHR Taspinar v. the Netherlands, 9 October 1985 (struck out). Yet there have been cases manifesting conflicting approaches within government. In A. v. France (inadm.1991) the European Commission noted 'that the deportation order was issued by the Prefect of Ain on 4 January 1991, whereas by that time, after an initial decision dated 9 October 1990 and subsequent decisions covering the period up to 18 January 1991, the Commission had decided to apply Rule 36 of its Rules of Procedure and indicated to the Government that it would be desirable in the interests of the parties and the proper conduct of the proceedings not to expel the applicant before it had had time to examine the application in greater detail'. The Commission also notes that the Prefect issued the above-mentioned order despite its use of provisional measures and while the Government had stated that they had decided to comply with the Commission's wishes, A. v. France, 27 February 1991 (inadm.), pp. 337-338.

⁴⁵ See Chapter XVIII (Follow-up), section 2.3.3.

⁴⁶ The Court observed that the parties disagreed as to whether the petitioner had been expelled 'before or after the Russian authorities had learnt about a Rule 39 request, as well as about the discussion in this respect shows that it is crucial for counsel to inform the Office of the Representative of the relevant State at the European Court, as well as the detention centre or another competent authority of the fact that a request for provisional measures has been made with the Court.⁴⁷ Another intriguing aspect related to this case is the fact that apparently subsequently the Director of the Detention Centre for Aliens was convicted for abuse of power for authorising the execution of Muminov's expulsion order while being aware that this order had not become final. The verdict specifically mentioned the fact that as a result of this unlawful action Russia had been unable to comply with the European Court's provisional measure.⁴⁸

There are also occasions in which the State first ignored the adjudicator's provisional measures, but later attempted to remedy the situation. In Dar v. Norway (2007), in violation of Article 22 ICAT, the State deported the petitioner to Pakistan despite provisional measures. On the merits CAT found that the breach of Article 22 ICAT was remedied by Norway granting him a residence permit for three years upon return. According to the Committee the issue whether deportation constituted a violation of Article 3 ICAT had become moot because complainant had returned to Norway.⁴⁹

With regard to the HRC, in most expulsion and extradition cases States have respected its provisional measures to halt expulsion, extradition or other forms of forced return. Yet there have been cases of non-compliance. Interestingly, one case in which Canada respected a provisional measure related to the right to family life (Articles 17 and 23 ICCPR) rather than to non-refoulement (Articles 6 and 7 ICCPR). The fact that it requested the HRC to clarify its criteria for using provisional measures and to withdraw them in this case because there was no risk of irrepaactual time of his departure from the territory of Russia'. It confirmed that 'the information concerning the application of Rule 39 in the applicant's case was published on its secure website at 7.17 p.m. (Moscow time) on the same date'. It found that the petitioner 'most likely left the territory of Russia shortly before midnight (Moscow time) on 24 October 2006. The Government did not specify, however, when they had first learnt about the application of Rule 39 in the present case and whether the administration of the detention centre and other competent authorities had been notified of it, if at all', ECtHR Muminov v. Russia, Judgment of 11 December 2008, §135. It did not exclude the possibility that a State's 'failure to make practical arrangements for receiving and processing information from the Court regarding the examination of a Rule 39 request or the Court's decision to apply it in a given case may raise an issue under Article 34 of the Convention. However, in the present case the Court cannot establish with sufficient certainty that having been put on notice about the Court's decision to apply Rule 39, the respondent Government deliberately omitted to comply with it', §136. A willingness of Russian courts to comply is also shown in Ryabikin v. Russia, 19 June 2008, (the Kuybyshevskiy district court and the St. Petersburg City Court), see §§84-85. See also Mostafa et autres c. Turquie, 15 January 2008, §38.

⁴⁷ The Court noted that it was 'unclear whether the applicant's lawyer – assisted by members of a non-governmental organisation helping asylum-seekers – informed the Office of the Representative of the Russian Federation at the European Court, the detention centre or another competent authority that the applicant had already lodged a request for interim measures under Rule 39 of the Rules of Court'. Accordingly, the Court noted, it could 'not consider that the respondent State was duly informed that a request under Rule 39 had already been made'. 'Against this background, the Court's assessment of the material before it leads it to find that there is an insufficient factual basis for it to conclude that the respondent State deliberately prevented the Court from taking its decision on the applicant's Rule 39 request or notifying it of that decision in a timely manner, in breach of its obligation to cooperate with the Court in good faith', ECtHR Muminov v. Russia, Judgment of 11 December 2008, §137.

⁴⁸ ECtHR Muminov v. Russia, Judgment of 11 December 2008, §44.

⁴⁹ CAT Nadeem Ahmad Dar v. Norway, 11 May 2007.

erable harm indicated a wish for a restrictive interpretation of the power to use provisional measures, but at the same time it showed that Canada took this power seriously and was willing to respect the Committee's provisional measures even in this case.⁵⁰ The very first case, dating from 1978, involved an unidentified State that apparently respected the provisional measure as well.⁵¹

In Weiss v. Austria (2003)⁵² the petitioner claimed that a sentence of 845 years imprisonment in the requesting State (US) would constitute a violation of this article. The Special Rapporteur used provisional measures, although they were more cautiously formulated and their maintenance would depend on the response of the State to certain questions. The Administrative Court had also ordered a stay of his extradition. The authorities nevertheless attempted to surrender the petitioner. They only returned him to a detention facility 'after a telephone call by the ranking officer of the airport police to the president of the Administrative Court', in light of the stay granted by the Administrative Court and of the petitioner's poor health. Subsequently, however, the investigating judge of the Vienna Regional Criminal Court ordered the surrender of the petitioner, considering the Administrative Court 'incompetent' to entertain any proceedings or bar the extradition. The State extradited the petitioner to the US on 9 June 2002.⁵³

2.2.3.3 PRE-EMPTING THE USE OF PROVISIONAL MEASURES: SPEED OF DEPORTATION

In Canepa v. Canada (1997) counsel suggested that one reason for the way in which the petitioner was removed, on such short notice, may have been the wish to ensure removal in advance of the Committee's use of provisional measures.⁵⁴ She also thought that the State might have depended as well on the expectation that, because of protocol, the Secretariat of the HRC would not be able to contact the State directly when the Canadian Mission in Geneva was closed.⁵⁵ The State took issue with these allegations. It noted it was a strong supporter of the HRC and took its international human rights obligations seriously. It considered that the 'facts in this case disclose no impropriety under domestic or international law'. It rejected 'the implications by counsel for Mr. Canepa that it acted in a manner that might frustrate a possible request by the Committee for interim measures'. His removal, it pointed out, did 'in no way' prejudice the consideration of his ⁵⁰ HRC Stewart v. Canada, 1 November 1996. See further Chapter IV. See e.g. C. v. Australia, 28 October 2002, §4.32. The State 'stayed the deportation in response to the Committee's rule 86 request pending finalization of this matter'. See further G.T. v. Australia, 4 November 1997, A.R.J. v. Australia, 28 July 1997, Baban v. Australia, 6 August 2003 and Bakhtiyari v. Australia, 29 October 2003, A.A.T. v. Hungary, (disc.1993) and Karker v. France, 26 October 2000.

⁵¹ HRC O.E. v. S., 26 July 1978.

⁵² HRC Sholam Weiss v. Austria, 3 April 2003.

⁵³ On 10 May 2002 the ECtHR had used provisional measures. Six days later it decided not to prolong them, 'following representations of the State party', §2.9. See further Chapter V (Non-refoulement). The next day the Constitutional Court issued an injunction to stay the extradition until 23 May 2002. On that day this Court terminated the injunction. The petitioner once more requested the ECtHR to use provisional measures, which it denied. The next day he withdrew his application before the ECtHR. He submitted his case to the HRC, which used provisional measures.

⁵⁴ HRC Giosue Canepa v. Canada, 3 April 1997. Chapter XVI (Legal status), section 2.4.3 discusses the attitude of the adjudicators to frustration of the right of petition through pre-emption of the possibility to request provisional measures.

⁵⁵ HRC Giosue Canepa v. Canada, 3 April 1997, Submission by counsel of 7 June 1994 (on file with the author).

case by the Committee, nor ‘affect the position that Canada might take’ about its determination on the merits. It wished to assure the HRC of its ‘full and continued cooperation’.⁵⁶ Independent of whether the State party or counsel was correct in this particular case (and independent of whether this case would have been an appropriate candidate for provisional measures),⁵⁷ it cannot be excluded that some States may wish to quickly undertake certain action before provisional measures are used aiming at halting such action.

There is at least one case in which the HRC was unable to use provisional measures given the speed of the deportation. This case, Judge v. Canada (2003), should have been an extradition case. The petitioner had requested a stay until Canada would seek and receive an extradition request from the US. If removed under the bilateral extradition treaty with the US the State could have asked for assurances against execution of the death penalty. However, he was deported on the day he submitted his petition, leaving no opportunity for the HRC to use provisional measures. Counsel pointed out that he was removed within hours after a court decision that was handed down ‘late evening’. Subsequently the State argued that the petitioner had not exhausted domestic remedies for his complaint about his deportation to the US. The Committee noted that the State ‘had not contested the speed with which the author was deported, after the decision of the Superior Court’. Thus, ‘irrespective of whether the author could have appealed his case on the merits’ it found that ‘it would be unreasonable to expect the author to appeal such a case after his deportation, the very act which was claimed to violate the Covenant’.⁵⁸

2.2.3.4 REQUESTS FOR WITHDRAWAL OF PROVISIONAL MEASURES

In July 1978, in the early expulsion case of O.E. v. S (disc. 1978) the HRC expressed its appreciation to the Addressee State about the information it provided in response to its request whether it was contemplating the alleged victim’s deportation or extradition to country X. Nevertheless, ‘pending further consideration of the case’, the Committee still considered that the alleged victim should not be handed over or expelled to that country.⁵⁹ In two expulsion cases against Australia the State also respected the Committee’s provisional measures. About eleven months after it had used them in A.R.J. v. Australia (1997)⁶⁰ the Attorney General of Australia transmitted a letter to the Chairman of the Committee in which he requested the HRC to withdraw the provisional measures, pointing out, among others, that the continued detention of the petitioner was the Committee’s responsibility.⁶¹ He noted that the authorities had placed the petitioner under immigration detention in October 1996 and would keep him there ‘as long as the Committee had not reached a final decision on his claims’. This remark signifies, on the one hand, the State party’s willingness to respect the Committee’s provisional measures and stay the return of the petitioner to Iran pending the proceedings. On the other hand it shows the State’s disagreement with the ⁵⁶ HRC Giosue Canepa v. Canada, 3 April 1997, Submission by the State of 13 June 1994 (on file with the author).

⁵⁷ See Conclusion Part II.

⁵⁸ HRC Judge v. Canada, 5 August 2003. §7.6. The petitioner had been removed ‘in the early hours of 7 August 1998, before any appeal could be launched’. Previous decision had been ‘rendered orally on 6 August 1998, at approximately 20:00’. See §6.4.

⁵⁹ HRC O.E. v. S, 26 July 1978. In other words, it maintained its provisional measures. Later that year it discontinued the case.

⁶⁰ The HRC used provisional measures on 3 April 1996. A.R.J. v. Australia, 28 July 1997.

⁶¹ He pointed out that ‘the author had been convicted of a serious criminal offence, after having entered Australia with the express purpose of committing a crime’. The immigration authorities had ‘given his applications full and careful consideration’.

provisional measure, hinting at the argument that the Committee is no fourth instance of appeal and emphasising the importance of its sovereign decision-making on law enforcement and immigration. The State pointed out, moreover, that the petitioner's continued detention was the Committee's responsibility. This indicates that the stay (and continued detention) was indeed triggered by the Committee's provisional measure.⁶² The State urged the Committee to give priority to the case. Requesting the HRC to decide on the petitioner's claims on a priority basis is not the same as requesting it to withdraw its provisional measure. It is possible that its primary request was withdrawal and its subsidiary request was giving the case priority. The Attorney General addressed his letter to the Chairman of the Committee, rather than to the Special Rapporteur.⁶³

In G.T. v. Australia (1996)⁶⁴ the Geneva Secretariat advised the petitioner to keep the Committee informed of the developments in her husband's case and contact it immediately if he were under imminent threat of deportation.⁶⁵ The Australian government submitted its comments on the admissibility and merits of the complaint only much later. This submission mainly dealt with evidentiary requirements, particularly the standard of proof.⁶⁶ It requested the HRC to lift its provisional measures. It referred to assurances it had received from the Malaysian government that it would not prosecute its nationals for offences committed overseas.⁶⁷

⁶² The State had requested the HRC to examine admissibility and merits at the same time. It pointed out that, following his application under the section of the Migration Act, allowing the Minister to grant persons the right to stay in Australia for humanitarian reasons, he had received a further bridging visa until July 1997 and if the Minister had not considered his request by then, he would be eligible for an extension of the visa.

⁶³ See also the decision of the HRC during its 55th session in 1995 about the competence of the Chairman to decide on provisional measures once the Working Group on Communications had taken up the question of admissibility. The Committee considered Australia's request that same month, during its 59th session. In its View the HRC noted that it gave this request 'careful consideration'. It decided that 'on the balance of the material before it, the request for interim protection should be maintained, and that the admissibility and the merits of the petitioner's case should be considered during the 60th session'. Joining the admissibility and merits was possible under the rules of procedure. The HRC has since decided to take this approach as a general rule, but at the time it may have been a response to the State's request to treat the case on a priority basis. In any case, it expressed its appreciation about the fact that the State had also provided information and observation on the merits, although it was challenging the admissibility. This enabled the Committee to accelerate the proceedings. See further Chapter XIV on the relationship with admissibility and jurisdiction on the merits.

⁶⁴ HRC Mrs. G.T. v. Australia, 4 November 1997.

⁶⁵ Letter of the Secretariat to the petitioner of 19 March 1997 in G.T. v. Australia, 706/1996 (on file with the author).

⁶⁶ See Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

⁶⁷ Malaysia had explained that it may charge a Malaysian national on other offences that he may have committed in Malaysia. Australia added that it had informed the petitioner's husband of these assurances two years previously and that he had responded that this information was 'very comforting and reassuring'. Three months before its request to lift the provisional measures in G.T., Australia had addressed the Committee with a similar request in A.R.J. Different from that case, here the View did not inform us of the Committee's reply, if any, to the request. In October 1997 the petitioner requested the HRC to maintain its provisional measures. The petitioner pointed out that her husband committed a criminal offence in Malaysia under legislation providing for the mandatory death penalty for trafficking drugs. She also explained that another inmate in prison wrote his reply to the aforementioned assurances of 1995 and 'that her husband signed the letter thinking it was a thank you letter in general terms'. She noted that his knowledge of English was limited and that he could not read or write it. Australia noted that it had

In one case, E.G. v. Canada (disc. 1997), counsel for the petitioner noted ‘with satisfaction that the Canadian Government has requested the withdrawal of interim protection, because this would appear to indicate that the Canadian Government now accepts the legitimacy of interim measures and, implicitly at least, its obligation to respect the requests of the Committee pursuant to Rule 86’.⁶⁸

2.2.3.5 INVOKING CONTRARY OBLIGATIONS UNDER INTERNATIONAL LAW

Sometimes contrary obligations under international law have been invoked. The UK defended its decision to ignore the provisional measures by the European Court to halt the transfer of two detainees in Iraq from the UK authorities to the Iraqi authorities⁶⁹ by reference to a domestic court decision ‘and its analysis of the application of the European Convention of Human Rights and the broader requirements of international law’, considering that it had ‘no lawful option other than transfer to the Iraqi authorities’.⁷⁰ Apparently the State had also pointed out that the ECtHR had asked the UK to retain power in Iraq of the two petitioners when the UK had ‘no legal power to do so. Compliance with Strasbourg requests would normally be a matter of course but these are exceptional circumstances’.⁷¹ assurances from the government of Malaysia that it would not prosecute the petitioner again ‘in connection to the drug trafficking offences for which he was convicted in Australia and that no question of double jeopardy would arise’. In this light Australia considered that the petitioner was ‘not at risk of imposition of a capital sentence should he be returned to Malaysia and, consequently, the Rule 86 request should be lifted’. Submission by the State of 3 June 1997 in G.T. v. Australia, 706/1996 (on file with the author). See about the often doubtful nature of assurances: Human Rights Watch (2004), also making reference to the more recent Concluding Observations of the HRC about the adequacy of assurances and the credibility of post-return monitoring mechanisms, pp. 10-12. On two occasions, one in 1993 and one in 1997 Canada respected the Committee’s provisional measures. Stewart v. Canada, 1 November 1996, 538/1993, Rule 86 of 26 April 1993 and 18 March 1994; E.G. v. Canada, 17 November 1997 (disc.) 738/1997, Rule 86 of 17 January 1997.

⁶⁸ HRC E.G. v. Canada (738/1997), initial submission 5 January 1997 (received 7 January 1997), Rule 86/91 of 17 January 1997; withdrawal of Rule 86 on 28 April 1997; petitioner’s request to withdraw the case of 26 May 1997. On 17 November 1997 the HRC informed the author that it had discontinued the case (on file with the author).

⁶⁹ See ECtHR provisional measures of 30 December 2008 by the Acting President of the Fourth Section. A scan of the ECtHR letter to counsel confirming its use of provisional measures was posted at <<http://humanrightsdoctorate.blogspot.com/2009/01/uk-breaches-provisional-measures.html>>.

⁷⁰ See the reference to the State’s Letter dated 31 December 2008 from Derek Walton, Agent of the Government of the United Kingdom to Mr T.L. Early, Section Registrar, European Court of Human Rights in: UK House of Commons Joint Committee on Human Rights, Letter by Chair Andrew Dismore MP to the Secretary of State for Defence, 13 January 2009, expressing concern regarding the transfer contrary to the European Court’s provisional measures and requesting clarifications, <<http://www.parliament.uk/documents/upload/JCHRAISaadon.pdf>>.

⁷¹ See the reference to statements published in the Independent, Pair accused of murder handed over to Iraqi authorities, 31 December 2008, in: UK House of Commons Joint Committee on Human Rights, Letter by Chair Andrew Dismore MP to the Secretary of State for Defence, 13 January 2009, expressing concern regarding the transfer contrary to the European Court’s provisional measures and requesting clarifications, <<http://www.parliament.uk/documents/upload/JCHRAISaadon.pdf>>.

These arguments are faulty. Given the difference in international obligations at stake the ‘broader requirements of international law’ were those based on the ECHR and the UK should have told the Iraqi authorities that it had ‘no lawful option’ other than compliance with the Court’s provisional measures. Indeed, parliamentary concern was expressed in response to the transfer and the government’s justification for it. Detailed information on the provisional measures and the transfer was requested, as well as a ‘a more detailed a more detailed explanation of the Government’s view that its decision to transfer the applicants is compatible with the right of individual petition secured by Article 34 ECHR, in the light of the interim measures decision of the European Court of Human Rights. In particular: a. Why does the Government consider it was appropriate to ignore the interim measures decision of the European Court on the basis of the UK courts’ interpretation of international law, and on the application of the ECHR? b. Does the Government agree that the final interpretation of the Convention and the scope of its application is a matter for the ECHR? If not, please explain the Government’s view’.⁷²

2.2.4 Various responses to provisional measures to intervene in detention and disappearance cases

2.2.4.1 DISAPPEARANCE CASES

While not much information is available about the Inter-American Commission’s intervention in disappearance cases there are indications that these may have some effect, especially when it intervenes shortly after a disappearance.⁷³

Colombia established an urgent search mechanism, at least partially in light of its obligations under the ACHR and other human rights treaties.⁷⁴ The Commission has in turn invoked this mechanism when it used precautionary measures. On 18 December 2001 the Commission used such measures to determine the whereabouts of two persons from the region of Antioquia and to protect their lives and persons. They were last seen on 27 November 2001 at a Medellín metropolitan police checkpoint. A few days later the two men contacted their families and told them a paramilitary group had abducted them. In its Annual Report the Commission notes that it ‘undertook a series of steps toward clearing up this situation during its on-site visit’. This visit had taken place from 7 until 13 December, but apparently these steps had not been sufficiently effective as the Commission resorted to the formal issuance of precautionary measures. As part of these measures it asked Colombia to ‘launch a prompt and effective investigation using the urgent search mechanism established by Law 589/2000’.⁷⁵ Again, the Commission does not indicate the precise contents of the State reply but it does note that it continued to receive information from the parties with regard to the situation of the protected persons.⁷⁶

⁷² UK House of Commons Joint Committee on Human Rights, Letter by Chair Andrew Dismore MP to the Secretary of State for Defence, 13 January 2009, expressing concern regarding the transfer contrary to the European Court’s provisional measures and requesting clarifications, <<http://www.parliament.uk/documents/upload/JCHRAISaadon.pdf>>.

⁷³ In March 1997, for instance, lawyers collective ‘José Alvear Restrepo’ in Colombia requested the Commission to take precautionary measures on behalf of one of its lawyers. Members of the National Police in Bogotá had arbitrarily detained him after a demonstration involving professors and students. CEJIL notes that the Commission immediately requested information from the Colombian government with regard to his detention and that he was freed the next day. Case of Mr. Vilalba Vargas, CEJIL case docket 1997. It is not clear whether the Commission simply requested information or indeed formally took precautionary measures. This example involves a specific type of threat to a human rights defender who is detained in unclear circumstances conducive to such disappearance. On 28 January 1999 the Commission was informed that a group of armed civilians had forcefully entered the headquarters of the Popular Training Institute (IPC) in Medellín, Antioquia and had abducted four investigators of the IPC. The Commission immediately took precautionary measures, that same afternoon. It urgently contacted Colombia to take the necessary measures to ascertain the whereabouts of the victims and protect their lives, physical integrity and liberty. Two of them were freed on 11 February and the two others on 19 February 1999. The ‘Autodefensas’ of Córdoba and Urabá had claimed responsibility for the kidnappings. Annual Report 1999, Chapter III.C.1, §17.

⁷⁴ See Law 589/2000, 10 July 2000, criminalizing enforced disappearance, instituting a national search mechanism including an urgent search mechanism.

2.2.4.2 HEALTH AND SAFETY IN DETENTION

In the early detention cases dealt with by the HRC, involving political prisoners, it appeared that State parties sometimes were more willing to respond to inquiries about health situations than to the claim on the merits relating to arbitrary detention etc. At other times Uruguay, the State most often involved, simply responded by denying admissibility.⁷⁷ The responses with regard to the health situation of political detainees ranged from blanket denial to precise information on medical treatment. Especially in the last two detention cases against Uruguay this State provided detailed information using medical terminology.⁷⁸ It is clear that the HRC rewarded this because in these cases it did not find a violation with regard to the alleged victims' health situations and it did not recommend the State to ensure adequate medical treatment.

⁷⁵ CIDH Annual Report 2001, §26.

⁷⁶ Ibid.

⁷⁷ The great majority of detention cases from the 1970s and 1980s relates to Uruguay, which at that time was led by a military junta. Other Latin American States from which such detention cases could have originated only recognized the right of individual complaint after a regime change. Uruguay, on the other hand, had ratified the OP in March 1976. Its military dictatorship lasted from 1973 to 1985. The State argued that the HRC exceeded its authority by dealing with complaints by detainees. In Sendic, for instance, the HRC had urged the State to provide information on the health and whereabouts of the petitioner’s husband, to transmit all the written material, such as submissions of the parties and the decisions of the HRC in this case to Raúl Sendic himself and allow him to communicate directly with the Committee. The State particularly protested the latter part of this decision, arguing that the HRC had ‘absolutely no basis’ for its request to give ‘a detainee under the jurisdiction of the State party’ the opportunity to communicate directly with it. Accepting this decision would ‘create a dangerous precedent’. It considered that the HRC had violated ‘international instruments such as the Covenant and its Protocol’. Uruguay considered that the provisions in these instruments extended to State parties as subjects of international law. ‘Thus these international norms, like any agreement of such nature, are applicable to States and not directly to individuals. Consequently, the Committee can hardly claim that this decision extends to any particular individual’. The State even went so far as to argue that the Committee’s decision violated elementary principles and norms ‘and thus indicates that the Committee is undermining its commitments in respect of the course of promoting and defending human rights’. The HRC pointed out that the State’s argument was ‘devoid of legal foundation’ because it had recognised the OP and, thus, the Committee’s competence to receive and consider communications from individuals. It pointed out that ‘denying individuals who are victims of an alleged violation their right to bring the matter before the Committee is tantamount to denying the mandatory nature of the Optional Protocol’. The ability of detainees to communicate directly with the Committee was, in fact, a prerequisite for the effective application of the OP. Governments had no right to create obstacles to this communication. Such obstacles would, in many cases, render meaningless the individual complaint procedure. HRC Raul Sendic Antonaccio (submitted by his wife Violeta Setelich) v. Uruguay, 28 October 1981.

While the general attitude of Uruguay with regard to the HRC's examination of cases of political prisoners in the 1970s and 1980s was far from cooperative, it is possible that the interest expressed by the HRC about the health of certain detainees has played a role not only in the State's decision to provide information but also in its decision to provide medical care. In any case it is likely that the HRC intended its requests for information at least partially to trigger such reaction and, thereby, to put a halt to continuing violations and prevent further irreparable harm. Of course, the Committee itself has expressly referred to the other reason for requesting information about an alleged victim's state of health: as necessary evidence to determine whether there has been a violation. Between August 1984 and 1 March 1985, when the newly elected government of Uruguay came to power, several people were released and cooperation improved dramatically since that time.

The Inter-American Commission has regularly intervened in detention situations. In August 2001, for instance, it took precautionary measures on behalf of an inmate at a women's penitentiary in Lima. The petitioners in her case had informed the Commission that her health problems included mobile breast lumps.⁷⁹ Specialized examinations were necessary to identify their nature and treatment. The Commission requested Peru to immediately provide the medical examinations necessary to protect her health. The State responded that it was providing her with medical attention and administered the medical exams necessary to protect her health.⁸⁰

In 2003, in a case involving psychiatric patients the Commission used precautionary measures in the face of information about female patients having been raped, children held together with adults and two youths that 'were kept for more than four years in solitary confinement in small cells, naked, and without access to the bathrooms'. It asked Paraguay to adopt measures to protect the 'life and physical, mental, and moral integrity' of these two youths as well as the other 458 patients. In response the State noted that two weeks after it received the precautionary measures the President of Paraguay, together with the Minister of Public Health and Social Welfare 'visited the hospital to learn more about the situation. After their visit, action was taken, as the director was replaced and an audit was launched'.⁸¹

2.2.4.3 IMMIGRATION DETENTION INVOLVING MINORS

The HRC has dealt with immigration detention involving children. In Bakhtiari family v. Australia (2003)⁸² the Rapporteur had requested the State to inform the Committee of the measures it had taken on the basis of the evaluation by Australia's own expert authorities that the children and their mother should have ongoing assessment outside of the Woomera detention centre in order to prevent further acts of self-harm. The State observed that it was closely monitoring the family and that there were individual care and case management plans in place that were regularly reviewed. It considered that release from detention would not be appropriate. 'Its processes had determined ⁷⁸ HRC Estradet Cabreira v. Uruguay, 21 July 1983 and Manera Lluberis v. Uruguay, 6 April 1984.

⁷⁹ CIDH Annual Report 2001, Chapter III C1, §50.

⁸⁰ Ibid.

⁸¹ CIDH Annual Report 2003, Chapter III C1, §60.

⁸² HRC Bakhtiari family v. Australia, 29 October 2003.

that it did not owe protection obligations to Mrs Bakhtiyari and her children'. Moreover, 'the Minister personally considered the case, inter alia in the light of the State party's obligations including the Covenant, and decided that it would not be in the public interest to substitute a more favourable decision'. Finally, the State considered it inappropriate to release the children and their mother when their father's visa was under consideration for cancellation for alleged fraud.⁸³

According to the State Article 24(1) ICCPR should not be interpreted as if it were the Convention on the Rights of the Child. Referring to its previous response to 'the Committee's request for information pursuant to Rule 86', it submitted that it had met its obligations with regard to the Bakhtiyari children. It added that 'all staff in detention facilities must advise local child protection authorities if they consider a child is at risk of harm'. Arrangements had been formalised in this respect. Moreover, in light of the concern about their well-being, 'special protective measures were implemented'.⁸⁴ Subsequently, however, the children and their parents were released following family court decisions.⁸⁵

⁸³ See HRC Bakhtiyari family v. Australia, 29 October 2003, §§4.3 and 4.4.

⁸⁴ "An officer has been specifically assigned to monitor the children's participation in educational and recreational activities, and to work with Mrs Bakhtiyari to encourage these ends. Records indicate that the two eldest boys attend school regularly, use computer facilities, play soccer regularly and attend exercise classes. They attend regular pool excursions and enjoy watching television, while Muntazar has actively taught other children cycling. Of the other children, the school-aged girls attend school and participate in recreational activities, including sewing with their mother".

⁸⁵ On 19 June 2003 the Family Court determined that the prolonged detention of children was unlawful. It considered that there was an obligation under the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child to protect minors held in custody. Family Court, B and B v. Minister for Immigration & Multicultural and Indigenous Affairs [2003] FamCA 451, judgment of 19 June 2003, see www.familycourt.gov.au. It found that its jurisdiction extended to protection against prospective as well as present harm, including by third party. The appeal was initially brought on behalf of two boys aged fourteen and twelve. Their three sisters of eleven, nine and six were later added. In this light all three judges considered that the Court did have jurisdiction to make certain protective orders concerning in immigration detention (including those related to medical and educational facilities). The majority considered that if it was to be determined at trial that the children were being held in detention indefinitely, this would be unlawful. They considered that for the purposes of this case the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child had been incorporated into the Family Law Act by the Family Reform Act of 1995, pursuant to the external affairs power in the Constitution. They also considered that the Migration Act should be interpreted as having been passed subject to Australia's obligations under the Children's Convention or having regard to them. The Court ordered that the case be remitted for rehearing as a matter of urgency. Following this decision several political parties called for the release of the approximately 107 children. The Labor party called upon the Government to immediately move families seeking asylum out of detention and into supervised housing, Agence France-Presse (via ClariNet), 'Release detained families now, opposition urges Australia's Howard', 21 June 2003, quickstart.clari.net. The Democrats also emphasised this both following and previous to the landmark decision, Australian Democrats Senator Andrew Bartlett, media releases 03/373 and 03/443 of 28 May and 20 June respectively, AusNews, AusIssues.com. Finally, the Greens equally re-emphasised that the 107 children should be released, Australian Greens-Federal leader Senator Bob Brown, media release of 19 June 2003, AusNews, AusIssues.com (consulted 13 August 2003). In July 2003 the State party informed the Committee that Mrs Bakhtiyari and her three daughters 'were currently resident in the Woomera Residential Housing Project, a facility aimed at special needs of women and children'. They were able to leave the house, provided they were escorted by correctional officers. By that time Mr Bakhtiyari was detained as well and the

Again it is unclear what role the Committee may have played. Presumably domestic pressure and, ultimately, the decision of the family court were crucial. Nevertheless, the various international efforts, including the Committee's provisional measures, may have played some role, directly or indirectly in the State's treatment, monitoring and eventual release of the children.⁸⁶

2.2.4.4 SEPARATE MINORS FROM ADULT DETAINEES

To some extent Honduras took seriously the Commission's intervention in the case of the minors detained in adult prisons. A few months after its precautionary measures it informed the Commission of the 'emergency measures taken to resolve the situation'.⁸⁷ In October 1996 the Commission took precautionary measures for the protection of the juveniles at the San Pedro Sula Prison. The next month the petitioners informed the Commission that the State had not yet implemented the precautionary measures, that it 'had failed to advise the courts that they were to cease the practice of incarcerating juveniles in adult facilities' and that it 'continued to allow juvenile offenders to be sent to those facilities'.⁸⁸ A month later the petitioners reported once more that Honduras had not yet adopted the precautionary measures. It requested the Commission to seek a government report on the concrete measures adopted to assign public defenders to all juveniles and to seek a suspension of the practice of incarcerating juveniles in adult facilities. Three days later, on 26 December 1996, the Commission reiterated the precautionary measures and requested information about their concrete implementation.⁸⁹

2.2.4.5 HOSTILE RESPONSE, BUT SITUATION OF DETAINEE REMEDIED

In April 2001 the Inter-American Commission took precautionary measures on behalf of a prisoner in Cuba. In its Annual Report the Commission quoted from the petitioners' request for precautionary measures that 'his health is delicate because of a tumor on his right lung' and that the prisoner began a hunger strike in February 2001 in demand of medical care. The Commission did not receive a friendly response. The Commission reports that Cuba 'returned the IACHR's document requesting the precautionary measures in an envelope from the Cuban Interests Section in Washington D.C'. It also reports, however, that it received information that the prisoner was moved to a hospital in Havana where he received specialized treatment. He was then transferred to a prison in that city.⁹⁰

two sons remained at the Baxter Immigration Reception and Processing Centre, because they were over the age limit for release into the Residential Housing Project for 'cultural sensitivities and security'. In August 2003 the Full Bench of the Family Court ordered the immediate release of all the children, pending resolution of the final application to the High Court. They were released that very day. More than two months later the HRC published its decision on the merits. Apart from violations of Article 9 (1) and (4), it also found violations of Article 24(1) and, potentially, of Articles 17(1) and 23(1) ICCPR.

⁸⁶ See also Chapter XVIII (Follow-up).

⁸⁷ CIDH Minors in detention v. Honduras, 10 March 1999 (merits), §21.

⁸⁸ See also Annual Report 1996, 14 March 1997, Chapter II, §4a (cont.).

⁸⁹ Ibid.

⁹⁰ CIDH Annual Report 2001, §28. Cuba is in a special situation as it is subjected to human rights monitoring but expelled from the political organs of the OAS. According to the Commission the OAS General Assembly had only suspended the participation of the Cuban Government but not

2.2.5 Responses to provisional measures to ensure access to health care outside the detention context

2.2.5.1 INTRODUCTION

As discussed in chapter XII, on occasion the Inter-American Commission has used provisional measures to ensure access to health care outside the detention context. The question arises how States have responded to such atypical provisional measures.

2.2.5.2 ENSURE ACCESS TO HIV MEDICATION

With regard to one of the new situations in which the Inter-American Commission has introduced the use of precautionary measures, namely to ensure access to medication for persons not in detention, but suffering from a serious illness, there has been some compliance and little outright criticism by the States concerned with regard to the Commission's decision to use the tool of precautionary measures in this context.

The case of El Salvador serves as an example, also of the responsiveness of the Commission to the State showing cooperation. A month after the Commission requested El Salvador to ensure access to HIV medication to prevent the death of 27 persons, the State informed the Commission that the authorities were reviewing their medical files 'in order to evaluate the anti-retroviral therapy and care needed for each case, and that they were seeking abroad the additional funds needed to provide the treatment'.⁹¹ A few months later the Board of Directors of the Social Security Institute of El Salvador authorised the procurement of the triple anti-retroviral therapy for persons who are HIV-positive or have AIDS. From that day on, El Salvador began to provide the requested treatment.⁹² Subsequently the Commission continued to request information regarding the State's compliance with the precautionary measures, but it did not heed to the petitioner's request to seek provisional measures from the Court.⁹³

the obligations of the State. Cuba does not subscribe to the Commission's view that it still has obligations under the OAS Charter.

⁹¹ CIDH Annual Report 1999, Chapter III C.1, §32.

⁹² CIDH Annual Report 2000, §30.

⁹³ In March 2000 the petitioners requested that the Commission would declare that El Salvador had not complied with the precautionary measures. They requested the Commission to seek provisional measures from the Court. In March 2000 the State reported that it had appointed someone at the Office of the Director General for Foreign Policy as the liaison officer for the petitioners in relation to this case. That same month the Commission requested the petitioners to provide it with the names of the alleged victims who had died since it had begun processing the case. It also requested specific information with regard to the precautionary measures. In April 2000 the petitioners submitted this information and they asked the Commission again to request the Court to order provisional measures. Four days later they repeated this request. Later that month the Commission transmitted the petitioners' comments to the State and requested more information with regard to compliance with the precautionary measures. In June 2000 the petitioners requested the Commission once more to move the case forward. In June El Salvador submitted the information the Commission had requested. This included 'the list of persons identified in the request for precautionary measures, together with detailed information on medical care, treatment, medical recommendations and other pertinent information'. Commenting on the information provided by the State, the petitioners reiterated their position

In July 2000 the State reported that the Governing Board of the Salvadoran Social Security Institute had decided to authorize the purchase of the triple therapy medication. It mentioned that this was authorized 'for persons who are insured' and reported the establishment of a fund. On 20 July 2000 El Salvador submitted additional information in relation to the treatment received by Mr. Miranda Cortéz. The Commission 'expressed its appreciation for this information and for the action taken by the Salvadoran State within the context of the precautionary measures granted in this case'. Later that month the State submitted additional information on the action undertaken to implement the measures. This included 'strengthening and taking up activities aimed at preventing the transmission of AIDS through education and the promotion of hygiene and preventive health ... among the sectors most at risk for this disease' and 'creating a fund aimed at purchasing anti-retroviral medications for the provision of triple therapy to HIV infected persons'.⁹⁴

In December 2000 the Commission decided in so many words not to grant the petitioners' request to seek provisional measures by the Court.

"In making this decision the Inter-American Commission considered the information received from both parties, and evaluated the different actions taken by the Salvadoran State to provide medical treatment not only to the members of the Atlacatl Association but also to other persons infected with HIV/AIDS in that country. These actions had continued even after expiration of the deadline for precautionary measures on August 29, 2000".⁹⁵ that it had not complied with the Commission's precautionary measures. They asserted, for instance, that the two alleged victims who died on 5 and 11 May 2000 had not received the treatment from the State 'that would have avoided their deaths'. Again, they requested the Commission to go to the Court for provisional measures. See footnote 3 in CIDH Jorge Odir Miranda Cortéz et al v. El Salvador, 7 March 2001 (adm.).

⁹⁴ In August the petitioners commented on this information, repeated their position on El Salvador's non-compliance with the precautionary measures and their request to seek provisional measures by the Court. In the meantime, the period for the precautionary measures expired on 29 August 2000 and the Commission did not extend the measures. They requested a hearing before the Commission, which took place in October 2000. In November and December 2000 the petitioners again asked the Commission to declare non-compliance and to seek provisional measures by the Court. In December El Salvador provided the Commission with a summary of its activities in order to comply with the precautionary measures.

⁹⁵ CIDH Jorge Odir Miranda Cortéz et al v. El Salvador, 7 March 2001 (adm.), §20. That same month, however, the Commission sent the State a request for information about the medical care and treatment provided to the 24 surviving persons identified in the case. In February 2001 the State informed the Commission that it had provided the anti-retroviral medication to eleven of the 24 persons. It noted that this medication was available to the other persons as well 'subject to the proper medical evaluation'. It had also expanded the provision of the medication to other persons not included in the case. With regard to the exhaustion of domestic remedies and the merits of the case, the State argued that the Commission should construe the information it had provided during the processing of the precautionary measures as the State's response to the petitioners' allegations. "The petitioners have availed themselves of domestic remedies and have at all times, had access to the appropriate entities in the country. We have evidence, which has also been provided to the Commission, pertaining to specialized medical and hospital care, the measures adopted by state institutions, the treatment provided to each patient living with HIV/AIDS, and the budget approved to provide them with the medication requested". Communication from the state, 8 September 2000, 7 March 2001 (adm.), §29. The State also noted that patients who did not yet begin the treatment plan would be notified by telegram to appear at the Social Work Unit of El Salvador requested the Commission to close the case. It argued that the attention it provided to the alleged victims within the framework of the precautionary measures already demonstrated its compliance with its international commitments.⁹⁶

When declaring the case admissible the Commission noted the following:

“The IACHR is aware of the fact that the people of El Salvador are in the midst of a very difficult period brought on by a series of natural disasters, which has placed enormous demands on the health authorities and officials. In that context, the Inter-American Commission appreciates the efforts of the Salvadoran authorities to address the needs of persons infected with HIV/AIDS in that country. The supply of anti-retroviral medications has been steadily increasing in recent months, and the state has announced that it will continue to adopt the measures necessary in that regard.”⁹⁷

2.2.5.3 ENSURE ACCESS TO HEALTH CARE TO SURVIVORS OF A MASSACRE

Two weeks after the Inter-American Commission had taken precautionary measures in the Aguas Blancas case Mexico reported the measures it had taken to comply.⁹⁸ These included ‘contacting each of the protected persons, providing access to health centres in the state of Guerrero, and holding meetings to resolve the problems that have been identified’. A month later, Mexico reported that a meeting that had taken place between the victims and several state and federal officials. During this meeting agreements were made in relation to medical attention, travelling and accommodation expenses and drugs and medical equipment ‘as indicated by their needs’.⁹⁹

2.2.6 Various responses to provisional measures aimed at protecting against death threats

2.2.6.1 INTRODUCTION

It appears from the case law that States are taking the Inter-American Court’s provisional measures more and more seriously. States generally do not question the Orders by the Court for provisional measures. They often send a high level delegation to a hearing to argue why the Court should not order such measures.¹⁰⁰

The situation in which the Court has used provisional measures most often (as has the Commission) is in the context of death threats and harassment. Killings have subsided when whole communities have been covered by an order for provisional measures.

the Oncology Hospital of the Salvadoran Social Security Institute. The liaison officer for the case contacted the legal representative of the petitioners on this issue.

⁹⁶ CIDH Jorge Odir Miranda Cortéz et al v. El Salvador, 7 March 2001 (adm.), §3.

⁹⁷ Id., §48.

⁹⁸ CIDH Tomás Porfirio Rondin (‘Aguas Blancas’ case) v. Mexico, 18 February 1998.

⁹⁹ CIDH Floriberto Cruz and another 7 survivors of the massacre in Aguas Blancas, Guerrero v. Mexico, precautionary measures of 17 July 2001, CIDH Annual Report 2001, Chapter III (a), §40.

¹⁰⁰ The Dominican Republic, for instance, in the Haitians in the Dominican Republic case, sent a delegation to the Court that included the representatives of all the parties. On this case see Chapter XI (Mass expulsion).

The first time the Inter-American Court ordered provisional measures directing a State to protect persons against death threats was in the famous case Velásquez Rodríguez, the first one decided by the Court on the merits. What was interesting in this disappearance case, in which two witnesses had been killed, is that it was the State that first proposed to take certain measures. In its Order of 19 January 1988 the Inter-American Court noted that Honduras had proposed, during the Court hearing, to take measures on its own initiative to investigate and punish those responsible for the murders of the two witnesses. It had announced that it would submit to the Court the findings of the autopsies of the victims. Honduras had also proposed to protect persons under threat, in particular the two persons mentioned before in the letter of the President. Honduras had included in its submission press releases of the Secretariat of its Presidency and of its Inter-Institutional Commission of Human Rights repudiating the assassination and the violence. The Inter-American Court subsequently ordered Honduras to 'adopt concrete measures to make clear that the appearance of an individual before the Inter-American Commission or Court of Human Rights, under conditions authorized by the American Convention and by the rules of procedure of both bodies, is a right enjoyed by every individual and is recognized as such by Honduras as a party to the Convention'.¹⁰¹

The Commission has used precautionary measures in many cases and sometimes they appear to be quite effective.¹⁰² Yet in other cases recourse to the Court is necessary. Sometimes the Commission takes a rather long time before actually doing so. In November 1995 the Commission requested Colombia to take precautionary measures on behalf of seven members of the Civic Human Rights Committee of Meta. This Committee exists since 1991 and its members have been subjected to constant threats and attacks since that time. Some have been summarily executed. Mr. Giraldo, however, who was protected by these precautionary measures, was murdered in October 1996. In response, the Commission requested the Court to take provisional measures on behalf of three of his family members as well as three members of the Civic Human Rights Committee of Meta, who had also been the beneficiaries of the Commission's precautionary measures.¹⁰³ The Court indeed did so.¹⁰⁴

¹⁰¹ IACHR Velásquez Rodríguez, Fairén Garbí/Solís Corrales and Godínez Cruz cases, Order of 19 January 1988, Compendium 1987-1996, pp. 9-11.

¹⁰² For instance, almost a month after the Commission had taken precautionary measures on behalf of the President of the Constitutional Court, Guatemala informed the Commission that it had already deployed two uniformed officers 'to protect the perimeter' of her home before the Commission's precautionary measures. Later it had permanently assigned four plain-clothes officers from the protection and security service of the National Civilian Police to protect her. CIDH Annual Report 2001, Chapter III (a), §31. Another example is that of a journalist in Mexico who had received death threats from members of the judicial police in the state of Sonora. Allegedly, these threats were connected to his investigation into corruption and ties to drug trafficking by the judicial police in that state. In September 1999 the Commission requested Mexico to protect his life and physical integrity. In October 1999 Mexico responded that the National Human Rights Commission communicated with him twice a day. Mexico also informed the Commission that it was investigating the alleged acts. Annual Report 1999, Chapter 3.C.1, §45. In March 2000, the Commission requested Brazil to take precautionary measures on behalf of Catherine Halvey, a human rights defender working with the Human Rights Centre of the Archdiocese of Manaus. She had informed the Commission that, as a result of her activities, she had received several death threats. Brazil replied that it had taken precautionary measures after the six months period. Apparently there was no reason to maintain the measures. CIDH Annual Report 2000, §12.

¹⁰³ Case 11.690.

¹⁰⁴ CIDH Annual report 1997, Chapter III (a) under 'Colombia'.

Obviously a State may nominally follow up the Inter-American Commission's suggestions, made either as part of precautionary measures or in the context of State or thematic reports or the Court's provisional measures, without really solving the underlying problems. It cannot be ruled out that in some cases following, or seemingly following, the Commission's suggestions may in fact exacerbate the situation locally.

This subsection will further deal with responses that lack specificity, with the difficulty States have in implementing the obligation to investigate, prosecute and punish, but also with specific measures taken by States in response. Also discussed are the use of provisional measures as leverage by certain members of government to indeed help achieve better protection, State compliance after regime change, the introduction by a State of a formalised protection program and the proactive approach by a State taking voluntary precautionary measures.

2.2.6.2 LACK OF SPECIFICITY IN RESPONSE: WE ARE TAKING 'THE APPROPRIATE STEPS'

Generally States respond to precautionary measures in the context of threats and harassment. Often they could be more specific about the implementation of the measures. They have noted, for instance, that they were 'in the process of implementing' them.¹⁰⁵ Armed civilians allegedly reporting to the Governor of Oaxaca had issued politically motivated death threats against a group of residents of the town of San Miguel Copala.¹⁰⁶ In August the Commission took precautionary measures. One of the beneficiaries was a survivor of an attack by these armed civilians who had been receiving medical treatment in Mexico City and was afraid to return home. Mexico responded that it had identified the perpetrators and issued warrants for their arrest. It added that the Human Rights Commission of Oaxaca state had played a role in solving the matter and that 'all the competent authorities were taking the appropriate steps within their respective areas of influence'. In September, however, the petitioners informed the Commission that the dangerous situation keeping one of the survivors of the ambush from returning to his community still existed.¹⁰⁷ While many less forthcoming responses are possible, the reference to 'taking the appropriate steps' is very vague and given the reaction of the petitioners did not include specific protection allowing this one survivor to return. The statement that it had identified the perpetrators and issued warrants for their arrest would be very positive, if followed by information that the arrest indeed took place and the perpetrators were prevented from continuing their threats. According to the petitioners, however, for at least one survivor the dangerous situation still persisted.

2.2.6.3 INVESTIGATE, PROSECUTE, PUNISH

In general, as noted, the Commission's precautionary measures on behalf of witnesses and human rights defenders seem to be reasonably effective.¹⁰⁸ In the majority of cases the Commission does ¹⁰⁵ Response by Guatemala of 11 April 1996 to precautionary measures of 2 March 1996 on behalf of five persons and their families the Commission requested Guatemala to take who had received various death threats. Annual Report 1996, 14 March 1997, §4a.

¹⁰⁶ In July 2001 they had shot several persons in an ambush. Two of them died.

¹⁰⁷ CIDH Annual Report 2001, Chapter III (a), §41.

¹⁰⁸ Early 1998 the President of the Court had adopted urgent measures requesting Guatemala to guarantee the personal integrity of the members of the Vásquez family, involved in the Paniagua not resort to the Court to ask for provisional measures, although this may be due mainly to lack of resources on the part of the Commission. There is one aspect of its precautionary measures, however, that States usually do not respect. This is the obligation to investigate threats and punish those found responsible.¹⁰⁹

In December 2000 the Commission requested Guatemala to guarantee the life and physical integrity of the President of the Association of Family Members of the Detained and Disappeared of Guatemala (FAMDEGUA).¹¹⁰ It also requested Guatemala to take effective measures to guarantee the safety of persons visiting or working at the offices of this organisation. Guatemala informed the Commission that the alleged perpetrators had been captured and that it was conducting judicial investigations and providing police protection.¹¹¹

Yet in those cases where there is a willingness to investigate and prosecute, the investigator and prosecutor, the witness and even the judges are often being threatened. In the end neither the original attacks, nor the subsequent threats and harassment are properly dealt with. Even when a prosecution results in a conviction, there are cases where the perpetrators escape or are liberated by armed groups and are not captured again, resuming their threats.¹¹²

States are prepared to enter into detailed negotiations with the beneficiaries and the Commission and take very specific action as suggested by the Commission, but their investigation of death threats, attacks and harassment lags behind dramatically. Prosecuting alleged perpetrators and punishing them when found guilty is a much more sensitive issue than spending resources on protective measures. The rate of compliance with regard to the latter is much higher than with regard to the former. This applies to the Court's provisional measures as well.

In April 2004 Guatemala informed the Court of the place of detention of the man convicted for the murder of Nicolas Blake, who was sentenced to 28 years in prison and would not be released before March 2025.¹¹³ Such detention is obviously an important step in the prevention of irreparable harm. Yet to the extent that the beneficiaries of provisional measures in the Blake case had been harassed by other persons, their acts should be investigated as well.

Morales ('White Van') case, President's urgent measures of 10 February 1998. The Court ratified these in June. Subsequently the security of the beneficiaries improved, and upon suggestion of the Commission, the Court lifted its provisional measures, Order of 28 August 2001.

¹⁰⁹ In the Carpio-Nicolle v. Guatemala case, for instance, compliance with the concrete recommendations was good but the threats and harassment themselves had not been well investigated. Here the political profile of the family and the nature of the case were very important.

¹¹⁰ FAMDEGUA is a petitioner in the case of the Dos Erres village massacre pending before the Commission, case 11.681.

¹¹¹ CIDH Annual Report 2000, §33.

¹¹² In the Colotenango case several former civilian patrol members responsible for the murder and other facts dealt with in this case had escaped. The lives and physical integrity of the witnesses remained at risk as a result. The situation in Colotenango is very complicated because of the inter-community battle between members of PAC and non-members. In the circumstances, many believe that all the media attention did not help and neither did the pressure by the UN presence Minugua. The first Order was of 1994 and the orders were finally lifted by Order of 12 July 2007. They were lifted because the main point of contention between the beneficiaries and the State related to the non-implementation of a point agreed on in the friendly settlement in 1997. The Court clarified that lifting the Order did not mean that the State had fully met its obligations under the Convention specified in the Inter-American Commission's Friendly Settlement Report, Juan Pablo Chanay (Guatemala), 13 March 1997 (Friendly Settlement). The State was not released either from its obligation to investigate, identify and, when appropriate, punish.

¹¹³ IACHR Blake, Order of 17 November 2004, 10th 'Having seen' clause.

Often protection is partial and an ongoing process requiring continued vigilance on the part of NGOs and the Commission. The result is some compliance but not sufficient to ensure lasting protection. The situation of the Peace Community is a case in point.¹¹⁴ An incredible number of people from this Community have been murdered. The provisional measures ordered by the Inter-American Court have helped achieve some protection to them. In addition the Community has gained international attention. Yet the members of this Community, as well as those persons providing services to them, are still in need of protection and the killings have not been investigated. President Uribe has never been a friend of the Peace Community.

At the same time, from the first Order for provisional measures in this case one may conclude that the government prefers to be perceived as being cooperative. Moreover, it seems that some civil servants, politicians or other officials are more willing to respect the Court's Order than others.

The comments of the State, in its reports or during hearings, may shed some light on its willingness to implement that part of the Court's orders for provisional measures aiming at investigation and prosecution. It pointed out that a Committee of representatives of the Office of the Attorney General, the Office of the General Prosecutor and the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights visited the local authorities of San José de Apartadó in order to promote investigations of the facts that took place in 1999-2000. This allowed for a formal opening of the investigations into the occurrences of April 1999, with the detention order for one person. The State's representatives made the observation that the actions of the State need to aim at eliminating any trace of impunity and 'render important results in the medium term'.¹¹⁵

With regard to its obligation to investigate and prosecute, the State had mentioned several times that it had opened an investigation, that it was in a preliminary stage, or at the stage of collecting evidence. During the hearing, in November 2000, the Commission pointed out that a situation of total impunity was prevailing in spite of the collaboration of the Community with the judicial authorities. Some of the violent acts, moreover, were now being dealt with under the military criminal justice system, specifically by the military judge of the 17th Brigade of the Army dealing with the investigation of criminal offences. It was the 17th Brigade that was mainly implicated in the violent acts against the Community perpetrated by paramilitaries. The State reported that its Defence Ministry had taken measures through the Lower Operating Unit ('la Unidad Operativa Menor'). This included operations in the area and capture of several members of the paramilitary ('Autodefensas') as well as of the armed revolutionary group FARC.

During the November hearing the State's representatives had also noted that the Vice-Presidency's promotion of actions providing physical protection, in collaboration with the local authorities and the Network of Social Solidarity, reaffirmed the State's commitment towards the Community of San José de Apartadó.¹¹⁶

¹¹⁴ See also Chapter IX (Threats).

¹¹⁵ IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order of 24 November 2000. In the original text: 'dar frutos importantes a mediano plazo', 'Having seen' clause 10(g).

¹¹⁶ The State was fully capable of contributing to and making concrete the implementation of these measures as well as to make progress in its dialogue with the Commission. They also pointed out that the Ministry of the Interior had followed up the developments around the Community since its creation. It had coordinated actions with local authorities and with City Hall in particular. It had provided humanitarian assistance to the displaced persons, which it had coordinated with the Municipality and the Office of the Governor. It had taken measures through the Lower Operating Unit ('la Unidad Operativa Menor'). These included controls on the road between Apartadó and San José de Apartadó, as well as orders from the Commanders of the 17th Brigade of the Army to the local units to protect human rights. In all this the State had emphasized the rights of the Peace Community. The Office of the UNHCHR, the Office of the National Ombudsman, the ICRC and

Five days before it was expected to hand in its first implementation report the State held a meeting with representatives of several State organs to analyse the situation of the Community. During this meeting the decision was taken to send to the Community an Inter-Institutional Commission made up of representatives of the Vice Presidency, the Office of the Attorney General and the Office of the General Prosecutor. A week before the Court would hold its public hearing on the Commission's request for provisional measures this delegation would visit the Community.¹¹⁷

The State's representatives acknowledged that the Court's provisional measures, with their collective nature, were based on important precedents in international law.¹¹⁸ They observed that the Court's hearing had allowed them to become more closely aware of all the different views. They also pointed out an additional purpose for the participating institutions: to take initiatives and be spokespersons inside the government so that the required actions would be implemented promptly and completely in the entire country.¹¹⁹

During the public hearing the Commission referred to the commitment of the Vice-Presidency of Colombia to allow the Community to ask for help, to resolve emergency situations and prevent violent acts from taking place. Measures to ensure this were now in the process of implementation and 'among them are the supply of short wave radios, repair of the telephone system of the place, repair of the road, and the installations of reflecting lights in the urban central area'.¹²⁰ The Commission emphasised these measures would be adopted by mutual agreement between the State, the Members of the Community and the petitioners in order to guarantee their effectiveness as well as compatibility with the Peace Community's commitment to the principle of neutrality. It noted that personnel and armed protection inside the Community itself could endanger this commitment.¹²¹ This relates to the intention expressed by the State to position such people inside the Community.

The State representatives pointed out that the State respected the position of the Peace Community and had worked with the authorities to ensure that they would afford armed protection on the outside of this Community. Nevertheless, the armed forces would be able to enter it if necessary. The State representatives also informed the Court that both the Minister of the Interior and the Office of Human Rights considered that the protection afforded to the Community must be coordinated. It is not clear whether they just meant coordination between the various governmental offices and local authorities or also with the beneficiaries. The State representatives continued with the remark that the State had dealt with petitions through the Network of Social Solidarity and the Ministry had made available a sum of 35 million pesos for a project of workshops intended to relieve tension between the authorities and the Community and to restore confidence between them. They did say, in so many words, that the early warning system promised by the State must be coordinated between the Community and the public security forces in order for it to be effective.¹²² They pointed out that the Vice-Presidency had promoted multiple actions on behalf of the Community, including the aforementioned 'installation of light reflectors in the others had also provided training to the troops on human rights and humanitarian law issues. Id., 'Having seen' clause 7(a).

¹¹⁷ Id., 'Having seen' clause 7(b).

¹¹⁸ In the original text: 'Estas medidas adoptadas con su carácter colectivo, están sustentadas en importantes antecedentes del derecho internacional'. Id., 'Having seen' clause 10(h). See also Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4 on beneficiaries.

¹¹⁹ Id., 'Having seen' clause 7(h).

¹²⁰ Id., 'Having seen' clause 9(m), iv.

¹²¹ Ibid.

¹²² IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order of 24 November 2000, 'Having seen' clause 10(f).

Community of San José and in La Unión, supply of communication radios and improvement of roads'. These were all undertaken in collaboration with the Municipality, the City Hall and the Network of Social Solidarity ('Red de Solidaridad Social').¹²³ They also repaired the telephone of the town centre of the Community, which was now in operation.¹²⁴

The Order in the Peace Community case has been repeated and expanded several times.¹²⁵ Early 2008 the Constitutional Court of Colombia ordered the State, among others, to comply with the Orders of the Inter-American Court. A new and potentially far-reaching part of its judgment is its order to provide specific information on the members of the armed forces etc. who were present in an area where massacres took place. The constitutional court also emphasized that the State should take efforts to gain the trust of the beneficiaries of the provisional measures.¹²⁶ The Constitutional Court of Colombia has pointed out that part of the Inter-American Court's provisional measures was the requirement to investigate and prosecute. Despite the fact considerable time had passed with regard to several of the killings, still no investigations had been completed. It also pointed out that the fact that the State had ratified the ACHR required all institutions of the State to conduct themselves in accordance with the terms of the Convention, in such a manner that the Inter-American Commission and Court are not required to intervene. It added that the same could be said with regard to the International Criminal Court (ICC). By ratifying the ICC-Statute Colombia had committed itself to do everything possible not to enter into a situation of ¹²³ Id., 'Having seen' clause 10(e).

¹²⁴ Id., 'Having seen' clause 7(c).

¹²⁵ See e.g. IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order of 6 February 2008.

¹²⁶ Constitutional Court of Colombia, Sala de Revisión, T-1025/07, decided 3 December 2007, published 22 January 2008. The Constitutional Court concluded that the facts demonstrated that Colombia had failed to comply with its duty to prosecute the violations against the members of the Peace Community. Despite the gravity of the crimes and the fact that many of them had been committed many years back, as of yet there have been no convictions. Many old cases were still at the initial stage of investigation, or the investigation has been suspended. In many other cases no information is available at all on the stage of investigation and yet other cases appear to remain inactive as they have been transferred to other jurisdictions or a verdict has been passed inhibiting further investigation. All of this results in impunity, in violation of the right of the Community members to access to justice and the right to know the truth of what happened, §25. The petitioner in the case before the Constitutional Court had noted that by May 2006 the number of members that were assassinated already reached 175. The Constitutional Court also derived from the information provided to it by the Prosecutor's Office that this Office was investigating more than 100 cases, §25. The Constitutional Court pointed out that in important percentage of the members that had established the Community had now been murdered. This situation was intolerable for a State that had committed itself in its Constitution to the protection of human rights. It added that it had previously established that the precautionary measures of the Inter-American Commission and the provisional measures of the Court were legally binding. This meant that the provisional measures ordered by the Court in this context, on six occasions, obliged the State in a special manner to take the urgent measures necessary to protect the Community. Consequently the Court put together a serious list of requirements for the State to fulfil, including providing specific information on ongoing investigations and investigations that had yet to be initiated. The Office of the Public Prosecutor was to establish a proceeding for accelerating the military investigations so that it could properly start its investigations as well. It indicated how a high level officer was to be responsible for coordinating all proceedings with regard to the killings and harassment of members of the Peace Community and those providing services to them, §27.

being unable or unwilling to investigate and prosecute.¹²⁷ This domestic judgment shows international and domestic courts working to remind the State of its human rights obligations under international and domestic law.¹²⁸

2.2.6.4 SPECIFIC MEASURES

In December 2000 the Commission requested Brazil to take precautionary measures on behalf of three Justice Advocates of São Paulo and their family members, as well as sixteen detainees. The last were detained in the Public Prison of Sorocaba in the State of São Paulo. They had received death threats ‘presumably linked to the mistreatment and torture taking place in that prison’.¹²⁹ The Commission requested Brazil to provide guarantees for the right to life and physical integrity of these persons as well as their ability to testify without fear of reprisal. In response, the State reported that it had transferred the guards involved in the case to administrative positions.¹³⁰

In response to a precautionary measure on behalf of three persons at the General Department for Integrity in Public Service, Nicaragua denied that President Alemán had threatened ‘any public official’.¹³¹ It did note, however, that ‘in keeping with the measures requested, the protection and personal security had been increased including, in the case of Mr. Anaya, a personal escort service comprised of five persons, protection of his residence and place of work by a uniformed policeman 24 hours a day; and a telephone communications monitoring service, by the Department of Investigation of Personal Security Matters in co-ordination with the Department of Criminal Investigation of the National Police, to process information and investigate threats made against him’.¹³²

2.2.6.5 PROVISIONAL MEASURES AS LEVERAGE FOR THOSE INDIVIDUALS WITHIN GOVERNMENT THAT ARE INDEED INTERESTED IN PREVENTING IRREPARABLE HARM

Often the situations in which provisional measures are taken to protect persons against death threats and harassment are extremely complicated and volatile. There may be a partial willingness of a government to comply on the one hand and perpetrators with influential networks (of army, police and other governmental officials) on the other.

¹²⁷ Constitutional Court of Colombia, Sala de Revisión, T-1025/07, decided 3 December 2007, published 22 January 2008, §26.

¹²⁸ Ibid. In October 2007, upon invitation by the Colombian government, an ICC delegation visited Colombia. The ICC media Advisory announced that, among others, a meeting would take place with Colombian judges and others ‘to discuss relevant justice issues, including the implementation of the law on Justice and peace’. International Criminal Court Media Advisory: ICC Prosecutor visits Colombia, 18 October 2007, at <www.icc-cpi.int/press/pressreleases/282.html> (visited 13 May 2008).

¹²⁹ CIDH Annual Report 2000, §14.

¹³⁰ The Commission does not mention the State’s approach, if any, to the protection of the Justice Advocates and their family. CIDH Annual Report 2000, §14.

¹³¹ It is interesting that Alemán himself, as a presidential candidate had once been under the protection of an Order for provisional measures by the Inter-American Court. See IACHR Alemán Lacayo (Nicaragua), Order of 6 February 1997, §4.2.2 and §5.1.

¹³² CIDH Annual report 1999, Chapter 3.C.1, §46.

El Salvador, for instance, in one case reported to the Commission that it had instructed the Director General of the National Civil Police Force to protect the life and personal integrity of the García Prieto family. It had also ordered him to start or continue the investigation of the acts of intimidation against them. Finally it had instructed the Director General to review the out-of-court steps taken by the National Civil Police Force to gather information in the murder case of García Prieto Giraldo.¹³³ Nevertheless repeated precautionary measures were necessary as the petitioners continued to receive threats in order to deter their search for justice in the murder case.¹³⁴

In some situations States themselves may find that provisional measures are very useful. This may be the case in certain regions where the provisional measures give them backing to deal with the armed forces.¹³⁵ In some cases a government even indicates that it wishes the Court to take provisional measures. States may actually prefer the Court to maintain or reintroduce provisional measures. They may use them as a 'back-up' in their struggle against certain sectors of their own armed forces, police or other governmental agencies.

In its 1997 Annual Report the Commission mentions that it had the opportunity to meet with representatives of the Colombian government to discuss the Court's decision to lift the provisional measures when it handed down its final judgment in the Caballero Delgado and Santana

¹³³ Mr García Prieto Giraldo was murdered in El Salvador in June 1994 in the presence of his wife and son. In October 1996, his family, CEJIL and IDHUCA requested the Commission to take precautionary measures for their protection (case 11.697). In June 1997 the Commission requested El Salvador to adopt precautionary measures safeguarding the life, liberty and personal integrity of three members of his family as well as of the attorneys and witnesses associated with the investigation and trial of those guilty of his death. More than two months later the government of El Salvador reported the above to the Commission. CIDH Annual Report 2001, Chapter III (a), §30.

¹³⁴ Subsequently the Commission sent a new request for precautionary measures. The government of El Salvador informed it that it was continuing its attempts to clarify the facts. In January 1998 the State informed the Commission of a meeting that had taken place between the beneficiaries and several authorities and some human rights defenders. The parties involved were the three family members and several public officers, the Director of the National Police Force, a representative of the Office of the Attorney for the Defence of Human Rights and someone from the Human Rights Institute of the José Simeón Cañas Central American University (IDHUCA). During this meeting a discussion took place about several options for the implementation of a security plan to protect the lives and integrity of this family. This security plan was also to protect the witnesses in connection with both the murder of Mr García Prieto Giraldo and with the acts of intimidation suffered by his family members. In November 2001, however, the Commission again took precautionary measures in connection with this case. It granted these measures on behalf of the parents of the murder victim and their legal advisers from the Human Rights Institute of the José Simeón Cañas Central American University. In its Annual Report 2001 the Commission refers to a preliminary report from El Salvador in which it noted that it had scheduled a meeting between its Attorney General, the family and their representatives for 22 November 2001. In this meeting it planned to reach an agreement on the necessary protection measures. On 5 December 2001 the petitioners 'submitted a series of specific proposals for the Salvadorian authorities to pursue, including appointing a special prosecutor and a special investigator from the National Civilian Police, assigning the García Prieto family and their advisors security guards, details on the equipment needed to protect them, and holding regular meetings with the competent authorities'. CIDH Annual Report 2001, Chapter III (a), §30.

¹³⁵ Interview by author with President of the IACHR Cançado Trindade, San José, Costa Rica, November 2001.

case.¹³⁶ The Commission notes that the Court's decision to lift these measures 'raised some concerns because of the dangerous situation of several persons as a result of the domestic investigations and tasks that were performed in this case'. Following this meeting, Colombia requested the Court to re-establish the provisional measures. In its Annual Report the Commission points out that this 'constitutes an important precedent that is worthy of following in similar circumstances in the future'.¹³⁷ Thus, in March 1997, the State itself proposed a continuation of the provisional measures, 'as long as the risk situation continues, bearing in mind that the internal proceedings are currently being carried out by the investigating authorities [...] The Government of Colombia will inform the Honorable Court when it considers that the situation no longer warrants maintenance of the measures requested, but until then, it trusts that these will be maintained, inasmuch as it is a question of protecting the life and physical integrity of those persons who have given evidence in the proceedings now under way and at those conducted by the Honorable Inter-American Court of Human Rights'. The Court indeed did so.¹³⁸

2.2.6.6 COMPLIANCE AFTER REGIME CHANGE

After Fujimori fled, the situation in Peru changed, even before elections took place. The Court was able to lift provisional measures in three cases, but in February 2001 it had to order them in another case. It ordered Peru to maintain those measures necessary to secure effectively the return of Ms Loayza to her country, guaranteeing her physical, psychological and moral integrity.¹³⁹

The other cases, however, were finally solved. In August 2000, in the case of Cesti Hurtado, the Court lifted the provisional measures dating from 1997. His security and that of his family did not appear to be at risk anymore. Thus, the circumstances of extreme gravity and urgency, which had motivated the adoption of the provisional measures, no longer existed.

That same month, in the case of the Constitutional Tribunal, the Court still had to ratify the resolution of the President of April 2000 for the protection of Ms Delia Revoredo. Again, in September 2000, the Commission informed the Court that acts of persecution persisted against her with the aim to deprive her of her liberty and her property and to prevent her from being re-instituted as a member of the Constitutional Tribunal.

In February 2001, however, Peru transmitted to the Court the express recognition of its responsibility for the violation of their rights of three magistrates of the Constitutional Tribunal including Delia Revoredo. Peru informed the Court that in November 2000 the seats in the Constitutional Tribunal were returned to those three magistrates. In March 2001 the Court lifted the provisional measures.

In November 2000, the Court had confirmed, and increased the scope of, provisional measures in the case of Baruch Ivcher. In February 2001, however, Peru informed the Court that it had annulled the decision to take away his Peruvian nationality. It had accepted the Commission's recommendations of December 1998¹⁴⁰ and Mr Ivcher and his family and others would enjoy the ¹³⁶ CIDH Annual Report 1997, section III(b). See IACHR Caballero Delgado and Santana (Colombia), Order of 31 January 1997 lifting its provisional measures following its judgment on the merits of 8 December 1995 and 29 January 1997.

¹³⁷ CIDH Annual Report 1997, section III(b).

¹³⁸ IACHR Caballero Delgado and Santana (Colombia), Order of 16 April 1997 reinstating its provisional measures. See also the Court's Order of 6 February 2008 maintaining the provisional measures despite the State's request to lift them.

¹³⁹ IACHR Loayza-Tamayo (Peru), Order of 3 February 2001. See also Order of 28 August 2001, lifting and terminating these provisional measures.

¹⁴⁰ See CIDH Report 94/98 of 9 December 1998.

protection of their physical, psychological and moral integrity as well as their judicial guarantees. Mr Ivcher was able to return to his previous position as shareowner of the news channel. Peru also indicated that it was at the disposition of the Commission to reach an amicable solution. The Court considered that the violations that were the reason for the order of provisional measures had ceased and it lifted the provisional measures.¹⁴¹

2.2.6.7 FORMALISED PROTECTION PROGRAM

The case Jiménez Vaca v. Colombia (2002) by the HRC is important because of its similarity to Colombian cases pending before the Inter-American Commission and Court. It is clear from the State's response that witnesses, members of NGOs and trade unions are often facing threats. In its submission of September 1999 the State explained that it had instituted new protection programs:

“In the particular case of union leaders, there is now a protection programme for witnesses and threatened persons. Provisions under this programme include an information centre, technical assistance, preventive action, emergency help, the purchase of communications systems, the purchase of vehicles, individual protection and protection for the offices of non-governmental and trade union organizations. Moreover, if the author should decide to return to the country, he would enjoy all the safeguards provided by the authorities and the protections merited in his particular case”.¹⁴²

The Commission's Annual Reports also provide information on the attitudes of States with regard to implementation of requirements for immediate protection. In 1999, for instance, the Commission noted that Colombia had informed it that it had strengthened the Program of the Ministry of Interior for the protection of witnesses and persons receiving threats. The Risk Evaluation Committee of the Protection Program processes the requests for protection from human rights defenders and witnesses. With the support of the General-Command of the National Police and if necessary, the Armed Forces and the 'Departamento Administrativo de Seguridad', it co-ordinates the adoption of urgent measures. The Commission, however, notes that the budget for this program was, in American dollars, $250,000, 'which cannot be considered an adequate or realistic amount in light of the high levels of risk these persons face'.¹⁴³

The State also reported that it had extended the terms of Law 418 of 1997 (intending to implement final decisions of the Commission and Court on reparations) and that it had regulated a program for the protection for persons at risk. The State pointed out, moreover, that its General Law Budget included an amount of approximately $ 1,400,000,000 for preventive and protective measures in the field of human rights. This amount was assigned to the Special Administrative Unit for Human Rights of the Ministry of the Interior.¹⁴⁴

¹⁴¹ IACHR Ivcher Bronstein et al. (Peru), Order of 14 March 2001.

¹⁴² HRC Jiménez Vaca v. Colombia, 25 March 2002, §5.4.

¹⁴³ CIDH Annual Report 1999, Chapter V – Colombia, §116.

¹⁴⁴ Id., §117.

2.2.6.8 TIMELINESS AND SPECIFICITY OF THE STATE'S REPORTING ON IMPLEMENTATION

The attitude of States could differ when they are approached informally, rather than formally. In the case of Father Vogt (Guatemala) the Government presented its first implementation report on time, but it stated that there was no situation of extreme urgency in the municipality where he lived and that Father Vogt was 'living and moving about in this and other communities and even travelling abroad in all tranquillity'. The Commission observed that his situation, on the contrary, was still one of extreme gravity and urgency and that full compliance with the Orders of the Court was 'of the utmost importance'. The Government presented its second report more than 30 days after its first, one day before the Court hearing, stating that the police department was still providing day and night patrols and that Father Vogt was in communication with the police authorities and with the Pro-Defence Committee of El Estor (the community where he lived). Guatemala also stated that the investigations into the threats and harassments were continuing and the authorities had asked a domestic court to issue a warrant for the arrest of the person accused of making the threats. Guatemala mentioned the name of the alleged perpetrator.¹⁴⁵ In relation to the timeliness of implementation reports of States, it seems that here the Court hearing provided a trigger for the Government to seriously prepare its second report.¹⁴⁶

2.2.6.9 PROACTIVE MEASURES BY THE STATE: VOLUNTARY PRECAUTIONARY MEASURES

In Ecuador witnesses to a police killing were receiving threats. The Commission was informed that Pedro Baque and his friends had been riding a motorcycle on their way to buy motor-cross equipment when the national police intercepted them. Then they were shot. His two friends died and he was left there, seriously wounded. Following this, he, his family and his attorneys were being threatened so that he would be too scared to offer testimony in court. In June 1999, when the Commission expressed its concern about this situation during a country visit, Ecuador voluntarily adopted precautionary measures to guarantee the life and personal integrity of Pedro Baque, his family and attorneys and to guarantee their access to the courts. On 16 June 1999 the Com-

¹⁴⁵ IACHR Vogt case, Order of 27 June 1996, Compendium 1987-1996, p. 161.

¹⁴⁶ It appears from the Court's order of 11 November 1997, in which it closed the provisional measures in the case of Father Vogt, that Guatemala had sufficiently respected the Court's order. The Court refers to the Commission's brief of 27 October 1997 requesting the withdrawal of the provisional measures. The Commission informed the Court that the petitioners had informed it that 'owing to the effective and timely intervention of the Honourable Court those threats and direct and specific acts of harassment had abated considerably and [that] Father Vogt [was] conducting his pastoral activity in a normal manner ... [and] that it would be fitting for the Honourable Court to order the withdrawal of the provisional measures presented on behalf of Father Vogt'. It does not discuss Guatemala's compliance with the part of the provisional measures referring to the duty to investigate the threats. The Court does note that the Commission's brief stated that it 'will continue to monitor the situation in connection with its processing of the case and, if the circumstances so warranted, it would once more request that such measures be provided'. IACHR Vogt case, Order of 11 November 1997, Compendium July 1996-June 2000, p. 426.

mission ratified these precautionary measures, duly recognising Ecuador for having adopted them on its own initiative.¹⁴⁷

In November 2001 the Commission took precautionary measures on behalf of two campesino environmentalists in Mexico.¹⁴⁸ They had been released from prison on that day. On the same day the Commission received a letter from the Undersecretary for Human Rights and Democracy in which she noted that the Mexican government shared the concern of the petitioners about 'incidents that could cause irreparable harm' to these two persons. When Mexico reported their release it requested the Commission, on its own initiative, to grant precautionary measures on their behalf.¹⁴⁹ Subsequently, when the beneficiaries had made reference to protection by PBI, the State responded that it would offer this organisation 'the necessary facilities' to fulfil their protective task.¹⁵⁰

3 STATED REASONS FOR NON-COMPLIANCE

3.1 Introduction

Do the responses depend on the types of cases, the substance of the request, the type of State (e.g. federal law States or common law States)? Do they depend on the type, the wording and the frequency of appeals? There are indications that the official responses by States may be explained by various other reasons as well. There are reasons for compliance, from norm-internalization to a wish to 'join the club'; regain prestige etc. There are also reasons from non-compliance. This book gives some examples that indicate reasons for non-compliance that have been officially forwarded by States, such as their view on the legal status of provisional measures.

At the same time the formal reasons for non-compliance may not necessarily be the 'real' reasons. This book refers to some other reasons that may be behind such decisions not to comply with certain provisional measures

For the sake of presentation the stated reasons for non-compliance are subdivided into three categories: (1) disagreement with the (temporary) outcome of the normative process (substantive disagreement); (2) the reputation of the adjudicator, the manner in which the provisional measure has been communicated or disagreement with the decision-making process on the provisional measures at issue; and (3) the domestic situation (sometimes stated, sometimes underlying).

Obviously in practice the various categories are interrelated. As justifications for non-compliance, States have, among others, invoked provisions of their internal law, doubted the legal nature of the provisional measures by the adjudicator in question, invoked 'contrary obligations' of international law (such as an extradition treaty) as well as the fact that their domestic courts ¹⁴⁷ CIDH Annual Report 1999, Chapter III C.1, §31. In the period covered by the 2000 Annual Report the Commission continued to receive information on these precautionary measures voluntarily granted by Ecuador on 14 June 1999. Annual Report 2000, §29.

¹⁴⁸ They were members of the Ecological Peasant Organisation of the Petatlán Sierra.

¹⁴⁹ See CIDH Teodoro Cabrera García and Rodolfo Montiel Flores v. Mexico, 27 February 2004 (adm.), §6 and accompanying footnote.

¹⁵⁰ Id., §7. In the Annual Report 2001, Chapter III (a), §44 the Commission speaks of the State's willingness to provide PBI 'with all possible support' in order to protect the two beneficiaries.

(and another international adjudicator, such as the ECtHR) had already considered the case ‘extensively’.¹⁵¹

3.2 Disagreement with the (temporary) outcome of the normative process

Sometimes States use a substantive law argument to justify ignoring a provisional measure. Such disagreement on the substantive law has arisen when the State considered that a given situation does not result in a human rights violation. A case in point is the question whether ICCPR and ACHR prohibit application of the mandatory death penalty. The Court of Appeal of Barbados considered with regard to Article 6(2) ICCPR and Article 4(2) ACHR that ‘the question of what constitutes a ‘most serious crime’ for the purpose of those provisions obviously has to be determined in Barbados and nowhere else’.¹⁵²

In the Mary and Carrie Dann case involving land rights and cultural identity, the US had not respected the Commission’s precautionary measures. It claimed that the petition of the Danns did not involve a human rights violation at all. Instead, it considered, their claims involved ‘lengthy litigation over land title and land use questions which have been carefully considered by all three branches of the United States Government’.¹⁵³

In this case the CIDH had taken precautionary measures already in 1993. Three years later, during a hearing in Washington, D.C., the petitioners informed the Commission that in March 1992 the US had impounded and sold 161 horses belonging to the Danns and in November 1992

¹⁵¹ See e.g. HRC Sholam Weiss v. Austria, 3 April 2003, §§6.1 and 6.2. The petitioner had pointed out that the treaty obligations were not really conflicting because the extradition treaty itself as well as Austria’s own legislation provided for refusal of extradition on human rights grounds. Moreover, even if there had been a conflict, ‘mandatory obligations under human rights treaties ought erga omnes, including under the Covenant, to take precedence over any interstate treaty obligation’. With regard to the situation of the petitioner following his extradition Austria observed that the US Attorney had applied to the US District Court for a re-sentencing of the petitioner since he was extradited ‘on fewer than all the charges for which he was initially sentenced’. ‘According to information supplied to the State party’ the re-sentencing would provide the petitioner with a full right of appeal against the new sentence as well as the original conviction. It also noted that it would continue to seek information from US authorities ‘in an appropriate manner’ about the proceedings in the US courts. See §§5.4 and 9.3. In its decision on the merits the HRC found violations of Article 14(1) ICCPR, taken together with Article 2(3) ICCPR, as well as a breach of the State’s obligations under the OP by extraditing the petitioner before the HRC could address the risk of irreparable harm. See also the discussion of this case in Chapter V (Non-refoulement). The petitioner had claimed also that he State had violated Article 9(1) by surrendering to the US in breach of the Committee’s provisional measures. On 6 August 2003, following the publication of the Committee’s decision on the merits, the Permanent Mission of Austria forwarded the Observations of the Government of Austria. It noted that it had complied with the Committee’s wish of publication by making the link to the View accessible to everyone on the website of the Constitutional Law Department of the Federal Chancellery. See <www.bka.gv.at/wir_informieren_ueber/grund_menschenrechte.html> (consulted on 10 July 2003). It further considered that ‘in order to avoid similar situations in future’, it had generally complied with ‘the Committee’s legal view’ because the complaint proceedings in the petitioner’s case were pending before the Supreme Court and a decision was expected by September 2003.

¹⁵² HRC Bradshaw v. Barbados, 19 July 1994, §4.2.

¹⁵³ CIDH Mary and Carrie Dann v. US, Report 99/99 of 27 September 1999 (case 11.140), §14 and 19.

it had sold 269 of their horses. According to the petitioners a gold mining company called Oro Nevada Mining Company was claiming the land in question 'under a law that permits mining companies to acquire land belonging to the United States for a token payment'.¹⁵⁴ The precautionary measures were repeated several times as the Bureau had continued with its trespass actions against the Danns and against other members of the Western Shoshone Nation. At one point the State noted: 'out of respect for the Commission, the State Department has initiated an inter-agency dialogue with the relevant Federal agencies to consider further the Commission's request. In the meantime, however, the United States will not hold in abeyance the normal operation of its laws'.¹⁵⁵ In June 1999 the Commission received another letter by the petitioners that federal officials were continuing trespass actions by issuing additional orders and decisions against the Danns and other Western Shoshone, despite the Commission's precautionary measures.¹⁵⁶ Subsequently the Commission received information that prompted it to reiterate its precautionary measures.¹⁵⁷ As the US have not ratified the ACHR the Commission could not ask the Court to order provisional measures, something it normally does when compliance with its own precautionary measures is less than sufficient.

In the context of the precautionary measures on behalf of the detainees at Guantanamo Bay the US has pointed out that it is not a Party to either the American Convention on Human Rights or any other convention making the Commission competent to consider the application of international humanitarian law. It based its reasoning that the precautionary measures were unnecessary on the argument that the legal status of the detainees was clear. It was a matter of public record, it suggested, that the Guantanamo detainees are not prisoners of war ('POWs') because they 'do not meet the criteria applicable to lawful combatants'. The US further argued that, pursuant to international humanitarian law, States engaged in armed conflict have a right to capture and detain ¹⁵⁴ In February 1998, more than a year after the Commission used precautionary measures, the petitioners once more requested it to take such measures 'to avoid immediate, grave and irreparable harm'. They stated that the Bureau of Land Management had issued, that month, notices declaring that the sisters Dann and other Western Shoshone people were trespassing on lands. It had also issued orders to remove cattle and property and threatened them with fines, imprisonment and confiscation. The petitioners argued that there was an urgent need for precautionary measures 'because this aggressive Government action enhances the threat to the economic and cultural survival of the Danns and other Western Shoshone'. The Commission indeed reiterated its precautionary measure.

¹⁵⁵ CIDH Mary and Carrie Dann v. US, 27 September 1999, §40.

¹⁵⁶ Because of the imminent threat of the impoundment of their cattle without further notice, the Danns initiated discussions with the Bureau. They met on 28 January 1999 and were invited to submit a proposal for an 'interim measures agreement'. They presented such proposal on 28 March 1999, but on 26 May 1999 the Bureau rejected it in 'terms that essentially restate the BLM's [Bureau of Land Management] position, that the Western Shoshone people no longer have rights to their ancestral lands'. Mary and Carrie Dann v. US, 27 September 1999, §42. Two days later, the Bureau issued a notice of intent to impound any 'unauthorized livestock grazing upon public land'. Again, the petitioners requested the Commission to issue precautionary measures. They stated that this notice 'demonstrated the intention of the United States to deprive them of access to and use of their ancestral lands', see §43.

¹⁵⁷ The Commission decided to take precautionary measures yet another time. It requested the US to 'take the appropriate measures to stay its intention to impound' the cattle of the Dann sisters, until it had had the opportunity to fully examine the claims. CIDH Mary and Carrie Dann v. US, 27 September 1999, §44. When it declared the case admissible in September 1999 it decided to maintain in effect the precautionary measures of June 1999. Both the Yomba Shoshone Tribe and the Ely Shoshone Tribe wished to intervene in the case as amicus curiae. On the merits see CIDH Mary and Carrie Dann v. US, 27 December 2002.

enemy combatants whether or not they are POWs. Alternatively, the US claimed that Guantanamo detainees are treated humanely and that they are not facing any “peril or irreparable harm”, which would have been a precondition for imposition of provisional measures pursuant to Article 19(c) of the Commission's Statute.¹⁵⁸

In Mamatkulov (2005) the State considered that: “It would be straining the language of Article 3 intolerably to hold that by surrendering a suspect in accordance with the terms of an extradition agreement, the extraditing State had subjected him to the treatment or punishment he received after his conviction and sentence in the receiving State”.¹⁵⁹ This would conflict with ‘the norms of international judicial process’ because ‘it would entail adjudication on the internal affairs of foreign States that were not Parties to the Convention’.¹⁶⁰

In response, the European Court referred to its settled case-law that extradition may give rise to an issue under Article 3, ‘where substantial grounds have been shown for believing that the person in question would, if extradited, face a real risk of being subjected to treatment contrary to Article 3 in the receiving country’. “The establishment of such responsibility inevitably involves an assessment of conditions in the requesting country against the standards of Article 3 of the Convention. Nonetheless, there is no question of adjudicating on or establishing the responsibility of the receiving country, whether under general international law, under the Convention or otherwise”.¹⁶¹ It noted that it ‘would hardly be compatible with the “common heritage of political traditions, ideals, freedom and the rule of law” to which the Preamble refers, were a Contracting State knowingly to surrender a person to another State where there were substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment’.¹⁶²

Even when the State does not dispute the adjudicator’s interpretation of substantive provisions on the merits, it may still argue that pending the proceedings the harm likely to occur is not irreparable. When the ECtHR used provisional measures requesting Turkey to ensure access to domestic counsel in the Öcalan case, the State did not wish to comply because it considered that this measure ‘went beyond the scope of the function that these orders are intended to serve’.¹⁶³ The Court informed the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe of Turkey’s refusal to comply.¹⁶⁴

In October 1987 Canada requested the HRC to review its admissibility decision in the Lubicon Lake Band case, arguing that the petitioner had not exhausted domestic remedies and the delays in the judicial proceedings ‘were largely attributable to the Band’s own inaction’. The State also insisted ‘that no irreparable damage to the traditional way of life of the Lubicon Lake Band had occurred and that there was no imminent threat of such harm, and further that both a

¹⁵⁸ As phrased by the editorial staff of International Legal Materials in: International Law In Brief of the American Society of International Law, 4 June 2002 (the text of the precautionary measures was provided to the ILM office in print form).

¹⁵⁹ ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §64.

¹⁶⁰ Ibid.

¹⁶¹ ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §67.

¹⁶² Id., §68.

¹⁶³ ECtHR Information Note 5, April 1999, p. 6. See also Garry (2001), p. 410: “As the Commission and Court have had to rely on the good faith of the Member State in complying with the interim order, they have issued them only in extreme cases where there is an ‘apparent real and imminent risk of irreparable harm’”. See also CAT R.T. v. Switzerland, 24 November 2005.

¹⁶⁴ In general on follow-up see Chapter XVIII.

trial on the merits of the Band's claims and the negotiation process constitute effective and valuable alternatives to the interim relief which the Band had unsuccessfully sought in the courts'.¹⁶⁵

Canepa was removed before his counsel could request the HRC to take provisional measures. The Committee had done so in the similar case Stewart. In Canepa the Minister did not agree to counsel's request not to remove her client from Canada pending the case before the HRC. He 'had to take account of the serious nature of the offences' committed by the petitioner and of 'the fact that the removal to Italy would not cause irreparable harm'. His letter confirmed the willingness to 'cooperate fully in the processing of the communication in order to expedite its final resolution'.¹⁶⁶

3.3 Communication of the provisional measures and disagreement with the decision-making process

3.3.1 Introduction

Compliance with provisional measures may relate to the reputation of the adjudicator, the visibility and specificity of its provisional measures. Specific arguments used by States to justify their non-compliance involve the alleged non-binding nature and procedural issues somehow implying a lack of due process on the part of the adjudicator.¹⁶⁷

3.3.2 Lack of due process

Several justifications offered for non-compliance relate to the procedure followed by the adjudicator in taking provisional measures. Obviously, also with regard to provisional measures the ¹⁶⁵ HRC Bernard Ominayak, Chief of the Lubicon Lake Band v. Canada, 26 March 1990, §29.4. In Länsman I, Ilmari Länsman v. Finland, 26 October 1994, the HRC did not use provisional measures because it considered they would be premature. It is the only case involving culture in which the HRC motivated its refusal to use them. This case also gives some indication of Finland's attitude towards situations pending before the Committee. The State party referred to an inspection of the site during which the company representatives had noted that the construction of a proper road was necessary for the profitability of the project. The representative of the Forest District had replied that the Herdsmen's Committee and the company had to negotiate a solution. The State party added that 'the Forestry and Park Service has informed the Government that a decision on a possible new contract with the company will be taken only after the adoption of Views by the Committee in the present case'. This is an interesting addition in the sense that, on the one hand, the Forestry and Park Service (the new translation by the State for the Central Forestry Board) shows an awareness of the case pending before the HRC and the importance of suspending the activities in order not to pre-empt the Committee's decision, and on the other hand the State itself simply mentions this for information but does not itself commit to this effect.

¹⁶⁶ HRC Giosue Canepa v. Canada, 3 April 1997. Letter of the Department of Justice to counsel faxed 31 May 1994 and faxed to the HRC by counsel on 6 June 1994 (on file with the author). See also section 3.4 of this chapter, referring to the 'danger to the public' argument.

¹⁶⁷ For criticism based on due process arguments see also ICJ LaGrand (Germany v. US), Order of 3 March 1999, Separate Opinion Judge Schwebel and Judgment of 27 June 2001, Dissenting Opinion Judge Buergenthal as referred to in Chapter I (ICJ). Obviously these judges did not argue that a lack of due process would justify non-compliance by States.

parties should have had a fair hearing, if hearings are being held, and their submissions must be shown to have been considered.¹⁶⁸

At one point in the Blake case the State informed the Inter-American Court that it decided to cease to provide safety measures to certain persons as of that date, because the Court had not yet taken a decision on its previous request to lift the provisional measures.¹⁶⁹ The Court specifically responded to this by noting that it 'is not a permanent Court, so that matters submitted to its consideration may only be decided when it is sitting'. When its previous session was held in February/March 2003 the Court 'did not have sufficient information to evaluate the request to lift the provisional measures, because the State, the representatives, and the Commission had not yet transmitted all the requested information'.¹⁷⁰ It pointed out 'provisional measures are exceptional in nature, are adopted in function of the needs for protection and, once adopted, must be maintained while the basic requirements mentioned in the second considering paragraph subsist'.¹⁷¹ It stressed that 'only the Court has the competence to decide on the continuance or lifting of a provisional measure. Consequently, the provisional measures that it adopts are fully in force and produce their effects until the Court orders that they be lifted'.¹⁷²

In T.P.S. v. Canada (2000) the State questioned why it had not had an opportunity to have its say on the use of provisional measures now that some time had passed between the petitioner's first request and CAT's decision to take them, 'a few days before his scheduled removal'. Canada pointed out that it had not been given the 'opportunity to comment on these ex parte communications with the Committee'.¹⁷³ While the HRC did not specifically respond to this statement, the duration of the proceedings, the extensive discussion on admissibility and the outcome of the case make this argument less credible.

In a case involving cultural survival by interlocutory decision the HRC 'invited the State party to submit to the Committee any further explanations or statements relating to the substance of the author's allegations, in addition to its earlier submissions'. At the same time it repeated its provisional measures 'to avoid damage to the author and the members of the Lubicon Lake Band'.¹⁷⁴ In its response to this interlocutory decision the State party asserted that it was 'being denied due process, since the principles of natural justice require that a party be aware of the specific charge and evidence on which the accusations of the author of the communication are based. It claims that since it was never informed of the articles of the Covenant and the evidence in respect of which the communication was declared admissible, the principles of procedural ¹⁶⁸ See in general Cassel (2002), p. 886.

¹⁶⁹ IACHR Blake, Order of 6 June 2003, 14th 'Having seen' clause, referring to the State's note of 13 May 2003.

¹⁷⁰ Id., 7th 'Considering clause'.

¹⁷¹ Id., 9th 'Considering clause'. The second considering paragraph refers to the requirements of extreme gravity and urgency, and when necessary to avoid irreparable damage to persons mentioned in Article 63(2) ACHR.

¹⁷² Id., 10th 'Considering clause'.

¹⁷³ CAT T.P.S. v. Canada, 16 May 2000, §8.4 ('The Government of Canada first became aware that the petitioner had submitted a communication, including a request for interim measures, when the author's counsel alluded to the Committee's granting of the request during a discussion with a CIC official on 18 December 1997, three months after the Committee had received the author's communication and request for interim measures. The record before the Committee reveals that the interim measures request was issued, after several appeals by the author's counsel to the Committee, a few days before his scheduled removal').

¹⁷⁴ HRC Chief Bernard Ominayak and the Lubicon Lake Band v. Canada, 26 March 1990, §25.

fairness have not been respected, and that the federal Government remains prejudiced in its ability to respond to the Band's claim'.¹⁷⁵

Following the public hearing before the Inter-American Court of 18 August 2000 the Dominican Republic submitted a brief alleging that the Commission 'acted hastily' when it requested provisional measures, as it did not wait for a State reply 'nor did it use the means and mechanisms at its disposal to ascertain the complaint'. According to the Dominican Republic its deportation procedure did in fact ensure due process and a personalised treatment. It pointed out that this procedure consists of three stages: 'detention and identification, investigation and depuration (sic) and, finally, verification and confirmation'.¹⁷⁶ The Court did not specifically deal with this statement nor with the allegation that the Commission 'acted hastily' when it required provisional measures. In fact the Commission had allowed the State six months time to reply to its own precautionary measures before it brought the case before the Court.

Bosnia and Herzegovina considered that the English and Bosnian version of the Order not to hand over the petitioners to US authorities, who were then transferred to Guantanamo Bay, were 'different in a number of decisive details'. It 'assumes from these mistakes that both the President and the Vice President were outside of Sarajevo at the relevant time. Bosnia and Herzegovina considers that in particular cases of such importance, the order should have been issued only after the President or any other judge issuing the order had personal insight into the files, even if that means that the judge must travel to Sarajevo immediately'.¹⁷⁷

When an adjudicator makes explicit procedures for requesting withdrawal of provisional measures, this does not guarantee that the State will respect them. CAT has observed 'that its procedures are sufficiently flexible and its powers sufficiently broad to prevent an abuse of process in a particular case'.¹⁷⁸ In Dar v. Norway the State expelled the petitioner to Pakistan despite a provisional measure by CAT that explicitly referred to the possibility of review. Norway informed CAT 'that it refused the Committee's request. However, at no time did it ask the Committee to lift the request'.¹⁷⁹ Half a year later he was allowed to return and was granted a residence permit for three years.¹⁸⁰

3.3.3 Delays

Apart from arguing to have had insufficient time to respond, States have also argued that provisional measures have caused too much delay.¹⁸¹ Jamaica, which had a practice of respecting provisional measures to halt the execution of a death sentence, decided to withdraw from the OP to the ICCPR because domestic law obliged it to otherwise commute death sentences. For similar ¹⁷⁵ Id., §26.

¹⁷⁶ IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic case, Order of 18 August 2000. Indeed, it is not immediately evident how these three stages could ensure due process.

¹⁷⁷ Bosnia Chamber Boudellaa, Lakhdar, Nechle and Lahmar v. BiH and Fed. BiH, 11 October 2002, §108.

¹⁷⁸ CAT Ahmed Hussein Mustafa Kamil Agiza v. Sweden, 20 May 2005, §13.10.

¹⁷⁹ CAT Nadeem Ahmad Dar v. Norway, 11 May 2007, §16.2.

¹⁸⁰ Id., §§1.2-1.4. The Special Rapporteur then denied a renewed request for provisional measures to prevent his deportation to Pakistan, see §1.5. While the reason is not mentioned, it is obvious that such deportation would not be imminent, see also Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

¹⁸¹ See e.g. Report of the Special Rapporteur for Freedom of Expression, Chapter V, §§23-25, in Annual Report of the Inter-American Commission 2001, Volume II, referring to precautionary measures of February 2001 on behalf of a journalist and director of a weekly magazine in Venezuela.

reasons Trinidad and Tobago sometimes responded to the HRC by making its compliance conditional on the ability of the HRC to determine a case within the deadline set by the State. In Smart v. Trinidad and Tobago (1998)¹⁸² the State party had informed the Committee that it would submit its comments on the admissibility of the case in three days. In its submission, two weeks later, the State party did not address the admissibility of the communication but informed the Committee that ‘to avoid further delays in the case of Mr. Smart, the State party would stay the author’s execution for a period of two months only’. The HRC quoted a longer part of the State’s submission:

“1. The Government of Trinidad and Tobago is committed to upholding the rule of law and it would therefore not deny Mr. Smart access to the United Nations Human Rights Committee for the determination of his petition provided that the process is not abused by the condemned prisoner. 2. The Government however has a responsibility to ensure that these petitions are determined quickly so as not to frustrate the application of the law. Any delay or procrastination by the United Nations Human Rights Committee can have the effect of subverting the sentence of the Court and Constitution of Trinidad and Tobago. 3. The Government therefore requests the petition of Smart be heard and determined within two months of the Government of Trinidad and Tobago submitting its response to the application before the said Committee. 4. During the two month period, the Government will not carry out the death sentence...”. (italics E.R.)

In other words, the State accused both the petitioner and the HRC of causing delays. Two weeks later the Committee, which was not in session at the time, replied through its Chairman. His letter reminded the State that it had been ‘the State party’s own failure to submit comments on the admissibility within the imparted deadline that had caused the delay in the deciding on the case’.¹⁸³ The HRC did not respond specifically to the State’s remark that it would only stay the execution for two months, but it is clear from its reaction that it considers it should set the deadlines for the proceedings, not the State party.

The State took a similar approach to the proceedings in the Inter-American system. In one of the Orders for provisional measures in the James case Trinidad stated that the Inter-American Commission had failed ‘to follow the approximately eight months timeframe established by the State for appeals to international bodies’. It noted that the delay constituted cruel and unusual punishment as defined by the State’s domestic laws as established by the [JCPC] case of Pratt and ¹⁸² HRC Clive Smart v. Trinidad and Tobago, 29 July 1998.

¹⁸³ He informed the Ambassador that the Committee had instructed him ‘to express its regret that your Government has, to date, failed to comply with the deadline set for the State party’s observations relating to the admissibility’ of the case. This meant that the HRC could not consider the case at the session that was then pending. He announced that he intended to take up the case during its next session. Accordingly, he would wish to receive the State’s submission on the admissibility of the case within six weeks. He also pointed out that the HRC could only deal with the cases during its sessions and that the UN determined the dates of its three annual sessions. “If a State party does not comply with the deadlines set by the Committee, thereby making it necessary to hold over consideration of a case to subsequent sessions, the full responsibility for the resulting delay and its consequences is with the State party”. Request by counsel for use of Rule 86, 11 December 1995; Note Verbale transmitting the case under the Rule 86/91, 18 December 1995; submissions by the State party of 5 and 19 March 1996 and letter by Chairperson Aguilar Urbina of 2 April 1996, all in relation to Smart v. Trinidad and Tobago, 672/1995 (on file with the author).

Morgan. This ‘would de facto abolish the death penalty, thereby usurping the legislative functions of the State of Trinidad and Tobago’.¹⁸⁴

The Commission considered as ‘mere policy’ the time-frames the State wished to impose on the Court. These timeframes were, moreover, ‘inconsistent with the timeframes established by the Statutes and Rules of Procedure of the Commission and the United Nations Human Rights Committee’.¹⁸⁵ The State’s Instructions Relating to Applications from Persons under Sentence of Death show that Trinidad wished to impose a timeframe on the Commission (as it has also done vis-à-vis the Human Rights Committee) so that it could comply with domestic case law and still execute its prisoners. In effect this meant Trinidad intended to disregard both its substantive and its procedural obligations under the ACHR.

The Court referred to Trinidad’s letters of August 1998 informing the Court that it would not attend the public hearing and that it would not accept any responsibility for the Commission’s failure to organise its proceedings with regard to the death penalty cases pending before it within the time limits established by Trinidad. The Court noted that its President had sent Trinidad’s Prime Minister a letter indicating the Court’s concern about this attitude. It also referred to the State’s letter of September 1998 that it would no longer report on this case to the Court or to the Commission.¹⁸⁶ The Court criticised the refusal of the State to recognise the obligatory nature of the Court’s decisions in this case and in particular its failure to appear at the Court’s hearing and to comply with its obligation to report periodically on the case.

In December 1999 the Commission requested the Bahamas to stay the executions of Mr. Mitchell and Mr. Higgs. On 23 December 1999 the Bahamas wrote to the Commission that the ‘government has already waited a considerable time for the receipt of recommendations from the IACHR in respect of Messrs. Higgs and Mitchell and will not further postpone the process of its domestic law’.¹⁸⁷

In Olaechea Cahuas v. Spain (2006) Spain had disrespected the ECtHR’s provisional measures. After receipt of the Court’s provisional measures the State sent the Court a decision by a domestic court confirming the extradition. This action, the Court pointed out in its Judgment on the merits, implied the State’s disrespect for the provisional measures. Subsequently, in its submissions to the Court, the State insisted that normally it would respect them, but in this case the petitioner had been so tardy in requesting them that it had not had sufficient time to put in place

¹⁸⁴ IACHR James et al. cases, Order of 29 August 1998, ‘Having seen’ clause 5c.

