

Preventing Irreparable Harm
Provisional Measures in International
Human Rights Adjudication

Eva Rieter
Preventing Irreparable Harm. Provisional Measures in International Human Rights Adjudication

The publication of this book has been made possible by financial contributions of the Stichting Internationale Informatie en Communicatie, the J.E. Jurriaanse Stichting and Maastricht University.

Cover cartoon © 2002/2009 by Kirk Anderson, www.kirktoons.com.

Layout: Marina Jodogne

A commercial edition of this dissertation will be published by Intersentia under ISBN 978-90-5095-931-5

© 2010 Intersentia
www.intersentia.com

Behoudens uitzondering door de wet gesteld, mag zonder schriftelijke toestemming van de rechthebbende(n) op het auteursrecht c.q. de uitgevers van deze uitgave, door de rechtshebbende(n) gemachtigd namens hem (hen) op te treden, niet uit deze uitgave worden verveelvoudigd en/of openbaar gemaakt door middel van druk, fotocopie, microfilm of anderszins, hetgeen ook van toepassing is op de gehele of gedeeltelijke bewerking. De uitgevers zijn met uitsluiting van ieder ander onherroepelijk door de auteur gemachtigd de door derden verschuldigde vergoedingen van kopiëren als bedoeld in artikel 17 lid 2 van de Auteurswet 1912 en in het KB van 20-6-'64 (Stb. 351) ex artikel 16b der Auteurswet 1912, te doen innen door (en overeenkomstig de reglementen van) de Stichting Reprorecht te Amsterdam.

Niets uit deze uitgave mag worden verveelvoudigd en/of openbaar gemaakt door middel van druk, fotocopie, microfilm of op welke andere wijze ook, zonder voorafgaande schriftelijke toestemming van de uitgevers.

No part of this book may be reproduced in any form, by print, photocopy, microfilm or any other means, without written permission from the publishers.

Preventing Irreparable Harm
Provisional Measures in International
Human Rights Adjudication

DISSERTATION

to obtain the degree of Doctor at the Maastricht University, on the authority of the Rector Magnificus,
Prof. dr. G.P.M.F. Mols in accordance with the decision of the Board of Deans, to be defended in public on Friday 12 March 2010 at 14:00 hours

by

Eva Rozemarijn Rieter

Supervisor

Prof. dr. Th.C. van Boven

Assessment Committee

Prof. dr. M. Kamminga (Chairman)

Prof. dr. C. Flinterman

Prof. dr. C. Medina Quiroga (Universidad de Chile)

Prof. dr. M. Scheinin (European University Institute)

Prof. dr. T. Spronken

*To my mother
Ella Verhamme
(1943-1990)*

To Mark

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

It has been a great privilege that Prof. Theo van Boven, whose life's work is to show that 'people matter', was willing to act as my doctoral advisor. The issue of provisional measures in human rights adjudication evidently is close to his heart and, as I argue in this book, conceptually related to the issue of reparations, an area of his particular expertise. Our discussions were interesting and inspiring. Moreover I would like to thank him for his unfailing support throughout the many years of the project that finally resulted in this book.

I have been incredibly fortunate in my family and friends. I cannot name them all here, but I will just mention Marion Golany-Wilbers, Nannet Heilhof, Marloes van den Akker and Denise Prévost who each in their own way, and from different places in the world, continue to show that 'people matter'. The regular thesis discussions, exchanging parts of chapters, with Denise have been great. Equally, several other friends have read and commented on various drafts. I would like to mention in particular Ilse Van Den Driessche, Alette Smeulders and Harald Quadvlieg.

Special mention deserve my research assistants, in particular Folkert de Vries, Sebastiaan van der Zwaan, Hansje Plagman, Nora Paulke, Amra Avdic and Pam Nicolai who worked for me over extended periods in a manner that was both intelligent and enjoyable. Several friends and family were willing to lend me a hand in a similar manner, among them Titia Rieter, Olivier Rieter, Hanneke Jacobs and Katrijn Hamakers.

Former colleagues at Maastricht University and my colleagues at the Department of International and European law of Radboud University Nijmegen have made me feel very welcome. What has been particularly important to the eventual completion of this book was the encouragement of Prof. Karel Wellens, Chair of the department of International and European Law and of Prof. Piet Hein van Kempen, professor of criminal law and procedure and of human rights law, at the Radboud University Nijmegen. Professor Wellens has been involved closely in the last stages of completion of the book. I am very grateful for the manner in which he read the complete manuscript and gave pertinent suggestions. Of the many others who have been supportive at crucial stages, I will just mention Prof. Fred Grünfeld, Prof. Fons Coomans and Prof. Ellen Vos of the Maastricht University department of International and European law and Henri de Waele of Radboud University department of International and European law. Fiorina Argante, Marion Grevinga, Nannet Heilhof and Ilse Van Den Driessche have painstakingly helped me out with some of the most tedious finalisations of the book. Finally I would like to thank Marina Jodogne who swiftly and competently prepared the voluminous manuscript for publication.

The support of the Netherlands Organisation for Scientific Research (NWO) is gratefully acknowledged for enabling me to visit the Inter-American Commission and Court in Washington, D.C. and San José, Costa Rica, respectively. I am indebted to the various practitioners I spoke with, such as (former) members of adjudicatory bodies and staff members at the relevant secretariats (Geneva, San José, Washington DC, Strasbourg). They are mentioned in Chapter II in the respective sections discussing the availability of information on provisional measures. In this respect I would like to single out for sharing their insights with me Prof. Scheinin, who has also been very helpful in the process of gaining access to information on the practice of the HRC with regard to provisional measures, Judge Thomas Buergenthal and Judge Cançado Trindade, both former Presidents of the Inter-American Court, Commissioners Goldman, Mendez and Grossman, and finally Brian Tittmore, scholar and staff member at the Inter-American Commission, whose particularly intelligent and kind assistance was very much appreciated. He died in 2007, but he has made an important contribution to the Inter-American jurisprudence.

Acknowledgments

This book is dedicated to my mother, who died a long time ago but whose memory continues to be present, gentle, with a love for people and words, quiet humour and insistence on respect. Crucial to me are always my family (Toon, Titia and Olivier Rieter, aunts and uncles, etc.) and friends. This book is dedicated to them as well. It is meant in particular for my partner Mark Kirkels, our daughter Julia, who was born in April 2009, and her brother and sister Luuk and Hester. Thank you Mark for supporting me in many ways in completing this book. Our love reminds me of what is important.

This manuscript was completed in December 2008, with incidental references to subsequent events.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS	vii
TABLE OF CONTENTS	ix
LIST OF ABBREVIATIONS	xxvii
GENERAL INTRODUCTION	xxix
1 Taking urgent action in international human rights adjudication	xxix
2 Provisional measures in human rights adjudication: changing the traditional concept?	xxxii
3 Publication and motivation	xxxii
4 Aspects of provisional measures in human rights adjudication	xxxv
5 Human rights systems	xxxvi
6 The common core and outer limits of provisional measures: an outline of the book	xxxviii

PART I: SETTING

INTRODUCTION	3
CHAPTER I
DEVELOPMENT OF THE CONCEPT OF PROVISIONAL MEASURES BY THE ICJ AND ITLOS	5
1 Introduction	5
2 The authority to use provisional measures	5
2.1 Introduction	5
2.2 Proprio motu use	6
2.3 Transparency, promptness and delegation	9
3 The purpose of provisional measures in general international law	12
3.1 Introduction	12
3.2 Adjudication of conflicts between States: the traditional purpose of provisional measures	13
3.2.1 Introduction	13
3.2.2 Preservation of rights and prevention of prejudice	14
3.2.3 Preservation of or return to the status quo/non-anticipation of the judgment	15
3.2.4 Non-aggravation or extension of the dispute	16
3.2.5 Preserving the integrity of the proceedings/preserving the evidence	19
3.2.6 Preventing serious harm to the (marine) environment	20
3.2.7 Preventing irreparable harm	21
3.3 Conflicts between States with regard to the protection of the individual	22
3.3.1 Introduction	22
3.3.2 Protecting nationals	23

Table of Contents

3.3.3	Protecting diplomats and other nationals.....	23
3.3.4	Protecting people in border conflict cases: collateral human beings	26
3.3.5	Releasing crew and the protection of the (marine) environment	28
3.3.6	Halting gross human rights violations	29
3.3.7	Protecting nationals: halting executions	31
3.4	Preventing irreparable harm and the humanization of international law	36
3.4.1	Introduction	36
3.4.2	Humanization	37
3.4.3	The concept of irreparable harm.....	38
3.5	The relation to the rights claimed and the possible judgment on the merits	39
3.6	Provisional measures and prejudgment	41
3.7	Protection and reparation.....	46
3.7.1	Introduction	46
3.7.2	Action and abstention: positive obligations in Orders for provisional measures	47
3.7.3	Specificity of decisions about provisional measures	47
3.7.4	Relation to reparation	51
3.8	The beneficiaries of provisional measures and the rights of the addressees	55
3.8.1	Introduction	55
3.8.2	Rights by proxy (diplomatic protection).....	55
3.8.3	General interest	56
3.8.4	Third parties' rights and obligations.....	56
3.8.5	Rights of the addressee States	57
4	Jurisdiction on the merits and the use of provisional measures	59
4.1	Decision-making on jurisdictional issues	65
4.2	Removing cases from the Court's List (docket) to discourage requests for provisional measures	65
4.3	The development of international law and Article IX Genocide Convention as a jurisdictional basis for provisional measures.....	67
4.4	Armed conflict and CEDAW as a jurisdictional basis for provisional measures.....	69
4.5	Provisional measures and forum prorogatum	71
4.6	ITLOS and prima facie jurisdiction	71
4.7	The duration of provisional measures.....	73
5	Assessment of urgency.....	74
5.1	Introduction	74
5.2	Assessment of temporal urgency	75
5.3	Assessment of material urgency	77
5.3.1	Introduction	77
5.3.2	Material urgency	78
5.3.3	The preventive and precautionary principles.....	83
6	The legal status of provisional measures	87
7	Following up on official State responses	90
7.1	ICJ Rules on follow-up.....	90
7.2	ITLOS Rules on follow-up	91
7.3	Follow-up in death penalty cases.....	91
7.4	Follow-up in the context of armed conflict	95
8	Conclusion.....	98
 CHAPTER II
THE USE OF PROVISIONAL MEASURES IN THE CONTEXT OF THE VARIOUS HUMAN RIGHTS
SYSTEMS		103
1	Introduction	103

2	Human Rights Committee	103
2.1	Introduction	103
2.2	The right of individual complaint: the HRC and the OP to the ICCPR	104
2.3	The power and promptness of the HRC to take provisional measures	105
2.3.1	Introduction	105
2.3.2	The power of the HRC to use provisional measures.....	106
2.3.3	Promptness and delegation	106
2.3.4	Explaining promptness and tardiness	108
2.3.4.1	Introduction	108
2.3.4.2	Death penalty cases	110
2.3.4.3	Detention and disappearance cases.....	111
2.3.4.4	Cases involving threats to indigenous culture	115
2.3.4.5	Urgency after registration of the petition.....	116
2.3.5	Contacting the addressee State with provisional measures.....	116
2.3.6	Related Rules of Procedure	119
2.3.7	Proprio motu use of provisional measures.....	120
2.3.8	Withdrawing provisional measures	122
2.4	Decisions of the HRC to take provisional measures: transparency or the lack thereof?.....	123
2.4.1	Introduction	123
2.4.2	Secondary literature and visit of the Geneva Secretariat	123
2.4.3	Drafting history Rule 86 (current Rule 92).....	124
2.4.4	Separate publication of decisions on provisional measures.....	124
2.4.5	Information in the Annual Reports	125
2.4.6	Information in the Committee's Views and inadmissibility decisions.....	126
2.4.7	Dividing decisions in time-periods depending on the availability of information	127
2.4.8	The relevance of discontinued cases.....	129
2.4.9	No information on pending cases	130
2.4.10	Construing the purpose of provisional measures from the Committee's case law.....	131
3	CAT, CEDAW and CERD	132
3.1	Introduction	132
3.2	The right of individual complaint and CERD, CAT and CEDAW.....	134
3.3	Power and promptness of CAT and CEDAW to take provisional measures and the possibilities of the new Committee against Disappearances.....	135
3.3.1	Introduction	135
3.3.2	Promptness and delegation	137
3.3.3	Proprio motu.....	139
3.3.4	Withdrawing provisional measures	139
3.4	Decisions of CAT and CEDAW to take provisional measures: transparency or the lack thereof?	141
4	The Inter-American human rights system	144
4.1	Introduction	144
4.2	Right of individual complaint and the Inter-American Commission and Court	145
4.2.1	Introduction	145
4.2.2	Inter-American Commission	145
4.2.3	The Inter-American Court	148
4.3	Power and promptness of the Inter-American Commission and Court.....	149
4.3.1	Introduction	149
4.3.2	The Commission's Rules of Procedure (2000/2003).....	152
4.3.3	The Court's competence.....	152
4.3.4	Delegation and consultation	153

Table of Contents

4.3.5	Promptness	155
4.3.6	Proprio motu.....	156
4.4	Decisions by the Inter-American Commission and Court to take provisional measures: transparency or the lack thereof?	158
4.4.1	Introduction	158
4.4.2	The Commission	159
4.4.3	The Court	163
5	The African human rights system.....	165
5.1	Introduction	165
5.2	The right of individual complaint before the African Commission and Court	165
5.3	Power and promptness in the African system.....	167
5.4	Decisions to use provisional measures: transparency or the lack thereof?	169
6	The European human rights system.....	170
6.1	Introduction	170
6.2	The right of individual complaint.....	170
6.3	Power and promptness in the European system.....	173
6.3.1	Introduction	173
6.3.2	Inter-State cases.....	175
6.3.3	Delegation and promptness	176
6.3.4	Proprio motu.....	178
6.4	Decisions to use provisional measures: transparency or the lack thereof?	178
7	The Bosnia Human Rights Chamber	182
7.1	Introduction	182
7.2	The right of individual complaint.....	182
7.3	The power and promptness of the Bosnia Human Chamber.....	184
7.3.1	Introduction	184
7.3.2	Delegation	185
7.3.3	Proprio motu use and withdrawal of provisional measures	186
7.3.4	Continuity.....	186
7.4	Decisions to use provisional measures: transparency or the lack thereof?	187
8	Conclusion.....	188
8.1	The authority to use provisional measures	188
8.1.1	Introduction	188
8.1.2	Proprio motu use	189
8.1.3	Delegation	189
8.2	Publication and motivation of provisional measures	189
8.3	Convergence or divergence?	191
	CONCLUSION	199

PART II: PURPOSE

INTRODUCTION.....	205
--------------------------	------------

CHAPTER III

HALTING EXECUTIONS	213
1 Introduction	213
2 Practice	214

2.1	Introduction	214
2.2	ECHR	214
2.3	Inter-American Commission and Court	215
2.4	HRC	218
3	Relation between provisional measures to halt expulsion or extan execution and the expected decision on the merits	219
3.1	Introduction	219
3.2	Prejudgment	222
3.3	The published Orders of the Inter-American Court to halt executions	225
3.4	Unpublished provisional measures to halt executions	227
3.4.1	Introduction	227
3.4.2	The right to life as such	228
3.4.2.1	ECtHR	228
3.4.2.2	Bosnia and Protocol No. 6 to the ECHR (abolition in peace time)	231
3.4.2.3	HRC and the right to life as such	233
3.4.3	The right to life and the person of the petitioner	233
3.4.4	The right to life and the fairness of the proceedings	239
3.4.4.1	Trial in public and the prohibition of forced confessions	240
3.4.4.2	The right to consular notification	240
3.4.4.3	Freedom from ex post facto laws	241
3.4.4.4	Independence and impartiality of the judiciary	241
3.4.4.5	Rights of amnesty, pardon or commutation and the prohibition to execute persons pending judicial or administrative proceedings	243
3.4.4.6	Right to counsel	243
3.4.4.7	Adequate time and facilities to prepare a defence	245
3.4.4.8	Right to appeal and effective representation on appeal	246
3.4.4.9	Undue delay	247
3.4.4.10	The lack of a written judgment by domestic courts	249
3.4.5	The death row phenomenon	250
4	Conclusion	255
 CHAPTER IV
HALTING CORPORAL PUNISHMENT		257
1	Introduction	257
2	The practice of the adjudicators to take provisional measures to halt corporal punishment	257
3	Relation between provisional measures to halt corporal punishment and the expected decision on the merits	259
4	Conclusion	263
 CHAPTER V
HALTING EXPULSION OR EXTRADITION IN NON-REFOULEMENT CASES		265
1	Introduction	265
2	Practice	265
2.1	Introduction	265
2.2	CAT	266
2.3	HRC	267
2.4	European Commission and Court	271
2.5	African Commission	273
2.6	Inter-American Commission	274
2.7	Bosnia Chamber	279

Table of Contents

3	Relation between provisional measures to halt expulsion or extradition and the expected decision on the merits.....	280
3.1	Introduction	280
3.2	Future violations in another State	280
3.2.1	Introduction	280
3.2.2	Obligation ‘to ensure’	281
3.2.3	The ICCPR and re-introduction of the death penalty through extradition	287
3.3	Findings ratione materiae	290
3.3.1	Introduction	290
3.3.2	Death row phenomenon	292
3.3.3	Life imprisonment	294
3.3.4	Lack of proper care	296
3.4	Findings ratione personae	302
3.4.1	Introduction	302
3.4.2	Indirect danger through removal	302
3.4.3	Threats by non-State actors	303
3.4.4	Extraordinary renditions and other forms of transfer	304
4	Conclusion	306
 CHAPTER VI
	LOCATING AND PROTECTING DISAPPEARED PERSONS	309
1	Introduction	309
2	Practice	310
2.1	HRC	311
2.2	Inter-American Commission	313
2.3	European system	316
2.4	Bosnia Chamber	316
3	Relation between provisional measures locate and protect disappeared persons and the expected decision on the merits	317
3.1	Introduction	317
3.2	HRC	317
3.3	Inter-American system	319
3.4	European system	321
3.5	Bosnia Chamber	324
4	Conclusion	326
 CHAPTER VII
	INTERVENING IN DETENTION SITUATIONS INVOLVING RISKS TO HEALTH AND DIGNITY	329
1	Introduction	329
2	Practice	330
2.1	Introduction	330
2.2	Protecting against certain interrogation methods and other ill treatment	330
2.2.1	European system	330
2.2.2	Inter-American system	332
2.3	Requests for information on the health situation of detainees	338
2.4	Ensuring access to health care in detention	343
2.4.1	Introduction	343
2.4.2	HRC	343
2.4.3	Inter-American system	349
2.4.4	African system	350
2.4.5	European system	352

2.5	Protecting particularly vulnerable detainees	353
2.5.1	Introduction	353
2.5.2	Protecting the health and safety of minors in detention	353
2.5.3	(Method of) confinement and protecting detainees in psychological distress	360
2.5.4	Protecting detainees on a hunger strike	363
2.6	Access to health care for death row inmates?	366
3	Relation between provisional measures to intervene in detention situations and the expected decision on the merits	371
3.1	Introduction	371
3.2	HRC	372
3.3	Inter-American system	375
3.4	African system	379
3.5	European system	380
4	Conclusion	382

CHAPTER VIII

ENSURING PROCEDURAL RIGHTS TO PROTECT THE RIGHT TO LIFE AND PERSONAL

INTEGRITY.....		385
1	Introduction.....	385
2	The practice of the adjudicators.....	386
2.1	Introduction.....	386
2.2	HRC.....	386
2.3	Inter-American system.....	388
2.4	African system.....	392
2.5	European system.....	393
3	Relation between provisional measures to ensure procedural rights and the expected decision on the merits.....	396
3.1	Introduction.....	396
3.2	Status of auxiliary rights.....	397
3.3	Effective control.....	401
4	Conclusion.....	402

CHAPTER IX

PROTECTING AGAINST DEATH THREATS AND HARASSMENT

1	Introduction	405
2	The practice of the adjudicators to take provisional measures to halt death threats and harassment	406
2.1	Introduction	406
2.2	Protecting persons involved in international human rights adjudication	406
2.2.1	Introduction	406
2.2.2	Inter-American Commission and Court	407
2.2.3	African system	410
2.2.4	CAT	411
2.2.5	HRC	411
2.2.6	ECtHR	415
2.3	Protecting persons bringing a claim regarding death threats and harassment	417
2.3.1	Introduction	417
2.3.2	Persons involved in domestic (human rights) investigations	417
2.3.3	Human rights defenders generally	419
2.3.4	Peace Community	423
2.3.5	Union leaders	425

Table of Contents

2.3.6	Persons involved in land disputes and indigenous communities	426
2.3.7	Refugees and internally displaced persons	428
2.3.8	Detainees	428
2.3.9	Journalists	429
2.3.10	Politicians and government officials	430
2.3.11	CEDAW and domestic violence	431
3	Relation between provisional measures to halt death threats and harassment and the expected decision on the merits	432
3.1	Introduction	432
3.2	Inter-American system	434
3.3	HRC	435
3.4	HRC and death threats on death row	440
3.5	CAT	443
3.6	CEDAW	443
3.7	Inter-American Commission and Court	444
3.8	ECtHR	446
4	Conclusion	448

CHAPTER X

PROTECTING (INDIGENOUS) CULTURAL AND RELIGIOUS RIGHTS	451
1	Introduction
2	The practice of the adjudicators to take provisional measures to protect cultural or religious rights
2.1	Introduction
2.2	HRC
2.3	Inter-American Commission
2.4	Inter-American Court
2.5	African Commission
2.6	Bosnia Human Rights Chamber and cultural/religious survival
3	Relation between provisional measures to protect cultural and religious rights and the expected decision on the merits
3.1	Introduction
3.2	Self-determination
3.3	Land rights and collective aspects of the right to culture
3.4	Moment of infringement-moment of irreparability
3.5	Collective rights and human dignity: special status right to culture of indigenous peoples
3.6	Consultation of indigenous peoples and impact assessment
4	Conclusion

CHAPTER XI

HALTING MASS OR ARBITRARY EXPULSION AND FORCED EVICTION	501
1	Introduction
2	The practice of the adjudicators to take provisional measures to halt mass or arbitrary expulsion and forced eviction
2.1	Introduction
2.2	The Inter-American system
2.3	African Commission
2.4	ECtHR
2.5	Bosnia Chamber

3	Relation between provisional measures to halt mass or arbitrary expulsion and forced eviction and the expected decision on the merits	509
3.1	Introduction	509
3.2	Mass and arbitrary expulsion.....	510
3.3	Forced eviction	517
4	Conclusion.....	520
CHAPTER XII
PROVISIONAL MEASURES IN OTHER SITUATIONS		523
1	Introduction	523
2	Towards the common core or towards the outer limits?.....	523
2.1	Introduction	523
2.2	Providing assistance in life threatening situations or situations violating personal integrity	525
2.2.1	Introduction	525
2.2.2	Practice of the European Commission on Human Rights.....	525
2.2.3	Practice of the Bosnia Chamber	526
2.2.4	Practice of the Inter-American Commission to ensure HIV medication outside of the detention context	526
2.2.5	Practice of the Inter-American Commission to call for the provision of humanitarian support.....	528
2.2.6	Conclusion.....	530
2.3	Protecting the physical or mental integrity of minors.....	531
2.3.1	Introduction	531
2.3.2	Children of disappeared parents	532
2.3.3	Children who have suffered abuse from their parents or caretakers	534
2.3.4	Conclusion.....	535
2.4	Protection against nuclear radiation.....	535
2.5	Preservation of IVF embryos.....	540
2.6	Releasing from (prolonged) arbitrary detention	541
2.6.1	Introduction	541
2.6.2	Practice in the Inter-American system.....	542
2.6.3	Practice in the African system	549
2.6.4	Practice by the EComHR.....	549
2.6.5	Practice by the Bosnia Chamber.....	550
2.6.6	Conclusion.....	551
2.7	Preventing impunity	553
2.7.1	Introduction	553
2.7.2	Practice.....	554
2.7.3	Conclusion.....	557
2.8	Protecting the independence of the judiciary in the context of harassment	558
2.8.1	Introduction	558
2.8.2	The practice in the Inter-American system.....	559
2.8.3	Conclusion.....	562
2.9	Preserving evidence.....	562
2.9.1	Introduction	562
2.9.2	Practice.....	563
2.9.3	Conclusion.....	563
2.10	Halting the destruction of a work of art.....	564
2.11	Securing political rights.....	565
2.11.1	Introduction	565

Table of Contents

2.11.2	Practice of the Bosnia Chamber	565
2.11.3	Inter-American practice.....	566
2.11.4	Conclusion.....	568
3	Beyond the outer limits?.....	568
3.1	Introduction	568
3.2	Halting deportation in ‘family life type’ cases (not involving non-refoulement)	569
3.3	Protecting freedom of expression and access to information (without threats to life and physical integrity)	577
3.3.1	Introduction	577
3.3.2	Inter-American practice.....	578
3.3.3	Conclusion.....	583
3.4	Halting the judicial seizure of assets or other financial measures.....	584
4	Conclusion.....	586

CHAPTER XIII

PROTECTION		589
1	Introduction	589
2	Action or abstention: positive obligations in Orders for provisional measures	589
2.1	Introduction	589
2.2	Positive obligations implied in orders to abstain from acting	590
2.3	Positive obligations on the merits	590
2.4	Explicit positive obligations in provisional measures	591
2.5	Conclusion	593
3	The specificity of provisional measures	594
3.1	Introduction	594
3.2	Cautious phrasing and lack of precedent	597
3.3	Specific requirements found in orders for provisional measures	598
3.3.1	Introduction	598
3.3.2	Concrete provisional measures in various issue areas	598
3.3.2.1	Halting executions	598
3.3.2.2	Protecting the life and personal integrity of recently disappeared persons	598
3.3.2.3	Protecting the life and personal integrity of detainees	599
3.3.2.4	Preventing expulsion or extradition	605
3.3.2.5	Physical protection against death threats	605
3.3.2.6	Protection against mass expulsion	607
3.3.2.7	Protecting freedom of expression	609
3.3.2.8	Protecting a range of rights	609
3.3.3	An incremental approach to specificity: the Peace Community and death threats and harassment	611
3.3.3.1	Introduction	611
3.3.3.2	Preventing forced displacement	612
3.3.3.3	Confronting the paramilitaries	613
3.3.3.4	Official recognition of human rights defenders	614
3.3.3.5	Practical measures for physical protection	615
3.3.3.6	Protecting free passage	615
3.3.3.7	Investigation and prosecution	616
3.3.3.8	Respect other rights	617
3.3.4	The obligation of the State and the Inter-American Commission to provide information	618
3.4	Conclusion on the specificity of provisional measures	619

4	The beneficiaries and addressees of provisional measures	623
4.1	Introduction	623
4.2	The relation between beneficiaries, petitioners and addressees	624
4.2.1	Petitioners and victims	624
4.2.2	Individuals or groups	626
4.2.3	Addressees	629
4.2.4	The petitioner as addressee	630
4.2.5	Rights of addressees	632
4.2.6	Indirect beneficiaries	634
4.3	Consent, consultation and representation	634
4.3.1	Introduction	634
4.3.2	Beneficiaries and their consent	635
4.3.3	Consultation	636
4.3.4	Representation and collective rights	637
4.4	Extending the group of beneficiaries, identification and representation	642
4.4.1	Introduction	642
4.4.2	Extending the group of beneficiaries	642
4.4.3	Early warning	645
4.4.4	Individual identification of each beneficiary?	645
4.4.4.1	Introduction	645
4.4.4.2	Mass expulsion	646
4.4.4.3	Protection of Peace Community	648
4.4.4.4	More generalised provisional measures	650
4.4.5	Identification and representation	653
4.5	Conclusion on beneficiaries and addressees of provisional measures	654
5	The relation to cessation, assurances of non-repetition and reparation	656
5.1	Introduction	656
5.2	Provisional measures and reparation	658
5.3	Provisional measures and cessation, non-repetition, reparation: a unison of purpose	660
5.4	A continuum of protection	666
5.4.1	Introduction	666
5.4.2	Halting corporal punishment and the expected obligations on the merits	666
5.4.3	Halting expulsion and extradition and the expected obligations on the merits	668
5.4.4	Health and whereabouts and the expected obligations on the merits	669
5.4.5	Death threats and harassment and the expected obligations on the merits	670
5.4.6	Cultural survival and the expected obligations on the merits	672
5.4.7	Halt interrogation techniques and the expected obligations on the merits	678
5.5	Halting executions and the expected obligations on the merits and reparations	678
5.5.1	Introduction	678
5.5.2	The rationale of the Committee's approach until its General Comment (2004)	679
5.5.3	HRC General Comment on the right to an effective remedy (Art. 2 ICCPR)	686
5.5.4	The Inter-American practice regarding obligations on the merits and reparation in death penalty cases	688
5.5.5	Conclusion on halting executions and the expected obligations on the merits and reparation	691
5.6	Conclusion on the relation of provisional measures to cessation, assurances of non-repetition and reparations	691
6	Conclusion: protecting the beneficiary against irreparable harm	694

Table of Contents

CONCLUSION	697
1 Introduction	697
2 Common core and outer limits of the concept	699
2.1 Introduction	699
2.2 Common core: preventing irreparable harm to persons	700
2.2.1 Introduction	700
2.2.2 Protecting the right to life and preventing torture and cruel treatment	705
2.2.3 Protecting cultural survival	708
2.2.4 Protecting against mass expulsion, internal displacement and forced eviction	713
2.3 Outer limits: preventing irreversible harm to the claim or procedure	715
3 Protective measures, merits and reparation	719
4 Conclusion	724

PART III: IMPACT OF THE IRREPARABLE NATURE OF THE HARM

INTRODUCTION	729
---------------------	-----

CHAPTER XIV

JURISDICTION AND ADMISSIBILITY	731
1 Introduction	731
2 Jurisdiction and provisional measures	732
2.1 Introduction	732
2.2 Addressees and extraterritoriality	733
2.3 Reservations and denunciation and provisional measures halting executions	738
2.3.1 Introduction	738
2.3.2 HRC	738
2.3.3 IACHR	742
2.3.4 Distinguishing the ICJ approach to jurisdiction	746
2.4 The Inter-American Court's jurisdiction to maintain provisional measures in matters that will never be brought to it on the merits	748
2.5 Use of provisional measures beyond inadmissibility or beyond judgments on the merits and reparation	754
3 Admissibility and provisional measures	759
3.1 Introduction	759
3.2 The HRC's discussion on the relation between admissibility and provisional measures	759
3.3 Provisional measures and opening a case in the Inter-American system	762
3.4 Exhaustion of domestic remedies	764
3.4.1 Introduction	764
3.4.2 Exhaustion and threats	765
3.4.3 Habeas corpus and patterns of violations	765
3.4.4 Exhaustion and suspensive effect in non-refoulement cases	768
3.4.5 Absence of legal aid	773
3.4.6 Exhaustion, availability of a written judgment and maintaining provisional measures beyond inadmissibility	776
3.4.7 Exhaustion in death penalty cases not relating to the availability of a written judgment	777
3.4.8 Suspensive effect and cultural survival	780
3.4.9 Conclusion	782

3.5	Provisional measures and the likelihood of inadmissibility for reasons other than non-exhaustion	782
3.5.1	Introduction	782
3.5.2	Manifestly unfounded or an abuse of process?	783
3.5.3	Same matter	784
3.5.4	Dayton and jurisdiction ratione temporis	785
3.6	Admissibility criteria and the two kinds of provisional measures in the new Convention against Disappearances	786
4	Conclusion	787

CHAPTER XV

IMMEDIACY AND RISK	791
1 Introduction	791
2 Assessment of temporal urgency	792
2.1 Introduction	792
2.2 Immediacy in death penalty cases	792
2.3 Immediacy in expulsion and extradition cases	796
2.4 Immediacy of the risk in cases involving death threats	799
2.5 Immediacy in cases involving indigenous culture	799
3 The likelihood of risk	802
3.1 Introduction	802
3.2 The practice of the human rights adjudicators	803
3.2.1 Introduction	803
3.2.2 Sketching the contours of the assessment of risk for the use of provisional measures	804
3.2.3 Death penalty cases and assessment of risk	808
3.2.3.1 Introduction	808
3.2.3.2 Right to counsel	809
3.2.3.3 Disputes about facts and evidence	812
3.2.4 Non-refoulement cases and assessment of risk	817
3.2.4.1 Introduction	817
3.2.4.2 Assessment of risk by CAT	818
3.2.4.3 Assessment of risk by the HRC	820
3.2.4.4 Assessment of risk in the European system	828
3.2.4.5 The Inter-American Court and mass expulsion	833
3.2.4.6 Diplomatic assurances and lifting provisional measures	836
3.2.5 Health in detention and assessment of risk	842
3.2.6 Death threats and assessment of risk	846
3.2.6.1 Introduction	846
3.2.6.2 Evidentiary requirements for provisional measures in the Inter-American system	846
3.2.6.3 Denying requests for provisional measures	851
3.2.6.4 Lifting provisional measures in cases of death threats	852
3.2.7 Cultural survival and assessment of risk	855
3.2.8 Nuclear tests and assessment of risk	860
4 The relevance of the preventive and precautionary approach	862
4.1 Introduction	862
4.2 The relationship between provisional measures and the preventive and precautionary approach	863
4.3 Criteria for the precautionary approach in human rights cases	865
5 Conclusion	868
5.1 Assessment of temporal urgency	868

Table of Contents

5.2	Assessment of risk.....	868
5.2.1	Introduction	868
5.2.2	Assessment of risk: right to life and prohibition of torture and cruel treatment	869
5.2.3	Assessment of risk: irreparable harm to indigenous culture	871
5.2.4	Conclusion on the assessment of risk at the stage of provisional measures.....	874
5.2.4.1	Introduction	874
5.2.4.2	Standard of proof and shifting the burden	875
5.2.4.3	Scrutiny and the precautionary principle	876
5.2.4.4	Risk and non-anticipation.....	878

CHAPTER XVI

THE LEGAL STATUS OF PROVISIONAL MEASURES IN HUMAN RIGHTS ADJUDICATION		881
1	Introduction	881
2	The practice of the adjudicators with regard to the legal status of provisional measures.....	882
2.1	Introduction	882
2.2	The legal status of decisions on the merits by the HRC and its relevance to the legal status of the Committee's provisional measures.....	882
2.3	Systems referring to provisional measures in the treaty text	888
2.3.1	Introduction	888
2.3.2	The treaty texts on provisional measures.....	888
2.3.3	The case law of the Inter-American Court.....	890
2.4	Systems referring to provisional measures solely in the Rules of Procedure.....	894
2.4.1	Introduction	894
2.4.2	Rules of Procedure on provisional measures.....	895
2.4.3	Pertinent case law on the legal status of provisional measures.....	898
2.4.3.1	Introduction	898
2.4.3.2	HRC on the legal status of its provisional measures.....	898
2.4.3.3	The attitude of the adjudicators to frustration of the right of petition through pre-emption of the possibility to request provisional measures	903
2.4.3.4	CAT on the legal status of its provisional measures.....	903
2.4.3.5	Inter-American Commission on the legal status of its precautionary measures.....	905
2.4.3.6	African Commission on the legal status of its provisional measures.....	908
2.4.3.7	European Commission on the legal status of its provisional measures.....	908
2.4.3.8	ECtHR on the legal status of provisional measures.....	911
2.4.4	The status of provisional measures: Mamatkulov singled out.....	912
2.4.4.1	Introduction	912
2.4.4.2	Mamatkulov and treaty interpretation	912
2.4.4.3	Evaluation of the Court's treaty interpretation	916
2.4.4.4	Reference to other human rights systems	918
2.4.4.5	Evaluation of the dissenters' position on the reference to the practice of other adjudicators	920
2.4.4.6	Mamatkulov and general principles of international law.....	921
2.4.4.7	Evaluation of the dissenting opinion with regard to general principles.....	923
2.4.4.8	Explaining the reversal.....	925
2.4.4.9	Evaluation of the Court's explanation of the reversal.....	926
2.4.4.10	Developments since Mamatkulov	929
3	Principles of interpretation and general principles of law	930
4	Conclusion.....	933

CONCLUSION	937
-------------------------	------------

PART IV: RESPONSES

INTRODUCTION	941
CHAPTER XVII
THE OFFICIAL RESPONSES OF ADDRESSEE STATES TO PROVISIONAL MEASURES	943
1 Introduction	943
2 Compliance	945
2.1 Introduction	945
2.2 A range of attitudes towards implementation of provisional measures	946
2.2.1 Introduction	946
2.2.2 Various responses to provisional measures to halt executions	946
2.2.2.1 Introduction	946
2.2.2.2 Explicitly positive response by the State	948
2.2.2.3 Level of compliance by Trinidad with provisional measures of the Inter-American Commission and Court	950
2.2.3 Various responses to provisional measures to halt expulsion and extradition	951
2.2.3.1 Introduction	951
2.2.3.2 Examples of compliance and non-compliance in the European system and under the ICCPR	952
2.2.3.3 Pre-empting the use of provisional measures: speed of deportation	954
2.2.3.4 Requests for withdrawal of provisional measures	955
2.2.3.5 Invoking contrary obligations under international law	957
2.2.4 Various responses to provisional measures to intervene in detention and disappearance cases	958
2.2.4.1 Disappearance cases	958
2.2.4.2 Health and safety in detention	959
2.2.4.3 Immigration detention involving minors	960
2.2.4.4 Separate minors from adult detainees	962
2.2.4.5 Hostile response, but situation of detainee remedied	962
2.2.5 Responses to provisional measures to ensure access to health care outside the detention context	963
2.2.5.1 Introduction	963
2.2.5.2 Ensure access to HIV medication	963
2.2.5.3 Ensure access to health care to survivors of a massacre	965
2.2.6 Various responses to provisional measures aimed at protecting against death threats	965
2.2.6.1 Introduction	965
2.2.6.2 Lack of specificity in response: we are taking ‘the appropriate steps’	967
2.2.6.3 Investigate, prosecute, punish	967
2.2.6.4 Specific measures	972
2.2.6.5 Provisional measures as leverage for those individuals within government that are indeed interested in preventing irreparable harm	972
2.2.6.6 Compliance after regime change	974
2.2.6.7 Formalised protection program	975
2.2.6.8 Timeliness and specificity of the State’s reporting on implementation	976
2.2.6.9 Proactive measures by the State: voluntary precautionary measures	976
3 Stated reasons for non-compliance	977
3.1 Introduction	977
3.2 Disagreement with the (temporary) outcome of the normative process	978