¹⁸⁵ Id., ‘Having seen’ clause 6c. Judge García Ramírez made some remarks about the issue in his concurring. He took note of the ‘statements in the file, in the sense that the State of Trinidad and Tobago is under certain judicially established timeframes to execute the capital punishment’. He observed ‘that considerable time remains before these timeframes expire in the cases referred to by these provisional measures, as well as in those provisional measures previously considered by the Court, in which it has ordered the similar measures’. James et al. cases, Concurring Vote of Judge Sergio García-Ramírez. It is not clear whether this means that he would have voted differently otherwise or whether the remark was simply to stress that the State cannot use the timeframes argument as an excuse here.

¹⁸⁶ See IACHR James et al. cases, Order of 29 August 1998. In a footnote, the CIDH Annual Report referred to the State’s note of 5 February 1999 in which it requested the Court to confirm that the provisional measures on behalf of Mr. Briggs had been lifted. At the time of publication of the Court’s Annual Report the State had presented none of the periodic reports required in the Court’s resolution of 29 August 1998.

¹⁸⁷ CIDH Annual Report 1999, Chapter III.C.1, §11. On 5 January 2000 the Commission repeated its precautionary measures. The petitioners informed the Commission, however, also on 5 January 2000, that the day before Mr. Higgs had committed suicide while shaving. On 23 February 2000 they informed the Commission that Mr. Mitchell had been executed on 6 January 2000.

the necessary measures to prevent the extradition.¹⁸⁸ The petitioner, on the other hand, considered that some two or three hours would have been sufficient to halt the extradition.¹⁸⁹ The ECtHR did not accept the justification offered by the State. When it received the provisional measure the government sent it to the domestic court dealing with the case and subsequently transmitted the latter's negative response back to the ECtHR. It appeared it had sufficient time to implement the provisional measures by ensuring the suspension of the extradition.¹⁹⁰

3.3.4 Procedural duration: what is provisional?

The Inter-American Commission has now placed limits on the time period in which its precautionary measures are active. After a six months period, for instance, it reviews the measure and determines whether it must be maintained or not. Sometimes the measures are shelved because the situation is still the same and sometimes because the situation is more or less solved. At other times the Commission specifically maintains or renews them. The Court seems to take a similar attitude towards its provisional measures. In theory, it places limits on their duration. It is faced, however, with certain situations of continuing threats where sometimes even the State itself indicates that the court should maintain its provisional measures. The case of Digna Ochoa is a tragic example in which Mexico requested the Court to lift its order for provisional measures, because at a certain point in time 'provisional' is no longer 'provisional'. The Commission informed the Court that the petitioners did not object to the State's request and the Court lifted its provisional measures. Several months later human rights defender Digna Ochoa was murdered.¹⁹¹ At the Court's hearing of 26 November 2001 on the provisional measures requested by the Commission for the protection of, among others, the members of Centro Pro after the murder of Digna Ochoa, a member of the Court asked the petitioners why, prior to this murder, they had agreed to Mexico's request to the Court to lift its provisional measures. One of the members of Centro Pro answered that they did not think the provisional measures made a difference.¹⁹² At the same time, they did attend this hearing to request new provisional measures for their protection.

3.3.5 Disputing the binding nature of provisional measures or the authority to take them

With regard to the HRC, according to the Court of Appeal of Canada 'in signing the Protocol, Canada did not agree to be bound by the final views of the Committee, nor did it even agree that it would stay its own domestic proceedings until the Committee gave its views'. It considered that neither the Committee's Views nor its provisional measures were binding on Canada 'as a matter of international law, much less as a matter of domestic law'. It added that the States parties to the ICCPR and the OP had decided 'as a matter of policy' that they should not agree to be bound by the Committee's Views nor 'agree to refrain from taking any action against an individual who had sought the Committee's views until they were known'. They left 'each party state, on a case by case basis, free to accept or reject the Committee's final views, and equally free to accede to or not accede to an interim measures request'.¹⁹³

¹⁸⁸ ECtHR Olaechea Cahuas v. Spain, Judgment of 10 August 2006 (5th section), §§65 and 69-70.

¹⁸⁹ Id., §66.

¹⁹⁰ Id., §70. Generally on the follow up by the adjudicators see Chapter XVIII.

¹⁹¹ See further Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk), section 3.2.6.

¹⁹² Ibid.

¹⁹³ Ontario Court of Appeal Ahani v. Canada, 8 February 2002, §32.

Different from what might have been expected it was only as an additional argument that the court referred to the wording of the OP and of Rule 86. It considered that this wording, as well as ‘the Committee’s own pronouncement’, ‘the opinions of recognised international law scholars’ and ‘case law’ showed that ‘the Committee’s final views and its interim measures request are not binding or enforceable in international law’.¹⁹⁴ With regard to the wording it noted that both the OP and Rule 86 ‘used permissive language’ (‘views’) and added that ‘neither has an enforcement mechanism’. It further referred to international scholars considering that the HRC ‘cannot issue binding decisions’.¹⁹⁵

The domestic court considered that when Canada ratified the OP (the Court speaks of ‘signed’) it ‘qualified’ the right to seek the Committee’s Views.¹⁹⁶ In addition, arguing from the non-binding nature of the Committee’s Views, the domestic court considered that States parties ‘did not agree to await the Committee’s views before enforcing their own laws’. “If Canada is free not to accept the Committee’s views, it is also free not to accede to an interim measures request”.¹⁹⁷

In Ahani v. Canada the HRC had used provisional measures to halt an expulsion.¹⁹⁸ A domestic court found that such measures were not legally binding and the petitioner was expelled. The court noted Ahani’s argument that, according to Article 26 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, States shall perform in good faith the international treaties to which they are a party. Counsel for Ahani had argued that if Canada did not wish to comply with the OP, it should denounce it rather than arbitrarily frustrate the proceedings. The court, however, considered ‘on its face the argument that Canada will not be acting in good faith by deporting Ahani now is difficult to support’. “In deporting him, Canada will be enforcing its own laws and the decision of its highest court. It will be doing nothing more than it is entitled to do under the terms of the Protocol”.¹⁹⁹ In other words, it considered that Canada ‘would have every reason to hold a good faith belief that deporting Ahani now would not breach its obligations under the Covenant’ because it had a right to enforce its own laws, these laws also took into account fundamental rights, as interpreted by its Supreme Court, and it was entitled to deport Ahani ‘under the terms of the Protocol’. As a side remark the court noted:

¹⁹⁴ Id., §35.

¹⁹⁵ It referred to the book by Burgers and Danelius on the Convention against Torture (1988), p. 9, Ghandhi; Bayefsky and Duxbury (2000) (none with page numbers). See Chapter XVI on legal status. It invoked the introduction to the second volume of the Selected Decisions of the HRC, published in 1990. This introduction made a comparison with the European Commission on Human Rights, noting that the decisions on the merits of both bodies are ‘non-binding recommendations’. This same introduction also noted that the Committee is ‘neither a court nor a body with a quasi-judicial mandate’. Selected Decisions of the Human Rights Committee under the Optional Protocol, Volume 2, (October 1982-April 1988), CCPR/C/OP/2, pp. 1-2. Note that this introduction has changed with the subsequent volumes.

¹⁹⁶ “In any given case, Canada first reserved the right to reject the Committee’s views, and second reserved the right to enforce its own laws before the Committee gave its views. In deporting Ahani, Canada is acting consistently with the terms under which it signed the Protocol. It is not denying Ahani procedural fairness or depriving him of any remedy to which he is entitled. Even under the Protocol, Ahani has no right to remain in Canada until the Committee gives its views. He can therefore hardly claim that the principles of fundamental justice give him that right”.

¹⁹⁷ Ontario Court of Appeal, Ahani v. Canada, 8 February 2002, §42.

¹⁹⁸ Ontario Court of Appeal Ahani v. Canada, 8 February 2002, §44.

¹⁹⁹ HRC Ahani v. Canada, 29 March 2004.

¹⁹⁹ Ontario Court of Appeal Ahani v. Canada, 8 February 2002, §46.

“If, however, Canada had not acted in good faith, then it may justifiably be open to public criticism. If it falls short of the laudable call of a full commitment to human rights conventions and treaties, other states may take it to task. But the principles of fundamental justice lie in the basic tenets of our legal system. They are found in the domain of the judiciary, the guardian of the justice system. What Ahani complains about is a matter for the court of public or international opinion, not for a court of law.”²⁰⁰

One of the three judges of the Court of Appeal dissented addressing several of the arguments made in the majority decision in Ahani. Justice Rosenberg stressed the obligation in Article 2 ICCPR ‘to respect and to ensure to all individuals within its territory and subject to its jurisdiction the rights recognised in the present Covenant’. He observed that this was a binding obligation that Canada had undertaken to perform the obligations in the Covenant in good faith. In reference to its obligations under the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties he noted that Canada had also undertaken not to invoke the provisions of its internal law as a justification for a failure to perform.²⁰¹ Moreover, it was ultimately the HRC, rather than a domestic court, that has the expertise on the meaning of the obligations in the ICCPR.²⁰² He considered that ‘where the legislation had established a statutory right to review a decision that could affect the security of the person, it is a principle of fundamental justice that the state cannot unreasonably frustrate that right’.²⁰³ He quoted from Lord Millett in the JCPC case of Thomas v. Baptiste (1999): ‘the right to be allowed to complete a current appellate or other legal process without having it rendered nugatory by executive action before it is completed is part of the fundamental concept of due process’.²⁰⁴ Rosenberg noted that ‘this principle of fundamental justice, although derived from a statutory right of review, can be applied by analogy to the process permitted by the Covenant and the Protocol’. This meant that ‘individuals within Canada facing a deprivation of their right to life, liberty or security of the person have a right under s.7 of the Charter, within reason, to have their petition reviewed by the Human Rights Committee free from any executive action that would render this review nugatory’.²⁰⁵

In T.P.S. v. Canada (2000) CAT expressed deep concern about Canada’s deportation of the petitioner to India despite the Committee’s provisional measures. According to Canada a request for provisional measures was ‘a recommendation to a State to take certain measures, not an order’. “Support for this proposition may be found not only in the word employed (‘request’) in rule 108, paragraph 9 but also in the European Court of Human Rights decision in Cruz Varas and others v. Sweden’.²⁰⁶ Interestingly, as discussed, based on general principles of law the European Court has since found that its provisional measures are legally binding.²⁰⁷

In March 2006 the European Court had used provisional measures ordering Russia to allow a lawyer access to a petitioner who had been committed to a psychiatric hospital against his will.

²⁰⁰ Id., §47.

²⁰¹ Id., dissenting opinion of Rosenberg J.A., §70.

²⁰² He referred to the ‘arcane language’ of the OP in forwarding its ‘views’. He observed that both Canada and its provinces had changed legislation because of the Committee’s Views. Rosenberg dissent, §72.

²⁰³ Ontario Court of Appeal, Ahani v. Canada, 8 February 2002, Rosenberg dissent, §86.

²⁰⁴ JCPC Thomas v. Baptiste, [1999] UKPC 13 (17 March 1999).

²⁰⁵ Ontario Court of Appeal Ahani v. Canada, 8 February 2002, Rosenberg dissent, §89.

²⁰⁶ CAT T.P.S. v. Canada, 16 May 2000, §8.2. For other examples of State arguments to this effect, see e.g., HRC Ahani v. Canada, 29 March 2004, §5.3, CAT Mafhoud Brada v. France, 17 May 2005, §8.2, CAT Tebourski v. France, 1 May 2007, §§8.6 and 8.7 and CAT Singh Sogi v. Canada, 16 November 2007, §7.7.

²⁰⁷ See also Chapter XVI (Legal status) on the ECtHR Mamatkulov judgment overruling Cruz Varas.

Yet the Chief Doctor of that hospital informed the lawyer that ‘he did not regard the Court’s decision on interim measures as binding’.²⁰⁸ Subsequently two domestic courts examined the European Court’s provisional measures and held that the lawyer should be allowed to meet the petitioner.²⁰⁹ But the hospital and the petitioner’s mother appealed against that decision and a higher court eventually quashed both decisions by the lower courts. Among others it held: “The Russian Federation as a special subject of international relations enjoys immunity from foreign jurisdiction, it is not bound by coercive measures applied by foreign courts and cannot be subjected to such measures ... without its consent. The [domestic] courts have no right to undertake on behalf of the Russian Federation an obligation to comply with the preliminary measures... This can be decided by the executive ... by way of an administrative decision”.²¹⁰ This Court later also held that ‘under Russian law the lawyer could not act on behalf of a client in the absence of an agreement between them’. It argued that the lawyer should have concluded such an agreement with the petitioner’s mother rather than with the petitioner himself, as she had the right, under domestic law, to act on his behalf in all legal transactions.²¹¹ On the merits the ECtHR found violations of Article 5 (lawfulness of his confinement in hospital and inability to obtain release), Article 6 with regard to the incapacitation proceedings and Article 8 (private life). Moreover, it found that the State failed to comply with its obligations under Article 34 by hindering petitioner’s access to the European court and by not complying with its provisional measure indicated ‘in order to remove this hindrance’. Specifically it noted that it was ‘struck by the authorities’ refusal to comply’.²¹² The interpretation by domestic courts that the provisional measure ‘was addressed to the Russian State as a whole, but not to any of its bodies in particular’ and that ‘Russian law did not recognise the binding force ‘of the European court’s provisional measures, was contrary to the Convention’.²¹³ The same applied to the interpretation that the petitioner could not act without the consent of his mother. Regarding the status of the lawyer, ‘it was not for the domestic courts to determine whether or not he was the applicant’s representative for the purposes of the proceedings before the Court – it sufficed that the Court regarded him as such’.²¹⁴ As to the legal force of a provisional measure, the Court quoted from its 2006 Aoulmi judgment and summarised this by stating that a provisional measure is ‘binding to the extent that non-compliance with it may lead to a violation under Article 34 of the Convention’. “For the Court, it makes no difference whether it was the State as a whole or any of its bodies which refused to implement an interim measure”.²¹⁵

In some cases Trinidad and Tobago conditioned its compliance with the provisional measures on its own estimation of the admissibility of a complaint, arguing that the case was inadmissible for non-exhaustion of domestic remedies and that it was already respecting the stay of execution ordered domestically.²¹⁶ In Ashby it questioned the competence of the HRC to examine the ²⁰⁸ ECtHR Shtukurov v. Russia, 27 March 2008, §34.

²⁰⁹ Id., §37.

²¹⁰ Id., §38. See also sections 3.4.3 (Attitudes of domestic courts) and 3.4.5.3 (Generally negative attitude towards international supervision).

²¹¹ Id., §39.

²¹² Id., §142.

²¹³ Id., §§142-143.

²¹⁴ Id., §143.

²¹⁵ Id., §144.

²¹⁶ HRC Michael Bullock v. Trinidad and Tobago, 19 July 1995. The HRC observed that it was not for the State party but for the HRC to decide on the admissibility of a communication. It requested the State ‘to cooperate fully with the Committee’s examination of communications in the future’. Following this, it declared the case inadmissible, not for non-exhaustion of domestic remedies, but because the jury instructions did not show such defects as to render them communication because it had been submitted at a time when he had not exhausted his domestic remedies. Apparently, the State considered that the HRC could only legitimately use provisional measures after domestic remedies had been exhausted and the petitioner had been executed. The Committee pointed out:

“The Committee remains deeply disturbed by the State party’s argument, being unable to appreciate how at one and the same time the State party could regard it as lawful to execute Mr. Ashby while indicating that he had not exhausted his local remedies. (Any remedies that may have existed cannot now be exhausted by Mr. Ashby).”²¹⁷

The State also disputed the HRC’s finding in its public decision that it had failed to comply with its obligations under the OP and the ICCPR:

“Apart from the fact that the relevant authorities were unaware of the request, the State party is of the view that rule 86 does not permit the Committee to make the request which was made nor does it impose an obligation on the State party to comply with the request.”²¹⁸

In the context of an Order for provisional measures by the Inter-American Court Trinidad has argued that ‘international organs have a duty to create the necessary machinery to allow a State to comply with its own domestic laws and its constitutional obligations in the field of human rights’.²¹⁹ In its Order of August 1998, the Court, on the other hand, pointed out that the function of the supervisory organs of the ACHR ‘is to ensure that the provisions of the American Convention are observed and adequately applied by States in their domestic laws, and not, as Trinidad and Tobago has argued, to ensure that State Parties comply with their own domestic laws’.²²⁰

Following the decisions of domestic courts in Trinidad and the UK, the State had read a warrant of execution to Anthony Briggs. His execution was scheduled for 28 July 1999. On 27 July the Secretariat of the Inter-American Court, on instruction by the President of the Court, reminded the State of the Court’s Order of May 1999 maintaining its provisional measures on behalf of Anthony Briggs. Despite this, the State executed Mr. Briggs as scheduled. The next day, the State submitted its observations on his execution. As neither the Inter-American Commission nor the State submitted Briggs’ petition to the Court, the State argued, the Court’s Order for provisional measures of 29 August was ‘spent’. It proceeded with the execution.²²¹

In several death penalty cases the US took the position that the Inter-American Commission’s recommendations were not legally binding. It considered that the Commission’s power to manifestly arbitrary or a denial of justice and because it was generally for the appellate courts to review the judge’s discretion in relation to the admission of evidence. See further Chapter XIV on admissibility.

²¹⁷ See also Chapter XIV on the relationship with admissibility.

²¹⁸ HRC Glenn Ashby v. Trinidad and Tobago, 21 March 2002, §5.6, referring to the Committee’s public decision of 26 July 1994.

²¹⁹ IACHR James et al. cases, Order of 29 August 1998, ‘Having seen’ clause 5(e).

²²⁰ Id., 10th ‘Considering’ clause.

²²¹ IACHR James et al. case, Order for provisional measures, 16 August 2000. It noted that the Commission completed its consideration of the case in November 1998 and transmitted the ensuing Article 50 Report to the State. In February 1999 the three-month period allowed under the Convention and the Statute of the Commission for submission of the matter to the Court expired. The Commission adopted its Article 51 Report in March 1999 and published it the next month.

grant precautionary measures did not exist in either the American Convention or the Statute of the Commission and, consequently. Thus its request was a non binding recommendation.²²²

In April 2002 the US responded to the Inter-American Commission's precautionary measures on behalf of the detainees at Guantanamo Bay. It claimed that the Commission acted without basis 'in fact or law' in requesting precautionary measures in this case. It also argued that the Commission did not have the requisite jurisdictional competence to apply international humanitarian law. According to the US it is humanitarian law, and not human rights law, that governs the capture and detention of enemy combatants in armed conflict. It argued that the Commission, 'whose mission ... is to interpret human rights under the [American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man],' lacks the jurisdictional competence to interpret and apply humanitarian law. Alternatively, it claimed that the precautionary measures were neither necessary nor appropriate in the case at hand. It argued that the Commission lacked a mandate to request the US to implement precautionary and even if it had the authority to issue them, such measures would not be binding.²²³

In March 2001, in the La Nación case, the Costa Rican court dealing with the case published its decision of the previous day rejecting the competence of the Inter-American Commission to dictate precautionary measures with regard to decisions by national courts. Counsel for Herrera and the newspaper 'la Nación' petitioned for a review of this decision, but the court rejected this the next day for lack of 'current interest'.²²⁴ In an Opinion published in 'la Nación' the NGO CEJIL criticised the Tribunal de Juicio for having misjudged and ignored the Commission's precautionary measures. It noted that this Tribunal justified its decision on the basis of the assumption that the power to order precautionary measures is not a function of the Commission and, moreover, that its decisions do not have a binding character, which is to say they are a request rather than an order.²²⁵ CEJIL, on the other hand, affirmed that the competence of the Commission to adopt precautionary measures is part of its Rules of Procedure and is founded on Articles 33 and 41 ACHR. CEJIL expressed its surprise at the attitude of the State, considering that the Government had only recently presented a proposal to the General Assembly of the OAS aimed at fortifying the Inter-American Human Rights System by creating a follow-up mechanism for the political organs of the OAS. This mechanism would make effective the reports and recommendation of the Commission and the decisions of the Court. In other words, it pointed out that this contradiction between how the State expressed itself externally and how it acted domestically could put at risk the international image of Costa Rica and the international obligations assumed by it.²²⁶

²²² See e.g. CIDH Annual Report 2001, §56 regarding Nevius v. US; §57 regarding Robert Bacon Jr v. US; and §59 regarding Gerardo Valdez Maltos v. US.

²²³ Digest of the US practice in international law 2002, Chapter 6, no. 21. 'U.S. Additional Response to the request for precautionary measures', 15 July 2002, <<http://www.state.gov/s/l/38642.htm>> (consulted 8 January 2009).

²²⁴ The phrase was: 'por falta de interés actual', in: Tribunal rechaza pedido de CIDH, Aduce que la Comisión no tiene competencia, La Nación, 24 March 2001, <www.nacion.com> (consulted 2 April 2002).

²²⁵ Literally, CEJIL wrote the following: "El tribunal justificó su decisión señalando que dentro de las funciones de este órgano de protección de los derechos humanos no se encuentra la facultad de decretar medidas cautelares y que, además, sus resoluciones no tiene carácter vinculante, es decir, son una requisitoria y no una orden". See: La Competencia de la CIDH, comunicado del Centro por la Justicia y el Derecho Internacional (CEJIL), in: La Nación, 5 April 2001, <www.nacion.com> (consulted 2 April 2002).

²²⁶ La Competencia de la CIDH, comunicado del Centro por la Justicia y el Derecho Internacional (CEJIL), in: La Nación, 5 April 2001, <www.nacion.com> (consulted 2 April 2002).

Both the Commission and the CIDH Special Rapporteur for Freedom of Expression note, in their Annual Report for 2001, that Costa Rica's ineffectiveness in protecting the freedom of expression 'combined with the fact that the Costa Rican courts did not carry out the required precautionary measures on a timely basis' forced it to resort to the Inter-American Court, which subsequently adopted provisional measures.²²⁷ Costa Rica informed the Court that 'due to a mistaken interpretation there had been confusion when [his] criminal record was certified'. It added that 'the Department of Judicial Records and Files had already taken the corresponding records to add definitively all the uncertainties surrounding [his] situation' and it guaranteed that 'a similar situation regarding certifications that might be issued in the future would by no means recur'. The Court took note of Costa Rica's report and ordered it to continue to apply the provisional measures, in particular to ensure nullification of the registration in the Judicial Registry of Criminal Offenders.²²⁸ After the Court's provisional measure, the State suspended all action against the journalist and the newspaper. In other words, it did more than the Court had requested. The State may have done this in order to prevent having to pay damages under national law later on, if the Court would eventually find a violation.²²⁹

3.3.6 Reputation, clear communication, visibility and specificity

The reputation of the adjudicator in the State in question may play a role. States may also argue, by way of justification for non-compliance with provisional measures, that the case law of another adjudicator is different on the issue at hand.²³⁰

Yasseen and Thomas v. Guyana (1998) shows the importance of sending submissions to the correct address.²³¹ In this case Guyana had mistakenly sent its submission to the UN Special ²²⁷ CIDH Annual Report 2001, Chapter III (a), §27 and Report of the Special Rapporteur for Freedom of Expression, Chapter V, §21.

²²⁸ CIDH Report of the Special Rapporteur for Freedom of Expression, Chapter V, §2 in: Annual Report 2001.

²²⁹ On the merits the Inter-American Court found that the contested judgment by the domestic criminal court convicting Herrera Ulloa had the effect of violating his right to freedom of thought and expression. Therefore Costa Rica 'must nullify that judgment and all the measures it ordered, including any involving third parties'. The state was to 'take all necessary judicial, administrative and any other measures to nullify and abolish any and all effects of the November 12, 1999 judgment'. IACHR Herrera-Ulloa v. Costa Rica, Judgment of 2 July 2004 (merits and reparation), §195. The 'State's obligations vis-à-vis the ordered provisional measures are now replaced by the obligations ordered in the present judgment, effective as of the date of its notification'. Id., §196. With regard to the other claims the court found that its judgment constituted per se a form of reparation, except for Mr Herrera Ulloa for whom compensation was to be paid for non-pecuniary damages.

²³⁰ Canada (in the context of refoulement) and the US (in the context of access to court for detainees at Guantanamo), for instance, have referred to the 1991 ECtHR judgment Cruz Varas where the European Court still considered not legally binding its provisional measures. See e.g. Ontario Court of Appeal Ahani v. Canada, 8 February 2002, §37 and Digest of the US practice in international law 2002, Chapter 6, no. 21. 'U.S. Additional Response to the request for precautionary measures', 15 July 2002, <<http://www.state.gov/s/l/38642.htm>> (consulted 8 January 2009).

²³¹ HRC Abdool Saleem Yasseen and Noel Thomas v. Republic of Guyana, 30 March 1998. The Committee received information from counsel that the Court of Appeal of Guyana had dismissed the petitioners' application. Subsequently, the State party requested an extension of the deadline for submission of observations on admissibility. By contrast, in its View the HRC referred to a Rapporteur on Summary and Arbitrary Executions instead of to the HRC and subsequently protested with the HRC that it failed to take into account its observations.²³² While this mistake cannot be attributed to the Committee, the incident indicates the importance of open and efficient lines of communication between different departments of the High Commissioner's Secretariat in Geneva. The staff, for instance, servicing the Special Rapporteur on Summary and Arbitrary Executions does have a responsibility in re-channelling communications not meant for it.

Six months after the execution of Glenn Ashby in disregard of the Committee's provisional measures, the State party responded by mentioning that its authorities 'were not aware' of the 'request under rule 86 at the time of Mr. Ashby's execution'.²³³

"The representative of Trinidad and Tobago at Geneva transmitted a covering memorandum by fax at 16.34 (Geneva time) (10.34 Trinidad time) on 13 July 1994. This memorandum made reference to a note from the Centre for Human Rights. However, the note referred to was not attached to the memorandum. The entire application filed on behalf of Mr. Ashby, together with note in which the State criticised the delays in the proceedings before the HRC. The Committee regretted the lack of co-operation from the State party and rejected this criticism.

²³² The HRC declared the case admissible in July 1997. In August of that year it received a Note Verbale in which Guyana's Minister for Foreign Affairs expressed 'disappointment and distress' about this admissibility decision. The Minister wrote that the Committee had failed to take into account the government's observations of October 1996 on the petitioners' claims. The HRC, however, had not received these observations. "Upon inquiry by the Committee, it transpired that the State party's submission of that date had been addressed to the Special Rapporteur for Summary and Arbitrary Executions of the UN Commission on Human Rights". The confusion may have arisen because in February 1996 the Special Rapporteur on Summary and Arbitrary Executions, Ndiaye, had submitted an urgent appeal to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Guyana as well, through its Permanent Mission. He had requested the State to refrain from carrying out the execution of Yasseen and Thomas scheduled two days later. Urgent appeal of 8 February 1996 to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Guyana by Bacre Waly Ndiaye (on file with the author). After Guyana was informed of this mistake it requested that its observations of 3 October 1996 be incorporated into the case file and that the Committee reconvene to consider the admissibility and the merits of the case. The Committee gave the petitioners' counsel an opportunity to comment on the above observations. It then reconsidered its admissibility decision. It observed, however, that the submission of October 1996 addressed the merits of the complaints rather than the admissibility. The only claim of which the State had challenged the admissibility was the claim that the jury foreman for the last trial, which had taken place in 1992, was related to the wife of the deceased. The State party argued that the petitioners did not raise this claim during the domestic proceedings. Observing that in that respect, in effect, domestic remedies had not been exhausted, the Committee set aside its earlier admissibility decision 'in as much as it relates to this claim'. It saw no grounds to review its admissibility decision in relation to the other claims made by the petitioners. At the same time, the Chairperson pointed out that the mandate of the HRC under the OP is 'distinct and entirely separate' from that of the Commission's Special Rapporteur on Summary and Arbitrary executions. Procedures before both bodies 'may proceed in parallel, but independently of each other'. She also re-iterated the Committee's provisional measures. Letter by the Chairperson of the HRC to the Permanent Representative of Guyana, 22 August 1997 (on file with the author).

²³³ HRC Glenn Ashby v. Trinidad and Tobago, 21 March 2002, §5.1. See also under 'Execution by Trinidad and Tobago: the case Ashby' the Special Rapporteur's request under rule 86, was received by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs on 18 July 1994, that is, four days after Mr. Ashby's execution".²³⁴

According to the State the Secretariat staff should have reminded the Permanent Representative of the urgency of the request. Without this, 'he would not in any way have been aware of the extreme urgency with which their request was to be transmitted to the relevant authorities in Trinidad and Tobago. It is not known whether the Committee in fact drew the urgency of the request to the attention of the Permanent Representative'. The HRC responded by writing that urgency was duly conveyed to the First Secretary at 16.05 on 13 July and was personally delivered.²³⁵

In the case of Rockliff Ross v. Guyana (disc. 1997) the HRC used provisional measures within a day after receipt of the communication. The execution was scheduled on that day. Despite the extensive efforts by the Committee's Secretariat to contact the relevant authorities including the prison director, the petitioner was executed. It is not clear whether the State would have failed to comply as well had the Committee been in a position to issue provisional measures several days in advance of the execution date.²³⁶

In Thompson v. St. Vincent & the Grenadines (2000)²³⁷ the HRC received information, a year and seven months after it used provisional measures, that the State had issued an execution warrant. The Special Rapporteur sent an immediate message to the State reminding it of the provisional measure under Rule 86.²³⁸ The State let the HRC know 'that it was not aware of having received the request nor the communication concerned'.

"Following an exchange of correspondence between the Special Rapporteur for New Communications and the State party's representatives, and after a constitutional motion had been presented to the High Court of St. Vincent and the Grenadines, the State party agreed to grant the author a stay of execution in order to allow the Committee to examine his communication".²³⁹

Bosnia and Herzegovina did not comply with the Bosnia Chamber's Order for provisional measures to halt handing over the petitioners to US forces. Bosnia and Herzegovina alleged that the order had never been delivered to it 'in a proper way'. It argued that 'even if the order was transmitted to the facsimile of the legal service of the Council of Ministers on 17 January 2002, at 6:26 p.m., it could not have complied with the order, because the Council of Ministers, where the Agents are situated, stops working at 5:00 p.m. However, on 18 January 2002, at 9:00 a.m., when the Agents started working the next day, the applicants were already outside of the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina. Moreover, the regular practice is that the Agents of Bosnia and Herzegovina receive cases and decisions of the Chamber and other materials directly by courier'.²⁴⁰

²³⁴ HRC Glenn Ashby v. Trinidad and Tobago, 21 March 2002, §5.1.

²³⁵ See also the references to HRC Thompson v. St. Vincent & the Grenadines, 18 October 2000 and Ross v. Guyana, 10 December 1997 (disc.) as discussed in this section under 'Communication and compliance'.

²³⁶ HRC Rockliff Ross v. Guyana, 10 December 1997 (disc.), (703/1996) (on file with the author).

²³⁷ HRC Eversley Thompson v. St. Vincent & the Grenadines, 18 October 2000.

²³⁸ While the HRC seems to have received the information three days after the execution was scheduled, it acted immediately and the State granted a stay. This means he had not yet been executed at the time.

²³⁹ HRC Mr. Eversley Thompson v. St. Vincent & the Grenadines, 18 October 2000.

²⁴⁰ Bosnia Chamber Boudellaa, Lakhdar, Nechle and Lahmar v. BiH and Fed. BiH, 11 October 2002, §107. See also e.g. the State's argument in ECtHR Kouhoul v. France, 26 September 2002 (inadm.), that even if the provisional measure had been in time, it would not postpone a

The visibility of provisional measures by the supervisory bodies concerned, including their motivation, may have an impact on the willingness of States to respect them.²⁴¹ In this context it is also interesting to note that, in its press releases on precautionary measures, the Inter-American Commission has introduced a practice of attaching background information (less than half a page) on its mandate and composition, evidently intended to inform the (US) media.²⁴² In addition, in particular in the Inter-American system another factor many petitioners and the Commission see as important in improving the effectiveness of precautionary and provisional measures is their specificity.²⁴³

In almost all cases a decision of non-compliance may be based on a combination of reasons. In the aftermath of the execution of the execution of Glenn Ashby, for instance, the State suggested several reasons for ignoring the Committee's provisional measures: it did not get the request in time, the HRC had no authority under its Rule on provisional measures to make this particular request (because of non-exhaustion) and that this Rule did not impose an obligation to comply with the Committee's provisional measures.²⁴⁴

3.4 The domestic situation

3.4.1 Introduction

The lack of knowledge of human rights obligations²⁴⁵ and the perception that international human rights law is a foreign affairs issue, rather than one of domestic implementation, seems to apply to the three branches of government in various States and is relevant to explain respect and disrespect for provisional measures as well. This section deals with the attitude of domestic courts to international adjudicators, including the issue of incorporation into domestic law (3.3.2); then it gives examples of three types of excuses for non-compliance; the first is a professed inability to comply (3.3.3), the second is a statement denying responsibility (3.3.4); and the third is an outright refusal to comply (3.3.5). The latter may involve an emphasis on public safety or the idea that domestic authorities are less capable or appropriate to deal with the issue than are international adjudicators.

decision to expel based simply on a telephone request. In other words, the State apparently insists on receiving all the information before it is prepared to respect the Court's provisional measures.

²⁴¹ The availability of persuasive provisional measures may contribute to convincing the State to comply in a particular case, although, as indicated by Viljoen/Louw (2007), pp. 1-34 with regard to the merits decisions of the African Commission, to the extent information was available the more persuasive merits decisions did not necessarily trigger compliance nor did cases of limited reasoning trigger non-compliance. Nevertheless this book considers accessible and persuasive provisional measures as a value in itself that will improve the concept in the long run and is more likely to be of use to non-governmental organisations in order to stir up public opinion than will less persuasive provisional measures. On follow-up by NGOs see section 4 of Chapter XVIII.

²⁴² See e.g. IACHR calls upon the United States to postpone execution of juvenile offender Alexander Williams, press release 7/02, 19 February 2002. See also Chapter XVIII (Follow-up).

²⁴³ See also Chapter XIII (Protection).

²⁴⁴ HRC Ashby v. Trinidad & Tobago, 21 March 2002, §5.6.

²⁴⁵ In a country report, for instance, the Inter-American Commission recommended a State to take additional measures to 'inform and train relevant officials at all levels, particularly judges and other decision-makers responsible for interpreting and applying the State's human rights obligations, to ensure that they are aware of and understand those obligations under applicable international law'. See CIDH Canada Report 2000, §181.

3.4.2 Attitude of domestic courts towards international adjudicators

As a branch of government, the judiciary plays an important role in the (non-)implementation of international obligations,²⁴⁶ including provisional measures. Issues like incorporation of international law and the extent of deference to the executive are important in this respect. Sometimes international and national courts are each other's allies.²⁴⁷ At other times domestic courts have a much more 'internal' outlook on international law, much more in unison with the executive.

Both situations may be observed in the context of provisional measures to halt executions. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (JCPC) is a domestic court with jurisdiction in many Caribbean States, although based in London. In Thomas v. Baptiste (1999) it found that an execution in advance of the completion of proceedings in the Inter-American human rights system would violate domestic constitutional rights.²⁴⁸ In any case, on the basis of common law a 'general right' could be found 'accorded to all litigants not to have the outcome of any pending appellate or other legal process pre-empted by executive action'.²⁴⁹ The JCPC considered that the government had made the international proceedings part of the domestic criminal justice system by ratifying treaties providing for individual access to an international adjudicator. This meant that it had at least temporarily extended the scope of the due process clause in its Constitution.²⁵⁰

It also pointed out that the constitutional reference to 'protection of the law' entitled the petitioner to complete international complaint procedures. Because the State in question was a party

²⁴⁶ Next to organisations such as Interights, making accessible Commonwealth and international case law on human rights in searchable databases (<<http://www.interights.org/database-search/index.htm>>; accessed 29 December 2007), commercial initiatives have also been introduced, including the Oxford University Press project coordinated by the University of Amsterdam called International Law in Domestic Courts (ILDC) (<<http://ildc.oxfordlawreports.com/public/login>>; accessed 29 December 2007), making available a searchable database of domestic case law from more than 60 jurisdictions both in original and in English translation, together with commentaries, regarding various topics of international law, including human rights.

²⁴⁷ Take, for instance, the Constitutional Court of Colombia.

²⁴⁸ JCPC Thomas v. Baptiste, 27 January 1999/17 March 1999 (reasoned). Lord Millett, Lord Browne-Wilkinson and Lord Steyn for the majority and Lord Puff of Chieveley and Lord Hobhouse of Woodborough dissenting. Initially it did not appear open to the relevance of international proceedings. In 1998, in the Fisher case, the JCPC determined that the petitioner had no legitimate expectation that the Bahamas would allow for a reasonable amount of time in order to complete the proceedings before the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights. JCPC Fisher v. Minister of Public Safety and Immigration (No. 2), 5 October 1998. The dissenters considered it 'hard to imagine a more obvious denial of human rights than to execute a man, after many months of waiting for the result, while his case is still under legitimate consideration by an international human rights body'. JCPC Fisher v. Minister of Public Safety and Immigration (No. 2), 5 October 1998. Dissenting opinion of Lord Slynn of Hedley and Lord Hope of Craighead, p. 452 E-F. The difference between the Fisher case (1998), concerning the Bahamas, and the Thomas case (1999), concerning Trinidad and Tobago, is that the Constitution of the Bahamas does not contain a due process clause while the Constitution of Trinidad does. In Higgs v. Minister of National Security the JCPC concluded that 'the ratio decidendi of Thomas v. Baptiste is that a due process clause in section 4(a) of the Trinidad and Tobago Constitution gave the Crown power to accept an international jurisdiction as part of the domestic criminal justice system'. JCPC Higgs v. Minister of National Security, 14 December 1999, p. 245E.

²⁴⁹ This was confirmed by the due process clause of the Constitution of Trinidad and Tobago, JCPC Thomas v. Baptiste, 27 January 1999/17 March 1999 (reasoned), p. 23 D-E.

²⁵⁰ JCPC Thomas v. Baptiste, 27 January 1999/17 March 1999 (reasoned), p. 23 E-F.

to the ACHR, the ICCPR and (for the cases still pending) the OP, the petitioner could obtain the reports by the Inter-American Commission and the HRC and present them to the Jamaican Privy Council for consideration before the latter would deal with his application for mercy. Until it had received and considered those reports the petitioner was entitled to a stay of execution.²⁵¹ The JCPC pointed out that the relevant executive body of the State was to consider the reports of international human rights adjudicators. If, after considering such a report, it would decide not to accept its recommendations this executive body was obliged to provide an explanation.²⁵²

One aspect that is likely to play a great role in the attitudes of domestic courts is the system of implementation of international law in domestic law: where is the domestic system situated on the continuum between monist and dualist? For more dualist systems: has the applicable international treaty been incorporated in domestic legislation and does this legislation take into account the possibility of the international adjudicator taking provisional measures? The JCPC has confirmed a principle that is important in many common law countries, namely that international conventions do not alter domestic law, except in so far as they are incorporated. Nevertheless, it has noted that it is 'sometimes argued that human rights treaties form an exception to this principle'.²⁵³

Apart from the JCPC's decisions, relevant to various Caribbean States, the domestic courts of individual States have sometimes faced decisions by international adjudicators. Two cases against Barbados show that in 1992 its courts dismissed the legal relevance of the proceedings under the OP.²⁵⁴ In Bradshaw v. Barbados (1994) counsel observed that 'the court of first instance refused to grant the author a stay of execution pending the consideration of his communication by the Human Rights Committee, and that it found that the author could not invoke the provisions of the Covenant, that the Covenant was not part of the law of Barbados, and did not bind the Government of Barbados in respect of its citizens'.²⁵⁵ The Court of Appeal then observed that 'the provisions enabling written representations to the Human Rights Committee, and the procedural and other provisions thereunder, are not part of the law of Barbados' because the State had not enacted legislation to fulfil its treaty obligations under the ICCPR and the OP.²⁵⁶

²⁵¹ JCPC Lewis v. Jamaica, 12 September 2000, p. 85B-C.

²⁵² Id., p. 79E/F and 85C.

²⁵³ JCPC Thomas v. Baptiste, 27 January 1999/17 March 1999 (reasoned), p. 23C.

²⁵⁴ HRC Bradshaw v. Barbados, 19 July 1994 and Denzil Roberts v. Barbados, 19 July 1994. On 23 May 1992 the authorities read Bradshaw a warrant for his execution on 25 May 1992. His counsel filed a constitutional motion and a stay of execution was granted on 24 May 1992. Four months later the court of first instance dismissed the constitutional motion. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal six months afterwards. As in the case of Bradshaw, in Roberts the HRC did not receive any further information from the State party about the petitioner's constitutional motion since July 1992. On 24 November 1992 counsel informed the HRC that the court of first instance dismissed the constitutional motion on 29 September 1992 but granted a temporary stay of execution for six weeks, until 10 November 1992. The petitioner appealed to the Court of Appeal and applied for a stay of execution pending the hearing of the appeal against the decision of the court of first instance. On 19 November 1992 the Court of Appeal granted a stay of execution.

²⁵⁵ HRC Bradshaw v. Barbados, 19 July 1994, §4.2.

²⁵⁶ Ibid.

The HRC noted with concern the abovementioned remarks of the Court of Appeal of Barbados.²⁵⁷

“By ratifying the Covenant and the Optional Protocol, Barbados has undertaken to fulfil its obligations thereunder and has recognised the Committee’s competence to receive and consider communications from individuals subject to its jurisdiction who claim to be victims of a violation by the State party of any of the rights set forth in the Covenant; while the Covenant is not part of the domestic law of Barbados which can be applied directly by the courts, the State party has nevertheless accepted the legal obligation to make the provisions of the Covenant effective. To this extent, it is an obligation for the State party to adopt appropriate measures to give legal effect to the views of the Committee as to the interpretation and application of the Covenant in particular cases arising under the Optional Protocol. This includes the Committee’s views under rule 86 of the rules of procedure on the desirability of interim measures of protection, to avoid irreparable damage to the victim of the alleged violation”.²⁵⁸

The refusal of the State to respect the HRC’s provisional measures in Ahani is based on the argument of protection of the general public, but also on the approach of domestic courts towards the obligations under the OP. To understand the decision by the Supreme Court of Canada to dismiss Ahani’s appeal, it is important to note that while his case originated years before the terrorist attacks on the US of September 11th, the Supreme Court of Canada made a decision on his expulsion after that date.²⁵⁹ Subsequently counsel resorted to the HRC and its Special Rapporteur used provisional measures to halt his expulsion. When the Minister refused to do so, counsel brought the case before the Ontario Superior Court, which held that ‘if there is a right protected by s. 7 of the Charter not to have the outcome of any pending appellate or other legal process pre-empted by executive action, this does not extend to an analogous legal process such as a petition to an international body whose advice is not binding domestically’. The OP did not create a ‘legitimate expectation not to be deported pending consideration of a communication by the Committee’.²⁶⁰ The Court of Appeal for Ontario dismissed Ahani’s appeal from this decision by way of Justice Laskin’s majority opinion. It considered that the domestic system did not allow for application of international legal obligations and added that the HRC’s provisional measures were not legally binding. It acknowledged that Ahani was still a Convention refugee under the definition in the Refugee Convention and noted that it ‘must therefore recognize that he still has a well-founded fear of persecution if returned to Iran’. Nevertheless, ‘no principle of fundamental justice entitles him to remain in Canada until his communication is considered by the Committee’.²⁶¹ Justice

²⁵⁷ While it declared the case inadmissible for non-exhaustion, the HRC expressed concern about the fact that the State party had issued an execution warrant for May 1992, in spite of the provisional measures by Special Rapporteur Lallah earlier that month. The HRC confirmed these measures.

²⁵⁸ HRC Peter Bradshaw v. Barbados, 19 July 1994 (inadm.), §§2.9, 2.10, 4.2, 5.3; see also Denzil Roberts v. Barbados, 19 July 1994, §§2.6, 2.7, 6.3. This follow-up and early expression by the HRC of the legal status of its Views and provisional measures dates from July 1994, the month in which another State, Trinidad and Tobago, executed a petitioner in defiance of a provisional measure. Generally on follow up see Chapter XVIII.

²⁵⁹ Supreme Court of Canada Ahani v. Canada, 11 January 2002.

²⁶⁰ Ontario Superior Court Justice Michael R. Dambrot, 15 January 2002, as referred to in Ontario Court of Appeal, Ahani v. Canada, 8 February 2002, §19.

²⁶¹ Ontario Court of Appeal Ahani v. Canada, 8 February 2002, §27. Ahani had argued that a domestic injunction was necessary ‘to preserve an effective remedy in international law’. Surprisingly, he did not refer to the Committee’s case law about provisional measures. He did consider ‘that the content of procedural fairness is greater the more vital the interest at stake, and that Canada’s international human rights commitments are an indicator, even an important

Laskin argued that neither the ICCPR nor the OP was incorporated into Canadian law. This meant that they had no legal effect in Canada. He considered that Ahani could not use the Canadian Charter and its principles of fundamental justice to ‘enforce Canada’s international commitments in a domestic court’.²⁶² Laskin did refer to the case law of the JCPC. However, he ‘confessed’ that he had difficulty understanding the reasoning of that Court in Thomas v. Baptiste (1999).²⁶³ Instead he preferred the arguments by Lord Goff, dissenting in that case, considering them ‘more in line’ with Canadian law.²⁶⁴ He considered that ‘this case demonstrates the difference between the proper role of the executive and the proper role of the judiciary’. “Judges are not competent to assess whether Canada is acting in bad faith by rejecting the Committee’s interim measures request and instead deporting Ahani immediately”.²⁶⁵

He considered that the relevant considerations ‘lie within the executive’s expertise in foreign relations’.

“Courts have no expertise in these matters, and in my respectful opinion, have no business intruding into them. Canada agreed to sign an international covenant and protocol that was not binding. It chose not to make these instruments part of its domestic law. It is not for the courts, under the guise of procedural fairness, to read in an enforceable constitutional obligation and commit Canada to a process that admittedly could take years, thus frustrating this country’s wish to enforce its own laws by deporting a terrorist to a country where he will face at best a minimal risk of harm”.²⁶⁶

Another doctrine discussed by the domestic court was that of legitimate expectations. Justice Laskin noted that this doctrine was limited. “It is a doctrine of procedural fairness only. It creates no substantive rights”. He considered that Ahani tried to use the doctrine of legitimate expectations to impose procedural requirements on Canada rather than on the HRC. He pointed out that procedural fairness normally relates to participatory rights. Apart from this, he stated that ‘nothing in Canada’s past practice with interim measures requests or in its dealings with Ahani could give rise to a legitimate expectation that it would permit Ahani to remain in the country until the Committee considers his communication’.²⁶⁷ He emphasised that Canada ‘had no consistent practise of acceding to interim measures requests. In some cases it has; in others it has not’. He pointed out in particular that ‘in the only other case concerning a terrorist – Tejinder Pal Sing – Canada did not accede to an interim measures request from the United Nations Committee against Torture’. In this case too it concluded that the petitioner’s immediate removal was required by ‘its international obligation to ensure it did not become a safe haven for terrorists’.²⁶⁸ He also considered that Ahani was in fact seeking not only procedural fairness but also a substantive right to remain in Canada until the Committee delivered its Views. Rather than explaining why this was a indicator, of the scope of the principles of fundamental justice’. Ontario Court of Appeal Ahani v. Canada, 8 February 2002, §30.

²⁶² Ontario Court of Appeal Ahani v. Canada (A.G.) (2002), §31.

²⁶³ JCPC Thomas v. Baptiste, 27 January 1999/17 March 1999 (reasoned), Lord Millett, Lord Browne-Wilkinson and Lord Steyn for the majority and Lord Goff of Chieveley and Lord Hobhouse of Woodborough dissenting.

²⁶⁴ Ontario Court of Appeal Ahani v. Canada, 8 February 2002, §33.

²⁶⁵ Ibid.

²⁶⁶ Ontario Court of Appeal Ahani v. Canada, 8 February 2002, §49. It may be assumed that he meant: ‘at worst a minimal risk of harm’. On the role of the judiciary and the executive in extradition cases see Smeulers (2002).

²⁶⁷ Ontario Court of Appeal Ahani v. Canada, 8 February 2002, §§59-61.

²⁶⁸ Id., §62.

substantive right, he only noted that the doctrine of legitimate expectations did not create substantive rights. It referred to the 'substantive right to remain in Canada until the Committee delivers its views, a process that could take years'.²⁶⁹

Judge Rosenberg's dissent in Ahani discussed the rationale of the domestic principle of incorporation, invoked by the government, that international conventions are not binding unless they have been specifically incorporated into Canadian law. This was to protect Parliament and the people of Canada from executive action. This case, however, related to 'administrative decision-making (as opposed to legislative interpretation)'.²⁷⁰ It was the government that sought to invoke this 'non binding principle' in order to 'shield the executive from the consequences of its voluntary decision to enter into and therefore be bound by the Covenant and the Protocol'.²⁷¹ The 'non-binding principle' of treaty incorporation 'goes only so far as to affirm that the Covenant and the Protocol do not create rights in the appellant that can be enforced in a domestic court'. In this case, however, the applicant 'claims only the limited procedural right to reasonable access to the Committee, upon which the federal government has conferred jurisdiction'. Whatever the nature of this right of review, the government 'should not be entitled to render it practically illusory by returning him to Iran before he has had a reasonable opportunity to access it'. It was indeed 'a principle of fundamental justice that individuals in Canada have fair access to the process in the Protocol'.²⁷² While he believed that application of the principle is more difficult in the international context 'because of the difficulty for a Canadian court to assess the merits of a communication to the Committee', he noted 'a generally held consensus in Canada that in the human rights context an individual whose security is at stake should within reason be given the opportunity to access remedies at the international level'. This was 'particularly so where the individual seeks access to a body of the stature of the Committee,' with its adjudicative functions.²⁷³ It was a 'simple principle of justice that where there is a right there should be a remedy'.²⁷⁴ At least in capital cases the JCPC had held that 'states subject to a constitutionally enshrined due process clause may be obliged to await the decision of international bodies such as the Human Rights Committee'.²⁷⁵ Justice Rosenberg referred to JCPC cases 'simply as an indica-

²⁶⁹ Id., 8 February 2002, §63.

²⁷⁰ As phrased by Weiser (2004), pp. 136-137, who notes that 'this is not the accepted position in Canada' although the Supreme Court had not yet specifically addressed this issue. Harrington (2003), p. 82, points out that the judge failed to take into account the practical realities of the OP. She suggests that the common law principle that unincorporated international treaties have no domestic legal consequences should not apply in the same extent to treaties creating international complaint procedures.

²⁷¹ Ontario Court of Appeal Ahani v. Canada, 8 February 2002, Rosenberg dissent, §§91-92.

²⁷² Id., §93.

²⁷³ Id., §94. He points out that Professor Walter Tarnopolsky was a member of the HRC before he was appointed to Supreme Court of Canada. He also refers to the statement by Lord Millett in Tangiora v. Wellington District Legal Services Committee, [2000] 1 W.L.R. 240 (P.C.), pp. 244-245 that the (non-binding) views of the HRC 'acquire authority from the standing of its members and their judicial qualities of impartiality, objectivity and restraint'.

²⁷⁴ Ontario Court of Appeal Ahani v. Canada, 8 February 2002, Rosenberg dissent, §§95-96.

²⁷⁵ Id., §97. At §98 he quotes the dissenting opinion of Lord Nicholls in Briggs v. Baptiste, [2000] 2 A.C. 40, §47: "By acceding to the Convention, Trinidad and Tobago intended to confer benefits on its citizens. The benefits were intended to be real, not illusory. The Inter-American system of human rights was not intended to be a hollow sham or, for those under sentence of death, a cruel charade".

tion that countries with legal systems like ours have found that due process requires that individuals be given the opportunity to access these international bodies'.²⁷⁶

3.4.3 'Sorry: we can't comply'

3.4.3.1 INTRODUCTION

States have often said that domestic legislation did not allow them to implement provisional measures. They said, for instance: 'we can't find the beneficiaries'. In 2001, in the Haitian mass expulsion case the Dominican Republic informed the Court that it still had not been able to locate the two beneficiaries of the Court's second Order for provisional measures.²⁷⁷ Two more excuses of this kind are discussed in this section.

3.4.3.2 'WE LACK THE AUTHORITY TO TAKE MEASURES'

Almost two months after it had taken precautionary measures in a case against Ecuador, during an on-site visit, member of the Inter-American Commission Marta Altolaguirre received a commitment from the Minister of Defence that he would deploy the personnel needed to enforce the Commission's precautionary measures. The petitioners, however, reported later that measures were never implemented and that 'the Ministry of Defence had told them that it lacked the authority to take such actions'. Thus, the Commission repeated its precautionary measures and asked the government to provide information on the implementation on a monthly basis.²⁷⁸

In September 1996 the Inter-American Commission took precautionary measures on behalf of Roberto Girón and Pedro Castillo Mendoza. Guatemala responded two days later, 'sending an explanation as to why it would not implement the measures requested'.²⁷⁹ In November 1997 the Commission requested Guatemala to take precautionary measures to stay the execution of Manuel Martínez Coronado. His complaint dealt with violations of due process.²⁸⁰ Guatemala went ahead with the execution despite the precautionary measure. It just stated that its Court system did not provide for the application of such measures to stay the execution of a death sentence. This is significantly different from its responses to precautionary measures involving death threats and harassment.

²⁷⁶ Ontario Court of Appeal Ahani v. Canada, 8 February 2002, Rosenberg dissent, §99. He considered that the appellant has a procedural right because the executive had ratified the OP. "That right is a narrow one. It does not entitle him to any particular result either from the Human Rights Committee or the government once it receives the views of the Committee". Rosenberg dissent, §113.

²⁷⁷ It had requested the help of the Network 'Dominican-Haitian Meeting' and had met with them on 27 November 2000. IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic, Order of 26 May 2001.

²⁷⁸ CIDH Annual Report 2001, Chapter III (a), §29.

²⁷⁹ CIDH Annual Report 1996, Chapter II, §4a (cont.).

²⁸⁰ CIDH Annual Report 1997, Chapter III (2a) under the heading 'Guatemala'.

In Weiss v. Austria (2003) in response to the HRC Chairperson's letter of regret²⁸¹ with regard to Austria's decision to ignore the Committee's provisional measures, the State argued that Rule 86 did not oblige States to amend their constitutions to arrange for direct effect. It considered that a Rule 86 request 'does not as such have any binding effect under international law'. It 'cannot override a contrary obligation of international law, that is, an obligation under the extradition treaty between the State party and the United States to surrender a person in circumstances where the necessary prerequisites set out in a treaty were followed'.²⁸²

On the Order not to hand over the petitioners to US authorities Bosnia and Herzegovina stated that the Bosnia Chamber was 'fully aware' that Bosnia and Herzegovina had 'no authority to give effect to orders by the Chamber': "In its provisional measure the Chamber requested the state of Bosnia and Herzegovina to prevent the applicants to be taken out of Bosnia and Herzegovina by the use of force. The esteemed Chamber, most certainly, should know by now that the state of Bosnia and Herzegovina, in its distinction from its Entities, does not institutionally possess any instrument of force ... and such wording of the order for provisional measures is not enforceable by the state of Bosnia and Herzegovina".²⁸³

3.4.3.3 'YOU ARE NOT BEING FAIR: WE CANNOT DO THE IMPOSSIBLE'

In the case of the deportation and expulsion of Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian origin, the Dominican Republic argued during the hearing of August 2000 that it is 'obliged to maintain a permanent return and expulsion policy, but it is necessary to point out that the number of persons repatriated does not compensate even remotely for the number of persons who come into the country illegally'. According to the State, the Court's acceptance of the Commission's request for provisional measures 'would be like tying the hands of a State that has been trying for years to make headway in the field of human rights and concerning its immigration problem'.²⁸⁴ In another context the Inter-American Commission had already pointed out that the 'State has the ²⁸¹ In August 2002 the Chairperson of the HRC, by letter to the mission of Austria at the UN, expressed 'great regret' about the extradition in contravention of the request for interim protection. The HRC sought 'a written explanation about the reasons which led to disregard of the Committee's request for interim measures and an explanation of how it intended to secure compliance with such requests in the future'. On the same date the Special Rapporteur on New Communications requested the State 'to monitor closely the situation and treatment of the author subsequent to his extradition, and to make such representations to the Government of the United States that were deemed pertinent to prevent irreparable harm to the author's Covenant rights'. See HRC Sholam Weiss v. Austria, 3 April 2003, §5.1.

²⁸² HRC Sholam Weiss v. Austria, 3 April 2003, §5.3.

²⁸³ Bosnia Chamber Boudellaa, Lakhdar, Nechle and Lahmar v. BiH and Fed. BiH, 11 October 2002, §109. See also ACHPR Interights (on behalf of Husaini et al.) v. Nigeria, April 2005, response by the State to provisional measures of 6 February 2002 assuring the Chairman of the Commission 'that the administration and many Nigerians equally shared his concern' and expressing 'optimism that, in the long run, justice would be done and Safiya's life would be spared'. "While noting that the federal government could not unilaterally suspend the Sharia penal statutes and decisions which were within the prerogative of the state government in accordance with the Nigerian Constitution, the letter assured the Chairman that the administration would leave no stone unturned in ensuring that the right to life and human dignity of Safiya, and that of all other Nigerians that may be affected in future, were adequately protected", §20.

²⁸⁴ IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic case, Order of 18 August 2000.

obligation to keep order and maintain the conditions for ordinary life with the limits of the law. It cannot abdicate its sovereign obligation to provide guarantees, and the fact that a location is distant from the major urban centers is no excuse for shirking that responsibility’.²⁸⁵

Sometimes the measures to be taken require considerable resources, in particular in the context of protection against death threats. The protection required could sometimes amount to an internationally triggered domestic witness protection programme, but mostly it just requires allocation of resources such as building a wall, between two warring factions in a prison. Delay in implementation may then be caused by inter-agency ducking and diving about finances.

As noted, in the European system provisional measures have only once been used to protect persons against threats pending the proceedings before it. Yet on the merits the ECtHR has made quite clear that in order to protect life and personal integrity States are expected to take positive certain measures. In Kaya v. Turkey (2000) the government contended that they could not have provided effective protection against the attacks. The ECtHR was not convinced by this argument.

“A wide range of preventive measures would have been available to the authorities regarding the activities of their own security forces and those groups allegedly acting under their auspices or with their knowledge”.²⁸⁶

3.4.4 ‘Sorry: it is not our responsibility’

3.4.4.1 INTRODUCTION

There have been several occasions when the State has stated it was not responsible for the non-compliance, for instance because it was a private problem between individuals, because it was a problem created by the previous government and, most often, referring to the internal division of responsibilities between the national government and the governments of constitutive states in a federation.

3.4.4.2 THE MATTER IS A ‘PRIVATE PROBLEM BETWEEN INDIVIDUALS’

In November 1995 the Inter-American Commission requested Guatemala to take precautionary measures on behalf of an official of the Myrna Mack Foundation and of an organisation of indigenous peoples in Santa Barbara in the Province of Huehuetenango. He had been threatened and attacked by both local militia patrols and military officers. As a result he had been obliged to leave the community. This interfered with his ability to continue his work on behalf of both organisations. Guatemala refused to implement the precautionary measures requested by the Commission. It alleged that ‘the matter was a private problem between individuals’.²⁸⁷ The State has not generally refused to take positive measures because of precautionary measures by the Commission or provisional measures by the Court, indicating that the refusal is based on a disagreement about the facts, not the law.

²⁸⁵ CIDH Newton Coutinho Mendes et al. v. Brazil, 13 April 1999, §114.

²⁸⁶ ECtHR Mahmut Kaya v. Turkey, 28 March 2000, §100: “The Government have not provided any information concerning steps taken by them prior to the Susurluk report to investigate the existence of contra-guerrilla groups and the extent to which State officials were implicated in unlawful killings carried out during this period, with a view to taking appropriate measures of prevention”. See further Chapters IX (Threats) and XIII (Protection).

²⁸⁷ CIDH Annual Report 1996, 14 March 1997, §4a.

3.4.4.3 'IT IS THE PREVIOUS GOVERNMENT'S FAULT'

In response to an argument by Honduras that the previous government was responsible for the situation that triggered precautionary measures, the Inter-American Commission has noted that just like a Government cannot justify a violation of state responsibility because it has been committed by a previous Government, it cannot justify non-implementation of precautionary measures on that basis either. After all, the Commission argues, 'the passive subject of the obligations deriving from this provision of the Convention, which for the most part are concrete and automatic, is not the government or any other body that exercises public power but rather the State itself'. It also noted that 'according to the principle of identity or continuity of the State in international law that responsibility subsists independently of any change of government over the course of time and, concretely, between the time of the illegal act that gave rise to the responsibility and the time that it is denounced'.²⁸⁸

3.4.4.4 'IMPLEMENTATION IS THE PREROGATIVE OF THE RELEVANT CONSTITUENT STATE IN THIS FEDERATION'

With regard to the United States (US) the Inter-American Commission has requested a stay of execution many times. It generally received no response at all,²⁸⁹ or it is informed that the Government has forwarded the Commission's request to the Governor or the Office of the Attorney General of the constituent State in question.²⁹⁰ Shaka Sankofa (formerly Gary Graham) was seventeen at the time of the offence for which he was subsequently sentenced to death and there were serious doubts about his guilt. Years later he was nevertheless executed.²⁹¹ In January 1999 the Commission requested the US to stay the execution of Sean Sellers. This stay would enable the Commission to 'study the reports of alleged violations of his human rights, since he was a minor when he committed the crime for which he was sentenced to capital punishment, and he was mentally incapacitated'. Despite this request Mr. Sellers was executed as scheduled on 4 February 1999.²⁹² Stanley Faulder was a Canadian national sentenced to death in violation of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations and his execution took place under vigorous protests by Can-²⁸⁸ CIDH Minors in Detention case (Honduras), 10 March 1999, §188. The Commission has used a similar argument with regard to the obligations of Cuba since the OAS had suspended the participation of the Government of Cuba, see paragraph 2.1 of this Chapter (ft. 1).

²⁸⁹ See e.g. CIDH Zeitvogel v. US, Annual Report 1996, 14 March 1997, Chapter II, §4a (cont.); Faulder v. US, Annual Report 1999, Chapter III C.1, §66; Leisure v. US, Annual Report 1999, Chapter III C.1, §68; Michael Domingues v. US; Miguel Angel Flores v. US; Alexander Williams v. US, Annual Report 2000 §§49, 51, 52.

²⁹⁰ See e.g. CIDH Bannister v. US, Annual Report 1997, Chapter III (a); and Leisure v. US, Annual Report 1999, Chapter III C, §68; In one case, for instance, the State noted 'the U.S. federal government had no involvement with the case prior to the receipt of the Commission's request and that Mr. Thomas had been executed by the state of Virginia on January 10, 2000, after the U.S. Supreme Court refused to grant a stay'. The US sent this note the day after the execution. 6 January 2000, Douglas Christopher Thomas, Case 12. 240, scheduled for execution in Virginia on 10 January 2000, executed as scheduled according to information sent by the US on 11 January 2000, Annual report 2000, §47.

²⁹¹ CIDH Case of Gary T. Graham, now known as Shaka Sankofa v. US, 15 June 2000 (adm.) and 29 December 2003 (merits).

²⁹² CIDH Annual Report 1998, Chapter III (a), §23.

ada.²⁹³ The US message appears to be that it bears no responsibility for the actions of its constituent states.

The federal structure may be more an argument of convenience than the real reason for non-compliance. Moreover, in a federal death penalty case it obviously cannot use the argument that the decision to grant a stay is a prerogative of the relevant constituent state.²⁹⁴ In the context of the Order by the Inter-American Court for provisional measures on behalf of the detainees of Mendoza, in March 2007 the Corte Suprema de Justicia of Argentina pointed out that it was a matter of national rather than regional interest in the consequences of compliance or non-compliance with the recommendations and decisions adopted by the Inter-American Commission and Court. The national executive must represent the State internationally and bear responsibility for any wrongs. The matter has left the domestic sphere and regional authorities and courts could not counteract the obligations incurred by the State. It added that this also appeared from the fact that the Inter-American Commission and Court clearly addressed the State and not the Province of Mendoza.²⁹⁵ Significantly, the Corte Suprema de Justicia de la Nación also quoted from the Inter-American Court's Order of 30 March 2006 to the effect that the State cannot invoke reasons of domestic law as an excuse for not taking firm, concrete and effective action to implement the Order. The State could not justify failure to comply fully with the excuse that the provincial and national authorities were unable to coordinate their activities to prevent the killings and violence that had continued to take place despite the Court's provisional measures.

In international proceedings it is the State that is responsible, independent of its unitary or federal structure.²⁹⁶

3.4.5 'We won't comply'

3.4.5.1 INTRODUCTION

As noted, most provisional measures are generally respected, but this chapter discusses the reasons for States that fail to comply with them. On some occasions a State refuses outright to comply with provisional measures because of domestic concerns or a generally negative attitude towards international supervision.

3.4.5.2 DOMESTIC CONCERNS INCLUDING STATE SECURITY AND PUBLIC SAFETY

In S.I.G. v. the Netherlands (1985) the Netherlands ignored the European Commission's provisional measures arguing that respecting them would bring the government in conflict with its ²⁹³ CIDH Annual Report 1999, Chapter III C.1, §66.

²⁹⁴ See e.g. CIDH Juan Raúl Garza v. US, 4 April 2001 (adm.), in which the Commission had already issued a Report on the merits. He has been executed on 19 June 2001. See CIDH Annual Report 2000, §48.

²⁹⁵ Corte Suprema de Justicia de la Nación, 20 March 2007, as quoted by the IACHR Las Penitenciarías de Mendoza (Argentina), President's Order of 22 August 2007 (maintaining the existing provisional measures, but refusing to amplify them), 13th 'Considering' clause.

²⁹⁶ IACHR Las Penitenciarías de Mendoza (Argentina), 11th 'Considering' clause, as quoted by the Corte Suprema de Justicia de la Nación, 20 March 2007, as quoted by the IACHR Las Penitenciarías de Mendoza (Argentina), President's Order of 22 August 2007 (maintaining the existing provisional measures, but refusing to amplify them), 13th 'Considering' clause. See also Article 27 VCLT.

domestic legislation. There was some follow-up by the Commission in that it reminded the Dutch Government of its established practice with regard to provisional measures.²⁹⁷

In the 'immigration context' provisional measures raised 'some particular difficulties' in which occasionally other (non legal) considerations may take precedence.²⁹⁸ Canada often refers to its obligations under domestic law.²⁹⁹

²⁹⁷ EComHR S.I.G. v. the Netherlands, 10 October 1985 (inadm.). See also EComHR S. v. the Netherlands, 5 March 1984 (inadm.) where the Dutch government refused to comply with the Commission's provisional measures. In practice it did not expel the petitioner pending the proceedings in Strasbourg, but the attitude displayed remains puzzling. The State argued, among others, that there had not been a prima facie violation of the ECHR. It argued it had a policy freedom to decide in which cases to comply and referred to the text of the Rule on provisional measures, which uses the verb: 'may indicate'. A Dutch court also concluded that the Netherlands was not obliged to comply: President of the Court in Rotterdam in summary proceedings, 2-4-1984, KG 118. See e.g. the critical comments by Zwart (1985), pp. 65-71.

²⁹⁸ See HRC Ahani v. Canada, 29 March 2004, §5.3. The State 'fully supported the important role mandated to the Committee and would always do its utmost to cooperate with the Committee'. It stated that 'it took its obligations under the Optional Protocol very seriously and that it was in full compliance with them'. Noting that 'alongside its human rights obligations it also has a duty to protect the safety of the Canadian public and to ensure that it does not become a safe haven for terrorists' (§5.2), it considered that requests for provisional measures are 'recommendatory rather than binding' because neither the ICCPR nor the OP provide for them. It pointed out that it nevertheless 'usually responded favourably' to requests for provisional measures. It had seriously considered the instant request 'before concluding in the circumstances of the case, including the finding (upheld by the courts) that he faced a minimum risk of harm in the event of return, that it was unable to delay the deportation'. 'The State party pointed out that usually it responds favourably to requests its decision to do so was determined to be legal and consistent with the Charter up to the highest judicial level'. See §5.3. A word (or several words) seems to be missing in this sentence. It is not clear, moreover, whether it considered the procedure under the OP the 'highest judicial level'. It referred to its constitutional obligations under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms rather than to its international obligations. In the 'immigration context' provisional measures raised 'some particular difficulties' in which occasionally other (non legal) considerations may take precedence. However, this 'should not be construed as a diminution of the State party's commitment to human rights or the Committee', §5.3. Interestingly, given the fact that it was its decision to return the petitioner contrary to the Committee's provisional measures, Canada argued with regard to the Committee's request to monitor his treatment in Iran that it had 'no jurisdiction' over him and 'was being asked to monitor the situation of a national of another State party on that State party's territory'. Nevertheless, 'in a good faith desire to cooperate with the Committee' it stated that Iranian authorities had advised it on 2 October 2002 that Ahani 'remained in Iran and was well', §5.4. It added that a representative of the Iranian embassy had contacted it at the end of September of that year informing it that the petitioner had called to enquire about three pieces of luggage he had left at the detention centre. According to the State this showed that he did not fear the Iranian government and that the latter was willing to assist him. It also noted that the petitioner visited the Canadian embassy in Iran in October 2002. He did not raise ill treatment issues, but only noted he had difficulty to obtain employment. Canada stated that it had indicated to Iran that it expected it to comply fully with its international human rights obligations. See §5.4. Almost a year later counsel for the petitioner pointed out that she had initially considered that the petitioner had been arrested upon arrival, but not mistreated and subsequently had been released. Later, however, she had repeatedly attempted to call his family and was told that 'he was at another location and/or that he was sick'. She also pointed out that Canadian officials had reported no

Some States have argued that the HRC should consider State security and public policy before it would impose constraints on State parties. Yet these considerations may not determine whether or not there has been a violation of the Covenant. It is only in the context of permissible restrictions that these considerations could play a role. Similar to many other countries in Canada the Minister has a broad discretion in deciding whether or not to extradite someone and under which conditions. The Extradition Treaty between Canada and the US does provide for the possibility of seeking assurances against the death penalty, but in practice the Minister did not consider it necessary to routinely seek assurances in every case in which the death penalty was an issue.

In Kindler (1993) Canada submitted on the merits that it shared a 4,800 kilometre unguarded border with the US and that there had been a steadily increasing number of extradition requests from the US. In 1980 there were 29 such requests and by 1992 there were 83.³⁰⁰ Canada did not specify how many of these involved death penalty cases, but it explained it chose not to seek assurances against the death penalty on a routine basis because it did not wish to become a haven for the most wanted and dangerous criminals from the US. In Ng v. Canada (1993) counsel for the petitioner pointed out that the increase in extradition requests related to tax offences and other reasons unrelated to dangerous criminals.³⁰¹ The State respected the provisional measures in contacts since fall 2002 and neither had Amnesty International been able to obtain further information. See §6.1.

²⁹⁹ Weiser (2004) argues that 'current judicial approaches do not give full and consistent credence to international obligations undertaken by Canada, nor do they offer sufficient guidance on the effect of international human rights treaties on domestic laws'. (p. 114) 'There appears to be no presumption of conformity' with regard to international obligations unless the court is faced with 'legislation enacted specifically in furtherance of a treaty'. She refers to the statement of the Supreme Court in Suresh that 'our concern is not with Canada's international obligations qua obligations'. The court simply looks at international law as evidence of Canada's principles of fundamental justice rather than 'as controlling in itself', p. 133. She offers explanations for Canada's attitude towards international legal obligations. There are few countries, she notes, facing 'as many constitutional obstacles as Canada to the successful integration of domestic and international law'. Apart from the role of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the fact that treaties are not considered self-executing she refers to the fact that treaty ratification is an executive act and 'the extent of Parliamentary scrutiny in the process of treaty adherence is limited', p. 122. The assessment and considerations on which a decision to ratify is based 'remains an internal document and so, non-governmental actors (including courts) face obvious difficulties in trying to identify the international obligations underlying a particular domestic law'. Subsequently there is 'no systematic review' either 'of new legislation for consistency with treaty obligations', pp. 127-128. She points out that recently 'other countries with Westminster-style Governments have taken steps to rectify similar situations', p. 123. In practice federalism is another obstacle. She points out that 'while the federal Executive alone is empowered to enter into international treaties, it has no power to implement them in areas of provincial jurisdiction'. By contrast, in other federal States 'such as Australia, the federal government retains residual power to legislate a furtherance of a treaty, even where the subject matter typically falls outside federal jurisdiction', p. 124.

³⁰⁰ In HRC Ng v. Canada, 5 November 1993 and Cox v. Canada, 31 October 1994, the State referred to 88 cases by 1992.

³⁰¹ Canada and the US had amended the terms of their bilateral treaty in 1991, making taxation offences extraditable and removing ambiguities about the rules of double jeopardy and reciprocity. The increase in extradition requests, she noted, could well be attributable to these amendments. She submitted that at the time of her client's surrender, the applicable article in the treaty had been in place for fifteen years. During this time the Minister of Justice had only made

Cox v. Canada (1994), the third extradition case, but in all three cases Canada put forward arguments against extradition with assurances. It considered that only if it had summarily or arbitrarily taken its decision to extradite without assurances the extradition would violate the petitioner's rights. The Committee took specific note of the reasons advanced by the minister of justice, 'in particular, the absence of exceptional circumstances, the availability of due process and of appeal against conviction, and the importance of not providing a safe-haven for those accused of murder'.³⁰² three decisions on whether or not to ask for assurances that the death penalty would not be imposed or executed.

³⁰² HRC Ng v. Canada, 5 November 1993 §15.5-15.6. In both Kindler and Ng the State party referred to the United Nations Model Treaty on Extradition, arguing that this treaty allowed for discretion in obtaining assurances against the death penalty. This argument does not convince. The model treaty on extradition, like the bilateral treaty between the US and Canada, is not a human rights treaty and does not aim to be one. It simply provides the option to obtain assurances in order to help solve possible conflicts of participating States' obligations under human rights treaties. In other words, the extradition treaty may provide for discretion, allowing a State to obtain assurances, while that State's human rights obligations oblige the State to make use of this possibility. In this respect counsel pointed out that 'it is very significant that the existence of the discretion embodied in article 6, in relation to the death penalty, enables the contracting parties to honour both their own domestic constitutions and their international obligations without violating their obligations under the bilateral Extradition Treaty'. See e.g. Ng v. Canada, 5 November 1993, §11.2. Although unrelated to its task under the OP or the Covenant, in its decision on the merits the HRC added an observation on Canada's obligations under treaties other than the ICCPR, noting that abolition of the death penalty did not release Canada from its obligations under extradition treaties. It considered that only if the decision to extradite without any assurances would have been taken arbitrarily or summarily it would have violated its obligations under Article 6 ICCPR. See e.g. Cox v. Canada, 31 October 1994. Counsel stressed that Pennsylvania had stated in its extradition application that it was seeking the death penalty. The HRC observed once more that the domestic abolition of capital punishment did not release Canada of its obligations under the extradition treaties. "However, it is in principle to be expected that, when exercising a permitted discretion under an extradition treaty (namely, whether or not to seek assurances that capital punishment will not be imposed) a State which has itself abandoned capital punishment would give serious consideration to its own chosen policy in making its decision. The Committee observes, however, that the State party has indicated that the possibility to seek assurances would normally be exercised where exceptional circumstances existed. Careful consideration was given to this possibility. The Committee notes the reasons given by Canada not to seek assurances in Mr. Cox's case, in particular, the absence of exceptional circumstances, the availability of due process in the State of Pennsylvania, and the importance of not providing a safe haven for those accused of or found guilty of murder". See §16.4. See also Kindler v. Canada, §14.5 and Ng v. Canada, §15.5 (in this case the phrasing was slightly different: 'However, it should be expected that'). In the three cases the HRC considered that Canada's decision was not taken arbitrarily or summarily. In other words, while pointing out that States must be 'mindful of the possibilities for the protection of life when exercising their discretion in the application of extradition treaties', the HRC left a wide margin of discretion to the State. This remark is particularly striking firstly because it seems that in this case the HRC takes the approach that the question whether or not there is a violation depends on whether there are conflicting treaty obligations. Secondly, these obligations are not really conflicting because the applicable extradition treaty explicitly provides for the possibility to request assurances. A reason for this approach may be the ambiguity within the Committee about the interpretation of

In a case before its own Supreme Court, ten years after the Committee's decision in Kindler and Ng, but before its reversal of these cases, the Canadian government argued once more that if it would seek assurances and the US would refuse these it could face the possibility that the respondent might avoid a trial altogether. The Supreme Court replied with the question why the US would prefer not to try them at all if the death penalty could not be imposed. It also noted that in cases where assurances against the death penalty had been asked of the US (by Mexico, by European states and twice by Canada) the US had indeed given them.³⁰³ In this domestic case Canada emphasised once more the need to ensure that Canada would not become a 'safe haven' for dangerous fugitives. However, the Supreme Court argued that there was no evidence that extradition to face life imprisonment without release or parole provided a lesser deterrent to those seeking a 'safe haven' than did the death penalty. "Elimination of a 'safe haven' depends on vigorous law enforcement rather than on infliction of the death penalty by a foreign State after the fugitive has been removed from this country".³⁰⁴ This domestic law case, decided ten years after the extraditions of Kindler, Ng and Cox, changed Canada's attitude, at least domestically. In a unanimous decision issued in February 2001 the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that Canadian authorities must seek and obtain assurances against the death penalty to States that still impose it. In all but exceptional circumstances this obligation outweighs all other considerations. The decision turns on the increasing awareness of the possibility of error in criminal cases, making the death penalty unacceptable since it is irrevocable. While this new attitude has no direct bearing on the HRC's provisional measures, the Supreme Court of Canada addressed several issues the State had brought up in its arguments before the HRC ten years earlier.

The Court states that it must determine what constitutes the applicable principles of fundamental justice in the extradition context. These principles are derived from "the basic tenets of our legal system".³⁰⁵ It noted that its appreciation of the applicable principles of fundamental justice may have changed since 1991.³⁰⁶ Its concern about wrongful convictions was probably the most important factor in the Court's change of heart.³⁰⁷ The recent developments originating in the the obligations under Article 6 for States that have abolished the death penalty. The HRC reversed its case law in 2003. See Judge v. Canada, 5 August 2003.

³⁰³ Supreme Court of Canada United States v. Burns, 15 February 2001.

³⁰⁴ Id.

³⁰⁵ The question before the Supreme Court was whether ministerial discretion in extradition cases might go so far that it would infringe on the rights and freedoms in the Canadian Constitution. "Although it is generally for the Minister, not the court, to assess the weight of competing considerations in extradition policy, the availability of the death penalty opens up a different dimension. Death penalty cases are uniquely bound up with basic constitutional values and the Court is the guardian of the Constitution".

³⁰⁶ "While these basic tenets have not changed since 1991 when Kindler and Ng were decided, their application 10 years later must take note of factual developments in Canada and in relevant foreign jurisdictions".

³⁰⁷ The Court stated: "The accelerating concern about potential wrongful convictions is a factor of increased weight since Kindler and Ng were decided. The avoidance of conviction and punishment of the innocent has long been in the forefront of 'the basic tenets of our legal system'. The recent and continuing disclosures of wrongful convictions for murder in Canada and the United States provide tragic testimony to the fallibility of the legal system, despite its elaborate safeguards for the protection of the innocent. This history weighs powerfully in the balance against extradition without assurances when fugitives are sought to be tried for murder by a retentionist state, however similar in other respects to our own legal system". The Court devoted several paragraphs on a discussion of wrongful convictions cases in Canada, the US and the UK (§§96-117) and concluded that there was an inherent risk of judicial error in the Anglo-

United States itself, bringing to light so many wrongful convictions, contributed to convince the Supreme Court of Canada that legal systems cannot be infallible, that mistakes are bound to be made even in the best systems with the best lawyers and judges. Apart from this, its arguments included the following:

“It is final. It is irreversible. Its imposition has been described as arbitrary. Its deterrent value has been doubted. Its implementation necessarily causes psychological and physical suffering. It has been rejected by the Canadian Parliament for offences committed within Canada. Its potential imposition in this case is thus a factor that weighs against extradition without assurances”.

The Canadian Supreme Court does not seem to have been influenced by the HRC case law, but rather by developments in the US itself and by international developments in general.³⁰⁸

In T.P.S. v. Canada (2000) the State submitted that ‘the examination of possible irreparable harm should be a rigorous one, particularly when the individual concerned was found to represent a danger to the public or, as in the author’s case, whose continued presence in the State was determined to be contrary to the public interest’.³⁰⁹ It then submitted that the authorities had concluded that the risk was minimal ‘on the basis of the documentary evidence submitted by the author as well as their own evidence regarding the author’s risk upon removal to India’. Finally, it mentioned that a judge of the Federal Court Trial Division had determined that the risk to the author was not sufficient to justify a stay of his removal.³¹⁰ It is not clear whether this judge was aware of the involvement of CAT and its provisional measures.

With regard to the State’s policy argument based on the obligation under the post-September 11th Security Council resolution, in his dissent to the domestic Ahani case Justice Rosenberg pointed out that Canada was ‘not harbouring terrorists or setting itself up as a haven for terrorists’. If Canada would nevertheless be concerned that the OP would be used ‘as a vehicle to shield terrorists’ it could denounce it. “It did not have to ratify the Protocol and many nations, such as the United States of America and the United Kingdom, have not done so”.³¹¹ He found it ‘difficult to accept that the federal government ratified the treaty because it knew it could not be made to comply with its binding obligations’. “This would undermine the good faith obligation inherent in ratifying treaties”. He noted the statements by the government of Canada in 1976 announcing it would ratify the ICCPR and the OP: ‘our becoming party to these extremely important human rights instruments will enable us to play a more active role internationally in the human rights field and will moreover strengthen our credibility in urging other states also to become parties and to implement their provisions’.³¹² Another official government statement he referred to was that Canada ‘accepts the authority of the UN Human Rights Committee to hear com-

American system. This discussion included a summary of recent concerns raised within the USA (§§104-111). This inherent risk was clearly an important argument for the Court to change its views.

³⁰⁸ In turn the HRC’s reversal of Kindler and Ng does appear to be influenced by Burns, see Judge v. Canada, 5 August 2003.

³⁰⁹ CAT T.P.S. v. Canada, 16 May 2000, §8.3. Also referring to the ‘danger to the public’ argument see the State in CAT Mafhoud Brada v. France, 17 May 2005, §8.10.

³¹⁰ CAT T.P.S. v. Canada, 16 May 2000, §8.3.

³¹¹ Ontario Court of Appeal, Ahani v. Canada, 8 February 2002, dissenting opinion of Rosenberg, §101.

³¹² Statement by Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs) to the House of Commons, 18 May 1976, as quoted by Rosenberg, §103 in Ontario Court of Appeal, Ahani v. Canada, 8 February 2002, dissenting opinion of Rosenberg. See also Harrington (2003), p. 56.

plaints' under the OP and that Canada's human rights undertakings strengthen its 'reputation as a guarantor of its citizens' rights and enhance our credentials to urge other governments to respect international standards'.³¹³

Responding to the argument that 'the Committee, which is chronically under funded, can take years to reach a decision', he considered that the right of access to the HRC was 'not absolute and the appellant may not have an unconditional right to stay in Canada indefinitely'.³¹⁴ He 'would not foreclose the possibility that the government might be able to show that the Committee process will result in such an intolerable delay that the balance of convenience favours deportation'.³¹⁵ "I would think, however, that would be an unusual case. Here the domestic procedures have occupied over eight years and the appellant has remained in custody throughout. Canada can hardly complain about some delay at the Committee level when it is a condition of invoking that jurisdiction that all domestic remedies have been exhausted".³¹⁶ He remarked, furthermore, that the principle of fundamental justice that the right of access to the HRC includes a stay of expulsion 'may only be enforced in cases where the individual's life, liberty or security of the person interests are implicated, as in the case of a Convention refugee'. "The right to pursue the international remedy is not a means for delaying deportation in less serious cases".³¹⁷

The domestic court clearly confuses legal status and enforcement. The ICJ itself explained that those are two different matters when it noted 'the fact that the court does not itself have the means to ensure the execution of orders (...) is not an argument against the binding nature of such orders'.³¹⁸ While the domestic court referred to 'case law' to support its view that provisional ³¹³ See Ontario Court of Appeal Ahani v. Canada, 8 February 2002, dissenting opinion of Rosenberg, §103, quoting from Human Rights in Canadian Foreign Policy, at a government internet address that is not accessible anymore. Presently the government provides information entitled 'Canada's Commitment to Human Rights', last updated 9 April 2003, at <www.dfait-maeci.gc.ca/foreign_policy/human-rights/hr3-commit-en.asp> (consulted on 3 August 2004). On this page it states that it takes its international human rights obligations seriously, that it accepts the authority of the UN treaty monitoring Committees to hear complaints 'from Canadian citizens' (this is imprecise because it has recognised this right for 'individuals subject to its jurisdiction') under the OP and the Convention against Torture. "These international mechanisms provide an independent perspective on the state of human rights in Canada, and allow the Canadian government to review laws or policies which may be in conflict with international obligations. This willingness to accept independent, constructive criticism is critical to Canada's credibility, both domestically and internationally. Canada holds itself to the same standard it expects from other countries".

³¹⁴ Ontario Court of Appeal Ahani v. Canada, 8 February 2002, dissenting opinion of Rosenberg, §§105 and 106.

³¹⁵ The reference to 'balance of convenience' is derived from the domestic test for granting an interlocutory injunction. "That test requires the court first to make a preliminary assessment of the merits of the case to ensure that there is a serious question to be tried. Secondly, the court must determine whether the applicant would suffer irreparable harm if the application were refused. Finally, an assessment must be made as to which of the parties would suffer greater harm from the granting or refusal of the remedy pending a decision on the merits". Ontario Court of Appeal Ahani v. Canada, 8 February 2002, dissenting opinion of Rosenberg, §107, referring to RJR-Macdonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General) (1994), 111 D.L.R. (4th) 385 (S.C.C.), at 400.

³¹⁶ Ontario Court of Appeal Ahani v. Canada, 8 February 2002, dissenting opinion of Rosenberg, §110.

³¹⁷ Apart from this, he considered that there could be cases in which the balance of convenience would favour removal 'as where the applicant poses an unacceptable risk to public security even where, as in this case, he or she is being held in custody', Rosenberg dissent, §109.

³¹⁸ See ICJ LaGrand (Germany v. US), 27 June 2001, §107.

measures are not binding, it did not specify this case law, let alone refer to the Committee's consistent decisions actually emphasising the legal obligation to respect provisional measures.³¹⁹ Harrington points out that in light of the Committee's strong statements in previous cases on the seriousness of ignoring its provisional measures and given 'the ready availability of this information on the internet', it was 'disturbing' that the domestic court did not mention this line of jurisprudence and even 'more disturbing that Canada continues to simply decline to abide by a rule 86 request rather than, at a minimum, making an application to have the request withdrawn'. 'It is also disturbing that Canada routinely accepts the Committee's rules of procedure on relatively minor issues, such as the form and due date for its submissions, but disregards the procedures developed by the Committee for the preservation of an individual's life or physical integrity'.³²⁰

The domestic court took the baffling position that 'the international community has agreed to binding obligations in other treaties', but 'in the Covenant and the Protocol, it made a policy decision to do otherwise'.³²¹ Mystifying is also the Court's statement that 'both the European Court of Human Rights and the Privy Council have acknowledged that the Committee's views are not binding or enforceable'. It referred to the European Court's judgment in Cruz Varas, dealing with the provisional measures in the European system. Obviously the ECtHR would have no competence to pronounce itself on the legal status of the Committee's Views. Thus, the domestic court must have had the intention to draw an analogy between the European system and the system under the OP. In that context it is significant that the ECtHR has since determined that its provisional measures to halt refoulement are legally binding, confirming the approach taken by the HRC and the Committee against Torture.³²²

The domestic court seems to have a rather limited conception of the function of the judiciary in the context of international obligations. Apparently it thought that compliance with international treaties was a political rather than a legal matter. Also the 'political question' doctrine does not necessarily mean that such compliance is not a legal matter. The decision to declare provisional measures non-binding appears to be based on the conviction that it is a legal matter.

It is exactly in times of 'real or perceived threat' that the 'responsibility of the judiciary to protect human rights comes under special scrutiny'.³²³ It does not seem, however, that the domestic courts considered they had such a responsibility in Ahani. The Court also failed to mention CAT's response to Canada's non-compliance in T.P.S. v. Canada.³²⁴ It places undue deference to ³¹⁹ See also Harrington (2003), pp. 83-84. The court also referred to an incorrect observation in the introduction to the Committee's earlier volumes of Selected Decisions. This introduction does not comport with the approach of the HRC itself. In any case an introduction to a bound volume of the Committee's Selected Decisions is not nearly as authoritative as the Committee's Views, Concluding Observations and other official public statements.

³²⁰ Harrington (2003), p. 72, pp. 83-84.

³²¹ See Ontario Court of Appeal Ahani v. Canada, 8 February 2002, §37.

³²² ECtHR (first section) Mamatkulov and Abdurasulovic v. Turkey, 2 February 2003 and Grand Chamber Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, discussed in Chapter XVI (Legal status). Similarly the US tried to base its argument of the non-binding character of the Inter-American Commission's precautionary measures on the 1991 Cruz Varas judgment by the ECtHR, see Digest of the US practice in international law 2002, Chapter 6, no. 21. 'U.S. Additional Response to the request for precautionary measures', 15 July 2002, <<http://www.state.gov/s/l/38642.htm>> (consulted 8 January 2009).

³²³ See Macklin (2002), p. 15, discussing the domestic Ahani and Suresh cases.

³²⁴ See CAT T.P.S. v. Canada, 16 May 2000. See also Harrington (2003), pp. 85-86.

the executive and starts from the remarkable assumption that the ICCPR and the OP, international treaties ratified by Canada, are not binding.³²⁵

In his case the length of proceedings was mainly due to the domestic proceedings. Ahani had been in detention fighting his expulsion since June 1993. Only in 2002, upon exhaustion of domestic remedies, he petitioned the HRC.³²⁶

Harrington concludes that the Ahani decision by the Ontario Court of Appeal was ‘a most regrettable and undesirable precedent and one that runs counter to the very principles and spirit of international dispute settlement, a phenomenon that now extends beyond interstate disputes to include those between states and individuals where a State has given its consent’.

“By allowing Canada to disregard requests for interim measures from a body such as the Human Rights Committee, the Ontario Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court of Canada have, in essence, gutted the right of individual petition of all utility, since any subsequent finding of a violation will be impossible to remedy with the individual outside Canada’s jurisdiction”.³²⁷

France has also justified ignoring provisional measures by CAT because a petitioner was a ‘demonstrably dangerous common criminal’ who ‘presented a particularly disproportionate risk to public order and the safety of third parties’.³²⁸ CAT itself emphasised that in non-refoulement cases the balancing with the general interest, preferred by many States, is not allowed. In Adel Tebourski v. France (2007) CAT noted that ‘article 3 of the Convention offers absolute protection to anyone in the territory of a State party which has made the declaration under article 22. Once this person alludes to a risk of torture under the conditions laid down in article 3, the State party can no longer cite domestic concerns as grounds for failing in its obligation under the Convention to guarantee protection to anyone in its jurisdiction who fears that he is in serious danger of being tortured if he is returned to another country’.³²⁹ It noted that ‘even if the Committee takes into consideration all the comments which the State party has submitted on this communication, the declaration made by the State party under article 22 confers on the Committee alone the power to assess whether the danger invoked is serious or not. The Committee takes into account the State party’s assessment of the facts and evidence, but it is the Committee that must ultimately decide whether there is a risk of torture’.³³⁰

³²⁵ Harrington points out that the ‘lack of a world policeman does not make a treaty any less binding on a state that has voluntarily agreed to become a party through ratification or accession’. In this context she expresses concern about the domestic court’s obviously incorrect ‘appreciation of the very nature of international law’. Harrington (2003), p. 83. She adds that the responses by the HRC and the CAT to the State’s non-compliance show that the two international adjudicators do not recognize exceptions in the context of terrorism. The wish to deport suspected terrorists ‘does not justify downgrading long-standing treaty law commitments in the field of human rights to ineffective exhortations’, Harrington (2003), p. 86.

³²⁶ In January and May 2002 the HRC used provisional measures. Canada nevertheless deported Ahani in June 2002. The Committee published its View in March 2004. Mansour Ahani v. Canada, 29 March 2004.

³²⁷ Harrington (2003), p. 86.

³²⁸ CAT Mafhoud Brada v. France, 17 May 2005, §8.10.

³²⁹ CAT Adel Tebourski v. France, 1 May 2007, §8.3. Obviously this response equally indicates the follow up by CAT, see also Chapter XVIII.

³³⁰ CAT Adel Tebourski v. France, 1 May 2007, §8.3.

3.4.5.3 GENERALLY NEGATIVE ATTITUDE TOWARDS INTERNATIONAL SUPERVISION

3.4.5.3.1 Introduction

In the interest of easing domestic or international pressures a State may respond to provisional measures in a hostile fashion, indifferently or, on the other hand, in a cooperative manner. The role of the media and public opinion may be manifested both ways. It may result in public shaming of the State, triggering compliance, or in pressure on the State not to implement provisional measures. The latter may occur in the context of the death penalty and certain asylum cases. In such cases States domestic public opinion often is considered much more important than international public opinion. States may then have a negative attitude towards international supervision, which is also reflected in their response to provisional measures.

In February 2002 the Inter-American Commission used precautionary measures calling on the US to stay the execution of British citizen Mr. Housel, scheduled to be executed in Georgia on 12 March 2002.³³¹ He was executed as scheduled. An indication of the intransigent attitude of the State with regard to this subject matter is the fact that this was done despite involvement not just by the Inter-American Commission, but also by the U.K. government, the European Union and the Council of Europe, which had all appealed for clemency.³³² This subsection provides some other examples in this respect.

3.4.5.3.2 ‘No foreign meddling with judicial orders or lawfully imposed sentences’

In its Order of May 1999 the Inter-American Court referred to a note of Trinidad and Tobago of September 1998. In this note Trinidad asserted that ‘the Court does not have jurisdiction (...) to take any steps or decide upon any measures that will frustrate the implementation of a lawfully imposed sentence of death in Trinidad and Tobago’. Trinidad also declared that it would not ‘be consulting with the Commission or the Court any further in these matters’.³³³

After extraditing a petitioner on whose behalf the HRC had used provisional measures Austria noted that its reason for disrespecting the provisional measures and extraditing the petitioner was that a lower court had blocked the State’s compliance. It noted that the Federal Minister of Justice had ordered the Public Prosecutor’s Office in Vienna ‘to file a request with the investigating judge of the Vienna Regional Criminal Court seeking suspension of the extradition’. However, ‘the Court refused to comply with this request, on the basis that Rule 86 of the Committee’s ³³¹ Amnesty International, Urgent Action, 4 March 2002, AI Index: AMR 51/043/2002.

³³² Amnesty International, further information on EXTRA 18/02(AMR 51/043/2002, 4 March 2002), AI Index: AMR 51/046/2002, 13 March 2002. See the urgent humanitarian appeal sent on 4 March 2002 by Spain as the current president of the EU together with Denmark, its subsequent president and the European Commission on behalf of the EU to both the Governor of Georgia and to the Chairman of the Georgia Board of Pardons and Paroles. See also the statement of Walter Schwimmer, the Secretary General of the Council of Europe, condemning the decision to refuse clemency in this case, press statement of 12 March 2002, 131a (2002) and the statement of the President of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe of 13 March 2002, 137a (2002).

³³³ IACHR James et al. case, Order of 25 May 1999.

Rules of Procedure may neither invalidate judicial orders nor restrict the jurisdiction of an independent domestic Court'.³³⁴

3.4.5.3.3 'We don't need outsiders'

After the execution of three petitioners and beneficiaries of the Committee's provisional measures one State party had argued that it was 'highly inappropriate' for counsel to petition the HRC after they had applied for presidential clemency and this application had been rejected.³³⁵ In response the HRC expressed 'grave concern about the State party's explanation for its action' and pointed out:

"There is nothing in the Optional Protocol that restricts the right of an alleged victim of a violation of his or her right under the Covenant from submitting the communication after a request for clemency or pardon has been rejected, and the State party may not unilaterally impose such a condition that limits both the competence of the Committee and the right of alleged victims to submit communications".³³⁶

3.4.5.3.4 'Our own system of protection suffices'

States often consider that domestic courts can do the job. In Weiss v. Austria (2003) the State emphasised 'the extensive consideration' of the petitioner's case by the Austrian courts and the ECtHR, implying that there was no need for the HRC to examine a case like this.³³⁷

They have also justified ignoring provisional measures by stating that the allegations of the asylum seeker were 'not credible'. Mansi had claimed that his expulsion to Jordan involved a risk that 'he would be detained and tortured in the way he has been tortured before'. Upon his expulsion he also claimed a violation of Articles 1 and 25 (current Article 34) ECHR by Sweden for deporting him despite the provisional measures. The State had submitted that the petitioner had 'changed his story several times'. It considered that his allegations, pending the domestic proceedings in Sweden, that he had suffered torture in Jordan were not credible. Only at a late stage he had mentioned anything about torture. "At the time of the expulsion the Government had available relevant and reliable information about the current situation in Jordan. There was no reason to believe that the applicant would be subjected to treatment contrary to Article 3 of the Convention in Jordan".³³⁸ The Commission examined the question whether, 'at the time of the expulsion, there existed substantial grounds for believing that he faced a real risk of being treated contrary to Article 3 of the Convention in Jordan'. At the stage of admissibility it had carried out a preliminary examination of the issue. It considered that it raised 'questions of fact and law which are of such a complex nature that their determination should depend on an examination of the merits'.³³⁹ Mansi was returned to Jordan contrary to the Commission's provisional measures.

³³⁴ See HRC Sholam Weiss v. Austria, 3 April 2003, §5.2.

³³⁵ HRC Dante Piandiong, Jesus Morillos and Archie Bulan (deceased) (submitted by Alexander Padilla and Ricardo III Sunga) v. the Philippines, 19 October 2000, §§3.1 and 5.3.

³³⁶ Id., §5.3. Additionally, the HRC noted that the State party had not shown that the course of justice would have been obstructed by acceding to its request for provisional measures.

³³⁷ See HRC Sholam Weiss v. Austria, 3 April 2003, §5.3.

³³⁸ EComHR Mansi v. Sweden, 7 December 1989, §1.

³³⁹ Ibid.

There he was subjected to ill treatment upon his return to Jordan, and subsequently needed treatment at the Danish torture rehabilitation centre. The case was closed with a friendly settlement.³⁴⁰

In 2000 the Philippines ignored provisional measures by the HRC to halt an execution because it considered that the beneficiaries of the Committee's provisional measures had received a fair trial.³⁴¹

During 1997 alone the Inter-American Commission granted precautionary measures in fourteen death penalty cases with regard to Trinidad and Tobago.³⁴² In the case of Mr. Ross the Commission received the following response: '(t)his petition duplicates the petition to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and the petitioner seeks to use the Commission as a fourth level of appeal, which is not its function'.³⁴³ In the case of Mr. Thomas Trinidad and Tobago likewise responded that '(t)he petitioner is attempting to use the Commission as a fourth level of appeal' and it added that this is 'only permissible if there has been some denial of justice'. It argued that this could not be the case: '(t)his matter has been presented to the Privy Council, which rejected the appeal. As a result, it is unthinkable that justice was denied'.³⁴⁴

The response of Trinidad and Tobago has often been rather blunt: 'There was no denial of justice and Mr. Denny Baptiste was not treated in a cruel and inhuman manner. In addition, legal assistance is available to the poor'.³⁴⁵

In its first submission to the Inter-American Court to apply for provisional measures to halt the execution of persons, the Commission pointed out that it had adopted its own precautionary measures, but that Trinidad did not respond. Later, Trinidad alleged that the Commission did not have jurisdiction 'either by its acts or omissions to prevent in any way a sentence, authorized by the Constitution and laws of Trinidad and Tobago and pronounced by a Court of competent jurisdiction, from being carried into effect'. It declared that it was 'at liberty to carry out the death sentences according to its domestic laws'.³⁴⁶ The State's attitude towards the Commission's decisions was that Article 41 only empowered the Commission to make recommendations. This meant that the Commission could not overturn judgments of domestic courts.³⁴⁷

3.4.5.3.5 'Dangerous international law'

Tensions flared up as views on the government policy on detention of immigrants, both pro and contra, were expressed in the press. This was especially so in the context of discussions in the press on the detention of children in Australia. The Bakhtiyari case was often taken as an example. Commenting on the Family Court decision in April 2002 to hear the case of the two Bakhtiyari boys in September, one newspaper qualified this as 'a skewed interpretation of the law'. This is an example of one section of public opinion in Australia. It noted:

³⁴⁰ EComHR Mansi v. Sweden, 9 March 1990 (Friendly settlement).

³⁴¹ HRC Dante Piandiong, Jesus Morillos and Archie Bulan (deceased) (submitted by Alexander Padilla and Ricardo III Sunga) v. the Philippines, 19 October 2000.

³⁴² See CIDH Annual Report 1997, Chapter III (2a), under 'Trinidad and Tobago'.

³⁴³ The case of Mr. Ross, response of 23 December 1997, ibid.

³⁴⁴ The case of Mr. Thomas, response of 15 December 1995, ibid.

³⁴⁵ The cases of Mr. Hilaire and Mr. Baptiste respectively, ibid.

³⁴⁶ IACHR James, Briggs, Noel, Garcia and Bethel cases, Order of the President for urgent measures, 27 May 1998.

³⁴⁷ For some very critical comments on the general attitude of Trinidad see e.g. IACHR Caesar v. Trinidad and Tobago, Judgment of 11 March 2005, individual opinion of Judge Jackman.

“As even Nicholson [family court judge, E.R.] noted in his Cape Town address, international treaties and conventions don’t hold much sway under Australian domestic law. That, of course, has not stopped him and other activist judges from relying on so-called international law in their ideologically driven attempts to seek justice – a short hand word for what the law should be according to them. It’s easy. These conventions are couched in generous language. Like a horoscope they can mean just about whatever you want them to mean. And so, as law professor Pat Lane said recently, ‘the commonwealth Government’s innumerable international assurances lie in ambush’, waiting to overturn the decisions of domestic democratic bodies”.³⁴⁸

3.4.5.3.6 ‘We decide how our country should be run’

In response to international criticism (not just the provisional measures by the HRC, but a range of statements and visits by other UN officials)³⁴⁹ of its system of mandatory immigration detention, also for children, Australia’s Foreign Minister told the Australian parliament: ‘We do not run off to the United Nations asking how Australia should be run,’ and ‘whatever the rights and wrongs of these issues, we will decide them for ourselves, not have bureaucrats in Geneva decide them for us’.³⁵⁰

3.4.5.3.7 Conclusion on domestic reasons for non-compliance

Many interrelated factors play a role. The precise reasoning may be blurred. An argument, for instance, that the assessment of risk by domestic courts is better may be based not only on the assumption that international adjudicators are more removed from the facts, but also on the fact that the domestic court took into account the risk to society in its assessment of the risk to the petitioner, while the international adjudicator has pointed out that the international obligation is of such nature that it does not allow for balancing.³⁵¹

Compliance with provisional measures seems to be more difficult in relation to decisions to execute extradition or expulsion orders or even death sentences in a democracy. While the international adjudicator takes provisional measures considering that the petition has brought a valid claim under international law and is facing irreparable harm to life or personal integrity, domestic authorities may decide not to comply in order to satisfy and protect the public. The mobilization of shame customarily referred to as an important means of enforcement of human rights obligations does not apply to the same extent in such cases. There may be a belief among many members of the public, as reported by the media, that human rights only apply to law-abiding citizens, experiencing an urgent need to protect their own safety and not wishing to know exactly how this is being done.³⁵² It may also be a partial explanation of the attitudes of Trinidad and Tobago and ³⁴⁸ J. Albrechtsen, ‘Ideology blurs role of judiciary’, The Australian, 21 August 2002, originally posted at <www.theaustralian.com.au>. It may still be found at the website of the Richard Hillman Foundation, in apparent support of her position, <www.rhfinc.org.au/docs/blurs.pdf> (consulted on 4 August 2004).

³⁴⁹ See Chapter XVIII (Follow-up).

³⁵⁰ Michael Millett and Michael Bradley, ‘Criminals better off than asylum seekers’, Sydney Morning Herald, 7 June 2002, <www.smh.com.au> (consulted on 9 April 2003).

³⁵¹ See also Conclusion Part II and Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

³⁵² For instance, during the first period Fujimori (Peru) was in power he was popular for being tough on crime and terrorism.

the US.³⁵³ In other cases States might comply in order to avoid media attention, but this obviously is less often the case with regard to halting executions in democracies with a public opinion largely favouring the death penalty or largely suspicious of foreign courts.

4 CONCLUSION

A distinction may be made between responses in which the parties (in particular the State) protest against the (temporary) outcome of the normative process, on the one hand, and against the development of the process as such on the other hand. Explanations for the first type may be derived from the system of implementation in domestic law, specific politics, the role of media, domestic and international NGOs and other international actors.³⁵⁴ This response may differ depending on the type and specificity of the provisional measure.

Explanations of non-compliance based on the second type, disagreement with the decision-making process of the adjudicator, may relate to the procedures of the adjudicator in general or to specific issues arising in the case, e.g. relating to the principle of audiatur et altera pars or the lack of transparency in the decision-making process.

Non-compliance should not necessarily be attributed to the common law system. Equally, non-common law countries such as Austria and Finland have argued that their administrative system did not permit them to implement provisional measures because they did not have the authority to overrule the decision of a domestic court. This is a problem occurring in both common and civil law systems. It may be related more to the fact that in many States international law is not part of domestic law. Thus, one explanation for non-compliance may be that international obligations have not (yet) been incorporated in the domestic system. In addition, compliance may also depend on whether it is a federal State, on the role of the media, of public opinion (as perceived) and on the fact that there will be elections soon.

Apart from the domestic circumstances at the time, some explanatory power for the attitudes of addressee States may lie, for instance, in the perceived authority of the adjudicator among the State parties in general or the attitude of that particular State to international adjudicators in general.

As to the type of provisional measures, what may matter is the controversial nature of the particular subject matter, the required measures of protection (positive or negative, general or detailed) and whether the provisional measure has been accompanied by some explanation.

The paucity of consistent information on State responses does not allow for a clear answer to the question whether States respond more favourably to provisional measures that aim to protect those rights that are commonly considered the most fundamental. Yet the fundamental nature of some of the rights involved does seem to play a role in the follow up by the adjudicators and others, which is discussed in the next chapter.

As Buergethal has pointed out:

“The effectiveness of decisions by international human rights tribunals ordering provisional measures depends, in large measure, on their judicious use. They are exceptional measures and should be reserved for exceptional and urgent situations. Most of the time that means that they should be granted very sparingly. Such orders are likely to be disregarded or not fully complied ³⁵³ It has been suggested that the Inter-American Commission and Court sometimes are too keen on publicity. In fact an important factor in non-compliance, for instance in relation to Peru and the US, is the public's inborn fear for personal security. Interview by author with Charles Moyer, San Jose, Costa Rica 2001.

³⁵⁴ See also Chapter XVIII (Follow-up).

with by States if they are permitted to be transformed from an exceptional remedy into one more procedural tool to be used against a recalcitrant State. Their effectiveness depends on their exceptional character precisely because that is how they preserve their shock value and corresponding effect on public opinion. Here it must never be forgotten that, in the final analysis, public opinion will determine whether or not the State will comply with the decision".³⁵⁵

³⁵⁵ Buergenthal (1994), p. 93.

CHAPTER XVIII

FOLLOW-UP ON NON-COMPLIANCE

1 INTRODUCTION

In some cases the ICJ has requested follow-up in its initial Orders for provisional measures involving the fate of human beings.¹ This chapter gives examples of the manner in which the human rights adjudicators have followed up on the implementation of their provisional measures, including the possible consequences attached to non-compliance with provisional measures with regard to findings on admissibility and merits (section 2). Indeed this follow-up by the adjudicators themselves is considered to be a very important factor contributing to the effectiveness of provisional measures: 'securing a vigilant and active follow-up monitoring process', it has been noted, is an important condition for the effectiveness of urgent action procedures.²

The public statements made by authorities from various inter-State systems of cooperation (section 3), as well as those made by NGOs (section 4) may help reinforce the follow-up activities performed by the adjudicators themselves.³

In addition to indicating a conviction that following up on compliance with provisional measures is important to ensure their effectiveness, the practice of the adjudicators, officials of intergovernmental organisations and NGOs also indicates their awareness of the irreparable nature of the harm at stake.

2 FOLLOW-UP BY THE ADJUDICATORS

2.1 Introduction

With regard to the developments in monitoring compliance with provisional measures this section focuses on the practice of the HRC and the Inter-American Commission and Court. It also gives a few examples from the practice of CAT. Further, some references are made to the follow-up on provisional measures separate from the individual petition procedure, as part of the state reporting procedure (section 2.2).

With regard to the possible consequences of failure to respect provisional measures for deciding on admissibility a few references are made to HRC case law. For such consequences for decisions on the merits, the ECtHR judgment in Mamatkulov is singled out for discussion (section 2.3).

¹ See further Chapter I (ICJ), section 7.

² Van Boven (2005), p. 106. See also Boerefijn (1999b), pp. 101-112 on the general issue of follow-up.

³ In turn these organisations use the provisional measures decided on by the adjudicators in order to reinforce their own goals of preventing irreparable harm to persons. Obviously critical domestic follow-up on (intended) non-compliance also occurs. See e.g. questions put by members of parliament in the case of J.R. v. the Netherlands, 124/1998, 19 November 1999 (disc.) as well as the comment by Rieter/Van Boven/Flinterman (1999) and letter of the Netherlands Advisory Committee for International Affairs of 13 July 1999, as referred to in Böcker (2006), p. 137.

2.2 Monitoring compliance

2.2.1 Introduction

This section sets out by explaining the gradual approach to follow-up taken by the HRC. It then focuses on its follow-up to its provisional measures to halt executions, on the one hand, and to halt expulsion or extradition, on the other. Subsequently it deals with one method of follow-up; that of sending reminders. Then follow-up by CAT and ‘seguimiento’ in the Inter-American system is discussed, as well as monitoring in the European system and under the Dayton peace agreement. Finally this chapter briefly refers to the possibility for adjudicators of using the respective State reporting procedures to follow up on provisional measures previously taken under the complaint proceedings.

2.2.2 The gradual approach of the HRC

The HRC has introduced a Special Rapporteur on Follow Up on Views, which indicates the importance it attaches to follow-up in general.⁴ Yet since provisional measures apply pending a case this Rapporteur does not deal with the follow-up on provisional measures. This is done by the Special Rapporteur on New Communications and Interim Measures as well as by the full Committee. Nevertheless there is a substantive link between the State's obligations at the merits stage and at the provisional measures stage.⁵ For instance, the HRC has sometimes followed up its decision on the merits, urgently communicating to the State, in the face of an execution date, that at the very least its findings of a violation meant that the death sentence should not be executed. There is no consistent policy or practice regarding this type of monitoring or follow-up.

The practice of the HRC with regard to follow-up in general, and to follow-up on provisional measures in particular, has developed significantly. In the detention cases of the 1970s and 1980s, in the face of insufficient response, the HRC generally followed up its informal request for provisional measures at periodic intervals,⁶ including as part of its admissibility decision. At that stage it sometimes made a stronger request than it had made previously, namely to ensure access to medical treatment. At the same time it rewarded any semblance of cooperation by the State by referring to it extensively. As a result, in some of these cases, on the merits it did not refer to the importance of ensuring medical attention.

⁴ CAT has equally done so, but CEDAW thus far continues with an ad hoc follow-up procedure. In its report on its 7th session the Working group on Communications under the OP to the CEDAW recommended to continue with an ad hoc follow-up procedure and refrain, ‘for the time being’ from establishing a permanent mechanism, see its report, in Annex IX to the 2006 Annual Report, A/61/38, §9(c); see also Report of the Working Group on Communications, 26 February 2007, in Sessional/Annual Report of Committee CEDAW/C/2007/111/WGCOP/L.1, §8(e), appointing, ad hoc, two of its members in order to follow up its View in A.S. v. Hungary (on this case see Chapter IX on protection against threats).

⁵ See also Chapter XIII (Protection).

⁶ See Chapter II (Systems) and Chapter VII (Detention) on the issue of informal provisional measures.

Sendic v. Uruguay (1981) serves as an example of follow-up in the context of the early detention cases dealt with by the HRC.⁷ The State argued, more than two months after the HRC used informal provisional measures, that the case was inadmissible because the same matter had been submitted to the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights. It did not provide any of the information requested by the HRC. A week later the petitioner commented on the State's submission, stating that she had never submitted her husband's case to the Inter-American Commission. She also informed the HRC of the place of detention of her husband that had become known 'thanks to strong international pressure'.⁸ When it declared the case admissible the HRC pointed out the State's obligation under Article 4(2) OP and decided that it 'should be requested to furnish the Committee with information on the present state of health of Raúl Sendic Antonaccio, the medical treatment given to him and his exact whereabouts'. It is noteworthy that the Committee again asked about his whereabouts. The petitioner had already provided some information but the HRC had never received any response by the State.⁹ The petitioner also asked the HRC 'to take appropriate action with a view to securing her husband's right to submit a communication himself'.¹⁰ In October 1980 she argued once more that her husband had the right to be informed of the Committee's admissibility decision, taken more than two months previously. Later that same month the HRC noted that in her first submission the petitioner had expressed 'grave concern as to her husband's state of health and the fact that his whereabouts were kept secret'. Taking into account 'the fact that its previous requests for information about the present situation of Raúl Sendic Antonaccio had gone unheeded' and further noting the latest letter by the petitioner, the HRC decided to formally follow up on the situation. It reminded the State of its previous decision requesting 'information about the state of health of Raúl Sendic Antonaccio, the medical treatment given to him and his exact whereabouts'. It urged the State 'to provide the information sought without any further delay' and, 'as requested by Violeta Setelich, the State party should be requested to transmit all written material pertaining to the proceedings (submissions of the parties, decisions of the Human Rights Committee) to Raúl Sendic Antonaccio, and that he should be given the opportunity himself to communicate directly with the Committee'.¹¹

On the merits the HRC noted 'with deep concern' the State's failure to fulfil its obligations under Article 4(2) OP. It also pointed out that Uruguay had 'completely ignored the Committee's repeated requests' for information about the health and whereabouts of Mr. Sendic. It is unable to fulfil its task if State parties do not provide it with all the relevant information. Knowledge of the state of health of the person concerned is 'essential to the evaluation of an allegation of torture or ill-treatment'. In other words, judging from this remark alone, the emphasis of the Committee's request for information seems actually to have been the need for information and not the need for intervention.¹²

⁷ HRC Sendic Antonaccio (submitted by his wife Violeta Setelich) v. Uruguay, 28 October 1981.

⁸ According to the petitioner, Uruguay 'had refrained from giving any information on her husband's state of health because he was kept on an inadequate diet in an underground cell with no fresh air or sunlight and his contacts with the outside world were restricted to a monthly visit that lasted 30 minutes and took place in the presence of armed guards'.

⁹ HRC Sendic Antonaccio (submitted by his wife Violeta Setelich) v. Uruguay, 28 October 1981.

¹⁰ This shows that already in very early cases the petitioners of a communication emphasised the autonomy of the actual victim under the individual complaint system.

¹¹ HRC Sendic Antonaccio (submitted by his wife Violeta Setelich) v. Uruguay, 28 October 1981.

¹² For an example of follow-up by the HRC in a disappearance case see HRC Tshishimbi v. Zaire, 25 March 1996. When the HRC declared the case admissible it criticized the lack of cooperation on the part of the State and specifically followed up the Special Rapporteur's provisional measures. In its examination of the merits the HRC once more noted 'with serious concern the total absence of cooperation' by the State party. It referred to the State's obligations under Article

The first time a State ignored the formal provisional measures of the HRC, the Committee simply expressed its regret. The case involved halting destruction of the natural habitat. In the Lubicon Lake Band case (1990)¹³ the HRC did not monitor compliance with its provisional measures other than by sending a renewed request for provisional measures more than a year after it first used them. Even if it had eventually recommended a remedy seeking a permanent or interim injunction, this would have been too late because it was tardy in using provisional measures in the first place and because the State did not appear to respect them once they had been taken. The HRC could have monitored compliance more actively.¹⁴

The first non-refoulement case in which a State ignored the Committee's provisional measures was Kindler v. Canada (1993). The HRC found no violations of Articles 6 and 7 but it expressed 'its regret that the State party did not accede to the Special Rapporteur's request under rule 86'.¹⁵ In his dissent Aguilar Urbina specifically commented on the way the petitioner was extradited in disregard for the Special Rapporteur's provisional measures.

"On ratifying the Optional Protocol, Canada undertook, with the other States Parties, to comply with the procedures followed in connection therewith. In extraditing Mr Kindler without taking into account the Special Rapporteur's request, Canada failed to display the good faith which ought to prevail among the parties to the Protocol and the Covenant".¹⁶

It was in this context that he considered there had been a violation of Article 26 ICCPR (right to equality). He pointed out that Canada had given 'no explanation as to why the extradition was 4(2) OP and pointed out, once more, that the State had failed to react to the Special Rapporteur's provisional measures in May 1993. The Committee pointed out that it had not received any information on the fate of Mr. Tshishimbi at all; see also Mohammed Bashir El-Megreisi (submitted by his brother Youssef El-Megreisi) v. Libya, 23 March 1994. The HRC had requested information on the whereabouts of the alleged victim on several occasions. In its View it noted 'with regret and great concern' the absence of cooperation by the State party and pointed out that it is implicit in Article 4(2) OP and in Rule 91 that the State party must investigate in good faith all the allegations of violations of the Covenant and provide the Committee with the information available to it. An example of follow-up by the Bosnia Chamber is its decision on the merits in Matanović et al. v. Republika Srpska, 6 August 1997, noting in §5 that it never received a response from Republika Srpska to its requests with regard to the whereabouts of a Roman Catholic priest and his parents, and in §31 that the respondent had not taken part in the proceedings before the Ombudsperson and Chamber until after the case had been declared admissible, stressing the obligation of the Parties to the Agreement to cooperate with the Chamber and the Ombudsperson under Articles X (5) and XIII (4).

¹³ HRC Bernard Ominayak, Chief of the Lubicon Lake Band v. Canada, 26 March 1990.

¹⁴ In HRC Jouni E. Lämsman et al. v. Finland, 30 October 1996, another case involving a claim of destruction of the natural habitat, the petitioner had requested the Committee to reiterate its provisional measures, but it did not do so. Apparently, in December 1995 a negotiation took place between the parties, in which a solution was actively sought. Note of the Secretariat of 8 December 1995 after speaking with the Finnish Foreign Ministry and counsel to the petitioners (on file with the author).

¹⁵ HRC Kindler v. Canada, 30 July 1993, §17.

¹⁶ HRC Kindler v. Canada, 30 July 1993, dissent Aguilar Urbina, §23. See also his dissent in HRC Ng v. Canada, 5 November 1993, §12.

carried out so rapidly once it was known that the author had submitted a communication to the Committee'.¹⁷

"By its censurable action in failing to observe its obligations to the international community, a State party has prevented the enjoyment of the rights which the author ought to have had as a person under Canadian jurisdiction in relation to the Optional Protocol. In so far as the Optional Protocol forms part of the Canadian legal order, all persons under Canadian jurisdiction enjoy the right to submit communications to the Human Rights Committee so that it may hear their complaints. Since it appears that Mr Kindler was extradited on account of his nationality and in so far as he has been denied the possibility of enjoying its protection in accordance with the Optional Protocol, I find that the State party has also violated article 26 of the Covenant".¹⁸

Lallah equally pointed out that the very notion of protection required preventive measures, in particular in relation to the right to life, because once a person is deprived of his life 'it cannot be restored to him'.¹⁹

While in Ng v. Canada (1993) the HRC expressed its regret that the State had not acceded to its request to stay the petitioner's extradition, it did so only when it decided to join the question of the victim requirement to the consideration of the merits. In Kindler it had expressed its regret as part of its discussion on the merits. Since the HRC did find a violation of Article 7 in Ng, it could have argued that Canada's extradition despite the Committee's provisional measures was an aggravated violation of Article 7. Instead, it requested Canada 'to make such representations as might still be possible to avoid the imposition of the death penalty' and it appealed to this State to ensure that a similar situation did not arise in the future.²⁰ It may have considered that the matter was too sensitive to draw attention to it, especially given the heinous crimes Ng was charged with. In fact Aguilar Urbina was the only Committee member to specifically deal with Canada's failure to respect the Committee's provisional measures.²¹

The quality of submissions by petitioner and State may have an impact on the attitude of the adjudicators towards non-compliance by governments and on whether or not they will take provisional measures in the first place. Equally, certain factual situations, such as public opinion, may have an impact on the attitude of the adjudicator towards whether it will take provisional measures in certain situations as well as its attitude towards non-compliance. Yet the lack of firm response in these cases by the HRC as a whole may mainly be due to the fact that they were among the first in which it was faced with non-compliance.

¹⁷ HRC Kindler v. Canada, 30 July 1993, dissent Aguilar Urbina, §24.

¹⁸ Ibid.

¹⁹ HRC Kindler v. Canada, 30 July 1993, dissent Lallah, §3.3. He also suggested that the Canadian act concerned arbitrary deprivation of life under Article 6(1) because 'unequal treatment is in effect meted out to different individuals within the same jurisdiction'. He noted that under Canadian law Canada could not sentence an individual to death through its judicial arm but it did find it possible, through its executive arm, to extradite him to face the real risk of such sentence. He would therefore have found a violation of Article 26 which 'regulates a State party's legislative, executive as well as judicial behaviour'. Chanet also would have found a violation of Article 26.

²⁰ HRC Ng v. Canada. In his dissent Lallah considered that there had been a violation of Articles 6 and 7 and '(e)ven at this stage, Canada should use its best efforts to provide a remedy by making appropriate representations, so as to ensure that, if convicted and sentenced to death, the author would not be executed'.

²¹ HRC Ng v. Canada, dissenting opinion Aguilar Urbina, §§12-13.

Subsequent to these sensitive extradition cases the HRC did develop a practice of strong condemnation on the basis of the obligations under the OP and the ICCPR, as discussed next.

2.2.3 Follow-up by the HRC on halting executions

As noted, it has been on the occasion of executions of death sentences in defiance of its provisional measures that the HRC has expressed itself most strongly on the rationale of provisional measures and their legal status.²²

²² In the vast majority of death penalty cases States have respected the Committee's provisional measures. Sometimes execution dates are scheduled even after the HRC has found a violation and recommended commutation. In such cases the HRC has also followed up, but not by using provisional measures, as the Inter-American Court had done. See e.g. HRC Anthony McLeod v. Jamaica, 31 March 1998. The Special Rapporteur had used provisional measures in January 1997. In March 1998 the HRC adopted its Views in this case, recommending a new appeal or release. Two months later counsel noted that he was still awaiting the Committee's Views and that his client was at risk of execution in June. He inquired when the HRC would make a determination on the merits. It seems he was not yet aware of the aforementioned View. He urgently requested the HRC to reapply provisional measures. Apparently the execution date was postponed to early 1999, when counsel again approached the HRC. This is one example of a case in which the Secretariat had to remind the State of the Committee's Views and of the State's obligation, under Article 2, to provide the victim with an effective remedy rather than with a warrant of execution. Note Verbale transmitting the case under Rule 86/91, 17 January 1997; fax by counsel of 12 and 20 May 1998 and 19 January 1999; faxes by Amnesty International of 19 and 20 January 1999 pointing out that scheduling a warrant of execution 'flies in the face of recommendations' by the HRC and 'would undermine the very international protection of fundamental human rights which petitions to the Committee are designed to provide'; letter by the Secretariat to the Permanent Mission referring to the Views of 31 March 1998 and the State's obligation under Article 2 ICCPR to provide an effective remedy, noting that a warrant of execution had been issued and reiterating its recommendation that the victim should be granted a new appeal hearing or be released, 22 January 1999 (on file with the author). In April 1997 the Special Rapporteur reiterated his earlier request for provisional measures in Abdool Saleem Yasseen and Noel Thomas v. Republic of Guyana, 30 March 1998. following an urgent submission by their counsel. Six days previously she reported that a government minister had publicly stated that the death sentences against her clients would be carried out in due course. See letter by counsel of 18 April 1997, with an attached newspaper article from the Starbrook news of 16 April 1997; Note Verbale of 24 April 1997 to the Permanent Mission reiterating the Rule 86 request of 7 February 1996 (on file with the author). Subsequently, in March 1998 the HRC found violations of the right to a fair trial and recommended the release of the petitioners. At the end of that year Guyana withdrew from the OP. In September 1999 it announced that it would proceed with the execution of Yasseen and Thomas. Both Amnesty International and the Guyana Human Rights Association took action on their behalf and on 10 September the UN Secretary General sent a Note Verbale to the Attorney General of Guyana (copied to the Permanent Mission in New York) reiterating the Committee's recommendations and urging the State to refrain from carrying out the death sentence. Again he referred to the obligations undertaken by the State under the ICCPR and its Optional Protocol. Amnesty International press release of 10 September 1999, 'Guyana: two men to be hanged after an unfair trial', AI Index: AMR 35/02/1999; letter by Michael McCormack, Co-President of the Guyana Human Rights Association to Secretary General Kofi Annan, with copies to the UN Legal Counsel and the High Commissioner for Human Rights, 12 September 1999; Note Verbale by the UN Secretary General to the Attorney General of Guyana of 10 September 1999. As becomes clear from a letter by the father of Yasseen sent to the UN Development Programme in Guyana on 14 August 2000

Over the years it has taken a stronger position on non-compliance.²³ It now condemns such executions as incompatible with the obligation to respect the Covenant in good faith and with the right of individual communication under the OP.

The day after the execution of Rockliff Ross, in defiance of a provisional measure by the HRC, the Secretariat sent a note to counsel:

“We profoundly regret having learnt of Mr. Ross’ execution on 4 June 1996. By the time of his execution, the case had in fact been registered upon instruction of the Chairman of the Human Rights Committee and been sent to the President of Guyana”.

The case was discontinued after the execution since the purpose of the submission had been to prevent the execution and counsel had not submitted any further comments. Aguilar Urbina, the Chairperson of the HRC addressed the Permanent Representative of Guyana in a formal response to the execution. He pointed out that the case had been transmitted before the execution took place, that it included a provisional measure and that the Superintendent of the Prison had also been informed.

“On 23 July 1996 the Committee discussed the case of Mr. Ross and expressed dismay at his execution on 4 June 1996, in spite of the Committee’s request for interim protection. In the name of the Committee and further to its unanimously adopted instructions, I should like to seek prompt written explanations from your Excellency’s Government as to the reason for which the Committee’s request was not respected. I am at your disposal for any clarifications in the matter”.²⁴

Trinidad and Tobago executed Glenn Ashby in July 1994 despite the Committee’s provisional measure, six days before he would have been eligible for commutation of his sentence under the JCPC’s Pratt and Morgan rule.²⁵

Following the HRC’s use of provisional measures the petitioner had written to the Mercy Committee. He had requested the right to be heard before that body, ‘stating that the Human Rights Committee was considering his communication and asking that the Mercy Committee await the outcome of the Human Rights Committee’s recommendations’. Five days later the Mercy Committee rejected his petition for mercy. On that same day a warrant for execution was read to him, to take place on 14 July 1994 at 6 a.m.²⁶ The subsequent events show that the assur-

(and transmitted to the HRC on 25 August 2000) both were still on death row at that time (on file with the author).

²³ See also Harrington (2003), p. 69 referring to a ‘movement towards recognizing the binding nature of interim measures requests’ as ‘reflected’ in the jurisprudence of the HRC. She notes that the Committee ‘has taken an increasingly stronger stance’ and ‘what were once seen as mere “failures to cooperate” are now viewed as violations of a state’s very obligations under the ICCPR regime’.

²⁴ HRC (The late) Rockliff Ross v. Guyana, 10 December 1997 (disc.), (703/1996), letter by Secretariat to counsel, 4 June/15 June 1994; Note Verbale by Chairman Aguilar Urbina to the Permanent Representative of Guyana, 24 July 1994 (on file with the author).

²⁵ HRC Glenn Ashby v. Trinidad and Tobago, 21 March 2002.

²⁶ HRC Ashby v. Trinidad and Tobago, 21 March 2002, §6.2.

ances by Trinidad to the JCPC that Ashby would not be executed before he had exhausted the available remedies could not be depended upon.²⁷

“At this point, one of Mr. Ashby’s lawyers appeared in Court with a written transcript of an order of the Privy Counsel staying the execution. The order had been read to him over the telephone, having been granted at approximately 6:30 a.m. Trinidad and Tobago time (11:30 a.m. London time). Shortly thereafter, it was announced that Mr. Ashby had been hanged at 6:40 a.m.”.²⁸

The HRC met the day after the execution requesting clarifications on an urgent basis. It invited the State to send an authorised person to provide such clarifications at that session’s plenary ²⁷ “The representative of the Attorney-General of Trinidad and Tobago then informed the Privy Council that Mr. Ashby would not be executed until all possibilities of obtaining a stay of execution, including applications to the Court of Appeal in Trinidad and Tobago and the Privy Council, had been exhausted. This was recorded in writing and signed by counsel for Mr. Ashby and counsel for the Attorney-General”. HRC Ashby v. Trinidad and Tobago, 21 March 2002, §6.3. Before the Court of Appeal, however, counsel for the respondents said that the petitioner would nevertheless be hanged at 7 a.m. (noon London time) unless the Court of Appeal granted a conservatory order. “The Court of Appeal then proposed to adjourn until 11 a.m. Trinidad and Tobago time in order to seek clarification of what had taken place before the Privy Council. Lawyers for Mr. Ashby asked for a conservatory order until 11 a.m., noting that the execution had been scheduled for 7 a.m. and that counsel for the respondents had made it clear that Mr. Ashby could not rely on the assurance given to the Privy Council. The Court expressed the view that, in the interim, Mr. Ashby could rely on the assurance given to the Privy Council and declined to make a conservatory order. The Court instead decided to adjourn until 6 a.m. Lawyers for Mr. Ashby applied for an interim conservatory order until 6 a.m. but the Court denied this request. At no time did the lawyers for the State party indicate that the execution was scheduled to take place earlier than 7 a.m.”. Id. §6.4 on 14 July at 10:30 a.m. London time, the JCPC held a special sitting, preparing a document about the decision-making the previous day. The Registrar immediately faxed this document to the Court of Appeal and to counsel for both sides in Trinidad and Tobago. The JCPC also requested further clarification of the Attorney-General’s position. Having received no such clarification, the JCPC ordered a stay of execution at about 11:30 a.m. London time. The Court of Appeal reconvened at approximately the same time, 6:20 a.m. Trinidad and Tobago time. Twenty minutes later counsel again applied to the Court of Appeal for a conservatory order. This Court denied the order, once more emphasising that the petitioner could rely on the assurance given to the JCPC. Id., §6.6. According to the State party the Court of Appeals did not express the view that counsel should rely on the assurances given to the JCPC that Mr. Ashby would not be executed. “Instead, the Court expressed that it was not prepared to do anything until the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council resolved the dispute”. Id., §9.8. See also Summary Record of the 1352nd meeting: Trinidad and Tobago, 26 July 1994, CCPR/C/SR.1352, 31 July 1996, §§5-10. During this meeting Committee member Francis (Jamaica) also observed that the Clerk of the Court of Appeals had been asked to attend the meeting at 6 p.m. on 14 July in order to communicate any decision of the Court to the Government. However he did not attend this meeting and appeared only after the execution. He wondered whether or not his absence had been deliberate. He also noted that the order for execution referred to an execution time between 6 a.m. and noon and he would like to know why the petitioner had been executed so early in the morning, §§18-19.

²⁸ Six days after the execution the Permanent Mission transmitted a copy of an undated media release issued by the advocate-general of Trinidad. According to this press release all the requirements of the law and the Constitution of Trinidad and Tobago had been satisfied.

meeting of the Committee. Moreover, it decided to hold a public meeting on this issue. At this meeting it briefly addressed the information transmitted by the Permanent Mission.

“The Committee studied the said media release and regretted that no replies had been given to its specific question. It noted with concern that the State party had failed to explain why it had not complied with the Committee’s request of interim measures of protection, and that nor the proceedings under the Optional Protocol, nor the Committee was mentioned in the media release”.²⁹

Twelve days after the execution the HRC held a public meeting, on an exceptional basis, and issued a public statement in which it expressed its indignation regarding the State’s failure to comply with its provisional measures and strongly urged the State party ‘to ensure, by all means at its disposal, that situations similar to that surrounding the execution of Mr. Ashby do not recur’.³⁰ The Committee decided to continue its consideration of the case under the OP.

Normally discussions about individual cases are not public, let alone published. Yet in this situation the Committee decided to make an exception and publish its summary records.³¹ In addition it published its discussion in the Annual Report to the General Assembly.³²

During the meeting the Chairman of the Committee had pointed out that States parties had thus far respected all the Committee’s provisional measures to halt executions (in more than 100 cases).³³ Each member of the Committee made an individual statement. All of them strongly regretted the execution, and all of them, except for Francis (Jamaica), argued for a strongly worded response. Aguilar Urbina (Costa Rica), for instance, considered that Trinidad and Tobago had carried out an extrajudicial execution and the Committee should react strongly.³⁴ El Shafei (Egypt) stressed that the other States parties to the OP should take up the issue of the serious breach by the authorities of Trinidad and Tobago of their obligations.³⁵ Sadi (Jordan) considered that Mr. Ashby had been the victim of a very grave miscarriage of justice. Following the execution ‘there was no hope of being able to remedy any mistakes that might have been committed during his trial’. ‘The authorities owed the Committee an explanation, but they owed to Mr. Ashby’s family even more’.³⁶ Francis (Jamaica) ‘particularly regretted’ the State’s behaviour ‘as he himself was from the Caribbean’.³⁷ Bán (Hungary) ‘shared the sorrow and indignation of the other members of the Committee’. The HRC should indeed ‘insist on the need to clarify under what circumstances and for what reasons it had taken place’. ‘That information was very impor-

²⁹ HRC Summary Record of the 1352nd meeting: Trinidad and Tobago, 26 July 1994, CCPR/C/SR.1352, 31 July 1996, §10.

³⁰ HRC Ashby v. Trinidad and Tobago, 21 March 2002, §3.4.

³¹ HRC Summary Record of the 1352nd meeting: Trinidad and Tobago, 26 July 1994.

³² See A/49/40, §§410–411. During the special session Higgins had noted that the Committee had decided to adopt a new format for its Annual Report that ‘would highlight the cooperation or lack of co-operation by a State party, whether in regard to submission of reports or communications’. In that light the case of Mr. Ashby ‘should be given a prominent place in the annual report to be adopted at the end of the current session’. HRC Summary Record of the 1352nd meeting: Trinidad and Tobago, 26 July 1994, §39.

³³ HRC Summary Record of the 1352nd meeting: Trinidad and Tobago, 26 July 1994, §2.

³⁴ Id., §12.

³⁵ Id., §31.

³⁶ Id., §32.

³⁷ Id., §17.

tant, as it could prevent the recurrence of such incidence”. The HRC should continue its investigation and seek assurances of non-repetition.³⁸

With regard to Trinidad’s media release following the execution, Higgins pointed out that ‘(t)he media release was in no way a reply to the Committee: it was, quite simply, an insult’. She also expressed her concern about the situation of two other petitioners, Guerra and Wallen, and pointed out that the Committee should press the authorities to comply with the provisional measures in their cases. She pointed out that the State was bound to respect the provisional measures on behalf of Guerra and Wallen and other cases.³⁹

Prado Vallejo (Ecuador) equally pointed out: “Others besides Mr. Ashby were awaiting execution in Trinidad and Tobago, and it was to be hoped that the authorities would fulfil their obligations towards them. It was also to be hoped that the State party would understand the gravity of its actions and in future honour its commitments in good faith”.⁴⁰ He noted that the State ‘had not honoured its obligations under the Covenant and the Optional Protocol’ and ‘committed a flagrant violation of article 6 of the Covenant’.⁴¹

Pocar (Italy) stated that each State had ‘the legal obligation to cooperate with the Committee when it considered communications concerning that State party, and at the very least it must allow it to examine those communications in the most effective possible manner’.

“That was an obligation which the State party had to fulfil in good faith. As to the Covenant, under article 39, the Committee established its own rules of procedure, and no State party had ever contested any of the provisions of those rules, including rule 86. By ignoring those provisions, Trinidad and Tobago had clearly prevented the Committee from examining the communication of Mr. Ashby in the most effective way”.⁴²

Higgins (UK) drew particular attention to Article 1 OP and pointed out that the Committee ‘was clearly not in a position to consider a communication under the normal procedure if its author was dead’. She noted that ‘if the Committee had been able to consider the communication under the usual conditions, it might have concluded that the Covenant had not been violated by the State party’.⁴³

“One thing, however, was certain: Trinidad and Tobago had violated the provisions of both the Covenant and the Optional Protocol. With respect to the Covenant, no matter what the merits of Mr. Ashby’s complaint, it was clear that the State party had violated article 6, given that it had ignored the guarantees called for by the Optional Protocol. The State party had also violated that instrument by refusing to cooperate with the Committee, particularly by failing to reply to the questions asked and to cooperate more generally with the Committee’s procedure”.⁴⁴

Thus Higgins duly noted the link to the seriousness of the harm risked, pointing out that ignoring provisional measures and executing the petitioner pending the proceedings ignoring the Committee’s provisional measures, was in itself a violation of Article 6 (right to life), ‘no matter what the merits’ of the petition.⁴⁵ Condemning the execution she proposed that the Committee would ³⁸ Id., §37.

³⁹ Id., §§24-29.

⁴⁰ Id., §33.

⁴¹ Ibid.

⁴² HRC Summary Record of the 1352nd meeting: Trinidad and Tobago, 26 July 1994, §22.

⁴³ Id., §24.

⁴⁴ Id., §27.

⁴⁵ Ibid.

‘strongly assert that such incident should be avoided in the future’ and that the State ‘was bound to grant the Committee’s request under rule 86’ in other cases.⁴⁶

Wennergren (Sweden) considered that the State had committed ‘a flagrant violation of the Committee’s rules of procedure’. Nevertheless he considered, different from Higgins, that ‘it was only subsequently that the Committee would be able to determine whether or not article 6 of the Covenant had been violated’.⁴⁷

The Chairman proposed the adoption of a text expressing the Committee’s deep concern and regret. The ‘attitude of the authorities was in flagrant breach of their obligations under the Covenant and the Optional Protocol’. He suggested that the Committee would ‘deplore the State party’s failure to make available a representative for the meetings at which Mr. Ashby’s case would be considered’. The Committee could recall that the State was bound to fulfil its obligations under the Covenant and the OP. It should also ‘insist on the need for a favourable reply by the authorities of Trinidad and Tobago’ to the provisional measures on behalf of two other petitioners as well.⁴⁸ Lallah (Mauritius) supported this proposal and Mavrommatis (Cyprus) said that the Committee should also issue a press release. He agreed that the case should be mentioned in the Annual Report ‘but would go even further: that case could be the subject of a special section of the report, given the grave consequences of the State party’s failure to cooperate’.⁴⁹ Francis considered that the Committee ‘should avoid using verbs such as “condemn” and “deplore” in the text to be adopted’. ‘It was true that the authorities of Trinidad and Tobago had committed irreparable damage, but the Committee should try to use wording that was generally acceptable to its members, and he was in favour of using measured language’.⁵⁰ The Chairman concluded that the Secretariat would be asked to draft a decision based on his proposal and the suggestions by members of the Committee.⁵¹

Thus the Committee’s position towards the obligation to respect its provisional measures first became clear with its immediate response to the execution of Glenn Ashby in 1994, also showing the position of individual members. Its first decision on the merits that fully establishes its position, however, is Piandiong et al. v. the Philippines (2000), not Ashby v. Trinidad that was only decided on the merits in 2002.⁵² The executions rendered examination by the HRC moot and the expression of its Views ‘nugatory and futile’. Flouting its provisional measures, ‘especially by irreversible measures such as the execution of the alleged victim’ undermined the protection of Covenant rights under the OP.⁵³ To underscore its indignation the HRC has not waited until its decision on the merits, but exceptionally published its Summary Records discussing an individual case (following the execution of Ashby) and on several occasions issued press releases condemning executions.⁵⁴

⁴⁶ Id., §29.

⁴⁷ Id., §35.

⁴⁸ Id., §41. This concerned the case of Guerra and Wallen also pending before the HRC.

⁴⁹ Id., §§42-43.

⁵⁰ Id., §44.

⁵¹ Id., §45.

⁵² HRC Dante Piandiong, Jesus Morillos and Archie Bulan v. the Philippines, 19 October 2000.

⁵³ See HRC Dante Piandiong, Jesus Morillos and Archie Bulan (deceased) (submitted by Alexander Padilla and Ricardo III Sunga) v. the Philippines, 19 October 2000. See also Mansaraj et al.; Gborie et al. and Sesay et al. v. Sierra Leone, 16 July 2001 and Glenn Ashby v. Trinidad and Tobago, 21 March 2002. In addition see Barno Saidova v. Tajikistan, 8 July 2004.

⁵⁴ See e.g. press release, ‘Human Rights Committee deplores the execution of six individuals in Uzbekistan’, 24 July 2003. The petitioners who were executed were Muzaffar Mirzaev (case 1170/2003), Shukrat Andasbaev (case 1166/2003), Ulugbek Ashov (case 1165/2003), Ilkhon Babadzhonov and Maksud Ismailov (case 1162/2003), and Azamat Uteev (case 1150/2003).

Thus, by the time it published its decision on the merits in Ashby (2002) it had already published Piandiong v. the Philippines (2000)⁵⁵ and the case against Sierra Leone (2001), involving executions that took place subsequent to that of Glenn Ashby.⁵⁶ Apart from violations of Article 14(3)(c) and (5) ICCPR (undue delay), the HRC found a violation of Article 6(1) and (2) for carrying out the execution when his sentence was still under challenge. It discussed closely the State's breach of the principle of good faith and the obligations under the OP.

“[H]aving regard to the fact that the representative of the Attorney-General informed the Privy Council that Mr. Ashby would not be executed until all possibilities of obtaining a stay of execution had been exhausted, the carrying out of Mr. Ashby's sentence notwithstanding that assurance constituted a breach of the principle of good faith which governs all States in their discharge of obligations under international treaties, including the Covenant. The carrying out of the execution of Mr. Ashby when the execution of the sentence was still under challenge constituted a violation of article 6, paragraphs 1 and 2, of the Covenant”.⁵⁷

The State had breached its obligations under the OP ‘by proceeding to execute Mr. Ashby before the Committee could conclude its examination of the communication, and the formulation of its Views’. It found the State's act ‘particularly inexcusable’ because the HRC had used provisional measures specifically requesting it to refrain from executing Mr. Ashby pending the determination of the case.

“The behaviour of the State party represents a shocking failure to demonstrate even the most elementary good faith required of a State party to the Covenant and the Optional Protocol”.

When Sierra Leone executed twelve petitioners in spite of the Committee's provisional measures, the HRC expressed ‘its indignation’ not only through its Permanent Mission in New York but also through the Office of the Secretary General's Special Representative in Freetown. At the same time it referred to the State's obligations under the reporting procedure of Article 40 ICCPR.⁵⁸

Sometimes the HRC also has a meeting with officials of the State party to follow up on an execution.⁵⁹

In Piandiong the HRC not only used several paragraphs of its View to stress the serious nature of the violation, it also entered these paragraphs in its Annual Report under the separate heading ‘Breach of Optional Protocol obligations’.⁶⁰ Harrington points out that by doing so the HRC put all UN member States ‘on notice as to the severity with which the body created by states to supervise them now viewed a state's failure to abide by a request for interim measures’.⁶¹

⁵⁵ HRC Dante Piandiong, Jesus Morillos and Archie Bulan v. the Philippines, 19 October 2000.

⁵⁶ HRC Mansaraj et al.; Gborie et al. and Sesay et al. v. Sierra Leone, 16 July 2001.

⁵⁷ HRC Glenn Ashby v. Trinidad and Tobago, 21 March 2002.

⁵⁸ HRC Public Decision, 4 November 1998, CCPR/C/64/D/839/1998, 4 November 1998. For the View on the merits, see: HRC Mansaraj et al.; Gborie et al. and Sesay et al. v. Sierra Leone, 16 July 2001.

⁵⁹ Two weeks after the execution of the three petitioners in Piandiong, for instance, the Special Rapporteur for New Communications and the Vice-Chairperson met with the representative of the State party. See Dante Piandiong, Jesus Morillos and Archie Bulan (deceased) (submitted by Alexander Padilla and Ricardo III Sunga) v. the Philippines, 19 October 2000.

⁶⁰ See A/56/40 (2001), §§128-130.

⁶¹ Harrington (2003), p. 72.

2.2.4 Follow-up by the HRC on halting expulsion and extradition

In Weiss v. Austria (2003) the HRC devoted a separate heading to the State's failure to respect its provisional measures. It found, in the circumstances of the case, that the State breached its obligations under the OP by extraditing the petitioner before the Committee could address his allegation of irreparable harm to his rights under the ICCPR. It specifically noted that it had offered the State the opportunity to convince it that provisional measures were not warranted, but rather than taking this opportunity the State simply ignored the provisional measures and went ahead with the extradition.

"In particular, the Committee is concerned by the sequence of events in this case in that, rather than requesting interim measures of protection directly upon an assumption that irreversible harm could follow the author's extradition, it first sought, under Rule 86 of its Rules of Procedure, the State party's views on the irreparability of harm. In so doing, the State party could have demonstrated to the Committee that extradition would not result in irreparable harm".⁶²

In fact this specification indicated bad faith on the part of the State.

The HRC specifically responded to the State's non-compliance in Ahani. In August the Chairperson to the HRC expressed 'great regret' at the deportation, seeking a written explanation about the reasons that led to this disregard for its provisional measures. A few days later the Committee followed up this action through its Special Rapporteur, acting under its Rule on provisional measures, who requested the State 'to monitor closely the situation and treatment of the author subsequent to his deportation to Iran and to make such representations to the Government of the Islamic Republic of Iran that were deemed pertinent in order to prevent violations of the author's rights under articles 6 and 7 of the Covenant'.⁶³ In its View in the Ahani case the HRC reiterated its conclusion that the State breached its obligations under the OP by deporting the petitioner before the Committee's determination of his claim.⁶⁴ The State had mainly referred to its obligations under domestic law.⁶⁵ At the same time it pointed out that it 'usually responded ⁶² See HRC Weiss v. Austria, 3 April 2003, §7.1. See also Chapter XIII (Protection).

⁶³ See HRC Mansour Ahani v. Canada, 29 March 2004, §5.1.

⁶⁴ Id., §11.

⁶⁵ Weiser (2004) argues that 'current judicial approaches do not give full and consistent credence to international obligations undertaken by Canada, nor do they offer sufficient guidance on the effect of international human rights treaties on domestic laws', p. 114. 'There appears to be no presumption of conformity' with regard to international obligations unless the court is faced with 'legislation enacted specifically in furtherance of a treaty'. She refers to the statement of the Supreme Court in Suresh that 'our concern is not with Canada's international obligations qua obligations'. The court simply looks at international law as evidence of Canada's principles of fundamental justice rather than 'as controlling in itself', p. 133. She offers explanations for Canada's attitude towards international legal obligations. There are few countries, she notes, facing 'as many constitutional obstacles as Canada to the successful integration of domestic and international law'. Apart from the role of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the fact that treaties are not considered self-executing she refers to the fact that treaty ratification is an executive act and 'the extent of Parliamentary scrutiny in the process of treaty adherence is limited', p. 122. The assessment and considerations on which a decision to ratify is based 'remains an internal document and so, non-governmental actors (including courts) face obvious difficulties in trying to identify the international obligations underlying a particular domestic law'. Subsequently there is 'no systematic review' either 'of new legislation for consistency with treaty obligations', pp. 127-128. She points out that recently 'other countries with Westminster-favourably' to requests for provisional measures.⁶⁶ The HRC stressed that Canada was under an obligation 'to avoid similar violations in the future, including by taking appropriate steps to ensure that the Committee's requests for interim measures of protection will be respected'.⁶⁷

2.2.5 One of the methods of follow-up: sending reminders

In some cases it was also important to confirm to the State that a case was still pending before the HRC. In Shaw v. Jamaica (1998)⁶⁸ counsel wrote to the Committee, on 18 May 1988, that the State had threatened not to further postpone the execution 'unless counsel could intimate,' by 20 May 1988, that he would make an application to the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights.⁶⁹ Counsel pointed out: 'Whilst Mr. Shaw's motion is pending before the UN Human Rights Committee, I cannot submit an application to the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights. In the circumstances, it is imperative that the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights make strong representations to the Jamaican authorities that Mr. Shaw's matter is still pending before the Human Rights Committee and has been afforded Rule 86 protection'. The HRC often repeats its provisional measures. An example is Junior Leslie v. Jamaica (1998).⁷⁰ In this case there was a real and immediate danger of the petitioner's execution. After all, he was only two months away from having been on death row for five years. Because of the JCPC case law, counsel believed that the Jamaican Government was prioritising Leslie's case with a view to executing him before the period of five years would elapse.⁷¹ style Governments have taken steps to rectify similar situations', p. 123. In practice federalism is another obstacle. She points out that 'while the federal Executive alone is empowered to enter into international treaties, it has no power to implement them in areas of provincial jurisdiction'. By contrast, in other federal States 'such as Australia, the federal government retains residual power to legislate a furtherance of a treaty, even where the subject matter typically falls outside federal jurisdiction', p. 124. See also Chapter XVII on official responses.

⁶⁶ See HRC Mansour Ahani v. Canada, 29 March 2004, §5.3. In fact until then it had respected the Committee's provisional measures four times and ignored them three times (all in the immigration context). The other time the HRC used provisional measures related to Article 27 ICCPR and indigenous peoples. Canada ignored these as well. See further the discussion in this section on its compliance with the provisional measures by CAT and the Inter-American Commission.

⁶⁷ HRC Mansour Ahani v. Canada, 29 March 2004, §12.

⁶⁸ HRC Steve Shaw v. Jamaica, 2 April 1998.

⁶⁹ He enclosed a letter of 15 March 1998 by the Secretary of the Governor General: 'execution will not be further postponed unless intimation in writing is given to the Governor General that an application will be made to the second International Human Rights Body, in this case the Inter American Commission on Human Rights. The intimation must be made by May 20, so you may wish to act accordingly'.

⁷⁰ HRC Junior Leslie v. Jamaica, 31 July 1998.

⁷¹ In this light he requested the HRC to repeat its provisional measures and the HRC did so four days after it received counsel's fax and five days before the scheduled hearing. Another example is Reece v. Jamaica (disc. 1993): the first Rule 86/91 was transmitted to the State on 25 November 1987 (based on a decision of 12 November 1987); it was repeated as part of the admissibility decision of 30 March 1988, interlocutory decision of 2 November 1989 and letter of 24 March 1992, again to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, with a copy to the Permanent Mission of Jamaica in Geneva. Lloyd Reece v. Jamaica, admissibility decision of 30 March 1989; interlocutory decision of 2 November 1999; Letter by the UN Secretariat of 24 March 1992 to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Jamaica concerning Lloyd Reece, 247/1987. Eventually the HRC

2.2.6 Follow-up by CAT

In Brada v. France (2005) CAT used strong wording. It stressed that the State party ‘seriously failed’ in its obligations under Article 22 ICAT ‘because it prevented the Committee from fully examining a complaint relating to a violation of the Convention, rendering action by the Committee futile and its comments worthless’.⁷² In Agiza v. Sweden (2005) it addressed, in passing, one reason that States might forward for ignoring provisional measures.⁷³ After pointing out that by making the declaration under Article 22 ICAT, recognizing the right of individual petition, a State ‘assumes an obligation to cooperate fully with the Committee’, it observed that ‘its procedures are sufficiently flexible and its powers sufficiently broad to prevent an abuse of process in a particular case’.⁷⁴

Pending the case the Committee, through its Special Rapporteur, follows up by recalling the State’s obligation to respect provisional measures and requesting clarifications on the ‘current status and whereabouts’ of the petitioner extradited in disregard of the Committee’s provisional measures.⁷⁵ During the Committee’s sessions the situation may also be discussed. In this case, for instance, CAT had sent a letter expressing ‘grave concern about the manner in which the State party acted in the case’ and requesting timely information on her ‘current whereabouts and state of well-being’.⁷⁶

After finding a violation of Articles 3 and 22 ICAT in Tebourski v. France (2007) the Committee wished to be informed, among others, of the steps taken ‘to make reparation for the breach of article 3 of the Convention, and to determine, in consultation with the country (also a State party to the Convention) to which he was deported, the complainant’s current whereabouts and the state of his well-being’.⁷⁷

In Dar v. Norway (2007) CAT had used provisional measures in April 2004. Early June Norway informed the Committee that it would not comply, but at the end of that month it added that it would refrain from proceeding with the expulsion to Pakistan until the court of first instance had reviewed the case.⁷⁸ In September 2005 he was expelled to Pakistan after all.⁷⁹ In its admissibility decision, two months later, CAT observed that ‘in ratifying the Convention and voluntarily accepting the Committee’s competence under article 22’, the State ‘undertook to cooperate with it in good faith in applying the procedure’. It pointed out that compliance with the provisional measure called for ‘was essential in order to protect the person in question from irreparable harm, which could, moreover, nullify the end result of the proceedings before the discontinued the case after it received a confirmation by the petitioner’s counsel that he wished to withdraw his application. Letter from counsel to the UN Secretariat of 28 April 1993 (on file with the author). Yet another example is Christopher Brown v. Jamaica, 23 March 1999; fax by counsel of 23 December 1998; response by Secretariat of 31 December 1998; faxes by Amnesty International of 19 and 20 January 1999 pointing out that his execution while his petition is pending before the HRC would violate ‘the country’s international obligations and his rights to a remedy’; fax by counsel of 21 January 1999 and Note Verbale to the State of 22 January 1999 reminding it of the earlier provisional measure (on file with the author).

⁷² CAT Mafhoud Brada v. France, 17 May 2005, §6.1.

⁷³ See Chapter XVII (Official responses), section 3.3.

⁷⁴ CAT Ahmed Hussein Mustafa Kamil Agiza v. Sweden, 20 May 2005, §13.10.

⁷⁵ CAT Elif Pelit v. Azerbaijan, 1 May 2007, §8.2.

⁷⁶ Id., §8.4. The State party subsequently did provide updated information and noted that a member of its embassy had had private conversations with her, §§8.19.4.

⁷⁷ CAT Adel Tebourski v. France, 1 May 2007, §10.

⁷⁸ CAT Nadeem Ahmad Dar v. Norway, 11 May 2007, §1.2.

⁷⁹ Id., §1.3.

Committee'. It explicitly 'invited' the State 'to comply with the Committee's request for interim measures of protection'.⁸⁰ On the merits it found that Norway had remedied the breach of its obligations under Article 22, half a year after the expulsion that CAT's provisional measures had meant to halt, by facilitating the safe return of the petitioner and granting him a residence permit for three years.⁸¹ Thus it appears that the Committee invited remedial action by the State pending the proceedings and when this action was undertaken, rewarded the State by not finding a violation.

2.2.7 'Seguimiento' in the Inter-American system

Reiterating and specifying provisional measures are just two of the methods the adjudicators have in dealing with States that fail to implement the obligations indicated in these measures. The Inter-American Commission, for instance, has several other (more or less resource intensive) tools to deal with non-compliance: on-site visits, country reports, discussion of the non-compliance in its Annual Reports, case law, renewed precautionary measures and requesting the Court to order provisional measures.⁸²

The OAS is still politicised and its General Assembly is not inclined to clearly support the Inter-American Commission and Court in their monitoring and follow-up of compliance with State obligations under the Convention and Declaration.⁸³ In this sense, the Inter-American system differs from the European human rights system. Comparatively speaking, the political bodies of the Council of Europe seem more inclined to support the ECHR both in its political statements and in its financial contribution.

Since 1998 the Commission has established the practice of seguimiento or follow-up on its case law. Seguimiento is the creation of a follow-up policy after the final decision. This way the Commission tries to monitor the activities of States with regard to its recommendations. Follow-up seems to be one of the better ways to increase effectiveness, both of precautionary and provisional measures and of decisions on the merits.⁸⁴ During the stage of seguimiento States sometimes reply that they need more time. Sometimes they say that they take it very seriously but chose not to act on the Commission's final report.⁸⁵ Normally States do not send the information on their compliance with provisional measures in time. The information they do send usually is very general and rather vague. In response, the Inter-American Commission's decisions on pre-

⁸⁰ Id., §6.7 (referring to its established case law in this respect).

⁸¹ CAT Nadeem Ahmad Dar v. Norway, 11 May 2007, §§16.4, 17 and 18.

⁸² The African Commission has also sent its urgent appeals in the context of individual complaints, not just to the State concerned, but also to authorities of the African Union. See e.g. ACHPR Interights (on behalf of Husaini et al.) v. Nigeria, April 2005, provisional measures ('urgent appeal') of 6 February 2002 'to His Excellency Amara Essy of the African Union, respectfully urging him to draw the attention of the President of the Federal Republic of Nigeria to the Commission's request and to positively respond thereof', §14. The next month the Director of the Political Affairs Department of the AU wrote to the Chairman of the African Commission that the Secretary General of the AU had formally taken up the matter, §18. See further §22.

⁸³ For some pointed comments and analysis on the failure of the OAS political organs see e.g. IACHR Caesar v. Trinidad and Tobago, Judgment of 11 March 2005, individual opinion of judge Ventura Robles. In general see Gómez (1998b), pp. 173-197.

⁸⁴ Similar to Article 46 of its new Rules, dealing with the follow-up of compliance with its final reports, Article 25(3) of its Rules confirms the Inter-American Commission's increasing practice to follow up compliance with precautionary measures.

⁸⁵ Interview by author with Juan Mendez, Washington D.C., 17 October 2001.

cautionary measures have now become very detailed so as to invite specific responses with regard to their implementation.

The Inter-American Commission also makes use of press releases stating its grave concern about impending executions ignoring the fact that the case is pending before the Inter-American human rights system. Such an execution would deprive the alleged victim of his 'fundamental right to have his complaint effectively determined by the Commission' and would cause him irreparable harm. It would be incompatible with the international human rights obligations under the OAS Charter and related instruments.⁸⁶

The case of Rudolph Baptiste is interesting because the Inter-American Commission also used the tool of precautionary measures as part of its Report on the merits. On 13 April 2000 the Commission decided to publish its report in this case. One of its recommendations in this report was a request to Grenada to adopt precautionary measures to stay his execution.⁸⁷ At the time of the publication of Annual Report 2000 the Commission had not received any reply yet from Grenada.⁸⁸ What is interesting here is that, according to the information provided in the Annual Report, the Commission requested precautionary measures as part of its report on the merits in a case that it had not sent to the Court for its consideration, as Grenada has not recognized the competence of the Court. In other words, given the use of precautionary measures, the case is not closed yet, while at the same time it can never go any further.⁸⁹

At the end of April 2000 armed inmates in the Bogotá Model Prison clashed, leaving 25 persons dead and 17 wounded. Subsequently political prisoners continued to be threatened by paramilitary prisoners wearing AUC bracelets. The Commission took precautionary measures on their behalf in May 2000.⁹⁰

"The threats made by paramilitary inmates against political prisoners in that penitentiary materialised in an attack last July with a high toll of deaths and injuries, even though the Commission's precautionary measures were still in effect". During its on-site visit, 7-13 December 2001, at the invitation of the administration of President Pastrana, the Commission visited the facilities at the Model Prison 'to check on compliance with the protective measures it had issued'. During its visit the Commission did not find full compliance, although it appreciated the appointment of a new director and hoped that he would be given 'the appropriate means to fulfill his functions'. It obtained a pledge by the Government to begin to build a separate partition by the end of that month in order to prevent new acts of violence. Both in a press release concluding its ⁸⁶ See e.g. CIDH press release 7/02 'IACHR calls upon the United States to postpone execution of juvenile offender Alexander Williams, 19 February 2002. Obviously it has also used press releases to publicly condemn executions that have taken place nevertheless. See e.g. CIDH press release 33/08 'IACHR condemns execution of José Ernesto Medellín', (condemning the execution 'in contempt of' the Commission's precautionary measures and its report on the merits in which it had concluded that the failure to fulfil the obligations under Article 36(1) VCCR did not meet the minimum standards of due process and a fair trial required under Articles XVIII and XXVI of the American Declaration. It reminded the State in its press release that in its report on the merits it had pointed out that if the State executed the victim based on those proceedings, 'it would commit an irreparable violation of his fundamental right to life, protected by Article I of the American Declaration').

⁸⁷ CIDH Baptiste v. Grenada, 13 April 2000.

⁸⁸ CIDH Annual Report 2000, §31.

⁸⁹ Id., §31.

⁹⁰ Id., §17.

visit and in its Annual Report the Commission emphasized that it would ‘continue to closely follow security conditions in the jail and compliance with the precautionary measures’.⁹¹

The Commission’s precautionary measures on behalf of the 9-11 detainees at Guantanamo Bay have been confirmed and expanded several times and eventually the Commission followed this up with a Resolution of July 2006 concluding that the non-compliance had ‘resulted in irreparable prejudice to the fundamental rights of the detainees at Guantanamo Bay including the rights to liberty and to humane treatment’. The Resolution urged the US, among others, to close Guantanamo without delay.⁹²

Sometimes the Commission issues press releases specifically to reinforce its precautionary measures. At other times it simply reacts to specific situations of gross human rights violations such as the murder of a human rights defender. In a press statement of 15 February 2002, for instance, the Commission condemned the torture and assassination in Colombia of human rights defender Ms. María del Carmen Florez on the previous day.⁹³ The Commission referred to a General Assembly resolution of June 2001 deploring acts directly or indirectly preventing or hampering the tasks of human rights defenders. The Assembly urged the member States to intensify their efforts to adopt the necessary measures guaranteeing the lives, personal integrity and freedom of expression of these human rights defenders. It also instructed the Permanent Council to follow up its resolution and to present to the General Assembly information about State compliance with it. In light of this resolution⁹⁴ the Commission informed the OAS Permanent Council of the extra-judicial execution of Ms. Florez.⁹⁵

The Inter-American Commission has institutionalised its capacity to deal with the situation of human rights defenders, thereby facilitating the monitoring the implementation of its precautionary measures and the provisional measures of the Court. In December 2001 the Executive Secretariat of the Commission established the ‘Human Rights Defenders Functional Unit’. As the President of the Commission noted in his presentation of the Commissions Annual Report of 2001, ‘(t)his Unit will be in charge of collecting information on the plight of human rights defenders in the America’s, maintaining contact with governmental and non-governmental organizations, and coordinating the Secretariat’s work in this area. This initiative should contribute to more comprehensive knowledge of the situation and to mechanisms to help the OAS work more effectively and with greater coordination’.⁹⁶

⁹¹ CIDH Press release 33/01 ‘Inter-American Commission on Human Rights concludes its visit to the Republic of Colombia’, 13 December 2001, §18 and Annual Report 2001, Chapter IV, §16.

⁹² See CIDH Guantanamo Bay case, precautionary measures of 23 July 2002, 18 March 2003, 29 July 2004 and 28 October 2005. CIDH Resolution 1/06 in Press Release 27/06, ‘Inter-American Commission urges to close Guantanamo without delay’, 28 July 2006, available at <<http://www.cidh.org/Comunicados/English/2006/27.06eng.htm>> (consulted 6 October 2006). See further Chapter VIII (Ensuring procedural rights).

⁹³ She was working on the alleged forced disappearance of Alcides Torres Arias whose case was pending before the Commission. Ms. Florez was preparing the next hearing before the Commission.

⁹⁴ General Assembly resolution AG/RES.1818, (XXXI-O/01), June 2001.

⁹⁵ CIDH ‘IACHR deplores the assassination of Maria del Carmen Florez in Colombia’, press release 6/02, 15 February 2002. In English the Inter-American Commission uses the same acronym as the Court: IACHR.

⁹⁶ Address by Dr. Juan E. Méndez, President of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, upon presenting the CIDH Annual Report for 2001 to the Committee on Juridical and Political Affairs of the Permanent Council of the OAS, 30 April 2002 (<www.cidh.org/discursos/04.30.02.eng.htm>).

The Commission considers that if it publishes a final report or if the Court publishes a decision and for a long time the government does not do anything about implementation, the only option it has under the Convention is to report this to the OAS General Assembly. In order to prepare a report for the General Assembly the Commission introduced a 're-opening of the issue' for the purposes of follow-up and implementation. It may, for instance, call a hearing and ask the government what it is doing about the recommendations that had been sent to them more than a year before. Many governments have protested that the Commission does not have jurisdiction to do this but the Commission believes it is actually part of its jurisdiction, being an implied power as the Commission has to protect the integrity of the system.⁹⁷ While this relates to its follow-up on decisions on the merits and not its precautionary measures, it does show the Commission's resolve indeed to protect the integrity of the system.

The Inter-American Court has also engaged in follow-up. It has done so both in the context of its judgments on the merits and reparations and in the context of its provisional measures. It needs to know the extent to which States have complied with its rulings in order to monitor compliance with the undertaking made by the States 'to comply with the judgment of the Court in any case to which they are parties' (under Article 68) and, in particular, to inform the General Assembly of 'the cases in which a State has not complied with its judgments' (Article 65 ACHR).⁹⁸ During 2007 the Inter-American Court started a new procedure of holding private hearings on monitoring compliance with its judgments.⁹⁹

The hearings that are held in order to decide on the use, maintenance, expansion or termination of provisional measures are important in themselves: 'besides calling public attention to the case', a hearing 'gives the provisional measures procedure a solemnity that enhanced the chances of compliance and enables the Court to better assess the need for such measures'.¹⁰⁰

In its Orders for provisional measures the Court requires the State and the Commission to report to it on the implementation of its provisional measures.¹⁰¹ Preparing the periodic reports on ⁹⁷ Interview by author with Juan Mendez, Washington D.C., 17 October 2001.

⁹⁸ "Accordingly, the Court must monitor that the States concerned comply with the reparations it has ordered, before informing the OAS General Assembly about any failure to comply with its decisions. The Court's monitoring of compliance with its decisions implies, first, that it must request information from the State on the actions carried out to implement compliance, and then obtain the comments of the Commission and of the victims or their representatives. When the Court has received this information, it can assess whether the State has complied with its judgment, guide the State's actions to that effect, and comply with its obligation to inform the General Assembly, in the terms of Article 65 of the Convention". IACHR Annual Report 2006, pp. 41-42.

⁹⁹ IACHR Annual Report 2007, p. 40. As pointed out by Buergenthal (1994), pp. 91-92, already before an initial Order for provisional measures is made, 'the mere threat of a hearing' would tend 'to make the State concerned more willing to adopt on its own certain protective measures it was previously unwilling to consider'. The developments since 1994 have confirmed this. The possibility of hearings has become an important tool at different stages of the proceedings before the Court and the private hearings that have in fact taken place since 2007 monitoring compliance with the Court's judgments have reportedly already had an important positive effect in the attitude of States.

¹⁰⁰ Buergenthal (1994), p. 94.

¹⁰¹ Buergenthal (1994), p. 92 notes that the Court cannot really act on the follow-up information provided by the Commission unless it is sitting. "To deal with this problem the Court in one case assigned to its own Permanent Commission the task of monitoring compliance. The Commission then began to transmit to the Court, without comment or analysis, all communications it received from the attorneys in the case relating to the provisional measures, forcing the Court to conclude

State compliance required by the Court is an enormous task for the Commission to tackle. It has to depend largely on the petitioners, usually NGOs, and it complements this, to some extent, with information gathered during on-site visits. The main problem in countries like Colombia, is losing contact with the beneficiaries. Local NGOs may be under death threats themselves and/or, because of an ongoing conflict, the Commission cannot send people to a particular area to gather information. Sometimes the Commission simply has to inform the Court that it is not in a position to give information on the current situation.¹⁰² Information on the situation of the beneficiaries of precautionary and provisional measures is essential for any follow-up. Without such information these measures cannot be effective. Especially in cases of threats and internal displacement effectiveness is fundamentally related to access. The intended beneficiaries are often located in remote places to which the Inter-American Commission, the petitioners or even the UNHCR have no access.¹⁰³ Without access to the beneficiaries it proves very problematic to monitor a State's compliance with provisional measures. Obviously, when the Commission and the petitioners cannot find the victims, the Commission is unable to monitor compliance and without follow-up the effectiveness decreases both of its own precautionary measures and of the provisional measures ordered by the Court.

The Court also holds hearings for a follow-up on its provisional measures. It has specifically followed up on promises made by States. In the Peace Community case Colombia had pointed out both in 2000 and in 2002 that it was seeking to design an early warning system to be coordinated between the Community and the public security forces in order to be effective.¹⁰⁴ While it had already announced this in 2000, in 2002 it was still at the intentional stage. In 2002 the Court ordered that, in agreement with the beneficiaries or their representatives, the State must also establish a mechanism for continuous surveillance and permanent security in the Community, in conformity with the terms of the Court's Order.¹⁰⁵

In its Order for provisional measures in the mass expulsion case the Court expressed its appreciation about the State's willingness – shown at the public hearing – to improve its procedures and practices.¹⁰⁶ This remark is important for the Court's follow-up of its provisional measures because at that stage it may refer to the State's promise and enquire about the results. The State assured the Court that with regard to the other people protected by the provisional measures, no deportations had occurred.

In Orders to halt an execution the Inter-American Court provides the rationale for its use of provisional measures: 'if the State were to execute the alleged victims, this would lead to an irreparable situation, as well as constitute conduct incompatible with the object and purpose of the Convention'.¹⁰⁷ This type of motivation may enhance compliance. The same applies to clarity: it that it was being asked to perform functions it was not really competent to perform under the Convention. As a result the Court returned the matter to the Commission for further monitoring. The matter was never resubmitted to the Court". The matter was that of Bustios-Rojas (Peru). See Order of 8 August 1990 for the Court's decision to monitor itself and Order of 17 January 1991 returning the matter to the Commission.

¹⁰² See also Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

¹⁰³ See also Chapter XIII (Protection), section 3 on beneficiaries.

¹⁰⁴ IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order of 24 November 2000.

¹⁰⁵ IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order of 18 June 2002.

¹⁰⁶ IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic, Order of 18 August 2000.

¹⁰⁷ See e.g. IACHR James et al., Order of 26 November 2001 (12th 'Considering' clause); Raxcacó et al., 30 August 2004 (9th 'Considering' clause) and Boyce and Joseph v. Barbados, 25 November 2004 (9th 'Considering' clause).

must be very clear to the State what is expected from it. If the responses of States on previous occasions leave much to be desired, the Court's follow-up will be more specific.¹⁰⁸

As noted, the references in its Orders to the State's reporting obligations show that the Court has incorporated some form of follow-up in its Orders themselves.¹⁰⁹ Yet in some instances the Court has also followed up the implementation of its Orders outside of the Orders themselves. In conformity with Article 65 ACHR, it informed the General Assembly of the State's failure to comply with its decisions on provisional measures. It requested the General Assembly to urge the State to comply with them. It also wished to put on record its concern about Trinidad's denunciation of the Convention, on 26 May 1998. It pointed out that this decision, which was without precedent in the history of the Inter-American human rights system, did not apply to the Court's provisional measures in this case. Finally, the Court considered that while States Parties have a right to denounce international instruments, when it concerns international human rights treaties, due to their special nature, such denunciation affects the international or regional human rights system as a whole. This particular situation justified, therefore, involvement on the part of the OAS General Assembly to request Trinidad to reconsider its decision.¹¹⁰

It appears, however, from the Court's note to the OAS Secretary General of May 1999, that the General Assembly did not properly receive the Court's request to urge Trinidad to comply with its obligations under the Convention. In this note the Court asked the Secretary General to bring its letter to the attention of the General Assembly. It quoted Article 65 and pointed out that 'it falls to the General Assembly to take formal note of the recommendations which the Court makes in its Annual Report concerning non-compliance with its decisions, and to issue such comments as it may consider pertinent'. It wrote that until then all States Parties to the ACHR had complied with its Orders. Trinidad and Tobago was the 'sole exception'.¹¹¹

¹⁰⁸ This was the case already early on the Court's practice. Buergethal (1994), p. 82 refers to the matter of Bustíos Rojas regarding the protection of witnesses to the killing of a journalist in Peru, in which the IACHR, in its second Order, 17 January 1991 responded to Peru's reported manner of compliance with the Court's Order. Peru had informed the Court that it had 'established a system of military liaisons whom the protected persons could contact'. In its follow-up the Court ordered Peru to supplement this system 'in three Peruvian localities with a comparable civilian liaison system'. 'This part of the order can be traced to the concern expressed by the Commission that the persons to be protected, some of whom were in hiding, accused various military officers of having been the killers. The witnesses might therefore have had a justified fear of military liaison officers affiliated with the very units that could have been involved in the murder and attempted cover-up'. IACHR Bustíos Rojas (Peru), Order of 17 January 1991. On specificity see further Chapter XIII (Protection), section 3.

¹⁰⁹ In its Order of August 1998, for example, the Court required the State to report every two weeks on the status of the appeals and scheduled executions. It also required the Commission to send its observations on these reports within two days of their receipt. It ordered both the State and the Commission to inform it immediately of any significant developments. James et al. cases, Order of 29 August 1998.

¹¹⁰ CIDH Informe Anual 1998, II (Actividades Jurisdiccionales y consultivas de la Corte), K. (Estado de Cumplimiento de las Sentencias de la Corte), §7.

¹¹¹ The Court reminded the Secretary General that, in the new structure of the General Assembly, the Presidents of the Inter-American Commission and Court (and the Inter-American Juridical Committee) could no longer orally present their Annual Reports. Instead, the Assembly only received for consideration a Resolution on the observations and recommendations to the Annual Reports approved by the Permanent Council. Both the Commission on Juridical and Political Matters and the Permanent Council, however, had omitted the Court's recommendation. Thus, the General Assembly would be ‘precluded from considering and commenting on’ the Court’s recommendation to urge Trinidad to comply with the Court’s Orders.

“It is a matter of profound concern to the Court that, in the operative part of the recommendations concerning its 1998 Annual Report, which the Commission on Juridical and Political Matters and the Permanent Council of the Organisation are forwarding to the General Assembly, no mention is made of the Court’s recommendation...”.¹¹²

The Court decided to send copies of this letter to all Ministers of Foreign Relations of the OAS member States and also to their Permanent Representatives to the OAS in Washington D.C.¹¹³ This proactive approach was considered necessary to ensure that all OAS Member States are aware of the situation. Still, the General Assembly adopted no resolution on this issue during its 1999 session.

¹¹² IACHR James et al. case, Note of the Court to His Excellency Ambassador Julio César Aráoz, President of the Permanent Council, 24 May 1999. The Court emphasised that the protection of human rights is the most important function of the OAS, ‘as has been acknowledged by Your Excellency’. The omission of the Court’s recommendation ‘affects the very essence of the Inter-American System of human rights protection, which finds its most telling expression in the binding nature of the judgements issued by the jurisdictional organ, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights’. The Court also noted that previously it had already taken steps to convince the Permanent Council, by sending two notes to its President. These notes, which the Court enclosed, remained without effect. In May 1999 the Court sent the first note to the President of the Permanent Council. This letter referred to the draft Resolution on the Court’s Annual Report that the Commission on Juridical and Political Affairs had presented to the Permanent Council. “When studying the draft Resolution that will be submitted to the General Assembly, the Court noted with some surprise that, whilst its second “considering” makes mention to [sic] Article 65 and to the duty of the Court to report the cases in which a State fails to comply with its judgements, the operative exhortation to the Republic of Trinidad and Tobago to comply with the Orders of the Court has been omitted”. IACHR James et al. case, Note of the Court to His Excellency Ambassador Julio César Aráoz, President of the Permanent Council, 24 May 1999. The Court emphasised the importance of the support of the highest organ of the OAS to help safeguard the effectiveness of the Inter-American system. It requested the inclusion in the draft Resolution of an operative paragraph in which ‘the General Assembly urges the Republic of Trinidad and Tobago to comply’ with the Court’s Orders for provisional measures. Such inclusion would be ‘in compliance with’ Article 65 ACHR. The Court also requested the President to submit its note to the next session of the full Permanent Council, James et al. case, Note of the Court to His Excellency Ambassador Julio César Aráoz, President of the Permanent Council, 24 May 1999. The Court received a reply by the President of the Permanent Council. It did not specify its contents but acknowledged its receipt and reiterated that ‘the Court esteems that it is convenient that the Permanent Council consider and decide upon the inclusion of an operative paragraph relating to Trinidad and Tobago’s failure to comply with its Orders for this Tribunal’, James et al. case, Note of the Court to His Excellency Ambassador Julio César Aráoz, President of the Permanent Council, 25 May 1999. As mentioned before, the Court included these letters in its note to the OAS Secretary General. It concluded that: “The Court is of the view that this issue which is of fundamental importance for the Organisation and the Inter-American System, should receive the benefit of a pronouncement by the General Assembly, the highest organ of the Organisation”. James et al. case, Note of the Court to His Excellency César Gaviria T., Secretary General of the OAS, 27 May 1999.

¹¹³ IACHR James et al. case, Note of the Court to His Excellency César Gaviria T., Secretary General of the OAS, 27 May 1999.

During its Thirtieth Regular Session in Windsor, Canada, which was held from 4 to 6 June 2000, the President of the Court presented the Court's Annual Report 1999 to the General Assembly. The General Assembly had once more changed its structure, at least to the extent that the Court's President was able again to personally present the Court's Report. In June 2000 the General Assembly adopted its amended Rules of Procedure. These state that the 'chairs or representatives' of, among others, the Commission and the Court 'may attend the General Assembly with the right to speak'.¹¹⁴

Upon his presentation, the General Assembly adopted a resolution in which it reiterated 'that the judgments of the Court are final and may not be appealed and that the states parties to the Convention undertake to comply with the rulings of the Court in all cases to which they are party'. The Assembly also urged States that had denounced the ACHR or withdrawn their recognition of the Court's obligatory jurisdiction to reconsider their decisions.¹¹⁵ In other words, in its Session of June 2000 the General Assembly issued the Resolution the Court had requested it to take the year before. Now the Assembly itself referred to Article 65 ACHR establishing that the Court 'shall submit' to the General Assembly a Report on its work during the previous year. It pointed out that the Court 'shall specify, in particular, the cases in which a state has not complied with the Court's judgments and make any pertinent recommendations'. The Assembly also reiterated the Court's statement about the particular nature of the regional human rights system: 'bearing in mind that the denunciation of inter-American legal instruments on human rights and the withdrawal of recognition of the Court's binding jurisdiction affect the regional system as a whole, due to its particular nature'.¹¹⁶

The Court had followed up specifically the cases of Mr. Ramiah and Mr. Briggs. In these cases it only approached the State itself, but did not resort to the General Assembly. In June 1999 Trinidad had executed Joey Ramiah in violation of the Court's provisional measures. As a first response to the execution the Court pointed out that Mr. Ramiah 'was protected by the Provisional Measures ordered by the Court'.¹¹⁷ The State may have thought that, in light of the attitude of the OAS Permanent Council with regard to the Court's Annual Report 1998 and the consequent lack of discussion of the Court's Report of non-compliance under Article 65 ACHR during the 1999 Session of the General Assembly, there was not much risk of General Assembly involvement if it would execute some of its prisoners in violation of the Court's provisional measures.

On 27 July 1999 the Deputy Secretary of the Court wrote to Trinidad that the President of the Court had directed him to urgently request the State to present information on the Commission's communication informing the Court that Trinidad had read Mr. Briggs a warrant of execution.¹¹⁸ He reminded the State of the Court's provisional measures on behalf of Mr. Briggs, in ¹¹⁴ OAS General Assembly, Amendments to the Rules of Procedure, OEA/Ser.P, AG/RES. 1737 (XXX-O/00), 5 June 2000 (original: Spanish).

¹¹⁵ OAS General Assembly, Resolution AG/RES. 1716 (XXX-O/00), 5 June 2000, reproduced in: Annual Report 2000, III (Other activities of the Court), 8. (Thirtieth Regular Session of the General Assembly of the OAS) and Commission Annual Report 2000, Chapter IIa.

¹¹⁶ OAS General Assembly, Observations and Recommendations of the Member States on the Annual Report of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights, AG/RES. 1716 (XXX-O/00), 5 June 2000, reproduced in: Commission Annual Report 2000, Chapter Iia.

¹¹⁷ IACHR James et al. cases, Order for provisional measures, 16 August 2000.

¹¹⁸ In the Briggs case the Commission informed the Court, in June 1999, that the High Court of Trinidad and Tobago had dismissed an application to stay his execution and that the State's Court of Appeal had dismissed his appeal. The latter court indicated that 'notwithstanding the Order of the Court of 25 May 1999, it was not satisfied that any substantive issue respecting Anthony Briggs was pending before the Inter-American Court'. It also refused to grant a stay of execution particular its Order of May 1999. In this Order ‘the Court considered the circumstances of Mr. Briggs’ case before the Inter-American system and after deliberation’ decided to maintain the measures until such time as the Court would have issued a decision.¹¹⁹ Trinidad executed Anthony Briggs that same day.

In its Order of 16 August 2000 the Court censured the State for having executed Anthony Briggs and Joey Ramiah. It pointed out that ‘pursuant to the Orders of the Inter-American Court’ Trinidad and Tobago ‘had a duty to preserve the life and physical integrity of Anthony Briggs and Joey Ramiah’.¹²⁰ It reprimanded Trinidad for failure to submit the required fortnightly reports on the circumstances of the beneficiaries of the Court’s provisional measures. The Order considered that the State ‘did present its observations on the execution of Anthony Briggs and, in like manner, this Court deems important to obtain information on the circumstances that led to the execution of Joey Ramiah’. It then referred to the Court’s obligation to comply in good faith with the provisions and to its duty not to take actions that may frustrate restitution in kind of the rights of the alleged victims. The Court referred to Article 65 ACHR on the recommendations the Court shall submit to the General Assembly in cases of non-compliance. Although this reference can be found in its considerations and not in its decisions, it gives an indication of the action the Court might undertake as follow-up to the State’s non-compliance.

As part of its follow-up it required Trinidad to submit information, within two weeks, ‘on the circumstances that led to the execution of Joey Ramiah so that the Inter-American Court of Human Rights may consider it and include it in its report to the next General Assembly of the Organisation of American States’.¹²¹ In September 2000, ‘pursuant to the Order of the Court’, the State ‘presented information regarding the circumstances that led to the execution of Joey Ramiah’.¹²²

In February 2000 the Commission submitted to the Court the case of Constantine et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago, which encompassed the case of Joey Ramiah. In its Judgment in this case, Hilaire, Constantine and Benjamin and others, the Court found that the State had arbitrarily deprived Mr. Ramiah of his right to life in violation of Article 4 ACHR. “This situation is aggravated because the victim was protected by Provisional Measures ordered by this Tribunal, which expressly indicated that his execution should be stayed pending the resolution of the case by the inter-American human rights system”.¹²³ The State had ‘caused irreparable harm to the detriment of Joey Ramiah, by reason of its disregard of a direct order of the Court and its deliberate decision pending an appeal to the Privy Council. Mr. Briggs’ solicitors instead brought an expedited petition for special leave to appeal to the Privy Council. They sought a stay of his execution pending the determination of this petition. On 21 June the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council indeed granted him leave to appeal as well as a stay of execution. It requested ‘further clarification from his solicitors as to the nature of the matter relating to him that was pending before the Inter-American Court’. On the same day the Commission informed the Court of this situation. The next month, however, the Privy Council dismissed his appeal. See further Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction).

¹¹⁹ Letter of Deputy Secretary Renzo Pomi to the honourable Ralph Maharaji, M.P., Minister of Foreign Affairs of Trinidad and Tobago, 27 July 1999, REF: CDH-S/877. The Court also reproduced the relevant parts of this letter in: James et al. cases, Order for provisional measures, 16 August 2000.

¹²⁰ IACHR James et al. cases, Order of 16 August 2000. See also the Order of 24 November 2000.

¹²¹ IACHR James et al. cases, Order of 16 August 2000.

¹²² IACHR James et al. cases, Order of 24 November 2000.

¹²³ IACHR Hilaire, Constantine and Benjamin et al. v. Trinidad & Tobago, Judgment of 21 June 2002, §198.

to order the execution of this victim'.¹²⁴ It stressed 'the seriousness of the State's non-compliance in virtue of the execution of the victim despite the existence of Provisional Measures in his favour, and as such' found the State responsible for violating Article 4 ACHR.¹²⁵

While the Court ordered different forms of reparation in the cases of the other victims, with regard to Mr. Ramiah this was no longer possible. Instead it ordered payment of damages for immaterial harm to his wife (to be used on behalf of their son) and mother. In light of the Court's remark about its provisional measures, its finding of an additional violation in the case of Mr. Ramiah can be seen as a form of follow-up of the Court's provisional measures in his case. Nevertheless the Court should also have found a violation of Article 63(2) ACHR on provisional measures.¹²⁶ Moreover, as has the European Court with regard to Article 34 ECHR, it could have found a violation of the right of individual petition (Article 44 ACHR).¹²⁷

The Court did not refer to the execution of Briggs because his case was not included in the Commission's submission to the Court that resulted in the Hilaire, Constantine and Benjamin and others Judgment. In order to follow up the Briggs case the Commission could have instituted new proceedings on the State's non-compliance with its recommendations in the Article 51 Report and with the Court's provisional measures. It could have moved such a case quickly through and submitted it to the Court. Yet it did not do so.¹²⁸

The Court had summoned the State and the Commission to a public hearing in August 1998 to discuss the provisional measures to halt the executions. Yet, Trinidad informed the Court that it 'must decline' its summons to appear at this public hearing. The President of the Court sent a note to the Prime Minister of Trinidad reiterating the importance of this State's appearance before the Court to fulfil its obligation as a State Party to the ACHR.

When in 1998 Trinidad announced its refusal to appear before the Inter-American Court the Court's President pointed out that the Court had always relied on the good faith and cooperation of States so that it could carry out its mandate. He expressed the following strongly worded criticism:

"the failure of a State Party to appear at a public hearing, to which it has been duly summoned, is without precedent in the history of the Court. The Tribunal is seriously concerned by the implications of Trinidad and Tobago's decision in the present matter and its ramifications".¹²⁹

The Court's President explained the importance of such hearing in which the Court sought to permit the Commission and the State to present their arguments in a public forum 'without compromising their positions in the proceedings which are currently pending before the Commission'. Apart from allowing both parties the opportunity to publicly present their arguments, such a hearing was also important, 'due to the urgency and complexity of these matters', to enable the Court to fully consider these arguments.¹³⁰ The Court later stressed that Trinidad's failure to appear at the public hearing 'represents a violation of its international obligations under the American Convention'.¹³¹

¹²⁴ Id., §199.

¹²⁵ Id., §200.

¹²⁶ On non-compliance with the Court's provisional measures as a violation of Article 63(2) ACHR itself, see already Buergenthal (1994), p. 88.

¹²⁷ See Chapter XVI (Legal status). See also Haack/Burbano Herrera/Zwaak (2008), p. 46 and p. 63.

¹²⁸ See also Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction).

¹²⁹ IACHR James et al. case, note from the President to the Prime Minister of Trinidad and Tobago, 19 August 1998, Series E, Compendium 2.

¹³⁰ Ibid.

¹³¹ IACHR James et al. cases, Order of 9 August 1998.

In its Order for provisional measures in Boyce and Joseph v. Barbados the Inter-American Court has pointed out that the State is ‘under the obligation to keep this Tribunal informed regarding the actions it has taken to comply with the Order of the President. The provision of such information is essential in order to permit the Court to evaluate the State’s degree of compliance with the said Order’.¹³² In this case the Court decided that despite the temporary stay of execution by the High Court of Barbados, it would maintain its provisional measures. It considered the stay ‘a crucial step on the part of the State’ to protect the fundamental rights of the beneficiaries ‘as well as to facilitate the processing of their cases in accordance with the requirements of the American Convention’. It noted, however, that the State had failed to submit the report required in the President’s Order two months previously and the Court consequently decided to maintain its Order.¹³³

Often the Inter-American Court follows up earlier provisional measures by confirming, specifying and/or expanding them. The Court has also maintained its provisional measures, in some of its cases, even after its decision on the merits of the case, because some of the witnesses involved in that case were still being threatened. In some of these cases the Court’s Judgment on Reparations was still pending, but it seems that even if that were not the case, the Court does not consider a case ‘closed’ until a State has implemented the Court’s Judgment on Reparations. Yet it now started the practice of continuing monitoring specifically as part of its procedure for supervision of Compliance of Judgments, often thereby concluding its provisional measures and instead issuing Orders on (non-)compliance.¹³⁴ At other times it decides to lift them with regard to those beneficiaries that are no longer at risk of irreparable harm to their life or personal integrity. It has also decided to lift provisional measures when it considered its monitoring was more appropriately related to compliance with a judgment on the merits or reparation.¹³⁵

Following up on its Judgments in the cases Fermín Ramírez and Raxcacó Reyes the Inter-American Court pointed out that it is a power inherent in its jurisdictional function to supervise compliance with its decisions.¹³⁶ States must apply their obligations in good faith (pacta sunt servanda) and the State may not forward internal reasons for non-compliance. The obligations apply to all organs of the State. Implementation by State agents of a domestic law that violates the ACHR triggers international state responsibility. When a State has ratified an international treaty such as the ACHR its domestic courts, as part of the State apparatus, are obliged to ensure that the ¹³² IACHR Boyce and Joseph v. Barbados. Order of 25 November 2004, §6.

¹³³ Ibid.

¹³⁴ See also Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction and admissibility). It may also combine the two types of Orders, see e.g. IACHR Bámaca Velásquez v. Guatemala, Order of 27 January 2009, declaring Guatemala’s partial compliance with the Judgment on Reparations, declaring to keep open its monitoring process until full compliance is achieved and maintaining its provisional measures of 11 March 2005 (Provisional Measures and Monitoring Compliance with Judgment).

¹³⁵ See e.g. IACHR Case of the Mayagna (Sumo) Awas Tingni Community (Nicaragua), Order of 26 November 2007. In December 2008 the Commission issued a press release praising the demarcation and titling of ancestral lands belonging to the Awas Tingni. The government of Nicaragua gave them the property title to 73,000 hectares of its territory, which ‘marked a critical step forwards’ in the resolution of the case. See CIDH press release 62/08, ‘IACHR hails titling of Awas Tingni Community lands in Nicaragua’, 18 December 2008.

¹³⁶ See e.g. IACHR Order on supervision of compliance of the cases Fermín Ramírez v. Guatemala and Raxcacó Reyes v. Guatemala and on the request to expand the provisional measures in Raxcacó Reyes y otros, 9 May 2008, 1st ‘Considering’ clause.

effects of the decisions made under the ACHR are not diminished because of the application of domestic laws that revolts against its object and purpose.¹³⁷

In its (consecutive) Orders the Inter-American Court also follows up on the implementation of the provisional measures ordered by it and, while doing so, it refers to the particularly important role of the Commission in adequately and effectively following up on the implementation of the measures ordered by the Court. It stresses that the State's reports reflect the adoption of the priority measures established by the Court by describing the specific results achieved.¹³⁸

The Court has pointed out that provisional measures have an exceptional character. They are ordered in function of the necessities of protection and, once ordered, they must be maintained as long as the Court considers that the basic requirements of extreme gravity and urgency and the prevention of irreparable harm to the persons protected by them, are still fulfilled.¹³⁹

In the context of three cases against Venezuela the Court noted that the State had questioned the Court's power to supervise its provisional measures, rather than responded to the requirement to provide information. Venezuela considered that the Court exceeded its power of supervision of compliance if it demanded information from the State, on an obligatory basis, with regard to the implementation of its measures or called into question the manner in which the State was implementing them.¹⁴⁰ Yet, as the Court has noted, the power to supervise the compliance with its provisional measures and give instructions as requested by the parties or proprio motu is a power inherent to the Court's functions.¹⁴¹ In other words it is simply part of the normal exercise of its jurisdictional functions.¹⁴²

The State's duty to inform the Court has a dual character. It requires for its effective implementation the formal presentation of a document as well as specific, recent and detailed information with regard to the implementation of the specific obligations.¹⁴³ In this respect the Court has stressed that it follows a written procedure that permits it to supervise compliance with the provisional measures adopted by it and to guarantee respect for the contradictory nature of the proceedings so that all parties (the State, the Commission and the beneficiaries) must have the opportunity to provide the Court with the information they consider relevant with regard to the compliance with the Order. Often public hearings take place that allow for oral testimonies by the parties.¹⁴⁴

In 2008, when faced with a request to expand the provisional measures in Raxcacó Reyes y otros, the Court pointed out that because Article 62(2) ACHR refers to cases of prima facie urgency, while the risk of irreparable harm in these cases related to violations that have already been established by judgments of the Court that have res iudicata status, it would not order the provisional measures requested. Instead it ordered the State simply to comply with its judgment, adding specifications and noting that it would continue to monitor the situation.¹⁴⁵

¹³⁷ IACHR Order on supervision of compliance of the cases Fermín Ramírez v. Guatemala and Raxcacó Reyes v. Guatemala and on the request to expand the provisional measures in Raxcacó Reyes y otros, 9 May 2008, 4th 'Considering' clause. The Court also referred to Article 27 VCLT.

¹³⁸ IACHR Matter of Mendoza prisons, Order of 27 November 2007, 3rd 'Decisional' clause.

¹³⁹ IACHR Matter of Liliana Ortega et al. (Venezuela), Order of 14 June 2005, 5th 'Considering' clause.

¹⁴⁰ IACHR Liliana Ortega et al.; Luisiana Ríos et al.; Luis Uzcátegui; Marta Colomina and Liliana Velásquez (Venezuela), Order of 4 May 2004, 16th 'Considering' clause.

¹⁴¹ Id., 9th 'Considering' clause.

¹⁴² Id., 11th 'Considering' clause.

¹⁴³ Id., 15th 'Considering' clause.

¹⁴⁴ Id., 10th 'Considering' clause.

¹⁴⁵ IACHR Order on supervision of compliance of the cases Fermín Ramírez v. Guatemala and Raxcacó Reyes v. Guatemala. See also e.g. IACHR Matter of the persons imprisoned in the "Dr.

In any case, as noted, the Inter-American Court has now decided, in cases in which it has already found violations on the merits, often simply to order compliance with the obligations based already on its previous Judgments rather than ordering provisional measures to halt irreparable harm. In other words it now more clearly distinguishes between supervision of its judgments on the merits and reparation and supervision, expansion or termination of its provisional measures.

2.2.8 Supervision and monitoring in the European system

The former European Commission on Human Rights has sometimes followed up specifically on its provisional measures, in the face of possible or actual non-compliance. It did so, for instance, by renewing them in response to certain developments.¹⁴⁶ It has also used follow-up provisional Sebastião Martins Silveira” Penitentiary in Araraquara, São Paulo (Brazil), Order of 30 September 2006, Matter of the persons imprisoned in the “Dr. Sebastião Martins Silveira” Penitentiary in Araraquara, São Paulo (Brazil), Order of 30 September 2006 and Case of Comunidad Indígena Sawhoyamaya v. Paraguay, Order of 2 February 2007 on supervision of compliance, 9th and 12th ‘Considering’ clauses. As part of the request to expand the provisional measures in Raxcacó Reyes y otros, 9 May 2008, the petitioners had also requested provisional measures on behalf of one person whose case was still pending in the Inter-American system, but this was a new matter that could not be dealt with as an expansion of existing provisional measures. Thus it involved a new request for provisional measures in a matter not yet pending before the Court. Therefore it was the Commission that had to request these measures and not the petitioners. See Chapter II (Systems). After the Commission indeed did so, the Court decided to order provisional measures on his behalf. IACHR Order on supervision of compliance of the cases Fermín Ramírez v. Guatemala and Raxcacó Reyes v. Guatemala and on the request to expand the provisional measures in Raxcacó Reyes y otros, 9 May 2008, 51st-63rd ‘Considering’ clauses.

¹⁴⁶ In EComHR B. v France (1987) the petitioner gave himself up to the French police. He explained that he himself wished to be extradited in order to be able to defend himself. Once detained, he allegedly found out he had already been sentenced to death in absentia in Morocco. EComHR B. v. France, 22 January 1987 (inadm.), p. 173. He feared that, upon return, he would ‘not be entitled to adversarial proceedings together with the guarantees accompanying a fair trial’. ‘If that proved to be the case, he would not be in a position to defend himself and enforcement of the death penalty would therefore constitute treatment contrary to Article 3 of the Convention’, p. 174. In August 1985 the President of the European Commission used provisional measures to halt his extradition. The next month the French Government informed the Commission that it had asked the Moroccan authorities to specify whether, in the event of Mr. B. being handed over to them, he could be retried in the Government’s presence in Morocco. It had also asked for a formal undertaking that, if the death penalty were to be pronounced a second time, it would not be enforced. The Commission decided to adjourn its examination of the case in light of the information provided by France. Many months later, in July 1986, the French Government informed the Commission that, according to the Moroccan authorities, a retrial was possible. From this, it concluded that it could ‘carry out the extradition in the next few weeks’. p. 175. As the Commission put it, the Government referred ‘only to the first of the two conditions with which the Moroccan authorities had been asked to comply’, p. 175. Accordingly, in August, October and December 1986 the President of the Commission renewed the application of Rule 36, p. 175. It specifically requested the views of the parties with regard to the question ‘whether a person detained with a view to extradition who receives a communication of this kind is not justified in placing legitimate confidence in the Government’s consenting to his extradition only if the Moroccan authorities give a formal undertaking that, in the event of the death penalty being pronounced a second time, it will not be enforced’. It added the question whether ‘a change in the measures to the effect that the State that ignored its provisional measures to halt an expulsion or extradition should enable the return of the petitioner. In Cruz Varas v. Sweden (1990) the European Commission specifically pointed out, under Rule 36 on provisional measures, that the State should take measures to enable the petitioner's return to Sweden as soon as possible 'given the failure of the Government to comply' with its earlier provisional measures.¹⁴⁷ The State responded that the National Immigration Board was responsible for granting permission to enter and remain in Sweden. A week after receipt of the Commission's provisional measures the Government had informed the Board of these measures. Two weeks later the Board rejected the request from Mr. Cruz Varas to be allowed to return to Sweden.¹⁴⁸ The Commission only followed up this decision when it maintained its provisional measures a few days later, but when the Board subsequently confirmed this rejection the Commission did not respond. Instead it decided, a few months later, not to prolong its provisional measures.¹⁴⁹

In Mansi v. Sweden (1989) the State again ignored the Commission's provisional measures. In this case as well the Commission subsequently invoked Rule 36 so that the Government would take measures to enable the petitioner to return to Sweden as soon as possible. Sweden informed the Commission that it had transmitted these provisional measures to the National Immigration Board. This is interesting because the Government had expelled Mansi despite this Board's proposal not to do so.¹⁵⁰ Both Amnesty International and a representative of the Swedish Embassy in Jordan confirmed that he had been tortured upon return. Later the petitioner was allowed to return to Sweden and the case never came before the ECtHR because a friendly settlement was agreed upon.¹⁵¹

As noted, the Inter-American Court itself monitors compliance. In the European system it is the Committee of Ministers (the Permanent Representatives of the member States) of the Council of Europe that supervises the execution of the Court's judgments under Article 46(2) ECHR. It generally does so through constructive dialogue. Normally a case remains on the agenda until the State concerned has informed the Committee of the measures it has taken to implement the judgment. Following this the Committee adopts a resolution containing the information given by the State.¹⁵²

Government's attitude' was 'liable to constitute a violation of Article 3 of the Convention, in view of the confidence awakened in the prisoner and the extreme seriousness of the issue concerning him', pp. 175-176. The case was subsequently declared inadmissible for non-exhaustion.

¹⁴⁷ EComHR Cruz Varas et al. v. Sweden, 7 June 1990 (Article 31 report), §§61 and 73.

¹⁴⁸ Id., §§62 and 38.

¹⁴⁹ Id., §§63 and 38. See also §§105-127 and dissenting opinion Sperduti.

¹⁵⁰ EComHR Mansi v. Sweden, 7 December 1989 (adm.), p. 244.

¹⁵¹ EComHR Mansi v. Sweden, 9 March 1990 (Friendly settlement).

¹⁵² See e.g. Klerk (2000), p. 154; Van der Velde (1997); VandeLanotte/Haeck (2005), pp. 733-752; Zwaak (2008) and Lodeweges (2008), pp. 949-953. Among others, within the Council of Europe a Department for the Execution of Judgments of the ECtHR has been established. Moreover, the Committee of Ministers has suggested to the Court, in its Resolution (2004) 3, 12 May 2004 to specifically identify systemic problems underlying the violations found, especially 'when it is likely to give rise to numerous applications', so as to assist states in finding the appropriate solution and the Committee of Ministers in supervising the execution of judgments'. See also Chapter XIII (Protection). This 2004 resolution also invited the Court to 'specifically notify any judgment containing indications of the existence of a systemic problem not only to the state concerned and to the Committee of Ministers, but also to the Parliamentary Assembly, to the Secretary General of the Council of Europe and to the Council of Europe Commissioner for Human Rights, and to highlight such judgments in an appropriate manner in the database of the

The Court's Rule 39 on provisional measures also specifically refers to the Committee of Minister's monitoring role. The Committee of Ministers has the role to follow up on compliance with the Court's provisional measures. Apparently one reason for including in Rule 39 a paragraph on follow-up was to compensate for the fact that legally binding provisional measures were not included as such in Protocol 11.¹⁵³ Garry notes the significance of the fact that this follow-up procedure is the same as that used after a binding final judgment has been issued under Article 46(2) ECHR.¹⁵⁴ The Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe, by way of its Committee on Legal Affairs and Human Rights, has actively followed up on provisional measures as well.¹⁵⁵

Nevertheless the fact that the Committee of Ministers does perform a task monitoring compliance of judgments as well as provisional measures and that the Parliamentary Assembly also plays a role, does not exclude the Court's own role in monitoring compliance. Lawson suggests this would apply in particular to monitoring measures directly related to the rights of the individuals involved: cessation of the violation, restitutio in integrum and payment of compensation, rather than changes in legislation. He also suggests that the Court should be able to keep the case on its docket to allow the national authorities, for instance, to reopen a criminal case. If this takes too long the European Court could still intervene.¹⁵⁶ The text of Article 41 ECHR certainly allows the ECtHR to monitor compliance with its judgments, including reparation in the form of restitutio in integrum. Like the Inter-American Court it could later issue a judgment on reparations taking into account the measures already taken by the State.¹⁵⁷ Lawson gives some additional Court'. Formally the Secretary General has the power, under Article 52 ECHR, to request from the State an explanation of its implementation of the Convention. The fact that the resolution refers to the Secretary General may open up the possibilities of this provision somewhat. The reason why the Committee also refers to the Parliamentary Assembly is obviously related to the fact that the latter has already involved itself in the supervision of judgments and may employ possibilities for publicity. The Committee of Ministers itself publishes interim decisions on implementation, which may include increasingly urgent language. The fact that it makes public such decisions is a way to pressure the State through public opinion. An interesting option suggested by Zwaak (2008), p. 362 is the use of Article 17 Statute of the Council of Europe, under which the Committee of Ministers may set up advisory or technical committees or commissions, for instance 'for the purpose of taking evidence and other tasks within the context of its function under the Convention'. Indeed such committees could also assist in the follow-up on provisional measures, especially of those revealing an underlying systemic problem affecting large groups of people.