Table of Contents

3.3	Communication of the provisional measures and disagreement with the decision-making process.....	981
3.3.1	Introduction	981
3.3.2	Lack of due process.....	981
3.3.3	Delays.....	983
3.3.4	Procedural duration: what is provisional?	986
3.3.5	Disputing the binding nature of provisional measures or the authority to take them.....	986
3.3.6	Reputation, clear communication, visibility and specificity	992
3.4	The domestic situation.....	995
3.4.1	Introduction	995
3.4.2	Attitude of domestic courts towards international adjudicators	996
3.4.3	‘Sorry: we can’t comply’	1001
3.4.3.1	Introduction	1001
3.4.3.2	‘We lack the authority to take measures’	1001
3.4.3.3	‘You are not being fair: we cannot do the impossible’	1002
3.4.4	‘Sorry: it is not our responsibility’	1003
3.4.4.1	Introduction	1003
3.4.4.2	The matter is a ‘private problem between individuals’	1003
3.4.4.3	‘It is the previous government’s fault’	1004
3.4.4.4	‘Implementation is the prerogative of the relevant constituent state in this federation’	1004
3.4.5	‘We won’t comply’	1005
3.4.5.1	Introduction	1005
3.4.5.2	Domestic concerns including State security and public safety	1005
3.4.5.3	Generally negative attitude towards international supervision	1014
3.4.5.3.1	Introduction	1014
3.4.5.3.2	‘No foreign meddling with judicial orders or lawfully imposed sentences’	1014
3.4.5.3.3	‘We don’t need outsiders’	1015
3.4.5.3.4	‘Our own system of protection suffices’	1015
3.4.5.3.5	‘Dangerous international law’	1016
3.4.5.3.6	‘We decide how our country should be run’	1017
3.4.5.3.7	Conclusion on domestic reasons for non-compliance.....	1017
4	Conclusion.....	1018

CHAPTER XVIII

FOLLOW-UP ON NON-COMPLIANCE	1021
1 Introduction	1021
2 Follow-up by the adjudicators	1021
2.1 Introduction	1021
2.2 Monitoring compliance	1022
2.2.1 Introduction	1022
2.2.2 The gradual approach of the HRC	1022
2.2.3 Follow-up by the HRC on halting executions	1026
2.2.4 Follow-up by the HRC on halting expulsion and extradition	1033
2.2.5 One of the methods of follow-up: sending reminders.....	1034
2.2.6 Follow-up by CAT	1035
2.2.7 ‘Seguimiento’ in the Inter-American system.....	1036
2.2.8 Supervision and monitoring in the European system.....	1048
2.2.9 Follow-up on provisional measures under the Dayton Accord.....	1051
2.2.10 Follow-up as part of the different reporting procedures	1052

2.3	Possible consequences attached to non-compliance with provisional measures with regard to the admissibility and merits stage.....	1053
2.3.1	Introduction	1053
2.3.2	Deciding on admissibility	1054
2.3.3	Evidentiary requirements: deciding on the merits	1054
3	Follow-up by other authorities in various inter-State systems of cooperation	1064
4	Follow-up by NGOs	1069
5	Conclusion.....	1076
CONCLUSION		1077
GENERAL CONCLUSION.....		1079
1	Introduction	1079
2	The setting of provisional measures in human rights adjudication	1080
2.1	Introduction	1080
2.2	The humanisation of the traditional concept.....	1080
2.3	The principle of effective protection and the inherent authority to take provisional measures	1082
2.4	Transparency or the lack thereof	1083
2.5	Cross-fertilization.....	1085
3	The purpose of provisional measures in human rights adjudication	1088
3.1	Introduction	1088
3.2	Within the common core: preventing irreparable harm to persons	1089
3.3	Within or beyond the outer limits: preventing irreversible harm to the claim	1093
3.4	The protection required	1094
4	The impact of the irreparable nature of the harm	1097
4.1	Introduction	1097
4.2	Jurisdiction, admissibility and provisional measures.....	1097
4.3	Immediacy, risk and provisional measures.....	1100
4.4	The legal status of provisional measures	1103
4.5	The principle of preventing irreparable harm and taking into account the inequality between the parties	1105
5	Official State responses and follow-up by the adjudicators.....	1106
6	An 'ideal' provisional measure.....	1108
SAMENVATTING		1111
BIBLIOGRAPHY		1117
TABLE OF CASES		1153
INDEX		1185
CURRICULUM VITAE		1195
SCHOOL OF HUMAN RIGHTS RESEARCH SERIES.....		1197

LIST OF ABBREVIATIONS

ACHR	American Convention on Human Rights
ACHPR	African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights
AI	Amnesty International
CAT	UN Committee against Torture
CEDAW	UN Committee on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women
CEJIL	Center for Justice and International Law
CERD	UN Committee on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination
CIDH	Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (Comisión Internacional de Derechos Humanos)
CoE	Council of Europe
ECHR	European Convention on Human Rights
EComHR	European Commission on Human Rights
ECtHR	European Court of Human Rights
Fed. BiH	Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina
HRC	UN Human Rights Committee
IACHR	Inter-American Court of Human Rights
ICAT	UN Convention against Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment of Punishment
ICCPR	International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights
ICJ	International Court of Justice
ICTY	International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia
ILC	International Law Commission
ITLOS	International Tribunal on the Law of the Sea
JCPC	Judicial Committee of the Privy Council
PCIJ	Permanent Court of International Justice
State of BiH	State of Bosnia and Herzegovina
UNHCR	United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees
VCCR	Vienna Convention on Consular Relations
VCLT	Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties
WTO	World Trade Organisation

GENERAL INTRODUCTION

1 TAKING URGENT ACTION IN INTERNATIONAL HUMAN RIGHTS ADJUDICATION

This book aims to clarify and further develop a legal concept of provisional measures as used by international adjudicators dealing with individual complaints about human rights violations. Various international adjudicators take action on behalf of individuals facing imminent or ongoing human rights violations. Often the need arises to take action as fast as possible. Such urgent action is particularly necessary when the imminent or ongoing violation would cause irreparable harm to persons. Examples of irreparable harm are disappearances, torture or executions.

An urgent action to prevent such irreparable harm generally takes place in the form of a message, sent as quickly as possible, to the State concerned, calling upon it to prevent the alleged imminent violation. If a United Nations (UN) Special Rapporteur, such as the Special Rapporteur on Extra-Judicial, Summary or Arbitrary Executions (hereinafter: Special Rapporteur on Executions),¹ sends such a message, it is usually called an ‘urgent appeal’. On the other hand, if it is sent during the course of judicial or quasi-judicial proceedings, it is called an interim or provisional measure. Such measure may traditionally be defined as a measure taken (or ‘indicated’)² by an adjudicator and sent to the State concerned in order to safeguard the rights of the petitioner pending the final determination of the case. In international law the terms ‘interim measures’ and ‘provisional measures’ are used interchangeably,³ but the Statute of the International Court of Justice (ICJ) speaks of provisional measures (Article 41) and this is the term generally used in this book. An exception is made only when discussing the practice of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights because this Commission uses the term ‘precautionary measures’ to distinguish its own provisional measures from those of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights.⁴

¹ Such Rapporteurs are independent experts appointed by the Chairperson of the UN Commission on Human Rights, a body of State representatives. They are appointed as part of the thematic proceedings based on the UN Charter. In relation to complaints sent to these Rapporteurs by individuals or NGOs reference is often made to more ‘humanitarian’, ‘Charter-based proceedings’ in order to distinguish them from the ‘treaty based’ individual complaint proceedings, based on specific treaties such as the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.

² This term is found in Article 41(1) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice. Several other adjudicators have copied its use. Generally the term ‘indicate’ is used to refer to the process of communicating a provisional measure to the State concerned. The meaning of this term in the context of provisional measures has been controversial. In its LaGrand decision (Germany v. United States) of 27 June 2001, the International Court of Justice has now clarified its own use of the term. See Chapter I on the ICJ’s provisional measures to protect persons.

³ The 1978 Rules of the International Court of Justice use the term provisional measures (articles 73-78), but the title of the subsection relating to Article 41 Statute is ‘Interim Protection’: Part III, Section D (Incidental Proceedings), Subsection 1.

⁴ See Chapter II, section 4 on provisional measures in the Inter-American system. The ‘precautionary measures’ taken by the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights during the course of adjudication are simply provisional measures by another name. They do not refer to the

The idea of provisional measures is based on a procedure used in national jurisdictions where an individual may, pending litigation, request a court to provide for preventive measures, injunctions, or other relief. A decision to take such measures does not prejudice the eventual legal determination of the conflict. It is relief pendente lite.

Various international adjudicators have the power to ‘indicate’, ‘take’, ‘issue’ or ‘use’ provisional measures during their proceedings. It can be necessary to use them pending international proceedings in order to preserve the respective rights of the parties or to prevent aggravation of the dispute. The most prominent international adjudicator making use of provisional measures is the ICJ.⁵ Although individuals cannot appeal to that Court, its procedures are nevertheless relevant for conceptual reasons. Furthermore, some of the ICJ’s case law on provisional measures, such as the Hostages case,⁶ the Genocide Convention case⁷ and Armed activities on the territory of the Congo (Congo v. Uganda),⁸ has dealt with the issue of irreparable harm to persons,⁹ an issue directly relevant to human rights law. The Court has even indicated provisional measures in order to postpone the execution by one State of a national of another State.¹⁰ Other adjudicators with no specific human rights competence taking provisional measures are the International Tribunal on the Law of the Sea (ITLOS),¹¹ the European Union’s European Court of Justice (ECJ)¹² and international (arbitral) tribunals in commercial law.¹³

The Inter-American Court of Human Rights (IACHR) and European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) and supervisory bodies to human rights treaties,¹⁴ such as the Human Rights Committee (HRC) to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), can indicate provisional measures in order to avert a deterioration of the alleged victim’s position.¹⁵ Human rights courts as well as other supervisory bodies to human rights treaties with an individual complaint mechanism are adjudicators determining a legal conflict between an individual and a State on the basis of law and rules of procedure.¹⁶ They have used provisional measures as part of their judicial function.¹⁷ ‘precautionary principle’. See Chapter I, section 5.3.3 and Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk), discussing the relationship between provisional measures and the precautionary principle.

⁵ See Article 41 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice.

⁶ ICJ Case concerning United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran (US v. Iran), Order of 15 December 1979.

⁷ ICJ Case concerning application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)), Orders of 8 April 1993 and 13 September 1993; see further Higgins (1997).

⁸ ICJ Armed activities on the territory of the Congo (Congo v. Uganda), Order of 1 July 2000.

⁹ The various reasons for provisional measures given by the ICJ are discussed more closely in Chapter I.

¹⁰ ICJ Case concerning the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations (Paraguay v. United States of America), Order of 9 April 1998; LaGrand (Germany v. United States), Order of 5 March 1999 and Judgment of 27 June 2001 and Avena and other Mexican Nationals (Mexico v. US), Order of 5 February 2003 and Judgment of 31 March 2004.

¹¹ See Article 290 UN Convention on the Law of the Sea and Article 25 of Annex VI.

¹² See Articles 242 and 243 EC Treaty.

¹³ The case law of the ECJ and of international tribunals in commercial law falls outside the scope of this book.

¹⁴ These are often called quasi-judicial bodies.

¹⁵ This research will show that provisional measures can be used also to protect others than the petitioner.

¹⁶ By analogy, according to the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) a ‘tribunal’ is a body exercising judicial functions, established by law to determine matters within its competence on the basis of rules of law and in accordance with proceedings conducted in a prescribed manner, see e.g. ECtHR Sramek v. Austria, Judgment of 22 October 1984, §36 and Le Compte, Van

The first urgent decisions of human rights adjudicators provide the historical background of the practice by human rights adjudicators. The HRC used so called ‘informal provisional measures’ in the 1970s and 1980s, requesting information on medical treatment in detention or on the whereabouts of alleged victims without explicitly invoking its rule on provisional measures, as well as a formal provisional measure to halt an expulsion, dating from 1977.¹⁸ In the 1970s and 1980s the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights intervened informally on behalf of disappeared persons.¹⁹ Since 1988, virtually as of its first case, the Inter-American Court has ordered provisional measures to protect against death threats.²⁰ The European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) initially did not often use provisional measures because the Commission (when it was still active) normally did so. The earliest known occasion on which the European Commission on Human Rights used (informal) provisional measures was to prevent the execution of Nicolas Sampson in 1958. The European Court did use them to halt the extradition of Soering in January 1989.²¹

For one of the systems discussed in this book, the Inter-American human rights system, Professor Buergenthal, President of the Inter-American Court between 1985 and 1987²² has expressed the importance of provisional measures as follows:

“It is quite clear that the power of the Court to grant provisional measures has proved to be a very useful enforcement tool in the inter-American system. In a region of the world where serious violations of human rights are by no means a thing of the past, provisional measures can save lives, and they have done so on a number of occasions”.²³

Professor Cançado Trindade, President of the Inter-American Court between 1999 and 2003,²⁴ has referred to provisional measures as a ‘procedural remedy of crucial importance to the protection of the fundamental rights of the human person’.²⁵

Leuven and De Meyere v. Belgium, 23 June 1981, §55. This reasoning may apply to international adjudicators such as the Human Rights Committee as well. See further Chapter XVI (Legal status).

¹⁷ While the theoretical issue of what should be the role of the judiciary and what powers it should have in a democracy is relevant, its discussion would require a separate study, especially in relation to the specific nature of the international system with its additional legitimacy problems. This study is based on the premise that the international system of supervision of human rights treaties – with all its flaws – is a given for those States that have accepted it.

¹⁸ See Chapters V (Expulsion), VI (Disappearances) and VII (Health in detention).

¹⁹ Interview by the author with Juan Méndez, Washington D.C., 17 October 2001. See further Chapters II (Systems) and VI (Disappearances).

²⁰ IACHR Velásquez Rodríguez, Fairén Garbi and Solís Corrales, and Godínez Cruz Cases, Orders for provisional measures of 15 and 19 January 1988.

²¹ ECtHR Soering v. UK Judgment of 7 July 1989. See further Chapter IV (Part 2), discussing the early case of Bönisch v. Austria, Judgment of 6 May 1985.

²² Member of the Court from 1979 to 1991.

²³ Buergenthal (1994), p. 93.

²⁴ Member of the Court from 1995 to 2006.

²⁵ Cançado Trindade, preface by the President of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights to Provisional Measures Compendium II (2000), p. XVII, §29. See further, e.g., Cançado Trindade (2003), pp. 162-168 and Pasqualucci (1993), pp. 803-864, in particular pp. 844-846.

2 PROVISIONAL MEASURES IN HUMAN RIGHTS ADJUDICATION: CHANGING THE TRADITIONAL CONCEPT?

This book examines the legal concept of provisional measures in human rights adjudication. Apart from the conceptual questions raised by these provisional measures, there is their evident practical significance. Yet, a systematic analysis of the situations in which they may be relied on is currently lacking.²⁶ Such analysis of the nature of the various types of provisional measures is of importance to alleged victims,²⁷ to organisations representing them, as well as to the adjudicators themselves.

The question arises whether the concept of provisional measures has been adapted to fit the context of international human rights law or is generally the same as under traditional international law. The purposes of provisional measures as used under the UN and the regional human rights systems may differ from the traditional purposes of provisional measures as used by the ICJ. It is assumed, for instance, that one traditional purpose, preventing irreparable harm, is more relevant in human rights cases than are other purposes such as preventing aggravation of the dispute or preserving the respective rights of the parties.

Thus Chapter I examines the concept as applied by two international tribunals with no specific human rights mandate: the ICJ (and its predecessor) and ITLOS. The subsequent chapters analyse the practice with regard to specific aspects of provisional measures (set out in section 4 of this introduction) of certain international and regional human rights adjudicators (mentioned in section 5). This is done in order to determine whether it is possible to identify a core to the concept of provisional measures that the human rights systems have in common and, if so, what this common core entails. Clearly the book does not only deal with the similarities and differences between the various systems that are immediately apparent from the treaty texts and Rules of Procedure but also discusses common developments, a certain convergence of approaches towards the concept of provisional measures in human rights cases. At the same time the scope of application, or outer limits, of provisional measures could vary from system to system. The exigencies of the situation in a specific region or the particular task of an adjudicator in a given system may require the use of provisional measures that go beyond the core common to all systems.

This book discusses the extent of the convergence or divergences in the approaches of the adjudicators. It examines not only the core common to provisional measures in the human rights systems, but also the outer limits of such measures. In this respect it may contribute to the ongoing discussion about the proliferation of international adjudicators and the risk of fragmentation of international law.

The outer limits are assumed to be wider in a regional rather than in an international system, due to the greater interest in mutual compliance displayed by other States parties and because in a regional system the adjudicator is geographically and culturally somewhat closer to the situations pending before it. Often a regional adjudicator may be able to apply mechanisms for fact-finding, monitoring and conciliation in a more focused way as well.

To the extent that there is a difference between the concept of provisional measures in human rights adjudication and in other situations the book discusses whether the concept as used by human rights adjudicators could also be relevant to adjudicators with a general competence, not limited to human rights issues, when they are dealing with issues involving irreparable harm to persons. In this sense this book is part of the discussion about the humanization of international law.²⁸

²⁶ The secondary literature on provisional measures in international adjudication that does exist, deals mostly with the ICJ. See Chapter I. There are some articles dealing with the practice of using provisional measures in some of the human rights systems. See Chapter II.

²⁷ In practice the term 'alleged victim' is used also in the context of potential victims. Obviously, in the context of an impending violation, if the provisional measure works as intended, the violation does not take place at all or at least is not continued.

3 PUBLICATION AND MOTIVATION

Most human rights adjudicators do not publish or motivate their provisional measures.²⁹ In this light the phenomenon that scholars sometimes read more into decisions than may have been intended by adjudicators³⁰ applies even more to decisions on provisional measures than to decisions on jurisdiction or merits.³¹ Even if the adjudicator would publish and motivate them, there is obviously little time for contemplation. The urgency of the situation does not allow for exhaustive study and discussion. Still, in order to interpret the concept, potential petitioners, States, the adjudicator itself in later cases, other adjudicators as well as commentators depend on the information made available on the use of provisional measures. Consequently, their interpretations, actions and submissions could improve if adjudicators would include reasoning in their decisions on provisional measures, as sent to the State and the petitioner. It would also be useful if they would make available to the public more information on their use of provisional measures.

It may be argued that provisional measures in human rights cases do not have to be reasoned and the practice of using them does not need to be coherent because they are by definition adopted to address a situation of urgency. In that sense they would have a character that would be more humanitarian than judicial. Such an argument could explain why provisional measures are used in a certain situation vis-à-vis a certain State but not in similar situations vis-à-vis another State. The adjudicator may have envisaged something could be achieved exactly in that State but not in other States. Apart from the lack of time for elaboration, the wish to maintain maximum flexibility may also account for the lack of transparency in the decision-making on provisional measures by human rights adjudicators.

Evidently the above argument is not the approach taken in this book. While the aim of using provisional measures is not as such to proclaim the law or have general application, but rather to help one or more specific individuals,³² explaining their use and increasing their accessibility is likely to make them more persuasive and to enhance their credibility. States and petitioners are now often unclear about the types of cases in which they are used. Some flexibility for the adjudicator would indeed remain necessary, but this does not rule out clarification of the use of provisional measures. The aim of flexibility does not justify secrecy and lack of explanation.³³

Sometimes States (including domestic courts) are uncertain about the concept of provisional measures. States may invoke arguments applicable not just in the context of provisional measures. They may argue that domestic courts are better placed to assess risk of irreparable harm, for

²⁸ See e.g. Van Boven (1982); Simma (1993); Buergenthal (1997); Higgins (1998); Flinterman (2000); Kamminga (2001); Seiderman (2001); Meron (2003/2006); Cançado Trindade (2004) and Kamminga (2008).

²⁹ See Chapter II on the human rights systems.

³⁰ Secretariat staff of the European Commission on Human Rights in Strasbourg (October 1997), the HRC in Geneva (October 1998) and the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights in Washington D.C. (September/October 2001) have also stressed this.

³¹ Thirlway (1994), p. 6 points out with regard to the provisional measures by the ICJ: "Provisional measures Orders are prepared under pressure of time and in order to deal with the immediate situation". As a result, he considers that the 'texts of such Orders should not be put under the magnifying glass on the assumption that every word has been weighed'. See also Sztucki (1983), p. 278.

³² See Conclusion Part II (Purpose).

³³ See further Chapter II.

instance in expulsion or extradition cases or cases involving indigenous peoples and the environment. They may also argue that international adjudicators should not interfere in democratic decisions, for instance in death penalty cases, or that domestic resources do not allow for certain expenditures to be made, for instance in cases involving protection against death threats or access to health care.

Substantiation of the use of provisional measures and making the decisions ordering them accessible to the public would help increase their coherence and credibility for everyone involved.³⁴ In the face of a particular threat, information about the use of provisional measures in similar cases would provide States and petitioners with some idea about the concept of irreparable harm employed by the adjudicator and about the way risks are assessed. It could also be useful to know, for instance, the number of times provisional measures are requested by petitioners and the number of times they are granted. Knowing in what type of situations adjudicators will intervene urgently could be equally useful to NGOs and to State authorities so that they could already anticipate this domestically, making recourse to an international adjudicator unnecessary because the situation would already be addressed. This would allow the State to be pro-active in the protection of human rights. After all, that is what is explicitly required under the respective provisions involving the undertakings of State parties to respect and ensure the rights and provide effective remedies and reparations³⁵ and implicitly in the requirement to exhaust domestic remedies.³⁶ Thus, the State would avoid the situation that many similarly situated persons would have to resort to international complaint proceedings in urgent cases.

The relevant information on the practice of the respective systems used for this book is presented in the subsequent Chapters. The practice of the various human rights adjudicators shows that they often do not indicate the criteria for the use of provisional measures, let alone the order in which they deal with these criteria, and that their approach is not always coherent. Still, at a more abstract level some underlying principles and ideas can be found in the human rights systems. These have been used to clarify and develop a legal concept of provisional measures in human rights cases. These principles and ideas are linked to the existing doctrine on provisional measures in general international law.³⁷ Thus, based on more abstract principles that seem to be common in the approach of the adjudicators, this book aims to fill gaps in the doctrine.³⁸

³⁴ See further Chapter II on transparency and Chapter XVII on the official responses of States.

³⁵ See e.g. Article 2 ICCPR, Articles 2 and 6 ICERD, Article 24 CEDAW, Article 2 ICAT, Articles 1, 13 and 50 ECHR, Articles 1, 2 and 63(1) ACHR and Article 1 ACHRPR.

³⁶ See e.g. Article 2 OP to the ICCPR, Article 11(3) ICERD, Article 4 OP to the CEDAW, Article 22(4)(b) ICAT, Article 35(1) ECHR, Article 46(1)(a) ACHR, Articles 50 and 56 ACHRPR and Article 6 Protocol African Court.

³⁷ Several scholars have contributed to the interpretation and development of this doctrine in non human rights law. See e.g. Guggenheim (1931 and 1933); Dumbauld (1932); Mendelson (1972-1973); Oellers-Frahm (1975); Elkind (1981); Sztucki (1983); Collins (1992); Thirlway (1994); Merrills (1995); Rosenne (2005) and Brown (2007), pp. 119-151. As noted, within the constraints of this book it was not feasible to deal with the extensive case law of arbitral tribunals and the European Court of Justice. For an account of the latter see, e.g. De Schutter (2005), pp. 93-130; Tridimas (1999); Jacobs (1994), pp. 37-68 and Collins (1992). For an account of the case law of arbitral tribunals see e.g. Collins (1992). See Chapter I for a discussion of approach by the PCIJ, ICJ and ITLOS.

³⁸ Given the lack of information available on the practice of the human rights adjudicators with regard to provisional measures, in particular their reasoning, the subsequent chapters sometimes refer to the arguments of the parties, on the assumption that these played a role in the adjudicator's decision-making. As ICJ Judge Shahabuddeen has observed, it is indeed 'not proper mechanically to impute to the Court the position taken or assumed by counsel, particularly where

4 ASPECTS OF PROVISIONAL MEASURES IN HUMAN RIGHTS ADJUDICATION

As this book aims to clarify and further develop a legal concept of provisional measures, used by international human rights adjudicators, it analyses the choices made by these adjudicators with regard to the use of provisional measures. Since the existing records of their decisions to take provisional measures, as well as the responses by Addressee States are mostly found in case law, it is case law that is used as the main source. This is complemented by some information derived from secondary literature, visits of the secretariats/Registries in Washington D.C., San Jose, Geneva and Strasbourg³⁹ and, for the HRC, information from the case files in Geneva.⁴⁰ The approach of the various adjudicators is compared, among others as to type of cases in which provisional measures are used. Exhaustive discussion is neither possible – most provisional measures are not published – nor necessary as this book takes a qualitative rather than a quantitative approach.

The cases discussed have been selected because they are informative about a particular aspect of provisional measures.⁴¹ The book discusses typical cases providing insight into the features of provisional measures that the various systems have in common. In addition, it mentions similar cases in which other adjudicators indeed confirm the approach taken in these typical cases or choose to take a different approach. The book also examines atypical cases (Chapter XI) to explore the outer limits of the concept.

Certain aspects of provisional measures have been selected that seem pertinent both with regard to the concept of provisional measures in general and in the context of human rights adjudication. These are: the protection required and the relationship with reparation and the (group of) beneficiaries; the relevance of admissibility and jurisdiction on the merits, assessment of temporal urgency and risk, legal status, the official responses of addressee States and the follow-up by adjudicators. The discussion focuses on irreparable harm, an aspect of the concept that may help explain the other aspects as well. Thus, the emphasis is on the situations in which human rights adjudicators have used provisional measures. Implicitly or explicitly an adjudicator facing a request for provisional measures not only determines the applicable purpose of provisional measures, but also the protection required, the relationship between provisional measures and forms of reparation and the group of beneficiaries involved.

At the same time the adjudicator assesses temporal urgency and risk. Obviously, without the competence to use provisional measures it would be a fruitless exercise to consider whether they are warranted. In that sense the competence or jurisdiction to use provisional measures is a prerequisite rather than a criterion for the use of provisional measures. With regard to the ICJ the relevance of admissibility and jurisdiction on the merits has sometimes been considered to be not just an aspect, but a prerequisite as well. Some human rights adjudicators have discussed non-exhaustion of domestic remedies, (non-)admissibility of the claim and the duration of provisional measures as well as the role of reservations in cases in which provisional measures were used.

the Court has not spoken'. 'On the other hand', he noted 'it is equally not right to seek to appreciate the positions taken by the Court abstracted from their forensic context'. 'As is well known, it is frequently the case that recourse to the arguments of counsel is necessary for an understanding of what in fact a court was doing'. Separate Opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen in Passage through the Great Belt (Finland v. Denmark), Order of 29 July 1991.

³⁹ Washington D.C., September-October 2001; San José Costa Rica, October-December 2001; Geneva, October 1998, April and October 2002; and Strasbourg, October 1997. See also Chapter II (Systems).

⁴⁰ A reason to pay particular attention to the practice of the HRC lies in the special difficulty of obtaining information on the use of and rationale for its provisional measures. Much information was derived from the case files rather than from publicly available documents. See Chapter II.

⁴¹ See about purposive sampling Patton (2002), pp. 230-243.

While these discussions have some bearing on the concept of provisional measures, it is obvious from the practice that admissibility and jurisdiction on the merits are not a prerequisite for the use of provisional measures in human rights cases.⁴²

In addition, the adjudicator considers the legal status of provisional measures, the responses of the Addressee State in the past and the best ways to monitor compliance. A separate discussion of each of these aspects is important in order to understand the concept of provisional measures in human rights adjudication. Yet in practice they obviously must be taken into account simultaneously. After all, in the concept of provisional measures procedural and substantive law are intertwined.⁴³

A question that sometimes arises is whether the adjudicator is the appropriate body to deal with the situation on an urgent basis.⁴⁴ If a request for provisional measures is made the adjudicator itself probably cannot avoid taking this policy question into account, at least to some extent. Individual petitioners could take it into account in order to find out what would be the most appropriate course of action to avoid irreparable harm and whether this includes resorting to international adjudicators. Petitioners could take into account as well the anticipated impact of the adjudicator's use of provisional measures on future cases and the responses of States.⁴⁵

In addition to examining the choices by the adjudicators with regard to the use of provisional measures, classical legal research is applied: finding and analysing relevant law with regard to provisional measures (case law as well as the applicable standards and rules of procedure), comparing the jurisprudence in order to find the underlying rationale for the use of provisional measures. This is then put in a conceptual framework interpreting the convergence and divergence of the practice of the various adjudicators with regard to provisional measures. This framework is based, on the one hand, on the factual question whether two or more adjudicators have used provisional measures in a given context (e.g. halting executions) and on the other hand on the underlying rationale that the provisional measures of the various adjudicators appear to have in common.

5 HUMAN RIGHTS SYSTEMS

The Human Rights Committee (HRC) is the only adjudicator in a system that is applicable to States in various regions of the world.⁴⁶ Its practice serves as a basis for the discussion of the common core of provisional measures. Apart from the HRC the most important UN adjudicator whose cases are discussed is the Committee against Torture (CAT). A discussion of the practice of CAT as well as that of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) helps clarify the assess-

⁴² See Chapter I (in Part I 'Setting') on this aspect of the general concept and Chapter XIV (in Part III 'Consequences') with regard to human rights adjudication.

⁴³ The Inter-American Court considers its provisional measures jurisdictional rather than procedural. Maybe the point where substantive and procedural law meet in order to prevent irreparable harm could be called a 'jurisdictional guarantee'.

⁴⁴ See also Part II on the purpose of provisional measures and the discussion in Chapter I on non-aggravation of the dispute including the relevance of simultaneous diplomatic activities.

⁴⁵ Sometimes NGOs are themselves the petitioner, but not the victims, as in the Inter-American and African systems, see Chapter II.

⁴⁶ Of the international treaties the ICCPR is the only one comparable to the regional conventions in the range of rights involved. The only other international human rights adjudicator with an established practice of using provisional measures is the Committee against Torture, but this involves a single-issue treaty. As of yet there is no (extensive) practice of using provisional measures by the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination and the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women.

ment of risk before using provisional measures in non-refoulement cases.⁴⁷ The ECtHR, moreover, has recently elaborated on the legal status of provisional measures, making reference to the practice of some other adjudicators as well.⁴⁸ The most important regional system, however, is the Inter-American system. This is the only system with a clearly developed practice of dealing with urgent cases. The practice of the Inter-American Commission and Court helps clarify the group of beneficiaries of provisional measures, the specificity of these measures – ordering to refrain from action or instead to take positive action – their purpose as well as their relationship to obligations on the merits and reparation.⁴⁹

To the extent information is available, a few references are made to the African human rights system and its provisional measures.⁵⁰ As noted, the case law of the ECtHR and the former European Commission is mainly relevant with regard to the legal status of provisional measures and assessment of risk in non-refoulement cases, although some atypical cases are discussed as well (Chapter XI). Finally, a brief reference is made to the approach of the Bosnia Human Rights Chamber, established under the Dayton Peace Agreement, particularly in relation to forced eviction and cultural rights. In its application of provisional measures this Chamber interprets the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) in a different way than the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR).⁵¹

Apart from an occasional reference to the urgent actions by UN thematic mechanisms, such as the Special Rapporteur against Executions and the Special Rapporteur on Human Rights Defenders, an examination of other types of urgent actions not constituting provisional measures is beyond the scope of this book.⁵² Thus, the urgent actions by the UN High Commissioner on Human Rights, by country mechanisms, by the ILO, preventive action (or preventive diplomacy) by the UN Secretary-General, urgent actions by the Security Council in individual cases,⁵³ and EU, Commonwealth and OSCE actions, most of them more ‘humanitarian’ than adjudicatory, will not be discussed. Urgent procedures before national courts, such as summary proceedings and injunctions, have likewise been excluded from this research.⁵⁴

For several of the human rights systems, the lack of direct information necessitates an approach drawing information from the rights claimed, the decisions on the merits and reparations in the cases in which the adjudicators took provisional measures. In other words, information on

⁴⁷ See Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

⁴⁸ See Chapter XVI (Legal status).

⁴⁹ See Chapters XII and XIII.

⁵⁰ This necessarily is brief given the lack of information on the individual petitions dealt with by the Commission supervising the African Convention on Human and People’s Rights (ACHPR).

⁵¹ Within the scope of this book the specific human rights procedures of international governance applicable to Kosovo are not discussed.

⁵² The independent experts based their activities on international rules, but they often use more diplomatic methods than the treaty monitoring bodies to convince States to respect these rules. Regularly they request governments to act in a certain way, or abstain from action, ‘for humanitarian reasons’. It can be inferred from their yearly reports to the United Nations Human Rights Commission that (thematic) Special Rapporteurs and Working Groups often receive more, and more positive replies from governments to their urgent appeals than to their normal communications. See Van Boven (1994), pp. 72-73 referring to the 1990 and 1992 reports by several Charter-based mechanisms. See also, e.g., Decaux (2005), pp. 241-275 and debate, pp. 277-281; Rodley (2001), pp. 279-283 and Van Boven (1995), pp. 98-105.

⁵³ For instance in relation to imminent executions of anti-apartheid activists in South Africa.

⁵⁴ Obviously provisional measures ordered by international adjudicators find their way back to domestic courts, which may implement them through injunctions, etc. See also Chapter XVII (Official responses).

the rationale of their provisional measures often is construed from the case law, rather than taken directly from it.

6 THE COMMON CORE AND OUTER LIMITS OF PROVISIONAL MEASURES: AN OUTLINE OF THE BOOK

While some theoretical works are available on provisional measures in general, writings on the theory of provisional measures in human rights cases are scarce. Part I of this book consists of two chapters. The first Chapter discusses the concept of provisional measures in traditional international law, as used in adjudication of conflicts between States. In this respect the current practice of the ICJ and the International Tribunal on the Law of the Sea (ITLOS) may already show how the traditional concept has evolved. This Chapter distinguishes those situations in which provisional measures aim to protect individuals, with a focus on their use to halt executions. Subsequently, Chapter II briefly sets out the use of provisional measures by human rights adjudicators in the context of the different human rights treaties. While this book is based on the premise that the possibility to resort to provisional measures is part of the judicial function,⁵⁵ this Chapter discusses the competence of each adjudicator to use provisional measures, based on the relevant treaty text and Rules of Procedure. For each system it also refers to promptness and transparency of decision-making. It briefly notes the types of situations in which provisional measures are used in each system (Chapter II). Parts II and III are organised by aspect (situations in which provisional measures have been used and the concept of irreparable harm; protective measures and relationship obligations on the merits and with reparation; beneficiaries; admissibility and jurisdiction; assessment of temporal urgency and risk; legal status; official responses of addressee States and follow-up) in order to find the common core and outer limits of provisional measures in human rights adjudication.

Part II focuses on the situations in which provisional measures are used, culminating in a conclusion on the purpose of provisional measures in human rights adjudication. There are situations that have triggered provisional measures in most of the systems. In other situations only one or two adjudicators have, thus far, used provisional measures. An attempt is made to assess the relevance of these cases for the practice of the other human rights adjudicators. Chapters III-XI discuss the following situations: halting executions, halting corporal punishment, halting expulsion or extradition, timely intervention in disappearance cases, timely intervention in detention situations involving risks to health, timely intervention to deal with death threats and harassment, ensuring procedural rights to protect the right to life and personal integrity, protecting cultural rights of indigenous peoples, halting mass expulsion, halting internal displacement or forced eviction and other, more incidental, cases that may help establish the outer limits of the concept of provisional measures. Chapter XII on protection deals with the substantive obligations of States. It is based on the situations discussed in the previous chapters. On the one hand it focuses on the specificity of the provisional measures and the question whether action (positive obligations) or abstention is required. On the other hand it discusses the relationship between provisional measures and obligations on the merits as well as forms of reparation. It also deals with the beneficiaries of provisional measures, representation and consultation and the addressees of provisional measures. Part II concludes with a substantive discussion of the purpose of provisional measures.

Part III deals with what could be seen as the consequences of the findings regarding the purpose of provisional measures in human rights adjudication. Chapter XIV discusses jurisdiction on the merits and admissibility. Chapter XV deals with assessment of temporal urgency and risk and Chapter XVI with the legal status of provisional measures. Recent case law has drawn international attention to the latter aspect of the concept.⁵⁶

⁵⁵ See also Chapter XVI (Legal Status).

Another question with regard to provisional measures in human rights adjudication is whether (and how) they actually work. This is a question of causality that falls outside the scope of this research. Nevertheless, the available case law provides some information on the official responses of addressee States (discussed in Chapter XVII) and the follow-up by adjudicators (Chapter XVIII). Rather than analysing causality as such this book simply discusses this information, as this may help clarify the legal concept of provisional measures in human rights cases.

Exactly because provisional measures in human rights adjudication concern the fate of human beings at risk, their individual situations and narratives have been the points of departure in this book. Still, for the sake of presenting the concept of provisional measures, the stories of the people involved have sometimes been split up over different Chapters. Nevertheless, the course of some of these stories may be followed throughout the Chapters, discussing various aspects of the concept.

By way of conclusion this book presents the common core of provisional measures in human rights adjudication and their outer limits and discusses what steps could be taken to improve the functioning of provisional measures in human rights adjudication. The latter is based, among others, on the best practices found in the various systems. It does this by taking into account, where relevant, the following criteria to determine how provisional measures could best assist a beneficiary: accessibility, motivation and consistency, responsiveness to the specific situation, consultation and follow-up. The criteria of accessibility, motivation and consistency have been selected for use in this study as they are thought to make provisional measures more convincing vis-à-vis addressee States. Responsiveness to the specific situation and consultation are considered necessary for the effectiveness of these measures in protecting the individual and follow-up by the adjudicators is used as a criterion because it has generally been regarded essential in treaty monitoring.⁵⁷

⁵⁶ See e.g. ICJ LaGrand (Germany v. US), Judgment of 27 June 2001 and ECtHR (Grand Chamber) Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, Judgment of 4 February 2005. This confirmed the first section's Judgment of 6 February 2003 in Mamatkulov v. Turkey, reversing Cruz Varas and Others v. Sweden, Judgment of 20 March 1991.

⁵⁷ On the general importance of follow-up in human rights cases see e.g. Boerefijn (1999), pp. 101-112.

PART I

SETTING

INTRODUCTION

This Part examines the setting of the concept of provisional measures as developed by human rights adjudicators. This setting provides the basis for an examination of the purpose of provisional measures (Part II), as well as the impact of the irreparable nature of the harm on the aspects of jurisdiction and admissibility, immediacy and risk and legal status (Part III) and the responses by States and the follow-up by the adjudicators (Part IV).

Implicitly or explicitly the use of provisional measures by the human rights adjudicators appears to have been inspired by the practice of the ICJ. While obviously the humanization of international law is expressed in the practice of the human rights adjudicators, the practice of the ICJ reflects this humanization as well. In order to see to what extent the human rights adjudicators have adapted the traditional concept of provisional measures this study takes as a point of departure the ICJ practice with regard to provisional measures. At the same time it discusses the fact that to some extent the ICJ itself has taken into account the special position of the individual as well (Chapter I). Among others Chapter I discusses the authority to order provisional measures in adjudication of conflicts between States, issues of promptness and transparency of decision-making and the purpose of provisional measures in general international law. It deals with the relation to the merits, the problem of prejudgment, the protective measures required and their relation to reparations. Furthermore it addresses the question who are the beneficiaries, the relevance of jurisdiction on the merits, the assessment of urgency, the legal status, the official responses of addressee States and the follow-up by the ICJ and ITLOS.

Before examining what the use of provisional measures may have in common in all the systems, it is necessary to examine how these measures function in each specific system. The particularities of the systems may help explain differences in the practice developed with regard to provisional measures. Chapter II introduces the various human rights adjudicators, putting their use of provisional measures in the context of the specific human rights system in which they operate. The chapter concludes by more specifically discussing the authority to use provisional measures, publication and motivation of these measures and convergence and divergence of case law. The latter is an issue relevant to the question of the 'common core' and 'outer limits' of the concept of provisional measures, discussed in Part II and to the legal status of these measures, discussed in Part III.

CHAPTER I

DEVELOPMENT OF THE CONCEPT OF PROVISIONAL MEASURES BY THE ICJ AND ITLOS

1 INTRODUCTION

This Chapter discusses the development of the traditional concept of provisional measures, as used in adjudication of conflicts between States. It focuses on the practice of the International Court of Justice (ICJ) and its predecessor the Permanent Court of International Justice (PCIJ), with an occasional reference to the International Tribunal on the Law of the Sea (ITLOS). Both are international adjudicators not specifically focussing on human rights, one a court of general jurisdiction, the other dealing with the law of the sea. As noted in the Introduction to this book, the question arises whether the concept of provisional measures has been adapted to fit the context of international human rights law or is generally the same as under traditional international law. The assumption is that the traditional concept of provisional measures differs from that developed by the UN and regional human rights adjudicators because the purpose is different. Thus this chapter focuses on the (development of) the traditional purpose of provisional measures by the ICJ and ITLOS.

The chapter first discusses the authority to order provisional measures in adjudication of conflicts between States. It also briefly refers to the issues of promptness and transparency of decision-making. Subsequently it deals with the purpose of provisional measures in general international law. It discusses separately those situations in which provisional measures by the ICJ aim to protect individuals. In fact the protection of the individual already played some role in the case law of the PCIJ. Nevertheless this chapter focuses on their more recent use to halt executions. It then refers to the relation to the merits, prejudgment, the protective measures required and their relation to reparations. Furthermore it addresses the beneficiaries, the relevance of jurisdiction on the merits, assessment of urgency, legal status, the official responses of addressee States and the (relative lack of) follow-up by the ICJ.

2 THE AUTHORITY TO USE PROVISIONAL MEASURES

2.1 Introduction

Article 41 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice (ICJ) provides in its first paragraph:

“The Court shall have the power to indicate, if it considers that circumstances so require, any provisional measures which ought to be taken to preserve the respective rights of either party”.¹

As Merrills has noted, partly because of its brevity Article 41 is one of the most difficult articles of the ICJ Statute. It leaves unanswered ‘questions concerning both the basis of interim measures and the scope and exercise of the power'.² This chapter first deals with the authority to use provisional measures proprio motu, then with the issues of transparency and promptness and the authority to delegate the use of provisional measures.

¹ The relevant Rules of Court are Articles 73-78 in section D. (Incidental Proceedings, Subsection 1. Interim protection), reproduced in 17 ILM 1286 (1978).

2.2 Proprio motu use

Adjudicators normally take provisional measures following a request by a party. Nevertheless, several adjudicators can do so proprio motu as well. The term proprio motu seems to be used to refer to the situation in which there was no (specific) request by one of the parties to use provisional measures, but the adjudicator used them on its own motion. The term ex officio is always used together with terms such as 'authority' or 'power'. In other words here the emphasis is on the authority of the adjudicator to use provisional measures. This relates to the function of the adjudicator. In fact such an adjudicator has the authority ex officio to use provisional measures proprio motu.³ Sometimes a reference to provisional measures taken proprio motu seems to denote a discretionary power to do so while the reference to provisional measures taken ex officio denotes an obligation on the part of the adjudicator.

In 1932 Dumbauld wrote that in cases already brought before it, in accordance with Article 40 PCIJ Statute, the PCIJ had the power to indicate provisional measures ex officio. However, if the main action had not yet been brought, it could not do so on its own initiative. In passing he pointed out that (one of) the parties could request provisional measures already before the main action was brought, but without such request the Court could not indicate them in such case.⁴

Different from the PCIJ the present Court can only order provisional measures once the complaint itself has already been instituted.⁵ Like the PCIJ, the ICJ may equally indicate provisional measures proprio motu 'at any time' (Article 75(1) of the Rules of Court). Moreover, the substance of the measures may be different from that asked by the parties. Thus far the ICJ itself has only once indicated provisional measures proprio motu.⁶ It has only done so in the

² Merrills (1995), p. 90. The ICJ has never used provisional measures in the course of advisory proceedings. See about this power Sztucki (1983), pp. 136-143. See also Merrills (1995), p. 145 referring to the Applicability of the obligation to arbitrate under section 21 of the UN Headquarters Agreement of 26 June 1947, Order of 9 March 1988 (holding that in the circumstances of the case it was not appropriate for the Court 'to consider whether or not provisional measures may be indicated in proceedings on a request for an advisory opinion').

³ Sometimes the term sua sponte is used instead of proprio motu.

⁴ Dumbauld (1932), p. 155.

⁵ Thirlway (1994), p. 17 notes that different from some other international tribunals, there must be an established case before the ICJ. Sztucki (1983), p. 13 refers to Mixed Arbitral Tribunals allowing requests for provisional measures before an application is filed.

⁶ See ICJ LaGrand (Germany v. US), Order of 3 March 1999. See Merrills (1995), p. 143, referring to the Orders until 1995. The Orders decided by the ICJ subsequent to 1995 were equally on request of a party, Rosenne (2005), p. 177. In 1975 Oellers-Frahm, pp. 14-16 argued that the possibility of ex officio use would remain a dead letter because, according to the author, at the stage of provisional measures the Court does not undertake a summary analysis of the conflict in light of the need for protection of certain rights. Yet once the Court is (made) aware that it is at the stage of provisional measures, it does undertake such a summary analysis. It is true, however, that thus far it only dealt with the issue of proprio motu use when the imminence of the harm risked would seem to require provisional measures without first organising a hearing. In the Bosnia case such use of Article 75(1) of the Court's Rules was requested unsuccessfully. The Court in fact considered that the parties had made specific requests for provisional measures and therefore Article 75(1) did not apply. ICJ Application of the Convention on the prevention and punishment of the crime of genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia (Serbia and

LaGrand case because Germany had brought the case so close to the actual execution date that a hearing could not be held.⁷ It has used its power to modify or ‘tone down’ the provisional measures requested by (one of) the Parties.⁸ After all Article 75(2) of the Rules of the Court stipulates that ‘the Court may indicate measures that are in whole or in part other than those requested, or that ought to be taken or complied with by the party which has itself made the request’. It invoked this Rule in its Order for provisional measures in the Genocide Convention case⁹ and in Cameroon v. Nigeria.¹⁰ It has also included new aspects in its Orders for provisional measures, which had not been requested by either of the parties. Judge Ajibola confirmed that the ‘purpose and content of Article 41 of the Statute is not and cannot be restricted only to the preservation of the prospective rights of the parties in a matter like the one before the Court’. Thus he voted with the majority of the ICJ on the first operative part of the Order for provisional measures in Cameroon v. Nigeria, noting that the situation called for an Order proprio motu under Article 75 of the Rules of Court. In this context he emphasized the Court’s power to order provisional measures in order to prevent the aggravation or extension of the dispute.¹¹

According to Judge Laing, in his separate opinion to the Order for provisional measures by ITLOS in the M/V ‘Saiga’ case (1998), the ICJ has now affirmed that it has the power to order provisional measures to prevent aggravation or extension of the dispute even when the parties did not request this. He pointed out that there was no doubt that ITLOS had this authority as well.¹² On the other hand, the next year ad hoc Judge Shearer questioned whether ITLOS could prescribe provisional measures not requested by the parties. According to him the situation of ITLOS differed significantly from that of the ICJ.¹³ He noted that Article 290(3) of the UN Convention on the Law of the Sea stipulates that the ITLOS could only prescribe, modify or revoke provisional measures taken under this article ‘at the request of a party to the dispute and after the parties have been given an opportunity to be heard’. He considered, therefore, that ‘if article 89, Montenegro)), Order of 13 September 1993 (second request). See Wellens (1998), p. 428 commenting on this approach.

⁷ See ICJ LaGrand (Germany v. US), Order of 3 March 1999. Note that it took a different approach here from that taken in the Bosnia case. See also Separate Opinion of President Schwebel attached to this Order, still questioning the appropriateness of the use of Article 75(1) of the Rules in this context.

⁸ See e.g. Merrills (1995), p. 144 and Oellers-Frahm (1975), p. 15 (the latter noting that for those adjudicators that, unlike the ICJ, are not allowed to order provisional measures different from those requested (ultra petita), ex officio authority may be used to change the protective measures required). See section 3.7 (Protection).

⁹ ICJ Application of the Convention on the prevention and punishment of the crime of genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)), Order of 13 September 1993 (second request). See section 3.3.6 (gross human rights violations).

¹⁰ ICJ Land and maritime boundary between Cameroon and Nigeria (Cameroon v. Nigeria), Order of 15 March 1996, §§41 and 48. See section 3.3.4 (border conflict cases).

¹¹ ICJ Land and maritime boundary between Cameroon and Nigeria (Cameroon v. Nigeria), Order of 15 March 1996, Separate Opinion of Judge Ajibola. He referred to Nicaragua v. US, Order of 10 May 1984, Frontier Dispute case (Burkina Faso v. Mali), Order of 10 January 1986 and the Application of the Convention on the prevention and punishment of the crime of genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)), Order of 8 April 1993. See section 3 on the purpose of provisional measures.

¹² ITLOS Separate Opinion Judge Laing, M/V ‘Saiga’ (No. 2), Order of 11 March 1998.

¹³ He noted that in its Order for provisional measures in the M/V ‘Saiga’ (No. 2) case ITLOS invoked Article 89(5) of the Rules. This stipulates that it may prescribe measures ‘different in whole or in part from those requested’ and that it may indicate ‘the parties which are to take or to comply with each measure’. This Rule was modelled on Article 75 of the 1978 ICJ Rules of Court.

paragraph 5, of the Rules of the Tribunal truly purports to give a power to the Tribunal to act beyond the bounds of what has been requested (ultra petita)¹⁴, the Rule would not be authorised by the Convention and would thus be invalid.

“If, on the other hand, it is properly to be interpreted as meaning only that the Tribunal may, in addition to the alternatives of acceding completely to, or rejecting completely, the requested measures, prescribe measures that represent a partial grant or modified version of the requested measures, then the rule would be within power. I would include among such permitted measures, even if not formally requested by the parties, such “traditional” provisional measures as non-aggravation of the dispute, and – in the special circumstances of the present case – the measure directing the parties to seek agreement with other States and fishing entities engaged in fishing for southern bluefin tuna, since this measure is closely related to other measures sought by the parties”.¹⁴

Nevertheless in the MOX Plant case (2001) both ITLOS and the Arbitral Tribunal constituted pursuant to the UN Convention on the Law of the Sea to deal with this case did consider that they may prescribe measures different from those requested by the parties. ITLOS simply referred to Article 89(5) of its Rules.¹⁵ The Arbitral Tribunal equally referred to this article. It also noted that any question of procedure not expressly governed by the Convention or the Rules were to be decided by the Tribunal after consulting the parties. Since the parties did not comment on this issue the Tribunal considered that it was competent to prescribe provisional measures other than those sought by a party.¹⁶

¹⁴ ITLOS Southern Bluefin Tuna Cases, (New Zealand v. Japan; Australia v. Japan), 27 August 1999, Separate Opinion of Judge ad hoc Shearer.

¹⁵ ITLOS the MOX Plant case (Ireland v. UK), Order for provisional measures of 3 December 2001, §83.

¹⁶ Arbitral Tribunal constituted pursuant to Article 287, and Article 1 of Annex VII, of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea for the dispute concerning the MOX Plant, international movement of radioactive materials, and the protection of the marine environment of the Irish Sea, The MOX Plant case (Ireland v. UK), Order No. 3, suspension of proceedings on jurisdiction and merits and request for further provisional measures, 24 June 2003, §43. The Arbitral Tribunal stated ‘its willingness’, during the hearings in June 2003, ‘to consider the possibility of prescribing provisional measures if either Party considers that such measures are necessary to preserve the respective rights of the Parties or to prevent serious harm to the environment’. It did so after it announced its decision to suspend further proceedings in the case on the basis of considerations of mutual respect and comity, given possible proceedings before the European Court of Justice. Subsequently Ireland indeed submitted a request for further provisional measures. See Arbitral Tribunal constituted pursuant to Article 287, and Article 1 of Annex VII, of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea for the dispute concerning the MOX Plant, international movement of radioactive materials, and the protection of the marine environment of the Irish Sea, The MOX Plant case (Ireland v. UK), Order No.3, suspension of proceedings on jurisdiction and merits and request for further provisional measures, 24 June 2003, §§31 and 32. See also ITLOS Land Reclamation by Singapore in and around the Straits of Johor (Malaysia v. Singapore), Order of 8 October 2003.

2.3 Transparency, promptness and delegation

The Orders of the ICJ are published and include reasoning.¹⁷ Obviously provisional measures should be taken in a timely fashion.¹⁸ Sometimes this necessitates delegation of the authority to take provisional measures. Moreover, the discussion on transparency and due process is also influenced by considerations of promptness. Article 74 of the ICJ's Rules stipulates that requests for provisional measures shall have priority over all other cases and that the Court shall be convened 'forthwith' and 'as a matter of urgency'. Pending the meeting of the Court, its President may call upon the parties to take into account the request. Merrills points out that until 1995 the period between the request and the Order granting provisional measures varied from eight to 31 days. For the cases in which the ICJ refused the request the period ranged from 42 to 68 days.¹⁹ More recently it took 27 days in Avena, one day in LaGrand and six days in Breard.²⁰ Notice for Orders for provisional measures shall go 'forthwith' to the Parties and the Security Council.²¹ In the Lockerbie and Genocide Convention cases the ICJ only dealt with the request for provisional measures after it had notified all Parties to the Montreal Convention and the Convention against Genocide, respectively, of the filing of the applications.²² Given the urgency involved, sending these notifications after the proceedings on provisional measures would seem more appropriate, especially in cases involving the fate of human beings.²³

It is the ICJ President who fixes a date for the hearing about the request for provisional measures. In some cases (s)he arranges a hearing within a very short period of time. Thirlway mentions the Hostages case (ten days) and contrasts this to the Great Belt case (40 days). He notes that the President presumably takes into account the degree of urgency as well as other material considerations, such as audi alteram partem. The Parties must have the opportunity to attend the hearing.²⁴

As noted, the possibility of delegation was introduced in order to address the need for promptness.

Initially the Presidents of the PCIJ and ICJ had the power to make provisional interim orders. In 1927 President Max Huber granted the request for provisional measures in the Sino-Belgian Treaty case.²⁵ Since the Rules of Court of 1978, Rule 74(4) stipulates that the President can only send a telegram requesting the States involved 'to act in such a way as will enable any ¹⁷ Since 1999 the Orders for provisional measures (and the written and oral pleadings) are easily accessible on the website of the ICJ (<www.icj-cij.org>). The Court's judgments and provisional measures, as well as the texts of the hearings are made available on the internet in full. The PCIJ case law is also made available on this website. ITLOS case law is available at <www.itlos.org>.

¹⁸ About promptness see e.g. Merrills (1995), p. 142. About assessment of temporal and material urgency see section 5.

¹⁹ Merrills (1995), p. 142.

²⁰ See further section 3.3 on the ICJ's provisional measures to protect persons.

²¹ Article 73(2) ICJ Rules of Procedure; Article 94 ITLOS Rule of Procedure; see further Rosenne (2005), pp. 153-154. In exceptional cases the Geneva human rights adjudicators might at some point decide to do the same, but it remains to be seen whether the Security Council will formally deal with the information received. On follow up by the human rights adjudicators see Chapter XVIII.

²² See further Rosenne (2005), p. 166.

²³ See e.g. ICJ LaGrand (Germany v. US) and Avena (Mexico v. US). See further Rosenne (2005), p. 166.

²⁴ Thirlway (1994), p. 26.

²⁵ PCIJ Denunciation of the Treaty of 2 November 1865 between China and Belgium, Order of 8 January 1927. See further section 3.3.2.

order the court may make (...) to have its appropriate effects'.²⁶ As Rosenne observes, in all cases in which the President sent such a telegram, provisional measures were later used and in those cases in which the President did not send telegrams, the ICJ subsequently denied the request for provisional measures. The Avena case is an exception: the ICJ used provisional measures to halt the execution of several Mexican nationals in the US. The President previously had not sent a telegram simply because the execution dates were not imminent.²⁷ Chambers of the ICJ do have the power to order provisional measures. In the Frontier Dispute case (1986) between Burkina Faso and Mali the Chamber constituted to deal with the dispute indeed did so.²⁸

Article 29 ICJ Statute stipulates that, (w)ith a view to the speedy dispatch of business', the Court 'shall form annually a chamber composed of five judges which, at the request of the parties, may hear and determine cases by summary procedure'. While this Chamber is formed annually it does not appear to be used in the context of requests for provisional measures, possibly also because provisional measures are generally requested by one of the parties rather than by both parties together.

In the context of requests for provisional measures it may be necessary to streamline the standard proceedings in the interest of promptness, as long as both parties have an opportunity to address procedural and substantive concerns upon the Court's first indication of provisional measures. In any case both parties must have equal access to information, also at the provisional measures stage. Both parties must have the opportunity to be heard.²⁹ Yet, if the respondent does not respond or fails to appear this is not an obstacle to the use of provisional measures.³⁰ In general the ICJ has tried to allow the parties full opportunity to present their observations on the request for provisional measures.³¹ 'The most usual practice', as Dumbauld put it in 1932 (with regard to the PCIJ), 'is to provide for a hearing if the matter is not too urgent'.³² He referred to the statement by Judge Guerrero that 'time might not always permit a hearing'.³³ Nevertheless he noted that urgency as a result of the applicant party's 'lack of diligence' in making a timely ²⁶ See also Rules 13 and 32. Initially the power was delegated to the President when Court was not sitting (1922 Rules of Court, Article 57); later the power could not be delegated (1931 revision of the Rules); subsequently the President could 'take such measures as may appear to him to be necessary in order to enable the Court to give an effective decision' (1936 Rules of Court, Article 61(3) and 1946 ICJ Rules of Court); the present Rule provides: "Pending the meeting of the Court, the President may call upon the parties to act in such a way as will enable any order the Court may make on the request for provisional measures to have its appropriate effects" (1978 ICJ Rules of Court: Article 74(4)). See Wellens (1998), pp. 428-429 on the President's proactive use of this power in the Genocide Convention case.

²⁷ Rosenne (2005), pp. 169-170. For a recent example see also ICJ Press release of 15 August 2008, Proceedings instituted by Georgia against Russia, Urgent Communication to the Parties from the President under Article 74, paragraph 4, of the Rules of Court.

²⁸ ICJ Frontier Dispute case (Burkina Faso v. Mali), Order for provisional measures of 10 January 1986.

²⁹ See e.g. Merrills (1995), p. 143.

³⁰ See e.g. ICJ Fisheries Jurisdiction cases (UK v. Iceland; Germany v. Iceland, Order of 17 August 1972; US Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran (US v. Iran) (Hostages case), Order of 15 December 1979).

³¹ See, however, the discussion by Judge Schwebel on the short notice in the LaGrand case (Germany v. US), Order of 3 March 1999. See also Judge Buergenthal in LaGrand case (Germany v. US), Judgment of 27 June 2001.

³² Dumbauld (1932), p. 159.

³³ Ibidem.

complaint would be ‘duly discounted’ by the Court.³⁴ The LaGrand case shows that the ICJ has taken a different approach when the life of an individual is at stake.³⁵

In 1995 Merrills noted that States without a national as a member of the Court had generally insisted on an ad hoc Judge already at the stage of provisional measures, with the exception of Nicaragua in the Nicaragua case.³⁶ This trend has continued since 1995, albeit again with some exceptions in particularly urgent cases.³⁷ This is consistent with the ICJ statement in the South-Eastern Greenland case that the presence of ad hoc Judges would depend on the urgency of the case.³⁸

ITLOS normally sends the information about the requests for provisional measures on the same day that a party requests them, generally to the relevant Ministry or Secretary of State and to the Embassy (or Consulate) of that State in Germany (where the ITLOS is seated).³⁹ It generally takes three weeks for it to Order provisional measures.

ITLOS has elaborated more than the ICJ on the possibilities of delegation. The Tribunal is composed of 21 members with a quorum of eleven members. Like the ICJ, annually it forms a chamber of five of its members that may hear and determine disputes by summary procedure.⁴⁰ Article 25 of the ITLOS Statute provides that ITLOS and its Seabed Disputes Chamber shall both have the power to prescribe provisional measures and that this power is delegated to the Chamber of Summary Procedure when the Tribunal is not in session or when there are insufficient members to constitute a quorum.⁴¹ Like the Chamber of the ICJ, this Chamber is composed of the President and the Vice-President, ‘acting ex officio’ and three other members.⁴² ITLOS may adopt provisional measures at the request of any party to the dispute and they shall be subject to its review and revision.

Pursuant to Article 16 of the Statute, ITLOS adopted Rules specifying, among others, its approach to urgent cases. The Rules stipulate that in case of urgency the President may convene the Tribunal at any time.⁴³ If the Tribunal is not sitting it is the President who shall fix the earliest ³⁷ Since 1995 in most cases States that did not have a Judge of their nationality in the Court proposed an ad hoc Judge already at the provisional measures stage (Land and Maritime Boundary between Cameroon and Nigeria (Cameroon v. Nigeria), Order of 15 March 1996; Legality of the use of force (Serbia and Montenegro v. Belgium/Canada/France/Germany/Italy/Netherlands/Portugal), Order of 2 July 1999; Arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 (Congo v. Belgium), Order of 8 December 2000; Armed activities on the territory of the Congo (Congo v. Rwanda), Order of 10 July 2002; Certain criminal proceedings in France (Congo v. France), Order of 18 July 2003; Case concerning pulp mills on the river Uruguay (Argentina v. Uruguay) Orders of 13 July 2006 and 23 January 2007. Yet in Breard (Paraguay v. US), Order of 9 April 1998, Avena et al. (Mexico v. US), Order of 5 February 2003 and Armed activities on the territory of the Congo (Congo v. Uganda), Order of 1 July 2000 no ad hoc Judges were appointed at the provisional measures stage.

³⁴ Ibidem.

³⁵ ICJ LaGrand (Germany v. US), Order of 3 March 1999. See further section 3.3 (protection of the individual).

³⁶ Merrills (1995), p. 145.

³⁸ PCIJ Legal status of the South-Eastern Territory of Greenland, Order for provisional measures of 3 August 1932, p. 280. See also Dumbauld (1932), p. 157 and Rosenne (2005), p. 137.

³⁹ See e.g. ITLOS MOX plant case, §3. See also Rosenne (2005), p. 154.

⁴⁰ See Article 15 Statute of the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea, also stipulating that two alternative members shall be selected for the purpose of replacing members who are unable to participate in a particular proceeding.

⁴¹ See e.g. ITLOS Press Release 100, 6 October 2005.

⁴² See Article 28 Rules of the Tribunal. For the ICJ see Article 29 ICJ Statute.

⁴³ Article 41(6) Rules of the Tribunal, adopted 28 October 1997 (amended 15 March and 21 September 2001).

possible date for a hearing. Pending the meeting of the Tribunal he may 'call upon the parties to act in such a way as will enable any order the Tribunal may make on the request for the provisional measures to have its appropriate effects'.⁴⁴ Within 15 days of the prescription of the measures, at the written request of a party, the Tribunal shall review or revise them. It may also review or revise them proprio motu.⁴⁵

3 THE PURPOSE OF PROVISIONAL MEASURES IN GENERAL INTERNATIONAL LAW

3.1 Introduction

Article 41 ICJ Statute gives the ICJ the power to order provisional measures 'if it considers that circumstances so require'. The power to order such measures is discretionary.⁴⁶ Nevertheless, certain criteria have been applied to assess the appropriateness of their use. In that sense, the decision to use them is 'not purely discretionary'.⁴⁷ Reference is often made to their use to prevent irreparable harm and to the criterion of 'urgency'.⁴⁸ Obviously the concepts of irreparable harm and urgency are interrelated. They can only be understood in light of the rights claimed and the possible form of reparation. This raises issues involving the purpose of provisional measures, the risk of prejudgment and the question how urgency must be assessed. These issues are discussed in different sections. In order to clarify the criteria of irreparable harm and urgency this book distinguishes between the purpose of provisional measures and the assessment of temporal and material urgency. Temporal urgency relates to immediacy and material urgency to assessment of risk. The other criterion is that of irreparable harm, which adjudicators have found difficult to define.⁴⁹ Moreover, this concept is not always explicitly referred to in each international legal conflict.⁵⁰

This Chapter not only discusses the purpose of preventing irreparable harm, but also other traditional purposes. It then discusses the relationship between provisional measures, the rights

⁴⁴ Article 90(2) and (4) Rules of the Tribunal.

⁴⁵ Article 91 Rules of the Tribunal.

⁴⁶ See e.g. Sztucki (1983), p. 111; Merrills (1995), p. 109 and with regard to ITLOS, in M/V 'Saiga' Judge Laing who has pointed out that 'the view is well known that the power to order provisional measures is in principle discretionary', §6. He notes that such measures are 'discretionary and equitable' and that the 'open-ended' language of the Convention on the Law of the Sea facilitates this by stating: 'if it considers that the circumstances so require', §27. M/V 'Saiga' (N o. 2), Order for provisional measures of 11 March 1998, Separate Opinion Judge Laing.

⁴⁷ Elkind (1981), p. 209.

⁴⁸ See e.g. Rosenne (2005), pp. 135-148; Elkind (1981), pp. 209-219; Sztucki (1983), pp. 104-122; Beirlaen (1979-1980), pp. 97-101 and pp. 256-261; Merrills (1995), pp. 106-113 and Thirlway (1994), pp. 8-10 and pp. 25-27.

⁴⁹ Also called irreparable damage, injury or prejudice. See further Elkind (1981), p. 216.

⁵⁰ See e.g. ITLOS Judge Laing arguing 'there seems to be no a priori universal requirement of substantive urgency'. He believes that the notion of irreparability should not replace the textual requirement of the preservation of rights. With regard to a requirement of substantive urgency he notes that this 'has received some tepid encouragement under the twin influences of the requirements of procedural urgency and the notion that irreparability, with its connotations of gravity, has largely replaced the textual requirement of preservation of rights'. He believes that this idea is inaccurate and points out that the Order 'gives no credence to it'. M/V 'Saiga' (No. 2), Order for provisional measures of 11 March 1998, Separate Opinion Judge Laing, §26.

claimed and the eventual form of reparation, an issue closely related to that of prejudgment and the interests of the respondent State.

3.2 Adjudication of conflicts between States: the traditional purpose of provisional measures

3.2.1 Introduction

The ICJ's provisional measures aim to provide States with an expeditious remedy. At a minimum they serve to protect the status quo ante pending international adjudication. Elkind gives a broader expression of the function of provisional measures: "No party to a pending action may take advantage of a delay in settlement procedures by taking actions which will frustrate those procedures. This general norm is the real 'general principle'".⁵¹ He also notes that this principle could be seen as 'a corollary to the principle nemo iudex in sua causa (no one may be judge in his own cause) since a defendant who takes an action anticipating the judgment of the court or prejudicing the outcome of the dispute is, in effect, deciding in his own favour'.⁵² This statement serves as an example of a broader approach to provisional measures that takes into account the fairness of the proceedings.

The way in which the ICJ uses provisional measures 'has an important bearing on its ability to assist States in managing and resolving their disputes by peaceful means'.⁵³ Upon receipt of a request for provisional measures it must examine, to some extent, the substance of the case.⁵⁴ In some of these cases it subsequently finds that it lacks jurisdiction or that the case must be discontinued. In these situations the provisional measures phase provides the only opportunity for the Court to perform its judicial function. Rosenne has referred to the Southern Bluefin Tuna case in which the Annex VII arbitral tribunal had pointed out that revocation of the ITLOS Order for provisional measures did 'not mean that the Parties may disregard the effects of that Order or their own decisions made in conformity with it'.⁵⁵

⁵¹ Elkind (1981), p. 30. See in general his discussion of irreparable injury, the maintenance of the status quo, protection of the environment and aggravation or extension of the dispute, pp. 209-233.

⁵² Elkind (1981), p. 33 (footnote 53). See also section 3.6 of this Chapter on provisional measures and prejudgment.

⁵³ See Merrills (1995), p. 142.

⁵⁴ See further section 4 on the relationship with the rights claimed and section 5 on provisional measures and prejudgment.

⁵⁵ Annex VII Arbitral Tribunal Southern Bluefin Tuna case, Award on Jurisdiction and Admissibility of 4 August 2000, §67, referring to ITLOS Southern Bluefin Tuna cases (New Zealand v. Japan, Australia v. Japan), Order of 27 August 1999. Rosenne (2005), pp. 157-158, noted that 'carefully drafted provisional measures prescribed by ITLOS may have an implication for the future actions of the parties and lay the basis for the final solution of the dispute, even when the arbitral tribunal does not have jurisdiction over the dispute. There is no reason why this notion should not be given a wider application'. Thus 'carefully crafted provisional measures' may 'lay the basis for the final solution of the dispute', even when the adjudicator subsequently determines that it has no jurisdiction. In other words, proceedings on provisional measures constitute 'an important element in the general procedures available to States for the pacific settlement of their international dispute'. This does not mean that States could start proceedings simply in order to obtain provisional measures as some sort of interim judgment. Thus far this was a practice mainly before the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, before the introduction of new Rules of Procedure, see Chapter II of this book. If proceedings started before the ICJ are disingenuous, the ICJ is likely to dismiss them or in any case to deny requests for Section 3.1 mentioned the notion of preventing irreparable harm and noted that adjudicators have found it difficult to define the concept. The PCIJ initially referred to it. Subsequently, however, in 1939 it failed to mention it as a purpose of its provisional measures. In 1951 the ICJ did not mention it either, but since 1972 it has generally been accepted to constitute one of the main purposes of its provisional measures. This section briefly refers to some of the important early cases, starting with the two cases in which the purpose of preventing irreparable harm was not mentioned.

3.2.2 Preservation of rights and prevention of prejudice

In Electricity Company of Sofia and Bulgaria (1939) the PCIJ decided to use provisional measures to prevent prejudice to Belgium. The Court referred to Article 41 of the Statute and noted that this provision applied the principle ‘universally accepted by international tribunals and likewise laid down in many conventions to which Bulgaria has been a party – to the effect that the parties to a case must abstain from any measure capable of exercising a prejudicial effect in regard to the execution of the decision to be given and, in general, not allow any step of any kind to be taken which might aggravate or extend the dispute’.⁵⁶ What it seems to have had in mind is the preservation of rights. The Parties shall not cause prejudice to the execution of the decision to be given by the Court. The decision also seems to regard non-aggravation of the dispute as a universally accepted principle. Thirlway speculates that this is ‘either a restatement of something which in the Permanent Court’s view was inherent in judicial procedures, or as something which was implied in Article 41 of the Statute’.⁵⁷ The Court referred to prejudice to the Applicant (Belgium) but there was no indication that this prejudice would have been irreparable.⁵⁸ In the Anglo-Iranian Oil Co. case (1951) the ICJ equally referred to the rights that may be ‘subsequently adjudged by the Court to belong either to the Applicant or to the Respondent’.⁵⁹

In a previous case brought by Belgium (1927) the PCIJ did order provisional measures exactly because the violation of certain rights ‘would not be made good simply by the payment of an indemnity or by compensation or restitution in some material form’.⁶⁰ Equally, in the South-Eastern Greenland case (1932), in which the Court denied a request for provisional measures, it pointed out that the object of provisional measures ‘contemplated by the Statute of the Court’ was to preserve the respective rights of the Parties insofar as ‘the damage threatening these rights would be irreparable in fact or in law’.⁶¹ In 1972 the ICJ confirmed this approach in its Order for provisional measures in the Fisheries Jurisdiction cases. It referred to the purpose of preservation of the respective rights of the Parties pending the decision of the Court and pointed out that this presupposed that irreparable prejudice should not be caused to rights that are the subject of dispute in judicial proceedings. If Iceland would undertake the action planned it would anticipate provisional measures. If a request for provisional measures is aimed at preventing irreparable harm to persons and there is no prima facie inadmissibility it is suggested in this book that the proceedings started are not to be regarded as disingenuous and if such serious cases can be solved as a consequence of provisional measures ordered by the Court this should only be welcomed.

⁵⁶ PCIJ Electricity Company of Sofia and Bulgaria (Belgium v. Bulgaria), Order of 5 December 1939, p. 199.

⁵⁷ Thirlway (1994), p. 13.

⁵⁸ See Elkind (1981), pp. 209-210. See also section 3.6.

⁵⁹ ICJ Anglo-Iranian Oil Co. case, Order of 5 July 1951.

⁶⁰ See e.g. PCIJ Sino-Belgian Treaty case, Order of 8 January 1927, p. 7.

⁶¹ PCIJ South-Eastern Greenland case, Order of 3 August 1932, p. 284.

the Court's judgment and prejudice the rights claimed by the UK and Germany. This would 'affect the possibility of their full restoration in the event of a judgment in its favour'.⁶²

3.2.3 Preservation of or return to the status quo/non-anticipation of the judgment

Thirlway refers to the idea of preservation as probably the most essential element of the concept of provisional measures, preserving rights that are threatened with irreparable harm.⁶³ This, in turn, raises the question of the status quo. In the Hostages case, for instance, the US had argued that it obviously was not requesting the Court to maintain the status quo 'as created by the Government of Iran of the past days and weeks', but rather a return to the status quo ante.⁶⁴ The US referred to Dumbauld's reference to 'the last uncontested status prior to the controversy'.⁶⁵ In the Frontier Dispute case the request for provisional measures related to the restoration of the status quo ante. The Parties only requested these measures a few years after they referred the boundary dispute to the Court.⁶⁶ They did so in light of subsequent incidents. Thirlway points out that non-anticipation is 'another way of putting the idea of preserving the status quo'. He then raises the question what is the status quo and whether it is necessarily the status quo that has to be preserved in order to protect the relevant rights.⁶⁷ He notes that 'preservation of rights' means that 'it must be shown that there is a right', that there is a threat to this right that must be prevented because it will not be sufficient 'to wait and recompense the holder of the right afterwards'. This obviously implies an 'anticipation' to some extent. In this respect he makes a distinction between a request to 'restrain one party from taking some step to change the status quo' and a request to 'require a form of restraint which itself involves a departure from the status quo'.⁶⁸ Merrills considers that 'there is no reason in principle why actual or impending economic damage should not be a sufficient reason for obtaining interim protection'. Clearly the requesting State should ⁶² ICJ Fisheries Jurisdiction cases, Orders of 17 August 1972. About those cases see Thirlway (1994), pp. 11-12 who regrets the brevity of the Court's finding. He refers to the UK's request in which it 'explained very clearly the economic consequences of exclusion of British vessels from the Icelandic fishing grounds, and why those consequences would be irreversible'. He suggests that it was this that justified the Court's Order for provisional measures. "Even if the economic consequences had been purely transitory, and therefore capable of redress by monetary reparation, the Icelandic action would be just as much an anticipation of the Court's judgment". In other words, he argues that even if there is no risk of irreparable harm (because redress by monetary reparation would be possible) the ICJ could still use provisional measures simply to prevent a State from anticipating the Court's judgment.

⁶³ Thirlway (1994), p. 3, referring to the French term mesures conservatoires, and pp. 8-10.

⁶⁴ ICJ Hostages case (US v. Iran), Oral pleadings of 10 December 1979, p. 33.

⁶⁵ Dumbauld (1932), p. 187. Elkind (1981) discusses these statements at pp. 219-220.

⁶⁶ ICJ Frontier Dispute case (Burkina Faso v. Mali), Order of 10 January 1986.

⁶⁷ In the context of the Passing through the Great Belt (1991) case he notes that it 'could be said that the status quo was the fact of the Great Belt remaining open; but Finland argued in fact that the mere continuation of the works was creating a situation in which it would be, as it were, too late for Denmark to turn back, and that therefore the status quo was a status quo in which Denmark was not planning a bridge, or was at least not proceeding with construction work of a bridge'. In reference to the fact that the ICJ found that the interference would not take place 'until after the Court would foreseeably have given judgment on the merits', he concludes that the Court considered that the status quo was that of the Great Belt and not of Denmark's plans, Thirlway (1994), p. 12.