¹⁵³ See interview by Garry (2001) with Judge Pellonpää, Section IV, 16 June 2000, p. 409.

¹⁵⁴ Garry (2001), p. 409.

¹⁵⁵ See e.g. its response to Russia ignoring the Court's provisional measures to suspend the deportation of a person to Uzbekistan. The President of the Parliamentary Assembly René van der Linden wrote to the Chairman of the Russian delegation to PACE to ask for explanations, see Council of Europe Parliamentary Assembly Committee on Legal Affairs and Human Rights, 'Member states' duty to co-operate with the European Court of Human Rights', Doc. 11183, 9, February 2007, Explanatory memorandum by Rapporteur Christos Pourgourides, §52 (in footnote). In this case the ECtHR found Russia in violation of Article 3 ECHR (among others). Yet given the conflicting information with regard to the timeline of the expulsion and the moment Russia received the provisional measures, the Court felt unable to find a violation of Article 34 ECHR for disrespecting its provisional measures, Muminov v. Russia, 11 December 2008.

¹⁵⁶ See Lawson (Preadvies 1999), pp. 82-83, p. 85.

¹⁵⁷ See also Lawson (Preadvies 1999), p. 82. In the proposed 14th Protocol, awaiting ratification by Russia, it is the Committee of Ministers that can ask the Court to interpret its previous judgments in order to assist the Committee in its supervisory role. In addition the Committee of Ministers arguments. The effet utile of the procedure requires implementation of the Court's judgments by the States and access to an effective procedure for the victim in case of State failure. Non-compliance, moreover, is an aggravated breach of the ECHR. The Court could reopen the case (or open a new case) and in its judgment on compensation it could take into account the fact that the State knowingly violates the Convention. The Committee of Ministers does not have this possibility. In this respect he emphasises that the Court should make clear in its judgment the measures it expects of the State.¹⁵⁸ It is suggested that these arguments for the Court's role in monitoring compliance with its judgments apply equally to its role in following up its provisional measures.

2.2.9 Follow-up on provisional measures under the Dayton Accord

Strangely, Article XI, 1(b) of Annex 6 of the Dayton Accord grants the Bosnia Chamber the power 'to include an order for provisional measures in its final decision on the merits of a case'. The Chamber seems to have found a way to interpret this provision: "This power might be used to regulate the position of the parties before the decision becomes final and binding, or pending the full implementation of the decision".¹⁵⁹ Indeed, pending implementation it may often be useful to follow up on the situation of the victims in order to make sure that nothing happens that could prevent further implementation.¹⁶⁰

In the case of Boudellaa et al. (2002) the Bosnia Chamber examined on the merits the obligations of the respondent Parties in handing over the petitioners to US forces. This led to their detention at Camp X-Ray in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. It had been done contrary to the Chamber's provisional measures.¹⁶¹ In response to Bosnia and Herzegovina ignoring its provisional measures to halt the removal of the petitioners the Bosnia Chamber found 'that the expulsion was unlawful because it was carried out in violation of the Chamber's binding order for provisional measures of 17 January 2002, which ordered both respondent Parties to take all necessary steps to prevent the applicants from being taken out of the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Chamber recalls that in its previous case law, the Chamber has held that an order for provisional measures is binding and has the status of national law'.¹⁶²

The Bosnia Chamber specifically responded to allegations by Bosnia that the order had not been delivered to it in a timely and proper manner and that it had no authority to give effect to the Orders by the Chamber.¹⁶³ It noted: "It is not necessary for the Chamber to examine these submissions. It is undisputed that the applicants were held in detention by officials of the Federation when its order was issued, that they were handed over to US forces by officials of the Federal may specifically refer a case to the Court asking it to determine whether a State has failed to comply with a judgment. See further Zwaak (2008), pp. 357-360.

¹⁵⁸ Lawson (Preadvies 1999), p. 91.

¹⁵⁹ See Bosnia Chamber Annual Report 2000 (under the heading 'provisional measures').

¹⁶⁰ Similarly, the Inter-American Court only considers a case closed once the State has fully implemented it. Before such time it may maintain provisional measures, for instance to protect witnesses. See also further Chapter XIV discussing jurisdiction.

¹⁶¹ Bosnia Chamber Boudellaa, Lakhdar, Nechle and Lahmar v. BiH and Fed. BiH, 11 October 2002, §§4-5.

¹⁶² Id., §185 (adding: 'The Chamber recalls that, for example, in the D.K. case, it held that the eviction of the applicant was not in accordance with the law, for the purposes of Article 8(2) of the Convention, even though the competent authorities had established that the applicant was an illegal occupant, because there was an order for provisional measures of the Chamber prohibiting the eviction (case no. CH/98/710, D.K. v. Republika Srpska, decision on admissibility and merits of 2 November 1999, paragraphs 33-37, Decisions August-December 1999)').

¹⁶³ See also Chapter XVII (Official responses).

Ministry of Interior, and that the order for provisional measures had been brought to the attention of the Federal Ministry of Interior before the hand-over of the applicants. This is sufficient to establish the unlawfulness of the expulsion in this respect as well".¹⁶⁴

The Chamber found that 'the respondent Parties have not followed the requirements of a legal expulsion procedure arising from the domestic law. They thereby violated the condition set out in Article 1 paragraph 1 of Protocol No. 7 to the Convention of a decision reached in accordance with law'.¹⁶⁵

The violations fell 'within the responsibility of both respondent Parties'. "The law and also the factual actions taken by both respondent Parties in regard to (...) the hand-over of the applicants to US forces, after ensuring through diplomatic contacts that those forces would take them into custody and take them out of the country, involved actions by both respondent Parties which constitute a violation of the applicants' rights".¹⁶⁶

Given the possibility that US authorities might seek and impose the death penalty against the petitioners, the Chamber found that the respondent Parties should have sought assurances from the US before handing them over. The fact that they had not done so constituted a violation of Article 1 Protocol 6 to the ECHR.

Among others, Bosnia and Herzegovina was ordered to take all possible steps to prevent the death penalty from being pronounced against and executed on the petitioners. This also meant that they should seek assurances from the US, through diplomatic contacts, that they will not be subjected to the death penalty.¹⁶⁷ The Chamber ordered both respondent Parties to 'retain lawyers authorised and admitted to practice in the relevant jurisdictions and before the relevant courts, tribunals or other authoritative bodies in order to take all necessary action to protect the applicants' rights while in U.S. custody and in case of possible military, criminal or other proceedings involving the applicants, each of the respondent Parties bearing half the cost of the attorney fees and expenses'.¹⁶⁸

In addition, if the petitioners did not return within a year, the respondent Parties were to pay the compensation in the amount of 10,000 KM to the petitioners' families in Bosnia and Herzegovina.¹⁶⁹ Both respondent Parties were also ordered to report to the Chamber every two months until full implementation of the Chamber's decision was achieved.¹⁷⁰

2.2.10 Follow-up as part of the different reporting procedures

In the Inter-American system there are two forms of seguimiento. Apart from a follow-up specifically on the case law, the Commission also uses its country visits and the reports it prepares to comment on failure to comply with its precautionary measures and the Court's provisional measures.¹⁷¹

Under the Convention against Torture and the ICCPR the reporting procedure has played a role both in providing country specific information that could help make provisional measures more focused and in providing the adjudicators with another forum for the follow-up on compli-

¹⁶⁴ Bosnia Chamber Boudellaa, Lakhdar, Nechle and Lahmar v. BiH and Fed. BiH, 11 October 2002, §187.

¹⁶⁵ Id., §188.

¹⁶⁶ Id., §189.

¹⁶⁷ Id., §330.

¹⁶⁸ Id., §331.

¹⁶⁹ Id., §332.

¹⁷⁰ Id., §333, 20th 'Decisional' clause.

¹⁷¹ This happened the first time in a report on Ecuador, providing a precedent for the later country reports on Mexico, Brazil and Colombia.

ance with their provisional measures. After all they can simply enter into dialogue directly with State representatives during the public hearings on the State reports and they can subsequently refer to non-compliance in their Concluding Observations with regard to these reports.¹⁷² In its Concluding observations CAT has referred to the ‘absolute nature’ of Article 3 ICAT and expressed concern with regard to the failure by some States to comply with all provisional measures.¹⁷³ In the European system the country reporting procedure is not used, although it would be possible under Article 52 ECHR.¹⁷⁴

2.3 Possible consequences attached to non-compliance with provisional measures with regard to the admissibility and merits stage

2.3.1 Introduction

Obviously there are many kinds of consequences of non-compliance with provisional measures. First and foremost it is the intended beneficiary of the provisional measures who suffers the consequences of an exposure to irreparable harm. Then obviously there the legal and political consequences for the State concerned.

One question in the context of the follow-up by the adjudicators, is whether this is still aimed at preventing (further) irreparable harm in the case at hand, or if no longer possible, whether it is aimed at preventing recurrence of non-compliance in future cases. What are the legal consequences for State of ignoring provisional measures?¹⁷⁵

Is the only legal consequence of non-compliance an aggravated breach in case a violation of the substantive right is indeed found? As discussed, another possibility is finding a procedural violation of the substantive right, such as the non-refoulement rule. In any case most adjudicators assume that the right of petition is no longer effective when acts occur that are of an irreparable nature, which is generally seen in the light of the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment and torture.

¹⁷² Yet the fact that most of the time and resources of the Committees is reserved to the reporting procedure also limits their capacity to deal with individual petitions.

¹⁷³ CAT Press release HR/4844 ‘Committee against Torture Concludes 34th session: Issues Concluding Observations on Reports of Canada, Switzerland, Finland, Albania, Uganda and Bahrain’, 20 May 2005 (referring to the report of Canada), <<http://www.un.org/News/Press/docs/2005/hr4844.doc.htm>> (consulted 17 April 2006).

¹⁷⁴ See e.g. Verhey (1996), pp. 103-116, suggesting the usefulness of the country reporting procedure to complement the individual complaint procedure.

¹⁷⁵ Another question is what are the consequences of compliance. Often the case is then solved and may be struck out of the list of pending cases. Yet this is not always the case. See e.g. ECtHR Sheekh v. the Netherlands, 11 January 2007, where the State argued that the petitioner had an official permit to stay in the Netherlands, which ‘solved’ the case. The Court, on the other hand, noted that the permit was granted based on a general policy based on the Court’s provisional measures. The Court considered it feasible that the petitioner would then have to reintroduce the case before the Court once the general policy is withdrawn and he can again be expelled. In fact, the use of provisional measures in this case required a final examination of the case so as to confirm or dismiss the real risk alleged. The Court declared the case admissible and held on the merits that the petitioner’s expulsion would be in violation of Article 3 ECHR. See also Woltjer (2007), p. 362.

This section focuses on the impact on the admissibility decision and on the evidentiary requirements for finding a violation on the merits of the substantive rights invoked. While reference is made to the practice of the HRC and CAT, the focus is on the ECtHR judgment in Mamatkulov.

2.3.2 Deciding on admissibility

In the disappearance case of Tshishimbi v. Zaire (1996), in which it had used provisional measures, the HRC noted, using the usual expression, that ‘in the circumstances, due weight had to be given to the author’s allegations, to the extent that they were sufficiently substantiated’. This remark indicates a relationship between lack of co-operation, including respect for provisional measures, and the standard and burden of proof required for the final determination of the case. The HRC also referred to the impossibility to have access to Mr. Tshishimbi or to ‘obtain reliable information about his whereabouts and state of health’. This explained why non-exhaustion of local remedies did not preclude it from examining the communication. In other words, the State’s unresponsiveness to the request for information on his whereabouts and state of health was an additional factor establishing a lack of effective local remedies.¹⁷⁶

In Guerra and Wallen v. Trinidad and Tobago (1995) the HRC deeply regretted that the State was ‘not prepared to give the undertaking requested by the Committee’ in its provisional measure, ‘apparently because it considers itself bound by the conservatory order issued by the Court of Appeal on 29 April 1994’.¹⁷⁷ The HRC considered that, in fact, ‘this situation should have made it easier for the State party to confirm that there would be no obstacles to acceding to the Committee’s request; to do so would, in any event, have been compatible with the State party’s international obligations’.¹⁷⁸ In view of the fact that the State was not prepared to respect the provisional measures taken pending the case, the HRC could also have decided to maintain these measures, as it did in several other cases it had declared inadmissible for non-exhaustion.¹⁷⁹ This case was decided after the public discussion condemning the execution of Ashby but before the decision on the merits in Piandiong.

2.3.3 Evidentiary requirements: deciding on the merits

The HRC and CAT have occasionally said something on the obligations of States on the merits in a case in which the State had ignored their provisional measures. In two cases involving Belarus the executions had already taken place when the HRC took provisional measures.¹⁸⁰ On the merits

¹⁷⁶ HRC Tshishimbi v. Zaire, 25 March 1996.

¹⁷⁷ HRC Lincoln Guerra and Brian Wallen v. Trinidad and Tobago, 4 April 1995, §2.3.

¹⁷⁸ Id., §6.5.

¹⁷⁹ See Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction and admissibility).

¹⁸⁰ HRC Igor Lyashkovich and Mariya Staselovich v. Belarus, 3 April 2003. In one of these cases the petitioner declared that death sentences are executed in secret in Belarus and neither the condemned prisoner nor his family are informed of the date of execution. In July 2002 the HRC addressed specific questions to the petitioner and the State party in this case to find out the exact execution date. It also requested the State to inform it ‘at what time did the State party learn about the existence of the communication’. It asked the petitioner whether she had informed the State party of the submission of the case to the HRC before the registration of the case. The State party replied to the Committee’s request in September 2002, but only to the question about the precise date of the execution and not about ‘the exact moment from which the State party was aware of the existence of the communication’. HRC Igor Lyashkovich and Mariya Staselovich v. Belarus, 3 April 2003, §6.1; see also Anton Bondarenko and Natalia Schedko (submitted by the latter on behalf of her deceased son and herself) v. Belarus, 3 April 2003, §7.1. Counsel asserted, ‘without the HRC noted its earlier case law that a State party violated its obligations under the OP by executing a person who has submitted a communication to the HRC. This was so not only in cases where it had explicitly requested provisional measures of protection ‘but also on the basis of the irreversible nature of capital punishment’.¹⁸¹ Yet the relevant earlier case law, Piandiong et al. v. the Philippines (2000),¹⁸² was decided and published subsequent to the execution of Lyashkevich and Bondarenko. For this reason the HRC decided it could not hold the State party responsible for a breach of the OP for the execution of the death sentence after the submission of the communication but prior to its registration. This means, however, that in new death penalty cases formal use of provisional measures by the HRC is not strictly necessary.

In Weiss v. Austria (2003) the State had extradited the petitioner to the US in contravention of the the HRC’s provisional measures. Consequently, the State was ‘under an obligation to make such representations to the United States’ authorities as may be required to ensure that the author does not suffer any consequential breaches of his rights under the Covenant, which would flow from the State party’s extradition of the author in violation of its obligations under the Covenant and the Optional Protocol’. It was also ‘under an obligation to avoid similar violations in the future, including by taking appropriate steps to ensure that the Committee’s request for interim measures of protection will be respected’.¹⁸³

In Dar v. Norway (2007) the petitioner had been deported to Pakistan in spite of CAT’s provisional measures. This was in violation of Article 22 ICAT, but this breach was remedied because Norway granted him a residence permit for three years upon return. CAT considered that the issue whether deportation constituted a violation of Article 3 has become moot because the petitioner had returned to Norway.¹⁸⁴

After finding a violation of Articles 3 and 22 in Brada v. France (2005) CAT noted that it wished ‘to be informed, within 90 days, of the steps the State party has taken in response to the views expressed above, including measures of compensation for the breach of article 3 of the Convention and determination, in consultation with the country (also a State party to the Convention) to which the complainant was returned, of his current whereabouts and state of well-being’.¹⁸⁵

Part of following up non-compliance with provisional measures in non-refoulement cases should also be in the assessment on the merits whether the forced removal indeed constituted a violation of non-refoulement. The question then arises as well what should be the role of subse-giving any further detail’, that Mrs Staselovich ‘had informed her son’s lawyer, the Supreme Court and the prison authorities that she had submitted a communication to the Human Rights Committee before her son’s actual execution’. HRC Igor Lyashkovich and Mariya Staselovich v. Belarus, 3 April 2003, §5.5; see also Anton Bondarenko and Natalia Schedko (submitted by the latter on behalf of her deceased son and herself) v. Belarus, 3 April 2003, §6.5. According to the petitioner the State had breached its obligations under the OP by ignoring the fact that she had sent a petition to the HRC and that she had informed her son’s lawyer, the prison authorities and the Supreme Court about this. The State party did not specifically refute this claim. It only referred to the date it received the HRC’s note verbale with the provisional measure, seven months after the execution.

¹⁸¹ HRC Igor Lyashkovich and Mariya Staselovich v. Belarus, 3 April 2003, §5.5; see also Anton Bondarenko and Natalia Schedko (submitted by the latter on behalf of her deceased son and herself) v. Belarus, 3 April 2003, §6.5.

¹⁸² HRC Dante Piandiong, Jesus Morillos and Archie Bulan (deceased) (submitted by Alexander Padilla and Ricardo III Sunga) v. the Philippines, 19 October 2000.

¹⁸³ See HRC Weiss v. Austria, 3 April 2003, §11.1.

¹⁸⁴ CAT Nadeem Ahmad Dar v. Norway, 11 May 2007, §16.5.

¹⁸⁵ CAT Mafhoud Brada v. France, 17 May 2005, §15.

quent information. It should be clear that when subsequent information provided by the State is taken into account, the information provided by the petitioner (if possible) or his counsel should be as well.

In Elif Pelit v. Azerbaijan (2007) CAT found a violation not just of Article 22 ICAT, but also of Article 3. It referred to the fact that Azerbaijan had ignored its provisional measures, together with the fact that the assurances provided by Turkey (the receiving State) were insufficient and the fact that Azerbaijan had not respected Conclusion No. 12 of the UNHCR Executive Committee to the effect that it should have recognized the determination of refugee status by Germany, another State party to the Refugee Convention.¹⁸⁶

In Cruz Varas (1991) the European Court pointed out that the European Commission or its President only took provisional measures in exceptional circumstances.¹⁸⁷ In expulsion or extradition cases they serve the purpose of ‘putting the Contracting States on notice that, in the Commission’s view, irreversible harm may be done to the applicant if he is expelled and, further, that there is good reason to believe that his expulsion may give rise to a breach of Article 3 of the convention’.¹⁸⁸ Apparently the Court distinguished the irreparable harm which may be done to the petitioner from the breach of Article 3 of the Convention that this expulsion may give rise to. It then merely concluded that a State, when it decides not to comply with a provisional measure, knowingly assumes the risk of being found in breach of Article 3 following adjudication of the dispute. Any such finding would then have to be seen as aggravated by the failure to comply with the indication, since by way of this provisional measure the State had had its attention drawn to ‘the dangers of prejudicing the outcome of the issue then pending before the Commission’.¹⁸⁹

The Commission, however, had previously stated that Contracting Parties do not have a choice between either complying with their obligations, or instead trying to provide a remedy for the violation once it has been established.¹⁹⁰ It had referred to the text of Article 1 of the Convention, stipulating that the High Contracting Parties “shall secure” the rights and freedoms in the Convention, and to the Court’s statements on the interpretation of the Convention’s provisions so as to make its safeguards practical and effective. It had concluded that the primary obligation of the Contracting Parties must always be not to violate the Convention in the first place.

Yet there was something else at stake than the risk for States of being found in breach of an international rule. An interpretation of such human rights treaties necessarily must take as a point of reference the position of the (potential) victim. Sweden specifically based its refusal to take provisional measures on its view that these were not legally binding. The likelihood of being found in aggravated breach after completion of the dispute’s adjudication may induce States to take provisional measures seriously, but apparently such inducements are not equal to a situation where provisional measures are legally binding.

The ECtHR (Grand Chamber) case Mamatkulov (2005) has particular relevance for the discussion of assessment of risk at the stage of provisional measures, because it illustrates the extent to which on the merits the ECtHR gave weight to its assessment of real risk at the stage of provi-

¹⁸⁶ CAT Elif Pelit v. Azerbaijan, 1 May 2007, §11. It also noted that ‘(b)y establishing Tunisia as the destination for the complainant, in spite of the latter’s explicit request not to be returned to his country of origin, the State party failed to take account of the universally accepted practice in such cases, whereby an alternative solution is sought with the agreement of the individual concerned and the assistance of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and a third country willing to receive the individual who fears for his safety’, §8.5.

¹⁸⁷ ECtHR Cruz Varas et al. v. Sweden, Judgment of 20 March 1991, §103.

¹⁸⁸ Ibid.

¹⁸⁹ Ibid.

¹⁹⁰ ECtHR Cruz Varas et al. v. Sweden, Judgment of 20 March 1991, §126.

sional measures when the State subsequently ignored these.¹⁹¹ In reference to this case, where the petitioners rather than the State bore the consequences, it is argued that the minority opinion of Bratza, Bonello and Hedigan in fact took the better approach.¹⁹²

Because the State had ignored the Court's provisional measures in Mamatkulov the Court had been prevented from effectively examining the complaint under Article 3 ECHR. Nevertheless, despite many indications of risk of a violation of Article 3, the Court rewarded the State for this behaviour by not finding a violation of this article.¹⁹³ Instead it only found a violation of Article 34 ECHR. In the circumstances of the case it found that the petitioners 'undeniably suffered non-pecuniary damage' that 'cannot be repaired solely by a finding that the respondent State has failed to comply with its obligations under Article 34'. In that light the Court awarded each applicant € 5,000 for non-pecuniary damage.¹⁹⁴

It is doubtful, in my view, whether an award for non-pecuniary damage alone helps repair the harm done or prevent future violations. This situation is particularly grave given the serious indications of risk available at the time of extradition, indications that indeed triggered the use of provisional measures and that were borne out by subsequent facts.

At the merits stage the petitioners' counsel had pointed out the significant difference between the situation of the petitioners in Turkey, before extradition, when they had denied the charges against them, and their full admission of the same charges once in Uzbekistan. They referred to the lack of legal assistance and suggested they had been forced to 'confess' the crimes.¹⁹⁵

According to Turkey Article 3 should only apply in extradition cases when it was certain that the requesting State would inflict the prohibited treatment. The petitioner should produce strong evidence that there were substantial grounds for believing he or she was facing torture or ill treatment. The State also argued that Article 3 should not be 'construed in a way that would engage the extraditing State's responsibility indefinitely'. Its responsibility 'should end once the extradited person had been found guilty and had started to serve his or her sentence'.

The Court acknowledged that the findings by international human rights organisations denouncing an administrative practice of torture and other forms of ill treatment of political dissidents described the general situation in Uzbekistan. These findings, however, did not support the specific allegations made by the petitioners in this particular case. Corroboration by other evidence was necessary.

The ECtHR assesses issues 'in light of all the material placed before it or, if necessary, material obtained proprio motu'.¹⁹⁶

"Since the nature of the Contracting States' responsibility under Article 3 in cases of this kind lies in the act of exposing an individual to the risk of ill-treatment, the existence of the risk must be assessed primarily with reference to those facts which were known or ought to have been known to the Contracting State at the time of the extradition; the Court is not precluded, ¹⁹¹ See also Chapter XVII (Official State responses).

¹⁹² See also Rieter (2007), p. 975.

¹⁹³ See Chapter XV on assessment of immediacy and risk.

¹⁹⁴ ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §134.

¹⁹⁵ During the extradition proceedings in Turkey the petitioners had denied the charges against them 'and adduced relevant evidence in their defence'. By contrast, counsel pointed out, the fact that the petitioners, once in Uzbekistan, and without legal assistance by a lawyer of their choosing, 'had fully admitted the same charges to the Uzbek authorities', 'showed that they had been forced through torture and ill-treatment to "confess" to crimes they had not committed'. ECtHR Grand Chamber Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 4 February 2005, §60.

¹⁹⁶ ECtHR Grand Chamber Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 4 February 2005, §69.

however, from having regard to information which comes to light subsequent to the extradition. This may be of value in confirming or refuting the appreciation that has been made by the Contracting Party of the well-foundedness or otherwise of an applicant's fears".¹⁹⁷

When the petitioner has not been extradited or deported during the Court's examination of the case 'the relevant time will be that of the proceedings before the Court' (i.e. the relevant time for the assessment of the risk).¹⁹⁸ In other words, if the State had respected the provisional measures the Court would have determined whether there was a real risk on the basis of the situation at the time of its decision on the merits rather than at the time the expulsion or extradition was initially intended. The Court noted that this situation 'typically arises when deportation or extradition is delayed' as a result of a provisional measure by the Court. Such measure 'means more often than not that the Court does not yet have before it all the relevant evidence it requires to determine whether there is a real risk of treatment proscribed by Article 3 in the country of destination'.¹⁹⁹

On the other hand, in this case the date that should be taken into consideration when assessing whether there was a real risk of a violation of Article 3 was 27 March 1999, when the petitioners were extradited despite the Court's provisional measure.

"By applying Rule 39, the Court indicated that it was not able on the basis of the information then available to make a final decision on the existence of a real risk. Had Turkey complied (...) the relevant date would have been the date of the Court's consideration of the case in the light of the evidence that had been adduced".²⁰⁰

It then pointed out that 'Turkey's failure to comply with the indication given by the Court has prevented the Court from following its normal procedure. Nevertheless, the Court cannot speculate as to what the outcome of the case would have been had the extradition been deferred as it had requested. For this reason, it will have to assess Turkey's responsibility under Article 3 by reference to the situation that obtained on 27 March 1999'.²⁰¹

When the Grand Chamber adopted its Judgment in Mamatkulov, on 15 December 2004, the representatives of the petitioners had still been unable to contact the petitioners.²⁰² The Court concluded as follows:

"In the light of the materials before it, the Court is not able to conclude that substantial grounds existed at the aforementioned date for believing that the applicants faced a real risk of treatment proscribed by Article 3. Turkey's failure to comply with the indication given under Rule 39, which prevented the Court from assessing whether a real risk existed in the manner it considered appropriate in the circumstances of the case, must be examined below under Article 34".²⁰³

¹⁹⁷ Ibid., §69, referring to Cruz Varas and others v. Sweden, 20 March 1991, §§75-76 and Vilvarajah and others v. the United Kingdom, 30 October 1991, §107.

¹⁹⁸ See e.g. ECtHR Chahal v. the United Kingdom, Judgment of 15 November 1996, §§85-86 and ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §69.

¹⁹⁹ ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §69.

²⁰⁰ Id., §75.

²⁰¹ Id., §75.

²⁰² Id., §36.

²⁰³ Id., §77. The Court noted that Turkey had asserted that it extradited the petitioners after it had obtained an assurance from the Uzbek Government. In fact it was the Public Prosecutor of Uzbekistan who gave the assurance that the 'applicants' property will not be liable to general

With regard to Mamatkulov and Askarov the Court concluded that the facts clearly showed that their extradition prevented it 'from conducting a proper examination of their complaints in accordance with its settled practice in similar cases and ultimately from protecting them, if need be, against potential violations of the Convention as alleged'.²⁰⁴ It found a violation of Article 34.²⁰⁵

In short, in Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey the Grand Chamber confirmed (more or less) the earlier decision by the First Section²⁰⁶ finding no violation of Art. 3 despite its recognition of the adverse situation with regard to respect for the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment in Uzbekistan, and notwithstanding the fact that Turkey had ignored the Court's provisional measures in violation of Article 34.

Different from the judgment of the First Section, in which there were no dissents, in the Grand Chamber three judges dissented on this issue. Judges Bratza, Bonello and Hedigan would indeed have found violations of Article 3.²⁰⁷ They pointed out that the prohibition of ill-treatment 'is an absolute prohibition even in the case of expulsion and extradition and that the activities of the individual in question, however undesirable or dangerous and whether or not terrorist-related, cannot be a material consideration where a real risk of treatment contrary to Article 3 has been shown'.²⁰⁸ They emphasised that when there is a real risk of a violation of Article 3 it is not allowed to extradite someone by arguing that 'a refusal to extradite would interfere with rights under international treaties or conflict with the norms of international judicial process or would inevitably involve an assessment of conditions in the requesting country which is not a Party to the Convention against the standards of Article 3 of the Convention'.²⁰⁹ confiscation, and the applicants will not be subjected to acts of torture or sentenced to capital punishment'. The prosecutor added that Uzbekistan 'is a party to the United Nations Convention against Torture and accepts and re-affirms its obligation to comply with the requirements of the provisions of that Convention as regards both Turkey and the international community as a whole'. ECtHR Grand Chamber Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §76. Uzbekistan also produced medical reports from the doctors of the Uzbek prisons in which the applicants were subsequently held.

²⁰⁴ ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §127.

²⁰⁵ See Chapter XVI on legal status.

²⁰⁶ ECtHR (First Section) Mamatkulov and Abdurasulovic v. Turkey, 6 February 2003. See also Rieter (2004).

²⁰⁷ They would also have found a violation of Article 6 and Judge Rozakis (Greece) joined them in this.

²⁰⁸ Joint partly Dissenting Opinion of Judges Bratza, Bonello and Hedigan, ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §2, referring to Chahal v. UK, 15 November 1996, §§79-80.

²⁰⁹ Joint partly Dissenting Opinion of Judges Bratza, Bonello and Hedigan, ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §2, referring to Soering v. UK, 7 July 1989, §§83 and 88-91. The dissenters confirmed that the existence of a risk must be assessed 'primarily with reference to those facts which were known or ought to have been known to the Contracting State responsible for returning the person at the time of the extradition or expulsion at question'. 'The Court is not precluded from having regard for information which comes to light subsequent to the return of the person, such information being of potential value in confirming or refuting the appreciation made by the Contracting State or the well-foundedness or otherwise of an applicant's fears'. Joint partly Dissenting Opinion of Judges Bratza, Bonello and Hedigan, ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §3. At the same time they acknowledged, in reference to Vilvarajah, that 'evidence as to the actual treatment received by the applicant on his return to the receiving country is not conclusive, the essential question being whether it was foreseeable at the time of the expulsion that the person would be subjected to ill-treatment reaching the threshold of Article 3'. Joint partly Dissenting

They pointed out that the question to be determined was whether there were substantial grounds for believing that the applicants faced a real risk of ill-treatment on 27 March 1999, the date on which they were handed over to the Uzbek authorities.

“By applying Rule 39 the Chamber of the Court was necessarily satisfied that there existed at least a prima facie case for the existence of such a risk. There appears to us to have been a strong basis for such a view”.²¹⁰

They added the following:

“It is unclear to us what further corroborative evidence could reasonably be expected of the applicants, particularly in a case such as the present, where it was Turkey’s failure to comply with the interim measures indicated by the Court which has prevented the Court from carrying out a full and effective examination of the application in accordance with its normal procedures. In such a situation, we consider that the Court should be slow to reject the complaint under Article 3 in the absence of compelling evidence to dispel the fears which formed the basis of the application of Rule 39”.²¹¹

Judges Bratza, Bonello and Hedigan considered that substantial grounds had indeed been shown ‘for believing that the applicants faced a real risk of ill-treatment and that, in returning the applicants despite this risk, Article 3 of the Convention has been violated’.²¹²

Opinion of Judges Bratza, Bonello and Hedigan, ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §3, referring to Vilvarajah and others v. UK, 30 October 1991, §112.

²¹⁰ They referred in particular to Amnesty International’s briefing for CAT, made public in October 1999, noting a growing number of reports of ill-treatment and torture by law enforcement officials since 1997 of persons perceived to be members of Islamic congregations, especially suspected supporters of banned movements such as Erk. Moreover, the briefing noted the response in the wake of bomb explosions in the capital in February 1999 and statements of officials, including the President, that ‘if not directly sanctioning the use of violence by State agents, could be perceived at the very least as condoning the use torture and ill-treatment’. The dissenters considered that the ‘undisputed findings’ about the general situation in Uzbekistan ‘provide strong grounds for believing that the applicants were at particular risk’. “Not only were both applicants members of Erk but both were arrested in March 1999 (shortly after the reported terrorist bomb attacks in Tashkent) on suspicion of homicide, causing injuries by explosions and an attempted terrorist attack on the President of Uzbekistan himself”. Joint partly Dissenting Opinion of Judges Bratza, Bonello and Hedigan. ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §7.

²¹¹ Joint partly dissenting opinion of Judges Bratza, Bonello and Hedigan. ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §8.

²¹² Joint partly dissenting opinion of Judges Bratza, Bonello and Hedigan. ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §13. They disputed the reliance by the Court on the assurances given by the Uzbek Government, the statement by the Public Prosecutor that Uzbekistan was party to the Convention against Torture and the medical reports from the doctors of the Uzbek prison in which the petitioners were being held upon extradition. They found it ‘striking that the only assurance which was received prior to the applicants’ surrender (namely, that of 9 March 1999) was not even communicated to the Court until 19 April 1999, well after the application of Rule 39 and after the extradition had been effected in disregard of the Court’s interim measures’. See also Chapter XVII (Official State responses). “Moreover, an assurance, even one given in good faith, that an individual will not be subjected to ill-treatment is

With regard to the assurances in Mamatkulov the Court did not address the fact that Turkey used the Uzbek assurances as an excuse for having ignored the Court's provisional measures.²¹³ Moreover, it entered new information by forwarding reports by medical doctors made subsequent to the extradition. In this context the Court could have taken the opportunity to examine the value of such assurances on the basis of generally available information without adhering to its approach of taking into account only the information available at the time of extradition. After all the State did not invoke the assurances to convince the Court to withdraw its provisional measures, but instead invoked them after having ignored these measures. The fact that the State deprived the Court of the opportunity to assess these assurances in advance of the extradition should not provide the State the additional advantage that critical reports published subsequently could not be taken into account, if these discredit the value of such assurances, especially not when the reports by medical staff provided subsequently by the State were indeed taken into account.

Other information that became available subsequently equally confirms the European Court's assessment of real risk at the provisional measures stage. In April 2001 the HRC expressed grave concern about 'consistent allegations of widespread torture, inhuman treatment and abuse of power by law enforcement officials'.²¹⁴ In June 2002 CAT equally was concerned about the 'particularly numerous, ongoing and consistent allegations of particularly brutal acts of torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment committed by law enforcement personnel'.²¹⁵ It was also concerned about the 'lack of access for persons deprived of liberty, immediately after they are apprehended, to independent counsel, a doctor or medical examiner and family members, an important safeguard against torture'.²¹⁶ Moreover, it noted 'a lack of practical training for doctors in the detection of signs of torture or ill-treatment of persons who have been or are in custody'.²¹⁷ The Committee further expressed alarm over the 'de facto refusal of judges to take account of evidence of torture and ill-treatment provided by the accused, so that there are neither investigations nor prosecutions' and concerning 'the numerous cases of convictions based on confessions, and the continued use of the criterion of "solved crimes" as the basis not of itself a sufficient safeguard where doubts exist as to its effective implementation". Joint partly dissenting opinion of Judges Bratza, Bonello and Hedigan. ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §§9 and 10, referring to Chahal v. UK, judgment of 15 November 1996, §105. They considered that the situation for political dissidents in Uzbekistan at the time of their surrender was such as to 'give rise to serious doubts' about the effectiveness of the assurances. The same applied to the reliance on the fact that Uzbekistan was party to the Convention against Torture. In this respect they referred in particular to the findings of Amnesty International. Joint partly dissenting opinion of Judges Bratza, Bonello and Hedigan. ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §§10 and 11. Finally, they noted that the medical reports were 'very brief and unspecific', following medical examinations apparently carried out 'at least 21 months after the extradition of the applicants and some 18 months after their trial and conviction'. "Insofar as any regard may be had to events occurring after the extradition had taken place we can attach very little weight to these reports which cast no light on the treatment received by the applicants in the intervening period and, more particularly, in the period leading up to their trial".

²¹³ Generally on the controversial issue of assurances, see e.g. Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk), section 3.2.4 on non-refoulement cases.

²¹⁴ HRC Concluding Observations, 4 April 2001, CCPR/CO/71/UZB, 26 April 2001, §7.

²¹⁵ CAT Concluding Observations CAT/C/CR/28/7, 6 June 2002, §5a.

²¹⁶ Id., §5b.

²¹⁷ Id., §5d.

for promotion of law enforcement personnel, which, taken together, create conditions that promote the use of torture and ill-treatment to force detainees to “confess”,²¹⁸

A few days before publication of the judgment by the First Section the UN Special Rapporteur on the question of torture, Theo van Boven, concluded that systemic torture takes place in Uzbekistan.²¹⁹ The Concluding Observations by CAT and the HRC and the report by the Special Rapporteur all seem to indicate that the assurances such as those provided to Turkey by Uzbekistan are of little value.²²⁰

The rationale for taking into account only the information available at the time of the extradition relates to the fact that the human rights situation may significantly change between that time and the decision on the merits.

Indeed, if the situation is improved and the petitioners have not yet been extradited the Court may find that the extradition would now be allowed under the Convention despite the fact that it considered there was a real risk a few years previously at the provisional measures stage. If the situation has deteriorated this will also be taken into account, except when the petitioner has already been extradited, even if the petitioner was indeed subjected to ill-treatment.

Yet when the State extradited petitioners despite provisional measures, this approach gives an unfair advantage to the State. This is exacerbated in a situation such as this where the State invokes assurances to justify ignoring the Court’s provisional measures.²²¹ In fact the State received one of the letters by Uzbekistan on 9 March, nine days before the Court used provisional measures. It could have informed the Court of these assurances and requested the Court not to maintain its provisional measures. The Court would then have been able to examine the contents of the assurances.²²² It would have noted, for instance, that Uzbekistan did not reaffirm its obligations under the ICCPR and the OP, but only referred to its obligations under the Convention against Torture. In this respect it is significant that Uzbekistan executed several petitioners to the OP in blatant disregard of the HRC’s provisional measures.²²³ These cases concerned complaints about confessions extracted under torture. In the context of anti-terrorism measures it is also ²¹⁸ Id., §5h. In May 2002 the delegation of Uzbekistan before CAT indicated that the authorities were considering to train medical personnel in recognizing and preventing torture. It is unlikely that the physicians who provided the medical certificates on the health of the petitioners would have already received such training and would have been aware that the authorities should not pressure them. Press release, ‘Committee Against Torture concludes consideration of report of Uzbekistan’, CAT 28th session, 2 May 2002.

²¹⁹ Special Rapporteur on the question of torture (Theo van Boven), E/CN.4/2003/68/Add.2, 3 February 2003.

²²⁰ See also Human Rights Watch (2004).

²²¹ Tams (2003), p. 678 takes a different approach, considering that ‘the Court sensibly opted for a relatively restrictive reading’ of Article 3 and that it ‘had good reason to rely on Uzbekistan’s formal assurances to respect the international guarantees against torture and inhuman treatment’. Nevertheless, he finds it ‘slightly surprising’ that the Court ‘seemed to downplay the relevance of independent assessments by bodies such as Amnesty International’. He noted that independent country reports ‘seem a rather helpful (although not sufficient) source of information’ to assess whether there is a real risk.

²²² The other letter of assurances invoked by Uzbekistan was of 10 April 1999, after which the petitioners had been extradited. It was only on 19 April 1999 that Turkey informed the Court of these assurances.

²²³ Press release, ‘Human Rights Committee deplores the execution of six individuals in Uzbekistan’, 24 July 2003. See also Chapter III (Halting executions) and Chapter XVII (Official State responses).

noteworthy that Uzbekistan only refers to the prohibition of torture and not to that of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment laid down in Article 7 ICCPR.

Obviously, while Uzbekistan refers to its obligations under the Convention against Torture alone, ignoring its obligations under the ICCPR that are similar to Article 3 ECHR, Turkey nevertheless has the obligation to secure the right not to be subjected to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment in Article 3 ECHR for everyone under its jurisdiction.

Thus the ECtHR generally holds responsible the extraditing State for those violations that this State could have foreseen at the time of extradition, not taking into account subsequent events. Nevertheless, in circumstances such as these it would have been more in line with the aim of using provisional measures to protect against irreparable harm to persons if the Court would have found that the evidence available at the time of removal indeed indicated a real risk of access to counsel being blocked and of incommunicado detention and torture.

The fact that it has to assess Turkey's responsibility by reference to the situation on the day they were extradited does not mean that the Court should ignore the fact that at the time it used provisional measures it considered there was a real risk of a violation of Article 3 in the requesting State, a risk that Turkey, through its extradition in defiance of the Court's provisional measures, made impossible to assess properly. In this respect the fact that the petitioners' counsel were unable to contact them in Uzbekistan is indeed significant for the assessment whether Turkey violated Article 3 when it extradited the petitioners. The Court itself concluded that in this case the extradition 'irreversibly reduced' the level of protection it could offer to the rights asserted under Articles 2 and 3.²²⁴

Much weight is to be given to the initial finding of prima facie risk at the stage of provisional measures, because by ignoring these measures the State has made it impossible for the Court to examine all the evidence it needs. As to subsequent information, the Court should not pay heed just to what the State is saying, but also to publicly available information.

If, upon renewed assessment of the information available at the time of the extradition, there is credible evidence of systematic torture and ill-treatment, combined with the individual factors that extradition was requested specifically for these petitioners, on charge of terrorism, the balance should generally tilt in favour of the person at risk. After all, the Court used provisional measures so as to be able to examine the case properly and it was the extraditing State that ignored them. In such cases the burden should shift to the State to show that these rights have not been violated.

In a slightly different context the Court has considered that a failure to investigate allegations of ill-treatment in itself constituted a violation of Article 3.²²⁵ Similarly, in my view a failure to fully cooperate with the ECtHR and adequately consider whether there is a real risk of a violation of Article 3, together with a failure to respect the right of individual petition by ignoring the Court's provisional measures in the context of Article 3, may in itself constitute a violation of that article.

Given the serious nature of the harm risked and the vulnerability of one party (the petitioner) vis-à-vis the other (the State), it should be the State that should bear the consequences of its non-compliance with the adjudicator's provisional measures.²²⁶

²²⁴ ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 4 February 2005, §108.

²²⁵ ECtHR Assenov et al. v. Bulgaria, 28 October 1998.

²²⁶ See also Rieter (2005b) and Vermeulen/De Vries (2005), §5.

3 FOLLOW-UP BY OTHER AUTHORITIES IN VARIOUS INTER-STATE SYSTEMS OF COOPERATION

As noted when discussing the legal status of provisional measures, authorities other than the HRC have also stressed that States should comply with the Committee's provisional measures.²²⁷ The UN Rapporteur against Torture, for instance, did so in 2003 and 2004²²⁸ and the Deputy UN High Commissioner for Human Rights equally urged respect for the Committee's provisional measures (2003). He emphasised the importance of respecting 'interim measures of protection ordered by Human Rights Treaty Bodies'.²²⁹ With regard to executions of death sentences in violation of the provisional measures by the HRC he spoke of a 'grave breach' of the obligations under both the ICCPR and the OP.²³⁰

During his visit of March 2003 the Deputy High Commissioner for Human Rights, Bertrand Ramcharan, discussed with senior officials, the compliance with provisional measures 'ordered by' the HRC. He was visiting countries in Central Asia to enhance dialogue and technical cooperation.²³¹

²²⁷ Indeed 'there may be good reasons to utilize both avenues [urgent action under both treaty and non treaty protection system] concurrently so as to enhance the chances of relief', Van Boven (2005), p. 106.

²²⁸ See e.g. Special Rapporteur on Torture, mission to Uzbekistan of November-December 2002, E/CN.4/2003/68/Add.2. See also official statement by the Special Rapporteur on Torture, 13 September 2004, referring to the 'interim measures ordered by the Committee and urgent appeals dispatched by United Nations monitoring mechanisms regarding persons whose life and physical integrity may be at risk of imminent and irreparable harm'.

²²⁹ Press release Deputy United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights Bertrand Ramcharan, 'Deputy Human Rights Chief ends visit to Uzbekistan with call for implementation of official commitments', 14 March 2003.

²³⁰ See e.g. press release Acting High Commissioner for Human Rights Bertrand Ramcharan, 'Acting High Commissioner for Human Rights asks Uzbek government not to carry out death sentences in cases under international appeal', 4 July 2003 and 'Acting High Commissioner for Human Rights deeply concerned at executions in Uzbekistan', 25 July 2003.

²³¹ 'Official visit of the Deputy High Commissioner in Tajikistan', <www.unhcr.ch/news/tajikistan.htm> (consulted 6 March 2003). In April 2001 Tajikistan executed Mr. Gaibullodzhon Ilyasovich Saidov. In January of that year the Committee had used provisional measures on his behalf. The State party had not responded. While the HRC devoted a separate section of its decision on the merits to the State's failure to respect its provisional measures, reiterating the remarks made in earlier decisions, it did not issue a press release. The initial provisional measures were addressed to the State on 12 January 2001. The execution took place on 4 April 2001. The Committee was informed of this on 10 May 2001. With this knowledge, a Note Verbale was sent to the State on 18 May 2001 requesting information on the situation of Mr. Saidov and reiterating the provisional measures. On 19 June 2001 the Chairperson of the Committee addressed the State with a request for clarification on the non-compliance with the provisional measures. Finally, on 3 August 2001, a Note Verbale was addressed to the State requesting it to provide information on 'what steps were taken by the State to comply with the Committee's rule 86 request, on what grounds Mr. Saidov was executed, and what measures are being taken by the state to guarantee compliance with such requests in future'. On 5 December 2002 the State was invited, once more, to provide this information. Barno Saidova v. Tajikistan, 8 July 2004.

In July 2003 the HRC issued a press release deploring the execution of six beneficiaries of its provisional measures in Uzbekistan.²³² The UN Special Rapporteur on the question of torture had already addressed the issue of compliance with the provisional measures of the HRC during his mission to Uzbekistan (November-December 2003). In his report he noted with concern that it became clear from his discussion with the Acting Chairperson of the Supreme Court that this Court, which reviews all death penalty cases, was not aware of the Committee's provisional measures. He pointed out that a large number of the provisional measures related to death sentences based on confessions allegedly extracted under torture.²³³ He recommended:

"All competent government authorities should give immediate attention and respond to interim measures ordered by the Human Rights Committee and urgent appeals dispatched by United Nations monitoring mechanisms regarding persons whose life and physical integrity may be at risk of imminent and irreparable harm".²³⁴

From the press release of the HRC deploring the executions of six individuals it appears that at least one of the individual cases addressed by the UN Rapporteur was also pending before the HRC. This was the case of Ulugbek Eshov. The Rapporteur noted, among others, that it was reported that Eshov was forced to sign a confession and that he could not stand or walk during the trial. His mother saw him last in August 2001. The Rapporteur pointed out that fears had been expressed that he 'may have been' executed.²³⁵ Subsequent to his visit the Rapporteur addressed the Chairperson of the HRC and expressed an interest in coordinating his activities with those of the HRC and exchange information on urgent cases including those in which the Committee had used provisional measures.²³⁶

As noted, in March 2003 the Deputy United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights visited Uzbekistan as part of an official trip to countries of Central Asia to enhance dialogue and technical cooperation. During his visit he noted that 'in several instances, interim measures of protection ordered by Human Rights Treaty Bodies had not been respected and that persons had even been executed notwithstanding such orders'. He urged respect for such provisional meas-

²³² It pointed out that their cases were pending before it. Moreover, it had issued provisional measures on their behalf. The petitioners had alleged that their death sentences were preceded by an unfair trial. The HRC noted that it had discussed the information of their execution during its plenary session. It reminded the State party of 'its position that it amounts to a grave breach of the Optional Protocol to execute an individual whose case is pending before the Committee, in particular where a request for interim protection under rule 86 of the Committee's Rules of Procedure has been issued'. It reiterated the provisional measures 'in all other cases currently pending under the Optional Protocol in respect of Uzbekistan'. The State was not to execute the persons involved before the HRC had concluded its consideration of those cases. More generally, it requested the State party's full cooperation with all cases currently pending before it. Finally, it took the opportunity to request the State to submit its second periodic report by April 2004, as requested in its Concluding Observations three years previously. Press release, 'Human Rights Committee deplores the execution of six individuals in Uzbekistan', 24 July 2003. The petitioners who were executed were Muzaffar Mirzaev (case 1170/2003), Shukrat Andasbaev (case 1166/2003), Ulugbek Ashov (case 1165/2003), Ilkhon Babadzhanov and Maksud Ismailov (case 1162/2003), and Azamat Uteev (case 1150/2003).

²³³ Special Rapporteur against Torture (Theo van Boven), Report of mission to Uzbekistan, E/CN.4/2003/68/Add.2, 3 February 2003, §§36 and 64.

²³⁴ Id., §70 (u).

²³⁵ Id., §40.

²³⁶ Information on file with the author.

ures.²³⁷ In July 2003 he asked the government of Uzbekistan once more not to carry out the execution of detainees whose cases were pending before the HRC. He re-iterated the importance of respecting interim measures of protection issued by human rights treaty bodies. Indicating that Special Procedures of the Commission on Human Rights had also brought some of these cases to the attention of the government, he urged the State 'to make all necessary efforts in order to ensure strict observance of its international human rights obligations' under the ICCPR and its OP 'and to cooperate fully with the Special Procedures'.²³⁸

Following the press release by the HRC deploring the execution of six petitioners in contravention of its provisional measures, the Acting High Commissioner equally expressed his concern and deep regret about these executions. He stressed that they 'render futile review by the Human Rights Committee of these cases, which amounts to a grave breach of Uzbekistan's obligations' under the ICCPR and the OP.²³⁹ During its summer session (14 July-8 August 2003) the HRC discussed the situation once more, deplored the executions and 'reminded the State party of its position that it amounts to a grave breach of the Optional Protocol to execute an individual whose case is pending before the Committee, in particular where a request for interim protection under rule 86 of the Committee's Rules of Procedure has been issued'.²⁴⁰

Since the execution of these six persons, Uzbekistan has executed at least three other petitioners as well. Apparently the HRC sent several letters for clarification, but it did not issue a press release. The Special Rapporteur on Torture did. He referred to his mission to Uzbekistan at the end of 2002. He deeply regretted that he continued 'to receive information on the execution of persons whose death sentences were allegedly based on confessions extracted under torture in Uzbekistan'. He strongly deplored that 'in a number of cases the Government disregarded requests of the United Nations Human Rights Committee to stay executions pending its considerations of the cases'. He pointed out that since the publication of the report of his visit at least nine persons had been executed despite the Committee's provisional measures. On the first six executions he had already commented previously. In this press statement he referred to the last two executions, of Azizbek Karimov and Yusuf Zhumayev, on 10 August 2004. He appealed to the government to 'ensure strict observance' of its obligations under the ICCPR, the OP and the Convention against Torture as well as to co-operate fully with the Special Procedures of the Commission on Human Rights. Once more he drew attention to the recommendations on the report of his visits.

"In particular, that all competent Government authorities give immediate attention and respond to interim measures ordered by the Committee and urgent appeals dispatched by United Nations monitoring mechanisms regarding persons whose life and physical integrity may be at risk of imminent and irreparable harm".²⁴¹

²³⁷ Press release Deputy United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights Bertrand Ramcharan, 'Deputy Human Rights Chief ends visit to Uzbekistan with call for implementation of official commitments', 14 March 2003.

²³⁸ Press release Acting High Commissioner for Human Rights Bertrand Ramcharan, 'Acting High Commissioner for Human Rights asks Uzbek government not to carry out death sentences in cases under international appeal', 4 July 2003.

²³⁹ Press release Acting High Commissioner for Human Rights Bertrand Ramcharan, 'Acting High Commissioner for Human Rights deeply concerned at executions in Uzbekistan', 25 July 2003.

²⁴⁰ Press release 'Human Rights Committee rules on complaints of violations from individuals', 4 September 2003.

²⁴¹ Press Release Special Rapporteur on Torture 'UN expert deplores Uzbekistan's lack of co-operation with UN human rights mechanisms', 13 September 2004. See also Radio Free

Reuters reports that his statements ‘followed several similar critiques of the former Soviet Central Asian state’s human rights record from U.N. bodies and independent international organisations’. It also notes that ‘President Karimov rejects criticism of his harsh treatment of opponents and jailing of thousands of dissident Muslims’. ‘He says secular rule in the country is endangered by militants seeking to set up a hardline Islamic state’.²⁴²

Tajikistan has a moratorium on the death penalty since March 2004. In 2005 the President of Uzbekistan decided to put executions on hold and the death penalty was officially abolished as of 1 January 2008.²⁴³

Moving to the Americas, in the case of juvenile offender Alexander Williams the Inter-American Commission had issued press releases about its precautionary measures. The EU had also sent an urgent humanitarian appeal, as had the Secretary General of the Council of Europe. The state of Georgia (US) later decided to commute Williams’ death sentence, although this may have been predominantly for domestic reasons.²⁴⁴

At other times there appears to be concerted action by various international authorities that implicitly reinforces provisional measures used by human rights adjudicators. On 3 May 2002 the HRC used provisional measures requesting Australia to inform it of what measures it had taken to prevent any further acts of self-harm by at least two of the children of Mrs. Bakhtiyari detained in immigration detention.²⁴⁵ In May/June 2002 the regional advisor to the UN High Commissioner Europe/Radio Liberty, based on AP/Reuters, ‘Uzbekistan accused of ignoring UN over death penalty’, 13 September 2004, <www.rferl.org> (consulted on 14 September 2004); also referring to a statement of 13 September by the Independent Human Rights organisation of Uzbekistan that a man convicted of terrorism the previous week might have been tortured to death in prison. Authorities had said that he died of natural causes; Scoop media, ‘UN human rights official deplores executions in Uzbekistan’, 14 September 2004, <www.scoop.co.nz> (consulted 14 September 2004).

²⁴² Reuters Foundation AlertNet, ‘UN sleuth hits US ally Uzbekistan on executions’, 13 September 2004, <www.alertnet.org> (consulted on 14 September 2004).

²⁴³ Associated press ‘EU welcomes Uzbekistan’s abolition of the death penalty’, 4 January 2008. In some previous HRC cases Uzbekistan had respected the provisional measures. In Arutyunyan v. Uzbekistan (2004), the HRC used provisional measures in March 2000 and in May of that year the State party informed the Committee that his sentence had been commuted to twenty years imprisonment at the end of March 2000: Arsen Arutyunyan (submitted by his sister Karina) v. Uzbekistan, 29 March 2004. In the case of Ikram Mukhtarov the State also respected the Committee’s provisional measures. This was around the same time as it ignored them in two other cases. The petitioner had been sentenced to death in May 2004. ‘The court reportedly ignored the claim that his “confession” to the murders was extracted in the torture’. The HRC used provisional measures on his behalf in July 2004. In August 2004 the judicial board of the Supreme Court of Uzbekistan overturned his death sentence and referred his case for further investigation. The Uzbek NGO Mothers Against the Death Penalty and Torture had been campaigning on his behalf. This Organisation believes that international pressure has ‘played a crucial role in getting his case re-examined’. Amnesty International, further information on Urgent Action 234/04, 23 September 2004, AI Index: EUR 62/023/2004.

²⁴⁴ See urgent humanitarian appeal of 21 August 2000, under the French Presidency and of 14 February 2002 by Spain as the current EU president, together with Denmark, the subsequent president and the European Commission to the Governor of Georgia and the Chairman of the Georgia Board of Pardons and Paroles. See also appeal of 15 February 2002 for clemency by Walter Schwimmer, Secretary General of the Council of Europe, press release 085a (2002) and press release of the Secretary General welcoming the commutation of the death sentence of Mr. Williams to a prison sentence, press release 107a (2002), 26 February 2002.

²⁴⁵ HRC Bakhtiyari family v. Australia, 29 October 2003. See also Chapter VII (Detention).

of Human Rights and the UN Working Group on Arbitrary Detention visited and criticized immigration detention centres and the immigration of children.²⁴⁶ Some months later a Rapporteur of the UN Committee of the Rights of the Child, the UN High Commissioner for Refugees and the Executive Director of UNICEF Australia spoke out against the mandatory immigration detention of children as well.²⁴⁷

The case of minors detained in adult prisons in Honduras,²⁴⁸ in which the CIDH had used precautionary measures, had also generated an international outcry. One Honduran newspaper even reported that the Italian authorities had warned the Honduran Government that the European Union would introduce, within 40 days, trade sanctions against Honduras for violation of international treaties on the rights of children.²⁴⁹ ²⁴⁶ See e.g. Cynthia Banham, 'UN deplores "tragedy" of asylum system', 1 August 2002, <www.smh.com.au> (consulted 9 April 2003), referring to regional advisor Justice Bhagwati's statement, after his visit of Woomera in May and June 2002: "These children were growing up in an environment which affected their physical and mental growth and many of them were traumatised and led to harm themselves in utter despair". He also said that the children were being 'deprived of adequate educational services appropriate to their age'. The Government responded by criticising him for including 'a number of emotive descriptions and assertions that have no foundation in the human rights instruments to which Australia is a party'; see also Grant Holloway 'UN links Australian camps to self-harm and suicide', 6 June 2002, <www.cnn.com> (consulted 9 April 2003). The Working Group expressed concern that the conditions in the detention camps could lead to a 'collective depression syndrome'. Some of the concerns already expressed by the Working Group on Arbitrary Detention in advance of the publication of its report related to the detention of vulnerable people 'especially children, pregnant women, the disabled and the elderly' and to the legality of using private security firms to run the detention camps. Chairman Joinet said that 'the use of private security reduced the care of the detained to a "bottom-line business" equation'. He also considered that the contractual relationship 'reinforced the disciplinary nature of detention'. See Michael Millett and Michael Bradley, 'criminals better off than asylum seekers', Sydney Morning Herald, 7 June 2002, <www.smh.com.au> (consulted 9 April 2003). The Immigration Minister, Philip Ruddock noted: "I would simply say that the issue of how the detention centres themselves are managed is not a matter (in which) treaties or any involvement of the UN is appropriate". He pointed out: "We make a decision in terms of certain standards that we expect will be applied. The operators have to meet those standards and we seem to get the best value for tax payers here in Australia and we do that through a competitive tendering system". Grant Holloway 'UN links Australian camps to self-harm and suicide', 6 June 2002, <www.cnn.com> (consulted 9 April 2003).

²⁴⁷ See e.g. Judith Carp as quoted by Caroline Overington, 'Australia attacked for harming child asylum seekers', 2 May 2002, <www.theage.com.au> (consulted 9 April 2003); Tony Stevens, 'UN call for release of child detainees', the Age, 15 July 2002, <www.theage.com.au> (consulted on 9 April 2003) and the UN High Commissioner for Refugees pointed out, in September 2002, that 'Australia's policy of mandatory, indefinite detention of asylum seekers, particularly children, is an outrageous violation of international conventions and human rights'. See The World Today, 'Govt. grilled by UN over treatment of asylum seekers', Australian Broadcasting Cooperation 26 September 2002, <www.acc.net.au> (consulted on 9 April 2003).

²⁴⁸ CIDH Minors in detention v. Honduras, 10 March 1999 (merits), §21.

²⁴⁹ 'Honduras violates its Constitution by incarcerating minors with adult prisoners' in: La Nación, July 1995; In its footnote 57 the Commission also refers to several other articles: see 'Canada asks why children are being jailed in Honduras' in: El Heraldo, 2 June 1995; Letter from London's Central American Human Rights Committee to President Reina, 26 April 1996; 'They exploit international pressure exerted over the unlawful incarceration of juveniles' in: El Heraldo, 8 April 1995.

On the failure to comply with the Bosnia Chamber's Order for provisional measures not to hand over the petitioners to the US authorities the UN Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, which had been asked to submit an amicus curiae brief in this case, argued 'that the respondent Parties have no defence to their failure to comply with the Chamber's order for provisional measures. In accordance with Annex 6 to the General Framework Agreement, the Chamber's decisions are final and binding on all parties. The UN OHCHR notes that superseding the authority of the Chamber, an independent judicial body, with that of the Executive undermines the rule of law'.²⁵⁰ Even more than in the context of international treaties, follow-up by various officials has occurred in the hybrid 'constitutional' system that existed under the Dayton Peace Agreement. For instance OSCE officers have played a role in monitoring compliance with Bosnia Chamber decisions, including Orders for provisional measures.²⁵¹ Both the Office of the High Representative²⁵² and the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) were involved in monitoring compliance with Judgments and decisions by the Bosnia Chamber.

In the context of follow-up by authorities from various inter-State systems of cooperation, general policy documents can be relevant as well. In 2001 the EU adopted Guidelines to EU policy towards third countries on torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.²⁵³ In its actions against torture the EU would 'urge third countries' to take measures, among others to "comply with the requests for interim measures of protection, rulings, decisions and recommendations of international human rights bodies" and 'ensure that no one is forcibly returned to a country where he or she risks being subjected to torture or ill-treatment' and "co-operate with the relevant Council of Europe mechanisms, in particular the decisions of the European Court of Human Rights and recommendations of the Committee for the Prevention of Torture". The EU noted it will 'support the relevant international and regional mechanisms (e.g. the Committee Against Torture, the European Committee for the Prevention of Torture, the relevant Special Rapporteurs) and stress the need for states to co-operate with the mechanisms'.²⁵⁴ These Guidelines are interesting also because in order to convincingly invoke them vis-à-vis third countries, the EU members may be expected themselves to respect provisional measures.

4 FOLLOW-UP BY NGOS

The follow-up by the adjudicators can be reinforced not just by officials of international organisations, but also by NGOs.²⁵⁵ Often these NGOs were actively supporting the petition in the first ²⁵⁰ Bosnia Chamber Boudellaa, Lakhdar, Nechle and Lahmar v. BiH and Fed. BiH, 11 October 2002, §140.

²⁵¹ See e.g. Annual Reports 1999 and 2000 of the Bosnia Chamber, in its overview of cooperation with international institutions in BiH and Periodic Report of the Human Rights Field Operation in the former Yugoslavia of the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, April 1998, §§27-29. See also Berg Handbook (1999), p. 10.

²⁵² The High Representative is at the same time the EU's Special Representative. See the website of the High Representative: <<http://www.ohr.int/>>.

²⁵³ "The purpose of these guidelines is to provide the EU with an operational tool to be used in contacts with third countries at all levels as well as in multilateral human rights fora in order to support and strengthen on-going efforts to prevent and eradicate torture and ill-treatment in all parts of the world".

²⁵⁴ Guidelines to EU policy towards third countries on torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, adopted by General Affairs Council – Luxembourg, 09/04/01, <http://ec.europa.eu/external_relations/human_rights/torture/guideline_en.htm>.

²⁵⁵ On the role of NGOs see e.g. Keck/Sikkink (1998).

place. In Mamatkulov (2003) the International Commission of Jurists had submitted an amicus curiae arguing for the binding nature of provisional measures.

Moreover, in the African and Inter-American systems, NGOs may themselves be the petitioners. Especially in the context of the Inter-American system NGOs (often themselves the petitioners, but not the beneficiaries of the provisional measures) regularly issue press releases condemning non-compliance with decisions by the Inter-American Commission and Court, including their precautionary and provisional measures. To give just one example, in a press release CEJIL and Amazon Watch expressed their concern regarding Ecuador's failure to comply with the Commission's precautionary measures, initially ordered in December 2005 and expanded in August 2006 in order to protect several legal counsel in domestic litigation against Chevron-Texaco who were being threatened by members of the military. As Ecuador had not done anything to protect them and the attacks were persisting the NGOs proposed the State to take the following specific measures: to install alarms and means to identify the origin of telephone calls, secure telephone lines and police surveillance. The government should study these proposals and meet with the beneficiaries that same week to discuss them.²⁵⁶

Obviously it is easier for the beneficiaries and NGOs to use provisional measures as a tool to approach governments and the media in order to prevent irreparable harm when these measures include argumentation and sufficient precision.²⁵⁷

A good illustration of the interplay between a human rights adjudicator, officials of inter-governmental organisations and NGOs as part of international rather than regional litigation is the case of Habré, the former dictator of Chad. In April 2001 CAT had decided on provisional measures to the effect that Senegal should not expel Habré and should take all necessary measures to prevent him from leaving the territory of Senegal in violation of the principle that a person suspected of torture should be either prosecuted or extradited. Subsequently President Wade of Senegal told journalists that he was still seeking Habré's departure. He claimed that the UN had not asked Senegal to hold Habré. In response Human Rights Watch (HRW) urged him to comply with the provisional measure and to hold Habré until he could be extradited to face torture charges.²⁵⁸ In September 2001, following an appeal by UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan, President Wade stated that he had agreed to hold Habré in Senegal 'pending an extradition request from a country such as Belgium capable of organising a fair trial. He 'reaffirmed this pledge in a meeting with Human Rights Watch in May 2002'.²⁵⁹

This shows how different actors can reinforce each other's actions.²⁶⁰ Kofi Annan had the backup of CAT determining individual complaints under the Convention against Torture with its provision on aut dedere aut iudicare. CAT had requested the State, as an urgent measure, to prevent Habré from leaving Senegal in any other way than through extradition. Its provisional measure, in turn, was strengthened by UN Secretary General Kofi Annan, using his authority and position. All of this was triggered by Chadian organisations, supported by international NGOs who made sure to report on these actions both domestically and internationally.

As noted, this is a case about which much information has been made available, especially by NGOs. This makes it possible to discuss what happened subsequently, between the date of the ²⁵⁶ CEJIL, 'Ecuador no cumple con las medidas cautelares de la CIDH', press release of 6 March 2007.

²⁵⁷ See also Chapter II (Systems), section 8.2.

²⁵⁸ Human Rights Watch, Senegalese President urged to aid rights prosecution, 27 June 2001, <www.hrw.org> (consulted 10 April 2003).

²⁵⁹ Human Rights Watch, The case against Hissène Habré, an 'African Pinochet', 2003/2006, <http://www.hrw.org/justice/habre/habre_0402.pdf> (consulted 14 June 2007).

²⁶⁰ See also, more generally, Chapter XVII (Official responses).

Committee's provisional measures and of its decision on the merits. This information, as discussed below, illustrates how the provisional measures have helped prevent irreversible harm to the claim under the Convention against Torture.

In early 2002 the Belgian investigating judge and a police team visited Chad.

"The visit was front-page news in Chad and transformed the abstract case against Habré in far-off courts into a concrete reality, touching off a minor revolution in a country where Habré's most brutal henchmen still occupy most of the key security posts".²⁶¹

While President Déby had ousted Habré, many high ranking officials in the new government of Chad had been implicated in Habré's crimes. Thus, the new government had not sought his extradition from Senegal. Yet the fact itself that Habré was indicted in Senegal 'had an immediate impact back in Chad'. After his arrest in Senegal, President Déby of Chad met with representatives of the Chadian association of victims of political repression AVCRP and told them that 'the time for justice has come'.²⁶² In October 2000 seventeen victims had lodged criminal complaints in courts in Chad for torture, murder and disappearance against identified members of Habré's police. Human Rights Watch reports that 'in May 2001 a Chadian investigating judge began to hear witnesses, and in September 2002, he started calling in the defendants to testify'.²⁶³ Public attention in Senegal to Chad's ex-dictator may also have played a role in the decision of the government of Chad to allow the victims and human rights NGOs access to the files of the Documentation and Security Directorate (DDS), Habré's political police. Subsequently, one of the aforementioned NGOs²⁶⁴ examined these files and submitted them to the investigating judge in Belgium. Meanwhile, the American Association for the Advancement of Science, together with Human Rights Watch was making a statistical analysis of the document.²⁶⁵

All of this indicates that the authorities in Chad had allowed victims and organisations some measure of access to files both in order to find the truth and in order to facilitate prosecution, albeit not in Chad itself. A similar approach is evident from Chad's decision to inform the Belgian judge of its withdrawal of Habré's immunity. In a letter to the judge investigating the charges against Habré in Belgium, in October 2002, the Minister of Justice of Chad wrote that 'Habré can not claim to enjoy any form of immunity from the Chadian authorities'.²⁶⁶

At the same time, the actions before courts in Chad, Senegal and Belgium apparently have not been without risks for the victims and their representatives. HRW refers to 'security forces

²⁶¹ Human Rights Watch, The case against Hissène Habré, an 'African Pinochet', 2003/2006, <http://www.hrw.org/justice/habre/habre_0402.pdf> (consulted 14 June 2007).

²⁶² Id.

²⁶³ Id.

²⁶⁴ The association of victims of political repression (AVCRP).

²⁶⁵ Human Rights Watch, The case against Hissène Habré, an 'African Pinochet', 2003/2006, <http://www.hrw.org/justice/habre/habre_0402.pdf> (consulted 14 June 2007).

²⁶⁶ On 5 December 2002 HRW and FIDH received a copy of this letter and made it public. Letter of Minister of Justice, Djimain Koudj-Gaou, to the 'Juge d'Instruction' of Brussels, Tribunal First Instance, 7 October 2002: "La Conférence Nationale Souveraine tenue à N'Djaména du 15 Janvier au 7 Avril 1993 avait officiellement levé toute immunité de juridiction à Monsieur HISSEIN HABRE. Cette position a été confortée par la Loi No 010/PR/95 du 9 Juin 1995 accordant l'amnistie aux détenus et exiles politiques et aux personnes en opposition armée, à l'exclusion de l'ex Président de la République, HISSEIN HABRE, ses co-auteurs et/ou complices. Dès lors, il est clair que Monsieur HISSEIN HABRE ne peut prétendre à une quelconque immunité de la part des autorités Tchadiennes et ce depuis la fin de la Conférence Nationale Souveraine". See <www.hrw.org> (consulted on 18 April 2003).

commanded by one of the ex-DDS defendants' that threw a grenade at counsel for the International Committee for the Trial of Habré, Jacqueline Moudeina. She was severely injured and her office was later ransacked.²⁶⁷ Amnesty International notes that members of the security forces reportedly enquired who was Ms. Moudeina and then threw a teargas grenade in her direction. Following this, a senior member of the security forces who had been searching for her was said to have visited twice the medical centre to which she had been brought.²⁶⁸ The Vice-President of one of the NGOs, Mr. Souleymane Guengueng,²⁶⁹ apparently had been tailed by uniformed men and was suspended from his civil service job just after the visit of the Belgian judge.²⁷⁰ As noted, Mr. Guengueng was one of the victims on whose behalf HRW had submitted the case before CAT and requested provisional measures to prevent impunity for Habré.²⁷¹

In September 2005 an international arrest warrant was issued and Belgium asked for Habré's extradition from Senegal. The Chairperson of the Commission of the African Union supported the request, as did the UN Special Rapporteur on Torture and the UN Secretary-General. Almost two months later he was arrested and taken into custody in Senegal. Its Court of Appeal, however, ruled that it had no jurisdiction to decide on an extradition request involving a former head of state. It was subsequently decided that he could remain in Senegal, which would request the January 2006 summit of the African Union to 'indicate the competent jurisdiction' for his trial. The African Union set up a Committee of Eminent African Jurists to consider this question. This Committee should take into account, among others, 'adherence to the principles of total rejection of impunity', to fair trial standards, efficiency, accessibility to the trial by alleged victims and by witnesses as well as priority for an African mechanism.²⁷² Following this Commit-

²⁶⁷ Human Rights Watch, The case against Hissène Habré, an 'African Pinochet', 2003/2006, http://www.hrw.org/justice/habre/habre_0402.pdf (consulted 14 June 2007).

²⁶⁸ Amnesty International Annual Report 2002, AI index POL 10/001/2002.

²⁶⁹ Vice-President of the AVCRP.

²⁷⁰ Human Rights Watch, The case against Hissène Habré, an 'African Pinochet', 2003/2006, <http://www.hrw.org/justice/habre/habre_0402.pdf> (consulted 14 June 2007).

²⁷¹ In February 2003 Human Rights Watch stated it was confident that President Wade would keep his promise to extradite Habré if a third State would guarantee him a fair trial. The President had made a commitment to the UN and Kofi Annan to keep Habré in Senegal until he could be brought to justice elsewhere. Reed Brody de Human Rights Watch sur l'affaire Habré: 'nous faisons confiance au Président Wade', Le Soleil (Senegal), 25 February 2003. In February 2003, when he was in Paris, President Wade formally excluded any possibility for trial of Habré in Senegal. A trial where the civil parties and the defence would produce two to three thousand witnesses would 'ridicule the Senegalese justice system'. He pointed out that any State that so wished could bring an extradition request before the Senegalese judiciary that, if it were up to him, would receive a favourable response. He noted, however, that, as of yet, no country had requested such extradition. Hissène Habré ne sera pas jugé au Sénégal, selon Wade, Le Soleil, 24 February 2003.

²⁷² Human Rights Watch, The case against Hissène Habré, an 'African Pinochet', 2003/2006, <http://www.hrw.org/justice/habre/habre_0402.pdf> (consulted 14 June 2007). See also the African Union resolution itself: Assembly/AU/Dec.103 (VI). Meanwhile Amnesty International requested the Chairperson of African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights 'to establish contacts with the Senegalese authorities and to request information on the steps taken by Senegal to comply with its obligations under international law and to report back to the Commission at its next session'. Amnesty International, 'African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights: Oral statement on options for trial of Hissene Habre', AI Index: AFR 01/004/2006 (Public), News Service No: 115, 11 May 2006.

tee's advice,²⁷³ the AU mandated 'Senegal to prosecute and ensure that Hissène Habré is tried, on behalf of Africa, by a competent Senegalese court with guarantees for fair trial'.²⁷⁴

Concerted action by various international and domestic actors, intergovernmental and non governmental, is particularly warranted in situations involving death threats. As discussed in chapter IX, thus far, there is only one case in which information is available on the use of provisional measures by the HRC to protect against death threats. The Special Rapporteur of the HRC had used them in January 2004 and had requested the State to inform the Committee on the measures it had taken in compliance within thirty days.²⁷⁵ On 2 February 2004 the non-governmental organisation Asian Human Rights Commission spread an urgent appeal relating to an attempt on ²⁷³ Report of the Committee of Eminent African Jurists on the case of Hissène Habré, May 2006 "27. The Committee recommends that an African option should be adopted. 28. Habré should be tried by an African member State – Senegal or Chad in the first instance, or by any other African country. 29. Senegal is the country best suited to try Habré as it is bound by International law to perform its obligations. 30. Chad has the primary responsibility to try and punish Hissène Habré. It should therefore cooperate with Senegal". See <<http://www.hrw.org/justice/habre/>> (consulted 16 May 2008).

²⁷⁴ AU Decision On The Hissène Habré Case And The African Union Doc. Assembly/Au/3 (Vii), 2 July 2006. See <<http://www.hrw.org/justice/habre/>> (consulted 16 May 2008). On subsequent developments, see e.g. HRW press release 'Senegal: New Law Will Permit Habré's Trial', 2 February 2007; HRW press release 'Senegal Failing to Act on Trial of Hissène Habré; One Year After Dakar Agreed to Try Chad Ex-Dictator, Victims are Still Waiting; Chadians March for Justice', 30 June 2007; HRW press release 'EU to Aid Senegal in Preparing Hissène Habré's Trial', 19 January 2008 (in response to a request by the Senegalese President for international assistance) and Open letter to the international and African communities of the Steering Committee of the International Committee for the Fair Trial of Hissène Habré, 15 April 2008 See <<http://www.hrw.org/justice/habre/>> (consulted 16 May 2008). See also Thijs Bouwknegt of Radio Netherlands Worldwide, 'rights Council should press Senegal over Habré; 5 February 2008, quoting petitioner Guengueng; The Human Rights Council needs to tell Senegal to comply with the UN ruling and bring Habré to justice'. The article notes that the European Commission, Chad itself, France, Switzerland, Belgium and the Netherlands 'have already agreed to help fund the trial, but are still waiting for Senegal to present a detailed budget'. The State has now amended its law, including its constitution, 'to allow its courts to prosecute genocide, crimes against humanity, torture and war crimes committed in the past'. "Meanwhile, however, it has appointed the former coordinator of Habré's legal defence team, Madické Niang, as minister of justice, responsible for the organisation of the trial'. <<http://www.rnw.nl/internationaljustice/specials/Universal/090905-habre>> (consulted 13 February 2009). In May 2009 Belgium submitted a case against Senegal before the ICJ, requesting provisional measures. The ICJ, by a majority, decided not to grant these, Questions relating to the Obligation to Prosecute or Extradite (Belgium v. Senegal), Order of 28 May 2009. While Belgium's action, inspired by NGOs, can as such be interpreted as a form of follow-up, neither Belgium's submission, nor the ICJ's Order referred to the previous provisional measure by CAT. The dissenting opinion by Judge Cançado Trindade, on the other hand, did, §84. See also his reference to discussion of the matter by the United Nations Human Rights Council, §45.

²⁷⁵ This meant that the Committee expected a response no later than on 9 February 2004. HRC Michael Anthony Fernando v. Sri Lanka, 1189/2003, provisional measures of 9 January 2004 as reproduced by the Human Rights Correspondence School, a project of the Asian Human Rights Commission, lesson series 33, p. 3, 14 April 2004, <www.hrschool.org> (consulted on 5 August 2004).

the petitioner's life earlier that day.²⁷⁶ It called for 'a thorough inquiry into the conduct of the Sri Lankan Government in terms of Rule 86'. It also called 'for the international community to cooperate in making the Sri Lankan government accountable under the international obligations of the ICCPR'. It also called upon the government itself 'to investigate this matter thoroughly and to arrest and prosecute the offenders, provide due medical care and compensation for Mr. Fernando and to provide the utmost protection to Mr. Fernando and his family'.²⁷⁷ The next day it issued an official statement. It pointed out that, while chloroform was sprayed on his face, a van pulled nearby, presumably to take him away. "This violent incident raises very serious issues as to whose responsibility it is to ensure that the Sri Lankan government implements the UNHRC's interim measures that were issued to it". It noted that the representative of Sri Lanka in Geneva would have been informed of the provisional measures on the day they were decided. It was his duty to transmit this information to the Minister of Foreign Affairs as soon as possible. The minister would then be duty-bound to 'inform the government of such an important decision by the UNHRC'.

"Given the importance of the decision, it would have been the right of the president, the prime minister and the cabinet to know about the communication from the UNHRC. Once the government is informed about the UNHRC's decision, the relevant authorities would be informed to take immediate action on the basis of the communication. In this particular instance, the two most relevant authorities are the attorney general and the inspector general of police (IGP). If the attorney general and the IGP had been informed by the government of the interim measures, it can be presumed that under normal circumstances they would take immediate action to see that they are implemented and would report back to the government of the actions that had been taken. The fact that no action has been taken suggests that either the attorney general and the IGP were not informed about the relevant interim measures or they neglected to attend to the matter after receiving this information. Whatever the case, Mr. Fernando did not receive any form of protection despite the interim measures; and as a result of this failure, he was subjected to a brutal attack which could have ended with even more drastic consequences than those that he is presently suffering".²⁷⁸

The Asian Human Rights Commission pointed out that the State's failure to adequately implement the provisional measures raises important questions that would likely feature in the public debate, 'both locally and internationally'.

"At what point, for instance, did the government fail to ensure its compliance with these interim measures? At whose desk did the communication from the UNHRC stop? (...) (H)as Sri Lanka developed a procedure to deal with its treaty obligations, particularly in terms of treaties to which it has become a state party in relation to the United Nations? What stipulated procedure exists for dealing with communication from the relevant international authorities? Above all, in terms of the great importance of the UNHRC, is there any existing mechanism to implement and respond to their communication specifically?"²⁷⁹

²⁷⁶ It reported that he went to see a friend 'when a bearded person appeared and held a handkerchief to his face'. He reportedly felt dizzy, but managed to escape to a tailor shop that he knew. He collapsed there and his father was informed and took him to the hospital.

²⁷⁷ Asian Human Rights Commission, Urgent Appeal of 2 February 2004, <www.derechos.org> (consulted on 5 August 2004).

²⁷⁸ A statement by the Asian Human Rights Commission, 'Attack on Tony Fernando, Sri Lanka seriously embarrassed internationally', <www.ahrchk.net> (consulted on 5 August 2004).

²⁷⁹ Id.

First of all, the government should immediately comply with the provisional measures ‘even at this late stage’. The petitioner was now in the hospital undergoing treatment. He ‘should be given the protection available to him as a citizen of Sri Lanka and in response to Sri Lanka’s international obligations’.

“The duty to provide direct protection lies with the IGP. The duty to see to the overall implementation of the interim measures lies with the attorney general. It is up to them to act promptly and boldly now to demonstrate the government’s willingness and capacity to protect its citizens”.²⁸⁰

The NGO noted that the perpetrators were still at large and that the government has a duty to answer these questions and to bring the perpetrators to justice.²⁸¹

Seven days after the attack the Asian Human Rights Commission received a letter by the petitioner explaining that he had been provided with security at the hospital on 2 February (noon) until his discharge on 7 February. Two armed police officers protected him under the instruction of the ministry of defence. Upon his discharge they brought him back home, but informed him ‘that they had instruction to give protection only at the hospital’ and until he was brought home. They said that there was nothing more they could do and if he needed further protection he should talk to ‘higher ups’. He was now in hiding, moving from place to place. He also referred to the non-compliance with the Committee’s provisional measures and noted that there had been three persons in the van that had been waiting to take him following the attack the previous week.²⁸²

It may be expected that the HRC sent a remainder if it did not receive a response to its provisional measures by 10 February 2004. However, the Committee probably merely would take specific action with regard to the attack of 2 February 2004 following specific submissions by the petitioner or the State with regard to the incidents. The Special Rapporteur on Torture, on the other hand, did intervene on his behalf.²⁸³ Sri Lanka is one of the few States in the Asian region that accepted the right of individual complaint to the HRC.²⁸⁴

In 2002 the Inter-American Commission took precautionary measures on behalf of several forensic anthropologists and their families in Guatemala who were receiving threats to intimidate them into stopping the exhumations of victims of the armed conflict buried in clandestine cemeteries. Guatemala had informed the Commission that it had in fact offered police protection to those beneficiaries who had ‘expressly accepted it’.²⁸⁵ NGOs regularly take Urgent Action through their own networks. In September 2005 Amnesty International issued an Urgent Action on behalf of one of the persons mentioned in the Commission’s precautionary measures (2002) and his family. It referred to these precautionary measures and noted that concerns remained that the level of protection they were receiving was inadequate. Following a death threat received by the anthropologist’s sister and her husband two policemen were initially stationed outside their

²⁸⁰ Id.

²⁸¹ Id.

²⁸² Letter of Tony Fernando, 9 February 2004, urgent appeal update of 10 February 2004, <www.ahrchk.net> (consulted on 5 August 2004).

²⁸³ UN Special Rapporteur on Torture Urgent appeal of 16 February 2004, also referring to the Committee’s provisional measures. The Special Rapporteur had previously contacted the State on Fernando’s behalf on 25 September 2003. Moreover, the Special Rapporteur on the Freedom of Opinion and Expression had done on 23 December 2003 (on file with the author).

²⁸⁴ For other Asian States that have recognised the right of individual complaint see the e.g. Philippines, South Korea, Uzbekistan and Tajikistan.

²⁸⁵ CIDH Annual Report 2002, §56.

house and she received 24 hour police protection.²⁸⁶ NGOs have equally used press releases to condemn non-compliance with provisional measures.²⁸⁷

5 CONCLUSION

The practice of the adjudicators as well as that of officials from intergovernmental organisations and that of NGOs shows that follow-up is considered to be essential. Without it provisional measures can be expected to decrease in effectiveness.

Follow-up can take place by the political bodies formally assigned that task within the relevant human rights system, but in practice this is insufficient or sometimes even non-existent. The Geneva bodies and the Inter-American Commission and Court have taken it upon themselves to monitor not just compliance with their decisions on the merits, but also with their provisional measures. Apart from repeated messages to the State concerned to the effect that the provisional measures remain in force, the adjudicators have also made use of press releases, Court hearings (Inter-American Court), country visits (Inter-American Commission), hearings in the context of State reports and referring to compliance with provisional measures in Concluding Observations on these reports (the Geneva bodies HRC, CAT and CEDAW).

In addition it is argued that ignoring provisional measures has consequences for how the complaint on the merits can be examined. Not only the right of individual petition is violated, but often the right to life and the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment is too. In fact the burden should shift to the State to show that these rights have not been violated.

Finally, apart from the adjudicators themselves, officials from intergovernmental organisations and NGOs have also 'followed up' on the provisional measures taken by the adjudicators. This may indeed help increase the pressure on the State to comply after all (if still possible) or otherwise at least to comply in future. Moreover it underscores the awareness of NGOs and officials appointed by intergovernmental organisations of the serious nature of the harm risked and appears to confirm their recognition of a general principle to prevent irreparable harm to persons.

²⁸⁶ “However, from late December 2005 onwards, the police officers stationed outside the house failed to report on duty on some days. On 7 January, three days three days before the written death threat was received, they stopped coming altogether. Since these most recent threats, the homes of Gianni Peccerelli and Bianka Peccerelli Monterroso are being guarded by police. However, as they have been threatened directly, the FAFG [the Forensic Anthropology Foundation, ER] is calling for the authorities to provide them with personal protection 24 hours a day, and to guarantee that this level of protection will be maintained”. Amnesty International, Urgent Action, 13 January 2006 (referring to previous Urgent Action of 14 September); this Action was circulated by the Guatemala Human Rights Commission (Washington, D.C.) as well.

²⁸⁷ See e.g. Human Rights Watch, ‘Italy: halt expulsion of Tunisian at risk of torture, Respect European Court of Human Rights Ruling’, 3 June 2008 and Update of 5 June 2008, <http://hrw.org/English/docs/2008/06/03/italy19016_txt.htm> (consulted 23 September 2008).

CONCLUSION

This Part dealt with the official responses by States to provisional measures and with the follow up by the adjudicators (and others). As to the first, Chapter XVII noted that States generally respect provisional measures, sometimes explicitly confirming their compliance. It then focused on those situations in which States have failed to comply. It discussed official responses by States justifying why they failed to comply with a provisional measure in which the State protested against the (temporary) outcome of the normative process, on the one hand, and official responses protesting against the development of the process as such, on the other hand. Explanations for the first category of responses may be derived from the system of implementation in domestic law, specific politics, the role of media and other actors. Explanations of non-compliance based on the second type, disagreement with the decision-making process of the adjudicator, may relate to the procedures of the adjudicator in general or to specific issues arising in the case, e.g. relating to the principle of audiatur et altera pars or the lack of transparency in the decision-making process.

These official responses simply present legal arguments for a decision of non-compliance that in fact is likely to be based on domestic reasons of a political rather than legal nature. Moreover, the paucity of consistent information on State responses does not allow for a clear answer to the question whether States respond more favourably to provisional measures that aim to protect those rights that are commonly considered the most fundamental.

It may be expected that governments wishing to maintain an image of democracy would generally be more receptive to provisional measures indicated by human rights adjudicators than would more authoritarian and repressive governments. Yet there is an exception to this receptiveness in relation to the execution of death sentences and decisions to expel or extradite convicted criminals or suspected terrorists. If international adjudicators consider that these persons run a real risk of irreparable harm not only to their human rights claim, but to their survival or personal integrity, domestic authorities are often less open to this assessment exactly because of a segment of public opinion that revolves around fear.

In such circumstances even the fact that the provisional measures relate to life and personal integrity may not be decisive for compliance in and of itself. For instance the decision not to halt an execution despite a provisional measure ordered by an international adjudicator may be explained by a public opinion strongly in favour of the death penalty. In fact a provisional measure protecting against irreparable harm to the claim (not involving a core right) rather than to persons may then be less controversial.

The practice of the adjudicators as well as that of officials from intergovernmental organisations and that of NGOs shows that follow-up is considered to be essential (Chapter XVIII). The follow up by the political bodies formally assigned with that task within the human rights systems is often insufficient or sometimes even non-existent. The Geneva adjudicators and the Inter-American Commission and Court have taken it upon themselves to monitor non-compliance with their provisional measures. They repeatedly send messages to the State concerned to the effect that the provisional measures remain in force. Such follow up may often require increased specificity of these provisional measures as well.¹ In addition the Inter-American Court has held Court hearings discussing implementation of its provisional measures and has assigned the Commission an important monitoring role in this respect. The Inter-American Commission has paid attention to implementation of its own precautionary measures and those of the Court during country visits. The Geneva bodies have asked questions on the implementation of provisional measures during hearings in the context of State reports, etc.

¹ See also Chapter XIII (Protection).

Chapter XVIII argued that ignoring provisional measures has consequences for how the complaint on the merits can be examined. Not only the right of individual petition is violated, but often the right to life and the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment are too. In such cases of non-compliance the burden should shift to the State to show that these rights have not been violated.

UN independent experts as well as NGOs may also play an important role in the follow-up on provisional measures. Publicity in the context of other activities (for those adjudicators that have other (non-adjudicatory) tasks in the human rights system as well) could be a useful tool to counteract non-compliance, as long as each situation is assessed individually as to the anticipated impact of such publicity on the beneficiaries, especially if domestic (or local) public opinion strongly disfavours the protection of the beneficiaries of the provisional measures.²

In contrast to the partly negative domestic factor of public opinion in such cases, in the long run it may also be the strength of the external disapproval for non-compliance that will help determine compliance with future cases. This external disapproval, through the follow up by the adjudicators, as well as statements by international organisations, NGOs and other States, does seem to be determined, at least partially, by the irreparable nature of the harm the provisional measures aim to prevent, thereby reaffirming the common core of the concept as it currently stands.

² The involvement of the media is very important in this respect. Yet the impact of the media may tip the balance both ways. Especially national media may make or break compliance. In addition, in the face of negative domestic media interest in provisional measures powerful States may be less inclined to comply with them than States in transition that are counting on joining international organizations or receiving financial support and therefore more interested in avoiding external disapproval.

GENERAL CONCLUSION

1 INTRODUCTION

This book examined the legal concept of provisional measures in human rights adjudication. The General Conclusion brings together aspects of the conclusions to the various chapters, with an emphasis on the conclusion to Part II on the purpose of provisional measures. That preliminary conclusion examined the extent of the convergence or divergences in the approaches of the adjudicators. A conceptual framework was presented discussing the core common to provisional measures in the human rights systems as well as the outer limits of such measures. The framework is based, on the one hand, on the factual question whether two or more adjudicators have used provisional measures in a given context (e.g. halting executions) and on the other hand on the underlying rationale of preventing irreparable harm that the provisional measures of the various adjudicators have in common. In other words, the ‘common core’ refers to the types of situations in which a provisional measure is based on a common underlying rationale and in which more than one human rights adjudicator has in fact used provisional measures. The ‘outer limits’ of the concept refers to the boundaries beyond which one can no longer speak of provisional measures, as the harm risked is not irreversible. It is argued that the use of provisional measures in such situations is therefore inappropriate. In addition there is a continuum between the outer limits of the concept and its common core. Along this continuum various provisional measures can be situated as ordered by the human rights adjudicators. In this respect the contexts in which the various adjudicators operate are significant. It should be noted, moreover, that the common core of the concept is not fixed, but may change over time, when a new underlying rationale becomes apparent in the case law of the various adjudicators, backed by actual provisional measures ordered in more than one system.

By singling out some of the best practices developed in the human rights systems discussed in this book this General Conclusion also suggests steps that could be taken to improve the functioning of provisional measures. It takes into account, where relevant, the following criteria to determine how provisional measures could best assist a beneficiary: accessibility, motivation and consistency, responsiveness to the specific situation, consultation and follow-up. The criteria of accessibility, motivation and consistency were selected for use in this study as they were thought to make provisional measures more convincing vis-à-vis addressee States. Responsiveness to the specific situation and consultation were considered necessary for the effectiveness of these measures in protecting the individual and follow-up by the adjudicators was used as a criterion because it has generally been regarded as essential in treaty monitoring.

Cançado Trindade already referred to the transformation of the concept of provisional measures through international human rights law, from precautionary to protective, as an example of the humanisation of public international law.¹ Indeed, as argued in this study, the concept of provisional measures has been adapted to some extent in order to fit the context of international human rights law, yet this may be relevant not just in the practice of the human rights adjudicators, but also in that of other international adjudicators faced with issues involving the fate of human beings.

¹ See e.g. IACHR Matter of the persons imprisoned in the “Dr. Sebastião Martins Silveira” Penitentiary in Araraquara, São Paulo (Brazil), Order of 30 September 2006, individual opinion Judge Cançado Trindade, §27.

Interestingly, there are also situations in which human rights adjudicators take a more limited approach to provisional measures than the ICJ and ITLOS. One explanation may be the fact that several constitutive documents of the human rights adjudicators do not contain a specific reference to provisional measures, which makes the adjudicators more cautious in using them. At the same time the principles of effective protection of human rights and of prevention of irreparable harm to persons would argue for a lenient approach to, for example, evidentiary requirements at the stage of provisional measures. The fact that the approach of human rights adjudicators is not always lenient appears due more to pragmatic than to principled reasons, for fear that a 'too lenient' approach might eventually render provisional measures less effective.

Yet with regard to other aspects of provisional measures the human rights adjudicators have developed a firm practice stressing the importance of preventing irreparable harm to persons and specifying the manner in which this prevention is to take form. This could, in turn, be relevant as well to adjudicators with a general competence, not limited to human rights issues, when they are dealing with issues involving irreparable harm to persons. The value still attached to the traditional concept of State consent in the contentious procedure before the ICJ might not yet allow the ICJ to join in all aspects of the practice on provisional measures developed by the human rights adjudicators. This applies in particular to the case law on jurisdiction and admissibility. Yet on other issues the ICJ, when dealing with situations involving risk of irreparable harm to persons, may indeed draw inspiration from the practice developed by the human rights adjudicators. An example is taking into account the question whether the interests of the individuals caught up in the conflicts between States are properly represented by their States. After all, while the States are the formal beneficiaries and addressees of the provisional measures by the ICJ, when provisional measures aim at preventing irreparable harm to persons de facto these persons are the beneficiaries. Another, related, example would be increasing the specificity of the Orders for provisional measures, allowing for additional scrutiny and follow-up precisely to prevent irreparable harm to persons.

2 THE SETTING OF PROVISIONAL MEASURES IN HUMAN RIGHTS ADJUDICATION

2.1 Introduction

The development of the concept of provisional measures in international human rights adjudication must be seen in the context of the traditional concept as developed by the ICJ, which is also subject to the 'humanisation' of international law (Chapter I). At the same time it must be seen in the specific context of each system of human rights adjudication (Chapter II).

2.2 The humanisation of the traditional concept

The rationale behind the use of provisional measures is to ensure a meaningful outcome of a case brought before a court or other adjudicator. More specifically, the traditional purposes of provisional measures as used by the ICJ are twofold. The first is the preservation of rights, the breach of which is both imminent (or already taking place) and likely to cause irreparable harm to the rights claimed. The second, applied only incidentally, is the preservation of proper legal proceedings. In other words, in the first case there should be a link between the right and remedy claimed and the provisional measure and in the second case there should be a link between the provisional measure and the purpose of having a fair and accurate procedure.

The ICJ is not a human rights court. It does not even deal with individual complaints. Yet in spite of the limitations it is faced with as an adjudicator dealing only with inter-State complaints, it does seem to realise the importance of the protection of groups and individuals. It has used provisional measures for reasons not necessarily closely related to the rights claimed or to the proceedings. It has taken provisional measures in border conflict cases, for instance, not only to maintain the status quo in relation to the claim, but also to prevent irreparable harm to civilians living in the border area. Their rights were not the (main) subject of a State's request for provisional measures against another State. In the practice of the ICJ the traditional twofold distinction may have been extended to a threefold distinction: to prevent irreparable harm to the claim, to the procedure or to individuals not central to the dispute.

The ICJ's finding in LaGrand that its provisional measures are legally binding was not made dependent on the fact that basic rights of the human person were involved, but was simply part of its traditional function. The power to indicate provisional measures is required by the object and purpose of Article 41 ICJ Statute and 'based on the necessity, when the circumstances call for it, to safeguard, and to avoid prejudice to, the rights of the parties as determined by the final judgment of the Court'.²

At the same time some conflicts between States in which the ICJ orders provisional measures may indeed concern the rights of individuals and the (human rights) obligations of States towards them. In such cases its provisional measures may either aim to halt measures that could result in irreparable harm to a large group of people (armed activities; nuclear tests, etc), or aim at the (diplomatic) protection of specific individuals (halt execution of a death sentence; release persons held hostage).

Various aspects of the Court's orders for provisional measures specifically show its responsiveness to the fate of human beings. In the Chorzów factory (1927) case, concerning a request to grant a pecuniary claim at the provisional measures stage, rather than to secure rights basic to the human being, the PCIJ was strict and refused to order provisional measures because it considered that the request coincided with the claim on the merits and was in fact a request for an interim judgment. On the other hand, without breaking with Chorzów factory, the ICJ did take provisional measures in the Nuclear Test cases (1973).³ While it did not explain the difference, it is likely, especially in light of subsequent cases, that it took into account the enormity of the possible consequences to the environment and population of the applicant States. In the Hostages case (1979) it again ordered provisional measures overlapping to a great extent with the main claim. What distinguishes these cases from the Chorzów factory case is that they involved the fate of human beings.

In some cases, at the stage of provisional measures, the ICJ was yet to determine on the merits whether a certain act or omission by a State would indeed constitute a violation of the rights invoked by the other State (e.g. the Nuclear Test cases). In other cases it was clear that certain acts or omissions constituted a violation of the rights invoked, but the dispute related to evidence and/or imputability (e.g. the Hostages case and DRC v. Uganda).

The ICJ has also taken into account the basic rights of the individual in its attitude towards procedural requirements. In a particularly urgent case it used provisional measures in advance of a hearing on the use of provisional measures: in an Order to halt the imminent execution of an individual it was prepared to 'reward' the requesting State for submitting the claim and request for provisional measures strategically late, as the individual facing execution could hardly be punished for his State being procedurally remiss. Had the claim only involved pecuniary interests, rather than the life of an individual, such decision would have been unlikely. A similar conclusion may be drawn with regard to the recent majority decision by the ICJ to order provisional measures to halt the execution of death sentences pending a case involving a request for the interpretation of its previous judgment Avena. This despite the fact that the respondent State had argued that there was no dispute between the parties regarding this interpretation and the Court therefore had no jurisdiction to order provisional measures.⁴

² ICJ LaGrand (Germany v. US), Judgment of 27 June 2001, §102.

³ Only two of the judges considered this approach incorrect, as rewarding an attempt to obtain an 'interim judgement'.

In some cases States may invoke human rights treaties. Even if they act on the basis of diplomatic protection rather than erga omnes obligations, they in fact ask the ICJ to interpret State obligations under human rights treaties and, therefore, to take into account the rights of the individuals concerned. In such cases the assessment of the risk involved and the role of the beneficiaries may differ from the approach normally taken by the ICJ in its use of provisional measures and approximate more closely the provisional measures taken by human rights adjudicators. At the same time, as noted, States may sometimes be involved in legal disputes that have developed into military conflicts, with their citizens caught in the middle. If the States involved bring the case before the Court and request provisional measures, not particularly invoking the rights of the individuals, the ICJ nevertheless takes into account the basic rights of the individual. As a result the provisional measures ordered may differ from those requested by the State(s). In general the Court seems to be more resourceful in drafting Orders for provisional measures different from those requested when the case involves the fate of human beings. In such cases it refers to the obligations of both Parties, it adds the obligation not to aggravate the dispute and it reminds States of their task in the maintenance of peace and security.

The more recent decisions to take provisional measures in the consular protection/death penalty cases, on the one hand, and in the cases on mass human rights violations, on the other, constitute examples of the humanisation of international law. The practice of the ICJ indicates, albeit tentatively, that adjudicators not exclusively dealing with human rights may develop sensitivity for the plight of human beings caught up in conflicts between States, with its consequent effects on the concept of provisional measures.

2.3 The principle of effective protection and the inherent authority to take provisional measures

While in most inter-State proceedings not involving human rights the principle of State sovereignty (and in particular State consent) is still important, in human rights adjudication (mostly between an individual and a State, but also inter-State) the principle of effective protection of human rights is predominant. Moreover, even in inter-State proceedings not automatically involving human rights, State sovereignty it is not the only relevant principle. Other relevant principles may be effective protection of the environment or the preservation of peace as well as preventing irreparable harm to persons.

Human rights adjudicators have the inherent authority to use provisional measures.⁵ If the treaty also includes inter-State proceedings it should be possible to use provisional measures in these proceedings as well. The authority to use provisional measures includes the authority to use them proprio motu. Especially in cases in which potential beneficiaries are unable to contact the adjudicator directly, the adjudicator should be able to intervene on his own motion on the basis of other credible information. The main concern in this respect should not be whether the adjudicators have the authority to do so – which is derived from their function and the purpose of provisional measures – but whether it is expected that the beneficiary will agree. In some situations involving death threats and harassment an intended beneficiary may not wish to be identified in the text of provisional measures.⁶

⁴ ICJ Request for interpretation of the judgment of 31 March 2004 in the case concerning Avena and other Mexican nationals (Mexico v. US), Order of 16 July 2008.