⁶⁸ Thirlway (1994), p. 11.

show that the harm is irreparable ‘in the sense that it could not be adequately dealt with by a subsequent award of compensation’.⁶⁹

Recently the ICJ denied requests for provisional measures in two cases instigated by Congo in relation to arrest warrants and criminal proceedings in Belgium and France, respectively.⁷⁰ The second case is still pending, but in the first the ICJ eventually found in favour of Congo.⁷¹ Nevertheless, pending the proceedings provisional measures were not warranted because the situation was not irreversible.

3.2.4 Non-aggravation or extension of the dispute

Non-aggravation or extension of the dispute was already mentioned as a purpose of provisional measures in the PCIJ Electricity Company of Sofia and Bulgaria case (1939).⁷² Yet the Fisheries Jurisdiction cases (1972), summing up the purposes of provisional measures, did not mention this aspect.⁷³ In the Aegean Sea case (1976) Greece argued that the purpose of preventing aggravation or extension of the dispute is a general consideration underlying the right to order provisional measures. All actions of the parties that might aggravate or extend the dispute fall under the jurisdiction of the Court. This power is not ‘merely another way of phrasing the idea that interim measures are intended to avoid prejudice in regard to the execution of the decision later to be given’. In other words, ‘these are clearly independent grounds for the Court’s intervention’.⁷⁴

According to Elkind the most important function of interim protection is indeed the prevention of violence,⁷⁵ yet in all cases provisional measures must aim at preserving the rights of the parties.⁷⁶ A decade later Merrills wrote that the idea appeared to be firmly established ‘that, in addition to the unique features of each situation’, the ICJ ‘should take into account the general value of containing disputes’.⁷⁷ On the other hand, Thirlway suggests that the obligation not to aggravate or extend an existing dispute ‘might be seen as a parallel’ to the obligation laid down in Article 18 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties or to the obligation not to defeat the object and purpose of an existing treaty between signature and ratification.⁷⁸ He notes that ‘you have, as it were, a legal kernel of obligation or asserted obligation contained in the original dispute, or in the treaty, and you have in parallel to that an obligation or asserted obligation not to enlarge, spoil, or defeat the kernel of law’.⁷⁹ The question remains whether non-aggravation of the dispute

⁶⁹ Merrills (1995), p. 112. In ICJ Arbitral Award of 31 July 1989 (Guinea-Bissau v. Senegal), Order of 2 March 1990, the ICJ rejected the argument that Article 41 should be used to protect interests as well as rights, see Merrills (1995), p. 143. See further section 3.5 on the relationship with the rights claimed.

⁷⁰ ICJ Arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 (Congo v. Belgium), Order of 8 December 2000 and Certain criminal proceedings in France (Congo v. France), Order of 17 June 2003.

⁷¹ ICJ Arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 (Congo v. Belgium), Judgment of 14 February 2002. See on this case e.g. Van Alebeek (2006), esp. pp. 333-337 and p. 477.

⁷² PCIJ Electricity Company of Sofia and Bulgaria (Belgium v. Bulgaria), Order of 5 December 1939; see also Dumbauld (1932), pp. 167-168 and Thirlway (1994), p. 7 pointing out that the 1907 Washington Convention that introduced the Central American Court and the Bryan Treaties (US) did not refer to preservation of rights but instead to the purpose of non-aggravation of the dispute and of preservation of status quo.

⁷³ ICJ Fisheries Jurisdiction cases, Orders of 17 August 1972.

⁷⁴ O’Connell’s arguments on behalf of Greece in the ICJ Aegean Sea case (Greece v. Turkey), Order of 11 September 1976, referred to in Elkind (1981), p. 225.

⁷⁵ See Elkind (1981), p. 229.

⁷⁶ Elkind (1981), p. 228.

⁷⁷ Merrills (1995), p. 122.

⁷⁸ Thirlway (1994), p. 13.

⁷⁹ Thirlway (1994), p. 14.

can be a purpose in itself sufficient for the Court to use provisional measures or whether it is part of or related to the power to use provisional measures to preserve the rights of the parties.

In the Nicaragua case the US argued that the use of provisional measures was ‘particularly inappropriate at this time’ because it could ‘irreparably prejudice the interests of a number of states and seriously interfere with the negotiations’.⁸⁰ The US considered that the fact that the UN Security Council and the OAS were addressing the conflict was another reason to refuse the provisional measures requested. Merrills notes that the ICJ did not discuss the relevance of the above-mentioned diplomatic activity for the ‘circumstances’ to be taken into account for the use of provisional measures. The fact, however, that it did order provisional measures shows that it did not consider that this was inappropriate. Merrills suggests that the Court may have agreed with Nicaragua’s argument that the fact that the question before it is linked with political questions should not force it to decline the ‘essentially judicial task’ before it.⁸¹ Subsequently the ICJ pointed out, in its judgment on jurisdiction and admissibility, that the UN Charter does not confer exclusive responsibility on the Security Council for the maintenance of international peace and security. There was no provision in the Charter demarcating between the functions of the Security Council and the ICJ. ‘The Council has functions of a political nature assigned to it, whereas the Court exercise purely judicial functions. Both organs can therefore perform their separate but complementary functions with respect to the same events’.⁸² Merrills concludes that legal and political processes complement each other and ‘there need be no contradiction between the pursuit of diplomatic means of settlement and the ordering of interim protection under Article 41’. At the same time there may be circumstances in which diplomatic efforts satisfy the Court that there is no longer a threat of irreparable harm, that there is no urgency anymore or that provisional measures would indeed prejudice ongoing negotiations.⁸³ In the Genocide Convention case the ICJ again did not consider the use of provisional measures inappropriate, despite Serbia’s argument that the Security Council was already dealing with the case under Chapter VII.⁸⁴

On the other hand, in the Lockerbie case, after the Security Council issued Resolution 748 under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, it did not consider the use of provisional measures appropriate, although several judges had argued that it could still have used them proprio motu with the purpose of preventing the aggravation of the dispute and in order to reduce tension.⁸⁵ According to Thirlway’s interpretation of the case law until and including the decision not to use provisional measures in the Lockerbie case (1992), either the Court has no independent power to use provisional measures only to prevent the aggravation or extension of the dispute or, if it exists

⁸⁰ ICJ Military and paramilitary activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. US), Judgment on jurisdiction and admissibility, 26 November 1984, §33 and Merrills (1995), p. 127.

⁸¹ Merrills (1995), p. 128. See further Rosenne (2005), pp. 196-201 and Gray (2003).

⁸² ICJ Military and paramilitary activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. US), Judgment on jurisdiction and admissibility, 26 November 1984, §95.

⁸³ Merrills (1995), p. 128.

⁸⁴ ICJ Application of the Convention on the prevention and punishment of the crime of genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)), Order of 8 April 1993, §33.

⁸⁵ ICJ Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libya v. US and UK), Order of 14 April 1992. See the Dissenting Opinions of Judges Bedjaoui, Ranjeva, Ajibola, Weeramantry and ad hoc Judge El-Koshi. As Merrills (1995), p. 131 points out, the ICJ could only have used provisional measures based on a finding that the Resolution was unconstitutional. ‘Whatever the Court’s powers to deal with such questions, it is difficult to see how they could be properly addressed in incidental proceedings’. He notes that the ICJ left open the question whether the ICJ could use provisional measures if the Security Council is acting in the same manner, but under Chapter VI. He refers in agreement to the statement by four individual members that this would indeed be possible (pp. 131-132).

it ‘should be exercised very sparingly’.⁸⁶ Subsequently, however, the ICJ has pointed out that, by virtue of Article 41, it does have the power to indicate provisional measures ‘with a view to preventing the aggravation or extension of the dispute whenever it considers that circumstances so require’. It has this power ‘independently of the requests for the indication of provisional measures submitted by the parties to preserve specific rights’.⁸⁷

In other words, in cases involving armed struggle the ICJ has used provisional measures to prevent aggravation of the conflict, but in the Lockerbie case it has not. According to Merrills, the fact that the Court refused to use them for that purpose in the latter case ‘must be explained by its different assessment of the facts’.⁸⁸ Moreover, it might also be explained by the idea that the ICJ ‘should be extremely cautious’ in its decision to use provisional measures proprio motu if a dispute was already dealt with under Chapter VII of the UN Charter.⁸⁹

In Congo v. Uganda (2000) the ICJ ordered provisional measures and noted that Security Council resolutions do not, as such, preclude the ICJ ‘from acting in accordance with its Statute and with the Rules of Court’.⁹⁰ After all the ICJ exercises ‘purely judicial functions’. ‘Both organs can therefore perform their separate but complementary functions with respect to the same events’.⁹¹ Already in the Frontier Dispute case (1986) the Chamber noted that ‘independently of the requests submitted by the Parties for the indication of provisional measures, the Court or, accordingly, the Chamber possesses by virtue of Article 41 of the Statute the power to indicate the provisional measures with a view of preventing the aggravation or extension of the dispute whenever it considers that circumstances so require’.⁹² The ICJ repeated this statement in 2000 in its Order for provisional measures in Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (Congo v. Uganda).⁹³ It now seems to be generally accepted that the need to prevent the aggravation or extension of a dispute could be taken into account in deciding whether provisional measures are necessary.⁹⁴

One situation in which this need is triggered is in cases where there is a risk of armed conflict. Yet Judge Buergenthal has pointed out that the ICJ must ‘be deemed to have the requisite powers vested in courts generally, powers that in my view find expression in Article 41 of its ⁸⁶ Thirlway (1994), pp. 14-16.

⁸⁷ See e.g. ICJ Certain criminal proceedings in France (Congo v. France), Order of 17 June 2003 (finding no need to use provisional measures) and Land and maritime boundary between Cameroon and Nigeria (Cameroon v. Nigeria), Order of 15 March 1996, §41. See also the Court’s statement in Frontier Dispute (Burkina Faso v. Mali), Order of 10 January 1986, §18.

⁸⁸ Merrills (1995), pp. 124-125. He also referred to the Separate Opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen, in Lockerbie (Libya v. US/UK), Order of 14 April 1992.

⁸⁹ Merrills (1995), p. 125. See also Wellens (1998), p. 422. In general on provisional measures and ‘international crisis management’: Rosenne (2005), pp. 218-222 and Gray (2003).

⁹⁰ ICJ Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (Congo v. Uganda), Order of 1 July 2000, §44.

⁹¹ ICJ Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (Congo v. Uganda), Order of 1 July 2000, §44. See also Cameroon v. Nigeria, Order of 15 March 1996, §36.

⁹² ICJ Frontier Dispute case (Burkina Faso v. Mali), Order of 10 January 1986, §18. Merrills (1995), p. 123 notes that this remark ‘served to underline the importance of the issue of aggravation and extension on the particular facts, as well as to confirm the existence of residual powers which might be significant in other cases’. See also the discussion of the proprio motu use of provisional measures in section 2 of this Chapter.

⁹³ ICJ Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (Congo v. Uganda), Order of 1 July 2000, §44. See also Cameroon v. Nigeria, Order of 15 March 1996, §41.

⁹⁴ Judge Laing even argues that ITLOS should not prescribe provisional measures without a reference to this purpose because they ‘might otherwise themselves become the source of tension between the parties’, ITLOS M/V ‘Saiga’ case (No. 2), Order of 11 March 1998, Separate Opinion of Judge Laing, §§31-32.

Statute, to ensure that the orderly adjudication of cases pending before it is not aggravated or undermined by extrajudicial coercive measures resorted to by one party to the dispute against the other'.⁹⁵ This applies to a broader range of cases than just those involving possible armed conflict. It would also mean that a provisional measure could be ordered 'just' to prevent aggravation of the dispute without also ordering measures to prevent irreparable harm to the rights that are the subject of the dispute.

He notes that in such cases 'the test would not be whether there is an imminent threat of irreparable harm to the subject matter of the dispute, but whether the challenged actions are having a serious adverse effect on the ability of the party seeking the provisional measures to fully protect its rights in the judicial proceedings'.⁹⁶

In any case, even if the ICJ decides not to use provisional measures, for a State the act of requesting provisional measures could have a value in itself. Merrills gives the following examples: the fact that they allow for the opportunity to generate publicity, that they may allow an increase in the pressure on the other States, that they may provoke a debate and even remove the requesting State's fear that it is about to be attacked.⁹⁷

3.2.5 Preserving the integrity of the proceedings/preserving the evidence

Reference has also been made to preserving the integrity of the proceedings and the preservation of evidence.⁹⁸ According to Dumbauld (1932) provisional measures 'protect rights of the parties, not the evidence by which a party expects to establish its rights, unless such evidence is indispensable and its loss would mean the loss of a right'.⁹⁹ The PCIJ President's Order in the Sino-Belgian case did refer to the obligation to provide judicial safeguards for Belgian nationals.¹⁰⁰ Yet this is a substantive obligation for China that could help protect the individual rights of the Belgian nationals rather than just obligations necessary to preserve the procedural rights of Belgium in the case before the PCIJ.

While in the Frontier Dispute case (1986) the ICJ did refer to the risk of destruction of evidence that might be material to the dispute, Thirlway considers this a purely procedural justification for provisional measures, 'not of great importance'.¹⁰¹ In this case both Parties (Burkina Faso and Mali) had agreed to bring the case before the ICJ and had also agreed on a cease-fire. In the Land and Maritime Boundary between Cameroon and Nigeria case (1996), however, this was not the case. Still the ICJ ordered, among others, that 'both parties should take ⁹⁵ ICJ Pulp Mills (Argentina v. Uruguay), Order of 27 January 2007, Declaration of Judge Buergenthal, §7. See also Declaration by Judge Koroma to the same order, §4.

⁹⁶ Id., Declaration of Judge Buergenthal, §11. See also the discussion in Chapter XIII (Protection) with regard to the problem with equality of arms when one of the parties in a legal conflict (the petitioner) is executed by the other (the State) pending a case before a human rights adjudicator.

⁹⁷ See Merrills (1995), pp. 140-141, referring to the Aegean Sea case and the Lockerbie case in relation to the fear of being attacked. For a contrary view, aiming at discouraging States to resort to the Court, see the two Concurring Opinions of Judges Dugard and Buergenthal in Congo v. Rwanda, Order of 10 July 2002.

⁹⁸ See e.g. Sztucki (1983), pp. 73-74.

⁹⁹ Dumbauld (1932), p. 164.

¹⁰⁰ PCIJ Sino-Belgian Treaty case, Order of 8 January 1927.

¹⁰¹ ICJ Frontier Dispute case (Burkina Faso v. Mali), Order of 10 January 1986. Thirlway (1994), p. 16. Yet as Merrills (1995), p. 108 points out, given the armed clashes that have taken place following reference of the boundary dispute to the Court, 'it was plainly important to restore the situation on the ground and to facilitate the gathering of evidence if the final judgment was to be effective'. See also Chapter XII, section 2.10 for an instance in which the European Commission on Human Rights used provisional measures to preserve evidence.

all necessary steps to conserve evidence relevant to the present case within the disputed area' and that they 'should lend any assistance to the fact-finding mission which the Secretary-General of the United Nations has proposed to send to the Bakassi Peninsula'.¹⁰²

3.2.6 Preventing serious harm to the (marine) environment

In its provisional measures in the Nuclear Test cases (1973) the ICJ ordered France to halt its nuclear tests and referred to claims that 'the uncertain physical and genetic effects to which contamination exposes the people of New Zealand causes them acute apprehension, anxiety and concern; and that there could be no possibility that the rights eroded by the holding of further tests could be fully restored in the event of a judgment in New Zealand's favour in these proceedings'.¹⁰³

The early work of Elkind (1981) already suggested protection of the environment as one of the circumstances that might warrant the use of provisional measures.¹⁰⁴ He referred to the pleadings of New Zealand in the Nuclear test cases about the 'irreversible contribution which such tests make to the pollution of the human environment'. To some extent it seemed, thereby, to be 'asserting some world community interest'.¹⁰⁵ He has also pointed out that '[e]nvironmental damage in most cases involves the unendurable rather than the irreparable'.¹⁰⁶ While the environmental and world community interests may certainly have played a role in the ICJ's Order to France to halt its nuclear tests, at the time environmental protection, as an interest in itself, was not yet generally considered to constitute a reason for the use of provisional measures. Later, in Pulp Mills, the ICJ did stress the 'great significance' it attached to respect for the environment.¹⁰⁷ It noted the 'general obligation of States to ensure that activities within their jurisdiction and control respect the environment of other States or of areas beyond national control is now part of the corpus of international law relating to the environment'.¹⁰⁸ It pointed out that the case

¹⁰² ICJ Land and Maritime Boundary between Cameroon and Nigeria case (1996), Order of 15 March 1996, §49 (Judge Ajibola voted against this part of the Order, considering that while the order was formally directed to both Parties, in fact it 'can only refer to Cameroon', resulting in unequal treatment of the Parties).

¹⁰³ ICJ Nuclear Tests case (New Zealand v. France), Order of 22 June 1973, §28. See also section 3.6 (prejudgment) and 3.7.4 (relation to reparation). In 1994 Wellens referred to the 'potential irreversibility of many forms of environmental damage' and considered that 'one would expect a more widespread acceptance and provision for mechanisms indicating interim measures of protection upon emergence of a dispute, although the need for such a mechanism could in the first place be reduced by the application of the precautionary principle to the maximum extent possible', Wellens (1994), p. 25. See also section 5.3 on assessment of material urgency and the precautionary principle.

¹⁰⁴ Elkind (1981), pp. 220-224.

¹⁰⁵ Elkind (1981), p. 222. See the Nuclear Test cases, Orders of 22 July 1973 (the six Dissenting Opinions related to the issue of jurisdiction rather than to the purpose of provisional measures). For Elkind's evaluation of the concept of irreparable harm see the discussion in section 3.3 of this Chapter.

¹⁰⁶ Elkind (1981), p. 224.

¹⁰⁷ ICJ Pulp Mills, Order of 13 July 2006, §72. Yet it denied the request for provisional measures because Argentina had not persuaded it that the construction of the mills posed 'an imminent threat of irreparable damage', §73. See also on lack of imminence, ICJ Pulp Mills, Order of 23 January 2007, §§42 and 50.

¹⁰⁸ It referred to ICJ Advisory Opinion on the Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons, 8 July 1996. See further, e.g. Kwiatkowska (1996). See also section 5.3 on assessment of material urgency and the precautionary principle.

highlighted the importance of the need to ensure environmental protection of shared natural resources while allowing for sustainable economic development'.¹⁰⁹

The introduction of Article 290(1) UNCLOS specifically recognized environmental protection as one of the aims of provisional measures. The article provides the criterion that the provisional measures prescribed by ITLOS must be 'appropriate under the circumstances to preserve the respective rights of the parties to the dispute or to prevent serious harm to the marine environment'. This means that there could be two different reasons for provisional measures by ITLOS. If it takes measures to prevent such harm to the marine environment and these measures have been requested by one of the Parties the two reasons coincide. It explicitly provides the tribunal with the authority to take into account a general interest going beyond the rights of the Parties to the conflict. This is the interest of the protection of the marine environment. ITLOS does not use the criterion of preventing irreparable harm. As is clear from the text, instead it uses the more lenient criterion of preventing serious harm. This is also the criterion generally used in international environmental law.¹¹⁰ This means that, just like in human rights treaties, States have now explicitly assigned to an international adjudicator the task to determine conflicts about the interpretation and application of rights and interests that surpass those of the State alone.

In the MOX Plant case Ireland argued that the commissioning of the plant would itself be 'a near-irreversible step'.¹¹¹ It would not be possible 'to return to the position that existed before the commissioning of the MOX Plant simply by ceasing to feed plutonium into the system'.¹¹² The UK, on the other hand, contended that 'neither the commissioning of the MOX Plant nor the introduction of plutonium into the system' would be irreversible, 'although decommissioning would present the operator of the plant with technical and financial difficulties, if Ireland were to be successful in its claim before the Annex VII arbitral tribunal'.¹¹³ ITLOS placed on record the assurances given by the UK that there would be no additional marine transports to or from Sellafield as a result of the commissioning of the MOX Plant and that there would be no export of MOX fuel until October 2002 nor import 'to the THORP plant of spent nuclear fuel pursuant to contracts for conversion to the MOX plant'. In the circumstances, and in the short period before the constitution of the Annex VII arbitral tribunal, it did not find that the urgency of the situation required the prescription of the provisional measures requested by Ireland. As discussed in section 3.7 on the substance of provisional measures it instead ordered the parties to cooperate.¹¹⁴

3.2.7 Preventing irreparable harm

Dumbauld pointed out in 1932 that it is not necessary for provisional measures to be 'absolutely indispensable'. It is 'sufficient if they serve as a safeguard against substantial and not easily reparable injury'.¹¹⁵ 'The degree of necessity required varies with the nature of the measure. The more serious the hardship to defendant, the stricter the scrutiny of plaintiff's wants'.¹¹⁶

¹⁰⁹ ICJ Pulp Mills, Order of 13 July 2006, §80.

¹¹⁰ See also the discussion on the relationship between provisional measures and the precautionary principle in section 5.3.3.

¹¹¹ ITLOS MOX Plant case (Ireland v. UK), Order of 3 December 2001, §70.

¹¹² Ibid.

¹¹³ ITLOS MOX Plant case (Ireland v. UK), Order of 3 December 2001. The discussion on the provisional measures in the Southern Bluefin Tuna cases (New Zealand v. Japan; Australia v. Japan) Order of 27 August 1999 is also relevant in this respect.

¹¹⁴ ITLOS MOX Plant case (Ireland v. UK), Order of 3 December 2001, §§77-89.

¹¹⁵ Dumbauld (1932), p. 163.

¹¹⁶ Ibid.

Half a century later Elkind noted that the likelihood of irreparable injury to be caused to (one of) the Parties was indeed ‘the most commonly accepted circumstance’ justifying the use of provisional measures.¹¹⁷

Even when the ICJ does not use the phrase ‘irreparable harm’, this seems to underlie its use of provisional measures, or in the words of Rosenne, the ICJ will regard a case as urgent only if the ‘potential damage would be irreparable’.¹¹⁸ The next section will refer to the Court’s case law regarding rights that surpass those of the State alone, in particular to protect the individual. In those cases reference is often made exactly to the purpose of preventing irreparable harm.

3.3 Conflicts between States with regard to the protection of the individual

3.3.1 Introduction

The ICJ is not a human rights court and not even an international court of general jurisdiction, receiving individual complaints. Yet a State may request it to indicate provisional measures for the protection of individuals. This means that the Court can address individual rights in so far as they are asserted by a State, through diplomatic protection, but always in function of the relationship between the rights of an individual and those of a State.¹¹⁹

Both under customary international law and in conventions such as the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations (1963), States have the fundamental right to protect their subjects abroad, if these are injured, or are about to be injured, by acts of another State, in violation of international obligations. The State may accord diplomatic protection against an act or omission by a foreign State causing injury to its subjects.¹²⁰ In 1924 the PCIJ already called this ‘an elementary principle of international law’.¹²¹ The State is entitled to communicate with its national who is arrested or charged with a crime in another State, to give him or her assistance and to have a representative present at the trial. Moreover, international law has recognised the right of States to demand reparation for damage suffered by their nationals abroad. In this respect, citizens are still seen as a constituent element of the State itself – and, ideally, the primary reason for the State’s existence. On the other hand, the changing nature of international law may even change the doctrine of diplomatic protection, exactly where human rights are concerned.¹²² The individual is increasingly gaining prominence in international law, which is particularly relevant in connection with dignity rights and the right to life. To some extent this is also reflected in the decisions of the ICJ.¹²³

This section discusses the PCIJ Order in China v. Belgium, and ICJ Orders involving consular issues, border conflicts and mass human rights violations.

¹¹⁷ Elkind (1981), p. 210. For Elkind’s evaluation of the concept of irreparable harm see the discussion in section 3.3 of this Chapter. For another discussion of the early case law see also Beirlaen (1979-1980), pp. 262-270.

¹¹⁸ Rosenne (2005), p. 135.

¹¹⁹ On diplomatic protection and attempts of the ILC Special Rapporteur Dugard to emphasize human rights aspects, see e.g. his reports A/CN.4/514 (2001), A/CN.4/538 (2004); A/CN.4/546 (2005) and A/CN.4/567 (2006). See also Vermeer-Künzli (2007) and Pronto (2007).

¹²⁰ ALI Restatement (Third) of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States, (1987) par 713, Comment c. See more closely on the issue of diplomatic protection and its relation to human rights the reports by ILC Rapporteur Dugard and Vermeer-Künzli (2007).

¹²¹ PCIJ Mavrommatis Concessions cases, Judgment of 30 August 1924, p. 12.

¹²² See Kamminga (1992).

¹²³ See also, e.g., Milano (2004), Pinto (2002), Bedjaoui (2000), Higgins (1998), Schwebel (1996b) and Goy (1995).

3.3.2 Protecting nationals

In 1927 Belgium claimed that the Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation with Belgium, which had been denounced by China, was still in force. President Huber of the PCIJ ordered provisional measures, noting that, should this claim later be found to be correct, a violation of the rights of the Belgian nationals in China ‘could not be made good simply by the payment of an indemnity or by compensation or restitution in some other material form’.¹²⁴ Thus he ordered provisional measures, upholding, at least during the proceedings, certain basic rights contained in this treaty. These rights included the right of any Belgian who lost his passport or had committed an offence ‘to be conducted in safety to the nearest Belgian consulate’ and protection of Belgians against insult or violence. They also included their right not to be arrested except through a consul, ‘nor to be subjected, as regards the execution of any penalty involving personal violence or duress, to any except the regular action of Belgian law’. Finally the provisional measures ordered China to ensure the right to a fair trial (legal proceedings) heard by ‘the modern courts’, with the right of appeal, ‘in accordance with the regular legal procedure and with the assistance of advocates and interpreters chosen by them and duly approved by the said courts’.¹²⁵ As Higgins puts it:

“[v]arious rights that today we would term human rights were protected by the interim measures, exactly because they were the claimed rights by one party under the dispute (...) The protection of human rights was the concomitant of the perceived need to protect the rights claimed in the dispute under litigation; it was not ancillary to them or separate from them”.¹²⁶

3.3.3 Protecting diplomats and other nationals

In US Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran (1979) the US had claimed violations of its diplomatic and consular rights, as well as the rights of its nationals to ‘life, liberty, protection and security’.¹²⁷

Early November 1979 a strong-armed group of several hundred people had attacked the US embassy and took hostage all the diplomatic and consular personnel, as well as other persons present in the premises. Later, they seized US personnel and one US private citizen in other places in Tehran and brought them to the embassy as well. Reportedly, the Iranian security personnel had simply disappeared from the scene and the government made no attempt to clear the embassy premises or to rescue the hostages. They did not even attempt to persuade the militants to terminate their actions. Two weeks after the attack thirteen hostages were released, but at the time of the request for provisional measures several people were still being held hostage: at least 28 persons with the status of ‘member of the diplomatic staff’, at least twenty persons recognized as ‘member of the administrative and technical staff’ and two US citizens with no diplomatic or consular status.

The US alleged inhumane treatment of the hostages. In its Order the Court noted the assertions by both the militants and the Iranian authorities that the hostages were well treated and that special visits had been allowed by religious personalities and representatives of the ICRC.

¹²⁴ PCIJ Denunciation of the Treaty of 2 November 1865 Between China and Belgium, Order of 8 January 1927, p. 7.

¹²⁵ Id., p. 8. Subsequently President Huber revoked the Order ‘in its entirety’, upon request of Belgium, now that Belgium and China had agreed to a provisional regime of protection, Order of 15 February 1927.

¹²⁶ Higgins (1997), p. 95.

¹²⁷ ICJ United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran (US v. Iran), 15 December 1979, p. 19.

The Court also pointed out that Iran had not refuted the concrete allegations of ill treatment. It referred to examples, mentioned in some of the sworn declarations, of hostages who had been released in November 1979. Some hostages ‘were paraded, bound and blindfolded before hostile and chanting crowds; at least during the initial period of their captivity, hostages were kept bound and frequently blindfolded, denied mail or any communication with their government or with each other, subjected to interrogation, threatened with weapons’.¹²⁸ Seventeen days later the Court unanimously issued an Order for provisional measures. While the ICJ ordered provisional measures on the basis of the diplomatic and consular conventions alone, it did add, that ‘the continuance of the situation [which is] the subject of the present request exposes the human beings concerned to deprivation, hardship, anguish and even danger to life and health and thus to a serious possibility of irreparable harm’.¹²⁹

The Hostages case is known mainly for its discussion of state responsibility, including responsibility for inaction¹³⁰ and for the Court’s determination that ‘diplomatic law itself provides the necessary means of defence against, in sanction form, illicit activities by members of diplomatic or consular missions’.¹³¹ At the time the US filed the Application, however, US nationals were still being held hostage in Iran, requiring immediate protective action. For this reason the US also requested provisional measures under Article 41 of the ICJ Statute and Article 73 Rules of Court.¹³² The US had requested, in particular, the immediate release of its nationals detained in the embassy and at the Iranian Ministry of Foreign Affairs. It had also requested the restoration of the embassy premises to the US authorities. Before the Court was able to convene to discuss this request the President sent the governments of Iran and the US a telegram requesting them ‘to act in such a way as will enable any order the court may make (...) to have its appropriate effects’.¹³³

Subsequently, in its judgment on the merits, the ICJ pointed out:

“Wrongfully to deprive human beings of their freedom and to subject them to physical restraint in conditions of hardship is in itself manifestly incompatible with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations, as well as with the fundamental principles enunciated in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights”.¹³⁴

In its order for provisional measures the Court considered that, contrary to Iran’s argument, the hostage taking and detention of internationally protected persons was far from ‘secondary and marginal’. The Court referred to the UN Secretary General’s statement that it was a ‘grave situation’ posing ‘a serious threat to international peace and security’ as well as Security Council resolution 457 in which the Council expressed its deep concern about the dangerous level of tension between the two States, a tension which ‘could have grave consequences for international peace and security’.¹³⁵ Iran had also put forward that the matter was one of domestic jurisdiction. The Court responded that ‘a dispute which concerns diplomatic and consular premises and the

¹²⁸ ICJ US Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran (US v. Iran) (Hostages case), Order of 15 December 1979, §§17, 18, 22 and 23.

¹²⁹ Id. p. 20.

¹³⁰ ICJ US Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran (US v. Iran) (Hostages case), Order of 15 December 1979, §§61-67 (due diligence) and 69-79 (acts of state).

¹³¹ ICJ US Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran (US v. Iran) (Hostages case), Order of 15 December 1979, §§83 and 86.

¹³² It requested provisional measures on 29 November 1979, the day it filed its Application.

¹³³ On the basis of Rule 74(4) of the Rules of Court (1978).

¹³⁴ ICJ US Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran (US v. Iran) (Hostages case), Judgment of 24 May 1980, §91.

¹³⁵ ICJ US Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran (US v. Iran), Order of 15 December 1979, §23.

detention of internationally protected persons, and involves the interpretation or application of multilateral conventions codifying the international law governing diplomatic and consular relations, is one which by its very nature falls within international jurisdiction'.¹³⁶

The Court also disposed of Iran's argument that provisional measures were intended to protect the interests of both Parties and could not be granted to one side only. It pointed out that the terms of Article 41 of the Statute explicitly refer to 'the respective rights of either party' (italics by the Court), that 'the whole concept of an indication for provisional measures, as Article 73 of the Rules recognizes, implies a request from one of the parties for measures to preserve its own rights against action by the other party calculated to prejudice those rights pendente lite'. It concluded that a request for provisional measures is 'by its nature unilateral'.¹³⁷

The State did not argue these points during the hearing, as it chose not to appear before the Court. Instead, the Court derived these arguments from a letter Iran had sent one day before the hearing.¹³⁸

After emphasising the fundamental importance of respect for the inviolability of envoys and embassies for the conduct of relation between States, in particular the reciprocal obligation to assure the personal safety of the diplomats, the US pointed out the danger of irreparable harm.

"Whereas continuance of the situation the subject of the present request exposes the human beings concerned to privation, hardship, anguish and even danger to life and health and thus to a serious possibility of irreparable harm".¹³⁹

The Court unanimously found that the situation required the indication of provisional measures in order to preserve the rights claimed.¹⁴⁰ Firstly, Iran should immediately return to the exclusive control of US authorities the premises of the US Embassy, Chancery and Consulates and ensure their inviolability and effective protection as required by the treaties in force between the two States as well as by customary international law. Secondly, Iran 'should ensure the immediate release, without any exception, of all persons of United States nationality who are or have been held in the Embassy of the United States of America or in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Tehran, or have been held as hostages elsewhere, and afford full protection to all such persons, in accordance with the treaties in force between the two States, and with general international law'. Thirdly, Iran 'should, as from that moment, afford to all the diplomatic and consular personnel of the United States the full protection, privileges immunities to which they are entitled under the treaties in force between the two States, and under general international law, including immunity from any form of criminal jurisdiction and freedom and facilities to leave the territory of Iran'. Finally, it also ordered both parties not to take any action and to 'ensure that no action is taken which may aggravate the tension between the two countries or render the existing dispute more difficult of solution'.¹⁴¹

Thirlway asks in what way the rights asserted by the US would be 'preserved' by the measures requested:

¹³⁶ Id., §25.

¹³⁷ Id., §29.

¹³⁸ According to Oellers-Frahm, in light of the fact that the defendant State often does not appear before the Court, it became customary in proceedings for provisional measures for the Court to take into consideration any available materials, even without any specific provision to that effect in the Rules of Court. Oellers-Frahm (1981), p. 283. See also Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

¹³⁹ ICJ US Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran (US v. Iran), Order of 15 December 1979, §42.

¹⁴⁰ It referred to the provisions of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected Persons, including Diplomatic Agents (1973).

¹⁴¹ ICJ US Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran (US v. Iran), Order of 15 December 1979, §47.

“Setting aside for the moment the rights of individuals concerned, the other rights had already been grossly and flagrantly infringed; it was certainly right that the infringement should cease, but whether this took place following an order of interim measures or following judgment on the merits would not be a question of preservation of the rights, but rather a damage-limitation exercise. In neither event would the injury suffered be an irreparable one”.¹⁴²

It seems evident, however, that the Court’s main interest was in fact the protection of the individuals concerned against further harm. While noting that ‘nothing could be more irreparable than the taking of life’, Thirlway questions whether the rights of the US were at stake now that some of the persons at risk of being executed were not US citizens.¹⁴³ He notes that the Court ‘moved imperceptibly from the international legal rights of the United States to the injury to the persons, health and life of the individuals concerned; the Order provides no link between these two considerations’.¹⁴⁴

Indeed, in Higgins’ words: ‘[e]schewing formalism, the Court thus made the connection between harm to the individuals concerned and obligations owed by Iran to the United States under the Vienna Conventions’.¹⁴⁵

3.3.4 Protecting people in border conflict cases: collateral human beings

In the Frontier Dispute case (1986) the ICJ Chamber pointed out that, in the face of ‘force which is irreconcilable with the principle of the peaceful settlement of international disputes’ it had the ‘power and duty to indicate, if need be, such provisional measures as may conduce to the due administration of justice’.¹⁴⁶ Moreover, in this case ‘the armed actions in the territory in dispute could result in the destruction of evidence material to the Chamber’s eventual decision’.¹⁴⁷ Finally the facts that had ‘given rise to the requests of both Parties for the indication of provisional measures exposes the persons and property in the disputed area, as well as the interests of both States within that area, to serious risk of irreparable damage’.¹⁴⁸ Thus the risk of irreparable harm to persons and property was sufficient for the use of provisional measures, ‘even though, it must be said, that harm could not of itself affect where the frontier line might run or the implementation of a judgment on the frontier line’.¹⁴⁹

In Cameroon v. Nigeria (1996) the ICJ noted that it was clear from submissions of both Parties ‘that there were military incidents and that they caused suffering, occasioned fatalities – of both military and civilian personnel – while causing others to be wounded or unaccounted for, as well as causing major material damage’.¹⁵⁰ It pointed out that the rights at issue were ‘sovereign rights which the Parties claim over territory’ and that these rights also concerned persons.¹⁵¹ It noted that especially the killing of persons had already ‘caused irreparable damage to the rights that the Parties may have over the Peninsula’ and persons in the disputed area were ‘exposed to ¹⁴² Thirlway (1994), p. 8. He pointed out that ‘if the Iranian intruders had not already gained access to the secret files in the Embassy vaults, to prevent them doing so would be to forestall an injury which would be irreparable’.

¹⁴³ Thirlway (1994), p. 8.

¹⁴⁴ Id., p. 9.

¹⁴⁵ Higgins (1997), p. 100. For ICJ DRC v. Uganda, Order of 1 July 2000. See section 3.3.6 of this Chapter.

¹⁴⁶ ICJ Frontier Dispute case (Burkina Faso v. Mali), Order of 10 January 1986, §19.

¹⁴⁷ Id., §20. See also section 3.2.

¹⁴⁸ Id., §21.

¹⁴⁹ Higgins (2007), p. 102.

¹⁵⁰ ICJ Land and maritime boundary between Cameroon and Nigeria (Cameroon v. Nigeria), Order of 15 March 1996, §38.

¹⁵¹ Id., §39.

serious risk of further irreparable damage'. As a consequence the rights of the Parties within that area were exposed to such risk. Armed actions 'could jeopardize the existence of evidence relevant to the present case'.¹⁵² Judge Oda attached a declaration to the Order, expressing some concern about this statement. He noted that the purpose of provisional measures was to preserve the rights that were to be considered at the merits stage and which constituted, or were 'directly engaged by, the subject of the application'. "The anticipated or actual breach of the rights to be preserved ought to be one which could not be erased by the payment of reparation or compensation to be ordered in a later judgment on the merits". He believed 'that loss of life in the disputed area, distressing as it undoubtedly is, does not constitute the real subject matter of the present case'.¹⁵³

Judge Koroma, on the other hand, considered that the Court had indeed sufficient reason to grant this provisional order 'on its own accord', because of 'the possibility of a further military engagement resulting in irreparable damage to the rights of either Party, including further loss of human life'.¹⁵⁴ Ad hoc Judge Ajibola did not agree with the contents of the provisional measures in several respects, but he did confirm that protection and preservation of human life has often been an important aspect of provisional measures and he agreed that the Court should indeed order provisional measures to the effect that Parties would cease acts of aggression in order to alleviate the sufferings and loss of life and property caused by the dispute between two States.¹⁵⁵

As noted, analysing this case Higgins pointed out that '[t]he risk of irreparable harm to persons', was 'enough for provisional measures – even though, it must be said, that harm could not of itself affect where the frontier line might run'.¹⁵⁶ She argues that this case and Frontier Dispute case (Burkina Faso v. Mali) (1986),¹⁵⁷ taken together, 'go beyond the series of cases in which provisional measures that protect human life were indicated because the dispute in question was exactly about such rights'.¹⁵⁸ In other words, even if the dispute before the Court is not exactly about the protection of human life or dignity, provisional measures for the protection of these rights may still be indicated.¹⁵⁹

¹⁵² Id., §42.

¹⁵³ ICJ Land and maritime boundary between Cameroon and Nigeria (Cameroon v. Nigeria), Order of 15 March 1996, declaration of Judge Oda.

¹⁵⁴ ICJ Land and maritime boundary between Cameroon and Nigeria (Cameroon v. Nigeria), Order of 15 March 1996, declaration of Judge Koroma. In a joint declaration Judges Weeramantry, Shi and Vereshchetin express concern about one aspect of the courts border, because of the dispute about the location of the respected armed forces, while Judge Mbaye was 'delighted' by the approach taken by the Court.

¹⁵⁵ ICJ Land and maritime boundary between Cameroon and Nigeria (Cameroon v. Nigeria), Order of 15 March 1996, Separate Opinion of Judge Ajibola (He referred to the Fisheries Jurisdiction case and the Hostages case. "Evidently those indications of provisional measures whether simply for the preservation of rights, the avoidance of an aggravation or extension of the dispute or an act such as might cause irreparable harm or prejudice to the parties have always had an element of protection and preservation of human life and/or property").

¹⁵⁶ Higgins (1998), p. 699.

¹⁵⁷ ICJ Frontier Dispute case (Burkina Faso v. Mali), Order of 10 January 1986 and Land and Maritime Boundary between Cameroon and Nigeria (Cameroon v. Nigeria), Order of 15 March 1996.

¹⁵⁸ Higgins (1997), pp. 107-108. See also Rosenne (2005), pp. 194-196 and Ghandhi (2004).

¹⁵⁹ For a different approach see Yoshiyuki Iwamoto (2002), p. 364.

3.3.5 Releasing crew and the protection of the (marine) environment

As discussed in section 3.2 the ICJ and ITLOS have dealt with requests for provisional measures to prevent serious harm to the (marine) environment. This section refers to the authority of ITLOS to order the release of crew and its wearing on the authority to order provisional measures.

In his separate opinion in the M/V 'Saiga' case (1998) ITLOS Judge Laing 'catalogued' the types of cases in which provisional measures have been used in public international law. He referred to a wide variety of rights that have been recognized in provisional measures in relation to: 'armed conflicts, threats to peace, injuries to property and persons; human rights violations; commercial and consular/diplomatic rights of aliens; environmental protection and maritime freedoms'. He considered that 'perhaps the existing jurisprudence reflects that rights or claims of a generally high order have received cognition'. In addition, he argued that Article 290 UNCLOS would have to protect 'non-traditional asserted rights'. However, in the 'Saiga' case 'the rights in issue fall within the catalogue set forth above or clearly involve specific entitlements and claims under UNCLOS, plus, in one situation, general notions of human rights'.¹⁶⁰ The 'one situation' referred to involved the rights and freedoms of crew members on board vessels that were entered by other States.¹⁶¹

The urgent action to be undertaken by ITLOS may take two different forms. One is the 'prescription' of provisional measures and the other is the delivery of an urgent judgment ordering the release of vessels or crews. Article 90 of the ITLOS Rules stipulates: 'subject to article 112, paragraph 1, a request for the prescription of provisional measures has priority over all other proceedings before the Tribunal. Article 112(1) of the Rules provides that applications for releases of vessels or crews have priority over all other proceedings before the Tribunal. Yet it also provides that 'if the Tribunal is seized of an application for release of a vessel or crew and of a request for the prescription of provisional measure, it shall take the necessary measures to ensure that both the application and the request are dealt with without delay'.

The fact that there is an urgent procedure for the release of vessels or crews, together with the fact that decisions for such release take the form of a judgment, shows the importance attached by ITLOS to the plight of persons in detention. Had it not introduced a specific provision on this issue, ITLOS could have used Article 290 UNCLOS, on the prescription of provisional measures, to intervene in such cases. The Rules imply that the requests for provisional measures have priority over all other proceedings except those involving the release of vessels or crews. At the same time they leave some possibility to examine a request for provisional measures prior to a request for release of vessels or crews.

Circumstances triggering a request for provisional measures may be more serious than those triggering a request for the release of crew and certainly more serious than those triggering a request for the release of vessels only. After all, a request for provisional measures could involve threats of irreparable harm to the environment as well as to the inhabitants of an Applicant State, for instance if one State claims that a nuclear facility of another State lacks any form of basic protection against leakage of waste into adjacent waters. In my view examination of such a request for provisional measures to intervene against irreparable harm should have priority over examination of a request for the release of crew, unless crew members are in danger of life and limb.

¹⁶⁰ ITLOS M/V 'Saiga' case (No. 2), Order of 11 March 1998, Separate Opinion of Judge Laing, §21.

¹⁶¹ See more closely on the prompt release procedure Tanaka (2004) and Escher (2004).

3.3.6 Halting gross human rights violations

Bosnia brought a case before the ICJ requesting it to order provisional measures to the effect, among others, that Yugoslavia and its agents in Bosnia ‘must immediately cease and desist from all acts of genocide’ and that Bosnia had the right to seek and receive support in order to defend itself, including through obtaining military supplies. The ICJ found that it had prima facie jurisdiction to deal with the submission in so far as it was based on the Genocide Convention. It avoided the issue of the effect of the UN arms embargo on Bosnia’s right to self-defence by considering that it had established the existence of ‘a basis on which its jurisdiction might be founded’ and ‘ought not to indicate measures for the protection of any disputed rights other than those which might ultimately form the basis of the judgment in the exercise of that jurisdiction’.¹⁶² It ordered Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) to immediately take all measures within its power to prevent commission of the crime of genocide, in particular to ‘ensure any military, paramilitary or irregular armed units which may be directed or supported by it, as well as any organizations and persons which may be subject to its control, direction or influence, do not commit any acts of genocide, of conspiracy to commit genocide, of direct and public incitement to commit genocide, or of complicity in genocide, whether directed against the Muslim population of Bosnia and Herzegovina or against any other national, ethnical, racial or religious group’. In addition neither Party should take action that could aggravate or extend the existing dispute.¹⁶³ A few months later Bosnia submitted a further request for provisional measures. Instead, the Court reaffirmed its previous provisional measures, ‘which should be immediately and effectively implemented’.¹⁶⁴ Many years later the Court found Serbia responsible not for complicity but for failure to prevent the genocide in Srebrenica. It also noted the State’s failure to observe its provisional measures.¹⁶⁵

In Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (2000) the ICJ unanimously ordered provisional measures, among others, to the effect that both Parties (Congo and Uganda) ‘must, forthwith, take all measures necessary to ensure full respect within the zone of conflict for fundamental human rights and for the applicable provisions of humanitarian law’.¹⁶⁶ The Court noted that it must focus its attention on the rights claimed in the Congo’s application, which included the right to respect for the rules of international humanitarian law and for the instruments relating to the protection of human rights.¹⁶⁷ Five years later, in its judgment in this case, it found ‘that the DRC put forward no specific evidence demonstrating that after July 2000 Uganda committed acts in violation of each of the three provisional measures indicated by the Court’. Nevertheless, the Court observed ‘that in the present Judgment it has found that Uganda is responsible for acts in violation of international human rights law and international humanitarian law carried out by its military forces in the territory of the DRC (...). The evidence shows that

¹⁶² ICJ Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia), Order of 8 April 1993, §35.

¹⁶³ Id., §52.

¹⁶⁴ ICJ Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia), Order of 13 September 1993. See further on this issue section 7 (follow-up), and the Separate Opinions of Judges Lauterpacht, Weeramantry, Ajibola and Shahabuddeen. For comment on these Orders see e.g. Toufayan (2005), Gaffikin (1995), Wiebalck (1995), Gray (1994), Maison (1994) and Warbrick (1993).

¹⁶⁵ ICJ Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia), Judgment of 26 February 2007. See also later in this Chapter, e.g. sections 3.7.4 and 7.

¹⁶⁶ ICJ Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (Congo v. Uganda), Order of 1 July 2000.

¹⁶⁷ Id., §40. Congo had requested the Court to order much more detailed provisional measures directed only at Uganda.

such violations were committed throughout the period when Ugandan troops were present in the DRC (...). The Court thus concludes that Uganda did not comply with the Court's Order on provisional measures of 1 July 2000".¹⁶⁸ It further noted that 'that the provisional measures indicated in the Order of 1 July 2000 were addressed to both Parties. The Court's finding in paragraph 264 is without prejudice to the question as to whether the DRC did not also fail to comply with the provisional measures indicated by the Court'.¹⁶⁹

The ICJ also expressed its awareness of the 'complex and tragic situation which had long prevailed in the Great Lakes Region'. "There has been much suffering by the local population and destabilisation of much of the region".¹⁷⁰ The Court noted that it had to pronounce on the violations committed by Ugandan military forces on the territory of the Congo, but it nevertheless observed 'that the actions of the various parties in the complex conflict' had 'contributed to the immense suffering faced by the Congolese population'. It made the following general remark in this respect: "The Court is painfully aware that many atrocities have been committed in the course of the conflict. It is incumbent on all those involved in the conflict to support the peace process in the DRC and other peace processes in the Great Lakes area, in order to ensure respect for human rights in the region".¹⁷¹

In August 2008 Georgia submitted a case against Russia to the ICJ under the International Convention on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD). Subsequently it requested the ICJ to order provisional measures against Russia 'to protect its citizens against violent discriminatory acts by Russian armed forces, acting in concert with separatist militia and foreign mercenaries the context of violations of CERD'.¹⁷² The next day the President of the Court invoked Article 74(4) of the Rules of Court and 'having considered the gravity of the situation' called upon the parties 'to act in such a way as will enable any order the Court may take on the request for provisional measures to have its appropriate effects'.¹⁷³ In October 2008 the Court ordered provisional measures to the effect that both Parties shall refrain from any act of racial discrimination and from sponsoring, defending or supporting such acts; that they shall facilitate humanitarian assistance; and that they shall refrain from any action which might prejudice the respective rights of the Parties or might aggravate or extend the dispute.¹⁷⁴

¹⁶⁸ ICJ Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (Congo v. Uganda), Judgment of 19 December 2005, §264.

¹⁶⁹ Id., §265.

¹⁷⁰ Referring to the security implications for Uganda and some other neighbouring States the Court was aware that 'the factional conflict' within the Congo required a 'comprehensive settlement of the conflict of the region'. Yet the Court was to respond to the particular legal dispute brought before it. 'As it interprets and implies the law, it will be mindful of context, but its task cannot go beyond that'. ICJ Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (Congo v. Uganda), Judgment of 19 December 2005, §26. On the judgment in general see e.g. Gathii (2007) and Savadogo (2002).

¹⁷¹ ICJ Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (Congo v. Uganda), Judgment of 19 December 2005, §221.

¹⁷² ICJ Press release of 14 August 2008, 'Georgia submits a Request for the indication of provisional measures'.

¹⁷³ ICJ Press release of 15 August 2008, 'Proceedings instituted by Georgia against Russia Urgent Communication to the Parties from the President under Article 74, paragraph 4, of the Rules of Court'.

¹⁷⁴ ICJ Application of the International Convention on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (Georgia v. Russian Federation), 15 October 2008 (by a 8-7 vote).

3.3.7 Protecting nationals: halting executions

The safety of its nationals abroad is a vital interest of a State. In the three death penalty cases before the ICJ the interests of States coincided with those of the individuals involved. In these cases about violations of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations (VCCR) the very lives of their citizens were at stake. In the Breard, LaGrand and Avena cases against the US, initiated by Paraguay, Germany and Mexico respectively, the ICJ ordered provisional measures to halt the execution of an individual.¹⁷⁵ Here the interests of the State, namely being able to assist its citizen entangled in the laws of a foreign country, overlapped with the interest of the individual concerned.

This section focuses on the Order for provisional measures in the Breard case, as it marks the first time the ICJ ordered provisional measures to suspend the execution of an individual.¹⁷⁶ The case, brought before the Court by Paraguay, concerned the US failure to observe the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations (VCCR) and its failure to remedy past violations of it. Under US domestic law, there is no legal recourse available to remedy this violation if a foreign national is only informed of his consular rights at the stage of federal proceedings for post-conviction relief.

The application stated that the authorities of Virginia had arrested Paraguayan national Breard in 1992 and that he was charged, tried and convicted of culpable homicide and sentenced to death in 1993. It stated that all this happened while he was not informed of his right to consular access under Article 36 VCCR.¹⁷⁷ When Paraguay found out about his case, by its own means, his state habeas appeals (before the Courts of the Commonwealth of Virginia) had already been concluded and he could no longer raise a VCCR claim, for reasons of procedural default. Yet he could not raise his claim any earlier, since he was not informed of his rights, which was also his claim.¹⁷⁸ For this reason, Paraguay demanded ‘restitution in kind’ in the form of a retrial of its national in conformity with the VCCR.

On 9 April 1998 the ICJ unanimously indicated provisional measures in Breard. It used the following sentence:

“The United States should take all measures at its disposal to ensure that Angel Francisco Breard is not executed pending the final decision in these proceedings, and should inform the Court of all the measures which it has taken in implementation of this Order”.

The ICJ ordered provisional measures to ensure that Breard was not executed pending the proceedings. It stated that its power to indicate provisional measures under Article 41 of its Statute presupposed that ‘irreparable prejudice shall not be caused to rights which are the subject ¹⁷⁵ ICJ Case concerning the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations (Paraguay v. US), Order of 9 April 1998; LaGrand (Germany v. US), Order of 3 March 1999; Avena and other Mexican nationals (Mexico v. US), Order of 5 February 2003. On the ICJ and the VCCR see e.g. Künzli (2005); Orakhelashvili (2005); Aceves (2004); Ghandhi (2004); Cassel (2002); Jennings (2002); Orakhelashvili (2002); Rieter (2002a); Schabas (2002b); Stephens (2002); Yoshiyuki Iwamoto (2002); Ferial Tinta (2001); Van Boven/Rieter (2000); Addo (1999); Cassel (1999b); Mani (1999) and Uribe (1996-97). See also Request for interpretation of the judgment of 31 March 2004 in the case concerning Avena and other Mexican nationals (Mexico v. US), Order of 16 July 2008, discussed infra.

¹⁷⁶ On this Order and the US response see more closely ‘Agora’ (AJIL 1998), pp. 666-712 and Rieter (1998), pp. 475-494.

¹⁷⁷ ICJ Case concerning the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations (Paraguay v. US), Order of 9 April 1998, and Verbatim Record of public sitting, CR 98/7, 7 April 1998.

¹⁷⁸ On the federal proceedings for post-conviction relief in the US see e.g. Bal/Rieter (2001).

of a dispute in judicial proceedings'.¹⁷⁹ It must, therefore, be concerned 'to preserve by such measures the rights which may subsequently be adjudged by the Court to belong either to the Applicant, or to the Respondent'.¹⁸⁰ Such measures, it stated, are only justified if there is urgency. Breard's execution was ordered for 14 April 1998 and 'such an execution would render it impossible for the Court to order the relief that Paraguay seeks and thus cause irreparable harm to the rights it claims'.¹⁸¹

The Court pointed out that 'the function of this Court is to resolve international legal disputes between States, inter alia when they arise out of the interpretation or application of international conventions, and not to act as a court of criminal appeal'.¹⁸² It ruled, furthermore, that the measures indicated by the Court for a stay of execution 'would necessarily be provisional in nature and would not in any way prejudice findings the Court might make on the merits'. They would preserve the respective rights of both Paraguay and the US. Finally, it indicated that it was 'appropriate that the Court, with the co-operation of the Parties, ensure that any decision on the merits be reached with all possible expedition'.¹⁸³

Judge Oda's declaration was rather confusing. He believed that the US was released from its responsibility for violating the Convention by apologising to Paraguay and giving an assurance of non-repetition. He also believed the Court had no prima facie jurisdiction in this case and he emphasized that 'the request for provisional measures should not be used to ensure that the main Application continue'. This is puzzling, as exactly this is generally seen as a very good reason for using provisional measures. Yet in his view, 'given the fundamental nature of provisional measures, those measures should not have been indicated upon Paraguay's request'. He voted, nevertheless, in favour of the Order, 'for humanitarian reasons, and in view of the fact that, if the execution were to be carried out on 14 April 1998, whatever findings the Court might have reached might be without object'.¹⁸⁴

The US, however, disregarded the provisional measures. This included a decision by the US Supreme Court not to postpone the execution. By way of its constituent State, the commonwealth of Virginia, the US executed Angel Francisco Breard on 14 April 1998.¹⁸⁵ While the Paraguayan case was not pursued after the execution of Breard, it set the standard for the ICJ. In fact the Court's reasoning in this case was not based on human rights law, but rather more generally on international law concepts such as restitutio in integrum. Human rights concerns, however, are not alien to these concepts and the provisional measures, if respected, advanced the protection of human rights.¹⁸⁶ In its subsequent Orders for provisional measures in the LaGrand and Avena cases the ICJ confirmed the approach taken in Breard.

The executions of Breard and, subsequently, of LaGrand raised the question again as to whether the Court's provisional measures were legally binding. This issue was finally affirmatively determined in the Court's judgment in LaGrand (2001).¹⁸⁷ Germany had brought this case before the ICJ on behalf of the brothers LaGrand, who had been sentenced to death in violation of the VCCR. Karl LaGrand had already been executed. Germany requested and the ICJ ordered provisional measures on behalf of Walter LaGrand.¹⁸⁸ Texas nevertheless executed him. In its judgment in LaGrand the Court found that 'when the sending State is unaware of the ¹⁷⁹ ICJ Vienna Convention on Consular Relations (Paraguay v. US), Order of 9 April 1998, §35.

¹⁸⁰ Ibid.

¹⁸¹ ICJ Vienna Convention on Consular Relations (Paraguay v. US), Order of 9 April 1998, §37.

¹⁸² Id., §38.

¹⁸³ Id., §40.

¹⁸⁴ ICJ LaGrand case (Germany v. US), Judgment of 27 June 2001, Declaration Judge Oda.

¹⁸⁵ See also section 7 of this Chapter (follow-up).

¹⁸⁶ See also, e.g., Schabas (2002), Orakhelashvili (2002) and Van Boven/Rieter (2000).

¹⁸⁷ ICJ LaGrand case (Germany v. US), Judgment of 27 June 2001.

¹⁸⁸ ICJ LaGrand case (Germany v. US), Order of 3 March 1999.

detention of its nationals due to the failure of the receiving State to provide the requisite consular notification without delay, (...) the sending State has been prevented for all practical purposes from exercising its rights under Article 36'.¹⁸⁹ Article 36(1) VCCR 'creates individual rights, which, by virtue of Article I of the Optional Protocol, may be invoked in this Court by the national State of the detained person. These rights were violated in the present case'.¹⁹⁰ It was not necessary to show 'whether the LaGrands would have sought consular assistance from Germany, whether Germany would have rendered such assistance, or whether a different verdict would have been rendered'. It was 'sufficient that the Convention conferred these rights, and that Germany and the LaGrands [italics ER] were in effect prevented by the breach of the United States from exercising them, had they so chosen'.¹⁹¹ The ICJ decided it need not discuss the issue whether the individual right to consular notification also was a human right.¹⁹²

The US had not given 'full effect' to the rights in paragraph 1 and had, thus, violated paragraph 2: "Under these circumstances, the procedural default rule had the effect of preventing 'full effect [from being] given to the purposes for which the rights accorded under this article are intended', and thus violated paragraph 2 of Article 36".¹⁹³ The Court found that 'although United States courts could and did examine the professional competence of counsel assigned to the indigent LaGrands by reference to United States constitutional standards, the procedural default rule prevented them from attaching any legal significance to the fact, inter alia, that the violation of the rights set forth in Article 36, paragraph 1, prevented Germany, in a timely fashion, from retaining private counsel for them and otherwise assisting in their defence as provided for by the Convention'.¹⁹⁴ Thus the Court found that while the rule of procedural default 'as such' did not violate Article 36 VCCR, its specific application in the present case did.

"The problem arises when the procedural default rule does not allow the detained individual to challenge a conviction and sentence by claiming, in reliance on Article 36, paragraph 1, of the Convention, that the competent national authorities failed to comply with their obligation to provide the requisite consular information 'without delay', thus preventing the person from seeking and obtaining consular assistance from the sending State".¹⁹⁵

In the Order for provisional measures in Avena the ICJ had ordered provisional measures to halt the execution of three persons.¹⁹⁶ The US respected this order. In its Judgment the ICJ again found violations of Article 36 VCCR and specified that 'the appropriate reparation in this case

¹⁸⁹ Paragraph 1 (a) VCCR refers to the right of communication and access and paragraph 1 (c) 'sets out the measures consular officers may take in rendering consular assistance to the nationals in custody of the receiving State', ICJ LaGrand case (Germany v. US), judgment of 27 June 2001, §74. The ICJ noted that the breach of paragraph 1 (b) 'had the consequence of depriving Germany of the exercise of the rights accorded it under Article 36, paragraph 1 (a) and paragraph 1 (c) and thus violated the provisions of the Convention', §73. It did not say that a violation of paragraph 1 (b) would always result in the breach of provisions of that Article, but in this case it did. The Court referred to paragraph 1 as establishing an 'interrelated régime' designed to facilitate implementation of the system of consular protection, §74.

¹⁹⁰ ICJ LaGrand case (Germany v. US), Judgment of 27 June 2001, §77.

¹⁹¹ Id., §74.

¹⁹² Id., §78. This was the Court's reply to the further contention of Germany, at the hearings, then the right of the individual to be informed without delay and article 36, paragraph 1, of the Vienna Convention was not only in individual rights, but has today assumed 'the character of a human right'.

¹⁹³ ICJ LaGrand case (Germany v. US), Judgment of 27 June 2001, §91.

¹⁹⁴ Ibid.

¹⁹⁵ ICJ LaGrand case (Germany v. US), Judgment of 27 June 2001, §90.

¹⁹⁶ ICJ Avena and other Mexican Nationals (Mexico v. US), Order of 5 February 2003.

consists in the obligation of the United States of America to provide, by means of its own choosing, review and reconsideration of the convictions and sentences of the Mexican nationals' mentioned in the judgment.¹⁹⁷

In response the US President issued a Memorandum to the Attorney General determining that the US 'will discharge its international obligations' under this judgment 'by having State courts give effect to the decision in accordance with general principles of comity in cases filed by the 51 Mexican nationals addressed in that decision'.¹⁹⁸ Then again, the next day the US withdrew from the Optional Protocol to the VCCR, in order to prevent any new claims against it by other States in case they would consider that the international obligations of the US based on the VCCR were not properly discharged. A State Department spokesman pointed out: 'we have a system of justice that provides people with due process and review of their cases, and it's not appropriate that there should be some international court that comes in and reverses decisions of our national courts'.¹⁹⁹

In June 2008 Mexico requested the ICJ to interpret the appropriate reparation referred to in its 2004 Avena Judgment because the US apparently understood it only as an obligation of means, while Mexico understood it as an obligation of result.²⁰⁰ Mexico noted that since Avena (2004) '[o]nly one state court had provided the required review and consideration'.²⁰¹ In addition, in March 2008 the US Supreme Court, 'while acknowledging that the Avena judgment constitutes an obligation under international law on the part of the United States, ruled that "the means chosen by the president of the United States to comply were unavailable under the US constitution" and that "neither the Avena Judgment on its own, nor the Judgment in conjunction with the President's memorandum, constituted directly enforceable federal law" precluding Texas from "applying state procedural rules that barred all review and consideration of Mr. Medellín's Vienna Convention claim".²⁰² Mexico added that the Supreme Court referred to alternative means by which the US could still comply with its obligations, 'in particular, by the passage of legislation by Congress making a "non-self-executing treaty domestically enforceable" or by "voluntary compliance by the State of Texas".²⁰³

¹⁹⁷ ICJ Avena and other Mexican Nationals (Mexico v. US), Judgment of 31 March 2004, §153(9).

¹⁹⁸ US President's Memorandum for the Attorney General on compliance with the decision of the ICJ in Avena, 28 February 2005. See also Kirgis (2005). Texas prosecutors, however, questioned the President's authority to 'force courts' to reopen cases. A spokesman for the Attorney General of Texas was quoted in the New York Times: "The State of Texas believes no international court supercedes the laws of Texas or the laws of the United States". See further Anaya Valencia/Jackson/Van de Putte/Ellis (2005); Young (2005); Brook (2004); Murphy (2004); Shelton (2004a); Carter (2003); Ray (2003); Babcock (2002).

¹⁹⁹ See 'U.S. quits foreign inmate accord', CNN.com, 11 March 2005 (quoting State Department spokesman Erel). See further e.g. Liptak, 'U.S. says it has withdrawn from world judicial body', New York Times 10 March 2005 (with Professor Koh commenting that this move was counterproductive and Professor Spiro that it was a 'sore-loser kind of move' and 'If we can't win, we're not going to play').

²⁰⁰ ICJ Request for interpretation of the judgment of 31 March 2004 in the case concerning Avena and other Mexican nationals (Mexico v. US), Order of 16 July 2008 (Judges Simma and Parra-Aranguren, acting under Article 24(1) ICJ Statute, had informed the Court that they would not sit in this case).

²⁰¹ This was the case of Osvaldo Torres Aguilera. It added that in another case, that of Rafael Camargo Ojeda, Arkansas had 'agreed to reduce' his death sentence to life imprisonment 'in exchange for his agreement to waive his right to review and reconsideration under the Avena judgment'. ICJ Request for interpretation of the judgment of 31 March 2004 in the case concerning Avena and other Mexican nationals (Mexico v. US), Order of 16 July 2008, §2.

²⁰² Id., §4.

²⁰³ Ibid.

Mexico also requested provisional measures because ‘a Texas court had declined the stay of execution requested by counsel for Mr. Medellín in order to allow Congress’ to pass such legislation.²⁰⁴ It indicated that ‘the paramount interest in human life is at stake’ and that ‘that interest would be irreparably harmed if any of the Mexican nationals whose right to review and reconsideration was determined in the Avena judgment were executed without having received that review and reconsideration’.²⁰⁵ The ICJ indeed ordered the US to ‘take all measures necessary to ensure’ that Medellín and four others ‘are not executed pending judgment on the Request for interpretation submitted by the United Mexican States, unless and until these five Mexican nationals receive review and reconsideration’ consistent with the Court’s Avena judgment of 2004.²⁰⁶

This is the first time the Court has ordered provisional measures in the context of a request for interpretation of an earlier ICJ judgment under Article 60 ICJ Statute. There was no other basis for jurisdiction as the US is no longer a party to the Optional Protocol to the VCCR. The decision to order these measures was made despite the US argument that there was in fact no dispute as to the meaning and scope of the Court’s Avena Judgment, as required by Article 60 ICJ Statute. The US argued that the dispute was not about interpretation, as it agreed with Mexico that it was facing an obligation of result, but about implementation. The majority of the Court (five judges dissented) considered that ‘while it seems both Parties regard paragraph 153(9) of the Avena Judgment as an international obligation of result, the Parties nonetheless apparently hold different views as to the meaning and scope of that obligation of result, namely whether that understanding is shared by all United States federal and state authorities and whether that obligation falls upon those authorities’.²⁰⁷ As it considered it could deal with the request for interpretation, it was able to order provisional measures.²⁰⁸

Indeed, the fact that something is a dispute about implementation does not rule out per se that it is also a dispute on interpretation. The question is whether or not it matters for the existence of a legal dispute that what the State says formally, differs from what it does or fails to do in practice or whether that is solely a matter of supervision of implementation. Some human rights adjudicators have created follow-up mechanisms such as maintaining a case on the docket pending implementation.²⁰⁹ The Inter-American Court, for instance, has pointed out that it is a power inherent in its jurisdictional function to supervise compliance with its decisions.²¹⁰ It

²⁰⁴ ICJ Request for interpretation of the judgment of 31 March 2004 in the case concerning Avena and other Mexican nationals (Mexico v. US), Order of 16 July 2008, §5.

²⁰⁵ Id., §19.

²⁰⁶ Id., §80 (referring specifically to the obligation of review and reconsideration ‘consistent with paragraphs 138 to 141’ of the 2004 Judgment).

²⁰⁷ Id., §55.

²⁰⁸ Yet five judges dissented, all of them stressing that no executions should take place before review and reconsideration, based on the US obligations as expressed in the Avena judgment. They argued, however, that Article 60 ICJ Statute could not be a basis upon which to found jurisdiction in this case, considering there was no dispute on the interpretation of the Avena judgment. See the dissenting opinion of judge Buergenthal (arguing, among others, that the Order ‘adds no additional protection’ and that ‘(h)umanitarian considerations which clearly underlie the decision cannot override the legal requirements of the Statute of the Court’); the joint dissenting opinion of judges Owada, Tomka and Keith and the dissenting opinion of Judge Skotnikov. See further section 7 of this Chapter on Follow up. Subsequently, in its judgment of 19 January 2009, the Court found it could not accede to Mexico’s request for interpretation.

²⁰⁹ See Chapter XVIII on Follow up by the human rights adjudicators.

²¹⁰ See e.g. IACHR Order on supervision of compliance in the cases Fermín Ramírez v. Guatemala and Raxcacó Reyes v. Guatemala and on the request to expand the provisional measures in Raxcacó Reyes y otros, 9 May 2008, 1st ‘Considering’ clause.

appears that in cases of a continuing or sudden risk of irreparable harm relating to violations that have already been established by the ICJ in a judgment,²¹¹ Article 60 ICJ Statute could be construed as a device for follow-up by the ICJ in order to enhance compliance with its Judgments in those cases where there is no longer jurisdiction for the Court to take up a new case regarding non-implementation. Yet this could only be so as long as there is some link to a 'dispute' between the parties regarding the interpretation of their obligations under the judgment. In this context it might be argued, at least at the stage of provisional measures, that a State's arguments involving contradictions in the behaviour of the executive of another State (or in the behaviour of the various branches) – with regard to its public expressions of legal commitment meant for a domestic as opposed to a 'foreign' or international audience – do indeed show the existence of a 'legal dispute' on interpretation.²¹²

3.4 Preventing irreparable harm and the humanization of international law

3.4.1 Introduction

The PCIJ and the ICJ have shown to be open to interests beyond those of individual States. They may concern peace and security, the rights of other States or organisations, the (marine) environment, the 'collateral damage' to individuals or minority groups and the rights of individuals vis-à-vis the main claim of the Applicant State.

As Elkind already put it in 1981, 'desperation defines the boundaries of interim protection'. Even though the ICJ deals only with complaints between States, the 'government of a State must cope with the desperation of its people'. He noted that 'irreparable injury and unendurable situations are only the two most acute situations likely to lead to violence', meaning that the ICJ is 'under a duty to grant interim measures in any dispute where the threat of violence is imminent'. He referred to the Hostages case as the one 'most fraught with desperation', also underlining 'the nexus between desperation and urgency'.²¹³ Elkind published his work on provisional measures in 1981, when the Hostages case was indeed one of the few specifically dealing with the plight of individual human beings. Subsequent to the Hostages case the ICJ has ²¹¹ In this context the Inter-American Court, which has on occasion also used provisional measures following a Judgment on the merits, and even on reparation, has recently decided, instead of ordering provisional measures, simply to order compliance with the obligation not to execute 25 persons based on its previous Judgments. In other words it now clearly distinguishes between supervision of its judgments on the merits and reparation and the use (and supervision, expansion or termination) of its provisional measures. See e.g. IACHR Order on supervision of compliance of the cases Fermín Ramírez v. Guatemala and Raxcacó Reyes v. Guatemala and on the request to expand the provisional measures in Raxcacó Reyes y otros, 9 May 2008.

²¹² Subsequently the ICJ considered it appropriate to review again whether there exists a dispute and whether there was a difference of opinion between the parties, see the discussion in §§21-47. From this it concluded that it could not accede to Mexico's request after all. Yet it did observe that 'considerations of domestic law which have so far hindered the implementation of the obligation incumbent upon the United States, cannot relieve it of its obligation'. It noted that a 'choice of means was allowed to the United States in the implementation of its obligation and, failing success within a reasonable period of time through the means chosen, it must rapidly turn to alternative and effective means of attaining that result'. With regard to the execution of Medellín in contravention of its provisional measures, it found that the US 'did not discharge of its obligation' under its Order. It also reiterated that 'its Avena Judgment remains binding and that the United States continues to be under an obligation fully to implement it'.

²¹³ Elkind (1981), p. 258.

dealt with cases involving border conflicts and gross human rights violations.²¹⁴ Apart from provisional measures aimed to help relieve the situations in these cases, the ICJ has now also used provisional measures to halt executions of death sentences of the nationals of one State by another State. Elkind put it as follows “Not all cases involving interim measures are as desperate, as urgent or as critical as the Hostages Case. But interim protection is best understood in conditions of desperation, crisis and urgency because these are the conditions with which it must be able to cope if it is to fulfil its function”.²¹⁵

3.4.2 Humanization

In DRC v. Rwanda (2006) the ICJ recognized the prohibition of genocide as a peremptory norm (ius cogens). As Judge Dugard has noted, norms of ius cogens ‘affirm the high principles of international law, which recognize the most important rights of the international order – such as the right to be free from aggression, genocide, torture and slavery and the right to self determination’.²¹⁶ He also observed that in its choice of precedent, in Congo v. Uganda (2005), the ICJ was influenced by ‘the gravity of the issues raised’, even though it did not make explicit that its choice ‘was influenced by the fact that norms of jus cogens were involved in this case’.²¹⁷

Judge Simma agreed with the Court’s judgment in Congo v. Uganda, but he considered that it should have found that the ‘victims of the attacks at the Ndjili International Airport remained legally protected against such maltreatment irrespective of their nationality’. International human rights law and humanitarian law applied in this case as well.²¹⁸ His discussion of this issue affirms that the Court has a task in the protection of persons caught up in conflicts between States, independent of the intentions of the States bringing a claim on their behalf, acknowledging that Uganda’s claim regarding the seventeen victims at the airport may not have been based on a ‘genuine concern for the fate of the persons concerned’.²¹⁹ He specifically pointed out ‘that legal arguments clarifying that in situations like the one before us no gaps exist in the law that would deprive the affected persons of any legal protection, have, unfortunately never been as important as at present, in the face of recent deplorable developments’.²²⁰ He noted that the events at the airport ‘were factually connected to the armed conflict’ and that ‘the application of international humanitarian law would be consistent with the understanding of the scope’ of this law as ²¹⁴ ICJ Nicaragua case, Order of 10 May 1984, Frontier Dispute case (Burkina Faso v. Mali), Order of 10 January 1986, Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)), Order of 8 April 1993, Land and maritime boundary between Cameroon and Nigeria (Cameroon v. Nigeria), Order of 15 March 1996, Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (DRC v. Uganda), Order of 1 July 2000.

²¹⁵ Elkind (1981), p. 258.

²¹⁶ ICJ Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (new application: 2002) (DRC v. Rwanda), Judgment on jurisdiction of the Court and admissibility of the application of 3 February 2006, Separate Opinion of Judge Dugard, §10.

²¹⁷ ICJ Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (new application: 2002) (DRC v. Rwanda), Judgment on jurisdiction of the Court and admissibility of the application of 3 February 2006, Separate Opinion of Judge Dugard, §11. He pointed out that the ICJ, in Congo v. Uganda, relied on the Certain Phosphate Lands case rather than referred to the controversial Monetary Gold case. Monetary Gold removed from Rome in 1943 (Italy v. France, UK and US), Judgment of 15 June 1954 and Certain Phosphate Lands in Nauru (Nauru v. Australia), Judgment of 26 June 1992 (preliminary objections).

²¹⁸ ICJ Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (Congo v. Uganda), Judgment of 19 December 2005, Separate Opinion of Judge Simma, §17.

²¹⁹ Id., §18.

²²⁰ Id., §19.

developed by the ICTY Appeals Chamber.²²¹ He invoked provisions on the prohibition of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, the right to liberty and security of persons and the freedom of movement in the ICCPR, the Convention against Torture and the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights. Uganda could have raised these violations before the ICJ.²²² Moreover, the contemporary law of state responsibility confirmed that a State has standing to bring a claim regarding human rights violations committed against persons that might not possess the nationality of that State.²²³ Finally, he argued that while Uganda 'chose the avenue of diplomatic protection and failed', the ICJ should have pointed out the applicability of international humanitarian and human rights law and Uganda's standing in this respect.²²⁴

3.4.3 The concept of irreparable harm

Elkind believes it is not always helpful to speak of irreparable harm because this criterion may be too difficult for the Applicant State to meet when arguing for the use of provisional measures. He refers to the Hostages case (1979) and to 'most cases of environmental injury', pointing out:

"Irreparable injury is a reference to a final result and is quite beside the point. In this respect, the basis of the complaint is not so much that the injury is irreparable, but that it is unendurable. The complainant cannot be expected to put up with it pending the outcome of the dispute. The status quo is intolerable".²²⁵

Agreeing with the ICJ's refusal to take provisional measures in the Arbitral Award case (1990) Judge Evensen wrote separately, pointing out that the risk of irreparable damage should not be a condition for the stipulation of interim measures. He noted that neither Article 41 ICJ Statute nor Article 73 Rules of Court contained any reference to 'irreparable damage' and considered that the Court's discretionary powers should not be limited in such manner.²²⁶

In M/V 'Saiga' (1997), the first Order for provisional measures by ITLOS, Judge Laing referred to Elkind's suggestion that the applicable phrase should be 'unendurable' rather than 'irreparable'. He agreed that 'irreparability arguably does not adequately cover such situations as that of the U.S. hostages' in the Hostages case (1979) and that of the case at hand. In this case the applicant State had requested provisional measures to the effect, among others, that the M/V 'Saiga' and her crew would be released. Previously, ITLOS had already ordered their prompt release under the 'prompt release' proceedings of the Convention on the Law of the Sea.²²⁷ During the public hearing held the next month the applicant specified this request. Subsequently ²²¹ Id., §§21-23. He referred to Article 75 of Protocol I Additional to the 1949 Geneva Conventions and Article 3, common to the four Geneva Conventions. Regarding the application of human rights law he quoted the ICJ in its Advisory Opinion on the Wall in the occupied Palestinian Territory stating that 'the protection offered by human rights conventions does not cease in case of armed conflict', §30, referring to ICJ Legal Consequences of the Construction of a Wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, Advisory Opinion of 9 July 2004, §106.