⁵ Chapter II (Systems) discussed the authority to use provisional measures in the context of each human rights system.

The inherent authority to order provisional measures, based on the principle of effective protection, also implies the possibility of delegation. Without the possibility to delegate the power to use provisional measures to one member of the court or adjudicatory body these measures will be deprived of their protective function. After all, various adjudicators only convene periodically. The member to whom the authority has been delegated should indeed report to the main body about the use of all provisional measures. An obligation to consult other members of the Court or Committee could be useful as well, but this should not be required at the cost of expedience.

2.4 Transparency or the lack thereof

This book emphasises the importance of motivation and accessibility of an adjudicator's provisional measures. In most systems the transparency of decision-making on provisional measures is insufficient. The availability of information is not very balanced over the different bodies. The Inter-American Court of Human Rights publishes its decisions on provisional measures separately and these decisions are motivated. The other systems, however, offer virtually no explanations on the use of provisional measures. The use of provisional measures is simply mentioned in the decision on the merits or inadmissibility. The unpublished letters to the parties informing them of decisions about provisional measures normally do not clarify the criteria for their use either.

Most adjudicators do not formally reject requests by petitioners to take provisional measures. Thus it is not possible to systematically trace failed attempts to convince them to take such measures. Systematic references to refusals to use provisional measures are only found in the decisions by the Inter-American Court, the Bosnia Chamber and, to some extent, the Committee against Torture. The lack of references by the other adjudicators is unfortunate because cases in which the petitioners failed to convince the adjudicators to take provisional measures could give particular insight into their approach to the concept.

It might be said that providing a motivation for the use of provisional measures would already anticipate the final determination of the case. Yet in that case it would be the use itself of the measures rather than the motivation that would anticipate the decision on the merits. Motivation only serves to clarify the basis for using provisional measures and to make visible the most important criteria applied by the adjudicator. If this already indicates a certain direction the adjudicator may take, this is very likely to happen as well if he omits making explicit such a motivation. Adjudicators like the ICJ, with a more general mandate, not only involving human rights, have also motivated their orders for provisional measures. The motivation and publication of the Orders of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights is commendable and States have not complained that this anticipated the eventual decision. In human rights cases involving the risk of irreparable harm to persons the rule of non-anticipation by the adjudicator of the decision on the merits simply means that provisional measures should not dictate the direction of the ultimate determination of the main conflict. This approach is based on the threat of irreparable harm to persons on the one hand and the difference in availability of evidence and time for evaluation of this evidence at different stages of the proceedings. The assessment of the evidence for the purpose of provisional measures should not prejudice the eventual decision. It should be clear, for instance, that the final decision is based on an evaluation of all the available evidence and arguments on the basis of the principle audi alteram partem. After all adjudicators should make available the information to both parties and allow them the opportunity to respond. In fact this principle should apply already pending the proceedings to any follow-up decision with regard to the provisional measures initially taken.

⁶ See further Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4 (beneficiaries).

In the text of the initial decision informing the State of the provisional measure there is no need for the adjudicator to already invite the State party to suggest that the measures be lifted. As part of the written proceedings the State party would have to respond to the provisional measures by a certain deadline. In its response it has to indicate how it is complying with the provisional measures. At the same time it has the opportunity to indicate why it does not (fully) agree with them and it may suggest that the adjudicator lift them. The petitioner would have an opportunity to comment on the State party's compliance and, if need be, on the arguments of the State that the provisional measures should be lifted. Following this exchange of information and comments the adjudicator could decide to maintain, lift or adapt its provisional measures.

Hearings on requests by petitioners for provisional measures may clearly help enhance the persuasive force of provisional measures as well, and play a role in follow-up. They would offer a formalized forum for dialogue between the parties on this issue. Nevertheless, they are not always practicable in the context of international adjudication, unless there would be a fund specifically for the purpose of paying the expenses of indigent petitioners in cases considered of particular importance by the adjudicator. Moreover, the absence of such hearings does not significantly diminish the authority of provisional measures that are substantiated and publicly accessible. The initial decisions sent to the State party should already contain a brief (standard) motivation referring to the purpose of provisional measures. The decision confirming these initial decisions should contain a clear motivation similar in structure to the Orders for provisional measures by the Inter-American Court of Human Rights.

With a brief explanation for the use of provisional measures both the State and the petitioner may be able to provide a more focused response. The provisional measure would be substantiated by referring to the authority to use it, to the purpose of preventing irreparable harm to persons and to the applicable rights, as well as by noting that the decision is made in light of the urgency of the situation and based on prima facie evidence of an imminent risk of irreparable harm. The adjudicator could also refer to previous decisions on the legal status of provisional measures, indicate the follow-up information required as well as the relevant time limits. For adjudicators that do not yet motivate their use of provisional measures, substantiation in this form would not imply an inordinate increase of the workload. It would only require one extra page in a Note Verbale or Order to the government (sent for information to the petitioners) that could partially be standardised.⁷

While a certain measure of flexibility for the adjudicator is warranted, better accessibility to the public of information about the use of these measures and some explanation of their use would help increase predictability of decision-making. The practice of using them should have consistency within each system. All of this would enhance legal certainty as well as the credibility of the adjudicator and the concept of provisional measures as such. It would make these measures more persuasive and it would enhance coherence within and even among systems. Transparency on the use of provisional measures would also enhance access of potential beneficiaries to the tool of provisional measures and it would provide conditions for a more informed media, which in turn could help improve State compliance.

⁷ The Inter-American Court uses such a standardised model, adding the relevant information for the case at issue.

Accessibility, transparency, coherence and consistency in the use of provisional measures should be increased, among others by making public the decisions and by including reasoning. One of the aims of the research was to assist in this process by collecting, systematizing and analysing the relevant information. This book makes reference mainly to those cases that are easily verifiable. An exception is made for the practice of the HRC because for several years it failed to mention its use of provisional measures in its final decisions altogether. Without reference to information derived from the case files the practice discussed would not be representative. Because eventually an opportunity was offered to examine case files in Geneva on the Committee's practice with regard to provisional measures it was decided to make the information retrieved more widely available in this book.

The current lack of transparency in the practice of most adjudicators made an impact on the methodology used in this book. Given the breadth of systems and subject matters discussed, and as most provisional measures are not published, exhaustive discussion of the practice with regard to all subject matters dealt with by all the adjudicators when using provisional measures was not possible. It was not necessary either since this book takes an illustrative rather than an exhaustive approach. The cases discussed were selected because they were informative about a particular aspect of provisional measures. Typical cases were discussed providing insight into the features of provisional measures that the various systems have in common. Similar cases were also mentioned in which other adjudicators confirmed the approach taken in these typical cases or in which they chose to take a different approach. The book also examined atypical cases (Chapter XI) in order to explore the outer limits of the concept.

At a more abstract level some underlying principles and ideas can be found in the human rights systems. These have been used to clarify and develop a legal concept of provisional measures in human rights cases. These principles and ideas are linked to the existing doctrine on provisional measures in general international law. Thus, based on more abstract principles that the approaches of the adjudicators have in common, this book aimed to fill gaps in the doctrine. While it did not claim to be exhaustive in discussing the practices of the different systems, the breadth and depth of the source material used made possible a comprehensive overview, allowing conclusions to be drawn about the common core and outer limits of provisional measures in human rights adjudication.

2.5 Cross-fertilization

The overview presented in Chapter II served to highlight commonalities as well as differences between the human rights systems. As to the commonalities, the systems are facing common problems and issues, which may sometimes result in converging interpretations, occasionally consciously (often referred to as 'dialogue' or 'cross-fertilization'), at other times more indirectly. As to the differences between the systems, they may help explain possible divergences in the approaches of the adjudicators with regard to provisional measures. These divergences were explored to clarify the use of provisional measures that are situated on a continuum beyond the common core, but still within the outer limits of the concept (Chapter XII).

The differences and commonalities in the systems may help to explain why the respective practices of the adjudicators converge or diverge with regard to the use of provisional measures. Awareness of convergence and divergence may in turn enhance the understanding of the common core and outer limits of the current concept of provisional measures in human rights adjudication.

As an example of an international law concept on which the approaches of the various adjudicators may differ, this research on provisional measures also contributes to the ongoing discussion on the proliferation of international adjudicators and the 'fragmentation' of international law, or in any case the importance of coherence in the application of international law. Article 31(3)(c) Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (VCLT) is particularly relevant as an expression of the aim of increasing coherence in the law applied to different subject matters. It reflects the principle of systemic integration, referring to 'any relevant rules of international law applicable in the relations between the parties' as an element that must be taken into account with the context when interpreting a treaty provision. A presumption exists of consistency of the text to be interpreted with general international law, unless this would undermine the object and purpose of the system.

International human rights law may to some extent be seen as a 'regime' or 'a set of implicit or explicit principles, norms, rules, and decision-making procedures around which actors' expectations converge in a given area of international relations'.⁸ Indeed, human rights adjudicators, alleged victims, NGOs and States appear to have assumed, even if implicitly, the principle of effective protection to prevent irreparable harm to persons as a fundamental norm around which the human rights system is built. At the same time, in light of the principle of systemic integration, this special 'regime' does not, and should not weaken general international law.

The African Commission is explicitly authorized to 'draw inspiration from' rules of international law other than those found as such in the ACHPR or to take those 'into consideration' (see Articles 60 and 61 ACHPR). The African Court even 'shall apply' the provisions of the ACHPR as well as 'other instruments ratified by the States concerned' (Article 7 Protocol).⁹ The older instruments, in particular the ECHR, are not explicit in this respect, but nevertheless cross-fertilization does appear to take place. In some cases even the ECtHR has explicitly referred to the case law of other adjudicators.

Obviously it is more difficult to find a common understanding of legal concepts and achieve convergence in interpretation with regard to a large number of States from different regions of the world. Yet if all adjudicators have a similar interpretative approach to certain phenomena and legal texts, this would validate that interpretation for the time being. Cross-fertilization can make an interpretation more convincing and more coherent from the perspective of the development of a body of international case law.

Consultation by adjudicators of the case law developed by other adjudicators and familiarity with their interpretative approaches is warranted. The practice that has been developed by human rights adjudicators in the application of the human rights treaties subsequent to their entry into force is relevant when a given treaty is applied domestically, as well as when other international adjudicators invoke the provisions of that treaty. International adjudicators may do so either directly, as the ICJ has done, or in order to inform the meaning of the particular treaty they supervise. In both cases they consider the subsequent practice of the relevant treaty bodies as well. This is so either as law applicable in the relations between the parties or as the authoritative interpretation of a treaty provision that is conceptually similar, which interpretation could therefore serve as a source of inspiration or even indicate underlying general principles of law or interpretation.

The text of Article 31(3)(b) VCLT, 'any subsequent practice in the application of the treaty which establishes the agreement of the parties regarding its interpretation', arguably could mandate a dynamic interpretation involving subsequent developments. After all, it may be assumed that States parties ratified human rights treaties, including the supervisory mechanisms, in good faith, meaning that the human rights adjudicators established by these treaties have genuinely been assigned the task of monitoring compliance therewith and therefore the task of interpreting the provisions of the treaty. Thus in a way the practice developed by the human rights adjudica-

⁸ Krasner (1983), p. 2.

⁹ This concerns the Protocol to the African Charter establishing an African Court on Human and Peoples' Rights, not the Protocol on the Statute of the African Court of Justice and Human Rights, see Chapter II, section 5.2.

tors could be seen as establishing the agreement of the parties regarding their interpretation as such, exactly because they created these adjudicators under the treaty in order to interpret it. Had States preferred to reserve each interpretation for themselves, their recognition of the individual complaint system would have been in bad faith. This is not to be assumed. In light of the object and purpose of the human rights treaty, which is not traditionally inter-State, as well as of the individual complaint mechanism included in the treaty, one may conclude that there is no need for the consent of each State party to each and every finding by these adjudicators. They have agreed to, and signed up for, a 'process' of treaty interpretation by an expert body functioning as an adjudicator in the context of the individual complaint procedure.¹⁰

Apart from the relevance of the subsequent practice developed by the adjudicators to the interpretation of treaty provisions, 'judicial decisions' also constitute 'subsidiary means for the determination of international law' (Article 38(1)(d) ICJ Statute). These may be domestic or international judicial decisions. The term 'judicial decisions' is used, rather than 'court decisions', which potentially includes the decisions made in individual cases by treaty monitoring bodies or WTO Panels. The argument is often made that such decisions are 'quasi-judicial', but even if that is the case, what could be argued to be most relevant is the range of States whose obligations are covered by the interpretation, rather than the exact legal status of the findings. In other words, a decision of a domestic court, which may be binding on one particular State, certainly has less legal authority vis-à-vis other States, than the interpretation by a treaty monitoring body. Nevertheless, the findings by domestic courts and other domestic adjudicators may be used as subsidiary means for the determination of international law. In this vein the decisions of treaty bodies on individual complaints against States could equally, and more suitably, serve as subsidiary means for the determination of this law.

Further dialogue about the concept within, as well as between the various systems, will undoubtedly enhance the quality and persuasiveness of provisional measures by human rights adjudicators. Meanwhile, for this research 'information-rich' cases were selected in order to gain insight into the concept of provisional measures in human rights adjudication. Some of them related to situations in which (almost) all human rights adjudicators have used provisional measures, others concerned unusual situations.

Most of the best practices with regard to provisional measures can be found in the Inter-American system. As noted, in this system the information is also the most accessible. The Orders for provisional measures by the Inter-American Court have been published separately. Yet it must be kept in mind that some of what this book identifies as 'best practices' might be explained by the particularities of a regional system and could not always easily be transferred to other systems.

As noted in the Introduction, when the underlying approaches of all adjudicators, as well as the specific practice of at least two of them converge, this study speaks of a common core.

It is assumed that if the adjudicators indeed move towards a more uniform approach this will make the provisional measures more persuasive to domestic courts, the executive and the legislator. In addition it presumably is more 'costly' for a State's image to ignore such provisional measures because of their enhanced legitimacy.

¹⁰ See Chapter II (Systems), §8.3.

3 THE PURPOSE OF PROVISIONAL MEASURES IN HUMAN RIGHTS ADJUDICATION

3.1 Introduction

In general international law the purposes of provisional measures relate to preserving the rights of the parties, preserving the procedure and preventing irreparable harm. In human rights adjudication preventing irreparable harm is the main purpose. This has taken on a specific meaning, relating primarily to harm to persons and only secondarily to harm to the claim or the procedure. Risk of irreparable harm to persons should normally be established by a two-prong test of (1) irreparable harm to persons and (2) irreparable harm to the rights claimed, including the possibility of reparation. The third type of irreparable harm, harm to the procedure, may play a role as well if persons other than the alleged victim(s) are risking irreparable harm.¹¹ This is the case when witnesses, counsel or family members of the alleged victim are harassed and receive death threats. In such cases there is no need to establish a relationship with the main claim. Here the test is (1) irreparable harm to persons and (2) irreparable harm to the integrity of the complaint procedure.

The ECtHR, the HRC and CAT adjudicate in systems that do not have an article on provisional measures included in their constitutive documents. They nevertheless use provisional measures because they consider that the power to do so is inherent in the protective function of the adjudicator, which is why they have included a reference to this power in their Rules of Procedure. Yet, maybe because of the absence of a reference in the constitutive documents themselves, they are more cautious in the use of provisional measures than the Inter-American Commission and Court.

In addition worldwide systems generally take a more limited approach than regional systems because they are further removed from the situations and have fewer possibilities for supervision. In order to determine the common core it is important to examine a system with less extensive possibilities. Thus, this book has taken the HRC as a point of departure. It is the most internationally applicable system, comparable in content to the regional systems.

The adjudicators appear to agree that in order to make provisional measures effective it is necessary, with respect to the kinds of situations in which they are taken, to draw the line somewhere. Part II of this book provided a conceptual motivation on where to draw the line. Acts or omissions by the State that are reversible cannot be irreparable, making irreversibility a threshold criterion for the use of provisional measures. Yet it is submitted in this book that acts or omissions that are irreversible are not necessarily irreparable. They are if they would result in harm for which forms of reparation other than restitutio in integrum would be unacceptable, while such restitution would no longer be possible.

In other words, violations of rights causing irreparable harm must be prevented since a return to the status quo ante is impossible after the irreversible has taken place (irreversibility), while the nature of the harm implies that such violations can never be repaired by financial compensation (irreparability). In human rights cases the relevance of this traditional reason for using provisional measures is particularly striking.

¹¹ In addition, as noted, preventing irreparable harm to the procedure could be seen as a collateral purpose in death penalty and non-refoulement cases. The execution of a petitioner, for instance, pending the proceedings causes irreparable harm to the fairness of the proceedings before the adjudicator and, thereby, the integrity of the individual complaint procedure under the treaty in question. Clearly, when one party in a conflict kills the other party during the course of legal proceedings instituted in order to settle their conflict, that party, rather than the adjudicator, settles the conflict. Such a course of action, moreover, is not conducive to the principle of equality of arms. This form of irreparable harm to the proceedings is so serious that the use of provisional measures to prevent it could be justified even if there is no clear link with an eventual remedy preserving the life of the victim.

Based on the practices in the various systems and the principles underlying the use of provisional measures the following findings were presented about the common core and outer limits of the concept.

3.2 Within the common core: preventing irreparable harm to persons

The practice of the human rights adjudicators with regard to provisional measures is rich but often incoherent and lacking explanation. There are four situations in which international human rights adjudicators most often make use of the tool of provisional measures. The first is to halt the execution of petitioners who are sentenced to death until the adjudicator has been able to examine their complaints (Chapter III). The second is to halt the expulsion, extradition or deportation of petitioners until the adjudicator has been able to examine their complaints involving non-refoulement (Chapter V). The third is to intervene in a timely manner in detention situations involving risks to health and dignity (Chapter VII). The fourth is to order a State to provide protection to witnesses, human rights defenders and others against threats to their lives and physical integrity (Chapter IX).

The first situation, where provisional measures are used in order to halt an execution while a case is pending before an adjudicator, is a more traditional use of provisional measures by human rights adjudicators. Almost all adjudicators in international human rights cases have used provisional measures this way. For the HRC supervising the ICCPR this is the predominant situation in which it used provisional measures, at least until both Jamaica and Trinidad and Tobago withdrew their recognition of the right of individual complaint.¹²

The second situation involving their use to halt deportations, is predominant in the practice by CAT as well as in the European human rights system. The European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR), or – in the past – the Convention organs (Court and Commission), indicates provisional measures when a State should halt an extradition or expulsion until the Court has examined whether this would result in a violation of Articles 2 (right to life) and 3 (prohibition of torture and cruel treatment) ECHR. When there is a real risk that the petitioner will be subjected to torture or inhuman treatment in the requesting or receiving State, extradition or expulsion would be contrary to the international obligations of the extraditing or expelling State. If there is a chance that such situation will occur, the Court may indicate to the State that, as a provisional measure, it should not expel or extradite this person until it has been able to determine whether such a real risk does or does not exist. In that case the measure taken may be temporary, in the sense that the extradition or expulsion may nevertheless take place later if the supervisory body, once it has determined the case, concludes that this would not result in a violation of the State's international obligations. Alternatively, the final decision may cause the provisional measure to lose its temporary nature (as a provisional measure) and become permanent.¹³ The same applies to the practice of CAT to order provisional measures to halt expulsion or extradition in cases involving claims under Article 3 ICAT (non-refoulement).

The third situation deals with ongoing detention situations in which detainees face risks to their lives and personal integrity. It was initially mainly the HRC that intervened in such situations pending the proceedings, albeit often without formally invoking its Rule on provisional measures. Currently it is mainly in the Inter-American system that provisional measures often aim at protecting the lives and personal integrity of all persons detained in, working at or visiting the premises of a certain detention facility. Nevertheless, the other adjudicators have also used provisional measures in this context.

¹² See Chapter XIV on jurisdiction and admissibility as well as XVII on the official responses of addressee States.

¹³ See Chapter XIII on the relationship with reparation.

The fourth situation, involving protection against threats, is most prominently used in the Inter-American system. This is an innovative approach to provisional measures that is still evolving, but that appears to already have saved lives. The example of the Inter-American Commission and Court to protect alleged victims, witnesses and other persons against death threats has been followed by the other adjudicators. While these have not yet built an extensive practice in this regard, their decision to intervene in these circumstances may be explained by the importance attached in all human rights systems to preventing irreparable harm to life and physical integrity (Chapter IX). Even the ECtHR may be expected to start taking a firm approach in taking provisional measures in situations of death threats and harassment as well.

Other situations in which provisional measures have been used with a similar underlying rationale of preventing irreparable harm to life and personal integrity are measures in order to halt corporal punishment or ensure the safety of persons recently disappeared. Indeed, adjudicators in human rights cases have taken most provisional measures in relation to the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment and torture. These fundamental rights have an exceptional position within all human rights treaties. For instance they are considered non-derogable in all treaties under examination exactly because their violation, even during a state of emergency, would defeat the whole purpose of the treaty. The exceptional nature of these non-derogable rights is also confirmed by the fact that their violation may constitute a crime against humanity. All adjudicators agree that even if the treaty in question does not explicitly provide for the use of provisional measures, the duty to protect against threats to life and personal integrity requires the State to abstain from action or take positive measures, also pending international proceedings.¹⁴

Chapter VIII argued that the few provisional measures that have been taken to ensure access to court and counsel may equally belong to the common core when these rights are accessory to the protection against ill treatment and torture and against threats to life.

As noted, the position taken in this book is that the common core of provisional measures is flexible rather than frozen in time. The right to life and the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment clearly necessitate the use of provisional measures because violations result in irreparable harm to persons threatening their very existence. Yet there are situations not involving the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment and torture in which human rights adjudicators have used provisional measures that have by now become part of the common core, namely to ensure cultural survival and prevent mass expulsion and forced eviction in a context of pervasive discrimination. This may be explained by the special position of indigenous peoples and of minorities in a particularly vulnerable position. For instance, an appropriate form of reparation for violations of the right to culture and religion should take into account cultural integrity and survival. Financial compensation alone would not constitute meaningful redress because the very existence as a cultural group may be at stake. Pending the proceedings provisional measures could prevent such irreparable harm (Chapter X).

Irreparable harm results from the violation of rights crucial to a person's or a group's basic existence or crucial to a person's dignity. In some contexts provisional measures may assist in alleviating the situation even of potentially large groups of people. At present the use of provisional measures to protect collective rights has been limited to protecting indigenous culture and protecting religious rights in the context of persecution of ethnic groups Combined with pervasive discrimination, mass expulsion or internal displacement may indeed be so serious as to constitute not just undue hardship, but irreparable harm to the very existence of people. Such harm must be prevented rather than only redressed following the mass expulsion or displacement. Mass expulsion (and internal displacement) must be prevented exactly because the causes may be endemic (e.g. based on religious or ethnic grounds) and the consequences may have extremely long-term effects for a large group of people. The protection against forced displacement ‘by expulsion or other coercive means from the area in which the persons concerned are lawfully present’ is another norm recognised by the HRC for its fundamental nature.¹⁵ The use of provisional measures to prevent or halt such violations could be warranted. At the same time international adjudicators may not be able to collect enough information to assist the potential beneficiaries with provisional measures that are sufficiently focused. Thus while the use of provisional measures in cases of mass expulsion and internal displacement may be justified normatively, in practice it does not seem to be immediately possible. If at all, in an international system such provisional measures should only be used incrementally on the basis of clearly established case law on the merits as well as an ongoing exchange of thoughts with the particular State in question and the alleged victims (Chapter XI). Nevertheless, in light of the underlying rationale and the practice of more than one adjudicator of actually using provisional measures in this context these situations now belong to the common core.

¹⁴ See also Chapter XVI (Legal status).

In sum, under universal treaties provisional measures are normally reserved for the prevention of irreparable harm to persons. Such provisional measures are taken in a limited set of circumstances, mainly involving claims about the right to life and the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment. Sometimes it concerns the cultural survival of indigenous peoples. In certain extreme situations the prohibition of discrimination may also trigger provisional measures, often in the context of mass expulsion, forced eviction and the right to family and private life or freedom of religion. Thus, presently the purpose of provisional measures in human rights adjudication is to prevent irreparable harm to persons and this relates to ensuring survival of persons and groups and ensuring personal integrity. This constitutes the core common to provisional measures used by international adjudicators in human rights cases.

The adjudicators have also used provisional measures in other situations, which are currently situated beyond the common core. Yet it is suggested that particularly in systems not providing for them in the text of the constitutive document, provisional measures should remain exceptional. If the authority of human rights adjudicators to use provisional measures is not based on the constituent document but derived from their function (and based on the rules of procedure),¹⁶ the importance of preventing irreparable harm requires that they are limited to situations threatening the very existence and personal integrity.

Provisional measures should not be used to prevent human rights violations that ‘simply’ cause undue hardship rather than irreparable harm. This is not because this would not be possible conceptually, but because it risks devaluating the system, especially if used abruptly and without sufficient explanation and discussion.

Still the rule that provisional measures are only to be used to prevent irreparable harm to persons should be applied with a certain measure of flexibility, taking into account, for instance, the developmental rights of children and their ensuing special right to protection. If the beneficiary is a young child one might indeed speak of prevention of irreparable harm to persons in some cases that would otherwise cause undue hardship short of irreparable harm.

¹⁵ See HRC General Comment 29 on states of emergency, 31 August 2001, §13, referring to Article 7(1)(d) and 7(2)(d) of the Statute of the International Criminal Court.

¹⁶ See further Chapter XVI (Legal status).

Indeed, the risk of irreparable harm may vary depending on the vulnerability of the persons involved. Irreparable harm to persons refers not only to harm to physical integrity, but also to psychological and moral integrity, as long as the adjudicator would be likely to find a violation of the prohibition of cruel treatment and torture when dealing with such a case on the merits.

In any case in order for provisional measures to remain exceptional any expansion of their use by these adjudicators should only involve other rights essential for the very existence of persons and indigenous peoples. In fact, as noted, these rights coincide with rights recognised for their particular fundamental nature within the treaty.

When provisional measures presently belong to the common core the adjudicator may be expected to use them, whether the system is regional or international, and whether its authority to use them is based on an explicit treaty provision on provisional measures or not. On the other hand, when provisional measures do not belong to the common core adjudicators could still decide to take them, so long as their aim and the protection required are not beyond the outer limits of the concept by dealing with situations that are easily reversible. Whether such use of provisional measures is advisable would depend on the context. One relevant factor is the international, regional or ‘constitutional’ nature of the complaint system. Regional systems with a monitoring presence or at least the capacity of making country visits and organising hearings are likely to have a better chance to collect sufficient information and focus the provisional measures on the specific needs of the beneficiaries. This applies even more to the provisional measures of more ‘constitutional’ or hybrid adjudicators, such as the Bosnia Chamber. Another relevant factor is whether the adjudicator was established in order to deal with a broad range of rights (HRC, CIDH, IACHR, EComHR, ECtHR, Bosnia Chamber) or with one issue in particular (CAT, CE-DAW, CERD).¹⁷

International adjudicators are generally seen as having the authority to use provisional measures, but not the obligation. In other words, it is a discretionary power. It could be argued, however, that given their function, human rights adjudicators do have the obligation to use provisional measures if they consider there is a risk of irreparable harm to persons meeting the criteria for the common core of provisional measures involving situations in which they have been used in other human rights systems as well. This indeed is the approach taken by the Inter-American Court, which is of course able to base this explicitly on the wording of Article 63(2) (‘shall’).¹⁸

This applies in particular if the case law on the merits is abundantly clear on the risk of irreparable harm to life or personal integrity. Yet provisional measures may fall within the common core even without pre-existing case law on the merits on the obligation to abstain from certain measures or instead to take certain action. Like the ICJ (e.g. in the Nuclear Test cases),¹⁹ on occasion human rights adjudicators have also used provisional measures in situations where there was no case law on the merits yet. Examples are a provisional measure to protect witnesses in the first case pending before the Inter-American Court, to halt refoulement in early cases pending before the European Commission, to halt corporal punishment and halt measures destroying the natural habitat (in a case involving indigenous culture) in cases pending before the HRC, or to halt destruction of embryos in a case pending before the ECtHR. If adjudicators are too cautious in this respect and do not use provisional measures for lack of specific precedent on the merits (or even ¹⁷ See also Chapter II (Systems).

¹⁸ See e.g. IACHR Matter of Capital El Rodeo I and El Rodeo II Judicial Confinement Center, Order of 8 February 2008, 19th ‘Considering’ clause (‘As is evident in the instant case, the irreparable nature of the extremely serious and urgent threat has to do with the right to life and physical integrity that the Court has the obligation to protect whenever there are circumstances such as the ones described in Article 63 (2)’).

¹⁹ See Chapter I.

for lack of a previous provisional measure in a similar case) they take the chance that irreparable harm will be caused to persons. The risk of such irreparable harm is greater in cases where previous developments, such as Concluding Observations by the UN adjudicators, already indicate the possibility that the adjudicator will find a violation on the merits.

3.3 Within or beyond the outer limits: preventing irreversible harm to the claim

This book identified the directions the various human rights adjudicators are taking to advance the scope of provisional measures in their own system. In this light it explained the outer limits of the concept in the various systems. It identified a few situations in which provisional measures were taken that are beyond the outer limits of the concept (Chapter XII). It is argued that the criteria of immediacy (Chapter XV) and irreversibility are relevant in all systems. In some situations the use of provisional measures is inappropriate, as they aim to prevent harm that would mostly be reversible. An example would be a single action hindering the freedom of expression or the independence of the judiciary. Yet in a climate of harassment against journalists or the judiciary, when single infringements add up, this could indeed result in irreversible harm to the claim. In such a context it could be appropriate for regional adjudicators with an explicit mandate to use provisional measures to order them to prevent irreversible harm to the claim. Moreover, such a climate of harassment would probably involve death threats and harassment against the personal integrity of the intended beneficiaries as well, bringing the provisional measures within the common core of the concept to the extent that they aim to protect the life and personal dignity of the person involved, while also specifying that this person should be able to continue his or her activities (as a journalist, judge, witness, human rights defender, etc.).

All human rights adjudicators may take steps to expand the use of provisional measures. Even an international adjudicator like the HRC, with no reference to provisional measures in its constituent document, may do so, but this requires particularly careful reasoning. Generally speaking it may be useful for all adjudicators to expand their use of provisional measures progressively rather than in a sudden and unexpected manner not based on a pre-existing rationale (Chapter II).

Some provisional measures are typical to a certain region. The most particular adjudicator dealt with in this book, the Bosnia Human Rights Chamber, may serve as an example. The Bosnia Chamber was a hybrid and non-permanent body that has been rather specific in its approaches to provisional measures, closely adapting its practice to the exigencies of the post-war situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Chamber had to deal with the aftermath of a four year war with ethnic cleansing and discriminatory practices that were still pervasive after the war. It had to deal with only three addressees (the State of BiH and its constituent parts: the Federation of BiH and the Republica Srpska), all from the same geographical region. The Secretariat of the Chamber was based in the area concerned and the Chamber held its sessions there. Although it was a sui generis body rather than a constitutional court, its case law clearly is – and should be – more context-specific than that of an international adjudicator like the HRC. This was reflected in its use of provisional measures to halt forced eviction and in certain provisional measures involving personal integrity and religion (Chapter XII).

Adjudicatory caution may explain why human rights adjudicators only use provisional measures to prevent irreparable harm to persons and generally not for other purposes. In that sense they take a more restrictive approach than the ICJ. Yet once a situation does involve irreparable harm to persons, the approach of the adjudicators is innovative and dynamic.

3.4 The protection required

Chapter XIII discussed several issues involving protection. The first three were the type and specificity of the protective measures and the group of beneficiaries and addressees. The last issue involved the link between the protection required as part of provisional measures and the protection required on the merits (cessation, assurances of non-repetition) and as part of a judgment on reparation.

The protection required in provisional measures takes various forms. They range from formal to informal and from abstention to action, representing various types of positive measures. Not only the right to personal security but also the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment and torture themselves imply positive obligations in order to prevent irreparable harm. In that light, rather than abstention alone, an element of positive action is present in most provisional measures as well. This should be made explicit in cases involving ongoing situations such as adverse detention conditions, recent disappearances and death threats (Chapters IX and XIII).

Often provisional measures indicate the required result, such as to refrain from executing a death sentence or to protect persons against threats. Sometimes they are also more precise as to how the State should achieve this result, or at least they rule out certain activities that do not qualify as compliance. Thus, in the Inter-American system the provisional measures have become increasingly specific, partly in light of the experiences of the Commission and Court with certain States. In fact these measures provide insight into the ways States could or must protect persons under their jurisdiction against threats by paramilitary groups or other groups operating with the acquiescence of (certain factions of) the army, the police, or other authorities. They show, for instance, that protection against threats means that the State must protect the beneficiaries in the area in which they live and work, rather than banishing them to 'safe areas', claiming that this would absolve it from taking protective measures. Providing effective protection against death threats is not divorced from other human rights obligations, which means that States must assist internally displaced persons to return safely and allow human rights defenders or journalists to continue the activities that had triggered the threats in the first place. Generally speaking the States involved do not appear to find fault with this approach, possibly also because the provisional measures concern the most basic of rights: the right to life and the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment.

This specificity applies especially to regional systems. Nevertheless, similar to the practice in regional systems it is argued that international adjudicators should also specify their provisional measures, so as to provide clarity to States on what is expected of them, but they should do so even more gradually than the regional systems. This gradual approach is warranted exactly because of the less cohesive nature of an international as opposed to a (presumably more coherent) regional monitoring system and the diminished possibility in an international system of collecting and interpreting information. Another aspect that might play a role is the sensitivity of some States and the way these States would base their disagreement with certain provisional measures on regional doctrine, or insist on sovereignty over protection of human rights.

In a way decisions by international human rights adjudicators combine a top-down and a bottom-up approach. After all, they are initiated with the individual's (or group's) complaint to the adjudicator, following exhaustion of domestic remedies. Subsequently the international adjudicator orders provisional measures and the individuals, groups and supporting NGOs in turn invoke these measures at the domestic level.

The discussion on subsidiarity (and on the related margin of appreciation in the interpretation of treaty obligations) is more prominent in some systems than in others and plays out differently in each system. Yet especially with regard to ensuring respect for core rights specificity could become important in all systems and the provisional measures taken by the other human rights adjudicators could at least give some direction to an adjudicator regarding what the State is expected to do or to abstain from doing in order to prevent irreparable harm to persons.

In order to uphold the legitimacy of provisional measures it is vital to adhere to principles of procedural fairness. In this regard it is important to make sure that the positions and arguments of both parties are duly taken into account. Yet in the face of irreparable harm to persons adjudicators should not balance the rights of the intended beneficiaries with the general interest.

In the European system the tables have sometimes been turned by addressing the alleged victim under the Rule on provisional measures. This book argued that, given the more vulnerable procedural position of the alleged victim, it is not appropriate to address an order for provisional measures to him or her instead of to the State, suggesting a detainee that stopping a hunger strike is a prerequisite for examining the case. Of course an adjudicator may call on a petitioner to stop his hunger strike as part of his or her duty to cooperate and may draw inferences from the failure to do so even after the State has complied with the adjudicator's provisional measures to improve a detention situation, but this is not the same as using the tool of provisional measures vis-à-vis the petitioner.

Both as to purpose and as to substance the provisional measures should be consistent with similar measures already taken by the same adjudicator in order to increase their credibility and avoid discriminatory application vis-à-vis various beneficiaries and addressees. Comparable situations should be treated similarly and different situations should be treated differently.

Apart from the type (action or abstention) and specificity of provisional measures, in order to give full effect to the protective nature of provisional measures it must be clear who is included as a beneficiary and whether and how the beneficiaries have been consulted about the measures intended to protect them. Especially with regard to large groups of persons, such as those cases involving indigenous culture and in cases involving protection against death threats, the issue of consultation is important. Do the intended beneficiaries really want the provisional measures? In addition consultation is important to ensure effective implementation of the provisional measures in a manner that truly protects the beneficiaries.

The Inter-American system has developed a special approach with regard to the beneficiaries of provisional measures. It does not aim to protect the alleged victim exclusively. Sometimes it aims to protect witnesses, counsel, or others. It regularly extends the group of beneficiaries and often seeks to protect a large group. This book argued that the practice developed in the Inter-American system of using provisional measures to protect the members of a defined community, or people working at human rights organisations, as well as all other persons visiting the premises, is appropriate. While they are not identified by name, the beneficiaries of the required protective measures are clear to the State.

Sometimes beneficiaries may live in remote areas or be otherwise difficult to reach. In such cases it should not be required to have the names and addresses of each beneficiary, as long as there are indications that they are likely to agree with the provisional measures ordered on their behalf and as long as there are no (subsequent) indications of disagreement.

The wider impact of provisional measures also deserves attention. A good faith implementation of the obligations under the human rights treaty warrants a pro-active stance of the State to ensure the underlying rationale to a provisional measure is achieved as well.

States interested in supporting early warning systems could invest in this type of monitoring by international and regional adjudicators, especially if, like is often the case in the Inter-American system, the provisional measures aim to protect an extended group of beneficiaries and concrete and effective follow-up is possible.

The final issue discussed in Chapter XIII (Protection) was the link between the protection required as part of provisional measures and the protection required on the merits (cessation, assurances of non-repetition) and as part of a judgment on reparation. There should be such a link in the sense that the protection required as part of the provisional measure should never go further than that required as part of the decision on the merits or reparation.

The general purpose of the provisional measure is to safeguard a final determination that makes sense in the light of the human rights treaty. Therefore there should be a correlation between the measures required pending and upon conclusion of the procedure, in case a violation is indeed found. Without such correlation the question arises whether the object of the provisional measure was simply to postpone the suffering until after the expected finding. This would be an unsatisfactory approach to the concept of provisional measures. An obligation on the merits aimed at restoring the situation as much as possible or at least at preventing further degradation in the context of a finding of a violation of the right to life, prohibition of torture and cruel treatment, the prohibition of mass expulsion and of violations of cultural and religious rights endangering cultural survival would justify the type of provisional measure taken pending the proceedings to prevent irreparable harm to persons.

Thus the authority to order provisional measures and the authority to order action or abstention on the merits, as well as reparations, are closely related. In some cases it would be particularly unacceptable to await the harm and then award pecuniary damages. Prevention (or putting a halt to ongoing violations) would be the only appropriate measure exactly because the harm is irreparable. In these cases, any form of financial compensation would be insufficient in relation to the harm done. The reason for using provisional measures would then be so pressing that States would normally feel especially embarrassed to ignore them.

With regard to ordering a State to protect a person against threats, the aim seems to be identical in provisional measures and on the merits. The link between halting an execution pending the proceedings and ordering commutation or a new trial as a form of reparation as part of the decision on the merits is evident. If in the final determination of the case the adjudicator does not recommend at least the preservation of the life of the victim it seems that its provisional measures to prevent harm to persons serve little purpose.

In other words, preventing harm to the claim and ensuring that adequate measures can be taken upon the finding of a violation are prerequisites to preventing harm to the person. This book argued that this would apply as well to situations in which the alleged victim and the beneficiary do not coincide. As noted, persons who are not the alleged victims may still receive protection as beneficiaries of provisional measures, for instance because they are receiving threats as witnesses in the case at hand. What the petitioner needs to show, for purposes of such provisional measures, is the threat of irreparable harm to persons and the relationship of these persons to the alleged victim. In order to make sure that the action or abstention required of the State remains credible, the petitioner also needs to show that the provisional measures would go no further than the eventual remedy would have, if the persons involved had been the alleged victims. Yet in order to obtain an eventual form of reparation as part of a judgment on the merits, persons other than the alleged victims obviously must institute their own proceedings.

Both in provisional measures and on the merits the ultimate aim is to prevent irreparable harm to persons. The substance of the protection required is often similar as well at both stages. What is different is the function of the protection required: at the provisional measures stage reference is made to this protection in order to ensure a final outcome that makes sense in case a violation would be found on the merits in which it would also be determined that certain protective measures are necessary in order to prevent irreparable harm to persons.

Thus there is a continuum between the substance of provisional measures, on the one hand, and cessation, assurances and reparation, on the other hand. Whether pending the proceedings or upon a finding of a violation on the merits, States have the obligation to prevent irreparable harm to persons by taking measures of protection that may substantively coincide, even though the function of these measures differs depending on whether they are required pending the proceedings or upon the finding of a violation.

In sum, alleged victims have the right to a remedy in the sense that they should be able to initiate a meaningful procedure. The adjudicators may then use provisional measures pending this procedure in order to ensure its effectiveness. Ensuring this effectiveness means in particular that a meaningful outcome such as cessation and specific forms of reparation must not be made impossible already pending the case. At the same time provisional measures may protect beneficiaries beyond the alleged victims. In all those cases a permanent injunction would be pointless without the interim injunction.

4 THE IMPACT OF THE IRREPARABLE NATURE OF THE HARM

4.1 Introduction

The case law developed by the human rights adjudicators shows a convergence, rather than divergence of jurisprudence on provisional measures, with regard to the purpose of preventing irreparable harm to persons and the impact of this purpose on questions involving jurisdiction and legal status. This could be explained by an awareness of each other's jurisprudence, sometimes evident from conscious cross-referencing of jurisprudence, as was seen in the ECtHR judgment in Mamatkulov. Moreover, to the extent that they are not aware of each other's jurisprudence, it could be explained simply by the fact that all the human rights adjudicators examined in this book are dealing with similar treaty provisions, for instance on the right to life and the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment and on the right of individual petition.

The principle of preventing irreparable harm to persons involves protection of the very existence of persons and groups. The common core with regard to the purpose of provisional measures has various consequences. Part III showed that the serious nature of the harm risked has an impact on the approach of the human rights adjudicators to the requirements of prima facie admissibility and jurisdiction on the merits (Chapter XIV); on the requirements of immediacy and real risk (Chapter XV) and on the legal status of provisional measures (Chapter XVI).

4.2 Jurisdiction, admissibility and provisional measures

What is the standard for assuming the competence to use provisional measures in light of the likelihood of jurisdiction on the merits? The rules discussed in Chapter I on traditional international law seem to apply in human rights cases as well, but in the latter cases the adjudicator appears to take a more flexible approach, not requiring prima facie admissibility. Rather, only if the case were prima facie inadmissible an adjudicator would have no competence to use provisional measures. In other words there is no need to determine admissibility and jurisdiction on the merits other than at very first glance.

More than the ICJ, human rights adjudicators have confirmed the principle that there is no need to finally establish their jurisdiction before using provisional measures. If the State has not ratified the individual complaint procedure, the adjudicator clearly has no jurisdiction on the merits and therefore no competence to use provisional measures. Yet in other situations, for purposes of provisional measures, the adjudicator is normally assumed to be competent to deal with the case. Generally speaking the human rights adjudicators are not reticent on this issue. The HRC and the Inter-American Court have used provisional measures in cases involving disputed recognition of their authority. They reserved determination of a dispute on jurisdiction, e.g. on the significance of certain reservations, to the phase of preliminary objections or admissibility and meanwhile used provisional measures.

This principle also applies, or should apply, in the context of the extraterritorial application of human rights treaties. Most adjudicators, including the ICJ, have recognized that States may have obligations under human rights treaties with regard to acts (and sometimes omissions) by their agents outside of the national borders. Some human rights adjudicators have also been faced with requests for provisional measures in this context and this may increasingly be the case in the future. While the case law on the merits is yet to fully crystallize, the adjudicators should not shrink from using provisional measures, if otherwise warranted, simply because they might later declare themselves incompetent to deal with such an ‘extraterritorial’ petition.

As to the duration of provisional measures, human rights adjudicators sometimes indicate that they apply until a given date, until ‘further notice’ or until a decision on admissibility has been made. In those cases, if there would still be urgency, they would extend the provisional measures just before expiry of the previous date, or upon declaring the case admissible. At other times they note that the provisional measures apply ‘pending the case’, meaning throughout the proceedings. One remarkable practice of the HRC has been to maintain its provisional measures upon declaring a case inadmissible. It did so in death penalty cases where the inadmissibility declaration related to non-exhaustion of domestic remedies and was open to review. In its decision it reminded the State, under its Rule on provisional measures, not to execute the petitioner in the period between exhaustion and a renewed petition to the HRC. Thus if it declares a death penalty case inadmissible for non-exhaustion of domestic remedies, it may maintain provisional measures to cover the period between inadmissibility and the resubmission of the case following exhaustion. If the State would execute the petitioner before he would have a chance to renew his submission, this would in fact pre-empt the use provisional measures.²⁰ In such cases it operates from the perspective that the case is still pending. This shows the importance the HRC attaches to the function of its provisional measures to protect against irreparable harm. It seems to have developed a sui generis approach to jurisdiction and admissibility for purposes of provisional measures, based on this protective function. If there is prima facie evidence of irreparable harm it would indeed be appropriate for adjudicators dealing with human rights cases to maintain their provisional measures in cases susceptible to review.

The Inter-American Court has even determined that, if necessary, its provisional measures remain applicable beyond its judgment on reparations because it considers cases closed only once they are fully implemented. Therefore it regards its jurisdiction as extending until that moment.²¹ Nevertheless more recently it has begun emphasizing its system on follow-up on compliance. This possibility has now become well-established. Thus, in cases where the risk of irreparable harm related to violations that had already been established by judgments of the Court (with res iudicata status), it does appear even more appropriate to resort to this follow-up procedure rather than maintaining or adopting provisional measures.²²

In general, human rights adjudicators, like other international adjudicators, consider provisional measures terminated upon inadmissibility declaration or final judgment. Yet they often deal with extreme situations of threats to life and physical integrity. In some cases this warrants an approach to jurisdiction and admissibility that is slightly different from that taken by other adjudicators, dealing with non-human rights cases. Even without formally maintaining or taking provisional measures, if there is still a threat following final determination, the follow-up proceeding could specifically indicate that the case would only be closed once it has been resolved.²³ At minimum, the adjudicator should commit actively to follow up the final decision not only through ²⁰ See also the discussion in Chapter XVI (Legal status) on the case law of the HRC to the effect that a good faith application of the ICCPR and its Optional Protocol means that States are to halt executions once they are informed that a petition has been brought before the HRC, in other words, already before the HRC has taken provisional measures.

²¹ In a similar vein, the HRC has sometimes followed up its decision on the merits, urgently communicating to the State, in the face of an execution date, that at the very least its findings of a violation meant that the death sentence should not be executed. In fact this is a follow-up to its final View, finding a violation of Article 14 and, therefore, Article 6 ICCPR. On the official responses of States and the follow-up on provisional measures see Chapters XVII and XVIII.

²² See Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction), section 2.5 and Chapter XVIII (Follow-up), section 2.2.

²³ See also Chapter XVIII (Follow-up).

regular follow-up proceedings but also through emergency proceedings and press releases. Nevertheless the latter would mainly be appropriate for the Inter-American Commission or the treaty bodies because of their range of functions going beyond the adjudicatory function alone. In exceptional cases an adjudicator could also decide proprio motu to ask the petitioner whether she wishes to re-institute a case and take new provisional measures. A final option would be to 'maintain' the provisional measures formally. This last option would be feasible after an adjudicator has built up a considerable practice of using provisional measures aiming to protect witnesses, human rights defenders and others against death threats and harassment, as is the case in the Inter-American system. Provisional measures could then become a tool to some extent operating independently from the main proceedings. Nevertheless, if a specific tool for follow-up has been established, this could sometimes be more appropriate, especially, as the Inter-American Court has indicated, in the context of the obligation to investigate, prosecute and punish previous violations.

Moreover it is argued that for those adjudicators that have no additional monitoring functions (i.e. the various regional courts) there should always be a real claim on the merits with which the provisional measures are connected. Turning the concept of provisional measures into a summary procedure standing on its own, disconnected from any intent by the petitioner to even continue proceedings on the merits, would move it too far from its origins as developed by the ICJ and its predecessor. While for the protection of human rights a dynamic approach is warranted, maintaining some continuity with the traditional concept is also important. Continuity has a persuasive force of its own. Thus in order to prevent irreparable harm to persons the use of strongly worded provisional measures, operating somewhat independently from the main case (jurisdiction, merits, reparation), would be warranted as long as the petitioners have brought a genuine claim on the merits as well.

As noted, thus far the Inter-American system is the only system that has on occasion maintained provisional measures even beyond the judgments on the merits or reparations. It is also a system that includes a provision on provisional measures in the treaty itself. Different from systems where the authority to use provisional measures is implied, this explicit presence may justify such 'free-standing' provisional measures. A case is treated as pending so long as it has not yet been implemented. On the other hand, if the authority is implicit the irreparable harm to persons must be linked much more clearly to the case to be dealt with on the merits, either because of irreparable harm to the claim or because of irreparable harm to the procedure.

With regard to general international law the argument has been made that because provisional measures primarily serve the legal interests of those requesting them, 'the principle of equality of parties before justice requires that the balance be restored by restraint in the practice of granting interim protection and by allowing the benefit of doubt to serve the respondent'.²⁴ Obviously this argument does not apply in cases involving risk of irreparable harm to persons. In such cases it is clearly not necessary nor warranted, in light of the urgency concerned, to wait until jurisdiction and admissibility are fully determined before using provisional measures.²⁵ Within the conceptual framework proposed in this book, and consonant with the practice of the HRC and Inter-American Court, it is suggested that if the State has withdrawn from the individual complaint proceeding and different interpretations are possible about the competence (e.g. ratione temporis) of the adjudicator to still deal with the case, this should be examined as part of the decision on preliminary objections or admissibility and not already at the stage of provisional measures.

²⁴ Sztucki (1983), pp. 258-259.

²⁵ As noted, in this respect Rule 94(3) of the CERD Rules of Procedure is an anomaly.

The ICJ itself noted in its Order in the Nuclear Test cases (1973) that it should be sufficient that there is no a priori lack of jurisdiction.²⁶ Clearly in light of the principle of effective protection against irreparable harm to persons²⁷ in human rights adjudication there should be no need to determine prima facie admissibility.

As discussed, only if the case were prima facie inadmissible an adjudicator would have no competence to use provisional measures. In such cases it would be worthwhile if UN treaty body adjudicators would put in place a procedure by which their secretariats could forward to other appropriate UN bodies or special mechanisms urgent cases for which they have such prima facie lack of jurisdiction. In the alternative they could inform the petitioners about other possibilities.

From the analysis of the wider issue of admissibility (not just involving jurisdiction on the merits) in cases in which provisional measures were used, it is clear that at the stage of provisional measures there is no need for full evidence about admissibility either. While the case law does not explicitly say whether some measure of prima facie evidence for admissibility is required for the use of provisional measures, the human rights adjudicators do use provisional measures before they declare cases (in-)admissible.

If the applicable remedies have no suspensive effect, exhaustion of domestic remedies is not necessary before granting provisional measures. In decisions on admissibility human rights adjudicators have made clear that domestic remedies must only be exhausted to the extent that they have suspensive effect. If they do not have such effect, resort is warranted to an international adjudicator who can also use provisional measures before determining that indeed the domestic remedies lack suspensive effect. After all, it is exactly in situations in which the domestic remedies do not prevent irreparable harm that provisional measures are warranted. In this approach the international adjudicator would equally have competence to use provisional measures if the domestic proceedings are theoretically capable of halting certain measures, in other words, have suspensive effect, but not in practice. This is not contrary to the text of the respective provisions on exhaustion, while it corresponds with the principle of effective protection of persons against irreparable harm.²⁸

In addition, if a complaint is submitted to more than one international adjudicator, provisional measures could initially be used. In urgent cases petitioners may resort to various international and domestic adjudicators at the same time. This does not necessarily conflict with rules on exhaustion of local remedies on the one hand and non-submission of the 'same matter' to different international adjudicators on the other hand, as long as this is done only at the early stages of the proceedings, in order to prevent irreparable harm to the persons involved. Subsequently the petitioner should indicate which claim he maintains. Any provisional measures used by the other adjudicator should then be withdrawn.

In any case, whether the authority to order provisional measures is implicit or explicit, the case law of the human rights adjudicators with regard to jurisdiction and admissibility clearly shows their awareness of the irreparable nature of the harm.

4.3 Immediacy, risk and provisional measures

In the practice of the human rights adjudicators there is a link as well between the importance attached to preventing irreparable harm to persons and the issue of imminence, immediacy or ²⁶ ICJ Nuclear Tests case (New Zealand v. France), Order of 22 June 1973.

²⁷ See Conclusion Part II and Chapter XVI (Legal status).

²⁸ See Conclusion Part II on the purpose of preventing irreparable harm to persons and Chapter XVI on legal status.

temporal urgency. While conceptually a similar link would be expected between the importance attached to preventing irreparable harm on the one hand and assessment of risk on the other, in practice this does not always appear to be the case.

For provisional measures in human rights cases the risk to be prevented generally relates to irreparable harm to the life or physical integrity of persons and the cultural survival of indigenous groups. When the alleged risk is imminent quick action is to be preferred over lengthy deliberation about the existence of such risk. In cases where there is friction between lack of information and the risk involved, the standard of proof may have to be lowered. Given the overriding importance of protecting the very existence of people(s)²⁹ this applies to the assessment of risk in human rights cases even more than it does to such assessment in other cases.³⁰ Yet in practice it seems that the human rights adjudicators sometimes take a rather restrictive approach in their use of provisional measures.

Looking at the specific situations in which provisional measures have been used in human rights cases it is evident that they related to future or ongoing facts. Nevertheless the level of evidence available may differ considerably. In some cases of ongoing harm very concrete evidence is available already at the stage of provisional measures to show the risk of irreparable harm. In other cases, involving future harm, the adjudicators have to determine at this stage whether there is a 'real risk'.

In all these cases the factors to be taken into account in the decision on the merits coincide with those relevant for an assessment at the stage of provisional measures. The difference lies in the difficulty of proving future facts. In non-refoulement cases involving claims of a risk to life or physical integrity in the receiving or requesting State if someone would be removed to that State, the facts necessary for a risk assessment are often difficult to obtain. A combination of those facts is usually required for a risk assessment.

Some examples illustrate the various situations in which petitioners have requested the use of provisional measures. With regard to requests for provisional measures to protect persons whose life is threatened, concrete evidence of recent threats and harassment could be provided. In the eventual decision on the merits of claims involving death threats and harassment the evidence that must be provided is similar, but more definitive and establishing attribution.

A situation in which the adjudicators have to attach great importance to circumstantial evidence is that of enforced disappearances.³¹ In this case as well the factors taken into account on the merits are equally important in the assessment for the use of provisional measures, again without having to establish at that stage attribution of the disappearance to the State. With regard to provisional measures, however, the adjudicator will additionally take into account the question whether the alleged disappearance is sufficiently recent to make the use of provisional measures worthwhile.

For provisional measures to put a stop to ongoing ill-treatment or ensure access to medical treatment in detention concrete evidence concerning ill-treatment may be provided as well. Again similar criteria of what has to be proved at the merits stage must be met. In relation to requests for provisional measures to halt corporal punishment or the execution of a death sentence it is even possible to provide very concrete evidence of material risk.³²

In contrast, in expulsion or extradition cases the claims of irreparable harm are more uncertain because they deal with future facts. The criterion to be met on the merits is that there is a real ²⁹ See Conclusion Part II.

³⁰ See Chapter I (ICJ and ITLOS).

³¹ See Chapter VI (Disappearances) and Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk), section 3.2.

³² Obviously a conviction and especially an execution date may equally provide evidence of temporal urgency or, in other words, the imminence of the risk.

risk of such harm. Here the risk assessment for decision-making on provisional measures equally coincides with the assessment of 'real risk' at the merits stage. Specific factors that may be relevant in this respect are the general human rights situation in the receiving State and, if available at the stage of provisional measures, evidence that petitioners have been ill treated in the receiving State, that they belong to a specific (ethnic) group that is being targeted, that they have been politically active (in the opposition) in the receiving State or have subsequently been vocal about their State of origin while in the sending State. It is argued in this respect that in these urgent cases, all adjudicators should be able to consult and take into account information derived from publicly available reports by authorities such as UN Special Rapporteurs or by reputable NGOs, even when the parties did not provide it.

The foregoing means that the type of evidence necessary to show a real risk is similar at the merits and provisional measures stages. Thus the type of evidence required on the merits coincides with that required for provisional measures.

It is only the standard of proof that may be lower at the stage of provisional measures. The question arises to what extent evidence of real risk and prima facie evidence of such risk differ or, more generally speaking, whether and how the standard of proof on the merits could be relevant already in the assessment of risk of irreparable harm pending the proceedings.

The contours of the assessment of risk for the use of provisional measures may be sketched in relation to the various stages of decision-making. The strictest requirements can be found exactly in relation to the merits. At the admissibility stage the standard of evidence to be shown by the petitioner is lower than at the merits stage. Among others, there must be prima facie evidence of admissibility ratione materiae. On the premise that provisional measures may be used in advance of the admissibility declaration the level of evidence required is again lower than that required at the admissibility stage. In other words, the petitioner must be able to show evidence of risk of irreparable harm at very first sight (prima prima facie).

Of course in all situations referred to (disappearances, threats, treatment in detention, expulsion) the State is in a position to cover up or withhold information. In general this warrants a lowering of the standard of proof required for the petitioner before the burden shifts to the State. Yet the question arises whether the issue of burden of proof is relevant already at the provisional measures stage. In this respect there is a difference between the provisional measures that are taken for the first time in a given case and those that are taken subsequently. Initially, when an adjudicator has to decide urgently on the use of provisional measures, this is often on the basis of an urgent evaluation of the credibility and sufficiency of the information provided by the petitioner alone. Yet when the adjudicator takes a provisional measure and subsequently is called upon to confirm, adapt or withdraw this measure, the burden of proof does play a role similar to that at the merits stage. If the State provides information to the effect that the petitioner is not (or no longer) facing irreparable harm, the petitioner wishing a continuation of the provisional measures, must bring evidence to convince the adjudicator that such continuation is necessary despite the information provided by the State.

Provisional measures show that adjudicators believe the matter to be so urgent that measures should be taken, although they have not yet been able to evaluate all the evidence and arguments in relation to the main claim. The adjudicator simply tried to assess, on an urgent basis and when the case was pending, all the information available at that point of the risk of irreparable harm to the person involved.

In my view the requirement that provisional measures must not prejudice the eventual legal determination is related to the assessment of risk.³³ If provisional measures are taken this does not mean that a violation will eventually be found. This is so exactly because pending the case the adjudicator takes decisions on the basis of urgency, without being able to examine fully the evidence in relation to the main claim.

³³ Chapter I discussed the issue of prejudgment in the context of the provisional measures by the ICJ.

If the adjudicator did not use provisional measures, eventually it can still find a violation of, for instance, the right to life. If it did use provisional measures it can still declare the case inadmissible or find no violations. With regard to the evidence, in other words, the decision on provisional measures is unrelated to and does not predetermine the decision on the merits.³⁴ What is important is that upon final determination the adjudicator is not led by the fact that provisional measures were taken pending the proceedings. After all, a full assessment of the evidence at the merits stage must be stricter than an assessment of risk at the provisional measures stage. The latter concerns a prima facie assessment only. Moreover, this assessment concerns those claims alone that relate to irreparable harm.³⁵

4.4 The legal status of provisional measures

Chapter XVI argued that the authority of human rights adjudicators to take binding provisional measures is derived from the core rights singled out in the treaties, in light of the practice developed of attaching particular importance to the protection of personal integrity and (cultural) survival, read together with the right of individual petition.³⁶ After all, the principles of effectiveness and of the prevention of irreparable harm have been used by the adjudicators, either explicitly or implicitly, when interpreting these provisions. In addition it is submitted that the prevention of irreparable harm is not just a principle of treaty interpretation, but has also developed into a general principle of law, which is, as such, binding on States (Article 38 (1)(c) ICJ Statute).

The human rights adjudicators do have in common an underlying interpretative approach, both with regard to their implied power to use provisional measures and as to the binding nature of provisional measures. In fact one can speak of an ‘acquis humanitaire’ based on the standards of protection that all human rights adjudicators have in common,³⁷ which also applies to the legal status of provisional measures.

The text of the human rights treaties must be interpreted in light of their context and object and purpose, in a dynamic manner, taking into account the need to ensure that they have effect. The principle of effectiveness flowing from the object and purpose indicates that the adjudicators instituted under these treaties must have the power to use provisional measures. As discussed, the ICJ’s finding in LaGrand that its provisional measures were legally binding was not made dependent on the fact that basic rights of the human person were involved, but was simply part of the Court’s traditional function. Nevertheless the principle of effectiveness came into play. The power to indicate provisional measures was required by the object and purpose of Article 41 ICJ Statute and ‘based on the necessity, when the circumstances call for it, to safeguard, and to avoid prejudice to, the rights of the parties as determined by the final judgment of the Court’.³⁸

³⁴ See Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction and admissibility).

³⁵ This should also be reflected in the motivation of provisional measures that this book argues for, see e.g. Chapter II, section 8.2.

³⁶ See also Conclusion Part II.

³⁷ On the issue of convergence and divergence in general, see Chapter II, section 8.3. On the common core of the concept of provisional measures, see Conclusion Part II. The term ‘acquis humanitaire’ was also used by Simma (1995), p. 173, although not in the specific context of the concept of provisional measures.

³⁸ ICJ LaGrand (Germany v. US), Judgment of 27 June 2001, §102.

The ECtHR has considered that ‘in the light of the general principles of international law, the law of treaties and international case-law, the interpretation of the scope of interim measures cannot be dissociated from the proceedings to which they relate or the decision on the merits they seek to protect’.³⁹ This statement about the scope of provisional measures shows that now the ECtHR too recognises that in the context of such measures procedural and substantive law meet. The emphasis on the decision on the merits that provisional measures seek to protect underscores the binding nature of these measures. After all, otherwise States would be allowed to cause irreparable harm to the claim on the merits, and, to the extent the provisional measures relate to claims involving survival and personal integrity, which is generally the case, irreparable harm to persons.⁴⁰

By accepting the jurisdiction of an international (including regional) adjudicator a State has committed itself to an international system of adjudication. Just like a domestic system of adjudication, an international system can, in my view, only be effective if the adjudicator has the power to order provisional measures that are legally binding. In this respect the main difference between domestic and international systems of adjudication is the all-inclusive nature of the former on the one hand and the fact that in most international systems States initially are free to accept or reject compulsory jurisdiction on the other. This difference, however, loses much of its significance once a State has accepted the jurisdiction of an adjudicator. Even if a rule on the binding character of provisional measures is not included as such in a treaty text, by accepting the competence of an adjudicator to deal with conflicts between States or between individuals and States, the State has accepted the adjudicator’s judicial independence and its power to deal with these conflicts effectively. The authority to use binding provisional measures is inherent to effective adjudication.

Even if the treaty in question does not explicitly provide for the use of provisional measures, the duty to protect against threats to survival and personal integrity requires the State to take positive measures also pending international proceedings. If it is the international adjudicator who recommends such positive measures, in the form of provisional measures, respecting them is also required as part of the obligations entered into by the State’s recognition of the complaint procedure.

It is argued that the human rights adjudicators have been correct to stress that the effet utile of their decisions on the merits necessitates respect for the provisional measures indicated by them pending the proceedings. If decisions on the merits are not considered legally binding in all respects (such as certain recommendations for reparation), at least the State’s recognition of the substantive rights in the treaty and its recognition of the individual complaint system require a basic level of action and abstention on its part. The most fundamental rights in the treaty at issue require at least the protection of the petitioner from irreparable harm, as well as the good faith cooperation by the State with the relevant adjudicator.

An action or omission causing irreparable harm to persons (involving personal integrity and survival) is an aggravated breach of the human rights treaty. If a State has recognized the right of individual complaint (or of inter-State complaint for that matter) and the adjudicator decided to use provisional measures to prevent such harm, ignoring these measures is an aggravated breach of the right of petition as well.

While not an aggravated breach, ignoring other provisional measures, which may not (yet) fall within the common core, is also contrary to the obligation to cooperate with the adjudicator in good faith. If a State considers that the adjudicator was in error in using provisional measures it should still respect the measures. In most such cases the State has a different assessment of the risk (urgency), but it is ultimately for the human rights adjudicator to decide on this. In addition,

³⁹ ECtHR Grand Chamber, Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 15 December 2004, §123.

⁴⁰ See also Conclusion Part II on the relation between irreparable harm to the claim and to persons.

the State's belief that the adjudicator was in error may be based on a genuine conviction that the risk is not irreversible, meaning that the provisional measures are situated beyond the outer limits. Even then the State must respect the provisional measures based on its obligations under the system of individual complaint. At the same time the adjudicators must take care not to go beyond the outer limits, also for the sake of the individual petition system. After all their provisional measures must be seen as worthy of compliance in the long run.

4.5 The principle of preventing irreparable harm and taking into account the inequality between the parties

The foregoing indicates that the effet utile of human rights treaties and the principle of preventing irreparable harm to persons not only necessitate the use of provisional measures that are legally binding, but these principles, as well as the due process principle of taking into account the de facto inequality between the parties, also influence the assessment of jurisdiction, admissibility and urgency at the provisional measures stage.

The further discussion deals with the principle of preventing irreparable harm and the principle of taking into account de facto inequality between the parties. The more adverse the impact of certain measures is likely to be on the well-being of people, facing a situation that would be intolerable, the more reason adjudicators have for the use of provisional measures pending the proceedings, particularly if the task of the adjudicator specifically relates to this issue or if the problem in question is endemic in the region involved.

As noted in Chapter II, international human rights law may to some extent be seen as a 'regime' or 'a set of implicit or explicit principles, norms, rules, and decision-making procedures around which actors' expectations converge in a given area of international relations'.⁴¹ Indeed, human rights adjudicators, alleged victims, NGOs and States appear to have assumed, even if implicitly, the principle of effective protection to prevent irreparable harm to persons.

In addition, when deciding on the use of provisional measures the human rights adjudicators have also taken into account the factual inequality between the parties. Together with their awareness of the serious nature of the harm risked, this inequality has also played a role in the more lenient attitude of the human rights adjudicators towards the requirements of prima facie admissibility and jurisdiction on the merits and of immediacy and real risk. It does not play a similar role in the discussion on the legal status of provisional measures because, as discussed, the authority to use binding provisional measures is inherent in effective adjudication in any case.

To the extent that cases before the ICJ also involve the rights of individuals, the case law of the human rights adjudicators could also be relevant to it. The inequality between the parties is a criterion applying particularly in the context of individual complaints about human rights violations. Yet taking into account the serious nature of the harm risked to persons clearly applies in the inter-State context of the ICJ as well.

Insofar as general international law is truly in the process of humanization,⁴² resort to international law rules that harm the effective protection of human rights is becoming increasingly less likely. While it is important for the human rights adjudicators, as it is for other adjudicators, to pursue consistency and coherence in the application of general concepts and principles of international law, two factors must be taken into account. The first is that in any case often the most human rights protective interpretation applies, simply based on the text of the relevant human rights treaty. The second is that the interpretation of rules of general international law by human rights adjudicators may be more correct, in the circumstances, than that of the ICJ or that expressed in certain general doctrine. Moreover, while human rights law as such may not (yet) be seen as hierarchically higher than international law regarding other values, this is different with regard to the law developed to prevent irreparable harm to persons. As Sands has suggested, in some cases the object and purpose of the human rights system would be undermined by applying the interpretation advanced by general international adjudicators.⁴³ Thus, in order to safeguard the object and purpose of the human rights system, which is at minimum to protect persons against irreparable harm, in case of differences with regard to the approach of the ICJ, e.g. on the issue of reservations, the human rights adjudicators may have to continue to ‘diverge’ until the ICJ follows their lead.

⁴¹ Krasner (1983), p. 2.

⁴² See also Chapter I, section 3.4.

5 OFFICIAL STATE RESPONSES AND FOLLOW-UP BY THE ADJUDICATORS

While the question of effectiveness is one of causality and is an empirical question that falls outside the scope of this conceptual research, it was considered useful to give a brief overview of the types of official responses by addressee States (Chapter XVII) and of the follow-up provided by the adjudicators and others (Chapter XVIII).

Chapter XVII noted that States generally respect provisional measures, sometimes explicitly confirming their compliance. It then focused on those situations in which States have failed to comply. It discussed official responses by States justifying why they failed to comply with a provisional measure. It distinguished two categories, one where the State protested against the (temporary) outcome of the normative process, and another where the State protested against the development of the process as such. Explanations for the first category of responses may be derived from the system of implementation in domestic law, specific politics, the role of media, domestic and international NGOs and other international actors. Explanations of non-compliance based on the second type, disagreement with the decision-making process of the adjudicator, may relate to the procedures of the adjudicator in general or to specific issues arising in the case, e.g. involving the principle of audiatur et altera pars or the lack of transparency in the decision-making process.

These official responses simply present legal arguments for a decision of non-compliance that in fact is likely to be based on domestic reasons of a political rather than legal nature. Moreover, the paucity of consistent information on State responses does not allow for a clear answer to the question whether States respond more favourably to provisional measures that aim to protect those rights that are commonly considered the most fundamental.

The adjudicators are the final interpreters of what would be irreparable harm, both during the proceedings and in their decisions on the merits. The general authority of the supervisory body is obviously linked with the persuasiveness of its case law. A distinction may be made, however, between the authority of the body in general, and its authority in the specific target-State. Apart from these types of authority and apart from residual doubts regarding the legal status of provisional measures, there are several other aspects that play a role in the attitude of States towards the provisional measures of the respective supervisory bodies.

Not even national courts can work miracles and protect everyone from harm. Regional and international adjudicators are even less in position to be an Action Hero. If tested against Superman standards the provisional measures by the international adjudicators would fail miserably. Their intervention against irreparable harm always takes place by proxy. They order the State to do what it should have done already or to refrain from acting in other cases. Their powers are simply those of authority and persuasion, making use of the wish of most States to perform well internationally and of their fear of international embarrassment. This is all the more reason for adjudicators to always strive to improve the persuasiveness of their decisions on provisional measures, among others by providing reasoning and promoting dialogue.

⁴³ Sands (1999), p. 104.

As was the practice especially before the former European Commission, given the rationale of protecting persons against irreparable harm, where appropriate the adjudicator should also allow a State to anticipate a formal provisional measure and make such measure unnecessary by solving an urgent situation. At the same time, the follow-up of such situations as well as the follow-up on actual provisional measures should ensure also that the adjudicator is aware of the particular circumstances of the case and immediately addresses stalling techniques and evasive replies.

It may be expected that governments wishing to maintain an image of democracy would generally be more receptive to provisional measures indicated by human rights adjudicators than would more authoritarian and repressive governments, among others for fear of public opinion. Yet there is an exception to this receptiveness in relation to the execution of death sentences and decisions to expel or extradite convicted criminals or suspected terrorists. If international adjudicators consider that these persons run a real risk of a irreparable harm not only to their human rights claim, but to their survival or personal integrity, domestic authorities are often less open to this assessment exactly because of public opinion.

In such cases the fact that the provisional measures relate to life and personal integrity may not be decisive in and of itself (e.g. the decision not to halt an execution despite a provisional measure ordered by an international adjudicator may be explained by a public opinion strongly in favour of the death penalty). In fact in such a context a provisional measure protecting against irreparable harm to the claim (not involving a core right) rather than to persons may be less controversial, making it easier for the State to comply.

Chapter XVIII noted that the practice of the adjudicators, as well as that of officials from intergovernmental organisations and that of NGOs, shows that follow-up on provisional measures is considered to be essential. In practice the follow-up by the political bodies formally assigned with that task within the human rights systems is insufficient or sometimes even non-existent. The Geneva adjudicators and the Inter-American Commission and Court have taken it upon themselves to monitor non-compliance with their provisional measures. They repeatedly send messages to the State concerned to the effect that the provisional measures remain in force. Such follow-up may often require increased specificity of these provisional measures as well.⁴⁴ In addition the Inter-American Court has held Court hearings discussing implementation of its provisional measures and has assigned the Inter-American Commission an important monitoring role in this respect. This Commission has paid attention to implementation of its own precautionary measures and of those of the Court also during country visits. The Geneva bodies have asked questions on the implementation of provisional measures during hearings in the context of State reports as well.

In addition Chapter XVIII argued that ignoring provisional measures has consequences for how the complaint on the merits can be examined. Not only the right of individual petition is implicated when a State has ignored provisional measures, but often the right to life and the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment are too. In such cases of non-compliance with provisional measures, on the merits the burden should shift to the State to show that these rights have not been violated.

Follow-up could be one of the best tools to ensure compliance. In particular the Inter-American Court shows a proactive approach in this respect. Any mechanisms for resort to the political bodies of the organisation within which the adjudicatory system has been created should also be employed to the full. Adjudicators that have other monitoring functions as well, such as the Geneva bodies and the African and Inter-American Commissions, may refer to compliance with their provisional measures in that context, e.g. when discussing State reports. When States nevertheless do not comply, the resort to publicity by NGOs or independent UN experts could be a useful method to help counteract this. Nevertheless it is important in this respect as well that each situation is assessed individually as to the anticipated impact of such publicity on the beneficiaries, especially if domestic (or local) public opinion strongly disfavours the protection of the beneficiaries of the provisional measures.

⁴⁴ See also Chapter XIII (Protection).

In the long run it may also be the strength of the external disapproval for non-compliance that will help determine compliance in future cases. This external disapproval, through the follow-up by the adjudicators, as well as statements by international organisations, NGOs and other States, does seem to be determined, at least partially, by the irreparable nature of the harm that the provisional measures aim to prevent, thereby reaffirming the common core of the concept as it currently stands. An ‘acquis humanitaire’ has now been achieved based on standards of protection that all human rights adjudicators have in common.

6 AN ‘IDEAL’ PROVISIONAL MEASURE

The use of provisional measures has helped protect persons against irreparable harm and their respect or disrespect has a significant impact on the integrity of the regional and international human rights systems. While the reasons for States to ignore provisional measures often are unrelated to their persuasiveness, the respect specific provisional measures command more generally does depend on their contents, the transparency of the decision-making procedure with regard to them, their purpose, the manner in which they are adapted to the situation at hand, their motivation and legal status.

The ‘common core’ discussed in this book refers to the types of situations in which a provisional measure appears to be based on a common underlying rationale and more than one human rights adjudicator has in fact used provisional measures in such situation. Currently the situations falling within the common core are those where provisional measures aim to prevent irreparable harm to persons. Such irreparable harm results from the violation of rights crucial to a person’s or a group’s basic existence or crucial to a person’s dignity. This entails ensuring survival of persons and groups and ensuring respect for personal integrity.

Given their function, human rights adjudicators do have the obligation to use provisional measures if they consider there is a risk of irreparable harm to persons meeting the criteria for the common core of provisional measures. This applies in particular if the case law on the merits is abundantly clear on the risk of irreparable harm to life or personal integrity.

On the other hand, in some situations the use of provisional measures is inappropriate, as they aim to prevent harm that would mostly be reversible. In this book such provisional measures are considered to be situated beyond the outer limits of the concept.

There are also many measures that can be placed along the continuum between the common core and the outer limits of the concept. In order to prevent a devaluation of the human rights system in question, particularly in systems not referring to provisional measures in the text of their constitutive documents, an ‘ideal’ provisional measure is a measure that is taken in exceptional circumstances, preferably situated within the common core or closely gravitating towards that core.⁴⁵ At the same time an ‘ideal’ provisional measure is sufficiently adapted to the exigencies of the situation at hand. Thus human rights adjudicators should have sufficient flexibility to be able to take steps to expand their use of provisional measures. Yet generally speaking they should do so progressively rather than in a sudden and unexpected manner not based on a pre-existing rationale.

⁴⁵ See Chapter XII (Other situations).

The Inter-American system is the system this book has often referred to for best practices with regard to the protection of witnesses, displaced persons, indigenous culture, human rights defenders and peace communities. The system is innovative and, compared to the other systems, shows a closer awareness of the circumstances of the individual cases. Provisional measures by the Inter-American Court are also more persuasive than those by the other human rights systems because they are published and they provide reasoning.

The practice in the Inter-American system exemplifies the continuum between preventing and compensating for human rights violations, as well as the importance of monitoring and follow-up.

Yet provisional measures are also context specific and what works in one system does not necessarily work in another. Of course the adage applies that the smaller the group, the greater the cohesion and the tighter the ordre public. Nevertheless, the international mechanisms of individual complaint (the Geneva supervisory bodies) and of individual accountability as well as international rules and supervision on trade and the law of the sea demonstrate the creation of various types of larger public orders, often warranting increased cross-referencing and cooperation. This applies even more to the rules and supervisory mechanisms (including the right of individual complaint) established by regional organisations. Organisations such as the Council of Europe and the OAS have created an ordre public with regard to human rights. The participating States have voluntarily submitted to international supervisory mechanisms and set in motion a process that would be difficult to reverse. They cannot, at convenient times, ignore or withdraw from this supervision by insisting on their complete sovereignty without severely damaging their own reputation.

For provisional measures by the UN adjudicators to serve their purpose it is also important – and this is specific to the Geneva context – that staff members of the High Commissioner’s Secretariat in Geneva maintain open and efficient lines of communication so that provisional measures by the treaty bodies and urgent appeals by special proceedings, such as the Special Rapporteurs on torture or executions, reinforce each other.

The persuasiveness of the provisional measures depends on their legitimacy, motivation, publication, consistency and follow-up. They must be credible and convincing. Another relevant factor is their precision, showing the awareness by the adjudicator of the situation in the target State suggesting the necessary measures in that particular context. This awareness of the situation in the target State also means that the adjudicator must have sufficient flexibility.

The effet utile of human rights treaties necessitates the use of binding provisional measures. These measures are authoritative if their use is coherent, credible and transparent and if they are at the same time closely adapted to the exigencies of the situation. All of this is warranted to ensure they effectively protect persons against irreparable harm.

SAMENVATTING

Voorlopige maatregelen in internationale rechtspraak over mensenrechten ter voorkoming van onherstelbare schade

Deze studie onderzoekt de ontwikkeling van het juridische concept van de voorlopige maatregel in internationale klachtprocedures ingesteld bij mensenrechtenverdragen. Is er sprake van een convergentie in de benadering van de verschillende regionale en internationale rechterlijke colleges op het gebied van de rechten van de mens? De praktijk van deze verschillende rechterlijke colleges bij het gebruik van voorlopige maatregelen is systematisch geanalyseerd met betrekking tot overtuigingskracht, waarbij de verschillende aspecten zijn belicht die een rol spelen in de discussie over het traditionele interstatelijke concept van de voorlopige maatregel. Het betreft de volgende aspecten van voorlopige maatregelen: de bevoegdheid tot het nemen ervan, de inhoud, de te beschermen personen, de rechten van de aangesproken Staten, de vraag in hoeverre de bevoegdheid van het Hof om de zaak ten gronde te behandelen een rol speelt; de beoordeling van het bewijs van risico als zodanig en van de vraag hoe onmiddellijk de dreiging is, de juridische status en de follow-up op de reacties van Staten.

De studie presenteert een conceptueel kader dat laat zien dat er inderdaad sprake is van een convergerende trend die de overtuigingskracht van voorlopige maatregelen kan vergroten. Hierbij is zowel de gemeenschappelijkheid van de onderliggende reden voor het gebruik ervan van belang, als het feit dat twee of meer juridische colleges daadwerkelijk in die situatie een voorlopige maatregel hebben gebruikt. Daarnaast spelen criteria als transparantie in de besluitvorming ook een rol bij de overtuigingskracht ten aanzien van Staten. Omdat voorlopige maatregelen inderdaad effectieve bescherming moeten kunnen bieden is het ook van belang dat zij qua inhoud zijn afgestemd op de concrete situatie en dat de te beschermen personen hierover worden geconsulteerd.

DEEL I

DE CONTEXT WAARBINNEN HET CONCEPT ‘VOORLOPIGE MAATREGEL’ ZICH ONTWIKKELT

Hoofdstuk I gaat in op het traditionele concept ‘voorlopige maatregelen’ zoals ontwikkeld door het Internationaal Gerechtshof. Daarnaast refereert het aan de praktijk van zijn voorganger, het Permanente Hof van International Justitie en aan de praktijk van het Zeerechttribunaal.

De focus van het hoofdstuk ligt op de humanisering van het concept, die ook al bij het Internationaal Gerechtshof kan worden waargenomen. Dit Hof, dat uitsluitend klachten behandelt van de ene Staat tegen de andere, houdt namelijk rekening met het lot van mensen die verstrikt zijn geraakt in conflicten tussen Staten. Dit blijkt niet alleen uit zijn voorlopige maatregelen in de context van klachten van de ene Staat over schending van mensenrechtenverplichtingen door de andere, maar ook uit voorlopige maatregelen die het Hof nam in de context van het Weense Verdrag inzake Consulaire Bescherming en in de context van bepaalde grensconflicten. In dit kader heeft het soms een voorlopige maatregel genomen die overeenkwam met de klacht ten gronde, of formuleerde het juist andere maatregelen dan gevraagd door de Partij(en).

Van oudsher is het doel van voorlopige maatregelen om rechten te beschermen die op het punt staan om te worden geschonden, terwijl dit onherstelbare schade aan de geclaimde rechten zou kunnen opleveren. Eventueel kunnen voorlopige maatregelen ook als doel hebben om te verzekeren dat de procedure als zodanig goed verloopt. In ieder geval moeten zij dus een zinnige einduitspraak kunnen waarborgen. Een zeker verband tussen een verzoek van een Staat om voorlopige maatregelen en de rechten die ten gronde worden ingeroepen ligt dan voor de hand. Als het gaat om serieuze situaties waar het lot van personen (en niet alleen andere belangen van Staten) in het geding is, stelt het Hof zich niet rigide op. Dit is zelfs zo als de klacht en het verzoek om voorlopige maatregelen elkaar grotendeels overlappen. Dit blijkt bijvoorbeeld uit de voorlopige maatregelen in de Hostages case en in de Nuclear Test cases. Bij een dergelijke overlap in klacht en verzoek tot voorlopige maatregelen zonder dat het lot van personen in het geding is, zou het Hof waarschijnlijk het verzoek afwijzen als een verkapt verzoek om een tussenvonnis.

Aan de andere kant houdt het Hof om dezelfde reden, namelijk bescherming van personen, ook niet strikt vast aan de eis dat er een duidelijk verband moet zijn met de hoofdklacht, hoewel het dus ook geen verhuuld verzoek om een tussenvonnis mag zijn. In grensconflicten heeft het Hof eveneens voorlopige maatregelen genomen die vooral gericht waren op bescherming van de grensbewoners tegen geweld van beide partijen en daarnaast op het waarborgen van bewijsmateriaal. Juist ter bescherming van personen is het Hof inventief in het herformuleren van door een Partij verzochte voorlopige maatregelen. Het Hof zou zelfs ambtshalve (proprio motu) dergelijke voorlopige maatregelen kunnen nemen wanneer de argumenten van de partijen daar maar enigszins aanleiding toe geven.

Hoewel het Internationaal Gerechtshof eventuele procedurele strategieën van Staten (bijvoorbeeld om stukken erg laat in te dienen) niet wenst te belonen, heeft het hierop een uitzondering gemaakt toen de indiener (Duitsland) zo'n strategie had gevolgd terwijl het leven van de de facto te beschermen persoon (LaGrand) op het spel stond. Het Hof nam een voorlopige maatregel om zijn executie op te schorten zonder eerst een hoorzitting te houden en de argumenten van beide partijen te horen, zoals bij het Hof anders wel gebruikelijk is. Ook dit illustreert een zekere humanisering in de benadering van het Hof.

Het Hof kan zelf bij zijn gebruik van voorlopige maatregelen eveneens kijken naar de praktijk van de toezichthoudende instanties bij mensenrechtenverdragen. Het heeft in een andere context ook naar de interpretaties verwezen van die instanties. De notie 'judicial decisions' in artikel 38(1) (d) van het Statuut van het Internationaal Gerechtshof verwijst ten slotte niet alleen naar uitspraken van het Internationaal Gerechtshof als hulpmiddel voor het bepalen van rechtsregels maar naar 'judicial decisions' in het algemeen.

Hoofdstuk II belicht voorlopige maatregelen in de context van de verschillende onderzochte mensenrechtensystemen waarbinnen personen klachten kunnen indienen: drie toezichthoudende comités bij VN-verdragen (het Mensenrechtencomité, het Comité tegen foltering en het Comité tegen discriminatie van vrouwen), drie regionale Commissies en Hoven (in het Inter-Amerikaanse, het Europese en het Afrikaanse systeem) en een sui generis instantie (de Bosnia Chamber). Bij sommige van deze instanties staat de bevoegdheid voorlopige maatregelen te nemen letterlijk vermeld in het betreffende verdrag zelf, bij andere is dit niet het geval. Het gaat echter om een impliciete bevoegdheid die voortvloeit uit het feit dat deze instanties de functie hebben individuele klachten juridisch te beoordelen. Zij moeten de verplichtingen van een Staat bepalen, op basis van een juridische procedure, bij een juridisch conflict met een of meerdere personen. Het beginsel van effectieve mensenrechtenbescherming veronderstelt dat deze instanties ten minste onherstelbare schade moeten kunnen voorkomen, ook proprio motu. Bovendien is het bij instanties die slechts enkele malen per jaar bijeenkomen van belang dat de bevoegdheid tot het nemen van voorlopige maatregelen wordt gedelegeerd naar een van de leden.

Het hoofdstuk bespreekt het gebrek aan publicatie en motivatie van voorlopige maatregelen in de meeste systemen en betoogt dat het vergroten van de toegankelijkheid van informatie over voorlopige maatregelen en hun motivatie noodzakelijk is om de overtuigingskracht van deze maatregelen te vergroten. Dit maakt het ook mogelijk effectief naar deze maatregelen te verwijzen in vergelijkbare zaken voor de nationale rechter.

De mensenrechtensystemen zijn zeer divers. Dit leidt tot een verscheidenheid aan situaties waarin slechts één rechterlijk college voorlopige maatregelen heeft genomen (bijvoorbeeld de Bosnia Chamber om gedwongen uithuiszettingen op te schorten). Maar ook dit blijkt niet te zijn gebaseerd op een divergentie in de onderliggende benadering van het concept. Uit deel II blijkt dat er duidelijk meer sprake is van convergentie dan van divergentie. Dit heeft te maken met het doel van voorlopige maatregelen.

DEEL II

HET DOEL VAN DE INGESTELDE VOORLOPIGE MAATREGELEN

Dit deel presenteert een conceptueel kader met een gemeenschappelijke kern, een uiterste grens en de bandbreedte daartussen. Het gaat hierbij om een zich ontwikkelend concept, waardoor de gemeenschappelijke kern en de bandbreedte in de loop van de tijd kunnen veranderen. In de kern betreft het die situaties ter bescherming van rechten die in de verschillende systemen in einduitspraken zijn geselecteerd als van uitzonderlijk belang en waarbij in twee of meer systemen ook daadwerkelijk voorlopige maatregelen zijn genomen. Hierbij wordt dus zowel normatief-inhoudelijk als feitelijk getoetst. Het onderzoek stelt dat de uiterste grens van het concept 'voorlopige maatregel' wordt overschreden als deze maatregel wordt genomen in situaties die niet onomkeerbaar zijn. Een voorbeeld is een maatregel in de vorm van een opdracht aan de Staat om tijdens de procedure de klager geen boetes op te leggen. In dergelijke situaties die buiten de grenzen van het concept vallen is het gebruik van voorlopige maatregelen ongepast omdat dit de algemene overtuigingskracht van het middel kan aantasten bij de effectieve bescherming tegen ernstige schendingen.

Er zijn ook mensenrechtensituaties die niet binnen de gemeenschappelijke kern vallen maar wel binnen de uiterste grenzen blijven omdat de voorlopige maatregelen wel degelijk beogen iets onomkeerbaars te voorkomen. Deze voorlopige maatregelen liggen op verschillende punten op de bandbreedte tussen de uiterste grens en de gemeenschappelijke kern. Hoe meer het, in de situatie waarin in één van de systemen een voorlopige maatregel is genomen, rechten betreft die in de verschillende systemen zijn geselecteerd om hun uitzonderlijk belang, hoe dichter bij de gemeenschappelijke kern zo'n maatregel kan worden gesitueerd.

Momenteel wordt in alle systemen de facto het criterium gehanteerd dat de voorlopige maatregel 'onherstelbare schade' moet voorkomen. Het kan hierbij gaan om schade aan de eis of de procedure. In het conceptueel kader gaat het dan simpelweg om het voorkomen van onomkeerbare situaties. Daarnaast worden voorlopige maatregelen genomen met als doel werkelijk onherstelbare schade aan personen te voorkomen. Onherstelbaar wordt in dit kader gezien als een overtreffende trap van onomkeerbaar. Het gaat namelijk om de onmogelijkheid van rechtsherstel. Het gaat om onomkeerbare situaties die hoe dan ook moeten worden voorkomen omdat zij ondraaglijk zijn. Het door de Staat in het vooruitzicht stellen van herstel achteraf (met een geldbedrag) is simpelweg onbehoorlijk.

In de praktijk gaat het bij het voorkomen van onherstelbare schade om bescherming van de rechten die in alle systemen zijn geselecteerd om hun grote belang. Wanneer een voorlopige maatregel de bescherming van één van deze rechten betreft en wanneer in twee of meer systemen in een dergelijke situatie zo'n maatregel is genomen, spreekt dit boek dus over een gemeenschappelijke kern. Hiervan is op dit moment sprake bij het opschorten van uitvoering van de doodstraf en lijfstraffen en van uitlevering en uitzetting in de context van non-refoulement; bij het ingrijpen in detentieomstandigheden en ter bescherming van verdwenen of bedreigde personen. Daarnaast is de gemeenschappelijke kern uitgebreid met het recht op toegang tot rechtsbijstand en rechter wanneer het recht op leven en het respect voor de persoonlijke integriteit in het geding zijn; met het waarborgen van het voortbestaan van inheemse culturen en bescherming van religieuze rechten van minderheden (in Bosnië als post-conflict gebied); en in specifieke situaties van diepgewortelde discriminatie ook met de bescherming tegen willekeurige (massale) uitzettingen en gedwongen uithuiszettingen.

Hoofdstukken III tot en met XI bespreken deze situaties, waarbij wordt gekeken of er inderdaad een verband is tussen de inhoud van de voorlopige maatregel genomen tijdens de procedure en de inhoud van de einduitspraak. Oordeelt het rechterlijke college in dergelijke gevallen meestal dat er inderdaad sprake is van een schending en is de Staat volgens de einduitspraak ook verplicht om iets te doen of na te laten om een dergelijke schending te voorkomen of stop te zetten? Er is bijvoorbeeld geen overtuigend verband tussen de voorlopige maatregel die tijdens de procedure wordt genomen ter opschorting van een executie en de klacht dat het verblijf in een dodencel in strijd is met het verbod op wrede behandeling indien het rechterlijk college in zijn einduitspraak nooit concludeert dat een dergelijk verblijf in strijd is met dit verbod. Er is ook geen overtuigend verband tussen een voorlopige maatregel en de claim ten gronde als het rechterlijk college weliswaar concludeert dat er een schending heeft plaatsgevonden (bijvoorbeeld van het verbod op wrede behandeling), maar daaraan niet de conclusie verbindt dat omzetting van de doodstraf naar een gevangenisstraf onderdeel moet zijn van het rechtsherstel waarop het slachtoffer recht heeft. Zonder een dergelijk verband kan er geen sprake zijn van het voorkomen van onomkeerbare schade aan de eis. Dan is het gebruik van voorlopige maatregelen ongepast omdat ten gronde de Staat dan nooit verplicht kan worden iets te doen of na te laten wat de voorlopige maatregelen eerder wel vorderden. De klager wordt dan bijvoorbeeld alsnog geëxecuteerd.

Hoofdstuk XII bespreekt atypische situaties waarin maar in één systeem voorlopige maatregelen zijn genomen en bespreekt waar op de bandbreedte deze kunnen worden geplaatst en of het gebruik van voorlopige maatregelen in sommige situaties niet buiten de uiterste grens van het concept valt. Hoofdstuk XIII gaat in op de inhoud van de voorlopige maatregelen. De Staat moet vaak niet alleen iets nalaten, maar heeft ook de positieve verplichting om iets te doen. Het Inter-Amerikaanse Hof en, meer nog, de Inter-Amerikaanse Commissie zijn hierbij het meest specifiek in de aanwijzingen aan de Staat over de vereiste bescherming. Het hoofdstuk stelt onder meer dat het subsidiariteitsbeginsel niet in de weg hoeft te staan aan het besluit van een internationaal rechterlijk college om verplichtingen van Staten in het kader van voorlopige maatregelen nader te concretiseren. Dit geldt ook voor het Europese Hof. In sommige gevallen is nader concretiseren noodzakelijk om de gewenste bescherming te bereiken. Bij voorlopige maatregelen om het voortbestaan van inheemse culturen te waarborgen is het van belang dat de woordvoerder de groep in kwestie inderdaad vertegenwoordigt. Bij doodsb bedreigingen kan het nodig zijn de lijst van te beschermen personen in vervolg-maatregelen uit te breiden naar familieleden, collega's en dergelijke. Terecht heeft het Inter-Amerikaanse Hof bepaald dat het niet altijd nodig is alle te beschermen personen met naam en toenaam te noemen. Soms is het niet mogelijk de namen van iedereen te achterhalen. De te beschermen personen willen bijvoorbeeld inderdaad wel beschermd worden, maar zijn bang om hun naam vrij te geven. Het is dan toch mogelijk voorlopige maatregelen te nemen om hen te beschermen. Het moet voor de Staat alleen duidelijk zijn dat iemand tot de bedreigde groep behoort, zoals een specifieke 'Peace Community', of iedereen die het gebouw van een plaatselijke mensenrechtenorganisatie bezoekt. Van groot belang is wel dat als de te beschermen personen bij naam worden genoemd, zij hiermee instemmen, dat alle te beschermen personen inderdaad beschermd willen worden en dat zij vervolgens ook worden geraadpleegd bij de implementatie van de genomen voorlopige maatregel.

DEEL III

IMPACT VAN DE ONHERSTELBARE AARD VAN DE TE VOORKOMEN SCHADE

Dit deel betreft de impact van de onherstelbare aard van de te voorkomen schade op de benadering door de rechterlijke colleges van onderwerpen zoals de ontvankelijkheid en bevoegdheid om de zaak ten gronde te beoordelen; het vereiste bewijs van risico, de onmiddellijkheid van dit risico en de juridische status van voorlopige maatregelen.

Het blijkt dat zij bij de besluitvorming over het al dan niet nemen van voorlopige maatregelen een minder strikte benadering hebben van zowel onmiddellijkheid van het risico als ontvankelijkheid en bevoegdheid ten gronde. Dit komt door het beginsel van effectieve bescherming tegen onherstelbare schade aan personen, en het beginsel dat rekening moet worden gehouden met de feitelijke ongelijkheid tussen de beoogde te beschermen persoon aan de ene kant en de Staat aan de andere. Voor het nemen van voorlopige maatregelen is het alleen nodig dat de niet-ontvankelijkheid van een zaak niet prima facie (op het eerste gezicht) duidelijk is en dat bevoegdheid ten gronde niet a priori ontbreekt. Een Staat heeft bijvoorbeeld een voorbehoud gemaakt, waardoor deze Staat de bevoegdheid van het rechterlijk college betwist om een zaak ten gronde te beoordelen. Maar er bestaat discussie over de rechtmatigheid van dit voorbehoud. In dergelijke gevallen is het wel degelijk gepast een voorlopige maatregel eerder in de procedure te nemen, voordat de besluitvorming over rechtsmacht plaatsvindt.

Voor ontvankelijkheid ratione materiae kijken de meeste rechterlijke colleges naar de vraag of er prima facie bewijs is van een reëel risico. Omdat de vraag naar het al dan niet instellen van voorlopige maatregelen nog vóór de besluitvorming over ontvankelijkheid aan de orde komt, zou daar het criterium van prima prima facie (op het allereerste gezicht) bewijs moeten gelden. Het beginsel van effectieve bescherming tegen onherstelbare schade aan personen, en het beginsel dat rekening moet worden gehouden met de feitelijke ongelijkheid tussen de partijen, hebben er echter in de context van uitlevering- en uitzettingszaken voor het EHRM niet toe geleid dat het vereiste bewijs van 'reëel risico' echt minder streng wordt beoordeeld. Het beginsel van effectieve bescherming tegen onherstelbare schade aan personen geeft wel voor alle internationale rechterlijke colleges de genomen voorlopige maatregelen noodzakelijkerwijs een verplichtend karakter, ook wanneer de bevoegdheid om voorlopige maatregelen te nemen niet expliciet in het verdrag is opgenomen.

DEEL IV

DE REACTIES VAN STATEN OP VOORLOPIGE MAATREGELEN EN DE REACTIES VAN ORGANISATIES EN DE RECHTERLIJKE COLLEGES ZELF OP GEVALLEN VAN NIET-NALEVING

De effectiviteitsvraag is een empirische vraag die buiten de reikwijdte valt van dit conceptuele onderzoek. Wel is er in deel IV voor gekozen een kort overzicht te geven van de verschillende soorten officiële reacties van Staten op de voorlopige maatregelen van de verschillende rechterlijke colleges (hoofdstuk XVII). Normaal gesproken respecteren Staten de aan hen opgelegde voorlopige maatregelen. Er zijn echter ook notoire gevallen van niet-naleving. In hun officiële reactie proberen Staten dit te rechtvaardigen met inhoudelijke argumenten of door middel van protest tegen de manier waarop de besluitvorming heeft plaatsgevonden. De echte redenen voor niet-naleving hoeven echter niet overeen te komen met de officiële rechtvaardiging zoals gericht aan het internationale rechterlijk college.

Hoofdstuk XVIII betreft het toezicht op de naleving, waarbij verschillende rechterlijke colleges zichzelf een taak hebben toebedeeld, vaak bij gebrek aan toezicht door de politieke instanties die daarin officieel een taak hebben. Dit eigen toezicht kan verschillende vormen aannemen, van het sturen van herinneringen aan de betreffende Staat tot het nemen van steeds specifiekere vervolmaatregelen gericht aan die Staat. Niet-naleving, bijvoorbeeld door iemand uit te zetten in strijd met een voorlopige maatregel, heeft ook consequenties voor de beoordeling van de klacht ten gronde. Naast een specifieke inbreuk op het effectief klachtrecht kunnen hierdoor ook het recht op leven en het verbod van foltering en wrede behandeling geschonden worden. Dit boek betoogt dat wanneer een Staat voorlopige maatregelen heeft genegeerd de bewijslast moet overgaan naar die Staat die dan overtuigend moet aantonen dat deze rechten toch niet zijn geschonden. Dit is dan ook een vorm van 'follow-up'. Het hoofdstuk constateert verder dat ook andere officiële instanties (bijvoorbeeld binnen de VN) en mensenrechtenorganisaties op hun manier 'toezien' op de naleving van voorlopige maatregelen. Ook dit toezicht, door de rechterlijke colleges zelf, door andere officiële instanties en door mensenrechtenorganisaties is gebaseerd op het beginsel van effectieve bescherming tegen onherstelbare schade aan personen.

CONCLUSIE

De meest overtuigende voorlopige maatregelen van internationale rechterlijke colleges zijn die welke ingrijpen in mensenrechten situaties die anders niet alleen onomkeerbaar maar ook onherstelbaar zouden zijn en die een onderliggende redenering en praktijk gemeen hebben met voorlopige maatregelen genomen door andere internationale rechterlijke colleges. Momenteel is die gemeenschappelijke onderliggende redenering de bescherming van het leven en de persoonlijke integriteit. Wanneer in de praktijk twee of meer internationaal rechterlijke colleges ook daadwerkelijk voorlopige maatregelen hebben genomen in situaties op basis van een dergelijke onderliggende redenering is er sprake van een gemeenschappelijke kern van het concept.

In de specifieke context van het rechterlijk college in kwestie kan het gebruik van voorlopige maatregelen ook gepast zijn wanneer de situatie niet binnen de gemeenschappelijke kern valt, zolang het gebruik van de voorlopige maatregel wel binnen de grenzen van het concept blijft. Voorlopige maatregelen die ingrijpen in mensenrechtensituaties die niet onomkeerbaar zijn vallen buiten de grenzen van het concept. Het gebruik van zulke voorlopige maatregelen speelt Staten die voorlopige maatregelen in andere gevallen naast zich neerleggen in de kaart omdat het aanzien van het middel hiermee wordt geschaad. Maar het zijn niet alleen de ernst van de situatie waarin wordt ingegrepen en een gemeenschappelijke redenering en praktijk van meerdere instanties die voorlopige maatregelen overtuigend maken. De voorlopige maatregelen van het Inter-Amerikaanse Hof zijn overtuigender dan die van het EHRM, Afrikaanse Commissie, de Comit  s in Geneve en de Bosnia Chamber simpelweg omdat zij apart worden gepubliceerd en gemotiveerd en bovendien meer zijn toegespitst op de specifieke situatie dan de voorlopige maatregelen ingesteld door de andere rechterlijke colleges.

Het feit dat de meeste voorlopige maatregelen genomen in de verschillende systemen binnen de gemeenschappelijke kern vallen, vergroot de overtuigingskracht van het concept 'voorlopige maatregel' als zodanig. Zij worden genomen om onherstelbare schade aan personen te voorkomen.

BIBLIOGRAPHY¹

A

- Abi-Saab, G., 'Fragmentation or Unification: Some Concluding Remarks', in Symposium Issue: 'The Proliferation of International Tribunals: Piecing Together the Puzzle', 31(4) NYU J. Int'l L. Pol. 679 (1999), pp. 919-933
- Aceves, W.J., 'Annotation of ICJ Order and US Supreme Court Breard v. Green', 92 American Journal of International Law 517 (1998), pp. 517-523
- Aceves, W.J., 'Avena and other Mexican Nationals', 97 American Journal of International Law 923 (2003), pp. 923-929
- Aceves, W.J., 'Consular Notification and the Death Penalty: the ICJ's Judgment in Avena', ASIL Insight, April 2004
- Ascencio, H., 'La responsabilité selon la Cour Internationale de Justice dans l'affaire du génocide Bosnien', 2 RGDIP 285 (2007), pp. 285-302
- Addo, M., 'Interim Measures of Protection for Rights under the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations', 10(4) European Journal of International Law 713 (1999), pp. 713-732
- 'Agora: Breard' with contributions by J. Charney, W. Reisman, C. Bradley, J. Goldsmith, L. Henkin, C. Vázquez, J. Paust, L. Fidler, Damrosch, F. Kirgis, A-M Slaughter, 92 American Journal of International Law 666 (1998), pp. 666-712
- Aguiar, A., 'Apuntes sobre las medidas cautelares en la Convención Americana sobre Derechos Humanos', in: R. Nieto (ed.), La Corte y el Sistema Interamericano de Derechos Humanos Corte IDH, San José 1994
- Ajibola B.A., 'Compliance with Judgments of the International Court of Justice', in: M.K. Bulterman, M. Kuijer (eds.), Compliance with Judgments of International Courts, Proceedings of the symposium organized in honour of Professor Henry G. Schermers by Mordenate College and the Department of International Public Law of Leiden University, The Hague, Boston, London 1996, pp. 7-38
- Alefsen, H., 'The Council of Europe and Enforcement of Human Rights in Bosnia and Herzegovina', in: W. Benedek (ed.), Human Rights in Bosnia and Herzegovina after Dayton: from Theory to Practice, Human Rights Centre of the University of Sarajevo, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague [etc.] 1999, pp. 149-154
- Alfredsson, G., J. Grimheden, B.G. Ramcharan, A. de Zayas (eds.), International Human Rights Monitoring Mechanisms: Essays in Honour of Jakob Th. Möller, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers The Hague [etc.] 2001
- Alleweldt, R., 'Protection against Expulsion under Article 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights', 4 European Journal of International Law 360 (1993), pp. 360-376

¹ Different from the manner customary in Dutch literature, names such as 'Van Boven' can be found under 'V' rather than 'B'. This applies similarly to surnames starting with 'De' or 'Van der'.

- Alleweldt, R., Schutz vor Abschiebung bei drohender Folter oder unmenschlicher oder erniedrigender Behandlung oder Strafe: Refoulement-Verbote im Völkerrecht und im deutschen Recht unter besonderer Berücksichtigung von Artikel 3 der Europäischen Menschenrechtskonvention und Artikel 1 des Grundgesetzes, Springer-Verlag, Berlin 1996
- Alston, P. (ed.), Peoples' Rights, Oxford University Press, Academy of European Law, European University Institute 2001
- Alston, P., Crawford, J., The Future of UN Human Rights Treaty Monitoring, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge 2000
- Amann, D.M., 'Guantánamo Bay', 42 Columbia Journal of Transnational Law 263 (2004) pp. 263-348
- Amerasinghe, C.F., 'The Bosnia Genocide case', 21 Leiden Journal of International Law 411 (2008), pp. 411-428
- Amnesty International, Angel Francisco Breard: Facing Death in a Foreign Land, March 1998, AI-Index: AMR 51/14/98
- Amnesty International, The Execution of Angel Breard: Apologies are not enough, 1 May 1998
- Amnesty International, Using the International Human Rights System to Combat Racial Discrimination, A Handbook, 2001, AI-Index: IOR 80/001/2001
- Amnesty International, 'A time for Action, Protecting Consular Rights of Foreign Nationals Facing the Death Penalty', August 2001, AI-Index: AMR 51/106/2001
- Amnesty International, 'Rights at Risk, Amnesty International's Concerns Regarding Security Legislation and Law Enforcement Measures', January 2002, AI-Index: ACT 30/001/2002
- Amnesty International, 'Time is Wasting: Respect for the Land Rights of the Lubicon Cree long Overdue', April 2003, AI-Index: AMR 20/001/2003
- Amnesty International, Niemandland, Opvang van Vluchtelingen in de Regio, Amnesty International, Amsterdam, 2003
- Amnesty International, 'Bosnia-Herzegovina. Unlawful Detention of Six Men from Bosnia-Herzegovina in Guantánamo Bay', 30 May 2003, AI-Index Eur 63/013/2003
- Amnesty International, 'USA, Human Dignity Denied, Torture and Accountability in the "War on Terror"', 27 October 2004, AI-Index: AMR 51/145/2004
- Amnesty International, 'USA, Guantánamo: Trusting the Executive, Prolonging the Injustice', 26 January 2005, AI-Index: AMR 51/030/2005
- Amnesty International, 'USA, Guantánamo and beyond: The Continuing Pursuit of Unchecked Executive Power', 13 May 2005, AI-Index: AMR 51/063/2005
- Amnesty International, Secret detention in CIA 'Black Sites', 8 November 2005, AI-Index: AMR 51/177/2005
- Amnesty International, USA: Torture and secret detention testimony of the 'disappeared' in the 'war on terror', 4 August 2005, AI-Index: AMR 51/108/2005
- Amnesty International, Below the radar: secret flights to torture and disappearance, 5 April 2006, AI-Index: AMR 51/051/2006
- Amnesty International, Partners in crime: Europe's role in US renditions, 14 June 2006, AI-Index: EUR 01/008/2006
- Amnesty International, 'USA, Justice at last or more of the same? Detentions and Trials after Hamdan v. Rumsfeld', 18 September 2006, AI-Index: AMR 51/146/2006
- Anaya, J.A., S. Wiessner, 'The UN Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous peoples: towards Re-empowerment', in: JURIST-Forum, Legal News and Research, University of Pittsburgh School of Law, 3 October 2007, at: <<http://jurist.law.pitt.edu/forumy/2007/10/un-declaration-on-rights-of-indigenous.php>>
- Anaya, S.J., Indigenous Peoples in International Law, Oxford University Press, New York 1996
- Anaya, S.J., C. Grossman, 'The Case of Awas Tingni v. Nicaragua, a New Step in the International Law of Indigenous Peoples', 19(1) Arizona Journal of international and Comparative Law 1 (2002), pp. 1-15

- Anaya, S.J., R.A. Williams, 'The Protection of Indigenous Peoples' Rights over Lands and Natural Resources Under the Inter-American Human Rights System', 14 Harvard Human Rights Journal 33 (2001), pp. 33-86
- Anaya Valencia, R., C. Jackson, L. van de Putte, R. Ellis, 'Avena and the World Court's Death Penalty Jurisdiction in Texas: Addressing the Odd Notion of Texas's Independence from the World', 23 Yale Law & Policy Review 455 (2005), pp. 455-507
- Andreu-Guzman, F., 'The Draft International Convention on the Protection of All Persons from Forced Disappearance', 62-63 ICJ Review 73 (2001), pp. 73-106
- Ankumah, E.A., The African Commission on Human and People's Rights: Practices and Procedures, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague [etc.] 1996
- Antoine, R.M.B., 'The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council – an Inadequate Remedy for Death Row Prisoners', 41 International and Comparative Law Quarterly 179 (1992), pp. 179-190
- Aolain, F. Ni, 'The Emergence of Diversity: Differences in Human Rights Jurisprudence', 19 Fordham International Law Journal 57 (1995), pp. 101-142
- Aolain, F. Ni, 'The Evolving Jurisprudence of the European Convention on Human Rights Concerning the Right to Life', 19(1) NQHR 21 (2001), pp. 21-42
- d'Argent, P., 'Le droit à un recours et à réparation des victimes de violations flagrantes du droit international des droits de l'homme et de violations graves du droit international humanitaire', Annuaire Français de Droit International 2005, pp. 27-56
- Ashworth, A., Human Rights, Serious Crime and Criminal Procedure, Sweet & Maxwell, London 2002
- d'Aspremont, J., 'The Recommendations made by the International Court of Justice', 56 ICLQ 185 (2007), pp. 185-198
- Association of the Bar of the City of New York & Center for Human Rights and Global Justice, Torture by Proxy: International and Domestic Law Applicable to 'Extraordinary Renditions', New York 2004
- Ayala Corao, C., 'La jerarquía de los Tratados de Derechos Humanos', in: J.E. Mendez, F. Cox (ed.), El Futuro del Sistema Interamericano de Protección de Los Derechos Humanos, Instituto Interamericano de Derechos Humanos, San José (Costa Rica) 1998, pp. 137-154
- Aybay, R., 'A New Institution in the Field: The Human Rights Chamber of Bosnia and Herzegovina', 15(4) Netherlands Quarterly of Human Rights 529 (1997), pp. 529-558

B

- Babcock, S., 'The Role of International Law in United States Death Penalty Cases', 15 Leiden Journal of International Law 367 (2002), pp. 367-387
- Bal, P., E.R. Rieter, 'Habeas corpus in de Verenigde Staten: een ultiem maar uiterst beperkt rechtsmiddel', 31(1) Delikt en delinkwent 1 (2001), pp. 1-57
- Barkhuysen, T., Artikel 13 EVRM: effectieve nationale rechtsbescherming bij schending van mensenrechten, diss. Leiden, Vermande, Lelystad 1998
- Barkhuysen, T., Annotation of ECtHR (Grand Chamber) Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 4 February 2005, in: AB 2005, 274 (annotation of Grand Chamber judgment on the legal status of provisional measures)
- Barkhuysen, T., M.L. van Emmerik, E.R. Rieter, Procederen over mensenrechten onder het EVRM, het IVBPR en andere VN-verdragen, Ars Aequi Libri, Nijmegen 2002 (1st); 2008 (2nd)
- Barkhuysen, T., M.L. van Emmerik, P.H.P.H.M.C. van Kempen (eds.), The Execution of Strasbourg and Geneva Human Rights Decisions in the National legal Order, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague/Boston/London 1999
- Barnhoorn, L., K. Wellens (eds.), Diversity in Secondary Rules and the Unity of International Law, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague [etc.] 1995

Bibliography

- Bassiouni, Ch., 'International crimes: jus cogens and obligatio erga omnes', 59(4) Law and Contemporary Problems 63 (1996), pp. 63-74
- Bassiouni report: independent expert to prepare a revised version of the Principles and Guidelines, Bassiouni, reports E/CN.4/1999/65 and E/CN.4/2000/62
- Battjes, H., European Asylum Law and International Law, Brill Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, Leiden 2006
- Battjes, H. (HBA), Annotation of N. v. UK, 27 May 2008, in: Jurisprudentie Vreemdelingenrecht JV 2008/266
- Bayefsky, A. (ed.), The UN Human Rights Treaty System in the 21st Century, Kluwer Law International, the Hague/London/Boston 2000
- Bayefsky, A., The UN Human Rights Treaty System: Universality at the Crossroads, Transnational Publishers, Ardsley, N.Y. 2001
- Bayefsky, A., How to Complain to the UN Human Rights Treaty System, Transnational Publishers, New York 2002
- Bedi, S., The Development of Human Rights Law by the Judges of the International Court of Justice, Hart Publishing, Oxford/Portland Oregon 2007
- Bedjaoui, M., 'À propos de la place des droits de la personne humaine dans la jurisprudence de la Cour internationale de Justice', in: P. Mahony et al., Protection of Human Rights: The European Perspective, Studies in Memory of Rolv Ryssdal, Heymans, Köln 2000, pp. 87-93
- Beirlaen, A., 'De ordonnantie van 11 september 1976 gewezen in de zaak Plateau continental de la Mer Egée en de bevoegdheidsproblematiek in de fase der voorlopige maatregelen van het Internationale Hof van Justitie', 14 Revue belge de droit international 425 (1978-1979), pp. 425-459
- Beirlaen, A., De conservatoire maatregelen van het Internationale Gerechtshof, diss. Free University Brussels, 1979-1980
- Beirlaen, A., 'De bindende kracht en afdwingbaarheid van de door het internationale Hof van Justitie aangeduide conservatoire maatregelen', 18 Revue belge de droit international 739 (1984-1985), pp. 739-775
- Bekker, G., 'Human Rights News: III Africa', 22(2) Netherlands Quarterly of Human Rights 293 (2004), pp. 293-299
- Benedek, W. (ed.), Human Rights in Bosnia and Herzegovina after Dayton: from Theory to Practice, Human Rights Centre of the University of Sarajevo, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague [etc.] 1999
- Ben-Naftali, O., M. Sharon, 'What the ICJ Did Not Say About the Duty to Punish Genocide: The Missing Pieces in a Puzzle', 5(4) Journal of International Criminal Justice 859 (2007), pp. 859-874
- Benvenisti, E., 'Margin of Appreciation, Consensus, and Universal Standards', 31(4) New York University Journal of International Law and Politics 843 (1999), pp. 843-854
- Berman M.R., R.S. Clark, 'State Terrorism: Disappearances', 13 Rutgers Law Journal 531 (1982), pp. 531-577
- Bernhardt, J.P.A., 'The Provisional Measures Procedure of the International Court of Justice through U.S. Staff in Tehran: Fiat Iustitia, Pereat Curia?', 20(3) Virginia J. Int.'l L. 557 (1980), pp. 557-613
- Bernhardt, R. (1994a), 'Interim Measures of Protection under the European Convention on Human Rights', in: R. Bernhardt (ed.), Interim Measures Indicated by International Courts, Springer-Verlag, Berlin [etc.] 1994, pp. 95-114
- Bernhardt, R. (ed.) (1994b), Interim Measures Indicated by International Courts, Springer-Verlag, Berlin/Heidelberg/New York 1994
- Birdsong, L.E., 'Is there a Rush to the Death Penalty in the Caribbean: the Bahamas says no', 13 Temple International and Comparative Law Journal 285 (1999), pp. 285-308

- Blaauw, M., “Denial and Silence” or “Acknowledgement and Disclosure”, 84 International Review of the Red Cross 767 (2002), pp. 767-783
- Boerefijn, I. (1999a), The Reporting Procedure under the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Intersentia, Antwerp [etc.] 1999
- Boerefijn, I. (1999b), ‘Follow up of the Views of the United Nations Treaty Bodies’, in: T. Barkhuysen et al. (eds.), The Execution of Strasbourg and Geneva Human Rights Decisions in the National Legal Order, Kluwer Law International, The Hague [etc.] 1999, pp. 101-112
- Boerefijn, I. (2005a), Annotation of CEDAW A.T. v. Hungary, 26 January 2005, 2/2003, 30(4) NJCM-bulletin 470 (2005), pp. 470-480
- Boerefijn, I. (2005b), ‘Foltering is het probleem, niet de oplossing: het verbod van foltering en andere wrede, onmenselijke of vernederende behandeling of bestraffing in het kader van VN-verdragen’, 30(3) NJCM-bulletin 240 (2005), pp. 240-258
- Boerefijn, I. (2005c), ‘Domestic Violence against Women in International Human Rights Law’, in: I. Westendorp, R. Wolleswinkel (eds.), Violence in the Domestic Sphere, Intersentia, Antwerp [etc.] 2005, pp. 35-57
- Bomhoff, J., L. Zucca, ‘The Tragedy of Ms. Evans: Conflicts and Incommensurability of Rights’, 2 European Constitutional Law Review 434 (2006), pp. 434-442
- Bonifaz Tweddle, G., ‘Las medidas cautelares, urgentes y provisionales en el Sistema Interamericano de Protección de los Derechos Humanos’ in: Política Internacional/Academia Diplomática del Perú, n. 85, julio-setiembre 2006, pp. 55-97
- Borgen, C.J., ‘Transnational Tribunals and the Transmission of Norms: Hegemony of Process’, St. John’s University School of Law Legal studies Research Paper series, August 2005
- Boulesbaa, A., The U.N. Convention against Torture and the Prospects for Enforcement, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague [etc.] 1999
- Böcker, R., ‘Feeling the Heat in Geneva and New York, The Netherlands before the UN Treaty Bodies in Individual Complaints Procedures’, in: N. Blokker, R. Lefebber, L. Lijnzaad, I. van Bladel (eds.), The Netherlands in Court, Essays in honour of Johan G. Lammers, Brill, Leiden 2006, pp. 125-140
- Böhler, B., De zwerftocht van een leider, Achter de schermen van de zaak Öcalan, Arbeiderspers Amsterdam 2000
- Bradley, C.A., ‘Breard, our Dualist Constitution, and the Internationalist Conception’, 51 Stanford Law Review 529 (1998-1999), pp. 529-566
- Brems, E., Case note on Evans v. UK (7 March 2006), European Human Rights Cases 2006, pp. 428-442
- Brody, R., F. Gonzáles, ‘Nunca Más: an analysis of international instruments on “Disappearances”’, 19 Human Rights Quarterly 365 (1997), pp. 365-405
- Bronkhorst, D., ‘Naming Names’, 16(4) Netherlands Quarterly of Human Rights 457 (1998), pp. 457-474
- Brook, J., ‘Federalism and Foreign Affairs: how to Remedy Violations of the Vienna Convention and obey the U.S. Constitution, too’, 37 University of Michigan Journal of Law Reform 573 (2004) pp. 573-597
- Brown, Ch., A Common Law of International Adjudication, Oxford University Press, New York 2007
- Bruin, R., “More than a Mere Possibility”, Risicogroepen, het Committee tegen Foltering en de bewijslast’, NAV 145 (1998), pp. 145-150
- Bruin, R., Case note of ECtHR (Grand Chamber) Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 4 February 2005, NAV 2005/79
- Bruin, R., Case note of ECtHR N. v. UK, 27 May 2007, NAV 2008/28
- Bruin, R., K. Wouters, ‘Terrorism and the Non-derogability of Non-refoulement’, 15(1) International Journal of Refugee Law 5 (2003), pp. 5-29

Bibliography

- Buergenthal, Th., 'The Revised OAS Charter and the Protection of Human Rights', 29 American Journal of International Law 828 (1975), pp. 828-836
- Buergenthal, Th., 'The Inter-American Court of Human Rights', 76 American Journal of International Law 231 (1982), pp. 231-245
- Buergenthal, Th., 'The Advisory Practice of the Inter-American Human Rights Court', 79 American Journal of International Law 1 (1985), pp. 1-27
- Buergenthal, Th., 'Interim Measures in the Inter-American Court of Human Rights', in: R. Bernhardt (ed.), Interim Measures indicated by International Courts, Springer-Verlag, Berlin 1994, pp. 69-94
- Buergenthal, Th., 'International Tribunals and National Courts: The Internationalization of Domestic Adjudication', in: U. Beyerlin et al. (eds.), Recht Zwischen Umbruch und Bewahrung: Völkerrecht, Europarecht, Staatsrecht: Festschrift für Rudolf Bernhardt, Springer, Berlin 1995, pp. 687-703
- Buergenthal, Th., 'The Normative and Institutional Evolution of International Human Rights', 19(4) Human Rights Quarterly 703 (1997), pp. 703-723
- Buergenthal, Th., 'Proliferation of International Courts and Tribunals: is it good or is it bad?', 14 Leiden Journal of International Law 267 (2001), pp. 267-275
- Buergenthal, Th., Remembering the Early Years of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights, NYU Center for Human Rights and Global Justice No. 1, 2005
- Buergenthal, Th., D. Cassell, 'The Future of the Inter-American Human Rights System', in: J.E. Mendez, F. Cox (eds.), El Futuro del Sistema Interamericano de Protección de los derechos Humanos, Instituto Interamericano de Derechos Humanos, San José 1998, pp. 539-571
- Buergenthal, Th., D. Shelton, Protecting Human Rights in the Americas: Cases and Materials (4th rev. ed.) International Institute of Human Rights, Strasbourg, Engel Verlag, Kehl 1995
- Bulterman, M., Case note Behrami and Behrami, 2 May 2007, EHRC 2007/111
- Bulterman, M.K., M. Kuijer (eds.), Compliance with judgments of international courts, Kluwer Law International, The Hague 1996
- Buquicchio-de Boer, M., 'Interim Measures by the European Commission of Human Rights', in: M. de Salvia, M.E. Villiger (eds.), The Birth of European Human Rights Law. Liber Amicorum Carl Aage Nørgaard, Nomos, Baden-Baden 1998, pp. 229-236
- Burgers, J.H., H. Danelius, The United Nations Convention against Torture: A Handbook against Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, Nijhoff, Dordrecht 1988

C

- Caflisch, L., A. Cançado Trindade, 'Les Conventions Américaines et Européennes des Droits de l'Homme et le Droit International Général', 108(1) RGDIP 5 (2004), pp. 5-62
- Cançado Trindade, A., Co-existence and Co-ordination of Mechanisms of International Protection of Human Rights (at Global and Regional Levels), 202 Collected Courses Hague Academy (1987-II)
- Cançado Trindade, A., 'Derecho internacional de los Refugiados y derechos internacional de los derechos Humanos: aproximaciones y convergencias', 119-120 Estudios Internacionales del instituto de estudios Internacionales 321 (1997), pp. 321-350
- Cançado Trindade, A. (1998a), 'The Operation of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights', in: D.J. Harris, S. Livingstone (eds.), The Inter-American System of Human Rights, Oxford Clarendon Press, Oxford 1998, pp. 133-149
- Cançado Trindade, A. (1998b), 'The Consolidation of the Procedural Capacity of Individuals on the Evolution of the International Protection of Human Rights: Present State and Perspective at the Turn of the Century', 30(1) Colombia Human Rights Law Review 1 (1998), pp. 1-27
- Cançado Trindade, A. (1998c), 'Reflexiones sobre el Futuro del sistema interamericano de Protección de los derechos Humanos', in: J.E. Mendez, F. Cox (eds.), El Futura del Sistema In-

- teramericano de Protección de Los Derechos Humanos*, Instituto Interamericano de Derechos Humanos (IIDH), San José, Costa Rica 1998, pp. 573-604
- Cançado Trindade, A., 'The Inter-American System of Protection of Human Rights (1948-2000): Evolution, Present State and Perspectives at the Dawn of the XXIst Century', International Institute of Human Rights, XXXI Study session, Strasbourg, 10-13 July 2000, AACT/1-AACT/60, pp. 113-172
- Cançado Trindade, A., Preface by the President of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights to Series E: Provisional Measures, No. 2, Compendium: July 1996-June 2000, Secretariat of the Court, San José, Costa Rica 2000
- Cançado Trindade, A., 'The Evolution of Provisional Measures of Protection under the Case-law of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights (1987-2002)', 24(5-8) Human Rights Law Journal 162 (2003), pp. 162-168
- Cançado Trindade, A., 'The Development of International Human Rights Law by the Operation and the Case-law of the European and the Inter-American Courts of Human Rights', speech on the occasion of the opening of the judicial year, 22 January 2004, <www.echr.coe.int/Eng/Speeches> (consulted on 14 July 2004)
- Cançado Trindade, A., 'Les mesures provisoires de protection dans la jurisprudence de la cour interaméricaine des droits de l'homme', in: G. Cohen-Jonathan, J.-F. Flauss (eds.), Mesures conservatoires et droits fondamentaux, Bruyant, Bruxelles 2005, pp. 145-163
- Carlson, S.N., G. Gisvold, Practical Guide to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Transnational Publishers, Ardsley, NY 2003
- Caron, D.D., 'Interim Measures of Protection: Theory and Practice in Light of the Iran-United States Claims Tribunal', 46 ZaöRV 465 (1986), pp. 465-518
- Carozza, P.G., 'Uses and Misuses of Comparative Law in International Human Rights: Some Reflections on the Jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights', 73(5) Notre Dame Law Review 1217 (1998), pp. 1217-1237
- Carozza, P.G., 'Subsidiarity as a Structural Principle of International Human Rights Law', 97 American Journal of International Law 38 (2003), pp. 38-79
- Carter, L.E., 'Compliance with ICJ Provisional Measures and the Meaning of Review and Reconsideration under the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations: Avena and other Mexican Nationals (Mex. v. U.S.)', 25(1) Michigan Journal of International Law 117 (2003), pp. 117-134
- Cassel, D., 'A United States View of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights', in: P. Nikken (ed.), The Modern World of Human Rights: Essays in Honour of Thomas Buergenthal, IIDH/IIHR, San José, Costa Rica 1996, pp. 209-230
- Cassel, D. (1999a), 'Peru Withdraws from the Court: will the Inter-American Human Rights System meet the Challenge?', 20(4-6) Human Rights Law Journal 167 (1999), pp. 167-175
- Cassel, D. (1999b), 'Judicial Remedies for Treaty Violations in Criminal Cases: Consular Rights of Foreign Nationals in United States Death Penalty Cases', 12 Leiden Journal of International Law 851 (1999), pp. 851-888
- Cassel, D., 'International Remedies in National Criminal Cases: ICJ Judgment in Germany v. United States', 15 Leiden Journal of International Law 69 (2002), pp. 69-86
- Cassel, D., 'Extraterritorial Application on Inter-American Human Rights Instruments', in: F. Coomans, M. Kamminga (eds.), Extraterritorial Application of Human Rights Treaties, Intersentia, Antwerp/Oxford 2004, pp. 175-181
- Castan, M., S. Joseph, J. Schultz, The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights: Cases, Materials and Commentary, Oxford University Press, Oxford 2004
- Cerna, C.M., 'International Law and the Protection of Human Rights in the Inter-American System', 19 Houston Journal of International Law 731 (1997), pp. 731-759
- Cerna, C.M., 'Extraterritorial Application of the Human Right Instruments of the Inter-American System', in: F. Coomans, M. Kamminga (eds.), Extraterritorial Application of Human Rights Treaties, Intersentia, Antwerp/Oxford 2004, pp. 141-174

Bibliography

- Cerna, C., Out of bounds? The approach of the Inter-American system for the promotion and protection of human rights to the extraterritorial application of human rights law, Working Paper 6 of the NYU Center for Human Rights and Global Justice, 2006
- Cerone, J., 'The Application of Regional Human Rights Law beyond Regional Frontiers: The Inter-American Commission on Human Rights and US Activities in Iraq', ASIL Insight October 25, 2005
- Cerone, J., Out of bounds? Considering the reach of international human rights law, Working Paper 5 of the NYU Center for Human Rights and Global Justice, 2006
- Charney, J.I. (1999a), Is International Law threatened by Multiple International Tribunals?, 271 Recueil des Cours, Collected courses of the Hague Academy of International Law 1998, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague [etc.] 1999
- Charney, J.I. (1999b), 'The Impact on the International Legal System of the Growth of International Courts and Tribunals', 31(4) New York University Journal of International Law and Politics 697 (1999), pp. 697-708
- Charney, J.I., 'The "Horizontal" Growth of International Courts and Tribunals: Challenges or Opportunities?', 96 American Society of International Law 369 (2002), pp. 369-380
- Cheng, B., General Principles of Law as applied by International Courts and Tribunals, Grotius Publications Limited, Cambridge 1987 (reprint from 1953)
- Chenwi, L., Towards the Abolition of the Death Penalty in Africa, A Human Rights Perspective, Pretoria University Law Press 2007, <http://www.pulp.up.ac.za/pdf/2007_02/2007_02.pdf>
- Clark, T., 'Mainstreaming Refugees Rights. The 1951 Refugee Convention and International Human Rights Law', 17(4) Netherlands Quarterly of Human Rights 389 (1999), pp. 389-410
- Clements, L.J., N. Mole, A. Simmons, European Human Rights Taking a Case under the Convention, Sweet & Maxwell, London 1999
- Cohen-Jonathan, G., 'De l'effet juridique des "mesures provisoires" dans certaines circonstances et de l'efficacité du droit de recours individuel: à propos de l'arrêt de la cour de Strasbourg Cruz Varas du 20 Mars 1991', Revue Universelle des Droits de l'homme 205 (1991), pp. 205-209
- Cohen-Jonathan, G., 'Les rapports entre la Convention européenne des Droits de l'Homme et les autres traités conclus par les Etats Parties', in: R. Lawson, M. de Blois (eds.), The Dynamics of the Protection of Human Rights in Europe; Essays in Honour of Henry G. Schermers (Vol. 3), Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, Dordrecht [etc.] 1994, pp. 79-111
- Cohen-Jonathan, G., 'Cour Européenne des Droits de L'Homme et Droit International Général (1998-1999)', XLV Annuaire Français de Droit International 767 (1999), pp. 767-789
- Cohen-Jonathan, G. (2005a), 'Sur la force obligatoire des mesures provisoires, l'arrêt de la Grande Chambre du 4 février 2005, Mamatkulov et Askarov contre Turquie', 2 RGDIP 421 (2005), pp. 421-434
- Cohen-Jonathan, G. (2005b), 'Conclusions générales', in: G. Cohen-Jonathan, J.-F. Flauss (eds.), Mesures conservatoires et droits fondamentaux, Bruyant, Bruxelles 2005, pp. 283-307
- Cohen-Jonathan, G. (2005c), 'À propos des arrêts Assanidzé (8 avril 2004), Ilascu (8 juillet 2004) et Issa (16 novembre 2004). Quelques observations sur les notions de 'juridiction' et 'd'injonction'', 63 Revue Trim. Dr. H. 767 (2005), pp. 767-785
- Cohen-Jonathan, G., J.-F. Flauss (eds.) (2005d), Mesures conservatoires et droits fondamentaux, Bruyant, Bruxelles 2005
- Collins, L., Provisional and Protective Measures in International Litigation, 234(III) Recueil des Cours, Academy of International Law 9 (1992), Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, Dordrecht [etc.] 1993
- Conforti, B., 'Unité et fragmentation du droit international: Glissez mortels, n'appuyez pas', 1 RGDIP 6 (2007), pp. 6-18
- Conte, A., S. Davidson, R. Burchill, Defining Civil and Political Rights: the Jurisprudence of the United Nations Human Rights Committee, Ashgate, Aldershot 2004

- Coomans, F., 'The Ogoni Case before the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights', 52 ICLQ 749 (2003), pp. 749-760
- Coomans, F., M. Kamminga (eds.), Extraterritorial Application of Human Rights Treaties, Intersentia, Antwerp/Oxford 2004
- Crawford, J., 'The Right of Self-Determination in International Law: Its Development and Future', in: Ph. Alston (ed.), Peoples' Rights, Academy of European Law, European University Institute, Oxford University Press, Oxford [etc.] 2001, pp. 7-67
- Crockett, C.H., 'The Effects of Interim Measures of Protection in the International Court of Justice', 7 Calif. West Int. L.J. 348 (1977), pp. 348-384

D

- Davidson, J.S., The Inter-American Human Rights System, Dartmouth Publishing Company, Aldershot 1997
- De Feyter, K., World Development Law, Sharing Responsibility for Development, Intersentia Antwerp/Groningen/Oxford 2001
- De Feyter, K., S. Parmentier, M. Bossuyt, P. Lemmens (eds.), Out of the Ashes, Reparation for Victims of Gross and Systematic Human Rights Violations, Intersentia, Antwerpen/Oxford 2005
- De Salvia, M., 'La pratique de la cour européenne des droits de l'homme relative aux mesures provisoires', in: G. Cohen-Jonathan, J.-F. Flauss (eds.), Mesures conservatoires et droits fondamentaux, Bruyant, Bruxelles 2005, pp. 177-194
- De Salvia, M., E. Villiger (eds.), The Birth of European Human Rights Law, Liber amicorum, Studies in Honour of Carl Aage Nørgaard, Nomos, Baden-Baden 1998
- De Schutter, O., 'Les mesures provisoires devant la Cour de justice des communautés européennes dans le domaine des droits fondamentaux', in: G. Cohen-Jonathan, J.-F. Flauss (eds.), Mesures conservatoires et droits fondamentaux, Bruyant, Bruxelles 2005, pp. 93-130
- De Wet, E., 'The Protection Mechanism under the African Charter and the Protocol on the African Court of Human and Peoples' Rights' in: G. Alfredsson, J. Grimheden, B.G. Ramcharan, A. de Zayas (eds.), International Human Rights Monitoring Mechanisms: Essays in Honour of Jakob Th. Möller, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers The Hague [etc.] 2001, pp. 713-729
- Decaux, E., 'Les mesures d'urgence devant la Commission des droits de l'homme des nations unies et ses organes subsidiaires', in: G. Cohen-Jonathan, J.-F. Flauss (eds.), Mesures conservatoires et droits fondamentaux, Bruyant, Bruxelles 2005, pp. 241-275
- Denbeaux, M., J. Denbeaux, 'The Guantanamo Detainees: the Government's Story', Report on Guantanamo detainees, a profile of 517 detainees through analysis of department of defence data, 2 August 2006, <http://law.shu.edu/news/guantanamo_report_final_2_08_06.pdf#search=%22Denbeaux%20Guantanamo%22>
- Devine, D.J., 'Provisional Measures ordered by the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea in the Area of Pollution, the Mox Plant Case (Ireland v. United Kingdom) ITLOS Case No. 10, 3 December 2001', 28 SAYIL 263 (2003), pp. 263-275
- De Zayas, A., 'The Examination of Individual Complaints by the United Nations Human Rights Committee under the Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights', in: G. Alfredsson et al. (eds.), International Human Rights Monitoring Mechanisms, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague [etc.] 2001, pp. 67-121
- Doerfel, J., 'The Convention against Torture and the Protection of Refugees', 24(2) Refugee Survey Quarterly 83 (2005), pp. 83-97
- Dommen, C., 'Claiming environmental rights: some possibilities offered by the United Nations human rights mechanisms', 11(1) Georgetown International Environmental Law Review 1 (1998), pp. 1-48
- Donders, Y.M., Towards a Right to Cultural Identity?, Intersentia, Antwerp/Oxford/New York 2002

Bibliography

- Douma, W., The Precautionary Principle, its Application in International, European and Dutch Law, Diss. Groningen 2003, T.M.C. Asser Press, The Hague 2004
- Dugard, J., 'The Future of International Law; a Human Rights Perspective – with some Comments on the Leiden School of International Law', 20 LJIL 729 (2007), pp. 729-739
- Dulitzky, A., 'La aplicación de los tratados sobre los derechos humanos por los tribunales locales: un estudio comparado', in: M. Abregú, C. Courtis (eds.), La aplicación de los tratados sobre los derechos humanos por los tribunales locales, CELS Centro de Estudios Legales y Sociales, Buenos Aires 1997, pp. 33-74
- Dulitzky, A., 'La Duración del procedimiento: responsabilidades compartidas', in: J.E. Mendez, F. Cox (eds.), El Futuro del Sistema Interamericano de Protección de Los Derechos Humanos, Instituto Interamericano de Derechos Humanos (IIDH), San José, Costa Rica 1998, pp. 363-390
- Dumbauld, E., Interim Measures of Protection in International Controversies, Nijhoff, The Hague 1932
- Dumbauld, E., 'Relief pendente lite in the Permanent Court of International Justice', 39 AJIL 391 (1945), pp. 391-405
- Dupuy, P.M., L'unité de l'ordre juridique international, 297 RCADI Recueil des Cours, Collected courses of the Hague Academy of International Law 2002
- Dupuy, P.M., 'Crime sans châtement ou mission accomplie?', 111(2) RGDIP 243 (2007), pp. 243-258
- Duxbury, A., 'Saving Lives in the International Court of Justice: the Use of Provisional Measures to Protect Human Rights', 31 California Western International Law Journal 141 (2000), pp. 141-176

E

- Eissen, M.A., 'Les mesures provisoires dans la Convention européenne des droits de l'homme', 2 Human Rights Journal 252 (1969), pp. 252-256
- Elkind, J.B., Interim Protection, a Functional Approach, Nijhoff, The Hague [etc.] 1981
- Ergec, R., J. Velu, La Convention Européenne des Droits de L'Homme; extrait du Répertoire pratique du droit belge Complément, tome VII, Bruylant, Bruxelles 1990
- Escher, A., 'Release of vessels and crews before the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea', 3 The Law and Practice of International Courts and Tribunals 411 (2004), pp. 411-507
- Evans, M., R. Murray (eds.), The African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights, the System in Practice: 1986-2000, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge 2002
- Evatt, E., 'Individual Communications under the Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights', in: S. Pritchard (ed.), Indigenous Peoples, the United Nations and Human Rights, Zed Books Ltd. (London), the Federation Press (Annandale/Leichardt, Australia) 1998, pp. 86-115

F

- Farer, T., 'The Future of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights: Promotion versus exposure', in: J.E. Mendez, F. Cox (eds.), El Futuro del Sistema Interamericano de Protección de los Derechos Humanos, Instituto Interamericano de Derechos Humanos, San José 1998, pp. 515-536
- Faúndez Ledesma, H., 'La Independencia e Imparcialidad de los Miembros de la Comisión y de la Corte: Paradojas y desafíos', in: J.E. Mendez, F. Cox (eds.), El Futuro del Sistema Interamericano de Protección de Los Derechos Humanos, Instituto Interamericano de Derechos Humanos (IIDH), San José, Costa Rica 1998, pp. 185-210

- Faúndez Ledesma, H., El sistema interamericano de protección de los derechos humanos: aspectos institucionales y procesales, Instituto Interamericano de Derechos Humanos (IIDH), San José, Costa Rica 1999 (2nd ed.)
- Faure, M.G., E.I.L. Vos, Juridische afbakening van het voorzorgsbeginsel: mogelijkheden en grenzen, Zoetermeer, Gezondheidsraad 2003
- Feria Tinta, M., 'Individual Human Rights v. State Sovereignty: the Case of Peru's Withdrawal from the Contentious Jurisdiction of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights, Current Legal Developments', 13 Leiden Journal of International Law 985 (2000), pp. 985-996
- Feria Tinta, M., 'Due Process and the Right to Life in the Context of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations: Arguing the LaGrand Case', 12(2) European Journal of International Law 363 (2001), pp. 363-366
- Fitzpatrick, J., 'The Unreality of International Law in the United States and the LaGrand Case', 27 Yale Journal of International Law 427 (2002), pp. 427-433
- Fix-Zamudio, H., 'La Protección Judicial de los Derechos Humanos en Latinoamérica y en el Sistema Interamericano', 8 Revista IIDH 8 (1989), pp. 8-64
- Fix-Zamudio, H., 'El derecho Internacional de los derechos Humanos en las Constituciones Latinoamericanas y en la Corte Interamericana de Derechos Humanos', in: P. Nikken (ed.), The Modern World of Human Rights: Essays in Honour of Thomas Buergenthal, IIDH/IIHR, San José, Costa Rica 1996, pp. 19-32
- Fix-Zamudio, H., 'The European and the Inter-American Courts of Human Rights: a Brief Comparison', in: P. Mahony, F. Matscher, H. Petzold, L. Wildhaber (eds.), Protecting Human Rights: The European Perspective, Studies in memory of Rolv Ryssdal, Carl Heymanns Verlag KG, Köln 2000, pp. 507-533
- Flauss, J.-F. (2005a), 'Notule sur les mesures provisoires devant la Commission africaine des droits de l'homme et des peuples', in: G. Cohen-Jonathan, J.-F. Flauss (eds.), Mesures conservatoires et droits fondamentaux, Bruyant, Bruxelles 2005, pp. 231-239
- Flauss, J.-F. (2005b), 'Discussion', in: G. Cohen-Jonathan, J.-F. Flauss (eds.), Mesures conservatoires et droits fondamentaux, Bruyant, Bruxelles 2005, pp. 195-214
- Flinterman, C., Soevereiniteit en de rechten van de mens, Inaugurale rede Universiteit Utrecht, 19 januari 2000 Utrecht: Studie- en Informatiecentrum Mensenrechten (SIM) 2000
- Flinterman, C., 'United Nations Human Rights Reform: Some Reflections of a CEDAW-member' (Column), 21(4) Netherlands Quarterly of Human Rights 621 (2003), pp. 621-624
- Flinterman, C., E. Ankumah, 'The African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights', in: H. Hannum (ed.), Guide to International Human Rights Practice, Transnational Publishers, Ardsley, New York 2004 (4th), pp. 171-188
- Fitzmaurice, G., The Law and Procedure of the International Court of Justice, Vol 2, Grotius, Cambridge 1986
- Forder, C., 'Positieve verplichtingen in het kader van het Europees Verdrag tot Bescherming van de Rechten van de Mens en Fundamentele Vrijheden', 17(6) NJCM-Bulletin 611 (1992), pp. 611-637
- Forder, C., J. Wittingham, Case note on Evans v. UK, 7 March 2006, NJCM 863 (2006), pp. 863-880
- Forster, M.J.C., 'The Mox Plant Cases – Provisional Measures in the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea', 16 Leiden Journal of International Law 611 (2003), pp. 611-619
- Freestone, D., E. Hey (eds.), The Precautionary Principle in International Law. The Challenge of Interpretation (International Environmental Law and Policy Series, Vol. 31), Kluwer Law International, The Hague/London/Boston 1996
- Froidevaux, S., 'L'humanitaire, le religieux et la mort', 848 International Review of the Red Cross (special issue on the missing) 785 (2002), pp. 785-801

G

- Gaeta, P. (2007a), 'Genocide d'état et responsabilité pénale individuelle', 2 RGDIP 273 (2007), pp. 273-283
- Gaeta, P. (2007b), 'On what Conditions can a State be held Responsible for Genocide?', 18(4) EJIL 631 (2007), pp. 631-684
- Gaffikin, B., 'The International Court of Justice and the Crisis in the Balkans Case Concerning Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia)', 17 Sydney Law Review 458 (1995), pp. 458-472
- Garry, H.R., 'When Procedure involves Matters of Life and Death: Interim Measures and the European Convention on Human Rights', 7(3) European Public Law 399 (2001), pp. 399-432
- Gathii, J. Thuo, 'Case Concerning Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda)' 101 American Journal of International Law 142 (2007), pp. 142-149
- Gattini, A., 'Breach of the Obligation to Prevent and Reparation thereof in the ICJ's Genocide Judgment', 18(4) EJIL 695 (2007), pp. 695-713
- Gelmamez, M.S., 'Constitution, Ombudsperson and Human Rights Chamber in 'Bosnia and Herzegovina'', 17(3) Netherlands Quarterly of Human Rights 277 (1999), pp. 277-329
- Ghandhi, P.R., The Human Rights Committee and the Right of Individual Communication: Law and Practice, Ashgate, Aldershot/Brookfield (USA)/Singapore/Sydney 1998
- Ghandhi, S., 'Avena and other Mexican Nationals', 53 International & Comparative Law Quarterly 738 (2004), pp. 738-746
- Giardina, A., 'Provisional Measures in Europe: Some Comparative Observations', 4 Diritto del commercio internazionale: pratica internazionale e diritto interno 791 (1993), pp. 791-802
- Gill, T., E. van Sliedregt, 'Guantánamo Bay: a Reflection on the Legal Status and Rights of "Unlawful Enemy Combatants"', 1 Utrecht Law Review 28 (2005), pp. 28-54
- Gilman, D., 'Confidentiality in the Proceedings as a Topic in the Discussion of Reform', in: J.E. Mendez, F. Cox (eds.), El Futuro del Sistema Interamericano de Protección de Los Derechos Humanos, IIDH, San José, Costa Rica 1998, pp. 261-290
- Goldie, L.F.E., 'The Nuclear Test Cases: Restraints on Environmental Harm', 5 Journal of Maritime Law & Commerce 491 (1973-74), pp. 491-505
- Goldman R.K., 'International Human Rights and Humanitarian Law and the Internally Displaced', in: P. Nikken (ed.), The Modern World of Human Rights: Essays in Honour of Thomas Buergenthal, IIDH/IIHR, San José, Costa Rica 1996, pp. 517-548
- Goldman, R.K., B.D. Tittmore, Unprivileged Combatants and the Hostilities in Afghanistan: Their Status and Rights under International Humanitarian and Human Rights Law, American Society of International Law Task Force Paper, Washington 2002
- Goldstone, R.J., R.J. Hamilton, '"Bosnia v. Serbia: Lessons from the Encounter of the International Court of Justice with the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia', 21 Leiden Journal of International Law 95 (2008), pp. 95-112
- Gómez, V. (1998a), 'Seguridad Jurídica e Igualdad Procesal ante los Órganos', in: J.E. Mendez, F. Cox (eds.), El Futura del Sistema Interamericano de Protección de Los Derechos Humanos, Instituto Interamericano de Derechos Humanos, San José 1998, pp. 213-240
- Gómez, V. (1998b), 'The Interaction between the Political Actors of the OAS, the Commission and the Court', in: D.J. Harris, S. Livingstone (eds.), The Inter-American System of Human Rights, Clarendon Press, Oxford 1998, pp. 173-197
- Gómez, V., 'Inter-American Commission on Human Rights and the Inter-American Court of Human Rights: New Rules and Recent Cases', 1(1) Human Rights Law Review 111 (2001), pp. 111-126
- Gomien, D., 'Human Rights in Bosnia and Herzegovina: European Practice, Fraught Federalism and the Future', in: W. Benedek (ed.), Human Rights in Bosnia and Herzegovina after Day-

- ton: from Theory to Practice, Human Rights Centre of the University of Sarajevo, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague [etc.] 1999, pp. 107-120
- Gomien, D., 'The Human Rights Ombudsperson for Bosnia and Herzegovina', in: G. Alfredsson, J. Grimheden, B.G. Ramcharan, A. de Zayas (eds.), International Human Rights Monitoring Mechanisms: Essays in Honour of Jakob Th. Möller, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers The Hague [etc.] 2001, pp. 763-770
- Gomien, D., D. Harris, L. Zwaak, Law and Practice of the European Convention on Human Rights and the European Social Charter, Council of Europe Publishing, Strasbourg 1996
- Gondek, M., 'Extraterritorial Application of the European Convention on Human Rights. Territorial Focus in the Age of Globalization?', 52 Netherlands International Law Review 349 (2005), pp. 349-387
- González Espinoza, O.I., La protección internacional del ser humano y las medidas provisionales dictadas en el marco de la Convención Americana sobre Derechos Humanos, con énfasis en la práctica de la Corte Interamericana de Derechos Humanos, Tesis Universidad de Costa Rica, Facultad de Derecho, May 2002
- Goodman, R., 'Human Rights Treaties, Invalid Reservations and State Consent', 96(3) American Journal of International Law 531 (2002), pp. 531-560
- Goodwin-Gill, G.S., J. MacAdam, The Refugee in International Law, Oxford University Press, Oxford 2007 (3rd)
- Gorlick, B., 'The Convention and the Committee against Torture; a Complementary Protection Regime for Refugees', 11(3) International Journal of Refugee Law 479 (1999), pp. 479-495
- Gorlick, B., 'Human Rights and Refugees: Enhancing Protection through International Human Rights Law', 69(2) Nordic Journal of International Law 117 (2000), pp. 117-177
- Goy, R., 'La Cour Permanente de Justice Internationale et les Droits de l'Homme', in: V. Berger et al. (eds.), Liber Amicorum Marc-André Eissen, Bruylant, Brussels 1995, pp. 199-232
- Gray, C., Judicial Remedies in International Law, Clarendon Press, Oxford 1987
- Gray, C., 'Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)), Orders of Provisional Measures of 8 April 1993 and 13 September 1993', 43 International and Comparative Law Quarterly 704 (1994), pp. 704-714
- Gray, C., 'The Use and Abuse of the International Court of Justice: Cases concerning the Use of Force after Nicaragua', 14(5) EJIL 867 (2003), pp. 867-905
- Gross, L., 'Some Observations on Provisional Measures', in: Y. Dinstein, M. Tabory (eds.), International Law at a Time of Perplexity, Essays in Honour of Shabtai Rosenne, Nijhoff, Dordrecht 1989, pp. 308-324
- Gros Espiell, H., 'Opiniones Disidentes y separadas en la Corte Interamericana de derechos Humanos', 4 Revista Uruguaya de derecho procesal 456 (1988), pp. 456-466
- Grossman, C., 'Disappearances in Honduras: The Need for Direct Victim Representation in Human Rights Litigation', 15 Hastings Int'l & Comp. L. Rev 363 (1992), pp. 363-389
- Grünfeld, F., Vroegtijdig optreden van omstanders ter voorkoming van oorlogen en schendingen van de rechten van de mens, Inaugural speech Utrecht University, 2003, available online at <<http://arno.unimaas.nl/show.cgi?fid=3830>>
- Grünfeld, F., 'The Role of Bystanders in Human Rights Violations', in: F. Coomans et al. (eds.), Rendering Justice to the Vulnerable: Liber Amicorum in Honour of Theo van Boven, Kluwer Law International, The Hague/London/Boston 2000, pp. 131-143
- Grünfeld, F., A. Huijboom, The Failure to Prevent Genocide in Rwanda: the Role of Bystanders, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, Leiden 2007
- Gubbay, A.R., 'The Protection and Enforcement of Fundamental Human Rights: The Zimbabwean Experience', 19 Human Rights Quarterly 227 (1997), pp. 227-254
- Guggenheim, P., Les Mesures Provisoires de Procédure Internationale et leur Influence sur le Développement du Droit des Gens, Recueil Sirey, Paris 1931

- Guggenheim, P., Les Mesures Conservatoires Dans la Procédure Arbitrale et Judiciaire, 40 Recueil des Cours, Recueil Sirey, Paris 1933
- Gumedze, S., 'Bringing Communications before the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights', 3(1) African Human Rights Law Journal 118 (2003), pp. 118-148

H

- Haeck, Y., C. Burbano Herrera, 'Provisional Measures in the Case Law of the European Court of Human Rights', 4 NQHR 625 (2003), pp. 625-676
- Haeck, Y., C. Burbano Herrera, L. Zwaak, 'Strasbourg Takes Away any Remaining Doubts and Broadens its Pan-European Protection: Non-Compliance with a Provisional Measure Automatically Leads to a Violation of the Right of Individual Application... or Doesn't it?', 1 European Constitutional Law Review 41 (2008), pp. 41-63
- Hafner, G., 'Risks Ensuing from Fragmentation of International Law', UN Doc. ILC (LIJ)/WG/LT/L.1/Add.1, at 24 (2000) (included as annex to UN Doc. A/55/10 (2000))
- Haller, G., 'The Human Rights Regime in Bosnia and Herzegovina in the European Context', in: W. Benedek (ed.), Human Rights in Bosnia and Herzegovina after Dayton: from Theory to Practice, Human Rights Centre of the University of Sarajevo, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague [etc.] 1999, pp. 25-32
- Hallo de Wolf, A., 'Defending the Defenders: hoe beschermt het internationaal recht mensenrechten NGO's', 27(5) NJCM-Bulletin 531 (2002), pp. 531-546
- Hamalengwa, M., C. Flinterman, E.V.O. Dankwa (eds.), The International Law of Human Rights in Africa: Basic Documents and Annotated Bibliography, Nijhoff, Dordrecht/Boston 1988
- Hannum, H., 'The Protection of Indigenous Rights in the Inter-American System', in: D.J. Harris, S. Livingstone (eds.), The Inter-American System of Human Rights, Clarendon Press, Oxford 1998, pp. 323-344
- Hannum, H. (ed.), Guide to International Human Rights Practice, Transnational Publishers, Ardsley, New York 2004 (4th)
- Hannum, H., R.B. Lillich, International Human Rights: Problems of Law, Policy, and Practice, Aspen Publishers, Boulder (Co) 1995 (3rd)
- Harrington, J. (Joanna), 'Punting Terrorists, Assassins and other Undesirables: Canada, the Human Rights Committee and Requests for Interim Measures of Protection', 48 McGill L.J. 55 (2003), pp. 55-87
- Harrington, J. (Joanna), 'The Absent Dialogue: Extradition and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights', 32 Queen's Law Journal 82 (2006), pp. 82-134
- Harrington, J. (Julia), 'Protecting Human Rights in Africa: Strategies and Roles of Non-Governmental Organizations by Claude Welch (book review)', 9 Harvard Human Rights Journal 333 (1996), pp. 333-338.
- Harrington, J. (Julia), 'Special Rapporteurs of the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights', 1(2) African Human Rights Law Journal 247 (2001), pp. 247-267
- Harrington, J. (Julia), 'The African Court on Human and Peoples' Rights', in: M. Evans, R. Murray (eds.), The African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights, the System in Practice: 1986-2000, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge 2002, pp. 305-334
- Harris, D., M. O'Boyle, C. Warbrick, Law of the European Convention on Human Rights, Butterworths, London 1995
- Harris, D., S. Livingstone (eds.), The Inter-American System of Human Rights, Clarendon Press, Oxford 1998
- Hathcock, J.N., 'The Precautionary Principle – An Impossible Burden of Proof', 3(4) AgBioForum 255 (2000), pp. 255-258, <www.agbioforum.org>
- Helfer, L.R., A.-M. Slaughter, 'Why States Create International Tribunals: A Response to Professors Posner and Yoo', 93 California Law Review 1 (2005), pp. 1-58

- Helfer, L.R., A.-M. Slaughter, 'Towards a Theory of Effective Supranational Adjudication', 107 Yale Law Journal 273 (1997), pp. 273-391
- Helfer, L.R., 'Forum Shopping for Human Rights', 148(2) University of Pennsylvania Law Review 285 (1999), pp. 285-379
- Henckaerts, J.M., Mass Expulsion in Modern International Law and Practice, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague 1995
- Henrard, K., Devising an Adequate System of Minority Protection: Individual Human Rights, Minority Rights and the Right to Self-determination, Nijhoff, The Hague 2000
- Herdegen, M., Völkerrecht, Beck, München 2004 (3rd)
- Hey, E., Teaching International Law: State-Consent as Consent to a Process of Normative Development and Ensuing Problems, Kluwer Law International, The Hague 2003
- Heyns, C. (ed.), Human Rights Law in Africa (Vol. 2), Martinus Nijhoff, Leyden 2004
- Heyns, C. (ed.), Compendium of Key Human Rights Documents of the African Union, Pretoria University Law Press, Pretoria 2005
- Heyns, C., M. Killander, 'The African Regional Human Rights System', in: F. Gómez Isa, K. De Feyter (eds.), International Protection of Human Rights: Achievements and Challenges, University of Deusto, Bilbao 2006, pp. 509-543
- Heyns, C., F. Viljoen, 'Current Developments: An overview of International Human Rights Protection in Africa', 15 SAJHR 421 (1999), pp. 421-445
- Heyns, C., F. Viljoen, 'The Regional Protection of Human Rights in Africa: An Overview and Evaluation', in: P.T. Zeleza, P.J. McConaughay (eds.), Human Rights, the Rule of Law, and Development in Africa, University of Pennsylvania Press, Philadelphia 2004, pp. 129-143
- Hicks, P., 'The Human Rights Role of the Office of the High Representative and Other Implementing Organizations', in: W. Benedek (ed.), Human Rights in Bosnia and Herzegovina after Dayton: from Theory to Practice, Human Rights Centre of the University of Sarajevo, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague [etc.] 1999, pp. 127-148
- Higgins, R., Problems and Process, International Law and how to use it, Clarendon Press, Oxford 1994
- Higgins, R., 'Interim Measures for the Protection of Human Rights', 36 Columbia Journal of Transnational Law 91 (1997), pp. 91-108
- Higgins, R., 'The International Court of Justice and Human Rights', in: K. Wellens (ed.), International Law: Theory and Practice, Essays in Honour of Eric Suy, Kluwer Law International/Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague/Boston/London 1998, pp. 691-705
- Higgins, R., 'The ICJ, the ECJ, and the Integrity of International Law', 52 International and Comparative Law Quarterly 1 (2003) pp. 1-20
- Higgins, R., 'Human Rights in the International Court of Justice', 20 LJIL 745 (2007), pp. 745-751
- Highet, K., 'U.S. Withdrawal from Proceedings Initiated by Nicaragua', 79 The American Journal of International Law 438 (1985), pp. 438-441
- Highet, K., 'Evidence and Proof of Fact', in: L. Fisler Damrosch (ed.), The International Court of Justice at a Crossroads, Transnational Publishers/Dobbs Ferry, New York 1987, pp. 355-375
- Highet, K., 'Evidence, the Chamber and the ELSI Case', in: R.B. Lillich (ed.), Fact-finding before International Tribunals, Transnational Publishers, Inc., Ardsley-on-Hudson, New York 1992, pp. 65-68
- Hirsch Ballin, E.M.H., 'The VS en het internationale recht: onthouden van consulaire bijstand aan ter dood veroordeelde Duitsers', 50(10) Ars Aequi 807 (2001), pp. 807-819
- Hood, R., The Death Penalty, a Worldwide Perspective, Oxford University Press, Oxford 2002
- Horn, F., Reservations and Interpretative Declarations to Multilateral Treaties, North-Holland, Amsterdam 1988

Bibliography

- Huff, A., 'Resource Development and Human Rights: A Look at the Case of the Lubicon Cree Indian Nation of Canada', 10 Colo. J. Int'l Environmental Law & Policy 161 (1999), pp. 161-194
- Human Rights First, 'Getting to Ground Truth, Investigating US Abuses in the "War on Terror"', September 2004, <www.HumanRightsFirst.org>
- Human Rights Watch, 'Empty Promises: Diplomatic Assurances no Safeguard against Torture', Vol. 16, No. 4 (D), April 2004
- Human Rights Watch, The United States' Disappeared; the CIA's long-term ghost detainees, a Human Rights Watch briefing paper, October 2004
- Human Rights Watch, 'Still at Risk: Diplomatic Assurances no Safeguard against Torture', Vol. 17, No. 4 (D), April 2005

I

- ILA, 'Interim Report of the Committee on International Human Rights Law and Practice of the International Law Association (ILA), on the Impact of Findings of the United Nations Human Rights Treaty Bodies on National Courts and Tribunals, at the New Delhi Conference (2002)', 70 International Law Association' Rep. Conf. 508, April 2-6 (2002), pp. 507-555
- ILA, 'Final Report of the Committee on International Human Rights Law and Practice of the International Law Association (ILA) on the Impact of Findings of the United Nations Human Rights Treaty Bodies, at the Berlin Conference (2004)', 71 International Law Association' Rep. Conf. 621 August 16-21 2004, pp. 621-702
- Ingelse, C., The UN Committee against Torture: An Assessment, Kluwer Law International, The Hague 2001
- Iwamoto, Y., 'The Protection of Human Life through Provisional Measures indicated by the International Court of Justice', 15 Leiden Journal of International Law 345 (2002), pp. 345-366

J

- Jacobs, F.G., 'Interim Measures in the Law and Practice of the Court of Justice of the European Communities', in: R. Bernhardt (ed.), Interim Measures Indicated by International Courts, Springer Verlag, Berlin/Heidelberg/New York 1994, pp. 37-68
- Jayawickrama, N., The Judicial Application of Human Rights Law, National, Regional and International Jurisprudence, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge 2002
- Jennings, R., 'The LaGrand Case', 1 The Law and Practice of International Courts and Tribunals, 13 (2002) pp. 13-54
- Joseph, S., 'Rendering Terrorists and the Convention against Torture', 5 Hum.Rts.L. Rev. 339 (2005), pp. 339-446
- Joseph, S., J. Schultz, M. Castan, The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Cases, Materials and Commentary, Oxford University Press, Oxford 2004 (2nd)

K

- Kammerhofer, J., 'The Binding Nature of Provisional Measures of the International Court of Justice: the 'Settlement' of the Issue in the LaGrand Case', 16(1) Leiden Journal of International Law 67 (2003), pp. 67-83
- Kamminga, M.T., Inter-State Accountability for Violations of Human Rights, University of Pennsylvania Press, Philadelphia 1992
- Kamminga, M.T., 'The Precautionary Approach in International Human Rights Law: How It can Benefit the Environment', in: E. Hey, D.A.C. Freestone (eds.), The Precautionary Principle and International Law, Kluwer Law International, The Hague 1996, pp. 171-186

- Kamminga, M.T., De humanisering van het volkenrecht, Inaugurele rede, Universiteit Maastricht, 2001
- Kamminga, M.T., 'The Evolving Status of NGOs under International Law: a Threat to the Inter-State System?', in: G.P.H. Kreijen et al. (eds.), State, Sovereignty, and International Governance, Oxford University Press, Oxford 2002, pp. 387-406
- Kamminga, M.T., 'Humanisation of International Law', in: I. Boerfijn, J. Goldschmidt (eds.), Changing Perceptions of Sovereignty and Human rights: Essays in Honour of Cees Flinterman, Intersentia, Antwerp 2008, pp. 29-40
- Kamminga, M.T., Final Report on the Impact of International Human Rights Law on General International Law, presented on behalf of the Committee of Human Rights Law and Practice of the International Law Association (ILA), July 2008, made available on SSRN: <<http://ssrn.com/abstract=1150664>> (consulted 5 August 2008)
- Kälin, W., 'Human Rights and Statehood', in: W. Benedek (ed.), Human Rights in Bosnia and Herzegovina after Dayton: from Theory to Practice, Human Rights Centre of the University of Sarajevo, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague [etc.] 1999, pp. 59-66
- Kazazi, M., Burden of Proof and Related Issues, A Study on Evidence before International Tribunals, Kluwer Law International, The Hague/London/Boston 1996
- Kempees, P., N. Mol, A. van Steijn, 'Voorlopige maatregelen bij het Europees Hof voor de Rechten van de Mens', in 5 NAV 299 (2004), pp. 299-300
- Kingsbury, B., 'Reconciling Five Competing Conceptual Structures of Indigenous Peoples' Claims in International and Comparative Law', 34 N.Y.U. J. Int'l L. & Pol. 189 (2001), pp. 189-250
- Kirgis, F.L., 'The Supreme Court decides a Consular Convention case', 10(16) ASIL Insight 7 July 2006
- Klabbers, J., 'Executing Mr Breard', 67(3) Nordic Journal of International Law 357 (1998), pp. 357-364
- Klabbers, J., 'Accepting the Unacceptable? A New Approach to Reservations to Multilateral Treaties', 69 Nordic Journal of International Law 179 (2000), pp. 179-193
- Klein, E., 'Individual Reparation Claims under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights: The Practice of the Human Rights Committee', in: A. Randelzhofer, C. Tomuschat (eds.), State Responsibility and the Individual: Reparation in Instances of Grave Violations of Human Rights, Kluwer Law International 1999, pp. 27-41
- Klerk, Y., 'The Character of the Views of the Human Rights Committee', in: F. Coomans et al. (eds.), Rendering Justice to the Vulnerable, Kluwer Law International, The Hague/London/Boston 2000, pp. 149-159
- Klerk, Y.S., Het ECRM-Toezichtmechanisme; verleden, heden, toekomst, dissertation, Ars Aequi Libri, Nijmegen 1995
- Knoops, G.G.J., 'Het House of Lords "Torture" arrest en de gevolgen voor counter-terrorisme door overheden: van "geheime vluchten", CIA tot Guantanamo Bay', 55 Ars Aequi 116 (2006) pp. 116-122
- Koh, H. Hongju, 'Refugees, The Courts, and the New World Order', Utah Law Review 999 (1994a), pp. 999-1025
- Koh, H. Hongju, 'America's Offshore Refugee Camps', 29 University of Richmond Law Review 139 (1994b), pp. 139-173
- Koh, H. Hongju, 'Why do Nations Obey International Law?', 106 The Yale Law Journal 2599 (1997), pp. 2599-2659
- Kokott, J., The Burden of Proof in Comparative and International Human Rights Law, Civil and Common Law Approaches with Special Reference to the American and German Legal Systems, Kluwer Law International, The Hague/London/Boston 1998
- Koskeniemi, M., P. Leino, 'Fragmentation of International Law? Postmodern Anxieties', 15(3) Leiden Journal of International Law 553 (2002), pp. 553-580

- Krisch, N., 'The Establishment of an African Court on Human and Peoples' Rights', 58(3) ZaöRV 713 (1998), pp. 713-726
- Kritsiotis, D., 'Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda): Provisional Measures', 50(3) International and Comparative Law Quarterly 662 (2001), pp. 662-670
- Krsticevic, V., 'Líneas de Trabajo para Mejorar la Eficacia del Sistema', in: J.E. Mendez, F. Cox (eds.), El Futuro del Sistema Interamericano de Protección de Los Derechos Humanos, Instituto Interamericano de Derechos Humanos, San José 1998, pp. 413-448
- Krüger, H.C., 'Probleme der Beweiserhebung durch die Europäische Kommission für Menschenrechte', 6 Bulletin Des Droits De L'Homme 43 (1996), pp. 43-56
- Künzli, A., 'Case Concerning Mexican Nationals', 18(1) Leiden Journal of International Law 49 (2005), pp. 49-64
- Küttler, E., Die Menschenrechtskammer für Bosnien-Herzegowina, Berliner Wirtschafts-Verlag GmbH, Berlin 2003
- Kwiatkowska, B., 'The International Court of Justice and the Law of the Sea', in: J. Makarczyk (ed.), Theory of International Law at the Threshold of the 21st Century: Essays in Honour of Krzysztof Skubiszewski, Kluwer Law International, The Hague 1996, pp. 439-485

L

- LaGrand* Symposium: 'Reflections on the ICJ's LaGrand Decision', 27 YaleJIL 423 (2002), pp. 423-452
- Lagrange, P., 'La protection des témoins: entre le possible et le souhaitable', in: L. Burgorgue-Larsen (ed.), La répression internationale du génocide rwandais, Collection du CREDHO-Université de Paris-Sud et Rouen, Bruyant, Bruxelles 2003, pp. 41-83
- Lakha Sriram, C., 'Trying Habre in Senegal: An African Solution to an African Problem?', Jurist, Legal News and Research, University of Pittsburgh School of Law, 6 July 2006, <<http://jurist.law.pitt.edu/forumy/2006/07/trying-habre-in-senegal-african.php>>
- Lavranos, N., 'The Mox Plant and IJzeren Rijn Disputes: which Court is the Supreme Arbiter?', 19 Leiden Journal of International Law 223 (2006) pp. 223-246
- Lawson, R., M. de Blois (eds.), The Dynamics of the Protection of Human Rights in Europe. Essays in Honour of Henry G. Schermers (Vol. 3), Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, Dordrecht 1994
- Lawson, R.A., 'Positieve verplichtingen onder het EVRM – Opkomst en ondergang van de Fair Balance-test', in 20(5) NJCM-Bulletin 558 (1995), pp. 558-573 and 20(6) NJCM-Bulletin 727 (1995), pp. 727-750
- Lawson, R., E. Myjer, 'De zaak loopt volstrekt uit de hand...' Een interview met de nieuwe Nederlandse leden van het Europese Hof en de Europese Commissie voor de Rechten van de Mens, 22(2) NJCM-Bulletin 104 (1997), pp. 104-123
- Lawson, R., De internationale rechter en de Nederlandse rechtsorde, Preadvies; Handelingen Nederlandse Juristen-Vereniging jrg. 129, Tjeenk Willink, Deventer 1999
- Lawson, R., 'Life after Bankovic: on the Extraterritorial Application of the European Convention on Human Rights', in: F.Coomans, M. Kamminga (eds.), Extraterritorial Application of Human Rights Treaties, Intersentia, Antwerp [etc.] 2004, pp. 83-123
- Lawson, R., 'Behrami en Behrami t. Frankrijk en Saramati t. Frankrijk, Duitsland en Noorwegen, Mission impossible, het EVRM is niet van toepassing op vn-vredesmissies, (annotation), 32 NJCM 39 (2007), pp. 39-63
- Leach, Ph., 'The British military in Iraq – the Applicability of the espace juridique doctrine under the European Convention on Human Rights', Public Law (2005), pp. 448-458
- Leach, Ph., Taking a Case to the European Court of Human Rights, Oxford University Press, Oxford 2007 (2nd)

- Letsas, G., 'International Human Rights and the Binding Force of Interim Measures', 5 European Human Rights Law Review 527 (2003), pp. 527-538
- Leuprecht, P., 'Human Rights – The Foundation of Justice and Peace', in: W. Benedek (ed.), Human Rights in Bosnia and Herzegovina after Dayton: from Theory to Practice, Human Rights Centre of the University of Sarajevo, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague [etc.] 1999, pp. 15-18
- Lewis-Anthony, S., M. Scheinin, 'Treaty-Based Procedures for Making Human Rights Complaints Within the UN System', in: H. Hannum (ed.), Guide to International Human Rights Practice, Transnational Publishers, Ardsley/New York 2004 (4th), pp. 43-64
- Lijnzaad, L., Reservations to UN-human Rights Treaties: Ratify and Ruin?, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, Dordrecht 1995
- Lillich, R.B., 'Notes and Comments, The Soering Case', 85 AJIL 128 (1991), pp. 128-149
- Lillich, R.B. (ed.), Fact-finding before International Tribunals, Transnational Publishers, Inc., Ardsley-on-Hudson/New York 1992
- Lloyd, A., R. Murray, 'Institutions with Responsibility for Human Rights Protection under the African Union', 48(2) Journal of African Law 165 (2004), pp. 165-187
- Lodeweges, A., 'Executie-impressies, ontwikkelingen in de praktijk van de tenuitvoerlegging van Hof-uitspraken', 33(7) NJCM 949 (2008), pp. 949-953
- Lombardi, G., R. Sluder, D. Wallace, 'Mainstreaming Death-Sentenced Inmates: The Missouri Experience and Its Legal Significance', 61(2) Federal Probation 3 (1997), pp. 3-11

M

- MacDonald, R.St.J., 'Interim Measures in International Law, with Special Reference to the European System for the Protection of Human Rights', 52(3-4) ZaöRV 703 (1992), pp. 703-740
- Macklin, A., 'Refugee Women and the Imperative of Categories', 17(2) Human Rights Quarterly 213 (1995), pp. 213-277
- Macklin, A., 'Mr. Suresh and the Evil Twin', 20(4) Refuge 15 (2002), pp. 15-22 (see <www.law.utoronto.ca> (consulted 18 July 2004))
- McLachlan, C., 'The Principle of Systemic Integration and Article 31(3)(c) of the Vienna Convention', 54 International and Comparative Law Quarterly 279 (2005), pp. 279-320
- Mahoney, P., 'Judicial Activism and Judicial Self-Restraint in the European Court of Human Rights: Two Sides of the Same Coin', 11(1-2) Human Rights Law Journal 57 (1990), pp. 57-88
- Maison, R., 'Les ordonnances de la CIJ dans l'affaire relative à l'application de la Convention sur la prévention et la répression du crime de génocide', 5 EJIL 381 (1994), pp. 381-400
- Malinverni, G., 'La pratique des Comités conventionnels des nations unies en matière de mesures conservatoires', in: G. Cohen-Jonathan, J.-F. Flauss (eds.), Mesures conservatoires et droits fondamentaux, Bruyant, Bruxelles 2005, pp. 63-75
- Mampuya, A., 'Responsabilité et réparations dans le conflit des Grands-Lacs au Congo-Zaïre', 108(3) Revue générale de droit international public 679 (2004), pp. 679-707
- Mani, V.S., 'On Interim Measures of Protection: I.C.J. Practice', 13 Indian Journal of International Law 262 (1973), pp. 262-272
- Mani, V.S., 'The Right to Consular Assistance as a Basic Human Right of Aliens – A Review of the ICJ Order dated 3 March 1999', 39(3) Indian Journal of International Law (1999), pp. 431-446
- Maraj, R. (Minister of Foreign Affairs), 'Notice to Denounce the Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights', 20 (4-6) Human Rights Law Journal 280 (1998), pp. 280-281
- Marr, S., The Precautionary Principle in the Law of the Sea: Modern Decision Making in International Law, Nijhoff, Leiden 2003

- Martin, C., "The Moiwana Village Case: A New Trend in Approaching the Rights of Ethnic Groups in the Inter-American System", 19(2) Leiden Journal of International Law 491 (2006), pp. 491-504
- Martin, I., 'International Experiences for Human Rights Monitoring', in: W. Benedek (ed.), Human Rights in Bosnia and Herzegovina after Dayton: from Theory to Practice, Human Rights Centre of the University of Sarajevo, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague [etc.] 1999, pp. 67-72
- Martin, S., 'The Missing', 84 International Review of the Red Cross 723 (2002), pp. 723-726
- Mayer, J., 'Outsourcing Torture, The Secret History of America's Extraordinary Rendition Program', The New Yorker, 7 February 2005
- McCorquodale, R., 'An Inclusive International Legal System', 17(3) Leiden Journal of International Law 477 (2004), pp. 477-504
- McGoldrick, D., The Human Rights Committee: Its Role in the Development of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Clarendon Press, Oxford 1994
- McGoldrick, D., 'Extraterritorial Application of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights', in: F. Coomans, M. Kamminga (eds.), Extraterritorial Application of Human Rights Treaties, Intersentia, Antwerp/Oxford 2004, pp. 41-72
- McKie, K.L., 'Executions and Apologies: The U.S., International Law and Right to Consular Notification', 11 Critical Criminology 199 (2002), pp. 199-215
- Medina Quiroga, C., The Battle of Human Rights: Gross, Systematic Violations and the Inter-American System, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, Dordrecht 1988
- Medina Quiroga, C., La Convención Americana: Teoría y jurisprudencia; vida, integridad personal, libertad personal, debido proceso y recurso judicial, Universidad de Chile 2005
- Medina Quiroga, C., C. Nash Rojas, Sistema Interamericano de Derechos Humanos: Introducción a sus Mecanismos de Protección Universidad de Chile, Centro de Derechos Humanos 2007
- Meijknecht, A.K., Towards International Personality: the Position of Minorities and Indigenous Peoples in International Law, Intersentia/Hart, Antwerp/Groningen/Oxford 2001
- Mendelson, M., 'Interim Measures of Protection in Cases of Contested Jurisdiction', 46 B.Y.I.L. 259 (1972-1973), pp. 259-322
- Mendelson, M., 'The international Court of Justice and the Sources of International Law', in: V. Lowe, M. Fitzmaurice (eds.), Fifty Years of the International Court of Justice: Essays in Honour of Sir Robert Jennings, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge 1996, pp. 63-89
- Méndez, J.E., F. Cox (eds.), El Futuro del Sistema Interamericano de Protección de los Derechos Humanos, Instituto Interamericano de Derechos Humanos, San José 1998
- Méndez, J.E., J.M. Vivanco, 'Disappearances and the Inter-American Court: Reflections on a Litigation Experience', 13 Hamline Law Review 507 (1990), pp. 507-577
- Méndez, J.E., J.M. Vivanco, V. Krsticevic, 'Amicus Curiae', 18 Revista IIDH 29 (1993), pp. 29-44
- Mennecke, M., C.J. Tams, 'LaGrand Case (Germany v. United States of America)', 51(2) ICLQ 449 (2002), pp. 449-454
- Meron, Th., The Humanization of International Law, Hague Academy of International Law, Vol. 3 (General Course 2003), Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, Leiden 2006
- Merrills, J.G., The Development of International Law by the European Court of Human Rights, Manchester University Press, Manchester 1993
- Merrills, J.G., 'Interim Measures of Protection in the Recent Jurisprudence of the International Court of Justice', 44(1) ICLQ 90 (1995), pp. 90-146
- Milano, E., 'Diplomatic Protection and Human Rights before the International Court of Justice: Re-fashioning Tradition?', XXXV Netherlands Yearbook of International Law 85 (2004), pp. 85-142
- Milanović, M., 'State Responsibility for Genocide', 17(3) EJIL 553 (2006), pp. 553-604

- Milanović, M., 'State Responsibility for Genocide: a Follow-up', 18(4) EJIL 669 (2007), pp. 669-694
- Mol, N., 'Implications of the Special Status Accorded in the General Framework Agreement for Peace to the European Convention on Human Rights', in: M. O'Flaherty, G. Gisvold (eds.), Post-war Protection of Human Rights in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague/Boston 1998, pp. 27-69
- Mole, N., 'Issa v. Turkey: Delineating the Extra Territorial Effect of the European Convention on Human Rights', 1 European Human Rights Law Journal 86 (2005), pp. 86-91
- Morel, C., 'Defending Human Rights in Africa: The Case for Minority and Indigenous Rights', 1(1) Essex Human Rights Review 54 (2004), pp. 54-65
- Mowbray, A.R., The Development of Positive Obligations Under the European Convention on Human Rights by the European Court of Human Rights, Hart Publishing, Oxford 2004
- Mowbray, A.R., 'A New Strasbourg Approach to the Legal Consequences of Interim Measures', 5(2) Human Rights Law Review 377 (2005), pp. 377-386
- Mowbray, A.R., Cases and Materials on the European Convention on Human Rights, Oxford University Press, Oxford 2007 (2nd)
- Mugwanya, G.W., Human Rights in Africa, Enhancing Human Rights through the African Regional Human Rights System, Transnational Publishers, New York 2003
- Müller, D., 'Procedural Developments at the International Court of Justice', 3 The Law and Practice of International courts and tribunals 553 (2004), pp. 553-579
- Murphy, S.D., 'Contemporary Practice of the United States relating to International Law', 98 American Journal of International Law 579 (2004), pp. 579-609
- Murray, R., 'Serious or Massive Violations under the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights: A Comparison with the Inter-American and European Mechanisms', 17(2) Netherlands Quarterly of Human Rights 109 (1999), pp. 109-133
- Murray, R. The African Commission on Human and People's Rights & International Law, Hart Publishing, Oxford/Portland Oregon 2000
- Murray, R., Human Rights in Africa, From the OAU to the African Union, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge 2004
- Murray, R., M. Evans (eds.), Documents of the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights, Hart Publishing, Oxford/Portland Oregon 2001
- Murray, R., S. Wheatley, 'Groups and the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights', 25 Human Rights Quarterly 213 (2003), pp. 213-236
- Mutua, M., 'African Human Rights Organizations: Questions of Context and Legitimacy', in: P.T. Zeleza, P.J. McConaughay, Human Rights, the Rule of Law, and Development in Africa, University of Pennsylvania Press, Philadelphia 2004, pp. 191-215
- Myjer, E., 'Straatsburgse Myj/meringen: wie het eerst komt is niet altijd urgent', 32(7) NJCM 1073 (2007), pp. 1073-1075

N

- Naldi, G.J., The Organization of African Unity, an Analysis of its Role, Mansell Publishing, New York 1999 (2nd)
- Naldi, G.J., 'Notes and Comments: Limitation of Rights under the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights: The Contribution of the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights', 17 South African Journal of Human Rights 109 (2001), pp. 109-118
- Naldi, G., 'Interim Measures of Protection in the African system for the Protection of Human and Peoples' Rights', 2(1) African Human Rights Law Journal 1 (2002), pp. 1-9
- Naldi, G.J., 'Interim Measures in the UN Human Rights Committee', 53 ICLQ 445 (2004), pp. 445-454
- Neussl, P., 'Bosnia and Herzegovina still far from the Rule of Law/Basic Facts and Landmark Decisions of the Human Rights Chamber', 20(7-11) HRLJ 290 (1999), pp. 290-302

- Nicholson, F., P. Twomey, Refugee Rights and Realities, Evolving International Concepts and Regimes, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge 1999
- Nieto Navia, R., 'Las medidas provisionales en la Corte Interamericana de Derechos Humanos: Teoría y Praxis', in: R. Nieto Navia (ed.), La Corte y el Sistema Interamericano de Derechos Humanos, Corte IDH, San José Costa Rica 1994, pp. 369-398
- Nieto Navia, R., 'Aplicación por la Corte Interamericana de derechos Humanos de las Normas de la Convención de Viena sobre el derecho de los Tratados sobre Interpretación en Diversos Idiomas', in: P. Nikken (ed.), The Modern World of Human Rights: Essays in Honour of Thomas Buergenthal, IIDH/IIHR, San José, Costa Rica 1996, pp. 397-418
- Nikken, P., 'Perfeccionar el Sistema Interamericano de Derechos Humanos sin Reformar al pacto de San José', in: J.E. Mendez, F. Cox (eds.), El Futuro del Sistema Interamericano de Protección de Los Derechos Humanos, The Modern World of Human Rights: Essays in Honour of Thomas Buergenthal, IIDH/IIHR, San José, Costa Rica 1996, pp. 25-44
- Nmehielle, V.O., The African Human Rights System: Its Law, Practice, and Institutions, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague [etc.] 2001
- Nørgaard, C.A., 'Interim Measures Under the European System for Protection of Human Rights', in: K. Thorup, J. Rosenbløm (eds.), Festschrift til Ole Due (Liber Amicorum), Forlaget Tomson, Stockholm 1994, pp. 278-297
- Nørgaard, C.A., H.C. Krüger, 'Interim and Conservatory Measures under the European System of Protection of Human Rights', in: M. Nowak, D. Steurer, H. Tresser (eds.), Fortschritt im Bewusstsein der Grund- und Menschenrechte, Progress in the Spirit of Human Rights, Festschrift für Felix Ermacora, Engel Verlag, Kehl/Strasbourg/Arlington 1988, pp. 109-117
- Nowak, M., U.N. Covenant on Civil and Political Rights: CCPR Commentary, N.P. Engel, Kehl/Strasbourg/Arlington 1993
- Nowak, M., 'The Human Rights Chamber for Bosnia and Herzegovina adopts its First Judgment', 18 HRLJ 174 (1997), pp. 174-178
- Nowak, M. (1999a), 'Is Bosnia and Herzegovina Ready for Membership in the Council of Europe? The Responsibility of the Committee of Ministers and of the Parliamentary Assembly', 20 HRLJ 285 (1999), pp. 285-289
- Nowak, M. (1999b), 'Shortcomings of Effective Enforcement of Human Rights in Bosnia and Herzegovina', in: W. Benedek (ed.), Human Rights in Bosnia and Herzegovina after Dayton: from Theory to Practice, Human Rights Centre of the University of Sarajevo, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague [etc.] 1999, pp. 95-106
- Nowak, M. (2000a), 'Lessons for the International Human Rights Regime from the Yugoslav Experience', Academy of European Law (ed.), Collected Courses of the Academy of European Law, Volume VIII, Book 2, Kluwer Law International, The Hague 2000, pp. 141-208
- Nowak, M. (2000b), 'Is the Death Penalty an Inhuman Punishment?', in: T.S. Orlin, A. Rosas, M. Scheinin (eds.), The Jurisprudence of Human Rights Law: A Comparative Interpretive Approach, Turku, Finland: Institute for Human Rights, Åbo Akademi University 2000, pp. 27-45
- Nowak, M., 'Individual Complaints Before the Human Rights Commission for Bosnia and Herzegovina', in: G. Alfredsson, J. Grimheden, B.G. Ramcharan, A. de Zayas (eds.), International Human Rights Monitoring Mechanisms: Essays in Honour of Jakob Th. Möller, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague [etc.] 2001, pp. 771-793

O

- O'Boyle, M., 'Torture and Emergency Powers under the European Convention on Human Rights: Ireland v. United Kingdom', 71 AJIL 674 (1977), pp. 674-691
- O'Boyle, M., 'The European Convention on Human Rights and Extraterritorial Jurisdiction: a Comment on 'Life after Bankovic'', in: F. Coomans, M. Kamminga (eds.), Extraterritorial Application of Human Rights Treaties, Intersentia, Antwerp/Oxford 2004, pp. 125-139

- O'Riordan, T., J. Cameron, A. Jordan (eds.), Reinterpreting the Precautionary Principle, Cameron May, London 2001
- Oda, S., 'Provisional Measures, The Practice of the International Court of Justice', in: V. Lowe, M. Fitzmaurice (eds.), Fifty Years of the International Court of Justice: Essays in Honour of Sir Robert Jennings, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge 1996, pp. 541-556
- Odinkalu, C.A., 'The Role of Case and Complaints Procedures in the Reform of the African Regional Human Rights System', 1(2) African Human Rights Law Journal 225 (2001), pp. 225-246
- Oellers-Frahm, K., Die einstweilige Anordnung in der internationalen Gerichtbarkeit, Springer-Verlag, Berlin 1975
- Oellers-Frahm, K., 'United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran Case', in: R. Bernhardt (ed.), Encyclopedia of Public International Law 2, Max Planck Institute, North-Holland Publishing Company, Amsterdam/New York/Oxford 1981, pp. 282-286
- Oellers-Frahm, K., 'Remarks Concerning the Indication of Provisional Measures by the ICJ in the Case of Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) of 8 April 1993 (Summary)', 53(3) Zeitschrift für ausländisches und öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht 654 (1993), pp. 654-656
- Oellers-Frahm, K. (2001a), 'Entscheidungen – IGH – 27.6.01 – Verbindlichkeit einstweiliger Anordnungen des IGH. Nichtbeachtung durch die USA. Individualrechte. Fall LaGrand (Deutschland gegen USA)', 28(11-13) EuGRZ 287 (2001), pp. 287-298
- Oellers-Frahm, K. (2001b), 'Multiplication of International Courts and Tribunals and Conflicting Jurisdiction- Problems and Possible Solutions', in: J.A. Frowein, R. Wolfrum (eds.), Max Planck Yearbook of United Nations Law 5, Kluwer Law International, The Hague 2001, pp. 67-104
- Oellers-Frahm, K., 'Verbindlichkeit einstweiliger Massnahmen: Der EGMR vollzieht – endlich – die erforderliche Wende in seiner Rechtsprechung, Anmerkung zum Fall Mamatkulov und Abdurasulovic gegen Türkei', 30 (22-23) EuGRZ 689 (2003), pp. 689-693
- O'Flaherty, M., Human Rights and the UN, Practice before the Treaty Bodies, Sweet & Maxwell, London 1996
- O'Flaherty, M., 'Report on the Conference on Human Rights in Bosnia and Herzegovina: From Theory to Practice', in: W. Benedek (ed.), Human Rights in Bosnia and Herzegovina after Dayton: from Theory to Practice, Human Rights Centre of the University of Sarajevo, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague [etc.] 1999, pp. 6-13
- O'Flaherty, M., 'Human Rights and the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina', in: G. Alfredsson, J. Grimheden, B.G. Ramcharan, A. de Zayas (eds.), International Human Rights Monitoring Mechanisms: Essays in Honour of Jakob Th. Möller, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague [etc.] 2001, pp. 749-762
- Oguz, N., S. Miles, 'The Physician and Prison Hunger Strikes: Reflecting on the Experience in Turkey', 31 J Med Ethics 169 (2005), pp. 169-172
- Onoria, H., 'The African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights and the Exhaustion of Local Remedies Under the African Charter', 31(1) African Human Rights Law Journal 1 (2003), pp. 1-24
- Orakhelashvili, A., 'Questions of International Judicial Jurisdiction in the LaGrand Case', 15 Leiden Journal of International Law 105 (2002), pp. 105-130
- Orakhelashvili, A., 'Judicial Competence and Judicial Remedies in the Avena Case', 18(1) Leiden Journal of International Law 31 (2005), pp. 31-48
- Orakhelashvili, A., Peremptory Norms in International Law, Oxford University Press, Oxford 2006
- Ouguerouz, F., The African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights: A Comprehensive Agenda for Human Dignity and Sustainable Democracy in Africa, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague 2003

Ovey, C., R. White, The European Convention on Human Rights, Oxford University Press, Oxford 2006

P

- Padilla, D.J., 'The Future of the Inter-American Human Rights System', 3(1) Human Rights Brief (American University Washington College of Law), 1995, <<http://www.wcl.american.edu/hrbrief/v3i1/iahr31.htm>>
- Padilla, D.J., 'Provisional Measures under the American Convention on Human Rights', in: C. Gaviria (ed.), Liber Amicorum Héctor Fix-Zamudio, San José, Costa Rica 1998, pp. 1189-1196
- Padilla, D., 'An African Human Rights Court: Reflections From the Perspective of the Inter-American System', 2(2) African Human Rights Law Journal 185 (2002), pp. 185-194
- Pajic, Z., 'An Overview of the substantive Human Rights Regime after Dayton: A Critical Appraisal of the Constitution of Bosnia and Herzegovina', in: M. O'Flaherty, G. Gisvold (eds.), Post-war Protection of Human Rights in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague 1998, pp. 1-12
- Pajic, Z., 'A Critical Appraisal of the Dayton Constitution of Bosnia and Herzegovina', in: W. Benedek (ed.), Human Rights in Bosnia and Herzegovina after Dayton: from Theory to Practice, Human Rights Centre of the University of Sarajevo, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague [etc.] 1999, pp. 33-44
- Palmisano, G., 'Les garanties de non-repetition entre codification et realization juridictionnelle du droit: à propos de l'affaire LaGrand', 4 Revue Générale de Droit International Public 753 (2002), pp. 753-789
- Partsch, K.J., 'Vor- und Nachteile einer Regionalisierung des internationalen Menschenrechtsschutzes', 16 (1-2) EuGRZ 1 (1989), pp. 1-9
- Pasqualucci, J.M., 'Provisional Measures in the Inter-American Human Rights System: An Innovative Development in International Law', 26(4) Vanderbilt Journal of Transnational Law 803 (1993), pp. 803-864
- Pasqualucci, J.M., 'Sonia Picado, First Woman Judge on the Inter-American Court of Human Rights', 17 HRQ 794 (1995), pp. 794-806
- Pasqualucci, J.M. (1996), 'Thomas Buerghenthal: Holocaust Survivor to Human Rights Advocate', 18 Human Rights Quarterly 877 (1996), pp. 877-899
- Pasqualucci, J.M., The Practice and Procedure of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge 2003
- Pasqualucci, J.M., 'Interim Measures in International Human Rights: Evolution and Harmonization', 38(1) Vanderbilt Journal of Transnational Law 1 (2005), pp. 1-49
- Patton, M.Q., Qualitative Research and Evaluation Methods, Sage, Thousand Oaks 2002 (3rd)
- Paulson, C., 'Compliance with Final Judgments of the International Court of Justice since 1987', 98(3) American Journal of International Law 434 (2004), pp. 434-461
- Paust, J. (2003), 'Judicial Power to Determine the Status and Rights of Persons Detained without Trial', 44 Harvard International Law Journal 505 (2003), pp. 505-532
- Paust, J. (2004a), 'Post-9/11 Overreaction and Fallacies Regarding War and Defense, Guantanamo, the Status of Persons, Treatment, Judicial Review of Detention, and Due Process in Military Commissions', 79 Notre Dame Law Review 1335 (2004), pp. 1335-1364
- Paust, J. (2004b), 'After 9/11, "No Neutral Ground" with Respect to Human Rights: Executive Claims and Actions of Special Concern and International Law Regarding the Disappearance of Detainees', 50 The Wayne Law Review 79 (2004), pp. 79-96
- Paust, J., 'Unsafe Harbour, the G.O.P. 'compromise' on Detainee Treatment', JURIST- Forum Legal News and Research, University of Pittsburgh School of Law, 22 September 2006, at: <<http://jurist.law.pitt.edu/forumy/2006/09/unsafe-harbor-gop-compromise-on.php>> (consulted 15 October 2007)

- Paust, J., 'Medellin, Avena, the Supremacy of Treaties, and Relevant Executive Authority', 31(2) Suffolk Transnational Law Review 301 (2008), pp. 301-333
- Pauwelyn, J., Conflict of Norms in Public International Law: How WTO law relates to Other Rules of International Law, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge 2003
- Penal Reform International, Making Standards Work, An international handbook on good prison practice, The Hague 2001 (2nd), <www.penalreform.org>
- Petzold, H., 'The Convention and the principle of subsidiarity', in: R.St.J. Macdonald, F. Matscher, H. Petzold (eds.), The European System for the Protection of Human Rights, Nijhoff, Dordrecht 1993, pp. 41-62
- Picado Sotela, S., 'Thomas Buergenthal', in: P. Nikken (ed.), The Modern World of Human Rights: Essays in Honour of Thomas Buergenthal, IIDH/IIHR, San José, Costa Rica 1996, pp. 19-32
- Pinto, M., 'Las relaciones entre los Órganos del Sistema', in: J.E. Mendez, F. Cox (eds.), El Futuro del Sistema Interamericano de Protección de Los Derechos Humanos, Instituto Interamericano de Derechos Humanos (IIDH), San José, Costa Rica 1998, pp. 169-184
- Pinto, M., 'De la protection diplomatique à la protection des droits de l'homme', 3 Revue Générale de Droit International Publique 513 (2002), pp. 513-548
- Pityana, N.B., 'The Challenge of Culture for Human Rights in Africa: the African Charter in a Comparative Context', in: M. Evans, R. Murray (eds.), The African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights, the System in Practice: 1986-2000, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge 2002, pp. 219-245
- Pityana, N.B., 'Hurdles and Pitfalls in International Human Rights Law: The Ratification Process of the Protocol to the African Charter on the Establishment of the African Court on Human and Peoples' Rights', 28 South African Yearbook of International Law 110 (2003), pp. 110-129
- Prakken, T., Het laatste woord, zes opstellen over verdediging in strafzaken, Kluwer, Deventer 2005
- Pritchard, S. (ed.), Indigenous Peoples, the United Nations and Human Rights, Zed Books Ltd., London, the Federation Press, Annandale/Leichardt, Australia 1998
- Pronto, A., 'Human-Rightism' and the Development of General International Law', 20 LJIL 753 (2007), pp. 753-765

Q

- Quigley, J., A.S. Shank, 'Death Row as a Violation of Human Rights: Is It Illegal to Extradite to Virginia?', 30 VJIL 214 (1989), pp. 241-272

R

- Raguz, B., 'The Ombudsman Institution of the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina', in: W. Benedek (ed.), Human Rights in Bosnia and Herzegovina after Dayton: from Theory to Practice, Human Rights Centre of the University of Sarajevo, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague [etc.] 1999, pp. 121-124
- Ramcharan, B.G., 'Complementarity between Universal and Regional Organizations/Perspectives from the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights', 21(8) Human Rights Law Journal 324 (2000), pp. 324-326
- Ramcharan, B.G., The United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, the Challenges of International Protection, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers/Kluwer Law International, The Hague [etc.] 2002
- Ratner, M., 'How We Closed the Guantanamo HIV Camp: The Intersection of Politics and Litigation', 11 Harvard Human Rights Journal 187 (1998), pp. 187-220

Bibliography

- Ray, S., 'Domesticating International Obligations: How to ensure U.S. Compliance with the Vienna Convention of Consular Relations', 91 Californian Law Revue 1729 (2003), pp. 1729-1771
- Redgwell, C.J., 'Reservations to Treaties and Human Rights Committee General Comment No. 24(52)', 46 International and Comparative Law Quarterly 390 (1997), pp. 390-412
- Reed, L., 'Great Expectations: Where does the Proliferation of International Dispute Resolution Tribunals Leave International Law?', 96 American Society of International Law 219 (2002), pp. 219-237
- Reichler, P.S., 'Tribute to Professor Abram Chayes: Holding America to its Own Best Standards: Abe Chayes and Nicaragua in the World Court', 42 Harvard International Law Journal 15 (2001), pp. 15-46
- Reisman, M., Systems of Control in International Adjudication and Arbitration: Breakdown and Repair, Duke University Press, Durham, NC 1992
- Rieter, E., 'Interim Measures by the World Court to suspend the Execution of an Individual: the Breard Case', 16(4) Netherlands Quarterly of Human Rights 475 (1998), pp. 475-494
- Rieter, E., 'Het VN-Comité tegen foltering, interim maatregelen en de Nederlandse verplichtingen', 24(8) NJCM-Bulletin 1136 (1999), pp. 1136-1145
- Rieter, E. (2002a), 'Het Internationaal Gerechtshof over rechtsherstel en de bindende kracht van voorlopige maatregelen: Duitsland t. VS (LaGrand)', 27(4) NJCM-Bulletin 481 (2002), pp. 481-491
- Rieter, E. (2002b), 'ICCPR Case Law on Detention, the Prohibition of Cruel Treatment and some Issues Pertaining to the Death Row Phenomenon', 1 Journal of the Institute of Justice and International Studies 83 (2002), pp. 83-103 (<www.cmsu.edu/cj/journal.htm>)
- Rieter, E. (2003a), 'Het recht op leven, het verbod van wrede behandeling en de voorlopige maatregelen van het EHRM: eindelijk effectief klachtrecht', 21 Nederlands Juristenblad 1074 (2003), pp. 1074-1076
- Rieter, E. (2003b), Annotation of Shamayev and 12 Others t. Georgië en Rusland, 1 European Human Rights Cases 23 (2003), pp. 23-27
- Rieter, E., 'Effectief klachtrecht, onherstelbaar letsel en voorlopige maatregelen door het EHRM', 29(1) NJCM-Bulletin 73 (2004), pp. 73-87
- Rieter, E. (2005a), 'Motiveringsvereisten voor de Straatsburgse voorlopige maatregelen, het voorbeeld van de Somalische zaken', 30(1) NJCM 25 (2005), pp. 25-44
- Rieter, E. (2005b), Annotation of Mamatkulov en Askarov t. Turkije, 4 februari 2005, 4(6) European Human Rights Cases (2005), pp. 320-324
- Rieter, E., Annotation of Afd. Bestuursrechtspraak Raad van State, 6 januari 2006, rol nr. 200508638/1, JV 2006/189, pp. 736-739
- Rieter, E., Annotation of Paladi v. Moldavia, 10 July 2007, 39806/05, European Human Rights Cases (EHRC) 2007/101, pp. 969-975
- Rivera-Salgado, G., Equal in Dignity and Rights: the Struggle of Indigenous Peoples of the Americas in an Age of Migration, inaugural address Utrecht University, Utrecht 2005
- Robertson, E., 'Psychological Injury and the Prison Litigation Reform Act: A 'Not exactly' Equal Protection Analysis', 37 Harvard Journal on Legislation 105 (2000), pp. 105-158
- Rodley, Sir N.S., The Treatment of Prisoners in International Law, Oxford University Press, Oxford 1999 (2nd)
- Rodley, Sir N.S., 'Urgent Action', in: G. Alfredsson et al. (eds.), International Human Rights Monitoring Mechanisms, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague [etc.] 2001, pp. 279-283
- Rodley, N.S., 'United Nations Human Rights Treaty Bodies and Special Procedures of the Commission on Human Rights – Complementarity or Competition?', 25(4) Human Rights Quarterly 882 (2003), pp. 882-908

- Rodríguez Pinzón, D., 'Presumption of Veracity, Nonappearance and Default in the Individual Complaint Procedure of the Inter-American System on Human Rights', 25 Revista IIDH 125 (1998), pp. 125-148
- Rodríguez Rescia, V., 'La ejecución de sentencias de la Corte', in: J.E. Mendez, F. Cox (eds.), El Futuro del Sistema Interamericano de Protección de Los Derechos Humanos, Instituto Interamericano de Derechos Humanos, San José 1998, pp. 51-72
- Rogge, K., 'Einstweilige Massnahmen in Verfahren von der Europäische Kommission für Menschenrechte', 35 Neue Jurist. Wochenschr. 1569 (1977), pp. 1569-1570
- Rosenne, S., Provisional Measures in International Law, the International Court of Justice and the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea, Oxford University Press, Oxford 2005

S

- Salvioli, F.O., 'Derechos, Acceso y Rol de las Víctimas', in: J.E. Mendez, F. Cox (eds.), El Futuro del Sistema Interamericano de Protección de Los Derechos Humanos, Instituto Interamericano de Derechos Humanos (IIDH), San José, Costa Rica 1998, pp. 293-342
- Sands, Ph., 'Treaty, Custom and the Cross-Fertilization of International Law', 1 Yale Journal of Human Rights and Development Law 85 (1999), pp. 85-105
- Sands, Ph., 'Turtles and Torturers: the Transformation of International Law', 33 NYU J. Int'l L. Pol. 527 (2001), pp. 527-558
- Sands, Ph., Principles of International Environmental Law, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge 2003 (2nd)
- Savadogo, L., 'Case concerning Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda): the Court's Provisional Measures Order of 1 July 2000', 72 BYIL 357 (2002), pp. 357-380
- Schabas, W., 'Soering's Legacy: the Human Rights Committee and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council take a Walk down Death Row', 43 International and Comparative Law Quarterly 913 (1994), pp. 913-921
- Schabas, W.A., The Death Penalty as Cruel Treatment and Torture, Capital Punishment Challenged in the World Courts, Northeastern University Press, Boston 1996
- Schabas, W.A. (2002a), The Abolition of the Death Penalty in International Law, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge 2002
- Schabas, W.A. (2002b), 'The ICJ ruling against the United States: Is it really about the death penalty?', 27 Yale Journal of International Law 445 (2002), pp. 445-452
- Schabas, W., 'Discussion', in: G. Cohen-Jonathan, J.-F. Flauss (eds.), Mesures conservatoires et droits fondamentaux, Bruyant, Bruxelles 2005, pp. 77-90
- Schachter, O., 'Creativity and Objectivity in International Tribunals', in: R. Bernhardt, W.K. Geck, G. Jaenicke, H. Steinberger, Volkerrecht als Rechtsordnung internationale Gerichtsbarkeit Menschenrechte, Festschrift für Hermann Mosler, Springer-Verlag, Berlin/Heidelberg/New York 1983, pp. 813-821
- Scheinin, M., 'The Right to enjoy a Distinct Culture: Indigenous and Competing Uses of Land', in: Th.S. Orlin et al. (eds.), The Jurisprudence of Human Rights: a Comparative Interpretive Approach, Åbo Akademi University Institute for Human Rights, Turku 2000, pp. 159-222
- Scheinin, M., 'How to Untie a Tie in the Human Rights Committee', in: G. Alfredsson et al. (eds.), International Human Rights Monitoring Mechanisms, Essays in Honour of Jakob Th. Möller, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers/Kluwer Law International, The Hague [etc.] 2001, pp. 129-145
- Scheinin, M. (2004a), 'Reservations by States under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and its Optional Protocols, and the Practice of the Human Rights Committee', in: I. Ziemele (ed.), Reservations to Human Rights Treaties and the Vienna Convention Regime: Conflict, Harmony or Reconciliation, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, Leiden 2004, pp. 41-58

Bibliography

- Scheinin, M. (2004b), 'Extraterritorial effect of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights', in: F. Coomans, M. Kamminga (eds.), Extraterritorial Application of Human Rights Treaties, Intersentia, Antwerp/Oxford 2004, pp. 73-81
- Schermers, H.S., 'Acceptance of International Supervision of Human Rights', 12 Leiden Journal of International Law 821 (1999), pp. 821-831
- Schiffman, H.W., 'The LaGrand Decision: The Involving Legal Landscape of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations in U.S. Death Penalty Cases', 42 Santa Clara Law Review 1099 (2002), pp. 1099-1135
- Schiffrin, N., 'Jamaica Withdraws the Rights of Individual Petition under the International Covenant of Civil and Political Rights', 92 American Journal of International Law 564 (1998), pp. 564-568
- Schmidt, M., 'Individual Human Rights Complaints Based on United Nations Treaties and the Need for Reform', 41 International and Comparative Law Quarterly 645 (1992), pp. 645-659
- Schmidt, M., 'Treaty-based Human Rights Complaints Procedures in the UN – Remedy or Mirage for Victims of Human Rights Violations?', 2 Human Rights – Droits de l'Homme 13 (1998), pp. 13-18
- Schmidt, M., 'The Death Row Phenomenon: a Comparative Analysis', in: T.S. Orlin, A. Rosas, M. Scheinin (eds.), The Jurisprudence of Human Rights Law: A Comparative Interpretive Approach, Turku, Finland: Institute for Human Rights, Åbo Akademi University 2000, pp. 47-72
- Schulte, C., Compliance with Decisions of the International Court of Justice, Oxford University Press, Oxford 2004
- Schwebel, S. (1996a), 'Commentary', in: M.K. Bulterman, M. Kuijter (eds.), Compliance with Judgments of International Courts, Proceedings of the symposium organized in honour of Professor Henry G. Schermers, Mordenate College and the Department of International Public Law of Leiden University, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague [etc.] 1996, pp. 39-62
- Schwebel, S. (1996b), 'The Treatment of Human Rights and of Aliens in the International Court of Justice', in: V. Lowe, M. Fitzmaurice (eds.), Fifty Years of the International Court of Justice, Essays in Honour of Sir Robert Jennings, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge 1996, pp. 327-350
- Seiderman, I., Hierarchy in International Law: the Human Rights Dimension, Intersentia/Hart, Antwerpen/Groningen/Oxford 2001
- Sepúlveda, M., The Nature of the Obligations under the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, Intersentia/Hart, Antwerpen/Groningen/Oxford 2003
- Sevinç, M., 'Hunger strikes in Turkey', 30 Human Rights Quarterly 655 (2008), pp. 655-679
- Shahabuddeen, M., Precedent in the World Court, Hersch Lauterpacht Memorial Lectures, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge 1997
- Shany, Y., The Competing Jurisdictions of International Courts and Tribunals, Oxford University Press, Oxford 2003
- Shea, M.P., 'Expanding Judicial Scrutiny of Human Rights in Extradition Cases After Soering', 17(1) Yale Journal of International Law 85 (1992), pp. 85-138
- Shelton, D., 'The Independence of International Tribunals', in: P. Nikken (ed.), The Modern World of Human Rights: Essays in Honour of Thomas Buergenthal, IIDH/IIHR, San José, Costa Rica 1996, pp. 299-334
- Shelton, D., 'The Legal Status of the Detainees at Guantanamo Bay: Innovative Elements in the Decision of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights of 12 March 2002', 23 Human Rights Law Journal 13 (2002), pp. 13-14
- Shelton, D. (2004a), 'Case concerning Avena and other Mexican Nationals', 98 American Journal of International Law 559 (2004), pp. 559-566

- Shelton, D. (2004b), 'The Inter-American Human Rights System', in: H. Hannum (ed.), Guide to International Human Rights Practice, Transnational Press, Ardsley, NY 2004 (4th), pp. 127-141
- Shelton, D. (2005a), Remedies in International Human Rights Law, Oxford University Press, Oxford 2005 (2nd)
- Shelton, D. (2005b), 'Discussion', in: G. Cohen-Jonathan, J.-F. Flauss (eds.), Mesures conservatoires et droits fondamentaux, Bruyant, Bruxelles 2005, pp. 165-176
- Shelton, D. (2006a), 'Normative Hierarchy in International Law', 100 American Journal of International Law 291 (2006), pp. 291-323
- Shelton, D. (2006b), 'Subsidiarity and Human Rights', 27 Human Rights Law Journal 4 (2006), pp. 4-11
- Simma, B., The Charter of the United Nations, Oxford University Press, Oxford 1994
- Simma, B., 'International Human Rights and General International Law: a Comparative Analysis', IV(2) Collected Courses of the Academy of European Law 1993, Kluwer Law International, Dordrecht 1995, pp. 153-236
- Simma, B., 'Introduction: Fragmentation in a Positive Light', Symposium: Diversity or Cacophony?: New Sources of Norms in International Law', 25(4) Mich. J. Int'l L. 845 (2004), pp. 845-847
- Sivakumaran, S., 'Case Comment: Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Serbia and Montenegro)', 56(3) ICLQ 695 (2007), pp. 695-708
- Slaughter, A.-M., 'A Typology of Transjudicial Communication', 29 University of Richmond Law Review 99 (1994), pp. 99-135
- Slaughter, A.-M., 'Judicial Globalization', 40 Virginia Journal of International Law 1103 (2000), pp. 1103-1124
- Slaughter, A.-M., 'A Global Community of Courts', 44 Harvard International Law Journal 191 (2003), pp. 191-219
- Smeulers, A., In Staat van Uitlevering, Intersentia, Antwerpen 2002
- Smeulers, A., J. de Vries, 'Het Europees aanhoudingsbevel, gerechtvaardigd vertrouwen?', 28(4) NJCM 428 (2003), pp. 428-460
- Sohn, L.B., 'The New International Law: Protection of the Rights of Individuals rather than States', 32 American University Law Review 1 (1982), pp. 1-64
- Sohn, L.B., 'The Contribution of Latin American Lawyers to the Development of the United Nations Concept of Human Rights and Economic and Social Justice', in: P. Nikken (ed.), The Modern World of Human Rights: Essays in Honour of Thomas Buergenthal, IIDH/IIHR, San José, Costa Rica 1996, pp. 33-56
- Sorel, J.-M., 'Article 31', in: O. Corten, P. Klein (eds.), Convention de Vienne sur le droit des traités – commentaire article par article, Bruylant, Bruxelles 2006, pp. 1289-1338
- Sorel, J.-M., 'Les multiples lectures d'un arrêt: entre sentiment d'impunité et sentiment de cohérence, une décision à relativiser', 111 RGDIP 259 (2007), pp. 259-272
- Spielmann, A., D. Spielmann, 'La cour unique et permanente et les mesures provisoires', in: P. Mahoney et al. (eds.), Protecting Human Rights: the European Perspective, Studies in Memory of Rolv Ryssdal, Heymanns, Köln 2000, pp. 1346-1358
- Spijkerboer, Th., Case note CAT Gamal El Rgeig v. Switzerland, 22 January 2007, JV 160 (2007), pp. 660-661
- Spijkerboer, Th., Case note ECtHR Saadi v. Italy, 23 February 2008 (Grand Chamber), 33(7) NJCM 1005 (2008), pp. 1005-1017
- Spronken, T., Verdediging, een onderzoek naar de normering van het optreden van advocaten in strafzaken, diss. Maastricht, Gouda Quint, Deventer 2001
- Steenbergen, H., T. Zwart, Annotation of ECtHR Cruz Varas et al. v. Sweden, NJCM (1991), pp. 335 ff.