²²² ICJ Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (Congo v. Uganda), Judgment of 19 December 2005, Separate Opinion of Judge Simma, §§31-32.

²²³ Id., §35, referring to Article 48 of the ILC's 2001 draft on State Responsibility.

²²⁴ Id., §37.

²²⁵ Elkind (1981), p. 223. See further section 3.3 (protection of the individual).

²²⁶ ICJ Arbitral Award of 31 July 1989 (Guinea-Bissau v. Senegal), Order of 2 March 1990 (dismissed by fourteen votes to one).

²²⁷ The M/V 'Saiga' case (St. Vincent and the Grenadines v. Guinea), Judgment of 4 December 1997, §§79 and 86. See Article 292 of the Convention. See about 'prompt release' Tanaka (2004) and Escher (2004).

Guinea released the vessel and its crew. Hence ITLOS noted in its Order that the prescription of a provisional measure for their release would no longer serve a purpose. Nevertheless, 'the rights of the Applicant would not fully be preserved if, pending the final decision, the vessel, its Master and the other members of the crew, its owners or operators were to be subjected to any judicial or administrative measure in connection to the incidents leading to the arrest and detention of the vessel and to the subsequent prosecution and conviction of the Master'. It unanimously prescribed provisional measures to the effect that Guinea would refrain from such actions.²²⁸ In his Separate Opinion Judge Laing noted that this case showed that the standard of irreparability was not applicable. He referred to the treaty language of 'the preservation of the respective rights' and the addition, in Article 290(1) UNCLOS of 'the institution of prevention of "serious" harm to the marine environment'. This language 'strongly reinforces the view that the rather grave standard of irreparability is inapt for universal use, at least in many situations under UNCLOS'. He considered that ITLOS should indicate very clearly the subsidiary or supplementary nature of the standard of irreparable harm if it would decide to use it in the future.²²⁹

Elkind has pointed out 'that the motivating force behind interim protection is urgency. Its purpose is to prevent irreparable injury, terminate unendurable situations, and generally to prevent violence by providing an effective alternative to self-help'.²³⁰ He specified that provisional measures must order the prevention of irreparable injury by maintaining the status quo. On the other hand, they could also order to put a halt to an unendurable or intolerable situation, because the complaining Party 'cannot reasonably be expected to endure the status quo pending judicial settlement of a dispute'.²³¹ This approach seems useful, also in the context of the ensuing discussion of the purpose of the provisional measures in human rights adjudication.²³² It comes down to maintaining the status quo in the face of threats of irreparable harm as well as returning to the status quo ante to deal with an ongoing unendurable situation. Such provisional measures aim to prevent (further) human suffering.

Nevertheless, thus far the ICJ and the human rights adjudicators have only referred to the concept of irreparable harm, which appears to cover both of the abovementioned situations. For this reason this book refers to the latter concept also in the context of ongoing unendurable situations that must be halted.²³³

3.5 The relation to the rights claimed and the possible judgment on the merits

In 1932 Dumbauld already pointed out that provisional measures 'always constitute an exceptional remedy'.²³⁴ The proceedings for provisional measures are subsidiary to the main claim. They simply aim to preserve the rights that are in dispute. As the ICJ has pointed out the purpose of the use of provisional measures is 'to safeguard the rights of each party'. It 'presupposes the possibility of irreparable damage being caused to the rights at issue in judicial ²²⁸ ITLOS M/V 'Saiga' (No. 2) case (St. Vincent and the Grenadines v. Guinea), Order of 11 March 1998, §§41 and 52.

²²⁹ ITLOS M/V 'Saiga' (No. 2) case (St. Vincent and the Grenadines v. Guinea), Order of 11 March 1998, Separate Opinion of Judge Laing, §28.

²³⁰ Elkind (1981), p. 229. This qualification, dating from 1981, has not lost its significance.

²³¹ Elkind (1981), pp. 229-230.

²³² See Part II of this book.

²³³ On the distinction between irreparability in law and irreparability in fact, see e.g. Sztucki (1983), pp. 108-110.

²³⁴ Dumbauld (1932), p. 184. See also Judge Shahabuddeen in the Passage through the Great Belt case (Finland v. Denmark), Order of 19 July 1991, p. 29.

proceedings'.²³⁵ There is no formal requirement that the Parties before the ICJ or ITLOS specify the rights claimed in their request for provisional measures. There should, however, be sufficient information for the adjudicators to conclude that there is 'a prima facie basis' for the 'probable jurisdiction of the Tribunal on the underlying merits'.²³⁶

Some respondent States have argued that the applicant State should show the likelihood of success on the merits.²³⁷ In the Hostages case (1979) the ICJ considered that it was the purpose of provisional measures to preserve 'rights which are the subject of dispute in judicial proceedings'.²³⁸ Thus generally speaking the rights to be protected by provisional measures must be linked closely to (or be identical to) the rights claimed in the main case.²³⁹ The main dispute in the Arbitral Award case (1990) related to the validity of an arbitral decision about maritime delimitations. However, Guinea-Bissau's application for provisional measures included a request to direct the Parties to abstain from all actions in the disputed area. The Court rejected this request because 'the alleged rights sought to be made the subject of provisional measures are not the subject of the proceedings before the Court on the merits of the case'.²⁴⁰ According to Merrills this decision 'reflects the traditional conception of interim measures as concerned with rights rather than interests'.²⁴¹ After all, Guinea-Bissau would not be able to bring the dispute on maritime delimitation before the ICJ because Senegal had made reservations in this respect.

Thirlway notes that the Genocide Convention case (1993) 'made clear that even the rights claimed in the Application cannot be protected by provisional measures unless they are rights in respect of which the Court would have jurisdiction under the title which the Court regards as prima facie established'.²⁴² The ICJ pointed out that 'the Court, having established the existence of a basis on which its jurisdiction might be founded, ought not to indicate measures for the protection of any disputed rights other than those which might ultimately form the basis of a judgment in the exercise of that jurisdiction'.²⁴³ At the same time, as discussed in section 3.3.4, the ICJ has been prepared to order provisional measures to protect the lives of persons on the

²³⁵ ICJ Frontier Dispute case (Burkina Faso v. Mali), Order of 10 January 1986 (Chamber), §13. See further e.g. the Passage through the Great Belt case, (Finland v. Denmark), Order of 19 July 1991, §21 and US Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran (US v. Iran) (Hostages case), Order of 15 December 1979, §36.

²³⁶ Separate Opinion of Judge Laing in the M/V 'Saiga' (No. 2), Order of 11 March 1998, §20, also noting that 'parties will sometimes request measures to protect rights not directly located in the Convention but arising under customary international law' and considering that the 'difficulty of identifying the precise content and even existence of customary rules might further influence a tolerant approach of decision-makers to this requirement'.

²³⁷ See further section 3.6 on the issue of prejudgment and section 5.3 on assessment of material urgency.

²³⁸ ICJ US Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran (US v. Iran) (Hostages case), Order of 15 December 1979, §36. See also, e.g., Fisheries Jurisdiction cases (UK v. Iceland; Germany v. Iceland), Order of 17 August 1972, §21; Frontier Dispute case (Burkina Faso v. Mali), Order of 10 January 1986, §13 and the Passage through the Great Belt case, Order of 29 July 1991, §16.

²³⁹ See also Wellens (1998), pp. 420-421, p. 424. Generally on this issue Beirlaen (1979-1980), pp. 270-283.

²⁴⁰ ICJ Arbitral Award of 31 July 1989 (Guinea-Bissau v. Senegal), Order of 2 March 1990, §26 (Judge ad hoc Thierry dissenting).

²⁴¹ Merrills (1995), p. 102. See also Thirlway (1994), p. 17.

²⁴² Thirlway (1994), p. 35. See also the criticism expressed by Toufayan (2005), Gaffikin (1995); Maison (1994) and Wiebalck (1995).

²⁴³ ICJ Application of the Convention on the prevention and punishment of the crime of genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)), Order of 8 April 1993, §35. See section 3.3.

basis of existing obligations of the Respondent State, even though these obligations were not the direct subject matter of the Application.

The rights claimed may have already earned clear recognition. In that case the party requesting provisional measures should just give some indication of the violation of these rights. In the alternative, the Applicant State should make an effort to show that the rights claimed indeed exist.²⁴⁴ After all the use of provisional measures would be ‘a pointless exercise in empty authority’ if there were ‘no possibility of the claimed rights being substantiated as having an existence in law’.²⁴⁵

By contrast, in other cases States have complained that a request for provisional measures was too much a request for an instant decision.²⁴⁶ Moreover, as noted, there have been Orders for provisional measures regarding the plight of human beings, not directly linked to the rights in dispute. This all indicates that the ICJ takes a sufficiently flexible approach to its competence to order provisional measures, taking into account the rights of (groups of) persons, as long as it has prima facie jurisdiction vis-à-vis the obligations of the State in this regard.²⁴⁷

3.6 Provisional measures and prejudgment

States have sometimes argued that provisional measures were intended to protect the interests of both Parties and could not be granted to one Party only.²⁴⁸ On the other hand, in the Hostages case (1979) the ICJ pointed out that the terms of Article 41 ICJ Statute explicitly refer to ‘the respective rights of either party’ (italics by the Court). ‘[T]he whole concept of an indication for provisional measures, as Article 73 of the Rules recognizes, implies a request from one of the parties for measures to preserve its own rights against action by the other party calculated to prejudice those rights pendente lite’. It concluded that a request for provisional measures is ‘by its nature unilateral’.²⁴⁹ This is different for ITLOS because it is authorised, under Article 290 UNCLOS, to order provisional measures that are appropriate ‘to preserve the respective rights of the parties’.²⁵⁰

Still according to Mendelson ‘the risk of prejudice to one or other of the parties is a real one, which cannot be glossed over by the simple incantation of the formula that the grant or ²⁴⁴ See also Goldie (1973-74), p. 501 who notes that in the latter case the State ‘would have a very heavy burden of proof to discharge’.

²⁴⁵ Goldie (1973-74), p. 502.

²⁴⁶ See also the next section on prejudgment (section 3.6).

²⁴⁷ See e.g. Questions relating to the obligation to prosecute or extradite (Belgium v. Senegal), Order of 28 May 2009, §57 ‘Whereas the power of the Court to indicate provisional measures should be exercised only if the Court is satisfied that the rights asserted by a party are at least plausible’. The Court added there was no need to establish definitively the existence of the rights claimed by Belgium or to consider Belgium’s capacity to assert such rights before the Court’ and that this State’s rights ‘begin grounded in a possible interpretation of the Convention against torture, therefore appear to be plausible’, §60. Not all members of the Court have been comfortable with the Court’s approach to the relation with the merits, see Judge Oda in ICJ Land and maritime boundary between Cameroon and Nigeria (Cameroon v. Nigeria), Order of 15 March 1996, §2. See also Yoshiyuki Iwamoto (2002).

²⁴⁸ See also Fitzmaurice (1986), p. 544, arguing that the ICJ should preserve the interests of ‘both parties equally’ and Judge Ajibola in his Separate Opinion in Land and maritime boundary between Cameroon and Nigeria (Cameroon v. Nigeria), Order of 15 March 1996, under IV (III).

²⁴⁹ ICJ Hostages case: United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran (US v. Iran), Order of 15 December 1979, §29.

²⁵⁰ Judge Laing considers that a general requirement to balance the right of the parties would be consistent with the language of Article 290(1), Separate Opinion Judge Laing, ITLOS M/V ‘Saiga’ (No. 2), Order of 11 March 1998, §23. See also section 3.7 on protection and reparation.

refusal of interim measures does not prejudice subsequent decisions in other phases of the proceedings'. The ICJ should 'weigh up the risks to both parties and try to achieve the fairest solution'. In this context he noted: "If there is a strong chance of jurisdiction on the merits, the risk of prejudice to the rights of the plaintiff will be relatively greater if interim measures are not indicated, than the risk of prejudice to the rights of the defendant, if they are. Conversely, if there is little prospect of a positive finding on jurisdiction, there will be little prejudice to the plaintiff in refusing interim measures, because the Court will probably not be in a position to grant it a remedy on the merits at the end of the day, whereas the granting of interim measures may cause substantial prejudice to the interests of an unwilling defendant".²⁵¹

In 1932 Dumbauld wrote that the PCIJ's provisional measures do not constitute a provisional judgment. The Applicant 'can not demand that his legal position be bettered'. He did note 'a seeming exception' when the relief sought in the principal case is simply aimed at forbidding 'a flagrant wrong or violation of right, rather than an exercise of "judicial jurisdiction" to decide a truly doubtful question of law'. In such case, he acknowledges, 'the only object of the final judgment is to forbid the illegal act, definitively and with force of res judicata'. Thus, 'it may well come to pass that the interim order temporarily prohibiting unlawful conduct threatening irreparable damage will in fact, though not in law, be equivalent to giving applicant the very same thing he hopes to secure by final judgment'.²⁵²

The requirement of non-anticipation by one of the Parties of a decision on the merits means that neither of the Parties shall pre-empt the final determination of the case. This is one of the traditional reasons for courts to use provisional measures.²⁵³ Provisional measures to prevent anticipation by one of the parties, in the sense of pre-empting the final determination that could otherwise have been made by the adjudicator, may at the same time trigger the different rule that the adjudicator itself shall not anticipate the final determination and must 'avoid any appearance of pre-judgment'.²⁵⁴ However, this does not mean that the provisional measures may not give an indication of substantive law to the extent this is already clear.

Thirlway notes that 'the rights sought to be protected must be, to put it at its lowest, closely linked with the rights which are the subject of dispute in the main proceedings'. Hence, 'to some extent an "anticipation" is only to be expected in every case'. The Court has to find the necessary degree of anticipation to justify provisional measures. What is important here, according to Thirlway, is who took the initiative: 'it is one thing to restrain one party from taking some step to change the status quo, and quite another to require a form of restraint which itself involves a departure from the status quo'.²⁵⁵

If a request for provisional measures is in fact a request for an interim judgment they should not be ordered because they could be seen to prejudice the decision on the merits and would be incompatible with Article 41.²⁵⁶ In Chorzów Factory (1927) the PCIJ rejected a request by Germany as 'designed to obtain an interim judgment in favour of part of the claim' rather than a request for interim protection proper.²⁵⁷ Thirlway suggests that the ICJ could refer to this decision in order to prevent applications for provisional measures that would simply cause 'short-term tactical advantage' to one of the Parties. Otherwise 'the fact that neither jurisdiction nor the claim itself have to be proved up to anywhere near the hilt for measures to be granted must offer a ²⁵¹ Mendelson (1972-73), pp. 313-314.

²⁵² Dumbauld (1932), pp. 163-164.

²⁵³ See e.g. Elkind (1981), p. 210. See also section 3.2 of this chapter on the traditional purposes of provisional measures.

²⁵⁴ See Judge Shahabuddeen in the Passage through the Great Belt case, Order of 29 July 1991.

²⁵⁵ Thirlway (1994), p. 11.

²⁵⁶ See e.g. Merrills (1995), p. 104 and Sztucki (1983), pp. 95-96.

²⁵⁷ PCIJ Factory at Chorzów (German interests in Polish Upper Silesia cases), Order of 21 November 1927, p. 10.

temptation where a case can be made for urgency even if the merits of the claim are shaky or the jurisdictional title dubious.²⁵⁸

Judge Gros referred to attempts to obtain an ‘interim judgment’ in his dissenting opinion on the Order for provisional measures in the Nuclear Test cases (1973). He considered that ‘it would indeed, by definition, be contrary to the nature of interlocutory proceedings if they enabled the dispute of which they were only an accessory element to be disposed of’.²⁵⁹ Thirlway points out that the result of this argument is curious. After all, the measures must relate to the rights claimed.

“Could the Court refuse to indicate measures requiring the temporary cessation of nuclear tests merely because the claim was for a permanent cessation of such tests? Assuming that there was sufficient evidence of urgency and the prospect of irreparable damage, the mere coincidence of the request for measures with the terms of the claim would be a strange and artificial reason for refusal”.²⁶⁰

He also notes that the ICJ could prevent complacency of the beneficiary once provisional measures have been taken, by including in the Order for provisional measures a provision to review the measures in light of, among others, the progress of the proceedings on the merits.²⁶¹ With regard to the Chorzów Factory case and its reference to ‘an interim judgment in favour of a part of the claim’ he explains that this turned on the basis of the German request. Germany ‘was not so much asking for protection pendente lite of the rights asserted in the Application, as asking for immediate satisfaction of what it regarded as an indisputable part of the claim’.²⁶²

In the Hostages case (1979) Iran had objected that the US was, in fact, requesting a judgment on the merits of the case during the interim measures phase. The Court distinguished this case from the Chorzów Factory case (1927), where the PCIJ had declined a request for provisional measures as being ‘designed to obtain an interim judgment in favour of a part of the claim’.²⁶³ The ICJ noted that the circumstances in that case were ‘entirely different from those of the present one, and the request there sought to obtain from the Court a final judgment on part of a claim for a sum of money’. It pointed out as well that a request for provisional measures must in fact ‘by its very nature relate to the substance of the case since, as Article 41 expressly states, their object is to preserve the respective rights of either party’. In other words, the relationship between the rights to be protected at the provisional measures phase and the rights claimed on the merits in fact is one of the requirements of Article 41.²⁶⁴ It concluded that ‘in the present case the purpose of the United States request appears to be not to obtain a judgment, interim or final, on the merits of its claims but to preserve the substance of the rights which it claims pendente lite’.²⁶⁵ Oellers-Frahm put it as follows:

²⁵⁸ Thirlway (1994), p. 27.

²⁵⁹ Dissenting Opinion Judge Gros, ICJ Nuclear tests cases (New Zealand v. France/Australia v. France), Order of 22 June 1973, p. 123 (Australia) and p. 158 (New Zealand). The ICJ denied the request, but Judge Gros proposed additional/different reasons for this denial.

²⁶⁰ Thirlway (1994), p. 27.

²⁶¹ Thirlway (1994), pp. 27-28. He pointed out that the ICJ had in fact done so in the ICJ Fisheries Jurisdiction cases (UK v. Iceland; Germany v. Iceland), Order of 17 August 1972.

²⁶² Thirlway (1994), p. 28.

²⁶³ PCIJ Factory at Chorzów (German interests in Polish Upper Silesia cases), Order of 21 November 1927, p. 10.

²⁶⁴ See also section 3.5.

²⁶⁵ ICJ US Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran (US v. Iran), Order of 15 December 1979, §28.

“That there may even be identity between the objects of those two procedures is self-evident, since often the claim on the merits concerns the re-establishment of the status quo ante”.²⁶⁶

In 1981 Elkind considered that in the Hostages case (1979) ‘it was precisely the status quo existing at the time the application and request were filed which was intolerable from the standpoint of international law’. This triggered the question of the restoration of the status quo ante. The attempt in this case ‘might have constituted an interim judgment’. ‘If the Court, after granting interim measures, later found for Iran on the question of jurisdiction, it could not revoke that particular measure. What could it do? Order the hostages returned to Iran? That would have been absurd. Yet it was one of the most urgent situations that the Court has ever faced’.²⁶⁷ In fact this case already showed that the ICJ takes a more flexible approach regarding the use of provisional measures when the urgent situation involves fundamental rights of individuals.

In the Genocide Convention case (1993) Serbia and Montenegro argued that Bosnia Herzegovina was really seeking an interim judgment, but the ICJ pointed out that the rights of both Parties ‘to dispute the facts alleged against it, and to submit arguments in respect of the merits, must remain unaffected by the Court’s decision’. At the stage of provisional measures it could not make definitive findings of fact or imputability, but it merely determined whether the circumstances required the use of provisional measures to protect rights under the Genocide Convention.²⁶⁸

In 1991 the ICJ denied a request for provisional measures in the Passage through the Great Belt case. It did so for lack of temporal urgency.²⁶⁹ The Respondent State had also argued that the Applicant State should be able to ‘substantiate the right it claims to a point where a reasonable prospect of success in the main case exists’. The Applicant, on the other hand, argued that the ICJ ‘may not enter into the merits of a particular case at the stage of deciding whether or not to indicate provisional measures’. It denied that its case could be considered as prima facie unfounded.²⁷⁰ Clearly the Applicant is not in a position to argue that the Court should not take into account the rights claimed, implying that this would prejudice the decision on the merits.²⁷¹ Indeed the ICJ noted that it is the purpose of the provisional measures to preserve rights that are subject to dispute.²⁷² With regard to the Respondent’s argument that the type of reparation in this case could only be satisfied by damages, because ‘restitution in kind would be excessively onerous’, it pointed out that it was ‘not at present called upon to determine the character of any decision which it might make on the merits’. It did point out, however, that the possibility of a judicial finding that the construction of works involving an infringement of a legal right ‘must not be continued or must be modified or dismantled’ could and should ‘not be excluded a priori’.²⁷³ It noted that it was for Denmark to consider the impact a judgment upholding Finland’s claim could have on the implementation of the Great Belt project. It was therefore also for Denmark ‘to decide

²⁶⁶ Oellers-Frahm (1981), p. 284.

²⁶⁷ Elkind (1981), pp. 219-220.

²⁶⁸ ICJ Application of the Convention on the prevention and punishment of the crime of genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)), Order of 13 September 1993 (second request), §44. Only according to Judge Tarassov the Order that Serbia was to ensure that forces under its control or influence would refrain from acts of genocide was ‘very close to a pre-judgment of the merits’. See also Merrills (1995), p. 105, remarking that this does not seem very convincing. See on the other hand, Gray (2003), p. 893.

²⁶⁹ See further section 5.2.

²⁷⁰ ICJ Passage through the Great Belt case (Finland v. Denmark), Order of 29 July 1991, §21.

²⁷¹ See also ICJ Passage through the Great Belt case (Finland v. Denmark), Order of 29 July 1991, Separate Opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen, pp. 29-30.

²⁷² ICJ Passage through the Great Belt case (Finland v. Denmark), Order of 29 July 1991, §22.

²⁷³ Id., §31.

whether or to what extent it should accordingly delay or modify that project'.²⁷⁴ Merrills pointed out:

"Although the question of possible remedies was a subsidiary point, it provides a striking illustration of how questions of interim protection can become bound up with those relating to the merits, and of how the Court, while not anticipating its future judgment, may nevertheless have to give an issue such as remedies its early attention".²⁷⁵

Judge Shahabuddeen has noted that the ICJ is only considering whether the State requesting provisional measures has shown any possibility of the existence of the right sought to be preserved, not whether it definitively exists. "A finding that such a possibility exists clearly falls short of constituting an interim judgment".²⁷⁶

When taking provisional measures the ICJ has to consider the circumstances drawn to its attention as requiring such measures, but it cannot make definitive findings of fact.²⁷⁷ It emphasises that 'the right of the respondent State to dispute the facts alleged and to submit arguments in respect of the merits must remain unaffected by the Court's decision'.²⁷⁸ In its decisions to order provisional measures for a stay of execution of death sentences, for instance, it has pointed out that the measures 'would necessarily be provisional in nature and would not in any way prejudice findings the Court might make on the merits'. Such measures would preserve the respective rights of the Parties and the Court would ensure, with the cooperation of the parties, that any decision on the merits would be reached 'with all possible expedition'.²⁷⁹

In its decisions to refuse provisional measures it also points out that 'the decision given in the present proceedings in no way prejudices any question relating to the merits of the case' and leaves unaffected the rights of both States to submit arguments. In Congo v. France (2003), for instance, it denied a request for provisional measures to the effect that the proceedings by a French investigating judge against a Congolese politician would be suspended immediately. It pointed out that this decision 'in no way prejudices the question of the jurisdiction of the Court to deal with the merits of the case or any questions relating to the admissibility of the Application, or relating to the merits themselves'. It added the customary remark that the decision 'leaves unaffected the right of the Governments of the Congo and France to submit the arguments in respect of those questions'.²⁸⁰

²⁷⁴ Id., §32-33. See further section 3.2 on the traditional purposes of provisional measures.

²⁷⁵ Merrills (1995), p. 113.

²⁷⁶ ICJ Passage through the Great Belt case (Finland v. Denmark), Order of 29 July 1991, Separate Opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen, p. 30.

²⁷⁷ See further section 5.3 on assessment of material urgency.

²⁷⁸ See e.g. ICJ Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. US), Order of 10 May 1984, §§29-31.

²⁷⁹ ICJ Breard (Paraguay v. US), Order of 9 April 1998, LaGrand (Germany v. US), Order of 3 March 1999, §27, Avena et al. (Mexico v. US), Order of 5 February 2003. See also Armed activities on the territory of the Congo (Congo v. Uganda), Order of 1 July 2000, §90.

²⁸⁰ ICJ Certain criminal proceedings in France (Congo v. France), Order of 17 June 2003, §40. See also Arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 (Congo v. Belgium), Order of 8 December 2000, §77.

3.7 Protection and reparation

3.7.1 Introduction

Clearly the discussion of the protection required by provisional measures is related to the purpose of these measures. Often it is a matter of perspective whether provisional measures are seen as requiring maintenance of, change of or return to the status quo. They may constitute requests or orders to provide information in order to preserve the evidence. The question whether and to what extent provisional measures require positive measures is equally a matter of perspective. The substance of provisional measures must be regarded as based on a continuum between negative and positive measures. Moreover, provisional measures may vary with regard to the level of specificity.

3.7.2 Action and abstention: positive obligations in Orders for provisional measures

International adjudicators have ordered States to abstain from acting as well as to take positive action, with varying degrees of detail.²⁸¹ In order to prevent prejudice to the rights of Belgian nationals in China, in 1927 the President of the PCIJ ordered China, among others, to accompany any Belgian who may have lost his passport or committed some offence against the law, 'in safety to the nearest Belgian consulate', to provide 'effective protection' of Belgian missionaries and 'in general, protection of Belgians against any insult or violence'. Any legal proceedings against Belgians were to be heard by 'modern courts', with a right of appeal and with the assistance of counsel and interpreters of choice.²⁸² This provisional measure is reasonably detailed and includes both obligations to act and to refrain from acting.

Equally, in the Fisheries cases (1972) the ICJ not only ordered Iceland to refrain from certain acts, but it also ordered the Applicant States (the UK and Germany) to 'ensure' that vessels registered in their State did not take an annual catch of a certain amount and to 'furnish' both Iceland and the Registry of the ICJ with all the relevant information.²⁸³

In the MOX Plant case (2001) ITLOS used provisional measures aimed precisely at preserving the rights arising from the duty to cooperate, referred to as a fundamental principle in relation to the prevention of environmental harm.²⁸⁴ Ireland had contended that its rights under certain specified conditions would be 'irrevocably violated' if the UK would start the operation of the MOX power plant at that time. Ireland considered that these operations would have irreversible consequences. Eventually, rather than ordering the provisional measures requested by Ireland, ITLOS ordered both Parties to exchange further information with regard to the possible consequences for the Irish Sea, to monitor risks and devise measures to prevent the radioactive pollution that 'might result from the operation of the Mox plant'.²⁸⁵ It ordered the Parties to cooperate and 'enter into consultations forthwith' to '(a) exchange further information with regard to possible consequences for the Irish Sea arising out of the commissioning of the MOX plant; (b) monitor risks or the effects of the operation of the MOX plant for the Irish Sea; (c) devise, as appropriate, measures to prevent pollution of the marine environment which might result from the ²⁸¹ See already Dumbauld (1932), p. 167: "Interim measures afford protection not only against acts but also against omissions to act which threaten a right". See also p. 195.

²⁸² PCIJ Sino-Belgian case, Order of the President of 8 January 1927.

²⁸³ ICJ Fisheries Jurisdiction cases (UK v. Iceland; Germany v. Iceland), Order of 17 August 1972.

²⁸⁴ ITLOS MOX plant case (Ireland v. UK), Order of 3 December 2001, §83.

²⁸⁵ ITLOS MOX plant case (Ireland v. UK), Order of 3 December 2001, §89.

operation of the MOX plant'.²⁸⁶ The duty to cooperate also plays a role in the specific context of risk assessment.²⁸⁷

3.7.3 Specificity of decisions about provisional measures

As noted, the PCIJ was rather specific in its Order for provisional measures in the Sino-Belgian case (1927).²⁸⁸ Yet traditionally the ICJ has not specified the contents of its provisional measures.²⁸⁹ In later cases this changed. As discussed, the ICJ (Chamber) decided in the Frontier Dispute case (1986) not to order exactly those measures as requested by Burkina Faso. Rather than the withdrawal of the Parties' forces to a specific line it ordered a withdrawal of the forces, the terms of which should be determined by agreement between the Parties. Only if such agreement would fail the ICJ itself would set the terms of the specific line for withdrawal.²⁹⁰ The effect of this approach was 'conciliatory in the sense that the onus is placed on the parties to negotiate a modus vivendi, pending judicial resolution of the dispute'.²⁹¹ The substance of the Order was particularly attuned to the context, in which a regional organisation was actively involved in addressing the situation. The Order recognised this involvement and 'the Chamber's task was essentially one of co-ordinating its application of Article 41 with the parties' outside activities'. By choosing this approach to the substance of provisional measures the ICJ also avoided accusations of prejudgment.²⁹² As Merrills points out, the approach of the Chamber in this case was 'clearly a legitimate exercise' of its powers under Article 41.²⁹³

²⁸⁶ Ibid.

²⁸⁷ See section 5.3 of this Chapter (urgency).

²⁸⁸ PCIJ Sino-Belgian case, Order of the President of 8 January 1927.

²⁸⁹ See e.g. PCIJ Electricity Company of Sofia and Bulgaria (Belgium v. Bulgaria), Order of 5 December 1939, see further Elkind (1981), pp. 97-98. See also ICJ Nuclear tests cases (New Zealand v. France and Australia v. France), Order of 22 June 1973, on the Nuclear Tests cases see further Elkind, pp. 117-122.

²⁹⁰ In the Frontier Dispute case (1986) Burkina Faso requested the Chamber to order the withdrawal of the Parties to a specific line also proposed on the merits. Mali pointed out that this request could not be seen as 'provisional' as it would amount to granting the claim on the merits. The ICJ responded by distinguishing 'between withdrawal as a matter of principle and the determination of its extent'. In other words it ordered the withdrawal of the forces and determined that the terms of this withdrawal should be determined by agreement between the Parties.

²⁹¹ Merrills (1995), p. 133.

²⁹² ICJ Frontier Dispute case (Burkina Faso v. Mali), Order of 10 January 1986. See also Merrills (1995), pp. 105-106 and p. 126. See also section 3.6 on provisional measures and prejudgment. As Merrills notes, at the time the issue was under consideration 'within the framework of a regional organisation'. Thus 'this was a constructive way of discharging the Chamber's function while avoiding any accusation of prejudgment', Merrills (1995), p. 105. This was the organisation ANAD, which stands for Accord de non-agression et d'assistance en matière de défense. Burkina Faso had also requested the Chamber to order that each Party should refrain from any act of territorial administration beyond that same specific line. The Chamber noted that it did not consider itself empowered, at the stage of provisional measures, to modify the situation that prevailed before the armed actions. Rather it was necessary to avoid prejudging the existence of any specific line, ICJ Frontier Dispute case (Burkina Faso v. Mali), Order of 10 January 1986, 11, §29. Instead it ordered that administrative acts in the disputed areas should not modify the situation that prevailed before the armed actions. If it would have ordered the provisional measures requested by Burkina Faso it would have gone 'beyond a restoration of the status quo', Merrills (1995), p. 105.

²⁹³ Id., p. 133.

Obviously the discussion on the specificity of provisional measures is closely related to that on the authority of adjudicators to order provisional measures proprio motu. Article 75(1) of the ICJ Rules of Procedure refers to an action proprio motu if provisional measures are ordered in the absence of any request.²⁹⁴ Modification of the contents of the provisional measures requested by one of the Parties, including by ordering the preservation of the rights involved ‘by other means than those proposed’, or by concluding that ‘rights other than those invoked in the request’, required provisional measures, ‘in addition to or instead of those rights’ (footnotes omitted).²⁹⁵ Such modification of provisional measures was ‘a matter of routine in the Court’s practice’. This mainly comes down to condensing and consolidating requests that were originally very detailed, granting the measures requested only in part. The Court also routinely adds specific protective measures in order to preserve the rights of the Respondent State, as well as measures of general restraint directed to both Parties, also in cases in which the requesting Party had only requested such measures to be taken vis-à-vis the Respondent. Finally, it may indicate general measures of restraint that were not included in the request for provisional measures at all.²⁹⁶

Regarding the substance of provisional measures, Judge Shahabuddeen has noted that they ‘should be framed in self-executing terms, in the sense that [they] should contain all the legal elements required for [their] interpretation and application’.²⁹⁷ In Cameroon v. Nigeria (1996) Judge Ajibola argued that the Court was correct in ordering both Parties to take no action that might prejudice rights of the other or that might aggravate or extend the dispute. After all, it was the ‘cardinal duty of the Court to preserve peace’. However, he disagreed with the other four operative parts of the Order. He considered that the Court should ‘refrain from orders with diplomatic or political content or matters concerning mediation or negotiation, since strictly speaking these issues are apparently outside the legal assignment of the Court’. Leaving aside the relation between ‘strictly speaking’ and ‘apparently’, it is clear that he was concerned that some of the operative parts may actually ‘do more harm or damage than good’ and that ‘the Court should not issue an order in vain, that is, an order that is difficult or impossible to implement’.²⁹⁸ The latter criterion is not very convincing. While it is obvious that an Order should be capable of being implemented, the Court should not be led by the expectation that the State concerned might not be willing to implement such Order. Authoritative Orders of the Court already are important simply in order to back up arguments made in domestic courts and other fora. In addition, even though that is not their main purpose, they are significant building blocks for the development of international law in general.

Dumbauld has pointed out that provisional measures ‘should go no further than necessary to fulfil their purpose’. The adjudicator should choose, from equally effective measures, those that ‘least harm’ the Addressee State.²⁹⁹ He referred to a range of protective measures relating to the preservation of peace, including the establishment of neutralised zones, and concluded that the ‘Court may use its discretion in indicating any sort of measure which will attain the end desired and prove acceptable in practice’.³⁰⁰

As to substance the Order for provisional measures often is less far reaching than the original request by (one of) the Parties and the ICJ often takes into account the rights of the respondent

²⁹⁴ See also section 2 (authority).

²⁹⁵ Sztucki (1983), p. 158.

²⁹⁶ Id., p. 159. See also section 3.3.4 (border conflict cases).

²⁹⁷ ICJ Land and maritime boundary between Cameroon and Nigeria (Cameroon v. Nigeria), Order of 15 March 1996, declaration of Judge Shahabuddeen.

²⁹⁸ ICJ Land and maritime boundary between Cameroon and Nigeria (Cameroon v. Nigeria), Order of 15 March 1996, Separate Opinion of Judge Ajibola. On the official responses of States, see section 7 of this chapter.

²⁹⁹ Dumbauld (1932), p. 167. See also section 3.8 on the rights of the addressee Parties.

³⁰⁰ Dumbauld (1932), p. 168.

as well.³⁰¹ At the same time it has pointed out the obligations of the addressee by specifying that the Respondent State should transmit the Court's order to its constituent parts, such as the Governor of Arizona in LaGrand and report on implementation.³⁰²

The Court's recommendations in Orders denying provisional measures, for instance by stressing the importance of preventing aggravation of the dispute (which is also one of the purposes of provisional measures) is, as Merrills put it, a type of 'conciliatory function' related to 'the kind of implied power referred to in the Free Zones case'.³⁰³ The ICJ has made such recommendations, for instance, in the case of Armed Activities in the territory of the Congo (Congo v. Rwanda) (2002).³⁰⁴ Judge Buergenthal disagreed with the expression of the Court's deep concern regarding 'deplorable human tragedy, loss of life, and enormous suffering' resulting from the continued fighting in East Congo. He also disputed the Court's emphasis on the obligations of all Parties to proceedings before it to act in conformity with their obligations under the UN Charter and other rules of international law. The Court had pointed out in particular, the obligations by Congo and Rwanda under the Geneva Conventions and the First Additional Protocol.³⁰⁵ It had also noted, referring to a range of UN Security Council resolutions, that whether or not States accept its jurisdiction, 'they remain in any event responsible for acts attributable to them that violate international law'.³⁰⁶ Buergenthal considered that the ICJ had no jurisdiction to address these matters once it had ruled that it lacked prima facie jurisdiction to order provisional measures: "The Court's function is to pronounce itself on matters within its jurisdiction and not to voice personal sentiments or to make comments, general or specific, which, despite their admittedly 'feel-good' qualities, have no legitimate place in this order".³⁰⁷ He pointed out that the Court's own responsibilities under the UN Charter for the maintenance of peace and security are not general, but 'strictly limited to the exercise of its judicial functions in cases of which it has jurisdiction'.³⁰⁸

Judge Koroma responded to Buergenthal by stating that the Court had 'rightly and judiciously' expressed its deep concern and rightly emphasized the responsibilities of all Parties.³⁰⁹ Judge Dugard pointed out that the Order made no judgment on the conduct of either Party, but rightly expressed concern about the human suffering in the region of the Eastern Congo as well as called upon States in the region 'to abide by the rule of law'. The Court's call applied to ³⁰¹ See section 3.6 on prejudgment and section 6.1 on the beneficiaries. See also Merrills (1995), p. 143.

³⁰² ICJ LaGrand case (Germany v. US), Order of 3 March 1999, §28. See also Wellens (1998), pp. 428-429 on the possibility for the President of the Court to specify the required action or abstention, for instance by way of follow up, based on the President's discretionary powers in Article 74(4) of the Rules.

³⁰³ Merrills (1995), p. 133, noting that in the Free Zones case the PCIJ considered that 'it is for the Court to facilitate, so far as is compatible with its Statute, such direct and frankly settlement'.

³⁰⁴ ICJ Armed Activities in the territory of the Congo (new application: 2002) (Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Rwanda), Order of 10 July 2002. See generally about this case Kritsiotis (2001); Savadogo (2002); Tatulli (2003); Gray (2003) and Mampuya (2004).

³⁰⁵ ICJ Armed Activities in the territory of the Congo (new application: 2002) (Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Rwanda), Order of 10 July 2002, §§54-56.

³⁰⁶ Id., §93.

³⁰⁷ ICJ Congo v. Rwanda, Order of 10 July 2002, Declaration of Judge Buergenthal, §§3-4. According to Buergenthal the Court's expression of concern 'in a formal Order of the Court' presupposed that the Court had the 'requisite jurisdiction to deal with that subject-matter', §5.

³⁰⁸ ICJ Congo v. Rwanda, Order of 10 July 2002, Declaration of Judge Buergenthal, §6.

³⁰⁹ ICJ Congo v. Rwanda, Order of 10 July 2002 (denying provisional measures), Declaration of Judge Koroma, §12.

all States in the region and did ‘not in any way prejudge the issue raised in the present proceedings’.³¹⁰

Judge Buergenthal warned that the Court’s statement ‘might also encourage States to file provisional measure requests, knowing that, despite the fact that they would be unable to sustain the burden of demonstrating the requisite prima facie jurisdiction, they would obtain from the Court some pronouncements that could be interpreted as supporting their claim against the other Party’.³¹¹ This indeed seems a real possibility, indicating that the Court must stay alert in its formulations. Yet it appears that the ICJ considers it may insert recommendations in its Orders denying provisional measures.

A more recent example (2006 and 2007) in which it did so was in its Orders denying requests by Argentina for provisional measures Pulp Mills, where the Court reminded the parties of their responsibilities under international law and stressed the need for Argentina and Uruguay ‘to implement in good faith the consultation and co-operation procedures’ provided for in a treaty concluded between them in the 1970s. It encouraged both parties ‘to refrain from any actions which might render more difficult the resolution of the present dispute’.³¹²

An earlier case in which the question was brought up whether the Court could insert general recommendations to the Parties in its Orders denying the use of provisional measures, was the Aegean Sea case (1976).³¹³ In this case Judge Lachs considered that the ICJ should, even when it did not indicate provisional measures, have acted proprio motu. It should have stressed the need for restraint and have made its own contribution to help ‘pave the way to the friendly resolution of a dangerous dispute’.³¹⁴ In the Arbitral Award case (1990) Judge Evenson drew attention to the Parties to ‘make every effort to enter into provisional arrangements’.³¹⁵ In the Passage through the Great Belt case (1991), the ICJ itself, in reference to the PCIJ decision in the Free-Zones case, noted that ‘pending a decision of the Court on the merits, any negotiation between the Parties with a view to achieving a direct and friendly settlement is to be welcomed’.³¹⁶ Subsequently this case was indeed settled by negotiation and Merrills points out that the Court’s suggestion ‘was well justified and may have served a useful purpose’.³¹⁷

³¹⁰ ICJ Congo v. Rwanda, Order of 10 July 2002, Separate Opinion of Judge Dugard, §13.

³¹¹ ICJ Congo v. Rwanda, Order of 10 July 2002, Declaration of Judge Buergenthal, §9.

³¹² ICJ Case concerning Pulp Mills on the River Uruguay (Argentina v. Uruguay), Order of 13 July 2006 (denying provisional measures), §82. In its subsequent Order it reiterated ‘its call to the Parties’ in respect to both aspects. Order of 23 January 2007 (denying provisional measures), §53.

³¹³ ICJ Aegean Sea case (Greece v. Turkey), Order of 11 September 1976. On the protection required in the Court’s provisional measures see also section 3.7.

³¹⁴ Judge Lachs suggested that the ICJ ‘could have made its own constructive, albeit indirect, contribution, helping to pave the way to the friendly resolution of a dangerous dispute’. It could have done so by acting proprio motu, laying ‘greater stress on, in particular the need for restraint on the part of both States and the possible consequences of any deterioration or extension of the conflict’, even without indicating provisional measures proper. ICJ Aegean Sea case (Greece v. Turkey), Order of 11 September 1976, Separate Opinion Judge Lachs, p. 20. Yet Sztucki noted in 1983 that the Court had been ‘consistently reluctant (South-Eastern Greenland, Right of Passage, Aegean Sea) to accept general prevention as the sole object of its interlocutory decisions’, Sztucki (1983), p. 78.

³¹⁵ ICJ Arbitral Award of 31 July 1989 (Guinea-Bissau v. Senegal), Order of 2 March 1990, Separate Opinion of Judge Evenson.

³¹⁶ ICJ Passage through the Great Belt case (Finland v. Denmark), 29 July 1991, §95. Judges Tarasov and Broms would have preferred an even more concrete proposal. Judge Broms also pointed out that the Parties could take up the suggestion for negotiations without loss of face exactly because such negotiations were recommended in the Court’s Order.

³¹⁷ Merrills (1995), p. 136.

With regard to cases in which it denied provisional measures because it considered them inappropriate in the circumstances, the above arguments indeed seem to justify the insertion of general recommendations. The same applies in cases where it denies a request for provisional measures because of prima facie inadmissibility, without removing the case from its docket (General List) altogether. On the other hand, in cases in which the ICJ manifestly has no jurisdiction under Article 41 to order provisional measures it could be argued to be inappropriate to insert such recommendations. An obvious example would be when an individual person requests the ICJ to order provisional measures. To be sure, exactly because of the lack of jurisdiction ratione personae the ICJ does not even list such a request in its List of cases. In that sense a better example would be an Order by the Court to deny provisional measures for manifest lack of jurisdiction combined with a decision to remove the case from the List.³¹⁸ In such Order it would be inappropriate to insert recommendations to the Parties, despite the fact that the Court has a role to play under the UN Charter for the maintenance of international peace and security. After all, it could only perform this role as part of the case pending before it to settle a contentious proceeding. If jurisdiction is so manifestly lacking that the Court removes the case from the List, it could be argued it has no jurisdiction either to insert recommendations in its Order denying a request for provisional measures. On the other hand, if the case is still on the List this means there is still a possibility of jurisdiction on the merits.

Thus generally speaking the issue goes to the appropriateness of inserting a recommendation, not to the power to do so. D'Aspremont has rightly pointed out that, contrary to the operative part of an Order for provisional measures, recommendations 'have no legal consequences'.³¹⁹ No 'apparent basis for jurisdiction over the merits' is needed for the Court to make such recommendations 'as they do not make a final finding of facts or imputability'.³²⁰ Moreover, a reference to the general human rights obligations of States or to their obligations under the UN Charter does not interfere with the purpose of preventing damages to the States involved.

According to Rosenne '[r]estraint and careful crafting of the judicial pronouncement are certainly necessary' in cases in which the Court decided not to grant judicial measures for lack of prima facie jurisdiction. "But the real test for the Court in considering whether to include such general statements in any order of provisional measures, in any other judicial pronouncement is whether the statement is likely to contribute to the peaceful settlement of the dispute".³²¹

3.7.4 Relation to reparation

As Collins has pointed out, in Chorzów Factory (1927) the PCIJ did not decide that it was precluded from ordering provisional measures by 'the mere fact that the Applicant State seeks the same remedy in the interim measures phase as it seeks on the merits'. Instead the Court simply decided that Article 41 PCIJ Statute could not serve as a basis for an award of interim damages, because this would require 'some form of determination on the merits' and not because the remedy somehow paralleled the final judgment.³²²

Apart from a relationship to the rights claimed, it is also important to examine the possible obligations and forms of reparation in the event of a finding of a violation on the merits.³²³ After ³¹⁸ That is, if the Court would enter into a discussion on the request at all. It might also simply start with removing the case from the List.

³¹⁹ D'Aspremont (2007), p. 190.

³²⁰ Id., p. 192.

³²¹ Rosenne (2005), p. 221.

³²² Collins (1993), p. 229. See PCIJ Factory at Chorzów (German interests in Polish Upper Silesia cases), Order of 21 November 1927. See also Rosenne (2005), p. 190.

³²³ In general on judicial remedies, including reparation, see e.g. Gray (1987).

all the use of provisional measures could be warranted if the respondent would otherwise preempt any meaningful reparation.³²⁴ At the same time the adjudicator must also be able to provide the relief requested.³²⁵ In that sense the substance of the eventual obligation (cessation, assurances of non-repetition) or form of reparation and that of the temporary relief pending the case (pendente lite) are closely related.³²⁶ In the Sino-Belgian Treaty case (1927) the PCIJ considered that the violation of certain rights ‘would not be made good simply by the payment of an indemnity or by compensation or restitution in some other material form’.³²⁷ In its Order for provisional measures in the Nuclear Tests cases (1973) the ICJ referred to claims that ‘the uncertain physical and genetic effects to which contamination exposes the people of New Zealand causes them acute apprehension, anxiety and concern; and that there could be no possibility that the rights eroded by the holding of further tests could be fully restored in the event of a judgment in New Zealand’s favour in these proceedings’.³²⁸

Merrills noted that ‘on a narrow view’ prejudice to a State ‘is irreparable only if it cannot be adequately compensated for in the final judgment’. The ICJ took such a narrow view in the Aegean Sea case (1976). The Court considered that the exclusive right to information on the natural resources of the continental shelf ‘might be capable of reparation by appropriate means’.³²⁹ Merrills emphasised that ‘such an interpretation of the concept of irreparable prejudice, if applied generally, would have the effect of restricting the scope for interim protection very severely’.³³⁰ He noted that the Court took a different approach when it ordered provisional measures in the Nicaragua case (1984). This, however, was not surprising given the seriousness of the allegations. Nevertheless, the ‘alleged violations of Nicaragua’s sovereignty could have been compensated by an award of reparation (which was in fact being sought) and thus in the strict sense this did not constitute “irreparable prejudice”’. Merrills presumed that the ICJ used provisional measures ‘on the ground that in a case involving allegations of flagrant violations of international law the applicant’s rights should be protected whether or not it might eventually succeed in its claim for damages’.³³¹

There is no need for a provision on restitution in kind in each particular Convention. The right to restitution in kind is a general rule of international law. As early as 1928, the Permanent Court of International Justice established that this form of reparation was to be preferred:

³²⁴ Dumbault (1932), p. 165 has referred to ‘irreparable in money’ and situations in which ‘pecuniary redress’ would be ‘inadequate’, also referring to Guggenheim (1931), p. 12.

³²⁵ See e.g. Goldie (1973-74), p. 504.

³²⁶ See also Wellens (1998), p. 421 (‘the kind of measures requested must be such that they can be subsumed by the Court’s judgment’).

³²⁷ PCIJ Sino-Belgian case, Order of the President of 8 January 1927, p. 7. Common law may be instructive in order to clarify the relation between irreparable harm and the prospect of reparation: harm is considered irreparable when ‘there is no certain pecuniary standard for the measure of damages’, for instance when the interest of the Party requesting provisional measures is primarily subjective, Elkind (1981), p. 216.

³²⁸ ICJ Nuclear tests case (New Zealand v. France), Order of 22 June 1973, §28.

³²⁹ Merrills (1995), p. 108. See also ICJ Pulp mills on the river Uruguay (Argentina v. Uruguay), Order of 13 July 2006, in which the Court found that the circumstances did not require the use of provisional measures. Among others, it was ‘not at present convinced’ any violation at issue ‘would not be capable of being remedied at the merits stage of the proceedings’, §70. See also §§72 and 76.

³³⁰ Merrills (1995), p. 108. See also Elkind’s criticism (1981), pp. 211-215 discussed in section 3.4. See further section 5.3 on assessment of material urgency.

³³¹ Merrills (1995), pp. 108-109. See also Sztucki (1983) p. 112, referring to the Hostages case.

“The essential principle contained in the actual notion of an illegal act -a principle which seems to be established by international practice and in particular by the decisions of arbitral tribunals- is that reparation must, as far as possible, wipe out all the consequences of the illegal act and re-establish the situation which would, in all probability, have existed if that act had not been committed. Restitution in kind, or, if this is not possible, payment of a sum corresponding to the value which a restitution in kind would bear”,³³²

Article 35 of the International Law Commission’s Articles on State Responsibility confirms that the injured State is entitled to the ‘re-establish the situation which existed before the wrongful act was committed’.³³³

In cases of mass human rights violations the ICJ has sought cessation and guarantees of non-repetition, rather than the compensation traditionally requested in diplomatic protection cases. In such cases of mass violations compensation would be a particularly inappropriate as the sole form of reparation and this would in fact be reflected in the use of provisional measures pending the proceedings.³³⁴ On the other hand, the Court has shown an awareness of the appropriateness of forms of reparation other than compensation also in cases involving fewer individuals, brought in the evolving exercise of ‘diplomatic protection’. The US hostages were to be released immediately. The Paraguayan, German and Mexican nationals were not to be executed before their cases had been submitted to a review taking into account the lack of consular assistance. In view of the object of the aforementioned VCCR, namely the protection of nationals abroad, it is not surprising that the wronged State expected some form of ‘restitution in kind’. By indicating provisional measures, the ICJ acknowledges that if it were to decide restitutio in integrum was indeed warranted, this decision would be rendered useless if irreparable harm had already been inflicted. Thus the ICJ ordered provisional measures in the cases Breard, LaGrand and Avena.³³⁵ The execution of Breard and LaGrand, in contravention of these Orders, made impossible this restitution in kind. As noted, Paraguay subsequently withdrew its case against the US, but Germany persisted. The purpose of Germany’s claim in LaGrand had been to ‘ensure that German nationals will be provided with adequate consular assistance in the future, and thus be protected against the fatal consequences following from breaches of Article 36 in circumstances allowing those leading to the death of the brothers LaGrand’.³³⁶ After the execution of Walter LaGrand Germany focused on its right to satisfaction. It considered that an apology alone did not suffice and would be no help in future cases. Instead, it asked the Court to pronounce the obligation to provide Germany with assurances of non-repetition. As the first reason for its insistence on satisfaction, it referred to the International Law Commission’s

³³² PCIJ Factory at Chorzów (German interests in Polish Upper Silesia cases), Order of 21 November 1927, p. 41.

³³³ ILC Articles on Responsibility of States for Internationally Wrongful Acts, adopted at the 53rd session, November 2001, A/56/10, Chapter IV E.2. Article 34 stipulates that restitution is the first of the forms of reparation available to an injured State.

³³⁴ Apart from its appropriate emphasis on the continued obligation to punish genocide and cooperate fully with the ICTY, the ICJ’s approach in the Genocide Convention case, 27 February 2007, was surprising in this respect. See e.g. Milanović (2007), pp. 689-691, also referring to the case law of the Inter-American and European Court of Human Rights and the Bosnia Human Rights Chamber. These adjudicators are introduced in the Chapter II of this book. Gattini (2007), p. 712 also noted that a look at the case law of the Inter-American Court ‘could have provided a useful source of obligation’. See further Chapter XIII on the approaches of the various adjudicators to the relation with reparation.

³³⁵ ICJ Breard (Paraguay v. US), Order of 9 April 1998; LaGrand case (Germany v. US), Order of 3 March 1999 and Avena et al. (Mexico v. US), Order of 5 February 2003.

³³⁶ See ICJ LaGrand case (Germany v. US), verbatim record CR 2000/27 of 13 November 2000, p. 15.

statement that satisfaction is a remedy designed especially for those cases in which injury cannot be made good by restitution or compensation. As its second reason to request the ICJ to oblige the US to render satisfaction, Germany referred to ‘the particularly grave character of the moral damage inflicted upon Germany’.³³⁷ In short Germany claimed that adequate assurances were warranted against repetition. This would mean a guarantee of non-repetition requiring preventive action, rather than ‘simple’ verbal assurances.

Indeed, the ICJ considered that an apology by the US was not sufficient in this case. It also considered that an apology would not be sufficient in other cases where ‘foreign nationals have not been advised without delay of their rights under Article 36, paragraph 1, of the Vienna Convention and have been subjected to prolonged detention or sentenced to severe penalties’.³³⁸

The Court stressed the importance of the information the US had provided on its programme to ensure compliance. ‘If a State, in proceedings before this Court, repeatedly refers to substantial activities which it is carrying out in order to achieve compliance with certain obligations under a treaty, then this expresses a commitment to follow through with the efforts in this regard’.³³⁹

In relation to the other two types of assurances sought by Germany, the Court considered that:

“if the United States, notwithstanding its commitment referred to in paragraph 124 above, should fail in its obligation of consular notification to the detriment of German nationals, an apology would not suffice in cases where the individuals concerned have been subjected to prolonged detention or convicted and sentenced to severe penalties. In the case of such a conviction and sentence, it would be incumbent upon the United States to allow the review and reconsideration of the conviction and sentence by taking account of the violation of the rights set forth in the Convention. This obligation can be carried out in various ways. The choice of means must be left to the United States”.³⁴⁰

Although this was less than Germany requested, in cases involving German nationals who are sentenced to severe penalties, the Court did confirm the obligation of the US to review and reconsider convictions and sentences in cases where Article 36(1)(b) has been denied despite the US assurances.³⁴¹ Two years later the ICJ specified this by pointing out that the ‘freedom in the choice of means for such review and reconsideration is not without qualification’.³⁴² It should be effective, take account of the rights in the VCCR and ‘guarantee that the violation and the possible prejudice caused by that violation will be fully examined and taken into account’. The ³³⁷ See ICJ LaGrand case (Germany v. US), verbatim record CR 2000/27 of 13 November 2000, pp. 15 and 16.

³³⁸ ICJ LaGrand case (Germany v. US), Judgment of 27 June 2001, §123.

³³⁹ On the other hand, the Court noted that such question could not provide an assurance that the US will never again fail to observe the obligation of notification under Article 36. It also noted that no State could give such a guarantee and that Germany did not seek it, but the US had met ‘Germany’s request for a general assurance of non-repetition’. The Court confirmed that it was indeed within its authority and jurisdiction to determine the existence of a violation of international obligation and, if necessary, to hold that a domestic law has been the cause of this violation. It stated that ‘it has not found that a United States law, whether substantive or procedural in character, is inherently inconsistent with the obligations undertaken by the United States in the Vienna Convention’, ICJ LaGrand case (Germany v. US), Judgment of 27 June 2001, §125.

³⁴⁰ Ibid.

³⁴¹ See e.g. Aceves (2003), Jennings (2002), Orakhelashvili (2002), Palmisano (2002), Tams (2002) and Cassel (1999b).

³⁴² ICJ Avena (Mexico v. US), Judgment of 31 March 2004, §131.

‘review and reconsideration should be both of the sentence and of the conviction’ and ‘should occur within the overall judicial proceedings relating to the individual defendant concerned’.³⁴³ It pointed out that ‘the clemency process as currently practiced within the United States criminal justice system, does not appear to meet the requirements (...) and is therefore not sufficient in itself to serve as an appropriate means of “review and reconsideration” as envisaged by the Court in the LaGrand case’.³⁴⁴ As discussed, Mexico requested the ICJ to interpret the Avena judgment and in this context it also requested provisional measures to halt the execution of Medellín and four others. The Court, by a narrow majority, found that the Parties ‘apparently hold different views as to the meaning and scope of th[e] obligation of result [in Avena], namely whether that understanding is shared by all United States federal and state authorities and whether that obligation falls upon those authorities’.³⁴⁵ Subsequently Texas executed Medellín. Clearly, the executions of Breard, LaGrand and Medellín caused irreparable harm not only to the claim, but in fact to the persons involved.

3.8 The beneficiaries of provisional measures and the rights of the addressees

3.8.1 Introduction

The Court’s recent use of provisional measures aimed to prevent human suffering may be roughly divided into cases involving individuals sentenced to death who had been deprived of consular protection by their State of nationality on the one hand and cases involving armed ‘territorial’ conflicts on the other hand. In the latter type of cases the group of beneficiaries generally is considerably larger. Moreover, the Court’s involvement may partially be explained by the ICJ’s role, under the UN Charter, in the maintenance of peace.

Even if the applicant State fails to convince the Court to use provisional measures it may still benefit from the Court’s examination of the case, as this may draw public attention to the conflict, enable it to publicly make arguments and bring the conflict ‘into sharper legal focus’.³⁴⁶ In some cases it may strengthen the State’s bargaining position, especially if the adjudicator, while denying the request, nevertheless gives some general recommendations.

3.8.2 Rights by proxy (diplomatic protection)

Evidently States normally institute proceedings and request provisional measures to protect their own rights, although in the majority of cases, in one way or other the interests of the Applicant State’s citizens are involved (and subsumed in those of the State).³⁴⁷ In Avena the Court had also stressed that it had ‘been addressing the issues of principle (...) from the viewpoint of the general application of the Vienna Convention, and there can be no question of an a contrario argument’. “In other words, the fact that in this case the court’s ruling has concerned only Mexican nationals

³⁴³ Id., §§138 and 141.

³⁴⁴ Id., §143. See also e.g. Shelton (2004) and Aceves (2003).

³⁴⁵ ICJ Request for interpretation of the judgment of 31 March 2004 in the case concerning Avena and other Mexican nationals (Mexico v. US), Order of 16 July 2008, §55. See further section 3.3.7.

³⁴⁶ See e.g. Merrills (1995), p. 113.

³⁴⁷ As Cançado Trindade put it in a dissent to the ICJ’s decision not to order provisional measures in Questions relating to the obligation to prosecute or extradite (Belgium v. Senegal), Order of 28 May 2009, the rights invoked by the contending parties ‘have a direct relationship with the legitimate expectations of thousands of human beings’, §14.

cannot be taken to imply that the conclusions reached by it in the present Judgment do not apply to other foreign nationals finding themselves in similar situations in the United States”.³⁴⁸ This ‘indicates that the Court is more concerned about the international rule of law than about strictly contractual relations between two states parties’.³⁴⁹

In cases involving the lives of persons the approach of the ICJ to the group of beneficiaries to be protected by its provisional measures should not be overly strict. The infusion of human rights norms in the law on diplomatic protection in fact warrants a flexible approach to the group of beneficiaries, rather than a strict interpretation of the ‘nationals’ to be protected.³⁵⁰ The point of departure should be the protection required rather than a narrow concept of nationality or an otherwise limited approach. In the Hostages case, for instance, the ICJ had ordered Iran to immediately release all US nationals, not just those held in the US Embassy or in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Tehran, but also those who ‘have been held as hostages elsewhere’.³⁵¹ In other words it took the scope of the group of beneficiaries to be rather wide to include all US nationals being held as hostage anywhere in Iran.

In the context of the law of the sea ITLOS Judge Laing has also noted ‘potential beneficiaries include non-States, often in a commercial context’ and argued that provisional measures must protect ‘non-traditional asserted rights’.³⁵²

3.8.3 General interest

Often the measures requested could also serve the general interest, such as in cases involving gross and widespread human rights violations or in cases involving environmental degradation. Already in the early cases of the PCIJ there were discussions on the question whether provisional measures could be used in ‘proceedings instituted by the requesting State not in defence of its own rights but in the ‘public interest’, as a member of the Council of the League’.³⁵³ If the State has standing to do so, without reference to its ‘own rights’, and the ICJ has jurisdiction to hear its particular human rights claim,³⁵⁴ this Court should also be able to Order provisional measures. After all this would still preserve the respective rights of either party to ensure protection of the human rights standards invoked. The prevention of aggravation of the dispute is but one example.³⁵⁵

3.8.4 Third parties’ rights and obligations

Applicant States may also refer to the rights and obligations of third parties. In some cases third parties have even submitted information separately.³⁵⁶ With regard to the relief sought in the M/V

³⁴⁸ ICJ Avena et al. (Mexico v. US), Judgment of 31 March 2004, §151. See on the confusion created in Avena on State rights, diplomatic protection and individual rights Künzli (2005), pp. 55-56 and Milano (2004), pp. 124-132. See also Shelton (2004a), p. 561.

³⁴⁹ Shelton (2004a), p. 565.

³⁵⁰ See also Judge Simma in ICJ Armed activities on the territory of the Congo (Congo v. Rwanda), Order of 10 July 2002. Generally on diplomatic protection, see the various reports by ILC Rapporteur Dugard; see also Vermeer-Künzli (2007).

³⁵¹ ICJ US Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran (US v. Iran), Order of 15 December 1979, §47.

³⁵² ITLOS M/V ‘Saiga’ (No.2) case, Order of 11 March 1998, Separate Opinion Judge Laing, §21.

³⁵³ Sztucki (1983), pp. 228-229.

³⁵⁴ See e.g. Milano (2004), p. 114, pp. 118-119.

³⁵⁵ See section 3.2.

³⁵⁶ See e.g. the applications for permission to intervene by Australia, Samoa, Solomon Islands, the Marshall Islands and the Federal States of Micronesia in the Request for an examination of the

'Saiga' case ITLOS Judge Laing wrote about third parties that situations involving them had no direct bearing on the case but 'incidents involving non-parties may provide evidence of (...) similar facts and conduct, raising the inference that the actions in issue may have occurred'.³⁵⁷

An applicant State's interest in the clarification of a legal issue may also be at stake, as was the case in the two requests for provisional measures by Bosnia, dealing with the legality of the UN arms embargo. As the ICJ considered that the clarification of this issue was meant for members of the Security Council rather than for Serbia and Montenegro, it decided not to order provisional measures to this effect.³⁵⁸ Bosnia declared its intention to institute legal proceedings against one 'third State' with permanent membership in the Security Council.³⁵⁹ In November 1993 it argued that the UK had 'failed and refused to prevent genocide, had imposed and maintained an arms embargo in violation of Article 51 of the UN Charter and had abetted ongoing genocide by opposing the efforts of others to have the embargo lifted'. It considered that these actions amounted to 'complicity in genocide'. The next month, however, Bosnia and UK issued a joint statement in which Bosnia announced that it would not institute such legal proceedings.³⁶⁰

3.8.5 Rights of the addressee States

The Court's Order for provisional measures in the Anglo-Iranian Oil Co. case (1951) has been criticised as arguably 'contrary to the usual practice' of the ICJ and the PCIJ, 'especially because the decree created an opportunity for the company to deplete Iran's oil reserves further'. In that sense it 'patently failed to protect the status quo in an even-handed way'.³⁶¹ Respondents need to be protected as well, but the question is to what length.

It has been suggested to include in the Order the condition that the requesting State will compensate the respondent for (some of the) losses sustained in compliance, should the Court subsequently reject the submission on the merits.³⁶² In domestic systems injunctions often include such condition. Different from domestic rules and regulations the ICJ Statute and Rules of Court do not expressly confer such a power on the ICJ. It has been pointed out that even if such a power could be implied it had never been exercised.³⁶³ Elkind has considered that one way to protect the situation in accordance with paragraph 63 of the Court's judgment of 20 December 1974 in the Nuclear Tests (New Zealand v. France) case, Order of 22 September 1995.

³⁵⁷ M/V 'Saiga' (No.2) case, Order of 11 March 1998, Separate Opinion Judge Laing, §24. He remarked, however, that the issue played no part in the Order in this case.

³⁵⁸ ICJ Application of the Convention on the prevention and punishment of the crime of genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)), Orders of 8 April 1993 and 13 September 1993.

³⁵⁹ It referred to the Separate Opinion of Judge Lauterpacht, to the Order of 13 September 1993, §§98-115.

³⁶⁰ See 'editor's note', p. 43 International and Comparative Law Quarterly p. 714 (1994). See also Toufayan (2005).

³⁶¹ ICJ Anglo-Iranian Oil Co. (UK v. Iran), Order of 5 July 1951. See Goldie (1974), p. 496. As Rosenne (2005), p. 155 put it 'the fact that important provisional measures were indicated in the case and that later the Court held itself to be without jurisdiction over the application has troubled both the Court and publicists'. See also Fisheries jurisdiction cases, Orders of 17 August 1972.

³⁶² Merrills (1995), p. 117 refers to the argument of Denmark in the Passage through the Great Belt case. The Court did not order provisional measures and therefore did not deal with this request.

³⁶³ Mendelson (1972-73), pp. 312-313. Collins (1992), pp. 229-231, points out that 'there can be little doubt that a principle of compensation for the unjustified grant of an injunction in private litigation is a general principle of law'. Dumbauld (1932), p. 162 considers that the PCIJ had an implied power to condition its use of provisional measures this way. Merrills (1995), p. 117 has noted that such a 'provision of security can be thought of as a general principle of law'. In his Separate Opinion to ITLOS Land reclamation by Singapore in and around the straits of Johor

respondent State is 'to balance the convenience of the parties in a case involving interim protection'. "If compliance with the measures involves a greater hardship than denial of the measures, then they should be denied".³⁶⁴ About the aforementioned conditional relief he mentioned that in many domestic jurisdictions courts can order plaintiffs to 'post security' against any damage the respondent might suffer 'by virtue of compliance with the Order if the Court later decides for respondent at the jurisdiction or the merits phases'. He suggested that the ICJ could consider this because the power to do so is 'functionally inherent' in the power to order provisional measures. At the same time he emphasized that Parties that fail to appear before the Court cannot raise matters such as balance of convenience nor can they ask the Court to order the Applicant State to post security.³⁶⁵

The ICJ has not yet decided the issue whether a Party may receive compensation for injuries resulting from compliance with provisional measures if the Court later determines it had no jurisdiction on the merits or if it finds in favour of the addressee of the provisional measures.³⁶⁶ In the Great Belt case (1991) Judge Shahabuddeen recalled that it was not settled whether the jurisprudence of the ICJ allowed for 'compensating a party for any injuries suffered in complying with an interim measure should the latter be eventually found to have been unjustified'. He pointed out that this made even more significant the exceptional character of provisional measures.³⁶⁷ The discussion in the next section on the existence of prima facie jurisdiction on the merits is particularly relevant from the perspective of the rights of the addressee State.

In the Lockerbie and Genocide Convention cases the (Acting) President denied the Applicant States' request to accelerate the proceedings, and did not invoke Article 75(1) of the Rules in order to ensure the effectiveness of any provisional measures that might be taken.³⁶⁸ In LaGrand, on the other hand, the Court did decide to order provisional measures immediately, as the execution of the death sentence against Walter LaGrand was so imminent that a formal hearing could not have been planned until after the execution. Judges Schwebel and Buergenthal were correct in criticising Germany for not bringing the case and the request for provisional measures before the Court sooner.³⁶⁹ This would have allowed the US to adequately prepare its response and present it during a hearing. Nevertheless, as the life of a person was involved the Court could not have taken a different approach. Moreover, the ICJ was fully aware of the US arguments in this respect because this was the second request for provisional measures to halt an execution the ICJ had dealt with within a limited period of time. In the previous case the US had extensively argued against the use of provisional measures in its written and oral submissions and subsequently disrespected the proceedings before the ICJ by executing the Paraguayan national in square violation of the Court's provisional measures.³⁷⁰

(Malaysia v. Singapore), Order of 8 October 2003, §20 Judge Lucky wrote: "Although there is no international precedent that I can find, I think the time has come to consider whether applicants for provisional measures, as in some municipal systems, should provide a guarantee in their applications that if the measures sought are granted, but discontinued if the substantive matter is determined in the respondent's favour, they will pay damages incurred and costs to the respondents".

³⁶⁴ Elkind (1981), p. 259.

³⁶⁵ Elkind (1981), pp. 259-260. See also pp. 238-241 and p. 57.

³⁶⁶ See section 3.6 on prejudgment. See further section 3.7 on protection and reparation. See also the purpose of protecting collateral rights, section 3.3.4.

³⁶⁷ ICJ Passage through the Great Belt case (Finland v. Denmark), Order of 29 July 1991, Separate Opinion Judge Shahabuddeen, p. 29.

³⁶⁸ See also Rosenne (2005), pp. 163-164 and Sztucki (1983), pp. 156-157.

³⁶⁹ ICJ LaGrand case (Germany v. US), Order of 3 March 1999, Separate Opinion Judge Schwebel and Judgment of 27 June 2001, Dissenting Opinion Judge Buergenthal.

³⁷⁰ See also Addo (1999), p. 720.

When the rights involved are the same for both States it is not difficult to order provisional measures that have an equal impact on both Parties. If, on the other hand, the case does not relate to a territorial question but to the international responsibility of a Respondent State, it is more difficult to fully achieve equal treatment in the text of the provisional measure.³⁷¹

It could be argued that in balancing the rights of the Parties in a conflict, a State's interest in the protection of life and limbs of its citizens must outweigh the procedural problems arising under the national law of the other State when, for instance, that other State has to retry a foreign national in compliance with international law. At the time of its Order to halt the execution of Breard and LaGrand, however, the ICJ had not yet reached a decision on this issue. It merely indicated provisional measures so that the effectiveness of a possible decision on the merits would not be precluded.³⁷² Its judgment in LaGrand (2001) indeed confirmed the importance of protection of life and limbs.³⁷³

4 JURISDICTION ON THE MERITS AND THE USE OF PROVISIONAL MEASURES

Section 2 noted that while the authority of the adjudicator to use provisional measures is a prerequisite, the possibility of jurisdiction on the merits relates to the appropriateness of their use.³⁷⁴

The discussion of the relationship between jurisdiction and provisional measures can be divided in two categories: the authority to use such measures in the particular system in the first place and their use in relation to the jurisdiction on the merits. The first relates to the implicit or explicit legal basis for provisional measures, the authority to use them in inter-state proceedings, the authority to use them proprio motu and the delegation of the authority to an individual judge. The second already relates to the question whether provisional measures are warranted. It involves the concept of prima facie jurisdiction and the use of provisional measures. This section

³⁷¹ Merrills (1995), p. 117.

³⁷² This is also observed by Wilson (1998), p. 8: "[The ICJ ruling] didn't say that Breard should go free. It didn't pass any judgment on the validity of the death sentence imposed in his case. It didn't even say that he should get a new trial. Moreover, it didn't reach any decision as to the ultimate question before the ICJ—that is, what should be done when the Vienna Convention is violated. It simply said that Angel Breard should not be executed until the court had a chance to hear the full arguments on the application of the Vienna Convention in the context of Breard's case, a legal dispute over which the U.S. government had explicitly agreed that the ICJ had jurisdiction".

³⁷³ ICJ LaGrand (Germany v. US), Judgment of 27 June 2001. See also Avena (Mexico v. US), Judgment of 31 March 2004 and Mexico's argument in ICJ Request for interpretation of the judgment of 31 March 2004 in the case concerning Avena and other Mexican nationals (Mexico v. US), Order of 16 July 2008, §20 ('any delay in an execution would not be prejudicial to the rights of the United States as all of the above-mentioned Mexican nationals would remain incarcerated and subject to execution once their right to review and reconsideration has been vindicated').

³⁷⁴ Obviously there are also levels of appropriateness. In the context of the practice of ITLOS Devine has suggested the following methodology: 1. Is there prima facie jurisdiction? 2. Has jurisdiction been excluded by (one of) the parties? 3. Is the exercise of jurisdiction admissible in this case? 4. Is it appropriate in this case (criteria of urgency, respective rights and serious harm to the marine environment)? 5. What measures should be taken? See Devine (2003), pp. 274-275.

deals with the second category: the relevance of the jurisdiction on the merits as established by the ICJ.³⁷⁵

If an individual, a company, or an organisation would request provisional measures, however much warranted to prevent irreparable harm, the ICJ obviously would have no authority to indicate them because 'only States may be parties in cases before the Court' (Article 34(1)). In other words the ICJ clearly would have no jurisdiction ratione personae.³⁷⁶

Yet in the context of provisional measures the ICJ normally does not have to concern itself with jurisdiction ratione personae, because almost all States are Party to the ICJ Statute.³⁷⁷

Generally speaking, however, the ICJ mainly deals with the question whether there is prima facie jurisdiction ratione materiae.

The power of the ICJ to indicate provisional measures is 'separate and independent from jurisdiction over the action in chief'.³⁷⁸ It must be seen independently from the jurisdiction on the ³⁷⁵ Chapter II of this book deals with the competence, procedure, promptness and transparency of the human rights adjudication, while Chapter XV deals with the relation between provisional measures and jurisdiction on the merits as well as admissibility.

³⁷⁶ Elkind points out that Article 35 of the ICJ Statute stipulates that 'the Court shall be open to States Parties to the present Statute'. It therefore deals with jurisdiction ratione personae. Read together with Article 94 of the UN Charter (providing that all members of the UN are ipso facto parties to the ICJ Statute) it identifies 'over whom the Court has inherent jurisdiction with regard to interim measures', Elkind (1981), p. 259 and p. 177. He further supports this approach by reference to domestic systems with some form of interim remedy, in which this remedy has been based on jurisdiction ratione personae, Elkind (1981), p. 177. He notes that the consent of a State to be brought before the ICJ is usually expressed through Article 36 of the Statute, which is primarily concerned with jurisdiction ratione materiae. He notes that interim protection is an urgent remedy and the Court 'cannot be bogged down by complicated questions of Article 36 jurisdiction at the interim protection stage', Elkind (1981), p. 259.