- Stephens, T., 'The LaGrand Case (Federal Republic of Germany v United States of America), The Right to Information on Consular Assistance under the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations: a Right for what Purpose?', 3 Melbourne Journal of International Law 143 (2002), pp. 143-164
- Steyn, J., 'Guantanamo Bay: the Legal Black Hole', 53 International and Comparative Law Quarterly 1 (2004) pp. 1-15
- Szabó, E., 'Provisional Measures in the World Court: Binding or Bound to be Ineffective?', 10 Leiden Journal of International Law 475 (1997), pp. 475-489
- Sztucki, J., Interim Measures in the Hague Court: an Attempt at a Scrutiny, Kluwer Law International, The Hague 1983

T

- Taillant, J.D., R. Picolotti, 'In the Wake of the Discussions on Reforming the Inter-American Human Rights System. Behind the Scenes at the OAS', in: J.E. Mendez, F. Cox (eds.), El Futuro del Sistema Interamericano de Protección de Los Derechos Humanos, Instituto Interamericano de Derechos Humanos (IIDH), San José, Costa Rica 1998, pp. 117-134
- Tams, C., 'Recognizing Guarantees and Assurances of Non-repetition: LaGrand and the Law of State Responsibility', 27 Yale Journal of International Law 441 (2002), pp. 441-444
- Tanaka, Y., 'Prompt Release in the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea: Some Reflections on the ITLOS Jurisprudence', Netherlands International Law Review 237 (2004), pp. 237-271
- Tanaka, A., Y. Nagamine, The International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination: A guide for NGOs, Minority Rights Group, London 2000
- Taqi, I., 'Adjudicating Disappearance Cases in Turkey: an Argument for Adopting the Inter-American Court of Human Rights' Approach', 24 Fordham International Law Journal 940 (2001), pp. 940-987
- Tatulli, J.R., 'UN report: Resolving Africa's Longest Civil War: Updates on the Case Concerning Armed Activities in the Democratic Republic of Congo', 19 New York Law School Journal of Human Rights 903 (2003), pp. 903-912
- Terlouw, A., 'Gepasseerd', Case note of Salah Sheekh v. the Netherlands, 32(2) NJCM 179 (2007), pp. 179-194
- Terlouw, A., 'De zaag in de stoelpoten van het absolute karakter van artikel 3 EVRM', Case note of ECtHR N. v. UK, 27 May 2007, 33(7) NJCM 1034, (2008), pp. 1034-1051
- Thirlway, H., 'The Indication of Provisional Measures by the International Court of Justice', in: R. Bernhardt (ed.), Interim Measures indicated by International Courts, Springer-Verlag, Berlin 1994, pp. 1-36
- Thomassen, W., 'Het kleine verschil en de grote gevolgen', 33(7) NJCM 930 (2008), pp. 930-935
- Thompson, J.J., 'La libertad de Prensa en el Sistema Interamericano', in: P. Nikken (ed.), The Modern World of Human Rights: Essays in Honour of Thomas Buergenthal, IIDH/IIHR, San José, Costa Rica 1996, pp. 231-254
- Thornberry, P., Indigenous Peoples and Human Rights, Manchester University Press, Manchester 2002
- Tittmore, B.D., 'Guantanamo Bay and the Precautionary Measures of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights: a Case for International Oversight in the Struggle against Terrorism', 6(2) Human Rights Law Review 378 (2006), pp. 378-402
- Tomuschat, C., 'Making Individual Communications an Effective tool for the Protection of Human Rights', in: U. Beyerlin (ed.), Recht zwischen Umbruch und Bewahrung: Völkerrecht, Europarecht, Staatsrecht; Festschrift für Rudolf Bernhardt, Springer-Verlag, Heidelberg 1995, pp. 615-634
- Tomuschat, C., 'Individual Reparation Claims in Instances of Grave Human Rights Violations: The Position under General International Law', in: A. Randelzhofer, C. Tomuschat (eds.),

- State Responsibility and the Individual: Reparation in Instances of Grave Violations of Human Rights*, Kluwer Law International, London 1999, pp. 1-25
- Tomuschat, C., Human Rights: Between Idealism and Realism, Oxford University Press, Oxford 2003
- Toufayan, M., 'Human Rights Treaty Interpretation: a Postmodern Account of its Claim to 'Speciality'', 2 NYU Center for Human Rights and Global Justice Working Paper 2005
- Toufayan, M., 'The World Court's Distress when Facing Genocide: a Critical Commentary on the Application of the Genocide Convention Case (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro))', 40 Tex. Int'l L. J. 233 (2005), pp. 233-261
- Treves, T., 'Conflicts between the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea and the International Court of Justice', 31 International Law and Politics 809 (1999), pp. 809-831
- Tridimas, T., The General Principles of EC Law, Oxford University Press, Oxford 1999
- Trouwborst, A., Evolution and Status of the Precautionary Principle in International Law, Kluwer Law International, the Hague/London/New York 2002
- Tushnet, M., L. Yackle, 'Symbolic Statutes and Real Laws: the Pathologies of the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act and the Prison Litigation Reform Act', 47 Duke Law Journal 1 (1997), pp. 1-86

U

- Udombana, N.J., 'Toward the African Court on Human Rights and Peoples' Rights: Better Late Than Never', 3 Yale Human Rights and Development L.J. 45 (2000), pp. 45-50
- Udombana, N.J., 'Can the Leopard Change its Spots? The African Union Treaty and Human Rights', 17(6) American University International Law Review 1177 (2002), pp. 1177-1261
- Udombana, N.J. (2003a), 'So far, so far: The local Remedies Rule in the Jurisprudence of the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights', 91(1) The American Journal of International Law 1 (2003), pp. 1-37
- Udombana, N.J. (2003b), 'Interim Measures: a Comparative Study of Selected International Institutions', 43 Indian Journal of International Law 479 (2003), pp. 479-532
- Umozurike, U.O., The African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague 1997
- Umozurike, U.O., 'The Complaint Procedure of the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights', in: G. Alfredsson, J. Grimheden, B.G. Ramcharan, A. de Zayas (eds.), International Human Rights Monitoring Mechanisms: Essays in Honour of Jakob Th. Möller, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague [etc.] 2001, pp. 707-712

V

- Van Alebeek, R. The Immunity of States and their Officials in the Light of International Criminal Law and International Human Rights Law, E.M. Meijers Institute of Legal Studies, Leiden University 2006
- Van Boven, Th.C., People Matter, Views on International Human Rights Policy, collected and introduced by Hans Thoolen, Meulenhoff, Amsterdam 1982
- Van Boven, Th.C., 'Facing Urgent Human Rights Cases; Legal and Diplomatic Action', in: R. Lawson, M. de Blois (eds.), The Dynamics of the Protection of Human Rights in Europe. Essays in Honour of Henry G. Schermers, (Vol. 3), Nijhoff, Dordrecht 1994, pp. 61-78
- Van Boven, Th.C., The Protection of Human Rights in Europe, Collected Courses of the Academy of European Law, Vol. IV(2) 1993, Nijhoff, The Hague 1995
- Van Boven, Th.C., Rapporteur, Study concerning the Right to Restitution, Compensation, and Rehabilitation for Victims of Gross Violations of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Final Report, E/CN.4/sub.2/1993/8, 2 July 1993; revised version E/CN.4/Sub.2/1996/17, 24 May 1996 and E/CN.4/1997/104, 16 January 1997

- Van Boven, Th.C., 'Prevention, Early-Warning and Urgent Procedures: A New approach by the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination', in: E. Denter, N. Schrijver (eds.), Reflections on International Law from the Low Countries, in Honour of Paul de Waart, Kluwer Law International, The Hague 1998, pp. 165-182
- Van Boven, Th.C., 'Rendering Justice to Victims: A Case for Reparations', in: W.J. M. van Genugten et al. (eds.), Realism and Moralism in International Relations, Kluwer Law International, The Hague 1999, pp. 197-211
- Van Boven, Th.C. (2000a), 'The Petition System under the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, A Sobering Balance-Sheet', in: J.A. Frowein, R. Wolfrum (eds.), Max Planck Yearbook of United Nations Law, Kluwer Law International, The Hague 2000, pp. 271-287
- Van Boven, Th.C. (2000b), 'Political' and 'Legal' Control Mechanisms: Their Competition and Coexistence', in: F. Coomans et al. (eds.), Human Rights from Exclusion to Inclusion; Principles and Practice, An Anthology from the Work of Theo van Boven, Kluwer Law International, The Hague 2000, pp. 49-72
- Van Boven, Th.C. (2001a), 'CERD and Article 14; The Unfulfilled Promise', in: G. Alfredsson et al. (eds.), International Human Rights Monitoring Mechanisms, Kluwer Law International, The Hague 2001, pp. 153-166
- Van Boven, Th.C. (2001b), 'Reparations; a Requirement of Justice', in: Corte Interamericana de Derechos Humanos, El Sistema Interamericano de Protección de los Derechos Humanos en el Umbral de los Siglo xxi, Corte Interamericana des Derechos Humanos, San José, Costa Rica 2001, pp. 653-670
- Van Boven, Th.C., 'La preambule dans la Convention de la Saufegarde de Droits de l'Homme Europeenne', in: J.E. Pettiti, E. Decaux, P.-H. Imbert (eds.), La Convention Europeenne des Droits de l'Homme, Commentaire article par article, Economica, Paris 1995 (2nd ed. 2002), pp. 125-134, also published in: F. Coomans et al. (eds.), Human Rights from Exclusion to Inclusion; Principles and Practice, An Anthology from the Work of Theo van Boven, Kluwer Law International, The Hague 2000, pp. 401-411
- Van Boven, Th.C., 'Agiza t. Zweden, Het Anti-Foltercomité scherpt het non-refoulement beginsel aan', 31(5) NJCM 746 (2006), pp. 746-758
- Van Boven, Th.C., 'Reparative justice – Focus on victims', SIM lecture 2007, 25(4) Netherlands Quarterly of Human Rights 723 (2007), pp. 723-735
- Van Boven, Th.C., C. Flinterman, F. Grünfeld, I. Westendorp (eds.), Seminar on the Right to Restitution, Compensation and Rehabilitation for Victims of gross Violations of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Maastricht, 11-15 March 1992, SIM Special No. 12
- Van Boven, Th.C., C. Flinterman, E. Rieter (1999), 'Nederland wil asielzoeker uitzetten in strijd met een interim maatregel van het VN-Comité tegen Foltering', 20 Nederlands Juristenblad 908 (1999), pp. 908-909
- Van Boven, Th.C., E. Rieter (2000), 'Nederland, het Internationale Gerechtshof en de doodstraf', 39 Nederlands Juristenblad 1921 (2000), pp. 1921-1922
- Vande Lanotte, J., Y. Haeck, Handboek Europees Verdrag voor de Rechten van de Mens, deel 1, algemene beginselen, Intersentia, Oxford 2005
- Vandenhoe, W., The Procedures before the UN Human Rights Treaty Bodies: Divergence or Convergence?, Intersentia, Antwerp 2004
- Van den Wyngaert, Ch., 'Applying the European Convention on Human Rights to Extradition: Ppening Pandora's Box?', 39 ICLQ 757 (1990), pp. 757-779
- Van der Mei, A.-P. (2005a), 'The New African Court on Human and Peoples' Rights: Towards an Effective Human Rights Protection Mechanism for Africa?', 18 Leiden Journal of International Law 113 (2005), pp. 113-129
- Van der Mei, A.-P. (2005b), 'The Advisory Jurisdiction of the African Court on Human and Peoples' Rights', 5(1) African Human Rights Law Journal 27 (2005), pp. 27-46

- Van der Velde, J., Grenzen aan het toezicht op de naleving van het EVRM, Stichting NJCM-Boekerij, Leiden 1997
- Van der Velde, J., 'Positieve verplichtingen', in: A.W. Heringa, J.G.C. Schokkenbroek, J. van der Velde (eds.), EVRM Rechtspraak en Commentaar, Koninklijke Vermande, The Hague 2002, pp. 1-22
- Van der Wilt, H., 'Après Soering: the Relationship between Extradition and Human Rights in the Legal Practices of the Netherlands, Germany and the United States', XLII (1) NILR 53 (1995), pp. 53-80
- Van Dijk, P., F. van Hoof, A. van Rijn, L. Zwaak (eds.), Theory and Practice of the European Convention on Human Rights, Intersentia, Antwerpen/Oxford 2006 (4th)
- Van Emmerik, M., Schadevergoeding bij schending van mensenrechten, De rechtspraktijk onder het EVRM vergeleken met die in Nederland, diss. Leiden, Leiden 1997
- Van Kempen, P.H.P.H.M.C., Heropening van procedures na veroordelingen door het EHRM. Over redres van schendingen van het EVRM in afgesloten strafzaken alsook afgesloten civiele en bestuurszaken, Wolf Legal Publishers, Nijmegen 2003
- Ventura Robles, M.E., La Corte Interamericana de Derechos Humanos, San José, Charla dictada el 20 de junio de 2001, en el XIX Curso Interdisciplinario en Derechos Humanos del Instituto Interamericano de Derechos Humanos
- Verdross, A., B. Simma, Universelles Völkerrecht, Theorie unter Praxis, Duncker & Humblot, Berlin 1984 (3rd)
- Verhey, L.F.M., 'Implementatie van het EVRM door de wetgever', in: A.W. Heringa, E. Myjer (eds.), 45 jaar EVRM 1950-1995, Speciaal nummer NJCM-Bulletin 21(1), Leiden 1996, pp. 103-116
- Vermeer-Künzli, A., 'As If: the Legal Fiction in Diplomatic Protection', 18(1) European Journal of International Law 37 (2007), pp. 37-68
- Vermeulen, B.P., Case note ECtHR Sheekh v. the Netherlands, 11 January 2007, JV 30 (2007), pp. 319-323
- Vermeulen, B.P., K.M. de Vries, Case note ECtHR (Grand Chamber) Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 4 February 2005, JV (2005), p. 89
- Viljoen, F., E. Baimu, 'Courts for Africa: Considering the Coexistence of the African Court on Human and Peoples' Rights and the African Court of Justice', 22(2) Netherlands Quarterly of Human Rights 241 (2004), pp. 241-267
- Viljoen, F., L. Louw, 'The Status of the Findings of the African Commission: From Moral Persuasion to Legal Obligation', 48 Journal of African Law 1 (2004), pp. 1-22
- Vivanco, J.M., 'Fortalecer o reformar el Sistema Interamericano', in: J.E. Mendez, F. Cox (eds.), El Futuro del Sistema Interamericano de Protección de Los Derechos Humanos, IIDH San José, Costa Rica 1998, pp. 51-72
- Vlemminx, F.M.C. (2002a), Een nieuw profiel van de grondrechten: een analyse van de prestatieplichten ingevolge klassieke en sociale grondrechten, Boom Juridische uitgevers, Den Haag 2002 (3rd Rev.)
- Vlemminx, F.M.C. (2002b), 'De autonome rechtstreekse werking van het EVRM; De Belgische en Nederlandse rechtspraak over verzekeringsplichten ingevolge het EVRM – Preadvies uitgebracht voor de Nederlandse Vereniging Voor Rechtsvergelijking op 19 december 2002 te Maastricht', 62 Geschriften van de Nederlandse Vereniging voor Rechtsvergelijking 1 (2002), pp. 1-120
- Volio Jiménez, F., 'La Protección de los Derechos Humanos', in: P. Nikken (ed.), The Modern World of Human Rights: Essays in Honour of Thomas Buergenthal, IIDH/IIHR, San José, Costa Rica 1996, pp. 287-298
- Vos, E., G. van Calster (eds.), Risico en voorzorg in de rechtsmaatschappij, Intersentia, Antwerpen 2004

W

- Warbrick, C., 'Interim Protection from Genocide', 52 Cambridge Law Journal 367 (1993), pp. 367-371
- Weckel, Ph., 'Les mesures conservatoires devant les juridictions internationales de caractère universel', in: G. Cohen-Jonathan, J.-F. Flauss (eds.), Mesures conservatoires et droits fondamentaux, Bruyant, Bruxelles 2005, pp. 33-53
- Weckel, Ph., 'L'arrêt sur le Génocide: le souffle de l'avis de 1951 n'a pas transporté la Cour', 111 RGDIP 305 (2007), pp. 305-331
- Weiser, I., 'Undressing the window: Treating International Human Rights Law meaningfully in the Canadian Commonwealth System', 37 U.B.C. Law Review 113 (2004), pp. 1-34
- Welch, C.E., Protecting Human Rights in Africa: Roles and Strategies of Non-Governmental Organizations, University of Pennsylvania Press, Philadelphia 1995
- Wellens, K., 'Diversity in Secondary Rules and the Unity of International Law: Some Reflections on Current Trends', 25 Netherlands Yearbook of International Law 3 (1994), pp. 3-37
- Wellens, K. (1998a) (ed.), International Law: Theory and Practice; Essays in Honour of Eric Suy, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague 1998
- Wellens, K. (1998b), 'Reflections on some Recent Incidental Proceedings before the International Court of Justice', in: E. Denters, N. Schrijver (eds.), Reflections on International Law from the Low Countries in Honour of Paul de Waart, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, The Hague 1998, pp. 417-441
- Wellens, K., Remedies against International Organisations, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge 2002
- Wellens, K., R. Huesa-Vinaixa, L'influence des sources sur l'unité et la fragmentation du droit international, Bruylant, Brussels 2006
- Westendorp, I., Women and Housing: Gender makes a Difference, diss., Intersentia, Antwerp 2007
- Wibisana, M.R.A.G., Law and Economic Analysis of the Precautionary Principle, diss., Maastricht 2008
- Wiebalck, A., 'Genocide in Bosnia and Herzegovina? Exploring the Parameters of Interim Measures of Protection at the ICJ', 28(1) Comparative and International Law Journal of Southern Africa 83 (1995), pp. 83-106
- Wijnakker, C., 'NJCM-Commentaar op de regelgeving over het toedienen van dwangvoeding, Duidelijke regelgeving met betrekking tot het toedienen van dwangvoeding aan gedetineerden broodnodig', 31(3) NJCM 434 (2006), pp. 434-449
- Willems, J., Wie zal de opvoeders opvoeden? Kindermishandeling en het recht van het kind op persoonswording, diss. Maastricht, T.M.C. Asser Press, Den Haag 1998
- Wilson, R.J., 'Researching the Jurisprudence of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights: a legislator's perspective', 10 American University International Journal of Law and Policy 1 (1994-1995), pp. 1-18 (in 1997 this Journal was renamed American University International Law Review), for the text see also <<http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/cases/commissn.htm>> (accessed 26 July 2005)
- Wilson, R.J., 'Defying World Law in the Angel Breard Case, State Department Dishonored Our Treaty Obligations', Legal Times of Washington (27 April 1998)
- Wilson, R.J., 'The Index of Individual Case Reports of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights: 1994-1999', 16 American University International Law Review 353 (2001), pp. 353-647
- Wiseberg, L., 'Protecting Human Rights Activists and NGOs: what more can be done?', 13(4) Human Rights Quarterly 525 (1991), pp. 525-544
- Woltjer, A., Case note ECtHR Sheekh v. the Netherlands, 11 January 2007, EHRC 36 (2007), pp. 362-363
- Woltjer, A., Case note ECtHR Olaechea Cahuas v. Spain, 10 August 2006, EHRC (2006), p. 128

Y

- Yang, Q., 'Thou shalt not violate provisional measures', 60 Cambridge Law Journal 441 (2001) pp. 441-446
- Yoo, J.C., J.C. Ho, 'The Status of Terrorists', 44 Virginia Journal of International Law 207 (2003), pp. 207-228
- Young, K., 'UNHCR and ICRC in the Former Yugoslavia: Bosnia-Herzegovina', 83(843) IRRC 781 (2001), pp. 781-805
- Young, K., The Law and Process of the U.N. Human Rights Committee, Transnational Publishers Ardsley NY 2002
- Young, L., 'Setting Sail with the Charming Betsy: Enforcing the International Court of Justice's Avena Judgment in Federal habeas corpus Proceedings', 89 Minnesota Law Review 890, (2005) pp. 890-915

Z

- Zezeza, P.T., P.J. McConaughay, Human Rights, the Rule of Law, and Development in Africa, University of Pennsylvania Press, Philadelphia 2004
- Ziemele, I. (ed.), Reservations to Human Rights Treaties and the Vienna Convention Regime: Conflict, Harmony or Reconciliation, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, Boston/Leiden 2004
- Zwaak, L., International Human Rights Procedures: Petitioning the ECHR, CCPR and CERD, Ars Aequi Libri, Nijmegen 1991
- Zwaak, L., 'The Role of the Council of Europe and its Committee of Ministers, Analysing the Efficiency of Measures taken under Article 46(2) of the ECHR', in: I. Boerefijn, J. Goldschmidt (eds.), Changing Perceptions of Sovereignty and Human Rights, Essays in Honour of Cees Flinterman, Intersentia, Antwerp 2008, pp. 355-380
- Zwart, T. (1985a), 'Aan de Amerikanen overgeleverd; uitlevering, ECRM en voorlopige maatregelen', 10(7) NJCM 562 (1985), pp. 562-571
- Zwart, T. (1985b), 'Onrechtmatige eigenwijsheid', 10(1) NJCM 65 (1985), pp. 65-71
- Zwart, T., The Admissibility of Human Rights Petitions, dissertation Leiden, Nijhoff, Dordrecht 1994
- Zyberi, G., The Humanitarian Face of the International Court of Justice, Its Contribution to Interpreting and Developing International Human Rights and Humanitarian Law Rules and Principles, Intersentia, Antwerp/Oxford/Portland 2008

TABLE OF CASES

1 PERMANENT COURT OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE (PCIJ)

Orders granting or denying provisional measures

Sino-Belgian treaty case, Denunciation of the Treaty of 2 November 1865 between China and Belgium, Order of 8 January 1927	9, 14, 19, 22, 23, 46, 47, 52, 61, 79, 589, 594
Chorzów Factory (Indemnities) (Germany v. Poland), Order of 21 November 1927 (denied) ..	43, 44, 52
Free Zones of Upper Savoy and the District of Gex, Order of 19 August 1929	49, 88
Legal Status of the South-Eastern Territory of Greenland (Norway v. Denmark; Denmark v. Norway), Order of 3 August 1932 (denied)	11, 14, 50
Administration of the Prince von Pless (Germany v. Poland), Order of 11 May 1933 (denied)	61
Polish Agrarian Reform and the German Minority (Germany v. Poland), Order of 29 July 1933 (denied)	83
Electricity Company of Sofia and Bulgaria (Belgium v. Bulgaria), Order of 5 December 1939 ...	14, 16, 47, 89, 90, 927, 933

Judgments

Mavrommatis Concessions Cases, Judgment of 30 August 1924	22
--	----

Advisory Opinions

Minority schools in Albania, Advisory Opinion of 6 April 1935	509
--	-----

2 INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE (ICJ)

Orders granting or denying provisional measures

Anglo-Iranian Oil Co. (UK v. Iran), Order of 5 July 1951	14, 57, 61-64, 74, 731
Interhandel case (Switzerland v. US), Order of 24 October 1957 (denied)	62, 75, 76
Fisheries Jurisdiction (U.K. v. Iceland) & (FRG v. Iceland), Orders of 17 August 1972	10, 14-16, 27, 40, 43, 46, 63-65, 91
Nuclear Tests cases (Australia v. France) & (New Zealand v. France), Orders of 22 June 1973	20, 43, 47, 52, 62-64, 79, 99, 535, 536, 540, 707, 720, 789, 930, 932, 1083, 1094, 1102
Trial of Pakistani Prisoners of War (Pakistan v. India), Order of 13 July 1973 (denied)	76
Aegean Sea Continental Shelf (Greece v. Turkey), Order of 11 September 1976 (denied) . 16, 19, 50, 52, 63, 65, 80, 81
US Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran (Hostages case) (US v. Iran), Order of 15 December 1979	xii, 9, 10, 15, 23-27, 36-38, 40, 41, 43, 44, 52, 53, 56, 63, 64, 81, 80, 99, 329, 541, 1083, 1114
Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. US), Order of 10 May 1984	7, 11, 17, 37, 45, 52, 63, 64, 87
Frontier Dispute (Burkina Faso/Mali), Order of 10 January 1986	7, 10, 15, 18, 19, 26, 27, 37, 40, 47, 91, 95
Arbitral Award of 31 July 1989 (Guinea-Bissau v. Senegal), Order of 2 March 1990 (denied)	16, 38, 40, 50, 64

Table of Cases

Passage through the Great Belt (Finland v. Denmark) , Order of 29 July 1991 (denied) ...	xvii, 9, 15, 39, 40, 42, 44, 45, 51, 58, 64, 65, 75, 76, 80-83, 596
Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libya v. UK) & (Libya v. US) , Orders of 14 April 1992 (denied)	9, 17-19, 58
Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia & Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia) , Orders of 8 April and 13 September 1993	xxx, 6, 7, 9, 10, 17, 29, 37, 40, 44, 53, 57, 58, 60, 63, 64, 78, 87-88, 90, 91-95, 97, 9, 881
Request for an examination of the situation in Accordance with Paragraph 61 of the Court's Judgment of 20 December 1974 in the Nuclear Tests (New Zealand v. France) case, Order of 22 September 1995 (denied)	57, 79, 85
Land and Maritime Boundary between Cameroon and Nigeria (Cameroon v. Nigeria) , Order of 15 March 1996	7, 11, 18, 26, 27, 37, 41, 48, 64, 92, 597
Vienna Convention on Consular Relations/Breard (Paraguay v. US) , Order of 9 April 1998	9, 11, 31, 32, 45, 53, 55, 59, 89-94, 213, 589
Legality of the use of force (Serbia and Montenegro v. Belgium & US/Canada/France/Germany/Italy/Netherlands/Portugal) , Orders of 2 June 1999 (denied)	11, 64
LaGrand (Germany v. US) , Order of 3 March 1999	xi, xii, xxi, 6, 7, 9-11, 31-33, 45, 49, 53-55, 58, 59, 66, 87-90, 92-94, 97, 99, 122, 189, 199, 213, 240, 589, 6329, 881, 918-920, 923-925, 981, 1011, 1083, 1105
Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (Congo v. Uganda) , Order of 1 July 2000	xii, 11, 18, 26, 29, 37, 38, 45, 78, 91, 97, 98, 305, 328, 734, 735
Armed activities on the territory of the Congo (Congo v. Rwanda) , Order of 10 July 2002 (denied) ...	11, 19, 49, 50, 56, 65-70, 197, 747
Avena and other Mexican Nationals (Mexico v. US) , Order of 5 February 2003	xii, 9-11, 31-36, 45, 53, 55, 56, 59, 74, 77, 90, 92, 95, 96, 98, 100, 122, 124, 213, 241, 632, 791, 1084
Certain criminal proceedings in France (Congo v. France) , Order of 18 July 2003 (denied) ..	11, 16, 18, 45, 64, 70, 71
Case concerning Pulp Mills on the River Uruguay (Argentina v. Uruguay) , Orders of 13 July 2006 and 23 January 2007 (denied)	11, 19-21, 50, 52, 75-76, 791
Request for interpretation of the Judgment of 31 March 2004 in the case concerning Avena and other Mexican nationals (Mexico v. US) , Order for provisional measures of 16 July 2008	31, 34-36, 55, 59, 73, 91, 94, 122, 135, 213, 241, 629, 1084
Case concerning the application of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (Georgia v. Russia) , Order of 15 October 2008	10, 30, 133
Questions relating to the Obligation to Prosecute or Extradite (Belgium v. Senegal) , Order of 28 May 2009 (denied)	41, 55, 81, 88, 101, 558, 589, 700, 1073

Judgments

Corfu Channel (UK v. Albania) , 9 April 1949	808, 872
Anglo-Iranian Oil Co. , Judgment on preliminary objections of 22 July 1952	14, 57, 61-64, 74, 731
Nottebohm (Liechtenstein v. Guatemala) 2 nd phase, 6 April 1955	517
Arbitration Judgment of the King of Spain of 1906 (Honduras v. Nicaragua) , Judgment of 18 November 1960	100
The North Sea Continental Shelf Cases (Germany v. Denmark) and (Germany v. the Netherlands) , 20 February 1969	921
Nuclear Test Cases (New Zealand v. France and Australia v. France) , 20 December 1974	20, 43, 47, 52, 57, 62-64, 80, 86, 100, 101, 537, 726, 789, 933, 934, 1083, 1094, 1102
Border and Transborder Armed Actions (Nicaragua v. Honduras) , 20 December 1988	932
United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran (Hostages case) (U.S. v. Iran) , 24 May 1980	xii, 9, 10, 15, 23-27, 36-38, 40, 41, 43, 44, 52, 53, 56, 63, 64, 81, 80, 99, 329, 541, 1083, 1114

Military and paramilitary activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. US) , 26 November 1984 (jurisdiction and admissibility)	17
Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. US) , 27 June 1986	87, 95
Gabcikovo-Nagymaros (Hungary v. Slovakia) , 25 September 1997	75, 76, 85, 87, 657, 791
LaGrand (Germany v. United States) , 27 June 2001	xi, xii, xxi, 6, 7, 9-11, 31-33, 45, 49, 53-55, 58, 59, 66, 87-90, 92-94, 97, 99, 122, 189, 199, 213, 240, 589, 632, 881, 918-920, 923-925, 981, 1011, 1083, 1105
Avena and other Mexican Nationals (Mexico v. US) , 31 March 2004	xii, 9-11, 31-36, 45, 53, 55, 56, 59, 74, 77, 92, 95, 96, 100, 124, 213, 241, 632, 793, 1084
Armed activities on the territory of the Congo (DRC v. Uganda) , Judgment of 19 December 2005	29, 30, 37, 38, 78, 90, 91, 96, 97, 99, 305, 328, 734-735, 1083
Armed activities on the territory of the Congo (DRC v. Rwanda) , 3 February 2006 (Jurisdiction)	37, 200
Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Serbia and Montenegro) , 26 February 2007	xxx, 6, 7, 9, 10, 17, 29, 37, 40, 44, 53, 57, 58, 60, 63, 64, 78, 87-88, 90, 91, 95-97, 99, 881
Request for interpretation of the Judgment of 31 March 2004 in the case concerning Avena and other Mexican nationals (Mexico v. US) , 19 January 2009	31, 34-36, 55, 59, 73, 91, 94, 122, 135, 213, 241, 629, 1084

Advisory Opinions

Competence of the General Assembly for the admission of a State to the United Nations , 3 March 1950	197
Conditions of admission of a State to membership in the United Nations (Article 4 of the Charter) , 28 May 1958	199
Legal Consequences for States of the Continued Presence of South Africa in Namibia (South West Africa) Notwithstanding Security Council Resolution 276 (1970) , 26 January 1971	194, 401
Certain Expenses of the United Nations , 20 July 1962	887
Legality of the threat or use of nuclear weapons (request by General Assembly) , 8 July 1996 Nuclear weapons advice	20, 711
Legal consequences of the construction of a wall in the occupied Palestinian territory , 9 July 2004	203

Order in the context of a request for an Advisory Opinion

Applicability of the obligation to arbitrate under section 21 of the UN Headquarters Agreement of 26 June 1947 , Order of 9 March 1988	6
---	---

3 INTERNATIONAL TRIBUNAL ON THE LAW OF THE SEA (ITLOS)

Orders granting or denying provisional measures

M/V 'Saiga' case (St. Vincent and the Grenadines v. Guinea) , Order of 11 March 1998	7, 12, 18, 28, 38-41, 56, 57, 72, 76, 82, 83
Southern Bluefin Tuna Cases (New Zealand v. Japan) , Order of 27 August 1999	8, 13, 21, 73, 74, 76, 77, 82, 86, 791, 863, 872
The MOX Plant case (Ireland v. UK) , Order of 3 December 2001	8, 21, 46, 72, 73, 77, 82, 195
MOX Plant case (Ireland v. UK) , Suspension of proceedings on jurisdiction and merits and request for further provisional measures, 24 June 2003	8, 21, 46, 72, 73, 77, 82, 195
Case concerning Land Reclamation by Singapore in and around the Straits of Johor (Malaysia v. Singapore) , Order of 8 October 2003	8

Table of Cases

Judgments

M/V 'Saiga' case (St. Vincent and the Grenadines v. Guinea), Judgment of 4 December 1997 8, 21, 46, 72, 73, 77, 82, 195

4 ARBITRAL TRIBUNAL UNDER UNCLOS

Arbitral Tribunal constituted pursuant to Article 287, and Article 1 of Annex VII, of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea for the dispute concerning the MOX Plant, international movement of radioactive materials, and the protection of the marine environment of the Irish Sea, The MOX Plant case (Ireland v. UK), Order No. 3, suspension of proceedings on jurisdiction and merits and request for further provisional measures, 24 June 2003 74

5 CEDAW

A.T. v. Hungary, 26 January 2005, 2/2003 70, 132, 135, 138, 142, 431, 433, 443, 592, 595
General Recommendation 19 on violence against women, 29 January 1992 433

6 CERD

Lacko v. Slovakia, 9 August 2001, CERD/C/59/D/11/1998 770

7 COMMITTEE AGAINST TORTURE (CAT)

Mutombo v. Switzerland, 27 April 1994, CAT/C/12/D/13/1993 137
B. M'B. v. Tunisia, 5 May 1994 (inadm.), CAT/C/14/D/14/1994 132, 411, 433, 626, 754, 754
Tahir Hussain Khan v. Canada, 15 November 1994, CAT/C/13/D/15/1994 828
Ismail Alan v. Switzerland, 8 May 1996, CAT/C/16/D/21/1995 818
Mr. Kaveh Yaragh Tala v. Sweden, 15 November 1996, CAT/C/17/D/43/1996 818
X, Y and Z v. Sweden, 6 May 1998, CAT/C/20/D/61/1996 138
I. A. O. v. Sweden, 6 May 1998 (inadm.), CAT/C/20/D/65/1997 819
Cecilia Rosana Núñez Chipana v. Venezuela, 10 November 1998, CAT/C/21/D/110/1998 903
P. S. S. v. Canada, 13 November 1998, CAT/C/21/D/66/1997 137
Avedes Hamayak Korban v. Sweden, 16 November 1998, CAT/C/21/D/88/1997 303
José Arkauz Arana v. France, 9 November 1999, CAT/C/23/D/63/1997 768
T.P.S. v. Canada, 16 May 2000, CAT/C/24/D/1999/1997 828, 903, 904, 911, 982, 988, 1010, 1012
S.L. v. Sweden, 11 May 2001, CAT/C/26/D/150/1999 817
S. and S.A. v. the Netherlands, 11 May 2001, CAT/C/26/D/142/1999 821
B.S. v. Canada, 14 November 2001, CAT/C/27/D/166/2000 292
Dzemajl et al v. Yugoslavia, 21 November 2002, CAT/C/29/D/161/2000 443, 520, 714
J.A.G.V. v. Sweden, 11 November 2003, CAT/C/31/D/215/2002 138
T.M. v. Sweden, 18 November 2003, CAT/C/31/D/228/2003 290
Z.T. v. Australia, 19 November 2003, CAT/C/31/D/153/2000 138
Hanan Attia v. Sweden, 17 November 2003, CAT/C/31/D/199/2002 836
A.R. v. The Netherlands, 21 November 2003, CAT/C/31/D/203/2002 821
S.S. v. The Netherlands, 5 May 2003, CAT/C/30/D/191/2001 303
M.A.K. v. Germany, 12 May 2004, CAT/C/32/D/214/2002 140, 817, 822, 839
Luis Jacinto Rocha Chorlango v. Sweden, 22 November 2004, CAT/C/33/D/218/2002 303
Mafhoud Brada v. France, 17 May 2005, CAT/C/34/D/195/2002 772, 773, 904, 905, 988, 1010, 1013, 1035, 1055
Ahmed Hussein Mustafa Kamil Agiza v. Sweden, 20 May 2005, CAT/C/34/D/233/2003 266, 633, 819, 836, 837, 903-905, 983, 1035
R.T. v. Switzerland, 24 November 2005 (inadm.), CAT/C/35/D/242/2003 140, 980
Iratxe Sorzabal Díaz v. France, 3 May 2005, CAT/C/34/D/194/2001 768

Suleymane Guengueng et al. v. Senegal , 17 May 2006, CAT/C/36/D/181/2001	132, 141, 554-558, 1072, 1073
S.P.A. v. Canada , 7 November 2006, CAT/C/37/D/282/2005	821
I.A.O. v. Sweden , 15 November 2006, CAT/C/37/D/280/2005	819
Gamal El Rgeig v. Switzerland , 15 November 2006, CAT/C/37/D/280/2005	301, 822
C.T. and K.M. v. Sweden , 17 November 2006, CAT/C/37/D/279/2005	818
V.L. v. Switzerland , 20 November 2006, CAT/C/37/D/262/2005	139, 818, 1147
E.R.K. and Y.K. v. Sweden , 30 April 2007, CAT/C/38/D/270&272/2005	820
A.R.A. v. Switzerland , 30 April 2007, CAT/C/38/D/305/2006	784
Elif Pelit v. Azerbaijan , 1 May 2007, CAT/C/38/D/281/2005	266, 267, 836, 837, 904, 905, 1035, 1056
Adel Tebourski v. France , 1 May 2007, CAT/C/38/D/300/2006	266, 772, 905, 988, 1013, 1035
Nadeem Ahmad Dar v. Norway , 11 May 2007, CAT/C/38/D/249/2004	268, 768, 905, 953, 983, 984, 1035, 1036, 1055
C.A.R.M. v. Canada , 18 May 2007, CAT/C/38/D/298/2006	817, 836
L.Z.B. and her daughter J.F.Z. v. Canada , 8 November 2007 (inadm.), CAT/C/39/D/304/2006	768
K.A. v. Sweden , 16 November 2007 (inadm.), CAT/C/39/D/308/2006	820
Bachan Singh Sogi v. Canada , 16 November 2007, CAT/C/39/D/297/2006	268, 907, 989
T.A. v. Sweden , 22 November 2007, CAT/C/39/D/303/2006	820
M.X. v. Switzerland , 7 May 2008, CAT/C/40/D/311/2007	820
Z.K. v. Sweden , 9 May 2008, CAT/C/40/D/301/2006	820
R.K. et al. v. Sweden , 16 May 2008, CAT/C/40/D/309/2006	820

CAT discontinued case

J.R. v. the Netherlands , 124/1998, 19 November 1999 (disc.)	1021
---	------

CAT General Comments

General Comment 1, Implementation of Article 3 of the Convention in the context of Article 22, 21 November 1997	134, 266, 303, 818
General Comment 2 on Implementation of Article 2 by States Parties, 23 November 2007	134

8 HUMAN RIGHTS COMMITTEE (HRC)

Those situations, uncovered during the research for this book, in which the HRC used provisional measures but did not mention this in its View or inadmissibility decision, are indicated by an asterisk: *, followed by the date(s) of the provisional measure.

[Category I]¹

O.E. v. S. , 25 January 1978, 22/1977, CCPR/C/OP/1 at 5 (1984); 26 July 1978, CCPR/C/OP/1 at 6	113, 126, 129, 133, 269, 284, 785, 824, 954, 955
M.A. v. S. , 24 April 1979, com. no. 20/1977, CCPR/C/OP/1 at 5 and 20	313, 341
Moriana Hernandez Valentini de Bazzano (on her own behalf, as well as on behalf of her husband, her stepfather and her mother) v. Uruguay , 15 August 1979 (seventh session), CCPR/C/7/D/5/1977	122, 341, 345, 374
Pietraroia v. Uruguay , 27 March 1981, CCPR/C/12/D/44/1979	341, 673
Aumeeruddy-Cziffeffra et al. v. Mauritius , 9 April 1981, CCPR/C/12/D/35/1978	285
Sergio Ruben Lopez Burgos (submitted by his wife Delia Saldias de Lopez) v. Uruguay , 29 July 1981, CCPR/C/13/D/52/1979	404, 438
Lilian Celiberti de Casariego v. Uruguay , 29 July 1981, CCPR/C/13/D/56/1979	402, 436, 734

¹ See Chapter II (Systems), section 2.4.6 on the categories of HRC decisions.

Table of Cases

Raul Sendic Antonaccio (submitted by his wife Violeta Setelich) v. Uruguay, 28 October 1981, CCPR/C/14/D/63/1979	311, 340, 346, 785, 899, 959, 1023
Altesor v. Uruguay, 29 March 1982, CCPR/C/15/D/10/1977	113, 339, 340, 343, 669
Bleier v. Uruguay, 29 March 1982, CCPR/C/15/D/30/1978	321, 809, 872
Guerrero v. Colombia, 31 March 1982, CCPR/C/15/D/45/1979	10, 317, 408, 411, 444, 531, 601, 614, 965
Teti Izquierdo v. Uruguay, 1 April 1982, CCPR/C/15/D/73/1981 (See also Rule 91 of 24 October 1980, CCPR/C/OP/1, p. 7)	313, 346, 347, 441, 673
Dermitt Barbato (submitted by Mr. Gilmet Dermitt on behalf of his cousins) v. Uruguay, 21 October 1982, CCPR/C/17/D/84/1981	319, 445
E.H.P. v. Canada, 27 October 1982 (inadm.), CCPR/C/17/D/67/1980	541
Dave Marais v. Madagascar, 24 March 1984, CCPR/C/18/D/49/1979	115, 313, 321, 343, 344, 348, 388, 440, 901
Daniel Monguya Mbenge v. Zaire, 25 March 1983, CCPR/C/18/D/16/1977	439
Vasilskis v. Uruguay, 31 March 1983, CCPR/C/18/D/1980	343, 375, 845
E.W. and others v. the Netherlands, 8 April 1993 (inadm.), CCPR/C/47/D/429/1990	538
Drescher Caldas (represented by his wife Ibarburu de Drescher) v. Uruguay, 21 July 1983, 43/1979, CCPR/C/OP/2, p. 80	313, 341
Estradet Cabreira v. Uruguay, 21 July 1983, CCPR/C/19/D/105/1981	343, 960
Almeida de Quinteros v. Uruguay, 21 July 1983, CCPR/C/19/D/107/1981	116, 320
Almirati Nieto (submitted by Almirati Garcia) v. Uruguay, 25 July 1983, CCPR/C/19/D/92/1981	122
Oxandabarat Scarrone v. Uruguay, 4 November 1983, CCPR/C/20/D/103/1981	375, 673
Martinez Machado v. Uruguay, 4 November 1983, CCPR/C/20/D/83/1981	122, 123, 313
Manera Lluberas v. Uruguay, 6 April 1984, CCPR/C/21/D/123/1982	115, 673, 960
Muteba v. Zaire, 24 July 1984, CCPR/C/22/D/124/1982	115, 348, 388, 389
A.D. (on behalf of the Mikmaq Tribal Society) v. Canada, 29 July 1984 (inadm.), 78/1980, CCPR/C/OP/2, pp. 23-25	497, 641
D.F. v. Sweden, 26 March 1985 (inadm.), CCPR/C/24/D/183/1984	626
John Wight v. Madagascar, 1 April 1985, CCPR/C/22/D/115/1982	344, 388, 440
Monja Jaona v. Madagascar, 1 April 1985, CCPR/C/24/D/132/1982	344, 440
Baboeram v. Suriname, 4 April 1985, CCPR/C/24/D/146/1983 and 148-154/1983	444
Hiber Conteris v. Uruguay (submitted by his sister Ilda Thomas), 17 July 1985, CCPR/C/25/D/139/1983	809
Lucia Arzuaga Gilboa (submitted by her aunt Felicia Gilboa de Reverdito) v. Uruguay, 1 November 1985, 147/1983, CCPR/C/OP/2, p. 176	343
Eric Hammel v. Madagascar, 3 April 1987, CCPR/C/29/D/155/1983, 3 April 1987 and CCPR/C/OP/2, pp. 11 and 179	344, 388, 440
Raul Cariboni (submitted by his wife Ruth Magri de Cariboni) v. Uruguay, 27 October 1987, 159/1983, CCPR/C/OP/2, p. 189	344
Lafuente Penarrieta, Rodriguez Candia, Ruiz Caceres and Toro Dorado v. Bolivia, 2 November 1987, CCPR/C/31/D/176/1984	115, 344, 785
Herrera Rubio v. Colombia, 2 November 1987, CCPR/C/31/D/161/1983	372
L.G. v. Jamaica, 26 July 1988 (inadm.), CCPR/C/33/D/285/1988	754
L.S. v. Jamaica, 26 July 1988 (inadm.), CCPR/C/33/D/286/1988	754
C.J. v. Jamaica, 26 July 1988 (inadm.), CCPR/C/33/D/252/1987, 12 August 1988 (See also X. v. S. , Rule 86/91 decision of 13 November 1987, CCPR/C/OP/2, p. 4)	754, 761
L.C. et al. v. Jamaica, 26 July 1988 (inadm.), 257/1987, A/43/40 (1988), pp. 269-271	754
O.W. v. Jamaica, 26 July 1988 (inadm.), CCPR/C/33/D/227/1987	119, 127, 754
Kitok v. Sweden, 27 July 1988, CCPR/C/33/D/197/1985	473, 474, 488, 498, 641
Hendriks v. the Netherlands, 27 July 1988, CCPR/C/33/D/201/1985	770
Robinson v. Jamaica, 30 March 1989, CCPR/C/35/D/223/1987	111, 244, 253, 685
Pratt and Morgan v. Jamaica, 6 April 1989, CCPR/C/35/D/210/1986 and 225/1987, 7 April (See also X v. S. , Rule 86/91 decision of 21 July 1986, CCPR/C/OP/2, p. 3) ...	124-125, 679, 688
A.A. v. Jamaica, 30 October 1989 (inadm.), CCPR/C/37/D/251/1987	107, 754, 776

H.G.B. and S.P. v. Trinidad and Tobago , 3 November 1989 (inadm.), CCPR/C/37/D/268/1987	674
Alfredo and Samuel Sanjuán Arévalo (submitted by their mother Elcida Arévalo Perez) v. Colombia , 3 November 1989, CCPR/C/37/D/181/1984	116, 320
A.W. v. Jamaica , 8 November 1989 (inadm.), CCPR/C/37/D/290/1988	756, 783
G.S. v. Jamaica , 8 November 1989 (inadm.), CCPR/C/37/D/369/1989 (* 15 September 1989, only Rule 86	756, 783, 811, 812
M.K. v. France , 8 November 1989 (inadm.), CCPR/C/37/D/222/1987	478
Bernard Ominayak, Chief of the Lubicon Lake Band v. Canada , 26 March 1990, CCPR/C/38/D/167/1984	115, 121, 125, 127, 451-454, 468, 470, 471, 498, 499, 597, 626, 638, 639, 674-677, 693, 780, 781, 800, 801, 855, 856, 980-982, 1024
D.F. v. Jamaica , 26 March 1990, CCPR/C/38/D/329/1988	783
R.A.V.N. et al v. Argentina , 26 March 1990 (inadm.), CCPR/C/38/D/345/1988	674
Delgado Páez v. Colombia , 12 July 1990, CCPR/C/39/D/195/1985, 23 August 1990	437
L.R. and T.W. v. Jamaica , 13 July 1990, CCPR/C/39/D/258/1987	754, 755
D.B. v. Jamaica , 13 July 1990, CCPR/C/39/D/259/1987	754, 755
C.B. v. Jamaica , 13 July 1990, CCPR/C/39/D/260/1987	754, 755
N.C. v. Jamaica , 13 July 1990, CCPR/C/39/D/278/1988	754, 755
Carlton Reid v. Jamaica , 20 July 1990, CCPR/C/39/D/250/1987	109, 239, 244, 247, 775, 816
Daniel Pinto v. Trinidad and Tobago , 20 July 1990, CCPR/C/39/D/232/1987	239, 243, 373, 680, 812, 813
Giry v. Dominican Republic , 20 July 1990, CCPR/C/39/D/193/1985	513
N.A.J. v. Jamaica , 26 July 1990 (inadm.), CCPR/C/39/D/246/1987	127, 755, 756
E.B. v. Jamaica , 26 October 1990, CCPR/C/40/D/303/1988	244, 754, 755, 776
W.W. v. Jamaica , 26 October 1990, CCPR/C/40/D/254/1987	109, 244, 754, 755
R.M. v. Jamaica , 26 October 1990 (inadm.), CCPR/C/40/D/315/1988	754, 755, 776
A. H. v. Trinidad and Tobago , 31 October 1990 (inadm.), CCPR/C/40/D/302/1988	112, 686, 688, 689
D.S. v. Jamaica , 8 April 1991, CCPR/C/41/D/234/1987	756
[Category II]
Paul Kelly v. Jamaica , 8 April 1991, CCPR/C/41/D/253/1987	109, 239, 240, 244, 246, 247, 250, 375, 684, 776, 816, 817
Irvine Reynolds v. Jamaica , 8 April 1991, CCPR/C/41/D/229/1987	253, 776, 818
D.D. v. Jamaica , 11 April 1991, CCPR/C/41/D/313/1988	754, 755
D.S. v. Jamaica , 11 April 1991, CCPR/C/41/D/304/1988	756
Michael Sawyers and Michael and Desmond McClean v. Jamaica , 11 April 1991, CCPR/C/41/D/ 226/1987 and 256/1987	130, 775, 813, 816, 818
M.F. v. Jamaica , 21 October 1991, CCPR/C/43/D/233/1987	754, 776
Aston Little v. Jamaica , 1 November 1991, CCPR/C/43/D/283/1988	246, 250, 684, 775, 776, 816
Raphael Henry v. Jamaica , 1 November 1991, CCPR/C/43/D/230/1987	244, 247, 250, 684, 775, 776, 814, 816
Willard Collins v. Jamaica , 1 November 1991, CCPR/C/43/D/240/1987	253, 443, 685, 774, 776, 815
G. J. v. Trinidad and Tobago , 5 November 1991, CCPR/C/43/D/331/1988	756
R.L., M.B. M.H. and 14 other members of the Whispering Pine Band v. Canada , 5 November 1991, CCPR/C/43/D/358/1989	473, 474
Wolf v. Panama , 26 March 1992, CCPR/C/44/D/289/1988	374
Glenford Campbell v. Jamaica , 30 March 1992, CCPR/C/44/D/248/1987	240, 244, 248, 816, 817
Delroy Prince v. Jamaica , 30 March 1992, CCPR/C/44/D/269/1987	814
Randolph Barrett and Clyde Sutcliffe v. Jamaica , 30 March 1992, CCPR/C/44/D/270/1988 and 271/1988	252, 253, 255, 440, 682, 683, 775, 776
Alrick Thomas v. Jamaica , 31 March 1992, CCPR/C/44/D/272/1988	245, 246, 811
N.A.J. v. Jamaica , 6 April 1992, CCPR/C/44/D/351/1989	127, 755, 756
M.F. v. Jamaica , 17 July 1992, CCPR/C/45/D/335/1988	754, 776
R.W. v. Jamaica , 21 July 1992, CCPR/C/45/D/340/1988	754

Table of Cases

Clifton Wright v. Jamaica , 27 July 1992, CCPR/C/45/D/349/1989.....	246, 775, 776, 778, 784, 816, 825
Parkanyi v. Hungary , 27 July 1992, CCPR/C/45/D/410/1990.....	374
C.F. v. Jamaica , 28 July 1992, CCPR/C/45/D/382/1989, 30 July 1992.....	254, 755
Trevor Ellis v. Jamaica , 28 July 1992, CCPR/C/45/D/276/1988, 26 August 1992.....	777, 948
M.R. v. Jamaica , 28 July 1992, CCPR/C/45/D/405/1990 (* 31 July 1991).....
K.C. v. Canada , 29 July 1992, CCPR/C/45/D/486/1992.....	269, 270, 284, 770
Glenmore Compass v. Jamaica , 19 October 1992, CCPR/C/49/D/352/1989.....	814
Carlton Linton v. Jamaica , 22 October 1992, CCPR/C/46/D/255/1987.....	109, 253, 685, 775, 776
Leroy Simmonds v. Jamaica , 23 October 1992, CCPR/C/46/D/338/1988.....	775, 776
E.E. v. Jamaica , 23 October 1992, CCPR/C/46/D/337/1988.....	756
Balkissoon Soogrim v. Trinidad and Tobago , 8 April 1993, CCPR/C/47/D/362/1989 (* 10 August 1989).....	686
Victor Francis v. Jamaica , 24 March 1993, CCPR/C/49/D/320/1988.....	250, 254, 797
Trevor Collins v. Jamaica , 25 March 1993, CCPR/C/47/D/356/1989 (* 25 May 1989)....	239, 244, 247, 250, 756, 776, 811, 812
Larrosa Bequiu v. Uruguay , 29 March 1993, CCPR/OP/2, p. 118 and CCPR/C/18/D/88/1981.....	343
Leaford Smith v. Jamaica , 31 March 1993, CCPR/C/47/D/282/1988.....	246, 684, 815
N.P. v. Jamaica , 5 April 1993, CCPR/C/47/D/404/1990.....	756
Bwalya v. Zambia , 14 July 1993, CCPR/C/48/D/314/1988.....	438
V.B. v. Trinidad and Tobago , 26 July 1993, CCPR/C/48/D/485/1991 (* 25 August 1992).....	797
Kindler v. Canada , 30 July 1993, CCPR/C/48/D/470/1991.....	233-235, 267, 282-283, 287-289, 771, 797, 821-833, 824, 1007-1010, 1024-1025
Glenmore Compass v. Jamaica , 19 October 1993, CCPR/C/49/D/375/1989.....	814
Bahamonde v. Equitorial Guinea , 20 October 1993, CCPR/C/49/D/468/1991.....	438
R.M. v. Trinidad and Tobago , 29 October 1993, CCPR/C/49/D/384/1989 (* 29 January 1990 (only 86)).....	756, 783, 816
Chitat Ng v. Canada , 5 November 1993, CCPR/C/49/D/469/1991.....	233-234, 267, 282- 283, 287, 291-292, 668, 703, 797, 821-822, 1007-1010, 1024-1025
Lenford Hamilton v. Jamaica , 21 March 1994, CCPR/C/50/D/333/1988.....	250, 368, 372, 684, 775, 776
O. Sara et al. v. Finland , 23 March 1994 (inadm.), CCPR/C/50/D/431/1990.....	122, 453, 455, 468, 640, 780, 799-801, 857, 860
Mohammed Bashir El-Megreisi (submitted by his brother Youssef El-Megreisi) v. Libya , 23 March 1994, CCPR/ C/50/D/440/1990.....	293, 320
Anthony Currie v. Jamaica , 29 March 1994, CCPR/C/50/D/377/1989 (* 13 November 1989).....	246, 250, 776, 884
Lloyd Grant v. Jamaica , 31 March 1994, CCPR/C/50/D/353/1988.....	246, 812, 814
R.M. v. Trinidad and Tobago , 31 March 1994, CCPR/C/50/D/476/1991.....	756, 783, 809, 813
Albert Berry v. Jamaica , 7 April 1994, CCPR/C/50/D/330/1988.....	240, 248
Dwayne Hylton v. Jamaica , 8 July 1994, CCPR/C/51/D/407/1990.....	443, 685, 686, 755, 783
George Winston Reid v. Jamaica , 8 July 1994, CCPR/C/51/D/355/1989.....	250
Mojica v. Dominican Republic , 15 July 1994, CCPR/C/51/D/449/1991.....	116
Peter Blaine v. Jamaica , 17 July 1997, CCPR/C/60/D/696/1996 (* 9 May 1996).....	217, 685, 762, 812
Lynden Champagnie, Delroy Palmer and Oswald Chisholm v. Jamaica , 18 July 1994, CCPR/C/51/D/445/1991.....	372
Theophilus Barry v. Trinidad and Tobago , 18 July 1994, CCPR/C/51/D/471/1992.....	578
Denzil Roberts v. Barbados , 19 July 1994, CCPR/C/51/D/504/1992.....	682, 754, 901, 997, 998
Peter Bradshaw v. Barbados , 19 July 1994 (inadm.), CCPR/C/53/D/489/1992.....	682, 754, 776, 901, 979, 997, 998
Albert Womah Mukong v. Cameroon , 21 July 1994, CCPR/C/51/D/458/1991.....	291, 319, 373
Länsman I: Ilmari Länsman v. Finland , 26 October 1994 (inadm.), CCPR/C/52/D/511/1992....	454, 488, 489, 633, 641, 800-802, 981
Coeriel and Aurik v. the Netherlands , 31 October 1994, CCPR/C/52/D/453/1991.....	478
Cox v. Canada , 31 October 1994, CCPR/C/52/D/539/1993.....	252, 267, 268, 283, 287, 288, 289, 668, 770-771, 822, 825, 827, 1007-1009

Darwinia Rosa Mónaco de Galliccho and her granddaughter Ximena Vicario v. Argentina , 3 April 1995, CCPR/C/OP/5, pp. 47-51 and CCPR/C/53/D/400/1990	532
Errol Simms v. Jamaica , 3 April 1995, CCPR/C/53/D/541/1993	756
Lloyd Rogers v. Jamaica , 4 April 1995, CCPR/C/53/D/494/1992 (* 14 July 1992)	756
Leroy Shalto v. Trinidad and Tobago , 4 April 1995, CCPR/C/53/D/447/1991	249
Lincoln Guerra and Brian Wallen v. Trinidad and Tobago , 4 April 1995, CCPR/C/53/D/575 and 576/1994	755, 777, 778, 947, 1030, 1031, 1054
Garfield and Andrew Peart v. Jamaica , 19 July 1995, CCPR/C/54/D/464/1991 and 482/1991	239, 443, 684, 814
Holder v. Trinidad and Tobago , 19 July 1995, CCPR/C/54/D/515/1992 (* 16 December 1992)	990
Michael Bullock v. Trinidad and Tobago , 19 July 1995, CCPR/C/54/D/553/1993	250, 254, 762
Clement Francis v. Jamaica , 25 July 1995, CCPR/C/54/D/606/1994	250, 254, 762
Lennon Stephens v. Jamaica , 18 October 1995, CCPR/C/55/D/373/1989, 25 October 1995 (* 15 September 1989 (only Rule 86) (Rule 86/91))	31, 248, 249, 443, 689, 811, 812
Bautista de Arellana v. Colombia , 27 October 1995, CCPR/C/55/D/563/1993	441, 607, 674
Bernhard Lubuto v. Zambia , 31 October 1995, CCPR/C/55/D/390/1990 (1995) (* 23 February 1990)	128, 237, 250, 948
Dennie Chaplin v. Jamaica , 2 November 1995, CCPR/C/55/D/596/1994 (* 23 August 1994)	685
Phillip v. Trinidad and Tobago , 15 March 1996, CCPR/C/56/D/594/1992 (* 16 December 1992 and 23 August 1993)	249, 252, 762, 817
Errol Johnson v. Jamaica , 22 March 1996, CCPR/C/56/D/588/1994	684
Peter Grant v. Jamaica , 22 March 1996, CCPR/C/56/D/597/1994	117, 314, 320, 437, 1023, 1054
Tshishimbi v. Zaire , 25 March 1996, CCPR/C/53/D/542/1993	116, 320
Laureano Atachahua (on behalf of his granddaughter Ana Rosario Celis Laureano) v. Peru , 25 March 1996, CCPR/C/56/D/540/1993	116, 320
George Graham and Arthur Morrison v. Jamaica , 25 March 1996, CCPR/C/52/D/461/1991 (* 25 October 1992)	126, 127, 239, 246, 810, 813
Daniel Pinto v. Trinidad and Tobago , 16 July 1996, CCPR/C/57/D/512/1992	680
[Category III]
Clyde Neptune v. Trinidad and Tobago , 16 July 1996, CCPR/C/57/D/523/1992 (* 11 December 1992)	370, 765
Dwayne Hylton v. Jamaica , 16 July 1996, CCPR/C/57/D/600/1994 (* 28 November 1994)	254, 442, 443, 686, 689, 755, 776, 783
Rickly Burrell (submitted by Phillip Leach) v. Jamaica , 18 July 1996, CCPR/C/53/D/546/1993 (* 9 June 1993)	247, 444
Vaihere Bordes and John Temeharo v. France , 22 July 1996, CCPR/C/57/D/645/1995	536, 860-861,
Eustace Henry and Everal Douglas v. Jamaica , 25 July 1996, CCPR/C/57/D/571/1994 (* probably on 11 January 1994)	249, 161, 368, 371, 1005
Michael Adams v. Jamaica , 30 October 1996, CCPR/C/58/D/607/1994	762, 797
Länsman II: Jouni E. Länsman et al. v. Finland , 30 October 1996, CCPR/C/58/D/671/1995	9, 454-457, 495, 633, 802, 858, 859, 864, 1024
Stewart v. Canada , 1 November 1996, CCPR/C/56/D/538/1993	298, 571-574, 576, 954, 957
B.L. v. Australia , 8 November 1996 (inadm.), CCPR/C/58/D/659/1995/Rev.1	571
Irvine Reynolds v. Jamaica , 3 April 1997, CCPR/C/59/D/587/1994 (* 23 August 1994) ...	253, 776, 818
Giosue Canepa v. Canada , 3 April 1997, CCPR/C/59/D/558/1993	576, 577, 800, 954, 955, 981
Neville Lewis v. Jamaica , 17 July 1997, CCPR/C/60/D/708/1996 (* 3 July 1996)	217, 690, 812
Patrick Taylor v. Jamaica , 18 July 1997, CCPR/C/60/D/707/1996 (* 25 June 1996)	246
Clifford McLawrence v. Jamaica , 18 July 1997, CCPR/C/60/D/702/1996	239, 248, 249, 816
A.R.J. v. Australia , 28 July 1997, CCPR/C/60/D/692/1996	827, 828, 954, 955
Francis Hopu and Tepoaitu Bessert v. France , 29 July 1997, CCPR/C/60/D/549/1993	477-481, 483, 484, 500, 596, 681, 862

Table of Cases

Robinson LaVende v. Trinidad and Tobago , 29 October 1997, CCPR/C/61/D/554/19938 (* 5 October 1993).....	244, 247, 252, 775
Ramcharan Bickaroo v. Trinidad and Tobago , 29 October 1997, CCPR/C/61/D/555/1993	119, 252, 686, 689
Maurice Thomas v. Jamaica , 3 November 1997, CCPR/C/61/D/532/1993 (* 30 April 1993)	245, 247
Byron Young v. Jamaica , 4 November 1997, CCPR/C/61/D/615/1995 (* 23 January 1995)	813, 815, 816
G.T. v. Australia , 4 November 1997, CCPR/C/61/D/706/1996	271, 291, 826, 827, 954, 956, 957
Nathaniel Williams v. Jamaica , 4 November 1997, CCPR/C/61/D/609/1995	254
Espinoza de Polay (on behalf of Polay Campos) v. Peru , 6 November 1997, CCPR/C/61/D/577/1994	118, 349, 785, 848
Anthony McLeod v. Jamaica , 31 March 1998, CCPR/C/62/D/734/1997	762, 814, 816, 817, 888, 1026
Abdool Saleem Yasseen and Noel Thomas v. Republic of Guyana , 30 March 1998, CCPR/C/62/D/676/1996 (* 7 February 1996).....	239, 244, 246, 249, 374, 684, 796, 993, 1026
Matthews v. Trinidad and Tobago , 31 March 1998, CCPR/C/62/D/569/1993	123, 263, 373, 671, 795
Deon McTaggart v. Jamaica , 31 March 1998, CCPR/C/62/D/749/1997 (* 11 April 1997).....	253, 814
Desmond Taylor v. Jamaica , 2 April 1998, CCPR/C/62/D/705/1996 (* 17 June 1996).....	246, 249, 762
Steve Shaw v. Jamaica , 2 April 1998, CCPR/C/62/D/704/1996 (13 June 1996)	246, 249, 762
Tony Jones v. Jamaica , 6 April 1998, CCPR/C/62/D/585/1994 (* 23 Aug. 1994).....	247, 253, 369, 684, 762
Victor Domukovsky, Zaza Tsiklauri, Petre Gelbakhiani and Irakli Dokvadze v. Georgia , 6 April 1998, CCPR/C/62/D/623/1995, 624/1995, 626/1995 and 627/1995 (* 2 March 1995 for Domukovsky; 10 March 1995 and 5 July 1996 for Gelbakhiani and Dokvadze)	219, 244, 252, 375, 680, 795, 949
Fray Deidrick v. Jamaica , 9 April 1998, CCPR/C/62/D/619/1995 (* 31 February 1995).....
Ian Chung v. Jamaica , 9 April 1998, CCPR/C/62/D/591/1994 (* 5 September 1994).....	443, 685
Beresford Whyte v. Jamaica , 27 July 1998, CCPR/C/62/D/732/1997 (* 10 January 1997).....	248, 369, 376, 813-816, 889
Everton Morrison v. Jamaica , 27 July 1998, CCPR/C/62/D/635/1995	249, 253, 369, 816
Clive Smart v. Trinidad and Tobago , 29 July 1998, CCPR/C/63/D/672/1995 (* 18 December 1995)	248, 249, 764, 776, 813, 984
Dole Chadee et al v. Trinidad and Tobago , 29 July 1998, CCPR/C/63/D/813/1998.....	816, 819
Andrew Perkins v. Jamaica , 30 July 1998, CCPR/C/63/D/733/1997 (* 10 January 1997).....	249
Silbert Daley v. Jamaica , 31 July 1998, CCPR/C/63/D/750/1997.....	240, 249, 443, 812, 888
Anthony Finn v. Jamaica , 31 July 1998, CCPR/C/63/D/617/1995 (* 30 January 1995)	248, 812, 814, 816, 817
Junior Leslie v. Jamaica , 31 July 1998, CCPR/C/63/D/564/1993.....	370, 685, 796, 1034
Hixford Morrison v. Jamaica , 31 July 1998, CCPR/C/63/D/611/1995 (* 9 January 1995 (Rule 86 only) and 15 February 1995).....	815
Irving Phillip v. Trinidad and Tobago , 20 October 1998, CCPR/C/64/D/594/1992.....	680, 943
Nicholas Henry v. Jamaica , 20 October 1998, CCPR/C/64/D/610/1995 (* 10 January 1995)	369, 371, 689
[Category IV]
Clive Johnson v. Jamaica , 20 October 1998, CCPR/C/64/D/592/1994 (* 5 September 1994).....	237, 244, 246, 762
Barrington Campbell v. Jamaica , 20 October 1998, CCPR/C/64/D/618/1995 (* 3 April 1995).....	685
McCordie Morrison v. Jamaica , 3 November 1998, CCPR/C/64/D/663/1995.....	247, 371, 796, 797
Leroy Morgan and Samuel Williams v. Jamaica , 3 November 1998, CCPR/C/64/D/720/1996 (* 2 September 1996)	369
Clarence Marshall v. Jamaica , 3 November 1998, CCPR/C/64/D/730/1996 (* 5 December 1996) ..	240, 244, 369, 377, 762, 816, 817, 949, 950

Table of Cases

Conroy Levy v. Jamaica , 3 November 1998, CCPR/C/64/D/719/1996, 25 November 1998 (* 2 September 1996)	240, 369, 762
Christopher Brown v. Jamaica , 23 March 1999, CCPR/C/65/D/775/1997 (* 13 November 1997 and 22 January 1999).....	240, 244, 248, 249, 253, 369, 814, 816, 1035
Desmond Amore v. Jamaica , 23 March 1999, CCPR/C/65/D/634/1995, 12 May 1999.....	796
Franklyn Gonzales v. Trinidad and Tobago , 23 March 1999, CCPR/C/65/D/673/1995, 30 April 1999 (* 12 January 1996).....
Trevor Bennett v. Jamaica , 25 March 1999, CCPR/C/65/D/590/1994	816
Samuel Thomas v. Jamaica , 31 March 1999, CCPR/C/65/D/614/1995 (* 23 January 1995)	249, 376, 762, 815, 816
Christopher Bethel v. Trinidad and Tobago , 31 March 1999, CCPR/C/65/D/830/1998 (* 17 September 1998)	738-739, 756, 778
Errol Smith and Oval Stewart v. Jamaica , 8 April 1999, CCPR/C/65/D/668/1995.....	246, 247, 249, 370, 684, 762, 796
Damian Thomas v. Jamaica , 8 April 1999, CCPR/C/65/D/800/1998, 1998.....	356
Vicente Barzana Yutronic (on his own behalf and on behalf of his two sons) v. Chile , 23 July 1999 (inadm.), CCPR/C/66/D/740/1997	441
Anthony Leehong v. Jamaica , 13 July 1999, CCPR/C/66/D/613/1995 (* 10 January 1995)	443, 685
Linderholm v. Croatia , 23 July 1999 (inadm.), CCPR/C/66/D/744/1997	805
Mohammed Ajaz and Amir Jamil v. Republic of Korea , 13 July 1999, CCPR/C/66/D/644/1995 (* 1 August 1995).....	813, 815
Ali Maleki v. Italy , 15 July 1999, CCPR/C/66/D/699/1996	846
Zephinah Hamilton v. Jamaica , 23 July 1999, CCPR/C/66/D/616/1995 (* 31 January 1995 (Rule 86 only))	248, 368, 372, 811
Osbourne v. Jamaica , 15 March 2000, CCPR/C/68/D/759/1997 (* 23 June 1997).....	123, 259, 260, 263, 670, 795
Higginson v. Jamaica , 15 March 2000, CCPR/C/68/D/759/1997,	260, 262, 670, 795
Dias v. Angola , 20 March 2000, CCPR/C/68/D/711/1996	438, 439
Michael Freemantle v. Jamaica , 24 March 2000, CCPR/C/68/D/625/1995 (* 3 March 1995)	253, 684, 685, 845
Michael Robinson v. Jamaica , 29 March 2000, CCPR/C/68/D/731/1996 (* 10 December 1996).....	111, 244, 253, 685
J.G.A. Diergaardt (late Captain of the Rehoboth Baster Community) et al. v. Namibia , 25 July 2000, CCPR/C/ 69/D/760/1997.....	470, 474, 475, 495
Eversley Thompson v. St. Vincent & the Grenadines , 18 October 2000, CCPR/C/70/D/806/1998 (* 19 February 1998).....	237, 994, 995
Dante Piandiong, Jesus Morallos and Archie Bulan (deceased) (submitted by Alexander Padilla and Ricardo III Sunga) v. the Philippines , 19 October 2000, CCPR/C/70/D/869/1999	111, 130, 208, 740, 795, 816, 899, 900, 902, 914, 918, 1015, 1016, 1031, 1032, 1054, 1055
Chongwe v. Zambia , 25 October 2000, CCPR/C/70/D/821/1998.....	438
Apirana Mahuika et al. v. New Zealand , 27 October 2000, CCPR/C/70/D/547/1993	494, 470, 494
Samira Karker on behalf of her husband Salah Karker v. France , 26 October 2000, CCPR/C/70/D/833/1998	270-271, 799, 954
Vakoumé and 28 other persons v. France , 31 October 2000 (inadm.), CCPR/C/70/D/822/1998	478-481, 801
Simlae Toala et al. v. New Zealand , 2 November 2000, CCPR/C/70/D/675/1995	768
Mansaraj et al.; Gborie et al. and Sesay et al. v. Sierra Leone , 16 July 2001	109, 111, 131, 900, 1031, 1032
Hendrick Winata and So Lan Li v. Australia , 26 July 2001, CCPR/C/72/D/930/2000	575, 576
Anni Äärelä and Jouni Näkkäläjärvi v. Finland , 24 October 2001, CCPR/C/73/D/779/1997	456, 803, 860, 861
Boodlal Sooklal v. Trinidad and Tobago , 25 October 2001, CCPR/C/73/D/928/2000	123, 223, 263, 671

Table of Cases

Devon Simpson v. Jamaica , 31 October 2001, CCPR/73/D/695/1996.....	252, 370, 372
Terrence Sahadeo (submitted by Margaret Paul on behalf of her brother) v. Republic of Guyana , 1 November 2001, CCPR/C/73/D/728/1996 (* 21 November 1996).....	249, 690, 817
[Category V]
Glenn Ashby v. Trinidad and Tobago , 21 March 2002, CCPR/C/74/D/580/1994	110, 111, 131, 680-681, 686, 778-779, 808, 900, 903, 989-990, 993-995, 1027-1032, 1059
Jiménez Vaca v. Colombia , 25 March 2002, CCPR/C/74/D/859/1999	438, 439, 975, 976
Rawle Kennedy v. Trinidad and Tobago , 26 March 2002, CCPR/C/74/D/845/1998, 28 March 2002 and public admissibility decision of 2 November 1999	109, 126, 237-238, 739-741, 243-244, 746, 787, 886
Higginson v. Jamaica , 28 March 2002, CCPR/C/74/D/792/1998	260, 262, 670, 795
R. S. v. Trinidad and Tobago , 2 April 2002, CCPR/C/74/D/684/1996	370, 371, 689, 741
Boodoo v. Trinidad and Tobago , 2 April 2002, CCPR/C/74/D/721/1996	373
Jayawardena v. Sri Lanka , 22 July 2002, CCPR/C/75/D/916/2000	442
José Antonio Coronel et al. v. Colombia , 24 October 2002, CCPR/C/76/D/778/1997	359
Jarle Jonassen and members of the Riast/Hylling reindeer herding district v. Norway , 25 October 2002 (inadm.), CCPR/C/76/D/942/2000	456, 862
Oral Hendricks v. Guyana , 28 October 2002, CCPR/C/76/D/838/1998.....	249
C. v. Australia , 28 October 2002, CCPR/C/76/D/900/1999	302, 303, 888, 954
Zheludkova v. Ukraine , 29 October 2002, CCPR/C/76/D/726/1996	370
Xavier Evans v. Trinidad and Tobago , 21 March 2003, CCPR/C/77/D/908/2000	238, 740
Jaime Carpo et al. v. Philippines , 28 March 2003, CCPR/C/77/D/1077/2002	238
Ngoc Si Truong v. Canada , 28 March 2003 (inadm.), CCPR/C/77/D/743/1997	801
Igor Lyashkovich and Mariya Staselovich (submitted by the latter on behalf of her deceased son and herself) v. Belarus , 3 April 2003, CCPR/C/77/D/887/1999, 24 April 2003	113, 797, 1054, 1055
Anton Bondarenko and Natalia Schedko (submitted by the latter on behalf of her deceased son and herself) v. Belarus , 3 April 2003, CCPR/C/77/D/886/1999	113, 797, 1054, 1055
Sholam Weiss v. Austria , 3 April 2003, CCPR/C/77/D/1086/2002	267, 294-296, 597, 772, 802, 844, 878, 901, 954, 978, 1002, 1015, 1033, 1055
J. Thevaraja Sarma (submitted by his father S. Jegatheeswara Sarma) v. Sri Lanka , 16 July 2003, CCPR/C/78/D/950/2000	116, 320, 321
Roger Judge v. Canada , 5 August 2003, CCPR/C/78/D/829/1998.....	112, 234, 238, 256, 288-291 668, 703, 771, 825, 884, 955, 1009, 1010
Omar Sharif Baban (also on behalf of his son Bawan Heman Baban) v. Australia , 6 August 2003, CCPR/C/78/D/1014/2001	271, 954
Azer Garyverdy ogy Aliiev v. Ukraine , 7 August 2003, CCPR/C/78/D/781/1997	240, 245
Floyd Howell v. Jamaica , 21 October 2003, CCPR/C/79/D/798/1998	109
Ali Aqsar Bakhtiyari and Roqaiha Bakhtiyari (also on behalf of their five children) v. Australia , 29 October 2003, CCPR/C/79/D/1069/2002.....	123, 133, 272, 356, 771, 772, 954, 961, 1017, 1067
Alfredo Baroy v. the Philippines , 31 October 2003 (inadm.), CCPR/C/79/D/1045/2002	236, 355, 356
Abduali Ismatovich Kurbanov (submitted by his mother Safarmo Kurbanova) v. Tajikistan , 6 November 2003, CCPR/C/79/D/1096/2002.....	813, 816, 818
Errol Pryce v. Jamaica , 15 March 2004, CCPR/C/80/D/793/1998	260, 262
Hak-Chul Shin v. South Korea , 16 March 2004, CCPR/C/80/D/926/2000	566, 567
Arsen Arutyunyan (submitted by his sister Karina) v. Uzbekistan , 29 March 2004, CCPR/C/80/D/917/2000	948, 1067
Mansour Ahani v. Canada , 29 March 2004, CCPR/C/80/D/1051/2002	131, 269, 285, 303, 304, 668, 703, 808, 820, 825, 826, 827, 901

Collin Smartt (submitted by his mother Daphne Smartt) v. Republic of Guyana , 6 July 2004, CCPR/C/81/D/867/1999	817
Gaibullodzhon Ilyasovich Saidov (submitted by his wife Barno Saidova) v. Tajikistan , 8 July 2004, CCPR/C/81/D/964/2001	246, 816, 1064
Steven Romans v. Canada , 9 July 2004, CCPR/C/81/D/1040/2001	303, 800
Lallman Mulai and Bharatraj Mulai (submitted by their sister Rookmin Mulai) v. Republic of Guyana , 20 July 2004, CCPR/C/81/D/811/1998	816, 825
Ramil Rayos v. the Philippines , 27 July 2004, CCPR/C/81/D/1167/2003	239
Bakhrom Khomidov (submitted by his mother Saodat Khomidova) v. Tajikistan , 29 July 2004, CCPR/C/81/D/1117/2002	372, 444, 817, 825
Mr. Deolall (submitted by his wife) v. Guyana , 1 November 2004, CCPR/C/82/D/912/2000	741
Jonny Rubin Byahuranga v. Denmark , 1 November 2004, CCPR/C/82/D/1222/2003	273, 830
Pagdayawon Rolando v. the Philippines , 3 November 2004, CCPR/C/82/D/1110/2002	239, 530
Länsman III: Jouni Länsman, Eino Länsman and the Muotkatunturi Herdsmen's Committee v. Finland , 17 March 2005, CCPR/C/83/D/1023/2001	177, 456, 457, 638
Maryam Khalilova on behalf of her son Validzhon Alievich Khalilov v. Tajikistan , 30 March 2005, CCPR/C/83/D/973/2001	902
Anthony Michael Fernando v. Sri Lanka , 31 March 2005, CCPR/C/83/D/1189/2003	11, 411-414, 1073- 1075
Abdukarim Boimurodov on behalf of son Mustafakul Boimurodov v. Tajikistan , 20 October 2005, CCPR/C/85/D/1042/2001	948
Lawrence Chan v. Guyana , 31 October 2005, CCPR/C/85/D/913/2000	741
Nazira Sirageva on behalf of her son Danis Siragev v. Uzbekistan , 1 November 2005, CCPR/C/85/D/907/2000	948
Hazerat Hussain and Sumintra Singh v. Guyana , 25 October 2005, CCPR/C/85/D/862/1999	741
Davlatbibi Shukurova on behalf of her husband Dovud and his brother Sherali Nazriev v. Tajikistan , 16 March 2006, CCPR/C/86/D/1044/2002	902, 905
Nadezhda Agabekova on behalf of her son Valery Agabekov v. Uzbekistan , 16 March 2006, CCPR/C/89/D/1071/2002	948
Raymond Persaud and Rampersaud v. Guyana , 21 March 2006, CCPR/C/86/D/812/1998	741
Louisa Bousroual (on behalf of her husband Salah Saker) v. Algeria , 30 March 2006, CCPR/C/86/D/992/2001	321
Daljit Singh v. Canada , 30 March 2006 (inadm.), CCPR/C/86/D/1315/2004	272, 823
D. and E. and their two children v. Australia , 11 July 2006, CCPR/C/87/D/1050/2002	270, 798
Dawood Khan v. Canada , 25 July 2006, CCPR/C/87/D/1302/2004	828
Dahanayake and 41 others v. Sri Lanka , 25 July 2006 (inadm.), CCPR/C/87/D/1331/2004	520
Brun v. France , 18 October 2006 (inadm.), CCPR/C/88/D/1453/2006	865
Larisa Tarasova on behalf of her son Alexander Kornetov v. Uzbekistan , 20 October 2006, CCPR/C/88/D/1057/2002	948
Mohammed Alzery v. Sweden , 25 October 2006, CCPR/C/88/D/1416/2005	271, 784, 836, 901
Jagjit Singh Bhullar v. Canada , 31 October 2006 (inadm.), CCPR/C/88/D/982/2001	768
Taghi Khadje v. the Netherlands , 31 October 2006 (inadm.), CCPR/C/88/D/1438/2005	797
Sultanova v. Uzbekistan , 30 March 2006, CCPR/C/86/D/915/2000	905
Walter Obodzinsky v. Canada , 19 March 2007, CCPR/C/89/D/1124/2002	571
Afuson Njaru v. Cameroon , 19 March 2007, CCPR/C/89/D/1353/2005	442
Humanitarian Law Center v. Serbia , 26 March 2007 (inadm.), CCPR/C/89/D/1355/2005	414
Sid Ahmed Aber v. Algeria , 13 July 2007, CCPR/C/90/D/1439/2005	414
Shevkkhie Tulyaganova v. Uzbekistan , 20 July 2007, CCPR/C/90/D/1041/2001	902
Matlyuba Khudayberganova on behalf of her son Iskandar Khudayberganov v. Uzbekistan , 24 July 2007, CCPR/C/90/D/1140/2002	948
Roza Uteeva on behalf of her brother Azamat Uteev v. Uzbekistan , 26 October 2007, CCPR/C/91/D/1150/2003	133, 902, 1031, 1065

Table of Cases

Blanca Lilia Londoño Soto, Oscar Alberto Teran Cano, Maria Hercilia Cano Bedoya, Lina Marcela Teran Londoño, and Lilia Andrea Teran Londoño v. Australia , 1 April 2008 (inadm.), CCPR/C/92/D/1429/2005	830
Dissanayake, Mudiyanseelage Sumanaweera Banda v. Sri Lanka , 22 July 2008, CCPR/C/93/D/1373/ 2005	125, 706
M.G. v. Germany , 23 July 2008, CCPR/C/93/D/1482/2006	571
Maksudov & Rakhidov; Tashbaev & Pirmatov v. Kyrgyzstan , 16 July 2008, CCPR/C/93/D/1461, 1462, 1476& 1477/2006	271

HRC documents other than inadmissibility decisions and Views

General Comments

General Comment 6 (16) on Article 2 ICCPR (right to life), 30 April 1982, A/37/40 (1982), Annex V (pp. 93-94)	239, 287, 279, 318, 536, 862
General Comment 8 (16) on the right to liberty and security of persons (Article 9), 28 July 1982, A/37/40 (1982) Annex V (pp. 95-96); CCPR/C/21/Rev.1, (pp. 7-8)	248
General Comment 12 (21) on Article 1 ICCPR (1984), HRI/GEN/1/Rev. 6, pp. 134-135, A/39/40 (1984) Annex VI (pp. 142-143)	470
General Comment 13 (21) on Article 14, 13 April 1982, A/39/40 (1984) Annex VI (pp. 143-147)	279
General Comment 15 (27) on the position of aliens, 22 July 1986, A/41/40 (1986) Annex VI (pp. 117-119)	510
General Comment 17 (35) on Article 24, 5 April 1989, A/44/40 (1989) Annex VI (pp. 173-175); CCPR/C/21/Rev.1, (pp. 21-23)	534
General Comment 20 (44) on torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment (Article 7), 3 April 1992, A/47/40 (1992), Annex VI (pp. 193-195)	259, 282, 285, 291, 432
General Comment 21 (44) on the right to humane treatment in detention (Article 10), 10 April 1992, A/47/40 (1992), Annex VI (pp. 195-198)	372, 374
General Comment 23 (50) on Article 27 (1994), A/49/40, Vol. I (1994) Annex V (pp. 107-110)	470, 474, 477, 488, 494, 495
General Comment 24 (52) on reservations to the ICCPR or the Optional Protocols, 4 November 1994, A/50/40, Vol. I (1995) Annex V (pp. 119-125) 68, 198, 207, 398, 477, 491, 492, 689, 490, 533, 711, 724, 740-741, 887
General Comment 29 (72) on states of emergency (Article 4), 4 July 2001	207, 287, 374, 397, 398 490, 510, 703, 704, 705-708, 712, 714, 724, 1093
General Comment 31 (80) on the nature of the general legal obligation imposed on States parties to the Covenant (Article 2), 29 March 2004, A/59/40, Vol. I, Annex III (pp. 175-179)	207, 282, 303, 432, 531, 587, 592, 637, 658, 669, 670, 677, 679-688, 734-735, 887, 899, 901, 902
General Comment 32, Article 14, Right to equality before courts and tribunals and to a fair trial, 23 August 2007, CCPR/C/GC/32	240, 279
General Comment 33 (94), The Obligations of States Parties under the Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 5 November 2008, CCPR/C/GC/33 ... 196, 415, 884, 886, 901

Published decisions to take provisional measures and transmit the case (as well as decisions to discontinue the case)

Teti Izquierdo v. Uruguay , 24 October 1980 (Rule 91 decision), 73/1981, CCPR/C/OP/1 at 7 (1984)	313, 346, 347, 441, 673
O.E. v. S. , 26 July 1978, 22/1977, CCPR/C/OP/1 at 6 (1984)	111, 124, 127, 130, 267, 281, 339, 784, 821, 954, 955
O.E. v. S. , 27 October 1978 (disc.), 22/1977, CCPR/C/OP/1 at 35 (1984)	111, 124, 127, 130, 267, 281, 339, 784, 821, 954, 955

Published admissibility decision

Rawle Kennedy v. Trinidad and Tobago , admissibility decision of 2 November 1999, CCPR/C/76/D/845/1999 or A/55/40, vol. II, Annex XI.A.....	109, 126, 237-238, 739-741, 243-244, 746, 787, 886
---	---

Discontinued HRC cases (disc.) (unpublished)

Lloyd Reece v. Jamaica , 247/1987, undated (disc.) (* 12 November 1987 (transmitted 27 November 1987), also March 1988, 2 November 1989 and 24 March 1992)	107, 117- 118, 130, 802, 1034
A.A.T. v. Hungary , 543/1993, 1994 (disc.) (* 2 June 1993).....	119, 129-130, 268-269, 271, 825, 954
H.M. v. Jamaica , 595/1994, 3 August 1995 (disc.) (* 8 Nov. 1994)	132
V. v. Spain , 495/1992, June 1995 (disc.) (* 22 May 1992)	133, 350, 357, 606
P. L.-B. v. Canada , 556/1993, 17 April 1996 (disc.) (* denied)	114, 304
Rockliff Ross v. Guyana , 703/1996, 10 December 1997 (disc.) (* 4 June 1996)	120, 121, 132, 994, 1027
F.M. v. Jamaica , 792/1996, undated (disc.) (* 4 December 1996).....
J.P.A.F. v. Canada , 620/1995, 13 August 1998 (disc.) (*denied).....	132, 576, 577, 799, 800
L. v. Canada , 621/1995, undated (disc.) (* denied)	576, 577
A.B. v. Canada , 622/1995, 1998 (disc.) (* denied).....	132, 576, 577, 800
E.O. v. Trinidad and Tobago , 636/1995, undated (disc.) (* 27 June 1995)
E.G. v. Canada , 738/1997, 17 November 1997 (disc.) (* 17 January 1997).....	122, 130, 267, 268, 799, 825, 826, 957
A. et al. (6 persons) v. Angola , 810/1998, 1 August 2000 (disc.) (* 10 March 1998).....	113, 130, 387
J.C.A. v. Costa Rica , 725/1996, July 2000 (disc.) (* denied).....	132, 800, 801
W. v. New Zealand , 773/1997, 66 th session (disc.) (* denied).....	527
J. v. Canada , 685/1996, April 2003 (disc.) (* denied).....
E.P. v. Trinidad and Tobago , 636/1995, 29 July 2003 (disc.) (* 27 June 1995).....	132

9 INTER-AMERICAN COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS (CIDH)

Miskito report relating to Nicaragua , 16 May 1984, Case 7964 (resolution regarding friendly settlement)	495
Yanomami v. Brazil , 5 March 1985, Case 7615, Res. 12/85	495
James Terry Roach and Jay Pinkerton v. US , 22 September 1987, Case 9647, Res. 3/87.....	236, 885
Dr. A. de Jesus Pedraza Becerra v. Colombia , 25 September 1992, 10.581, Report No. 33/92.....	441
Cheryl Monica Joseph v. Canada , 6 October 1993, 11.092, Report 27/93	770
The Haitian Centre for Human Rights et al. v. United States (Haitian refugees case) , 13 October 1993 (adm.), 10.675, Report 28/93	275-279, 284-285
Gallardo Rodríguez v. Mexico , 15 October 1996, 11.430, Report 43/96.....	545, 546, 852
The Haitian Centre for Human Rights et al. v. United States (Haitian refugees case) , 13 March 1997, 10.675, Report 51/96	278-281, 286
Juan Chanay Pablo v. Guatemala , 13 March 1997 (Friendly Settlement), 11.212, Report No. 19/97	430, 609, 610, 620, 655, 1003
La Tablada case (Juan Carlos Abella v. Argentina) , 1 November 1997, 11.137, Report 55/97.....	159, 365, 366
Tomás Porfirio Rondin ('Aguas Blancas' case) v. Mexico , 18 February 1998, 11.520, Report 49/97	410, 411, 531, 965
Father Ricardo Rezende v. Brazil , 7 April 1998, 11.287, Report 24/98	609, 620, 655
Baruch Ivcher Bronstein v. Peru , 3 March 1998 (adm.), 11.762, Report 20/98	560, 578, 580, 583, 609, 745-747, 975
Baruch Ivcher Bronstein v. Peru , 9 December 1998 (merits), 11.762, Report 91/98	560, 578, 580, 583, 609, 745-747, 975

Table of Cases

Minors in detention v. Honduras , 10 March 1999 (merits), 11.491, Report 41/99	359, 360, 379, 436, 447, 553, 655, 766, 962, 1068
Victor Saldaño v. Argentina , no case number, 11 March 1999, Report 38/99 (inadm.)	403
Newton Coutinho Mendes et al. v. Brazil , 13 April 1999 (merits), 11.405, Report 59/99	428, 606, 607, 617, 652, 1003
Juan de la Cruz Núñez Santana et al. v. Peru , 13 April 1999, 10.815, 10.905, 10.981, 10.955, 11.042, 11.136, Report. 55/99	322
Coard et al. v. US , 29 September 1999, 10.951, Report 109/99	399, 401, 403, 734
Mary and Carrie Dann v. US , 27 September 1999 (adm.), 11.140, Report 99/99	459, 460, 474, 485, 493, 885, 979, 980
Ignacio Ellacuría et al. v. El Salvador , 22 December 1999, 10.488, Report 136/99	322
Mary and Carrie Dann v. US , 27 December 2002, 11.140, Report 75/02	459, 460, 474, 485, 493, 885, 979, 980
Polay Campos v. Peru , 10 March 2000 (inadm.), 11.048, Report N° 32/00	848
Baptiste v. Grenada , 13 April 2000, 11.743, Report 38/00	375, 756, 1037
Shaka Sankofa aka Gary Graham v. US , 15 June 2000 (adm.), 11.193, Report 51/00	215-216, 236, 598, 629, 813, 1004,
Damion Thomas v. Jamaica , 15 June 2000 (adm.), 12.069, Report 54/00	338, 339, 375, 675
Leoncio Florian López et al. v. Peru , 3 October 2000 (adm.), 11.849, Report 65/00	360
Hugo Juárez Cruzat et al. v. Peru (Miguel Castro Castro Prison case) , 5 March 2001 (adm.), 11.015, Report 43/01	333-335, 845
Jorge Odir Miranda Cortez et al. v. El Salvador , 7 March 2001 (adm.), 12.249, Report 29/01	528, 529, 654, 766, 964, 965
Garza v. US , 4 April 2001 (adm.), 12.243, Report 52/01	165, 216, 217, 422, 908, 1005
Damion Thomas v. Jamaica , 4 April 2001 (merits), 12.069, Report 50/01	338, 339, 375, 675
Lamey, Mykoo, Montique & Daley v. Jamaica , 4 April 2001, 11.826, Report 49/01	237
Franz Britton AKA Collie Wills v. Guyana , 10 October 2001, 12.264, Report 80/01	315, 317
Joseph Thomas v. Jamaica , 3 December 2001, 12.183, Report 127/01	247
Manickavasagam Suresh v. Canada , 27 February 2002 (adm.), 11.661, Report 7/02	287, 829, 1007, 1013, 1033
Alladin Mohamed v. Trinidad and Tobago , 9 October 2002 (adm.), 12.401, Report 50/02	688
Domingues v. US , 22 October 2002, 12.285, Report 62/02	236, 1004
Shaka Sankofa aka Gary Graham v. US , 29 December 2003, 11.193, Report 97/03	216, 236, 600, 601, 632, 816, 1004, 1005
Napoleon Beazley v. US , 29 December 2003, 12.412, Report 101/03	908
Teodoro Cabrera García and Rodolfo Montiel Flores v. Mexico , 27 February 2004 (adm.), 735/01, Report 11/04	609, 850, 977
Jorge Alberto Rosal Paz v. Guatemala , 11 March 2004 (friendly settlement), 9618, Report 29/04	315
Mercedes Julia Huentao Beroiza et al. v. Chile , 11 March 2004 (friendly settlement), 4617/02, Report 30/04	461, 462, 492
Maya Indigenous Communities of the Toledo District v. Belize , 12 October 2004, 12.053, Report 40/04	460, 485, 498
Toronto Markkey Patterson v. US , 7 March 2005, 12.439, Report 25/05	236
Luis Rolando Cuscul Pivaral et al. v. Guatemala (persons living with HIV/AIDS) , 7 March 2005 (adm.), 642/03, Report 32/05	530
Persons deprived of freedom at Urso Branco prison, Rondônia v. Brazil , 21 October 2006 (adm.), P394-02, Report 81/06	163, 218, 337, 338, 376, 601 -603, 617, 643, 653, 662, 671, 672
Nicaragua v. Costa Rica , 8 March 2007 (inadm.), 1-06, Report 11/07	178
Prince Pinder v. Bahamas , 12.513, 12 October 2007, Report 79/07	261, 264

10 INTER-AMERICAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS (IACHR)

Provisional measures²

19 Tradesmen/19 Merchants v. Colombia , Order of 3 September 2004.....	406, 851
Adrián Meléndez-Quijano et al. (El Salvador, matter of) , Orders of 12 May and 26 November 2007	222, 406, 720
Alemán-Lacayo v. Nicaragua , Orders of 2 and 6 February 1996.....	852
Álvarez et al. v. Colombia , Orders of 22 July 1997-30 May 2001	600, 637, 643, 647, 651, 893
Bámaca Velásquez v. Guatemala , Orders of 30 June 1998-27 January 2009	408, 628, 758, 1046
Bámaca Velásquez v. Guatemala , Order of 27 January 2009 (Provisional Measures and Monitoring Compliance with Judgment)	758, 1046
Blake v. Guatemala , Orders of 16 August 1995-17 November 2004.....	98, 101, 320, 406, 607, 624, 626, 635, 636, 645, 661, 745, 835, 883, 968, 982
Boyce and Joseph v. Barbados , Order of 25 November 2004	217, 218, 224, 226, 239, 688, 796, 847, 892, 894, 1040, 1046
Bustíos-Rojas v. Peru , Orders of 5 June 1990-17 January 1991	152, 408, 1040, 1041
Caballero Delgado and Santana v. Colombia , Orders of 7 December 1994, 31 January 1997 (lifted), 16 April 1997 (reinstated)-6 February 2008	320, 766, 852, 854, 973, 974
Capital El Rodeo I & El Rodeo II Judicial Confinement Center v. Venezuela (Matter of) , Order of 8 February 2008.....	337, 338, 377, 601, 602, 651, 711, 752, 753, 1094
Cárcel de Urso Branco (Urso Branco Prison) v. Brazil , Orders of 18 June 2002-2 May 2008..	163, 218, 337, 338, 376, 601 -603, 617, 643, 653, 662, 671, 672
Carlos Nieto Palma et al. v. Venezuela , Orders of 9 July 2004 and 3 July 2007	406, 612
Carpio-Nicolle v. Guatemala , Orders of 4 June 1995-8 July 2004	850, 968
Castañeda Gutman v. Mexico , Order of 25 November 2005 (denied).....	222, 359, 545, 567, 568, 583
Cesti Hurtado v. Peru , Orders of 29 July 1997-14 August 2000 and 21 December 2005	349, 350, 360, 361, 544, 545, 689, 690, 974
Children and Adolescents Deprived of Liberty in the "Complexo do Tatuapé" of FEBEM (Brazil) (matter of; CASA Foundation) , Orders of 17 November 2005-10 June 2008.....	152, 337, 338, 359, 360, 376, 377, 567, 568, 599, 601, 652
Chipoco v. Peru , Orders of 14 December 1992 (President) and 27 January 1993	157, 542, 543, 568, 799
Chunimá v. Guatemala , Order of 15 July-1 August 1991.....	422, 611, 848, 849
Clemente-Teherán et al. v. Colombia , Orders of 23 March 1998-1 December 2003	427, 647, 665, 853
Colotenango (Guatemala) (matter of) , Orders of 22 June 1994-12 July 2007 (lifted)	408, 600, 613, 628, 757, 758, 849, 931, 968
Communities of the Jiguamiandó and of the Curbaradó v. Colombia , Orders of 6 March 2003-15 March 2005.....	410, 592, 643, 644, 653, 655
Constitutional Court Case v. Peru , Orders of 7 April 2000-14 March 2001-	205, 560-561, 627, 745, 746, 748, 891
Digna Ochoa and Plácido et al. v. Mexico , Orders of 17 November 1999-28 August 2001	159, 628, 647, 846, 853, 854, 891, 986
Eloisa Barrios et al. v. Venezuela , Order of 23 November 2004.....	504

² This refers to Orders granting or denying requests for provisional measures. The provisional measures by the Inter-American Court are presented in alphabetical, rather than chronological, order, because often they are maintained for a considerable period and regularly expanded. Consecutive Orders are listed by date of first Order; the last Order mentioned may not be the last Order in the matter, as many situations are ongoing.

Table of Cases

García Prieto family et al. (El Salvador) (Gloria Giralt de García Prieto et al.), Order of 26 September 2006.....	152, 160, 445, 446, 611, 973, 974
García Uribe et al. v. Mexico (Matter of), Order of 2 February 2006	752
Gallardo-Rodríguez v. Mexico , Orders of 20 December 2001-18 February 2002 and 11 July 2007	546-549, 553, 852
Guerrero Gallucci and Martínez Barrios v. Venezuela , Order of 29 November 2007	406, 612
Giraldo-Cardona v. Colombia , Orders of 28 October 1996-3 December 2001	408, 410, 444, 600, 613, 617, 966
Gómez-Paquiyaury brothers v. Peru , Order of 7 May 2004	218, 376, 379
Gutiérrez Soler v. Colombia , Orders of 11 March 2005-27 November 2007	406, 612
Haitians and Dominican of Haitian origin in the Dominican Republic v. Dominican Republic , Orders of 7 August 2000-26 May 2001,	409, 410, 502-506, 512, 513, 521, 524, 600, 607, 608, 628, 646-650, 834, 835, 892, 965, 983, 1001, 1002, 1040
Herrera-Ulloa v. Costa Rica (La Nación) , Orders of 6 April 2001-26 August 2002.....	580-582, 584, 991
Ivcher Bronstein v. Peru , Orders of 21 November 2000-14 March 2001	560, 578, 580, 583, 609, 745-747, 975
James et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago , Orders of 27 May 1998-28 February 2005	154, 156-159, 217-219, 223-227, 256, 621, 622, 645, 663, 689, 693, 742, 743, 749-752, 757, 779, 798, 849, 850, 854, 894-896, 908, 920, 950, 951, 985, 990, 991, 1015, 1040-1045
Kankuamo indigenous community v. Colombia , Order of 5 July 2005	460, 461, 643, 653
La Nación , see Herrera-Ulloa
Liliana Ortega et al. v. Venezuela , Orders of 27 November 2002-1 March 2005.....	753, 894, 896, 1047
Liliana Ortega et al.; Luisiana Ríos et al.; Luis Uzcátegui; Marta Colomina and Liliana Velásquez v. Venezuela , Order for provisional measures of 4 May 2004	753, 894, 1047
Loayza Tamayo v. Peru , Orders of 2 July 1996 - 28 August 2001 (lifted).....	361, 378, 461, 505, 524, 599-601, 751, 835
Tyrone Dacosta Cadogan v. Barbados , Order of the President of 4 November 2008	752, 892
Luis Uzcátegui v. Venezuela , Orders of 27 November 2002-4 May 2004	753, 894, 1047
Luisiana Ríos et al. v. Venezuela , Orders of 27 November 2002-3 July 2007	222, 582, 583, 720, 753, 851, 894
Marta Colomina and Liliana Velásquez v. Venezuela , Orders 30 July 2003-4 May 2004.....	753, 894, 1047
Mayagna (Sumo) Awas Tingni Community v. Nicaragua , Orders of 6 September 2002 and 26 November 2007 (lifting)	458, 461-463, 484, 513, 1046
Mendoza Prison inmates v. Argentina , Order of 9 October 2000-17 October 2008	337, 338, 349, 359, 360, 377, 504, 592, 599, 601, 604, 605, 620, 622, 652, 653, 1005, 1047
Mery Naranjo et al. v. Colombia , Order of 22 September 2006	152, 160
Miguel Agustín pro Juárez human rights center et al. v. Mexico , Orders of 30 November 2001-22 August 2007	853, 854
Miguel Castro-Castro Prison v. Peru , Orders of 29 January 2008 and 30 January 2007	337, 583, 601, 799, 851, 852
Millacura Llaipén y otros v. Argentina , Order of 21 June 2006	849
Monagas Judicial Confinement Center (‘La Pica’) (Venezuela) (Matter of), Orders of February 2006 and 3 July 2007.....	337, 338, 359, 360, 601, 652
Paniagua-Morales et al. and Vásquez et al. v. Guatemala (Panel Blanca case) , Orders of 10 February 1998-28 August 2001	408, 636, 964
Peace Community of San José de Apartado v. Colombia , Orders of 9 October 2000-6 February 2008	205, 410, 423-425, 592, 598, 600, 611-617, 619, 620, 624, 625, 637, 643, 646, 648-651, 653, 697, 720, 732, 850, 851, 891, 894, 969-971, 1040

Persons imprisoned in the "Dr. Sebastião Martins Silveira" Penitentiary in Araraquara São Paulo (Brazil) (Matter of the) , Orders of 30 September 2006 and 10 June 2008	152, 160, 890, 906, 1047, 1048, 1081
Peruvian Prisons cases v. Peru , Resolution of the President, 14 December 1992, Order of 27 January 1993 (denied)	335, 844, 848
Penitentiary Center of the Central Occidental Region (Uribana Prison) (Venezuela) (Matter of the) , Order of 2 February 2007	337, 601, 652
Plan de Sánchez Massacre v. Guatemala , Orders of 30 July 2004 and 8 September 2004	492, 665
Ramírez Hinojosa et al. (Peru) (Matter of) , Order of 17 May 2007	406, 612
Raxcacó Reyes et al. v. Guatemala , Order of 30 August 2004	35, 36, 149, 227, 236, 251, 758, 1046-1048
Reggiardo-Tolosa v. Argentina , Orders of 19 November 1993 and 19 January 1994	532, 534
Sarayaku indigenous community (Matter of/Asunto de Pueblo Indígena de Sarayaku) v. Ecuador , Orders of 6 July 2004 and 17 June 2005	218, 224, 460, 463, 646, 650, 653
Serech and Saquic v. Guatemala , Orders of 28 June 1996 and 19 September 1997	852
Suárez Rosero v. Ecuador , Orders of 12 April and 28 June 1996	337, 544, 661, 835
Urso Branco prison, see: Cárcel de Urso Branco
Velásquez Rodríguez, Fairén Garbi and Solís Corrales, and Godínez Cruz Cases (Honduras) , Letter President on behalf of witnesses Jiménez-Puerto and Custodio López, 6 November 1987, Series E, Compendium 1 (1987-1996), pp. 3-4; Letter Secretariat on behalf of witness Ramón Custodio López, 18 December 1987, Series E, Compendium 1 (1987-1996), pp. 1-2; Order of 15 January 1988, Series E, Compendium 1 (1987-1996), pp. 5-7; Order of 19 January 1988, Series E, Compendium 1 (1987-1996), pp. 9-11	407, 434
Vogt v. Guatemala , Orders of 27 June 1996 and 11 November 1997	423, 671, 850, 906, 976,
Yare I and Yare II Capital Region Penitentiary Center (Venezuela) (Matter of) , Orders of 30 March 2006-8 February 2008	337, 359, 360, 601, 604, 643, 652

Orders for compliance with judgments

Loayza Tamayo v. Peru , Compliance with Judgment, Order of 17 November 1999	361, 378, 461, 505, 524, 599-601, 751, 835
Cesti Hurtado v. Peru , Compliance with judgment, Order of 22 September 2006	349, 350, 360, 361, 544, 545, 689, 690, 974
Comunidad Indígena Yakye Axa v. Paraguay , 17 June 2005	458, 459, 485, 486, 531, 610
Case of Comunidad Indígena Sawhoyamaya v. Paraguay , Order of 2 February 2007 on supervision of compliance	459, 758, 1048
Fermín Ramírez v. Guatemala and Raxcacó Reyes v. Guatemala (Order on supervision of compliance) and Order on the request to expand the provisional measures in Raxcacó Reyes y otros, 9 May 2008	35, 36, 149, 227, 236, 251, 758, 1046-1048
Bámaca Velásquez v. Guatemala , Order of 27 January 2009 (Provisional Measures and Monitoring Compliance with Judgment)	758, 1046

IACHR Judgments

Velásquez Rodríguez v. Honduras , Judgment of 26 June 1987 (Preliminary Objections)	xxxi, 148, 433, 434, 443, 445, 627, 661, 764-766, 806, 807, 845, 890, 891, 924, 966
Velásquez Rodríguez v. Honduras , Judgment of 28 July 1988	xxxi, 148, 433, 434, 443, 445, 627, 661, 764-766, 806, 807, 845, 890, 891, 924, 966
Godínez Cruz Case v. Honduras , Judgment of 20 January 1989	xxxi, 148, 433, 434, 627, 661, 765, 845, 891, 924, 966
Fairén Garbi and Solís Corrales Case v. Honduras , Judgment of 19 March 1989	xxxi, 407, 434, 627, 765, 891, 924, 966
Blake v. Guatemala , Judgment of 2 July 1996 (Preliminary Objections)	98, 101, 320, 406, 607, 624, 626, 635, 636, 645, 661, 745, 835, 883, 968, 982

Table of Cases

Velásquez Rodríguez v. Honduras , Judgment of 21 July 1989 (Compensatory damages).....	xxxi, 148, 433, 434, 443, 445, 627, 661, 764-766, 806, 807, 845, 890, 891, 924, 966
Aloeboetoe et al. v. Suriname , Judgment of 10 September 1993 (Reparation)	492, 661, 664, 665
Caballero Delgado and Santana v. Colombia , Judgment of 21 January 1994 (Preliminary Objections)	320, 766, 852, 853, 892, 973, 974
Neira Alegria et al. v. Peru , Judgment of 19 January 1995	373, 377, 542, 799
Caballero Delgado and Santana v. Colombia , Judgment of 8 December 1995.....	320, 766, 852, 853, 892, 973-974
Garrido and Baigorria v. Argentina , 2 February 1996	320, 444, 661
Loayza Tamayo v. Peru , Judgment of 31 January 1996 (Preliminary Objections)	361, 378, 461, 505, 524, 599-601, 751, 835
El Amparo v. Venezuela , Judgment of 14 September 1996	661
Loayza Tamayo v. Peru , Judgment of 17 September 1997	361, 378, 461, 505, 524, 599-601, 751, 835
Loayza Tamayo v. Peru , Interpretation of the Judgment of 17 September 1997.....	361, 378, 461, 505, 524, 599-601, 751, 835
Castillo Páez v. Peru , 3 November 1997.....	320, 399, 853
Suárez Rosero v. Ecuador , Judgment of 12 November 1997.....	337, 544, 661, 835
Blake v. Guatemala , Judgment of 24 January 1998	98, 101, 320, 406, 607, 624, 626, 635, 636, 645, 661, 745, 835, 883, 968, 982
Paniagua Morales et al v. Guatemala , Judgment of 8 March 1998	444, 661, 662, 835
“Panel Blanca” case, see: Paniagua Morales et al v. Guatemala
“White Van” case, see: Paniagua Morales et al v. Guatemala
Benavides Ceballos v. Ecuador , Judgment of 19 June 1998.....	665
Loayza Tamayo v. Peru , Judgment of 27 November 1998 (Reparations).....	361, 378, 461, 505, 524, 599-601, 751, 835
Suárez Rosero v. Ecuador , Judgment of 29 May 1999 (Interpretation of the Judgment on Reparations and costs)	337, 564, 661, 835
Castillo Petrucci v. Peru , 30 May 1999	399
Loayza Tamayo v. Peru , Judgment of 3 June 1999 (Interpretation of the Judgment of Reparations) .	361, 378, 461, 505, 524, 599-601, 751, 835
Constitutional Court v. Peru , Judgment of 24 September 1999 (Competence)	205, 560-561, 627, 745, 746, 748, 891
Ivcher Bronstein v. Peru , Judgment of 24 September 1999 (Competence)	560, 578, 580, 583, 609, 745-747, 975
Cesti Hurtado v. Peru , Judgment of 29 September 1999	349, 350, 360, 361, 544, 545, 689, 690, 974
Blake v. Guatemala , Judgment of 1 October 1999 (Interpretation of the Judgment on Reparations) ...	98, 101, 320, 406, 607, 624, 626, 635, 636, 645, 661, 745, 835, 883, 968, 982
Street Children case (Villagrán Morales et al.) v. Guatemala , Judgment of 19 November 1999.....	462, 505, 513, 524, 664, 665, 689, 690
Cesti Hurtado v. Peru , Judgment of 29 January 2000 (Interpretation of the Judgment on the Merits)	349, 350, 360, 361, 544, 545, 689, 690, 974
Mayagna (Sumo) Awas Tingni Community v. Nicaragua , Judgment of 1 February 2000 (Preliminary Objections)	458, 461-463, 484, 513, 1046
Figueredo Planchart v. Venezuela , 13 April 2000	545
Cantoral Benavides v. Peru , Judgment of 18 August 2000	287, 506, 524, 689, 690, 707
Bámaca Velásquez v. Guatemala , Judgment of 25 November 2000.....	320, 444, 470, 661, 664, 702, 806
Cantoral Benavides v. Peru , Judgment of 3 December 2000 (Reparations).....	287, 506, 524, 689, 690, 707
Constitutional Court Case v. Peru , Judgment of 31 January 2001	205, 560-561, 627, 745, 746, 748, 891

Table of Cases

“The Last Temptation of Christ” (Olmedo Bustos et al.) v. Chile , 5 February 2001	583, 691
Ivcher Bronstein v. Peru , Judgment of 6 February 2001	560, 578, 580, 583, 609, 745-747, 975
Street Children case (Villagrán Morales et al.) v. Guatemala , Judgment of 26 May 2001 (Reparations)	505, 513
Cesti Hurtado v. Peru , Judgment of 31 May 2001 (Reparations)	349, 350, 360, 361, 544, 545, 689, 690, 974
Mayagna (Sumo) Awas Tingni Community v. Nicaragua , Judgment of 31 August 2001	458, 461-463, 484, 513, 1046
Constantine et al. v. Trinidad & Tobago , 1 September 2001 (Preliminary objections)	102, 217, 226, 227, 229, 237, 238, 379, 645, 693-695, 742, 743, 746-748, 753, 934, 1044, 1045
Hilaire et al. v. Trinidad & Tobago , 1 September 2001 (Preliminary objections)	159, 217, 226, 227, 229, 237, 238, 379, 642, 693-695, 742, 743, 746, 753, 1016, 1044, 1045
Benjamin et al. v. Trinidad & Tobago , 1 September 2001 (Preliminary objections)	217, 226, 227, 229, 237, 238, 379, 645, 691-693, 695, 742, 743, 745, 746, 753, 1044
Ivcher Bronstein v. Peru , Judgment of 4 September 2001 (Interpretation of the Judgment on the Merits)	560, 578, 580, 583, 609, 745-747, 975
Cesti Hurtado v. Peru , Judgment of 27 November 2001 (Interpretation of the Judgment of Reparation)	349, 350, 360, 361, 544, 545, 689, 690, 974
Barrios Altos v. Peru , Judgment of 30 November 2001 (Reparations)	662, 686
Durand and Ugarte v. Peru , Judgment of 3 December 2001 (Reparations)	689
Cantoral Benavides v. Peru , Judgment of 3 December 2001 (Reparations)	287, 506, 524, 689, 690, 707
Bámaca Velásquez v. Guatemala , Judgment of 22 February 2002 (Reparations)	159, 429, 513
Hilaire, Constantine, Benjamin et al. v. Trinidad & Tobago , Judgment of 21 June 2002	217, 225-227, 229, 236, 237, 377, 689-691, 753, 1044, 1045
Cantos v. Argentina , Judgment of 28 November 2002	585
Juan Humberto Sanchez v. Honduras , 7 July 2003	320
Bulacio v. Argentina , Judgment of 18 September 2003	377
Maritza Urrutia v. Guatemala , Judgment of 27 November 2003	287, 707
Mercedes Julia Huentao Beroiza et al. v. Chile , 11 March 2004	459, 460, 490
Molina Thiessen v. Guatemala , 4 May 2004	320
Herrera-Ulloa v. Costa Rica , Judgment of 2 July 2004 (merits and reparation) (la Nación)	583, 992
Case of 19 Merchants disappeared in 1987 (‘19 Tradesmen’) v. Colombia , 5 July 2004	320
Gómez Paquiyauri Brothers v. Peru , 8 July 2004	218, 376, 379
“Instituto de Reeducción del Menor” v. Paraguay , 2 September 2004	357, 376-379, 604
Plan de Sánchez massacre v. Guatemala , 19 November 2004 (Reparations)	492, 605
Serrano Cruz sisters v. El Salvador , 1 March 2005	320
Caesar v. Trinidad and Tobago , 11 March 2005 (Merits, Reparations and Costs)	262, 263, 746, 1016, 1036
Moiwana Village v. Suriname , 15 June 2005	484, 485, 492
Comunidad Indígena Yakye Axa v. Paraguay , 17 June 2005	458, 459, 485, 531, 610
Fermín Ramírez v. Guatemala , 20 June 2005	229, 230, 241, 243
Yatama v. Nicaragua , 23 June 2005	568
Yean and Bosico children v. Dominican Republic , 8 September 2005	506-507, 513-516, 227, 236, 251
Raxcacó Reyes et al. v. Guatemala , Judgment of 15 September 2005	485
Comunidad Indígena Sawhoyamaya v. Paraguay , Judgment of 29 March 2006	375
Ximenes-Lopes v. Brazil , Judgment of 4 July 2006	377
Montero Arangunen et al. (Detention Center of Catia) v. Venezuela , Judgment of 5 July 2006	852
Miguel Castro Castro Prison , Judgment of 25 November 2006

Table of Cases

García-Prieto et al. v. El Salvador , Judgment of 20 November 2007 (Preliminary Objections, Merits, Reparations, and Costs).....	152, 160, 445
Boyce et al. v. Barbados , Judgment of 20 November 2007	217, 218, 224, 226, 227, 239, 688, 796, 847, 892, 894, 1040, 1046

Advisory Opinions

Restrictions to the death penalty , OC-3/83, 8 September 1983	227
Habeas Corpus in Emergency Situations (Articles 27(2) and 7(6) ACHR) , OC-8/87, 30 January 1987.....	399
Judicial Guarantees in States of Emergency (Articles 27(2), 25 and 8 ACHR) , OC-9/87, 6 October 1987	401
Exceptions to the Exhaustion of Domestic Remedies (Article 46(1), 46(2) and 46(2)(b) ACHR) , OC-11/90, 10 August 1990.....	774
The Right to Information on Consular Assistance in the Framework of Guarantees of the Due Process of law , OC-16/99, 1 October 1999	240
The Juridical Condition and Human Rights of the Child , OC-17/02, 28 August 2002	524
The Juridical Condition and Rights of the Undocumented Migrants , OC-18, 17 September 2003.....	276, 510

11 AFRICAN COMMISSION ON HUMAN AND PEOPLE'S RIGHTS (ACHPR)³

Jean Yaovi Degli (on behalf of Corporal N. Bikagni, Union Interafricaine des Droits de l'Homme, International Commission of Jurists) v. Togo , March 1995, 83/92, 88/93, 91/93, (2000) AHRLR 315 (ACHPR 1994).....	172, 412, 597
Achutan and another (on behalf of Banda and others) v. Malawi , October/November 1995, 64/92, 68/92, and 78/92, 8 th Annual Activity Report, (2000) AHRLR 144 (ACHPR 1995)...	243
Commission Nationale des Droits de l'Homme et des Libertés v. Chad , October 1995, 74/92, (2000) AHRLR 66 (ACHPR 1995)	707
Constitutional Rights Project (in respect of Akamu and Others) v. Nigeria , 60/91, 1995, 8 th Annual Activity Report and (2000) AHRLR 180 (ACHPR 1995).....	214, 243, 247
Constitutional Rights Project (in respect of Zamani Lekwot and 6 Others) v. Nigeria , 87/93, October 1995, 8 th Annual Activity Report and (2000) AHRLR 183 (ACHPR 1995).....	214
Free Legal Assistance group, Lawyers' Committee for Human Rights, Union Interafricaine des Droits de l'Homme, Les Témoins de Jehovah v. Zaire (now Congo) , decided at 18 th ordinary session, Oct. 1995, 25/89, 47/90, 56/91, 100/93, 9 th Annual Activity Report and (2000) AHRLR 74 (ACHPR 1995).....	516
Organisation Mondiale Contre La Torture v. Rwanda , 20 th ordinary session, October 1996, 27/89, 46/91, 49/91, 99/93, (2000) AHRLR 282 (ACHPR 1996).....	513
Rencontre Africaine pour la Defense des Droits de l'Homme v. Zambia (on behalf of 517 West Africans) , 20 th ordinary session, October 1997, 71/92, (2000) AHRLR, 321 (ACHPR 1996).....	511
Fédération Internationale des Ligues des Droits de l'Homme v. Angola , 11 November 1997, 159/96, (2000) AHRLR 18, (ACHPR 1997)	514
Media Rights Agenda and others v. Nigeria , 31 October 1998, 105/93, 128/94, 130/94 and 152/96, (2000) AHRLR 200 (ACHPR 1998)	381, 707
International Pen, Constitutional Rights Project and Interights on behalf of Ken Saro-wiwa Jr. and Civil Liberties Organisation v. Nigeria , 31 October 1998, 137/94, 139/94, 154/96 and 161/97, 12 th Annual Activity Report, AHRLR 212 (ACHPR 1998).....	214, 242, 379, 595, 779, 908, 919, 946

³ The decisions by the African Commission are often undated.

Constitutional Rights Project and Another v. Nigeria , 102/93, decided at the 24 th ordinary session, 12 th Annual Activity Report and (2000) AHRLR 191 (ACHPR 1998).....	353
Amnesty International et al. v. Sudan , November 1999, 48/90, 50/91, 52/91, 89/93, (2000) AHRLR 297 (ACHPR 1999)	243, 246, 247
Amnesty International (on behalf of William Banda and John Chinula) v. Zambia , 212/98, 5 May 1999, 12 th Annual Activity Report and (2000) AHRLR 325 (ACHPR 1999).....	276, 510, 515, 516, 519, 767
Constitutional Rights Project v. Nigeria (I) , 148/96, decided at the 26 th ordinary session, 13 th Annual Activity Report and (2000) AHRLR (ACHPR 1999)	246, 353
Constitutional Rights Project and Another v. Nigeria , 150/96, decided at the 26 th ordinary session, 13 th Annual Activity Report and (2000) AHRLR 235 (ACHPR 1999).....	353
Civil Liberties Organisation v. Nigeria , 151/96, decided at the 26 th ordinary session, November 1999, 13 th Annual Activity Report and (2000) AHRLR 243 (ACHPR 1999).....	214, 353, 402, 403, 910, 921, 946
Africa Legal Aid (on behalf of Mr. Lamin Waa Juwara) v. Gambia , 11 May 2000 (inadm.), 209/97, (2000) AHRLR 119 (ACHPR 2000)	323, 774
Malawi African Association et al. v. Mauritania , 11 May 2000, 4/91, 61/91, 98/93, 164/97 à 196/97 and 210/98, (2000) AHRLR 194 (2000).....	240, 243, 246, 247, 381, 514
Association pour la Défense des Droits de l'Homme et des Libertés v. Djibouti , 13 th Annual Activity Report (2000), 133/94 and (2000) AHRLR 80 (ACHPR 2000).....	71, 172, 413
Forum of Conscience v. Sierra Leone , October/November 2000, 223/98, (2000) AHRLR 293 (ACHPR 2000).....	248
Modise v. Botswana , 14 th Annual Activity Report (2000), 97/93, AHRLR 30 (ACHPR 2000)	514, 519, 767
Avocats sans Frontières (on behalf of Bwampamye) v. Burundi , October/November 2000, 231/99, (2000)AHRLR 48 (ACHPR 2000)	214
Huri-Laws v. Nigeria , October/November 2000, 225/98, (2000) AHRLR 273 (ACHPR 2000)	382
Civil Liberties Organisation et al. v. Nigeria , 218/98, April/May 2001, (2001) AHRLR 75 (ACHPR 2001)	214, 240, 245, 247, 351, 401
Social and Economic Rights Action Center and Center for Economic and Social Rights v. Nigeria , 155/96, 27 October 2001, (2001) AHRLR 60 (ACHPR 2001)	166, 191, 433, 486, 497, 518, 647, 648, 908
Ogoni case, see: Social and Economic Rights Action Center and Center for Economic and Social Rights v. Nigeria 155/96, 27 October 2001
Legal Resource Foundation v. Zambia , April/May 2001, 211/98, (2001) AHRLR 84 (ACHPR 2001)	435
Interights (on behalf of Jose Domingo Sikunda) v. Namibia , May 2002 (inadm.), 239/2001, (2002) AHRLR 21 (ACHPR 2002)	276, 288
Congo v. Rwanda, Burundi and Uganda , 227/99, reference to case in 15 th Annual Activity report (2001-2002), p. 13	168, 178
Curtis Doebbler v. Sudan , May 2003, 236/2000, 16 th Annual Activity Report	264
Purohit and Moore v. The Gambia , May 2003, 241/2001, (2003) AHRLR 96 (ACHPR).....	435
Interights (on behalf of Jose Domingo Sikunda) v. Namibia , May 2002 (inadm.), 239/2001, (2002) AHRLR 21 (ACHPR 2002)	274, 286
Liesbeth Zegveld and Mussie Ephrem v. Eritrea , November 2003, 250/2002, 17 th Annual Activity Report	394, 395, 402
Samuel Kofi Woods, II and Kabineh M. Ja'neh v. Liberia , November 2003, 256/2002, 17 th Annual Activity Report	395, 551
B. v. Kenya , November/December 2004 (inadm.), 283/2003, 2004 AHRLR 67	171
Interights (on behalf of Husaini et al.) v. Nigeria , April 2005, (2005) AHRLR 56 (ACHPR 2005) ..	214, 1002, 1036
Open Society Justice Initiative (on behalf of Njawe Noumeni) v. Cameroon , May 2006, (2006) AHRLR 75 (ACHPR 2006)	579

Table of Cases

Zimbabwe Human Rights NGO Forum v. Zimbabwe , May 2006, (2006) AHRLR 128 (ACHPR 2006).....	708
---	-----

12 EUROPEAN COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS (ECOMHR)

Application of the ECHR to the Island of Cyprus (Greece v. UK) , 176/56, 2 June 1956 (adm.).....	173, 175, 214, 215, 416, 418, 896, 946
X. v. FRG , 297/57, 22 March 1958 (inadm.).....	173, 331, 352, 549, 550, 896
Application of the ECHR to the Island of Cyprus (Greece v. UK) , 176/56, 26 September 1958.....	173, 175, 214, 215, 416, 418, 896, 946
X v. Sweden , 434/58, 30 June 1959.....	281
X v. Belgium , 984/61, 29 May 1961 (inadm.).....	281
Mohamed Nazih-Al-Kuzbari v. FRG , 1802/63, 26 March 1963 (inadm.), Yearbook 4, pp. 462-484.....	281
X. and Y. v. Belgium , 1420/62, 1477/62 and 1478/62, 18 December 1963 (inadm.).....	176, 896
X. v. Austria and Yugoslavia , 2143/64, 30 June 1964 (inadm.).....	274, 281, 912
Karl Heinz Wemhoff v. FRG , 2122/64, 1 April 1966.....	550, 903
X v. FRG , 3040/67, 7 April 1967 (inadm.).....	281
X. v. Federal Republic of Germany , 2396/65, 22 December 1967 (adm.).....	272, 281
First Greek case: Denmark, Norway, Sweden & the Netherlands v. Greece , 3321-3323/67 and 3344/67, 24 January 1968.....	769, 909
Second Greek case: Denmark, Norway, Sweden v. Greece , 4448/70, 5 October 1970.....	173, 176, 215, 416, 946
X. v. FRG , 5207/71, 13 December 1971 (adm.).....	908, 909
Mohamed Kerkoub v. Belgium , 5012/71, 15 December 1971 (inadm.).....	272
Tossum Dolani v. Belgium , 5399/72, 31 May 1972 (inadm.).....	274
Ireland v. UK , 5310/71, 1 October 1972 (inadm.).....	8, 21, 46, 47, 72, 73, 77, 195, 332, 334, 418, 596, 681, 682, 727, 745, 872
Amekrane v. UK , 5961/72, 11 October 1973 (adm.).....	176, 283
X. v. The Netherlands , 6225/73, 27 May 1974 (struck out).....	272
East African Asians v. UK , 4403/70, 4404/70 and 4405/70, 14 December 1973.....	522
Brückmann v. Federal Republic of Germany , 6242/73, 14 July 1976, D.R. 6 (1977), p. 57.....	363
X. v. the Netherlands , 6225/73, 27 May 1974 (struck out).....	272
Becker v. Denmark , 7011/75, 3 October 1975 (inadm.).....	273, 274, 283, 646, 769
William Posnett Lynas v. Switzerland , 7317/75, 6 October 1976 (inadm.).....	179, 831, 909
Ennslin, Baader and Raspe v. FRG , 7572/76, 7586/76 and 7587/76, 8 July 1978 (inadm.).....	178, 563, 699, 917
M. Sands and R. Sands v. UK , 9338/81, 14 October 1981 (struck out).....	85-87, 196, 197, 366, 367, 638, 1108
Cemal Kemal Altun v. Federal Republic of Germany , 10308/83, 3 May 1983 (adm.).....	281, 630, 837-841
France, Norway, Denmark, Sweden & The Netherlands v. Turkey , 9940/82, 9941/82, 9942/82, 9943/82 and 9944/82, 6 December 1983 (adm.).....	840
Cemal Kemal Altun v. Federal Republic of Germany , 7 March 1984 (struck out), 10308/83, D&R 36, April 1984, p. 236.....	281, 630, 837-841
S. v. the Netherlands , 10633/83, 5 March 1984 (inadm.).....	1006
Kirkwood v. UK , 10479/83, 12 March 1984 (inadm.).....	283, 294, 295
A. Romano, J. Santos and C. Antunes, I. Do Carmo (S., R., A. and C.) v. Portugal , 9911/82 and 9945/82, 15 March 1984 (inadm.).....	365, 630
L. v. France , 10 December 1984, 10564/83, D. & R. 40, p. 262.....	769
H.I. Taspinar v. The Netherlands , 11026/84, 9 October 1985 (struck out).....	296, 297, 952
S.I.G. v. the Netherlands , 11615/85, 10 October 1985 (inadm.).....	294, 911, 1006
France, Norway, Denmark, Sweden & The Netherlands v. Turkey , 9940/82, 9941/82, 9942/82, 9943/82 and 9944/82, 7 December 1985.....	840

Patané v. Italy , 11488/85, 3 December 1986 (struck out; not reported)	361
Dhoest v. Belgium , 10448/83, 14 May 1987	293
B. v. France , 18020/91, 12 July 1991 (adm.)	177
Jens Soering v. UK , 14038/88, 10 November 1988 (adm.)	xxxi, 174, 177, 228-230, 233, 250, 251, 255, 272, 282, 284, 285, 291-293, 306, 748, 913, 1059
Nadarajah Vilvarajah, Vaithialingam Skandarajah, Saravamuthu Sivakumaran, Vathanan Navratnasingam and Vinnasithamby Rasalingam v. UK , 13163/87, 13164/87, 13165/87, 13447/87 and 13448/87, 7 July 1989 (adm.)	273, 282, 291, 828, 1058-1060
Cruz Varas et al. v. Sweden , 15576/89, 7 June 1990	xxi, 179, 182, 282, 508, 591, 904, 909-912, 914-916, 918-921, 924-927, 929, 988, 992, 1012, 1049, 1056
Mansi v. Sweden , 15658/89, 7 December 1990 (adm.)	179, 591, 909-911, 913, 1013, 1016, 1049
Mansi v. Sweden , 15658/89, 9 March 1990 (friendly settlement)	179, 591, 909-911, 1013, 1016, 1049
A. v. France , 17262/90, 27 February 1991 (inadm.)	769, 952
B. v. France , 22 January 1987 (inadm.), 11722/85, D. & R. 51	769, 1048
B., M. and 51 others v. Spain , 20347/92, 11 September 1992	526, 591, 643
Vakalis v. Greece , 19796/92, 15 January 1993 (struck out)	367, 633
D. et al. v. Sweden , 22308/93, 8 September 1993 (struck out)	297
G. and E. v. Norway , 9278/81 and 9415/81, 3 October 1993	475, 479, 643
Barir and Amuur v. France , 19776/92, 18 October 1993 (partly struck out, partly adm.)	380, 769
R.M. v. UK , 22761/93, 14 April 1994 (inadm.)	177
J. Aylor-Davis v. France , 22742/93, 20 January 1994 (inadm.)	252
I. Tanko v. Finland , 23634/94, 19 May 1994 (inadm.)	296, 297
Sampson v. Cyprus , 19774/92, 9 May 1994 (inadm.)	xxxi, 173, 175, 214-215, 896, 946
Francine Nsona and Bata Nsona v. The Netherlands , 23366/94, 2 March 1995	297
Ahmed v. Austria , 25964/94, 2 March 1995 (adm.)	174, 272, 303, 373
Chahal Family v. UK , 22414/93, 27 June 1995	174, 273, 285, 400, 841, 871, 1058, 1059, 1061
Ahmed v. Austria , 25964/94, 5 July 1995	174, 272, 303, 373
Nasri v. France , 19465/92, Judgment of 13 July 1995	299
Iian v. Sweden , 26516/95, 14 September 1995 (inadm.)	634
Yeung Yuk Leung v. Portugal , 24464/94, 27 November 1995 (struck out)	770
Tauria et al. v. France , 28204/95, 4 December 1995 (inadm.)	536, 537, 862
H.L.R. v. France , 24573/94, 7 December 1995	449
Hussain Mohamed Omar and Yonis Hassan Samanthar v. France , 29531/95, 25 January 1996 (struck out)	271
A. Harron and J. Alayo v. Sweden , 28783/95, 7 March 1996 (adm.)	297
A. Zapata Salazar and Family v. Sweden , 28987/95, 7 March 1996 (inadm.)	351
J.A. Paez v. Sweden , 29482/95, 18 April 1996 (adm.)	415, 429
Aaiza and Azam Choudry v. UK , 27949/95, 13 May 1996 (inadm.)	298, 303
D. v. UK , 30240/96, 15 October 1996	297-299, 301
Pietro Venezia v. Italy , 29966/96, 21 October 1996 (struck out)	252
Harron and Alayo v. Sweden , 28783/95, 3 December 1996 (struck out)	299
Kurt v. Turkey , 24276/94, 5 December 1996	195, 321-323, 913
Hüseyin Demir, Faik Kaplan, Sükrü Süsin v. Turkey , 21380/93, 21381/93 and 21383/93, 29 May 1997	354
B.B. v. France , 30930/96, 8 September 1997 (adm.), 9 March 1998 (Article 31 Report) and 7 September 1998 (struck out)	300
Ilijkov v. Bulgaria , 33977/96, 20 October 1997 (inadm.)	365, 630
Cyprus v. Turkey , 25781/94, 4 June 1999	322, 325, 380, 735

13 EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS (ECTHR)

Wemhoff v. Germany , 2122/64, 27 June 1968	550, 903
Golder v. UK , 4451/70, 21 February 1975	921
Handyside v. United Kingdom , 5493/72, 7 December 1976	586

Table of Cases

Ireland v. United Kingdom , 5310/71, Judgment of 18 January 1978.....	330, 332, 416, 678, 682, 722, 750, 869
Tyrer v. UK , 5856/72, Judgment of 25 April 1978	250, 261, 262, 926
Klass and others v. Germany , 5029/71, Judgment of 6 September 1978.....	915
The Sunday Times v. United Kingdom , 6538/74, 29 March 1979	586
Le Compte, Van Leuven and De Meyere v. Belgium , 6878/75 and 7238/75, Judgment of 23 June 1981.....	xiii, 563
Piersack v. Belgium , 8692/79, 1 October 1982.....	563
Sramek v. Austria , 8790/79, Judgment of 22 October 1984.....	xii
Z. v. The Netherlands , 10400/83, 14 May 1984.....	769
Bönisch v. Austria , 8658/79, Judgment of 6 May 1985	xxxi, 585
X and Y v. the Netherlands , 8978/80, 26 March 1985	447, 448, 591
Belilos v. Switzerland , 10328/83, 29 April 1988	476
Plattform 'Ärzte für das Leben' v. Austria , 10126/82, 21 June 1988.....	593
Langborger v. Sweden , 11179/84, 27 January 1989	563
Soering v. UK , 14038/88, Judgment of 7 July 1989	xxxi, 174, 177, 228-230, 233, 250, 251, 255, 272, 282, 284, 285, 291-293, 306, 748, 913, 1059
Powell and Rayner v. UK , 9310/81, 21 February 1990	593
Cossey v. UK , 10843/84, Judgment of 27 September 1990	929
Case of Cruz Varas and Others v. Sweden , 15576/89, Judgment of 20 March 1991.....	xxi, 179, 282, 508, 591, 904, 909-912, 914-916, 918-921, 924-927, 929, 988, 992, 1012, 1049, 1056
Clooth v. Belgium , 12718/87, 12 December 1991	662
Vilvarajah and others v. the United Kingdom , 13163/87, 30 October 1991	273, 282, 291, 828, 1058-1060
Beldjoudi v. France , 12083/86, Judgment of 26 February 1992.....	576
Vijayanathan and Pusparajah v. France , 17550/90 and 17825/91, Judgment of 27 August 1992	177
Herczegfalvy v. Austria , 10533/83, Judgment of 24 September 1992.....	334
Brannigan and McBride v. UK , 14553/89	402
Hurtado v. Switzerland , 17549/90, 28 January 1994	351, 352, 362, 363, 380, 441, 546, 547, 693, 694, 975
Keegan v. Ireland , 16969/90, 26 May 1994	593
Otto-Preminger-Institut v. Austria , 13470/87, 20 September 1994	586
Hentrich v. France , 13616/88, 22 September 1994	661
Loizidou v. Turkey , 15318/89, Judgment of 23 March 1995 (Grand Chamber) (preliminary objections)	735, 745, 747, 748, 912
McCann and Others v. UK , 18984/91, 27 September 1995.....	598
Amuur v. France , 19776/92, Judgment of 25 June 1996	380, 769
Akdivar and others v. Turkey , 21893/93, Judgment of 16 September 1996 (Grand Chamber).....	518, 659, 913
Stubbings v. UK , 22083/93 and 22095/93, 22 October 1996	450, 593
Chahal v. the United Kingdom , 22414/93, Judgment of 15 November 1996 (Grand Chamber).....	177, 273, 285, 400, 841, 871, 1058, 1059, 1061
F. & B. Nsona v. The Netherlands , 23366/94, Judgment of 28 November 1996	299
Ahmed v. Austria , 25964/94, Judgment of 17 December 1996	174, 272, 303, 373
Aksoy v. Turkey , 21987/93, Judgment of 18 December 1996	400, 913
Greenpeace Schweiz et al. v. Switzerland , 27644/95, 7 April 1997	646
D. v. UK , 30240/96, Judgment of 2 May 1997	297-299, 301
Balmer-Schafroth et al. v. Switzerland , 22110/93, 27 August 1997	862
Aydin v. Turkey , 23178/94, Judgment of 25 September 1997.....	446, 448
Raninen v. Finland , 20972/92, 16 December 1997	522
Akdivar and others v. Turkey , 21893/93, 1 April 1998 (Pecuniary damages).....	518, 659, 913
Selçuk and Asker v. Turkey , 23184/94 and 23185/94, 24 April 1998	521
Kurt v. Turkey , 24276/94, Judgment of 25 May 1998	193, 321-323, 913
Petra v. Romania , 27273/95, Judgment of 23 September 1998	915

Assenov et al. v. Bulgaria , 24760/94, Judgment 28 October 1998.....	1063
Osman v. UK , 23452/94, 28 October 1998 (Grand Chamber)	446-448, 590, 646
Pélissier and Sassi v. France , 25444/94, 25 March 1999.....	241
Messina v. Italy , 25498/94, 8 June 1999 (adm.)	364
Çakici v. Turkey , 23657/94, 8 July 1999 (Grand Chamber).....	323
Selmouni v. France , 25803/94, 28 July 1999 (Grand Chamber).....	678
Lorsé et al. v. The Netherlands , 52750/99, 18 January 2000 (adm.).....	362, 363, 380, 631
S.C.C. v. Sweden , 46553/99, Decision of 15 February 2000 (inadm.)	297, 298
T.I. v. UK , 43844/98, Judgment of 7 March 2000	305
Özgür Gündem v. Turkey , 23144/93, 16 March 2000	593
Mahmut Kaya v. Turkey , 22535/93, 28 March 2000.....	447, 448, 590, 596, 646, 1003
Labita v. Italy , 26772/95, 6 April 2000	325, 593
Athanassoglou et al. v. Switzerland , 27644/95, 6 April 2000 (Grand Chamber)	538, 539, 646
Timurtas v. Turkey , 23531/94, 13 June 2000.....	323, 325
Salman v. Turkey , 21986/93, Judgment of 27 June 2000 (Grand Chamber).....	323, 869
Tatete v. Switzerland , 41874/98, Judgment 6 July 2000	297, 952
Jabari v. Turkey , 40035/98, Judgment of 11 July 2000.....	272, 591, 769, 952
Cardoso and Johansen v. UK , 47061/99, Decision of 5 September 2000 (struck out).....	299
Labita v. Italy , 26772/95, Judgment of 6 April 2000 (Grand Chamber).....	325, 593
Sevtap Veznedaroğlu v. Turkey , 32357/96, 11 April 2000.....	833
Kudla v. Poland , 30210/96, Judgment of 26 October 2000.....	383, 522
Bilgin v. Turkey , 23819/94, 16 November 2000	521
Öcalan v. Turkey , 46221/99, Judgment of 14 December 2000 (First Section) (partly inadm.)... 171, 175, 180, 181, 215, 228-231, 241, 244, 245, 250, 251, 393, -396, 917, 946, 980
Chapman v. UK , 27238/95, Judgment of 18 January 2001	929
Dulaş v. Turkey , 25801/94, 30 January 2001.....	521
Bensaid v. UK , 44599/98, 6 February 2001	300
Conka et al. v. Belgium , 51564/99, Judgment of 13 March 2001 (partly adm.)..... 380, 508, 512, 769, 911, 919, 920, 922, 926, 927, 929
Keenan v. UK , 27229/95, Judgment of 3 April 2001	363, 593
Cyprus v. Turkey , 25781/94, 10 May 2001 (Grand Chamber).....	322, 325, 380, 735
Z. et al. v. UK , 29392/95, 10 May 2001.....	450, 593
Nivette v. France , 44190/98, Judgment 3 July 2001 (inadm.)	296
Avşar v. Turkey , 25657/94, Judgment of 10 July 2001	872
Einhorn v. France , 71555/01, Judgment 16 October 2001 (inadm.).....	296
Al-Adsani v. UK , 35763/97, Judgment of 21 November 2001 (Grand Chamber).....	287, 707, 919
Bankovic et al v. Belgium and 16 other States , 52207/99, 12 December 2001 (inadm.) (Grand Chamber).....	305, 735
Conka and others v. Belgium , 51564/99, Judgment of 5 February 2002	380, 508, 512, 769, 911, 919, 920, 922, 926, 927, 929
Stafford v. UK , 46295/99, 28 May 2002 (Grand Chamber).....	929, 930
Al-Nashif v. Bulgaria , 50963/99, 30 May 2002	402
Weiss v. Austria , 74511/01, 13 June 2002 (struck out)	294
Orhan v. Turkey , 25656/94, 18 June 2002	325
Christine Goodwin v. UK , 28957/95, 11 July 2002 (Grand Chamber)	267, 928, 929
Taskin v. Germany , 56132/00, 23 July 2002 (struck out)	299
Williams v. Germany , 10763/02, 12 September 2002 (struck out).....	533
Koughouli v. France , 50160/99, 26 September 2002 (inadm.)	995
Mastromatteo v. Italy , 37703/97, 24 October 2002	450
E. et al. v. the UK , 33218/96, 26 November 2002	450
Jacobus Lorsé et al. v. The Netherlands , 52750/99, Judgment of 4 February 2003.....	362, 363, 380, 631
Van der Ven v. The Netherlands , 50901/99, Judgment of 4 February 2003 (First Section)	362, 380

Table of Cases

Mamatkulov and Abdurasulovic v. Turkey , 46827/99 and 46951/99, Judgment of 6 February 2003 (First Section).....	xxi, 182, 716, 909, 911, 914, 931, 1012, 1059, 1070, 1099
Öcalan v. Turkey , 46221/99, 12 March 2003 (First Section).....	171, 175, 180, 181, 215, 228-231, 241, 244, 245, 250, 251, 393, 396, 917, 946, 980
Izquierdo Galbis v. Spain , 59724/00, 20 May 2003 (inadm.).....	587
Arcila Henao v. the Netherlands , 13669/03, 24 June 2003 (inadm.).....	398
Lunguli v. Sweden , 33692/02, Judgment 1 July 2003 (struck out).....	272
Shamayev and 12 others v. Georgia and Russia , 36378/02, Judgment 16 September 2003 (Second Section) (partly adm.).....	177, 181, 272, 316, 396, 629, 841, 929
N. v. Finland , 38885/02, 23 September 2003 (adm.).....	830, 831
Olaechea Cahuas v. Spain , 24668/03, Decision 23 September 2003.....	772, 929, 930, 985, 986
Scharsach and News Verlagsgesellschaft v. Austria , 39394/98, 13 November 2003.....	586
Nachova and Others v. Bulgaria , 43577/98 and 43579/98, 26 February 2004.....	325
Hida v. Denmark , 38025/02, 19 February 2004 (inadm.).....	300
Haliti et al. v. Denmark , 14712/03, 19 February 2004 (inadm.).....	300
Muratovic v. Denmark , 14923/03, 19 February 2004 (inadm.).....	300
Assanidze v. Georgia , 71503/01, 8 April 2004.....	596
Tahsin Acar v. Turkey , 26307/95, 8 April 2004.....	325
Ndangoya v. Sweden , 17868/03, 22 June 2004 (inadm.).....	298
Von Hannover v. Germany , 59320/00, 24 June 2004.....	593
Salkic et al. v. Sweden , 7702/04, Decision 29 June 2004 (inadm.).....	298
Ilaşcu et al. v. Moldova and Russia , 48787/99, 8 July 2004.....	367, 633, 735
Hun v. Turkey , 5142/04, Decision of 2 September 2004 (adm.).....	633
Issa v. Turkey , 31821/96, 16 November 2004.....	197, 735, 736
Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey , 46827/99 and 46951, 15 December 2004/4 February 2005.....	xxi, 179, 182, 195, 208, 508, 630, 698, 716, 748, 828, 842, 845, 908, 909, 912-931, 934, 945, 952, 980, 988, 1012, 1022, 1054, 1056-1061, 1063, 1099, 1106
Türkoğlu v. Turkey , 34506/97, 17 March 2005.....	325
Nevmerzhitsky v. Ukraine , 54825/00, 5 April 2005.....	334
Shamayev et al. v. Georgia and Russia , 36378/02, 12 April 2005 (Grand Chamber).....	177, 181, 272, 316, 396, 629, 841, 929
Öcalan v. Turkey , 46221/99, Judgment of 12 May 2005 (Grand Chamber).....	171, 175, 180, 181, 215, 228-231, 241, 244, 245, 250, 251, 393, 396, 917, 946, 980
Akdeniz v. Turkey , 25165/94, 31 May 2005.....	325, 807
Said v. the Netherlands , 2345/02, 5 July 2005.....	828
Moldovan et al. v. Romania (No. 2), 41138/98 and 64320/01, 12 July 2005.....	519, 520, 714
N. v. Finland , 38885/02, Judgment of 26 July 2005.....	828
Taniş et al. v. Turkey , 65899/01, 2 August 2005.....	325, 326
Özgen et autres c. Turquie , 38607/97, 20 September 2005.....	325
Kaldik v. Germany , 28526/05, 22 September 2005 (inadm.).....	300
Mathew v. the Netherlands , 24919/03, 29 September 2005.....	293
Sarban v. Moldova , 3456/05, 4 October 2005.....	354
Nesibe Haran v. Turkey , 28299/95, 6 October 2005.....	325
Gongadze v. Ukraine , 34056/02, 8 November 2005.....	326
Tekin Yildiz v. Turkey , 22913/04, 10 November 2005.....	367, 606, 848
Hun v. Turkey , 5142/04, 10 November 2005.....	632
Taner Tanyeri et al. v. Turkey , 74308/01, 6 December 2005 (struck out).....	367
Şeker v. Turkey , 52390/99, 21 February 2006.....	325
Evans v. UK , 6339/05, 7 March 2006 (Fourth section).....	540
Saddam Hussein v. Albania, UK et al. , 23276/04, 14 March 2006 (inadm.).....	181, 230, 268, 304, 305, 736
Uçar v. Turkey , 52392/99, 11 April 2006.....	325

Istrate v. Moldova , 53773/00, 13 June 2006.....	318
Bazorkina v. Russia , 69481/01, 27 July 2006.....	324-325, 804
Olaechea Cahuas v. Spain , 24668/03, Judgment of 10 August 2006.....	772, 929, 930, 985, 986
Isaak et al. v. Turkey , 44587/98, 28 September 2006 (adm.).....	736
Salah Sheekh v. The Netherlands , 1948/04, 11 January 2007.....	273, 303, 805, 830-832, 1053
Al-Moayad v. Germany , 35865/03, 20 February 2007 (inadm.).....	903
Collins and Akaziebie v. Sweden , 23944/05, 8 March 2007 (inadm.).....	292
Evans v. UK , 6339/05, 10 April 2007 (Grand Chamber).....	540
Gebremedhin v. France , 25389/05, 26 April 2007.....	769, 773
Behrami and Behrami v. France and Saramati v. France , 71412/01 and 78166/01, 2 May 2007.....	736, 737
Ciorap v. Moldova , 12066/02, 19 June 2007.....	332
Bitiyeva and X v. Russia , 57953/00.....	415
Paladi v. Moldova , 39806/05, 10 July 2007.....	352, 930
Sultani c. France , 45223/05, 20 September 2007.....	768, 769
Dybeku v. Albania , 41153/06, 18 December 2007.....	362, 596
Mostafa et autres c. Turquie , 16348/05, 15 January 2008.....	953
Saadi v. Italy , 37201/06, 28 February 2008 (Grand Chamber).....	273, 299, 828-831, 833, 842, 871
Shtukaturvov v. Russia , 44009/05, 27 March 2008.....	396, 596, 989
Nyanzi v. UK , 21878/06, 8 April 2008.....	831
N. v. UK , 26565/05, 27 May 2008 (Grand Chamber).....	298-299
Rodić et al. v. Bosnia and Herzegovina , 22893/05, 27 May 2008.....	365, 630, 631
Kotsaftis v. Greece , 39780/06, 12 June 2008.....	352
Ryabikin v. Russia , 8320/04, 19 June 2008.....	272, 805, 828, 829, 842, 953
Pad et al. v. Turkey , 60167/00, 28 June 2007 (inadm.).....	735
NA. v. UK , 25904/07, 17 July 2008.....	181, 2753 644, 829-831
Prezec v. Croatia , 7508/05, 28 August 2008 (struck out).....	362
Muminov v. Russia , 42502/06, 11 December 2008.....	952, 953, 1050
Paladi v. Moldova , 39806/05, 10 March 2009 (Grand Chamber).....	352, 930

International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY)

Prosecutor v. Furundžija , case IT-95-17/I-T, 10 December 1998, 38 ILM 317 (1999).....	287, 707
Prosecutor v. Delacic and Others , case IT-96-21-T, 16 November 1998.....	287, 707
Prosecutor v. Kunarac , cases IT-96-23-T and IT-96-23/1, 22 February 2001.....	287, 707

Bosnia Human Rights Chamber

Borislav Herak v. Fed. BiH , 12 June 1998.....	214, 231, 232, 241, 946
Sretko Damjanović v. Fed. BiH , 5 September 1997.....	214, 231, 232, 241, 946
Nail Rizvanović v. Fed. BiH , 13 November 1998.....	214, 946
Ratko Grgić v. Republika Srpska , 5 August 1997.....	318, 786
Josip, Božana and Tomislav Matanović v. Republika Srpska , 6 August 1997.....	316, 322, 324, 325, 434, 447, 592, 786, 1024
M.J. v. Srpska , 7 November 1997.....	519
Medan et al. v. State and Fed. B&H , 7 November 1997.....	519
Turčinović v. Fed. B&H , 11 March 1998.....	519
Kalinčević v. B&H and Fed. B&H , 11 March 1998.....	519
Balić v. Srpska , 10 September 1998 (adm.).....	318
Dyke Hasanaj et al. (11 adults and 27 children) v. B&H and Fed. B&H , 16 April 1999 (struck out).....	528
Milorad Marčeta v. The Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina , 3 April 1998.....	550, 553
Adnan Suljanović, Edita Čišić and Asim Lelić v. State BiH and Republika Srpska , 14 May 1998 (inadm.).....	568, 733
S.K. v. Srpska , 14 May 1999.....	511
Čavić v. B&H , 18 December 1998 (inadm.).....	734

Table of Cases

The Islamic Community in BiH (Banja Luka Mosques) v. The Republika Srpska , 11 June 1999.....	465, 468, 487
Nada Blagojević v. Srpska , 11 June 1999.....	519
Mahmutović v. Republika Srpska , 8 October 1999.....	466, 477, 493
D.K. v. Republika Srpska , 2 November 1999.....	890, 1051
Islamic Community in BiH v. Republika Srpska (Muslim Town Cemetery in Prnjavor) , 11 January 2000.....	466, 493-495, 643-644
Municipal Council of the Municipality South-West Mostar v. the High Representative , 9 March 2000 (inadm.).....	734
Novo Bencuz v. Republika Srpska , 8 February 2000 (inadm.).....	550
Ristić v. Srpska , 4 September 2000.....	511
Islamic Community in BiH (former mosque sites in Zvornik) v. Republika Srpska , 9 November 2000.....	468, 489
The Islamic Community in BiH (former Atik Mosque, Bijeljina) v. Republika Srpska , 6 December 2000.....	466, 487, 488
Srpska Radikalna Stranka v. State BiH , 8 December 2000 (inadm.).....	568, 733
Jasmin Šljivo v. Republika Srpska , 9 February 2001 (inadm.).....	550
M.A. v. Federation BiH , 7 March 2001 (inadm.).....	550
Aziz Dautbegović and 51 Other Villagers from Duge v. Federation BiH , 2 July 2001.....	509, 641
Drago Lukenda and Miroljub Bevanda v. Fed. BiH , 5 July 2001 (inadm.).....	511, 644
The Islamic Community in BiH (Jakeš Cemetery) v. Republika Srpska , 8 October 2001.....	466
Boudellaa, Lakhdar, Nechle and Lahmar v. BiH and Fed. BiH , 11 October 2002.....	279, 286, 304, 605, 772, 890, 983, 994, 1002, 1051, 1052, 1069
Ibrahim Makić v. Fed. BiH , 9 November 2001 (inadm.).....	550
Aiša Tufekčić v. Fed. BiH , 6 December 2001 (adm.).....	511
Ivo Lozančić et al. v. Fed. BiH , 8 March 2002 (inadm.).....	550
Edin Garplija v. Fed. BiH , 9 April 2002.....	550
Mustafa Ait Idir v. BiH and Fed. BiH , 4 April 2003 (adm. & merits).....	279, 286, 287, 304
Belkasem Bensayah v. BiH and Fed. BiH , 4 April 2003.....	282
Čengić v. BiH and Srpska , 5 September 2003.....	469, 480
Islamic Community in BiH (Mrkonjić Grad) v. Republika Srpska , 22 December 2003.....	467, 673, 674

Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (JCPC)

Fisher v Minister of Public Safety and Immigration (No. 2) (Bahamas) 2 W.L.R. 349 (P.C.) (Lord Slynn of Hedley and Lord Hope of Craighead dissenting, p. 452 E-F) (5 October 1998).....	996
Pratt and Ivan Morgan v The Attorney General for Jamaica and another (Jamaica) [1993] UKPC 1 (2 November 1993).....	683
Darrin Roger Thomas and Haniff Hilaire v Cipriani Baptiste (Trinidad and Tobago) [1999] UKPC 13 (17 March 1999).....	988, 996, 997, 999
Tangiora v Wellington District Legal Services Committee (New Zealand) [1999] UKPC 42 (4 October 1999).....	1000
Briggs v Cipriani Baptiste (Commissioner of Prisons) and Others (Trinidad and Tobago) [1999] UKPC 45 (28 October 1999).....	752, 1000
Higgs v Minister of National Security [2000] 2 A.C. 228, pp. 245G-46C (14 December 1999).....	996
Lewis, Patrick Taylor and Anthony McLeod, Christopher Brown, Desmond Taylor and Steve Shaw v The Attorney General of Jamaica and Another (Jamaica) [2000] UKPC 34 (12 September 2000).....	997

Supreme Court of Canada

United States v. Burns , [2001] 1 S.C.R. 283 (15 February 2001).....	139, 145, 236, 283, 291, 1009, 1010
RJR-Macdonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General) , [1994] 1 S.C.R. 311 (3 March 1994).....	1011

Ahani v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) , [2002] 1 S.C.R. 72 (11 January 2002).....	826, 998
Suresh v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) , [2002] 1 S.C.R. 3 (11 January 2002).....	285, 825, 826, 1007, 1012, 1033

Court of Appeal for Ontario

Ahani v. Canada (A.G.) (2002), 58 O.R. (3d) 107 (8 February 2002)	633, 986-988, 992, 999-1001, 1006, 1010-1013
--	---

US Supreme Court

Sale, Acting Commissioner, Immigration and Naturalization Service, et al. v. Haitian Center Council, INC, et al. , 509 U.S. 155	284
Breard v. Greene , 523 U.S. 371 (1998).....	92, 94
Roper v. Simmons , 543 U.S. 551 (2005).....	216
Medellin v. Dretke , 544 U.S. 660 (2005).....	94
Sanchez-Llamas v. Oregon , 548 U.S. 331 (2006).....	94
Medellin v. Texas , US 552 U.S. _ (2008), 128 S. Ct. 1346.....	94
Boumediene v. Bush , 553 U.S. _ (2008), 128 S. Ct. 2229.....	392

Texas Courts of Criminal Appeals

Saldaño v. State , 70 S.W. 3d 873 (Tex. Crim. App. 2002) (13 March 2002)	217
---	-----

Other domestic courts

House of Lords (UK) R (Al-Jedda) v. Secretary of State for Defence , 12 December 2007, [2007] UKHL 58	737
England and Wales Court of Appeal R (Al-Saadoon) v. Secretary of State for Defence [2009] EWCA Civ 7, appeal dismissed on 30 December 2008, motivated and published on 21 January 2009.....	737
Family Court (Australia) B and B v. Minister for Immigration & Multicultural and Indigenous Affairs [2003] FamCA 451, judgment of 19 June 2003.....	355, 961, 962, 1016, 1017
Constitutional Court of Colombia, Sala de Revisión, T-1025/07, decided 3 December 2007, published 22 January 2008.....	971, 972, 996
South African Constitutional Court S v. Makwanyane and Mchunu , 1995 (2) SACR 1 (CC).....	220, 250
South African Constitutional Court Mohamed and another v. President of Republic of South Africa and others , 28 May 2001, CCT 17/01 (2001).....	283
Hoge Raad (Dutch Supreme Court) 30 maart 1990 RvdW 1990, 76, Nederlandse Jurisprudentie 1991, No. 249, 30 March 1990 (the Short case, also reported in English ILM 29 (1990), pp. 1375 ff.).....	283, 871

INDEX

A

Abstention

see Negative obligations

Acquis humanitaire 933, 934, 1105, 1110

Action

see Positive obligations

Addressees of provisional measures 210, 623, 654, 918

Adequate time and facilities 239, 245, 256, 811

Admissibility 759-787, 1099-1102, 1054

Aggravation of dispute 14, 16, 25, 29, 30, 48, 89, 98, 100, 133, 199, 925, 930, 1084

Aggravated breach 914, 935, 1025, 1044, 1051, 1053, 1056, 1106

Amnesty 215, 219-221, 226, 239, 346, 373, 662, 670

Amnesty International 91, 94, 131, 135, 183, 220, 242, 245, 247, 258, 260, 269, 274, 304, 310, 316
327, 330, 351, 388, 392, 402, 405, 409, 438, 442, 507, 512, 513, 517, 546, 548, 675, 677, 767, 830, 832, 911, 1007, 1014, 1026, 1035, 1049, 1060-1062, 1067, 1072, 1075, 1076

Anticipation of judgment

see Non-anticipation of judgment

Arbitrary detention 144, 342, 385, 411, 412, 506, 524, 541, 542, 543, 545, 547-553, 692, 710, 719, 945, 959

Arbitrary expulsion

see Mass expulsion

Armed conflict 18, 28, 37, 38, 66, 69, 70, 87, 95, 99, 274, 315, 317, 397, 420, 423, 431, 467, 625, 702, 849, 979, 991, 1075

Assets, judicial seizure of 584

Assurances

see Diplomatic assurances

Assurances of non-repetition 52, 53, 368, 437, 656, 658, 660, 670, 678, 691, 693-695, 701, 1030, 1096, 1097

Atypical provisional measures 200, 501, 523, 525, 553, 586, 963, 1087

Audi alteram partem 9, 191, 1018, 1079, 1086, 1108

Audiat et altera pars

see Audi alteram partem

Aut dedere aut iudicare 553-558, 1070-1073

Authority to use provisional measures 3, 5, 6, 103, 124, 188, 189, 199, 656, 699, 711, 790, 885, 894, 896, 897, 1084, 1094, 1101

Auxiliary rights 392, 396, 397, 707

B

Balance of convenience 58, 571, 633, 634, 654, 701, 781, 789, 856, 869, 1011

Beneficiaries of provisional measures 55, 172, 186, 210, 539, 621, 623, 624, 626, 628, 638
642, 646, 648, 655, 695, 789, 852, 853, 968, 1097, 1098

Border conflict 7, 22, 26, 37, 48, 98, 99, 623, 1083

Bosnia Human Rights Chamber 53, 103, 182, 465, 501, 716, 1095

Bottom-up approach 1096

Index

Burden of proof 41, 77, 80, 83, 85, 86, 96, 193, 319, 320, 323, 326, 442, 494, 597, 774, 804, 806, 807, 815, 818, 819, 830, 843, 845, 863, 869, 873, 876, 877, 943, 1054, 1104

C

Capital punishment
see Death penalty

CEDAW 67, 69, 70, 103, 132-136, 138, 139, 141, 142, 153, 183, 188, 213, 214, 405, 431-433, 443, 449, 514, 592, 595, 626, 718, 726, 805, 885, 919, 1022, 1076, 1094

CEJIL 158, 159, 207, 313, 314, 337, 357, 358, 360, 409, 419, 421, 427, 578, 581, 582, 585, 627, 766, 849, 906, 958, 973, 991, 1070

CERD 30, 66, 103, 132-136, 188, 206, 213, 416, 469, 471, 482, 489-492, 499, 514, 517, 726, 759, 770, 787, 789, 885, 896, 1094, 1101

Cessation 43, 52, 53, 550, 589, 656-660, 662, 666, 669, 679, 691, 693-695, 1050, 1096, 1097, 1098

Children 96, 121, 131, 133, 152, 167, 259, 270, 271, 296-298, 302, 320, 337, 338, 353-355, 357-360, 372, 376-378, 382, 408-419, 444, 447, 462, 468, 474, 485, 503-507, 513-517, 521, 524, 526, 529-535, 540, 541, 546, 552, 564, 568, 570, 575, 576, 587, 592, 599-602, 604, 607-609, 643, 652, 664, 665, 689, 690, 702, 707, 714, 718, 726, 737, 769, 771, 798, 834, 840, 960-962, 1016, 1017, 1067, 1068, 1093

Collective rights 166, 210, 451, 455, 457, 459, 462, 464, 469-475, 479-484, 486, 489, 497-499, 510, 512, 518, 530, 635-638, 645, 650, 655, 674, 709-712, 725, 859, 860, 912, 1092

Committee against Disappearances 135, 136, 786, 787

Common core of provisional measures 705, 715, 1092, 1094, 1110

Commutation of death sentence 217, 219, 221, 222, 226, 237-239, 243, 248, 252, 254, 375, 678-686, 688, 691-693, 721, 722, 749, 756, 777, 794, 816, 949, 1026, 1027, 1067, 1098

Compétence de la compétence 72, 752, 932

Compliance

see Non-compliance

Concept of provisional measures 3, 5, 15, 78, 101, 104, 124, 192, 195, 199, 200-202, 209, 210, 256, 293, 451, 499, 506, 521, 523, 531, 542, 553, 559, 562, 564, 586, 587, 679, 695, 700, 705, 712, 718, 720, 724, 729, 758, 855, 872, 934, 941, 944, 1081, 1082, 1084, 1086, 1087, 1089, 1098, 1101, 1105

Consent, of beneficiary with provisional measure 414, 446, 469, 480, 482, 483, 491, 496, 497, 626, 634-642, 656, 695, 989

Consent, of State 60, 62, 68, 71, 98, 196, 744, 844, 845, 920, 944, 989, 1013, 1082, 1084, 1089

Consular notification 33, 54, 239, 240

Consultation between the Parties 46, 50, 72, 84, 145-153, 202, 453, 455, 469, 472, 480, 487, 491, 493-496, 624, 633-642, 695, 1035, 1055, 1081, 1097

Convergence 3, 103, 191, 192, 195, 201, 497, 700, 716, 746, 927, 934, 1081, 1087, 1088, 1099, 1105

Core rights 497, 593, 622, 656, 694, 702, 719, 912, 913, 917, 925, 928, 933, 1096, 1105

Corporal punishment 103, 120, 121, 210, 257-263, 291, 329, 371, 375, 590, 666-668, 721, 722, 793, 803, 875, 1092, 1094, 1103

Cross-fertilization 113, 192, 195, 200, 201, 499, 1087, 1088

Cultural identity 453, 459, 460, 463, 465, 481, 485, 486, 490, 493, 709, 710, 978

Cultural survival 121, 125, 434, 456, 462, 473, 479, 482-485, 487, 493, 495, 498-501, 509, 530, 597, 655, 672, 674, 699, 705, 708-712, 725, 780-782, 804, 855-857, 859, 860, 864-867, 871, 872, 874, 877, 979, 982, 1092, 1093, 1098, 1103

D

Dayton Peace Agreement 182-185, 206, 242, 325, 432, 465, 467, 497, 501, 508, 518, 520, 623, 659, 712, 734, 756, 783, 785, 786, 890, 1022, 1051, 1069

- Death penalty
 Death row phenomenon 250-255, 292-294
 Exhaustion..... 799-789
 Extradition..... 287-290
 Follow-up by ICJ 91-94
 IACHR and reparation 688-691
 ICJ 31-36, 89, 91-94, 100
 Promptness of intervention by HRC..... 106-111
 Risk, assessment of 808-816
 Risk, immediacy of 792-795
 Death row 76, 107, 120, 156, 163, 226-228, 233, 236, 250-256, 292, 293, 296, 306, 330, 353, 366, 367, 369-371, 374, 382, 440-442, 449, 738, 741, 762, 774, 775, 783, 784, 791, 796, 809, 824, 951, 1027, 1034
 Death threats 104, 112, 162, 163, 178, 210, 253, 271, 316, 329, 345, 405-449, 457, 460-462, 501, 510, 530, 531, 547, 553, 554, 557-559, 562, 590, 592-594, 598, 605, 607, 610-614, 616, 617, 620, 621, 635, 642, 646, 655, 658, 661, 666, 670, 672, 681, 692, 694, 699, 708, 714, 715, 717-719, 723-725, 732, 756-758, 764, 765, 790, 799, 803, 804, 846, 848, 852, 870, 874, 946, 965-968, 972, 1001, 1003, 1040, 1073, 1085, 1090, 1092, 1095-1097, 1101, 1103
 Deference to the executive..... 996, 1013
 Delegation of power to order provisional measures 9-11, 59, 106, 107, 124, 126, 137, 138, 153, 154, 176, 177, 185, 189, 200, 1085
 Denunciation of treaty 129, 145, 258, 356, 619, 738-748, 886, 1041, 1043
 Detention 329-383, 541, 599, 669, 678, 705, 842-845, 958-962
 Diplomatic assurances 21, 52-54, 75, 76, 81, 122, 233, 235, 251, 267, 268, 280, 283, 286, 289, 290, 292, 304, 368, 391, 392, 437, 545, 605, 630, 656, 658, 660, 662, 666, 668, 670, 678, 679, 691, 693-695, 701, 736, 783, 817, 822, 823, 825, 826, 833, 836-842, 909, 948, 955, 956, 1007-1010, 1017, 1028, 1030, 1052, 1056, 1060-1062, 1096-1098
 Diplomatic protection 22, 38, 53, 55, 56, 100, 764, 1084
 Disappearance..... 111-115, 136, 144, 210, 309-329, 344, 345, 393, 397, 399, 402, 405, 413, 439, 532, 534, 551, 598, 635, 664, 665, 678, 735, 766, 786, 804, 806, 870, 875, 888, 945, 958, 966, 1023, 1038, 1054, 1071, 1103
 Discrimination 30, 66-69, 133, 183, 232, 289, 433, 443, 465, 469, 471, 475-476, 487, 489-490, 493, 497, 499-500, 501-521, 524, 540, 568, 573, 705-715, 725, 732, 739, 1092, 1093
 Disappeared persons see Disappearance
 Divergence..... 3, 103, 191, 192, 201, 716, 934, 1087, 1099, 1105
 Domestic violence 70, 132, 135, 431, 433
 Drafting history of Rule 86 by the HRC 124
 Dualist system of implementation 92, 997
- E
 Early warning 489, 645
Effet utile 691, 745, 746, 748, 918, 931, 932, 934, 1051, 1106, 1107, 1111
 Embryos..... 506, 524, 540, 541, 721, 1094
 Ensuring procedural rights
 see Purpose of provisional measures
 Environment, protection of the 13, 20-21, 28, 36-38, 46, 56, 83-86, 99, 419, 454, 455, 460, 469, 480, 486, 490, 494, 496-499, 516, 519, 529, 530, 537-539, 594, 597, 623, 640, 657, 676, 677, 709, 711, 713, 724, 780-782, 791, 801, 857, 860, 861, 862-867, 869, 871-873, 876, 877, 1083, 1084

Index

- Equality 78, 105, 171, 191, 238, 241, 295, 326, 433, 454, 458, 476, 477, 483, 509, 510, 568, 710, 788, 898, 927, 1024, 1101
- Equality of arms 19, 78, 98, 105, 245, 585, 684, 723, 811, 816, 867, 869, 1088, 1105
- Erga omnes* obligations
see Obligations erga omnes
- Eviction, forced 133, 182, 207, 210, 276, 449, 461, 486, 487, 501, 502, 508-511, 517-521, 569, 713-715, 1092, 1093, 1095
- Evidence 812-880, 1054-1062
Preserving the 19, 652
- Exhaustion of domestic remedies 246, 274, 286, 295, 301, 327, 395, 454, 474, 480, 539, 634, 644, 684, 685, 732, 739, 755, 756, 759, 761-764, 767, 770-774,
777, 779-781, 788, 789, 797, 798, 825, 833, 857, 868, 949, 964, 989, 1013, 1096, 1100, 1102
- Ex nunc* 62, 829
- Expression, freedom of 104, 165, 342, 429, 434, 546-549, 552, 560, 564, 566, 568, 577-580, 582-584, 587, 591, 598, 609, 610, 713, 715, 718, 992, 1038, 1095
- Extradition 112, 116, 122, 130, 170, 173, 174, 177, 179, 206, 210, 228, 233, 235, 250-252, 265-307, 327, 330, 354, 510, 537, 555-557, 573, 597, 605, 630, 668, 669,
698, 699, 769-772, 792, 796, 797, 803, 805, 817, 820-825, 833, 837-842, 844, 863, 869, 870, 875, 876, 897, 898, 900, 901, 910, 912-914, 921, 925, 929, 946, 951-955, 977, 978, 980, 985, 999, 1002, 1007-1010, 1014, 1017, 1022, 1024-1026, 1033, 1048, 1049, 1055-1063, 1070-1072, 1091, 1103
- Extraordinary rendition
see Rendition
- Extraterritorial obligations 195, 279-280, 305, 329, 375, 397, 401-403, 436, 733-737, 788, 1099, 1100
- F
- Fairness 13, 229, 230, 239, 241, 256, 286, 633, 654, 695, 697, 722, 724, 783, 808, 816, 826, 827, 983, 987, 998, 999, 1090, 1097
- Family life 103, 268, 279, 290, 296, 467-479, 481, 482, 487, 493, 518, 533, 536, 538, 569, 571, 572, 575, 576, 587, 641, 677, 698, 711, 715, 797, 824, 861, 912, 917, 953
- Financial measures, halting 584, 585
- Flexibility of use of provisional measures 143, 148, 299, 586, 587, 619, 620, 622, 629, 726, 897, 1086, 1093, 1111
- Follow-up on on-compliance by the HRC 1022-1034
by CAT 1035
in Inter-American system 1036-1047
in European system 1048-1050
under Dayton Peace Agreement 1051 as part of treaty reporting procedures 1052 by other authorities 1064-1068
by NGOs 1069-1075
- Forced confessions 239, 240
- Forum prorogatum* 60, 71
- Fragmentation of international law 193, 194, 745, 746, 1087
- Freedom from ex post facto laws 239, 241, 702
- G
- General principles of law 77, 201, 881, 882, 912, 921, 923, 930, 988, 1088
- Genocide Convention 7, 9, 10, 17, 29, 40, 44, 53, 58, 60, 63, 64, 66-68, 78, 88, 90, 91, 95, 97, 748, 881

Gross human rights violations 7, 29, 37, 151, 596, 623, 662, 767, 871, 1038

H

Habeas corpus..... 247, 293, 315, 317, 318, 327, 335, 337, 339, 347, 349, 350, 358, 385, 386, 392, 397-400, 544, 545, 549, 669, 681, 764, 765, 766

Halting corporal punishment

see Purpose of provisional measures

Halting executions

see Purpose of provisional measures

Harassment 210, 271, 405-450, 558-562, 611-619, 670, 671, 869-871

Human Rights Watch..... 78, 132, 141, 154, 159, 304, 310, 313, 324, 327, 402, 436, 543, 554-557, 560, 799, 837, 957, 1062, 1070-1072, 1076

Humanization 3, 36, 37, 100, 194, 716, 933, 1081, 1082, 1084, 1107

Hunger strike 113, 178, 186, 329, 330, 332, 342, 343, 349, 353, 354, 362-366, 383, 604, 630-632
635, 654, 719, 843, 846, 915, 918, 962, 1097

I

Identification of beneficiaries 609, 615, 642-655

Immediacy of risk 6, 20, 74-76, 177, 294, 555, 698, 701, 710, 732, 771, 791-802, 846, 847, 868, 983, 1102, 1103, 1107

Imminence of risk

see Immediacy of risk

Impact assessment 84, 469, 494, 496, 498, 499, 530, 873

Impartiality 162, 177, 239, 241, 242, 395, 813, 814, 884, 885, 1000

Impunity 79, 132, 327, 427, 428, 434, 435, 444, 462, 548, 553, 557, 558, 610, 616, 617, 660-662, 664, 671, 672, 708, 854, 969, 971, 1072

Incorporation into domestic law 995, 996, 1000

Incremental approach to specificity 598, 611

Independence of the judiciary 242, 413, 558, 559, 662, 718, 1095

Indigenous communities 315, 426, 427, 459, 463, 483-485, 489, 490, 493, 496, 499, 873

Indigenous culture 103, 112, 115, 127, 144, 165, 451, 454, 457, 461, 468-471, 482, 490, 492, 497, 499, 500, 626, 635, 638, 639, 654, 677, 700, 708, 710-712, 721, 725, 765, 792, 799, 803, 863, 868, 871-873, 1092, 1094, 1097, 1111

Individual complaints

under African system 165-167, 171

under Bosnia Human Rights Chamber 182-184

under CAT/CEDAW/CERD 134-135

under European Human Rights system 170-172

under Human Rights Committee 104-105

under Inter-American Human Rights system 145-149, 548

Inequality 326, 723, 731, 792, 796, 803, 806, 808, 867, 882, 937, 943, 1105

Inferences 78, 323, 631, 805, 869, 1097

Information, access to 10, 120, 497, 538, 577-584

Information on provisional measures, accessibility of 164, 190, 191, 200, 202, 219, 1081, 1085-1087

Internal displacement 165, 181, 273, 327, 422, 428, 434, 461, 501, 509, 510, 529, 530, 619, 621, 694, 700, 713-715, 721, 725, 1040, 1093, 1096

Interrogation method 330, 332, 383, 392, 678

Intervening in detention situations

see Purpose of provisional measures

Index

- Irreversible harm..... 15, 16, 20, 21, 46, 84, 85, 205, 208, 209, 211, 229, 238, 296, 300, 305, 394, 463, 482, 498, 523, 525, 531, 540, 552-554, 557, 559, 562, 564, 567, 568, 573, 574, 576, 582, 584, 586, 587, 657, 685, 698, 699, 701, 707, 709-713, 715, 718, 719, 722-724, 736, 795, 831, 857, 900, 901, 907, 913, 922, 935, 1010, 1031, 1033, 1055, 1056, 1071, 1081, 1090, 1095, 1107
- Ius cogens* 37, 77, 207, 236, 275, 276, 285, 287, 510, 700, 702, 703, 705, 707
- Ius soli* 506, 514
- IVF 170, 506, 524, 540, 721
- J
- Journalist 214, 408, 418, 429, 430, 579, 580, 582, 609, 610, 637, 718, 903, 966, 983, 992, 1041, 1095
- Jurisdiction 59-72, 729-791, 1099-1101
- L
- Lack of proper care..... 271, 272, 280, 292, 296-299, 301, 306, 367, 721
- Land rights..... 314, 451, 462, 465, 469, 471, 475, 490-493, 496, 499, 531, 710, 859, 978
- Legal aid..... 244, 246, 625, 761, 764, 769, 773-776, 809-811
- Legal status of provisional measures 87, 179, 188, 191, 197, 222, 266, 597, 693, 729, 881, 882, 894, 898, 908, 909, 911, 934, 937, 943,
945, 977, 1064, 1086, 1099, 1105, 1107, 1108
- Legitimacy..... 193, 201, 401, 421, 494, 507, 611, 614, 654, 666, 695, 957, 1089, 1097, 1111
- Life imprisonment 34, 94, 130, 170, 215, 252, 280, 292, 294, 295, 306, 307, 347, 680, 682, 683, 844, 1009
- Life plan
 see Project of life
- Lifting provisional measures 122, 139, 143, 150, 186, 408, 571, 580, 771, 797, 803, 817, 821, 822, 836-841, 852-854, 867, 889, 955-957, 968, 974, 976, 982, 983
- M
- Margin of appreciation 488, 541, 591, 622, 641, 694, 1096
- Marine environment, protection of 8, 20-21, 28-29, 36, 39, 46, 59, 71-73
- Mass expulsion 133, 144, 207, 210, 274, 276, 378, 405, 409, 487, 501-518, 521, 524, 531, 590, 591, 607, 608, 642, 646, 655, 700, 713-715, 721, 725, 767, 833-835, 965, 1001, 1040, 1092, 1093, 1098
- Medical care 170, 252, 297, 299, 329, 330, 333-335, 340-342, 344, 346, 348-351, 359, 363, 369, 371, 372, 378, 382, 386, 392, 526, 530, 601, 611, 669, 670, 960, 962-964, 1074
- Minors 94, 144, 235, 250, 256, 329, 330, 353, 355, 357-359, 376, 377, 378, 429, 434, 445, 531, 532, 534, 535, 551, 576, 604, 652, 664, 707, 766, 806, 807, 960-962, 1004, 1068
- Monist system of implementation..... 997
- Motivation of provisional measures 117, 125, 143, 161, 189, 190, 200, 202, 305, 580, 688, 691, 699, 718, 867, 879, 995, 1040, 1081, 1085, 1086, 1090, 1105, 1110, 1111
- N
- Negative obligations 46, 49, 210, 376, 458, 486, 538, 589-593, 609, 693-695, 700, 717, 721-724, 934, 944, 1096-1098, 1106
- NGO
 see Non-governmental organisation
- Non-anticipation of judgment..... 15, 16, 42, 191, 225, 360, 394, 544, 721, 722, 732, 851, 878, 879, 1085
- Non-compliance consequences of 1053-1063
 general..... 1108-1110

- official reasons given for..... 977-1018 with provisional measures in re disappearance..... 959 with provisional measures health in detention..... 959-962 with provisional measures health care..... 963-965 with provisional measures halting executions 946-950 with provisional measures ICJ 34-36, 54, 57-59, 90-101
 Non-derogable rights 207, 229, 236, 288, 358, 388, 390, 397-399, 489, 702-706, 708, 714, 724, 917, 1092
 Non-governmental organisation..... 119, 131, 132, 151, 154, 156, 158, 159, 166, 169, 170, 172, 178, 181, 192, 194, 207, 216, 247, 327, 333, 337, 357, 379, 388, 405, 411-413, 417, 427, 431, 434, 497, 554, 578, 595, 600, 606, 624-627, 643, 647, 651, 653, 655, 703, 712, 766, 774, 798, 805, 815, 830, 831, 875, 932, 944, 969, 975, 991, 995, 1018, 1021, 1040, 1067, 1069-1073, 1075-1077, 1079, 1080, 1088, 1096, 1104, 1107-1110
 Non-refoulement..... 132, 134, 139, 144, 174, 181, 210, 230, 265-307, 310, 327, 367, 390-394, 398, 401, 402, 428, 436, 501, 525, 553, 569, 573, 576, 634, 656, 669, 699, 705, 707, 716, 721, 724, 737, 764, 768, 773, 779, 782, 796, 803, 804, 817, 819-821, 831, 833, 836, 863, 870, 871, 874, 878, 901, 903, 904, 917, 925, 951, 953, 954, 978, 1013, 1024, 1053, 1055, 1061, 1090, 1091, 1103
 Nuclear radiation 530, 535, 536, 539
 Nuclear tests 20, 43, 47, 52, 79, 99, 535-537, 539, 707, 804, 860, 1083
- O
- Obligations erga omnes 100, 285, 328, 513, 624, 714, 1084
Ordre public 747, 750, 893, 1111
 Outer limits of provisional measures xx, 474, 729, 1087
- P
- Pardon of criminal conviction..... 219, 221, 226, 238, 239, 243, 252, 690, 949, 1015
 Personal integrity 148, 154, 207, 210, 225, 310, 315, 320, 329, 338, 346, 350, 358-360, 372, 375-378, 389-391, 393, 398, 402, 403, 406, 407, 409-411, 413, 415, 421, 424, 425, 427, 428, 433, 438, 445, 459, 460, 462, 463, 482, 485, 500, 501, 503-505, 509, 521, 523, 525, 535, 541, 542, 546, 553, 557, 559, 567, 576, 577, 582, 585, 587, 592, 593, 596, 598-600, 602, 603, 609, 610, 612, 625, 643, 645, 648, 649, 654, 656, 672, 690, 692, 700, 701, 709, 713, 716, 718, 720, 723-725, 729, 773, 799, 834, 850, 851, 855-857, 868, 917, 924, 933-935, 944, 967, 973, 976, 1003, 1017, 1038, 1046, 1079, 1091-1095, 1105, 1106, 1109, 1110
 Political rights..... 171, 299, 434, 549, 565-567, 568
 Positive obligations..... 46, 171, 313, 317, 319, 322, 372, 373, 376, 380, 383, 432-434, 436, 443, 447-449, 458, 497, 520, 530, 531, 534, 558, 589-592, 659, 669, 698, 706, 708, 724, 1096
 Precaution 771, 864, 866
 Precautionary principle..... 20, 21, 73, 75, 83-86, 538, 657, 792, 858, 859, 861-867, 869-871, 873, 876, 877
 Precedent 37, 58, 61, 66, 275, 394, 528, 540, 583, 596, 597, 608, 714, 722, 780, 801, 926, 927, 952, 959, 970, 974, 1013, 1041, 1045, 1052, 1094
 Pre-empting use of provisional measures 788, 903, 97, 954, 955, 1100
 Pre-emption of outcome judicial process..... 42, 92, 224, 255, 657, 723, 981, 996, 998
 Prejudgment..... 3, 5, 12, 13, 20, 40, 41, 47, 49, 58, 61, 78-82, 150, 213, 222, 224, 656, 683, 720, 722, 748, 848, 878, 1104
 Preventive principle..... 78, 83, 863, 870, 877
 Project of life 378, 505, 513, 524, 541, 548, 553, 717, 725

Index

Promptness of intervention
by African Commission	167, 168
by Bosnia Chamber	185
by CAT and CEDAW	135-138
in European system	173-178
in general	200, 254, 868
by HRC	103-119, 290, 326, 793
by ICJ and ITLOS	9-12
in Inter-American system	149-156
Proprio motu	6, 12, 17, 18, 48, 50, 59, 77, 80, 90, 97, 99, 105, 120, 121, 139, 156-158, 168, 186, 189, 174, 178, 200, 238, 261, 304, 311, 343, 344, 349, 356, 432, 451, 470, 545, 567, 595, 626, 627, 636, 667, 668, 682, 683, 719, 739, 790, 805, 814, 816, 828, 1047, 1057, 1085, 1101
Prosecution of perpetrators	241, 315, 338, 405, 416, 433, 434, 558, 598, 616-617, 658, 661, 666, 670-672, 693, 1074, 1101
Protecting against death threats and harassment
see Purpose of provisional measures
Psychological distress	353, 360, 362, 381
Purpose of provisional measures
Ensuring procedural rights	310, 346, 385, 386, 405-449, 767, 1038
Halting corporal punishment	xx, 257-264, 666, 793, 803
Halting executions	31, 130, 170, 213-256, 265, 287, 291, 292, 396, 598, 629, 642, 658, 678, 691, 738, 779, 784, 808, 817, 948, 951, 1018, 1026, 1062, 1081
Halting expulsion/extradition	265-307
Halting mass or arbitrary expulsion and forced eviction	501-521
Intervening in detention situations	170
Locating disappeared persons	309-328
Protecting against death threats and harassment	209, 330, 385-403, 627
Protecting (indigenous) cultural and religious rights	451-500
R
Real risk	132, 174, 206, 233, 235, 250, 251, 256, 267, 270, 272, 274, 281-287, 289, 291-293, 297, 298, 302, 306, 537, 569, 575, 591, 597, 646, 653, 705, 716, 769, 792, 795, 798, 807, 817, 820, 822-825, 827-829, 842, 863, 864, 867-871, 874-878, 913, 937, 941, 943, 980, 1015, 1025, 1053, 1056, 1058-1063, 1079, 1091, 1099, 1103, 1104, 1107, 1109
Recommendations in Orders denying provisional measures	49
Refugees	129, 165, 181, 265, 272-279, 284, 304, 353, 428, 487, 511, 517, 526, 550, 591, 643, 838, 916, 1056, 1068
Rendition, extraordinary	280, 302, 304-306, 310, 327, 329, 401, 402, 736, 737
Reparation	51-54, 656-696, 699, 701, 715-726, 975, 992, 1035, 1045, 1046, 1050, 1090-1092, 1096-1098, 1100, 1101, 1106
Representation	240, 243, 246, 256, 810
Reservations	40, 62, 64, 67-69, 109, 196, 198, 207, 398, 476, 477, 489, 490, 687, 702, 703, 711, 724, 731, 733, 738, 740, 742, 744, 746-748, 760, 787, 887, 1099, 1108
Responses to provisional measures	946, 951, 958, 963, 965
Restitutio in integrum	31, 32, 44, 52, 53, 92, 664, 670, 678, 689, 693, 698, 701, 752, 892-894, 918, 924, 925, 932, 1044, 1050, 1090
Restitution in kind see restitutio in integrum
Right to counsel	239, 243, 256, 397, 770, 809

S

- Satisfaction 43, 53, 95, 133, 433, 446, 498, 509, 639, 660, 662-666, 672, 687, 693, 779, 957
 Scrutiny by adjudicators, level of 769, 804, 806, 809, 826, 876, 878, 1012, 1082
Seguimiento 751, 1022, 1036, 1052
 Self-determination 377, 464, 468-471, 490, 498, 638, 655, 711
 Sovereignty 52, 84, 305, 401, 412, 513, 622, 694, 779, 944, 1084, 1096, 1111
 Specificity of provisional measures 46-48, 120, 353, 396, 400, 416, 458, 460, 530, 589, 591, 594, 596, 598, 599, 611, 617, 619, 620, 622, 624, 651, 658, 694, 837, 967, 976, 981, 992, 995, 1018, 1041, 1079, 1082, 1096, 1097, 1109
 Standard of proof 63, 64, 78, 79, 321, 323, 326, 806, 807, 830, 841, 843, 869-871, 874-876, 956, 1103, 1104
 Subsidiarity 173, 193, 550, 604, 620, 622, 644, 694, 719, 745, 778, 779, 804, 817, 897, 1096
 Subsidiary means for the determination of international law 197, 201, 202, 931, 1089
 Subsidiary organs 106, 107, 124
Sui generis 183, 586, 716, 788, 1095, 1100
 Suspensive effect 173, 301, 479, 512, 550, 731, 768-770, 772, 778-780, 782, 789, 797-800, 833, 856, 896, 921, 1102
 Systemic integration 194, 201, 1088

T

- Timeliness of State reporting 976
 Top-down approach 1096
 Torture 37, 96, 174, 206, 207, 260, 263, 265-307, 374, 375, 380, 391-403, 447-558, 575, 593, 620-622, 656, 798, 806-808, 815, 817-833, 836-842, 869-971, 901-904, 909-912, 917, 918, 925, 928, 931, 933, 980, 1013, 1015, 1023, 1038, 1049, 1053, 1056-1076, 1080, 1091-1094, 1096, 1098, 1099, 1109
 Transparency of information on provisional measures 3, 5, 6, 9, 60, 90, 103, 123-131, 140-143, 158-164, 169, 178, 187, 189-191, 200, 476, 627, 644, 692, 793, 861, 945, 1018, 1079, 1085-1087, 1108, 1110
 Treaty interpretation 196, 876, 881, 902, 912, 916, 921, 933, 1089, 1105

U

- Undue delay 240, 247, 249, 256, 317, 370, 398, 441, 1032
 Undue hardship 301, 550, 715, 716, 725, 726, 1093
 UNESCO 465, 713, 863
 Urgency
 in general 9, 12, 17, 39, 74, 116, 152, 175, 191, 222, 338, 505, 545, 547, 548, 555, 558, 562, 582, 584, 605, 697, 717, 718, 720, 758, 760, 796, 832, 849, 856, 874, 878, 976, 994
 Material 12, 20, 40, 45, 52, 74, 77-86, 116-118, 192, 729, 791, 821
 Temporal 12, 44, 74-76, 192, 295, 705, 717, 729, 771, 785, 788, 791-801, 821, 833, 868, 874, 875, 1102, 1103

W

- Withdrawal from individual complaint system 738, 739, 742, 847, 951, 1043
 Withdrawal of provisional measures see Lifting provisional measures
 Written judgment 240, 249, 256, 679, 756, 765, 776, 777

CURRICULUM VITAE

Eva Rieter (1970) studied law at Maastricht University (Master of Dutch law, specialization international law, 1995). She went on to obtain an LL.M degree at the University of Virginia School of Law (LL.M. 1996, specializations human rights law and US law), where she also worked as a research assistant for Prof. R.B. Lillich and received the McClure Fellowship in human rights. She joined the Maastricht Centre for Human Rights in 1997. In 1999 she received a Max van der Stoep Human Rights award for her article 'Interim Measures by the World Court to Suspend the Execution of an Individual: the Breard Case', published in the Netherlands Quarterly of Human Rights. She has published a range of articles and is the co-author of a book on the proceedings before the European Court of Human Rights, the UN Human Rights Committee and the other three Geneva bodies (2002; revised edition 2008). She has taught public international law and human rights at Maastricht University School of Law and University College Maastricht. Currently she is assistant professor at Radboud University Nijmegen lecturing public international law and international human rights law.

SCHOOL OF HUMAN RIGHTS RESEARCH SERIES

The School of Human Rights Research is a joint effort by human rights researchers in the Netherlands. Its central research theme is the nature and meaning of international standards in the field of human rights, their application and promotion in the national legal order, their interplay with national standards, and the international supervision of such application. The School of Human Rights Research Series only includes English titles that contribute to a better understanding of the different aspects of human rights.

Editorial Board of the Series:

Prof. dr. J.E. Goldschmidt (Utrecht University), Prof. dr. D.A. Hellema (Utrecht University), Prof. dr. W.J.M. van Genugten (Tilburg University), Prof. dr. M.T. Kamminga (Maastricht University), Prof. dr. P.A.M. Mevis (Erasmus University Rotterdam), Prof. dr. R.A. Lawson (Leiden University) and Dr. O.M. Ribbelink (Asser Institute).

Published titles within the Series:

- 1 Brigit C.A. Toebes, The Right to Health as a Human Right in International Law
ISBN 90-5095-057-4
- 2 Ineke Boerefijn, The Reporting Procedure under the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. Practice and Procedures of the Human Rights Committee
ISBN 90-5095-074-4
- 3 Kitty Arambulo, Strengthening the Supervision of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. Theoretical and Procedural Aspects
ISBN 90-5095-058-2
- 4 Marlies Glasius, Foreign Policy on Human Rights. Its Influence on Indonesia under Soeharto
ISBN 90-5095-089-2
- 5 Cornelis D. de Jong, The Freedom of Thought, Conscience and Religion or Belief in the United Nations (1946-1992)
ISBN 90-5095-137-6
- 6 Heleen Bosma, Freedom of Expression in England and under the ECHR: in Search of a Common Ground. A Foundation for the Application of the Human Rights Act 1998 in English Law
ISBN 90-5095-136-8
- 7 Mielle Bulterman, Human Rights in the External Relations of the European Union
ISBN 90-5095-164-3

- 8 Esther M. van den Berg, The Influence of Domestic NGOs on Dutch Human Rights Policy. Case Studies on South Africa, Namibia, Indonesia and East Timor
ISBN 90-5095-159-7
- 9 Ian Seiderman, Hierarchy in International Law: the Human Rights Dimension
ISBN 90-5095-165-1
- 10 Anna Meijknecht, Towards International Personality: the Position of Minorities and Indigenous Peoples in International Law
ISBN 90-5095-166-X
- 11 Mohamed Eltayeb, A Human Rights Approach to Combating Religious Persecution. Cases from Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and Sudan
ISBN 90-5095-170-8
- 12 Machteld Boot, Genocide, Crimes Against Humanity, War Crimes: Nullum Crimen Sine Lege and the Subject Matter Jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court
ISBN 90-5095-216-X
- 13 Corinne Packer, Using Human Rights to Change Tradition. Traditional Practices Harmful to Women's Reproductive Health in sub-Saharan Africa
ISBN 90-5095-226-7
- 14 Theo R.G. van Banning, The Human Right to Property
ISBN 90-5095-203-8
- 15 Yvonne M. Donders, Towards a Right to Cultural Identity?
ISBN 90-5095-238-0
- 16 Göran K. Sluiter, International Criminal Adjudication and the Collection of Evidence: Obligations of States
ISBN 90-5095-227-5
- 17 Nicola Jägers, Corporate Human Rights Obligations: in Search of Accountability
ISBN 90-5095-240-2
- 18 Magdalena Sepúlveda, The Nature of the Obligations under the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights
ISBN 90-5095-260-7
- 19 Mitsue Inazumi, Universal Jurisdiction in Modern International Law: Expansion of National Jurisdiction for Prosecuting Serious Crimes under International Law
ISBN 90-5095-366-2
- 20 Anne-Marie L.M. de Brouwer, Supranational Criminal Prosecution of Sexual Violence: The ICC and the Practice of the ICTY and the ICTR
ISBN 90-5095-533-9

- 21 Jeroen Gutter, Thematic Procedures of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights and International Law: in Search of a Sense of Community
ISBN 90-5095-557-6
- 22 Hilde Reiding, The Netherlands and the Development of International Human Rights Instruments
ISBN 978-90-5095-654-3
- 23 Ingrid Westendorp, Women and Housing: Gender Makes a Difference
ISBN 978-90-5095-669-7
- 24 Quirine A.M. Eijkman, We Are Here to Serve You! Public Security, Police Reform and Human Rights Implementation in Costa Rica
ISBN 978-90-5095-704-5
- 25 Antoine Ch. Buyse, Post-conflict Housing Restitution. The European Human Rights Perspective with a case study on Bosnia and Herzegovina
ISBN 978-90-5095-770-0
- 26 Gentian Zyberi, The Humanitarian Face of the International Court of Justice. Its Contribution to Interpreting and Developing International Human Rights and Humanitarian Law Rules and Principles
ISBN 978-90-5095-792-2
- 27 Dragoş Cucereanu, Aspects of Regulating Freedom of Expression on the Internet
ISBN 978-90-5095-842-4
- 28 Ton Liefwaard, Deprivation of Liberty of Children in Light of International Human Rights Law and Standards
ISBN 978-90-5095-838-7
- 29 Laura van Waas, Nationality Matters. Statelessness under International Law
ISBN 978-90-5095-854-7
- 30 Jeroen Denkers, The World Trade Organization and Import Bans in Response to Violations of Fundamental Labour Rights
ISBN 978-90-5095-855-4
- 31 Irene Hadiprayitno, The Dialectics of Development Practice and the Internationally Declared Right to Development, with Special Reference to Indonesia
ISBN 978-90-5095-932-2
- 32 Michał Gondek, The Reach of Human Rights in a Globalising World: Extraterritorial Application of Human Rights Treaties
ISBN 978-90-5095-817-2
- 33 Jeff Handmaker, Advocating for Accountability: Civic-State Interactions to Protect Refugees in South Africa
ISBN 978-905095-910-0

- 34 Anna Oehmichen, Hazard or Right? Terrorism and Anti-Terror Legislation: The Terrorised Legislator? A Comparison of Counter-Terror Legislation and Its Implications on Human Rights in the Legal Systems of the United Kingdom, Spain, Germany and France
ISBN 978-90-5095-956-8
- 35 Simon Walker, The Future of Human Rights Impact Assessments of Trade Agreements
ISBN 978-90-5095-986-5
- 36 Fleur van Leeuwen, Women's Rights Are Human Rights: The Practice of the United Nations Human Rights Committee and the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights
ISBN 978-90-5095-980-3