³⁷⁷ This was different in the Genocide Convention case: ICJ Application of the Convention on the prevention and punishment of the crime of genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)), Order of 8 April 1993. In this case the ICJ itself raised the question of jurisdiction. Thirlway (1994), p. 34 points out that the Court found it necessary to raise the issue ex officio, at the stage of provisional measures. The Respondent (the Republic of Yugoslavia) had chosen not to raise it, obviously because it in fact claimed to be a member of the UN, as successor of the 'old' Yugoslavia, and therefore claimed to be a party to the Statute. The ICJ repeated that there should be prima facie jurisdiction and added that this includes jurisdiction ratione personae as well as ratione materiae. Resolutions of the Security Council and the General Assembly had denied the continuity of Yugoslavia (the Respondent State) and pointed out that it should reapply for UN membership. The ICJ noted that it was not necessary, at the phase of provisional measures, to determine definitely whether the Respondent was still a party to the ICJ statute. It noted that the compromissory clause to a multilateral treaty, such as Article XI of the Genocide Convention could be regarded prima facie within its jurisdiction ratione personae. With regard to the Applicant State, Bosnia-Herzegovina, it equally concluded that Article XI appeared to afford a basis on which its jurisdiction might be founded, see Order of 8 April 1993, §19. It rejected another basis for jurisdiction relied on by Bosnia-Herzegovina, namely a treaty dating from 1919, because it appeared to be limited to the present territory of Yugoslavia. In other words, there was no jurisdiction ratione loci based on this treaty. Neither was there prima facie jurisdiction based on the doctrine of forum prorogatum. See further Merrills (1995), pp. 95-100. See also Elkind (1981) arguing that the only prerequisite for the use of provisional measures is jurisdiction ratione personae, while with regard to jurisdiction ratione materiae the Court should only satisfy itself that there is no manifest absence of jurisdiction, p. 177 and p. 192. Doubts on jurisdiction on the merits ratione temporis does not necessarily hinder the use of provisional measures as orders for such measures are 'oriented towards the present and the future', Wellens (1998), p. 435.

merits exactly because of the aim to ‘provide an expeditious remedy’ and, in the words of Merrills, it ‘is therefore well established that the Court can consider whether to order interim measures without first resolving contested issues of jurisdiction and, as a corollary, that such consideration in no way prejudices its later decision on jurisdictional questions’.³⁷⁹

In the 1930s Dumbauld pointed out that jurisdiction to grant protection pendente lite did not depend on jurisdiction in the main action. A Court could provide such a remedy in advance of determination about its jurisdiction.³⁸⁰ He noted that it was ‘sufficient that want of jurisdiction is not obvious prima facie’.³⁸¹ In other words, he argued that it is sufficient that there is no a priori lack of jurisdiction.³⁸²

It is important to examine the issue of jurisdiction on the merits at least to a certain extent. Eli Lauterpacht has observed that the ICJ could not ‘disregard altogether the question of its competence on the merits’ although it did not need to satisfy itself at that stage that it had such ³⁷⁸ Dumbauld (1932), p. 165. See e.g. ICJ Anglo-Iranian Oil Co. case Judgment on preliminary objections of 22 July 1952, pp. 102-103. The Court held that it was competent to indicate provisional measures if the dispute did not a priori fall ‘completely outside the scope of international jurisdiction’. Judges Badawi Pasha and Winiarski dissented. They considered that if ‘there is no jurisdiction on the merits, there can be no jurisdiction to indicate interim measures of protection’ (p. 97). They agreed, however, that the ICJ did not have to finally pronounce on the question of jurisdiction before indicating provisional measures, because requests for provisional measures ‘might well become pointless’ in such cases. Cheng (1953), p. 271 refers to the Czechoslovak-Hungarian Mixed Arbitral Tribunal’s statement that refusing provisional measures ‘for the sole reason that the jurisdiction of the Tribunal is challenged’ would ‘open a very simple way for any party wishing to avoid interim measures of protection being taken against him. The power of the Tribunal (...) would thus be rendered absolutely futile’. Sztucki (1983), p. 230 also quotes from (the French version) of this case: ‘Il suffit que son incompétence ne soit pas manifeste, évidente’. About the phrasing in the Anglo-Iranian case Cheng points out, at p. 272, that it would have been preferable if the Court would have said that the dispute could not a priori be excluded from its (rather than ‘international’) jurisdiction.

³⁷⁹ Merrills (1995), p. 91. See section 3.6 about the issue of prejudgment.

³⁸⁰ Dumbauld (1932), p. 165 and p. 186. In the 1920s the President of the PCIJ, who at the time had the power to indicate provisional measures, noted that the Court, in its final decision, would ‘either declare itself to have no jurisdiction or give judgment on the merits’: PCIJ Denunciation of the Treaty of 2 November 1865 between China and Belgium, Order of 8 January 1927. According to Cheng this means that ‘he was evidently of the opinion that he was competent to indicate such measures, even before the question of jurisdiction had been decided, but when prima facie the dispute came within, or at least did not fall outside the Court’s jurisdiction’. Cheng (1953), p. 272, also referring to PCIJ Administration of the Prince von Pless case, Order of 11 May 1933, A/B 54, p. 153 and Polish Agrarian Reform and the German minority case, 29 July 1933, A/B 58, p. 179.

³⁸¹ Dumbauld (1932), p. 165.

³⁸² According to Sztucki the Sino-Belgian case, the Polish Agrarians and the Pless cases do not mean that the Court has the power to order provisional measures unless there is a manifest lack of substantive jurisdiction. He argues that these cases have limited value as a precedent in the context of jurisdictional issues, Sztucki (1983), pp. 226-227. He points out that at the time (until 1936) preliminary objections were not filed immediately upon the notification of an application and the request for provisional measures, Sztucki (1983), pp. 222-223 and pp. 225-229. Moreover, he argues, the President in the Sino-Belgian case used provisional measures ‘on personal conviction that the application and request met very high jurisdictional requirements; but at the same time felt it necessary to reflect the fact that competence in the matters of interim protections and substantive jurisdiction was divided in that case, and that the latter question, if necessary, would be decided by the full Court unbound by the decision or conviction of its President’ (footnotes omitted), Sztucki (1983), pp. 226-227.

jurisdiction. As a reason for this he noted that ‘Governments ought not to be discouraged from undertaking, or continuing to undertake, the obligations of judicial settlement as the result of any justifiable apprehension that by accepting them they may become exposed to the embarrassment, vexation and loss, possibly following upon interim measures, in cases in which there is no reasonable possibility, prima facie ascertained by the Court, of jurisdiction on the merits’.³⁸³

Sztucki points out that there is always a risk that the ICJ, for jurisdictional reasons, will deny provisional measures that may otherwise be warranted, while it may eventually uphold jurisdiction. On the other hand, the ICJ may also renounce jurisdiction after having indicated provisional measures. In that case the Respondent would have been ‘called upon to submit to a restraint on his freedom of action in a matter on which the Court really has had nothing to say from the very beginning’.³⁸⁴ Yet Sztucki notes that indicating provisional measures before the final decision on jurisdiction is nevertheless appropriate because ‘requests for interim protection are regarded as a matter of urgency while jurisdictional questions are not’. Exactly because ‘the question of jurisdiction is so important in inter-State litigation and therefore requires a scrupulous ³⁸³ The claim, he considered, must be based on an instrument that prima facie confers jurisdiction upon the Court and that incorporates ‘no reservations obviously excluding its jurisdiction’. ICJ Interhandel case (Switzerland v. US), Order of 24 October 1957, Separate Opinion Lauterpacht, pp. 118-119. The ICJ had determined that the question of jurisdiction on the merits was to be dealt with in the phase of Preliminary Objections. While the majority did not consider the issue of jurisdiction to be an obstacle, the Court determined that there was no need for provisional measures. Four members (Judges Lauterpacht, Klaestad, Hackworth and Read) disagreed and considered that the ICJ had no jurisdiction to take provisional measures in this case. See also the Nuclear Test cases, Orders of 22 June 1973, Declaration of Judge Singh pointing out that there must be a ‘possible valid base for the Court’s competence’ and that the application must be ‘prima facie entertainable’. Even at the stage of prima facie examination the ICJ ‘has to examine the reservations and declarations’ referred to as the basis for the Court’s jurisdiction. As a result the ICJ could either find that ‘there is no possible base’ for the Court’s jurisdiction or ‘a possible base exists, but needs further investigation’. In the latter case ‘the Court is inevitably left no option but to proceed to the substance of the jurisdiction of the case to complete its process of adjudication which, in turn, is time-consuming and therefore comes into conflict with the urgency of the matter coupled with the prospect of irreparable damage to the rights of the parties. It is this situation which furnishes the “raison d’être” of interim relief’, Australia v. France, pp. 109-110 and New Zealand v. France, p. 146. In other words he argued that if there is no such prima facie jurisdiction provisional measures should not be taken. See also Merrills (1995), pp. 91-92 pointing out that ‘despite the incidental character of the proceedings, the consent of the respondent, and hence the question of substantive jurisdiction, cannot be entirely ignored’, exactly because of the ‘exacting consequences’ of provisional measures. After all, their aim is ‘to make States act, or more usually refrain from acting, in certain ways for a period of months, or possibly years, until the case is finally disposed of’. See further section 3.7 of this Chapter on the protective measures required.

³⁸⁴ Sztucki (1983), pp. 255-256. He points out that this was the case in the Anglo-Iranian Oil Co. case, Judgment of 22 July 1952, p. 114. He acknowledges that the ICJ ‘convalidated the indication of interim measures by stating in his judgment on jurisdiction that the order was lapsing ex nunc and not ex tunc’. He also refers to the Separate Opinion of Judge Fitzmaurice in the Northern Cameroons case regarding this situation, as Sztucki puts it, ‘as perfectly regular’. He confirms that this ‘may be so from the point of view of formal logic based on the general concept of incidental jurisdiction’ but from the point of view of common sense the situation is ‘highly undesirable’.

and time-consuming examination, the Court is compelled to be less scrupulous with respect to the determination of that very question when it considers requests for interim protection'.³⁸⁵

In the Anglo-Iranian Oil Co. (1951) case the ICJ granted provisional measures, but later decided it had no jurisdiction.³⁸⁶ According to Elkind, since then 'many judges and scholars have been timid about the Court's power to indicate interim measures without sufficient assurance that the Court actually has jurisdiction to hear the merits of the case'. He notes that 'no clear theory has emerged from either the Court or from scholars' as to the basis of the Court's jurisdiction to grant provisional measures under Article 41.³⁸⁷ Yet he considers that in conditions of urgency even the test of a prima facie chance of success on the merits is too strict. The better rule would be 'that the action must not be manifestly without merit'.³⁸⁸ In other words, he argues for 'a very light standard of proof as to jurisdiction under Article 36 at the interim protection phase'.³⁸⁹ With regard to this jurisdiction the Court should go no further than 'satisfy itself that the absence of jurisdiction under Article 36 is not manifest'.³⁹⁰

In the Nuclear Test cases (1973) the ICJ established the criterion that provisional measures may be used if there is no a priori lack of jurisdiction.³⁹¹ In the Fisheries Jurisdiction cases (1972) it pointed out that it need not finally satisfy itself that it had jurisdiction on the merits, but ought not to act 'if the absence on the jurisdiction of the merits is manifest'. It concluded by stating that it could take provisional measures as long as it 'could identify an instrument which appeared prima facie, to afford a possible basis on which the jurisdiction of the Court might be founded'.³⁹² This means that the possibility of such jurisdiction is sufficient.³⁹³ In the Hostages case (1979) the ICJ 'regarded the so-called 'positive' prima facie test as sufficient for the interim ³⁸⁵ Sztucki (1983), pp. 253-254. For a general discussion on the likelihood of jurisdiction on the merits and the use of provisional measures, see also Beirlaen (1978-1979), pp. 425-459.

³⁸⁶ ICJ Anglo-Iranian Oil Co. case, Order of 5 July 1951. See also Cheng (1953), p. 273 who notes that there are differences of opinion 'as to whether there must be a probability that the Court has jurisdiction or whether a mere possibility is sufficient'. "The reason why an international tribunal may exercise this power even when its jurisdiction as to the merits is yet uncertain must be sought in the fact that the duty of the parties to maintain the status quo already exists independently of any judicial intervention". At the other end of the spectrum it has sometimes been asserted that the Court must fully satisfy itself that it has jurisdiction. Elkind (1981), p. 179 mentions the approach of Judge Forster in the Nuclear Test cases (Australia v. France; New Zealand v. France), Orders of 22 June 1973. He also refers to the suggestion of Judge Gros that Article 53 ICJ Statute requires the Court to fully satisfy itself that it had jurisdiction when one of the parties failed to appear. Vice-President Singh and Judge Morosov accepted this approach in the Aegean Sea case, Order of 11 September 1976, p. 17 and p. 22. Elkind points out, however, that the Court unanimously applied the prima facie test in the Hostages case, despite the non-appearance of Iran before the Court. Judges Forster, Gros and Singh all took part in this decision.

³⁸⁷ Elkind (1981), p. 167.

³⁸⁸ Elkind (1981), p. 192. See also p. 259: "The best rule is that interlocutory injunctive relief will be granted unless the claim is frivolous or vexatious". At p. 182 he points out that prima facie is a slippery concept.

³⁸⁹ Elkind (1981), p. 207.

³⁹⁰ Elkind (1981), p. 259.

³⁹¹ ICJ Nuclear Test cases (Australia v. France; New Zealand v. France), 22 June 1973, §23. See further Cheng (1953), pp. 270-271.

³⁹² ICJ Fisheries Jurisdiction cases, Order of 22 June 1973, §17.

³⁹³ See Merrills (1995), p. 92, referring to the Nuclear Test cases and pointing out that more recent cases confirmed this. See pp. 92-100 for his discussion of the Nicaragua, Arbitral Award, Passage through the Great Belt and Genocide Convention cases. See also Collins (1992), pp. 220-222.

protection stage, namely that there must be an instrument in force between the parties conferring jurisdiction upon the Court without reservations concerning the question at issue'.³⁹⁴

In the Nicaragua case (1984) the ICJ pointed out that it had given the issue of jurisdiction over the merits of the case the 'fullest consideration compatible with the requirements of urgency'.³⁹⁵ In the Legality of the use of force cases (1999) the ICJ applied the stricter test of existing prima facie evidence rather than the more lenient test of absence of manifest lack of jurisdiction or of prima facie not to be excluded.³⁹⁶ Thirlway has noted that it is 'impossible to arrive at a water-tight definition' of the jurisdiction required and that the general trend seems to be towards a very low standard of proof.³⁹⁷ After all, extensive deliberations about the question

³⁹⁴ Oellers-Frahm (1981), p. 283. The ICJ found that the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations (1961) and the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations (1963), as well as Article I of the Optional Protocols to both treaties (on the compulsory settlement of disputes), furnished a basis on which the jurisdiction of the Court 'might be founded'. It pointed out that it was sufficient at this stage of the proceedings 'if the provisions invoked by the Applicant appear, prima facie, to afford a basis on which the jurisdiction of the Court might be founded'. ICJ United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran (US v. Iran), Order of 15 December 1979, §§14 and 15.

³⁹⁵ ICJ Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. US), Order of 10 May 1984, §§24 and 25 (while the ICJ unanimously decided it was competent to use provisional measures, while several members later questioned one of the grounds for jurisdiction. Judge Schwebel dissented regarding both grounds for jurisdiction). Again, in its decision whether or not to take provisional measures the ICJ merely examined whether it had prima facie jurisdiction on the merits. It need not finally satisfy itself that it has such jurisdiction, 'yet it ought not to indicate such measures unless the provisions invoked by the applicant appear, prima facie to afford a basis on which the jurisdiction of the Court might be founded'. See also Arbitral Award of 31 July 1989 (Guinea-Bissau v. Senegal), Order of 2 March 1990; Passage through the Great Belt (Finland v. Denmark), Order of 29 July 1991, §14; Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)), Order of 8 April 1993; Land and Maritime Boundary between Cameroon and Nigeria (Cameroon v. Nigeria), Order of 15 March 1996, §31 (In fact the declaration made by both Parties under Article 36(2) ICJ Statute, constituted 'a prima facie basis upon which its jurisdiction in the present case might be founded'; Nigeria had also argued that provisional measures should not be ordered because the case was inadmissible. The Court pointed out that while it did not rule on the question whether it should decide on prima facie admissibility before ordering provisional measures, it considered that the case did 'not appear prima facie to be inadmissible', §33); Certain criminal proceedings in France (Congo v. France), Order of 17 June 2003, §20; for older cases see Nuclear Test cases, Orders of 22 June 1973, §§13 and 17 and US Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran (US v. Iran) (Hostages case), Order of 15 December 1979, §§15, 18 and 20. In some of these cases the judgment on the merits also illustrates the approach of the members of the Court towards provisional measures. In the ICJ Anglo-Iranian Oil Co. case, Order of 5 July 1951 the ICJ ordered provisional measures while later it found it had no jurisdiction on the merits.

³⁹⁶ ICJ Legality of the use of force (Serbia and Montenegro v. Belgium and seven other States), Order of 2 July 1999. In this case Serbia had requested it to take provisional measures against the member States of NATO to halt military action in the Kosovo conflict. The ICJ considered that it manifestly lacked jurisdiction to take such measures because, among others, there was no prima facie evidence that Article IX of the Genocide Convention constituted a basis of jurisdiction. With regard to the cases against Spain and the US (the ninth and tenth cases submitted) it found a manifest absence of jurisdiction and these cases were removed from the General List (see §42 Yugoslavia v. Spain and §34 Yugoslavia v. US). The other eight cases remained on the Court's List of cases.

³⁹⁷ Thirlway (1994), p. 22.

whether an adjudicator has jurisdiction or competence to deal with a given case on the merits would conflict with the need for urgent action.³⁹⁸

In 1991 Judge Shahabuddeen pointed out, in reference to the ‘circumstances’ mentioned in Article 41 ICJ Statute, that the question of prima facie jurisdiction in fact does not relate to the power to order provisional measures, but rather ‘whether the case is a fit and proper one for exercising that power’.³⁹⁹ Commentators have equally noted that ‘one cannot treat the possible jurisdiction over the merits as a precondition to the indication of provisional measures without confusing the two sorts of jurisdiction’.⁴⁰⁰ Indeed, the question rather is whether it is appropriate for the ICJ to order provisional measures in light of the evidence of likelihood of substantive jurisdiction.

4.1 Decision-making on jurisdictional issues

Sztucki notes that the ICJ does not decide on provisional measures as a collective body. Rather, the judges decide individually. He refers to the 1978 Hague Academy course by Judge Jiménez de Aréchaga equally pointing out that each judge decides individually: ‘theories, attempting to determine the collective criteria followed on this matter, do not reflect accurately the reality nor the way the Court operates at this stage’. He notes that while the judges may discuss the question together, a ‘formal and collective decision on the jurisdictional issue is not possible’. Judges will vote for or against provisional measures taking into account the views they have formed individually on the issue of jurisdiction. They may later change their minds in the light of further pleadings. The Court will grant provisional measures only if ‘a majority of judges believes at the time that there will be jurisdiction over the merits’.⁴⁰¹

4.2 Removing cases from the Court’s List (docket) to discourage requests for provisional measures

The question has arisen whether cases in which provisional measures were denied should be removed from the List only for manifest or also for prima facie lack of jurisdiction. In Congo v. Rwanda (2002) the ICJ did not grant Congo’s request for provisional measures finding it lacked ³⁹⁸ See also section 2.

³⁹⁹ Separate opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen in Passage through the Great Belt case (Finland v. Denmark), Order of 29 July 1991.

⁴⁰⁰ Thirlway, among others, has referred to the Court’s ‘distinct statutory jurisdiction’ under Article 41 to use provisional measures, Thirlway (1994), p. 22. Only incidentally it has been argued that jurisdiction on the merits is a prerequisite for the use of provisional measures and that the Court cannot take provisional measures before jurisdiction is established. See e.g. Judge Morozov in the Aegean Sea case (Greece v. Turkey), Order of 11 September 1976, disagreeing with the argument ‘that the Court allegedly has a right to consider the request for the indication of interim measures of protection before it has considered and settled the question of its jurisdiction’, p. 21 and considering that ‘neither the Statute nor the Rules of Court contain any provisions which provide that the request for interim measures for protection has any priority over the question of jurisdiction’, p. 22. Sztucki (1983), p. 152 points out that four years previously, in the Fisheries Jurisdiction cases (UK v. Iceland; Germany v. Iceland), Order of 17 August 1972, Morozov had voted in favour of the indication of provisional measures before the Court had ‘settled’ the question of its jurisdiction.

⁴⁰¹ Sztucki (1983), p. 257 quoting Jiménez de Aréchaga, ‘International Law in the Past Third of a Century’, 159 RCADI 161(1978).

prima facie jurisdiction.⁴⁰² Judge Dugard, who had voted with the majority, considered that the Court should have removed the case from the List, as requested by Rwanda.⁴⁰³ He referred to the Court's judgment in LaGrand, finding that its Orders for provisional measures are binding upon States. He pointed out: "As a consequence of this decision, provisional measures will assume a greater importance than before and there will be a greater incentive on the part of States to request such measures". "In these circumstances," he argued, the case should have been removed from the List for manifest lack of jurisdiction. Dugard referred to the Separate Opinion of Judge Higgins in Yugoslavia v. Belgium (1999) explaining cases manifestly lacking jurisdiction as cases in which 'it is clear beyond doubt that no jurisdiction exists in a particular case'. In such situation 'a good administration of justice requires that the case be immediately struck off the List'.⁴⁰⁴ Considering that the Court, by failing to find manifest lack of jurisdiction, set a dangerous precedent that could result in the Court being 'inundated with requests for provisional measures',⁴⁰⁵ he noted that the applicant State was 'clutching at straws to found jurisdiction'. "It has clutched at eight straws in the hope that their cumulative effect might compensate for the failure of each one individually to offer a basis for jurisdiction. The Court should show its displeasure for this strategy by striking the Application from the list".⁴⁰⁶ Yet this approach to jurisdiction appears overly strict. Rather the ICJ should seriously consider all possible grounds for jurisdiction, especially in cases of grave human suffering. In any case, even when it denies a request for provisional measures it should not declare a case manifestly lacking jurisdiction and remove it from the List if there are serious jurisdictional issues remaining to be discussed. The aim of discouraging States from submitting requests for provisional measures should not interfere with the Court's task in this respect. In Congo v. Rwanda there seem to have been at least two such jurisdictional issues, one based on the Genocide Convention and the other based on the Convention on the Elimination of ⁴⁰² ICJ Congo v. Rwanda, Order of 10 July 2002. Judge Elaraby dissented, considering that the progressive shift that the Court had made in its approach to jurisdiction had not been reflected in the Order. Judge Mavungu also dissented.

⁴⁰³ ICJ Congo v. Rwanda, Order of 10 July 2002 (Dugard dissenting).

⁴⁰⁴ ICJ Congo v. Rwanda, Order of 10 July 2002, Separate Opinion of Judge Dugard, §5, referring to Legality of Use of Force (Yugoslavia v. Belgium), Order of 2 June 1999, Separate Opinion of Judge Higgins, §29. Dugard suggested that the case 'should be removed from the List where there is no reasonable possibility, based on the facts and circumstances of the unsuccessful Application, that the Applicant will at some future date be able to establish the jurisdiction of the Court on the instruments invoked for jurisdiction in the Application for provisional measures'.

⁴⁰⁵ In his view, six of the instruments relied on by the Congo manifestly did 'not provide the remotest basis for jurisdiction'. Regarding the first remaining 'possible ground', the Montreal Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Civil Aviation, he pointed out that the 'accumulation of objections to the establishment of jurisdiction' indicated that it 'manifestly' did not constitute a basis for jurisdiction. He also referred to other factors demonstrating that there was 'no real possibility' that a reasonable connection between the dispute submitted to the Court and Article 14 of the Montreal Convention could be established at subsequent stages of the proceedings', ICJ Congo v. Rwanda, Order of 10 July 2002, Separate Opinion of Judge Dugard, §10. Regarding the second 'possible ground' he questioned whether the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women was an appropriate instrument for the protection of women in armed conflict and noted that it imposed no effective procedures for its enforcement, §11. He referred to the never used Article 11 CERD as an example of such an effective procedure. He considered that 'none of the eight instruments advanced by the Applicant to found jurisdiction in the present proceedings, viewed separately, offers, prima facie, a basis for jurisdiction in the present dispute, either now or in future'. He concluded that '(t)he absence of jurisdiction is therefore manifest' and that '(t)his conclusion is even stronger if one views the eight instruments cumulatively'.

⁴⁰⁶ ICJ Congo v. Rwanda, Order of 10 July 2002, Separate Opinion of Judge Dugard, §12.

Discrimination against Women (CEDAW).⁴⁰⁷ The next heading discusses the validity of the reservations to Article IX Genocide Convention (the jurisdictional clause) made by Rwanda.⁴⁰⁸ The subsequent heading refers to the possible jurisdictional basis of CEDAW.

4.3 The development of international law and Article IX Genocide Convention as a jurisdictional basis for provisional measures

Subsequent to the denial of the request for provisional measures in Congo v. Rwanda (2002) the Court rendered a judgment on jurisdiction and admissibility in this case. The Dissenting Opinion of Judge Koroma and the joint Separate Opinion of Judges Higgins, Kooijmans, Elaraby, Owada and Simma confirmed that absence of jurisdiction under the Genocide Convention was not manifest. The Separate Opinion argued against a 'laissez faire' interpretation of the ICJ's 1951 Advisory Opinion on reservations to the Genocide Convention. Instead this 1951 Opinion should be read in its particular context, without being allowed to freeze the development of international law.⁴⁰⁹ At the time, the Court 'had no occasion to address the application of the law of treaties to issues of severability in the context of reservations to human rights treaties'.⁴¹⁰ Moreover, the Court's present judgment, in Congo v. Rwanda (2006), should not be understood to suggest that a reservation to a jurisdictional clause will always be compatible with the object and purpose of a Convention.⁴¹¹

"It is thus not self-evident that a reservation to Article IX could not be regarded as incompatible with the object and purpose of the Convention and we believe that this is a matter that the Court should revisit for further consideration".⁴¹²

⁴⁰⁷ ICJ Congo v. Rwanda, Order of 10 July 2002 and Judgment of 3 February 2006. See also Kritsiotis (2001); Savadogo (2002); Tatulli (2003) and Mampuya (2004).

⁴⁰⁸ See also Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction and admissibility).

⁴⁰⁹ They pointed out that the 1951 Opinion must be understood against the background of the specific questions put to it by the General Assembly and that the problems that it 'could already envisage in 1951 have turned out to be vastly greater than it could have foreseen'. They also noted that the vast majority of States have failed to engage in the task of scrutinizing and objecting to reservations, often giving rise to 'serious concern as to compatibility with the object and purpose of the treaty concerned'. ICJ Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (new application: 2002) (Congo v. Rwanda), Judgment on jurisdiction of the Court and admissibility of the application of 3 February 2006, Separate Opinion Judges Higgins, Kooijmans, Elaraby, Owada and Simma, §§10-11. "The Court itself was not in 1951 asked to pronounce on the compatibility of particular reservations to the Genocide Convention with its object and purpose (...) Since 1951 many other issues relating to reservations have emerged, that equally were not and could not have been before the Court at that time". They mentioned two related questions, one regarding the role of UN bodies monitoring human rights treaties in the assessment of the compatibility with object and purpose and the other concerning the scope and powers of regional human rights courts, §12. See also Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction, admissibility and provisional measures in human rights adjudication).

⁴¹⁰ Separate Opinion Judges Higgins, Kooijmans, Elaraby, Owada and Simma, §12.

⁴¹¹ Neither should the Court's previous Order denying Congo's request for provisional measures. They also explained that the ICJ did not pronounce on the issue in Yugoslavia v. US, since Yugoslavia had not introduced any arguments to this effect, Separate Opinion Judges Higgins, Kooijmans, Elaraby, Owada and Simma, §18.

⁴¹² Judges Higgins, Kooijmans, Elaraby, Owada and Simma suggested some of the considerations the Court had in mind 'in its findings thus far, that a reservation to Article IX is not incompatible with the objects and purposes of the Convention'. Yet they pointed out that the ICJ has an

The joint Separate Opinion referred to the ensuing evolution of international law, emphasizing that to observe the reality that the Court did not settle all matters relating to reservations in its 1951 Advisory Opinion ‘is not to attempt to fragment a mythical overarching law on all questions of reservations’. After all the 1951 opinion just ‘set out the law as to what it was asked, and no more, and did not foreclose legal developments in respect of hitherto uncharted waters in the future’.⁴¹³

Human rights courts and tribunals had ‘not regarded themselves as precluded by this Court’s 1951 Advisory Opinion from doing other than nothing’. This development did not constitute a ‘deviation’ from general international law by ‘these various courts and tribunals’.⁴¹⁴ ‘Rather, it is to be regarded as developing the law to meet contemporary realities’. The specific findings of the Court in 1951 did not prohibit this. “Indeed, it is clear that the practice of the International Court itself reflects this trend for tribunals and courts themselves to pronounce on compatibility with object and purpose, when the need arises”.⁴¹⁵

In his Dissent Judge Koroma argued that the reservation to Article IX of the Genocide Convention was indeed invalid. He considered that it is contrary to the object and purpose of the treaty to make reservations to a provision on dispute settlement, if that provision is the raison d’être of the treaty.⁴¹⁶ He pointed out that ‘States are often remiss in fulfilling their duties of objecting to reservations which they consider invalid’. “Moreover, the failure of a State to object should not be regarded as determinative in the context of human rights treaties like the Genocide Convention that are not based on reciprocity between States but instead serve to protect individuals and the international community at large”.⁴¹⁷ He referred to the General Comment on reservations by the Human Rights Committee interpreting the ICCPR, which was equally relevant for the interpretation of the Genocide Convention. Congo’s failure to object to Rwanda’s reservation at the time it was made had ‘no bearing on the Court’s ability to consider it’.⁴¹⁸ Judge Koroma also emphasized that Rwanda, from a moral perspective, should have consented to the Court’s jurisdiction.⁴¹⁹

Despite the unimpressive practice of objecting to reservations contrary to the object and purpose of human rights treaties, various States have indeed objected against the reservations made by certain States to Article IX Genocide Convention.⁴²⁰ The UK, for instance, has ‘consistently stated’ that it is ‘unable to accept reservations in respect of article IX of the said Convention’; it ‘is not the kind of reservation which intending parties to the Convention have the right to make’. It also specifically pointed this out vis-à-vis Rwanda, emphasizing that it does not important role to play under the Genocide Convention and that Article IX of the Convention not only speaks of disputes regarding its interpretation and application, but also regarding the ‘fulfilment of the Convention’, Joint Separate Opinion, §§26-29.

⁴¹³ ICJ Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (new application: 2002) (Congo v. Rwanda), Judgment on jurisdiction of the Court and admissibility of the application of 3 February 2006, Separate Opinion Judges Higgins, Kooijmans, Elaraby, Owada and Simma, §13.

⁴¹⁴ Id., Separate Opinion Judges Higgins, Kooijmans, Elaraby, Owada and Simma, §22.

⁴¹⁵ Id., Separate Opinion Judges Higgins, Kooijmans, Elaraby, Owada and Simma, §23.

⁴¹⁶ Id., Dissenting Opinion Judge Koroma, §11, referring to ILC Report A/CN.4/558/Add.2, §3.1.13, 14 June 2005.

⁴¹⁷ Id., Dissenting Opinion Judge Koroma, §14.

⁴¹⁸ Id., §15.

⁴¹⁹ Id., §§24-25.

⁴²⁰ Article IX stipulates: “Disputes between the Contracting Parties relating to the interpretation, application or fulfillment of the present Convention, including those relating to the responsibility of a State for genocide or for any of the other acts enumerated in article III, shall be submitted to the International Court of Justice at the request of any of the parties to the dispute”.

accept the reservation.⁴²¹ The Netherlands went a step further. When it declared the reservations made by a range of States to Article IX incompatible with the object and purpose of the Convention, it explicitly stated, also referring to Rwanda, that it did ‘not deem any State which has made or which will make such reservation a party to the Convention’.⁴²²

4.4 Armed conflict and CEDAW as a jurisdictional basis for provisional measures

The jurisdictional ground of Article 29 Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), invoked in Congo v. Rwanda (2002), did have some merit.⁴²³ Indeed, the ICJ did not completely dismiss it in its Order for provisional measures. After all it did not remove the case from the List. It simply stated that ‘at this stage in the proceedings the Congo has not shown that its attempts to enter into negotiations or undertake arbitration proceedings with Rwanda’ concerned the application of Article 29 CEDAW and the Congo had not specified either ‘which rights protected by that Convention have allegedly been violated by Rwanda and should be the object of provisional measures’.⁴²⁴ The latter argument, on the specification of the relevant treaty provisions, has rightly been criticized by Judge Higgins. Especially in situations involving human beings in conditions of hardship, it is for the Court to specify these rights.⁴²⁵ She noted that it is well-established in the case law of international human rights adjudicators that it is not necessary for a petitioner ‘to identify which specific provisions of the treaty said to found jurisdiction are alleged to be breached’. She considered that ‘a fortiori’ there was ‘no reason’ for the ICJ ‘to suggest a more stringent test’ for establishing whether it had prima facie jurisdiction for the use of provisional measures. It is not clear why there was no reason ‘a fortiori’. Nevertheless, Higgins correctly invokes the practice of the human rights adjudicators and indeed there appears to be no reason for the ICJ to take a different approach. As Higgins pointed out:

“It should rather be for the Court itself, in accordance with the usual practice, to see whether the claims made by the Congo and the facts alleged could prima facie constitute violations of any particular clause in the Conventions on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, the instrument relied on by the Congo as providing the Court with jurisdiction over the merits”.⁴²⁶

⁴²¹ Objections of 26 August 1983. See also Mexico’s objection of 4 June 1990 pointing out that ‘the reservation made by the United States Government to article IX of the aforesaid Convention should be considered invalid because it is not in keeping with the object and purpose of the Convention, nor with the principle governing the interpretation of treaties whereby no State can invoke provisions of its domestic law as a reason for not complying with a treaty’. Moreover, application of the reservation ‘would give rise to a situation of uncertainty as to the scope of the obligations which the United States Government would assume with respect to the Convention’.

⁴²² Declaration made upon accession to the Convention, 20 June 1966; Objections of 27 December 1989 to the reservations of the US.

⁴²³ Article 29 CEDAW stipulates: “Any dispute between two or more States concerning the interpretation or application of the present Convention which is not settled by negotiation shall, at the request of one of them, be submitted to arbitration. If within six months from the date of request for arbitration the parties are unable to agree on the organization of the arbitration, any one of those parties may refer the dispute to the International Court of Justice by request in conformity with the Statute of the Court”.

⁴²⁴ ICJ Congo v. Rwanda, Order of 10 July 2002, §79.

⁴²⁵ ICJ Congo v. Rwanda, Order of 10 July 2002, Declaration of Judge Higgins.

⁴²⁶ Ibid.

While CEDAW may not be the most appropriate instrument for the protection of women in armed conflict, this does not mean it cannot create a jurisdictional basis. It is true that the most effective procedures for the enforcement of this Convention are found in its recent Optional Protocol, which has not yet been ratified by Congo and Rwanda. Yet the supervisory committee to this treaty has also dealt with the issue of violence against women in its Concluding Observations and in a General Recommendation, interpreting the State obligations under the Convention to prevent violence against women.⁴²⁷ The newly developed practice under its Optional Protocol has only confirmed this.⁴²⁸

What made Congo's argument based on CEDAW less convincing was the apparent lack of attempts by it to submit for arbitration a dispute with Rwanda regarding the application of CEDAW before bringing it before the ICJ. Yet at the provisional measures stage doubts regarding the existence of these attempts should not as such mean that Article 29 CEDAW manifestly does not constitute a basis for the Court's jurisdiction.⁴²⁹ Moreover, as Judge Kooijmans pointed out, the position of the Court that Congo should have explicitly referred to CEDAW in its attempts to settle the dispute by negotiation is unrealistic, 'in particular in the case of a multifaceted conflict like the present one'.⁴³⁰ He referred to a complaint brought by Congo before the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights (ACHPR), as well as to many complaints brought before the UN Security Council.⁴³¹

"In view of the character and mandate of the international institutions to which these grievances were addressed, the complaints could not be expected to itemize on a treaty-by-treaty basis the provisions allegedly breached".⁴³²

The ICJ had no choice, he noted, 'but to ascertain whether a precondition, explicitly laid down by the Contracting States, is met and to decline jurisdiction if it is not'. Nevertheless, the Women's Convention did not 'set out any specific criteria for the element of "not settled by negotiation"'.⁴³³ This meant that the Court would have had 'sufficient room' to interpret this element less rigidly.⁴³⁴

In other words, prima facie CEDAW could serve as a jurisdictional basis, which could even have justified the use of provisional measures. In any case, the ICJ only removes a case from the List in exceptional cases.⁴³⁵

⁴²⁷ It has also published statements regarding the rights of women in, for instance, Iraq and Afghanistan.

⁴²⁸ CEDAW has made a public inquiry and published a report involving violence against women in Mexico, among others discussing murders and disappearances (CEDAW/C/2005/OP.8/MEXICO). It also published a decision on an individual complaint regarding domestic violence: A.T. v. Hungary, 26 January 2005. See further Chapter II (Systems) and IX (Threats).

⁴²⁹ ICJ Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (new application: 2002) (Congo v. Rwanda), Judgment on jurisdiction of the Court and admissibility of the application of 3 February 2006, §91 points out that the evidence had not satisfied the Court that the Congo had 'in fact sought to commence negotiations in respect of the interpretation or application of the Convention'.

⁴³⁰ ICJ Certain criminal proceedings in France (Congo v. France), 17 June 2003, Declaration of Judge Kooijmans, §7.

⁴³¹ Id., §5.

⁴³² Id., §7.

⁴³³ Id., §15.

⁴³⁴ Id., §15. For a different approach see the Separate Opinion of Judge Dugard, §18.

⁴³⁵ See also Rosenne (2005), pp. 132-134.

4.5 Provisional measures and forum prorogatum

In the case concerning Certain criminal proceedings in France (2003) Congo ‘proposed to found the jurisdiction of the Court upon on a consent thereto yet to be given by France’, under Article 38(5) Rules of Court. Subsequently France indeed explicitly consented to the jurisdiction of the Court in this case.⁴³⁶ With regard to the request for provisional measures the ICJ in this case initially followed a different procedure exactly because there was no evidence yet of consent to the Court’s jurisdiction. The application was simply sent to France and both States were informed that the case would not be entered in the General List and no action would be taken in the proceedings until the ICJ was informed of the consent of France. Upon receipt of this consent, four months later, the case was entered in the General List and hearings were fixed for that same month. Subsequently the ICJ decided not to indicate provisional measures.⁴³⁷

4.6 ITLOS and prima facie jurisdiction

Under Article 290 UNCLOS the adjudicator deciding on provisional measures should first determine that the adjudicator deciding on the merits ‘has or would have prima facie jurisdiction’.⁴³⁸ According to Judge Laing ‘the juridical understanding of “prima facie” is that at first sight or impression (on its face), the evidence adduced by the Applicant sufficiently establishes the Tribunal’s jurisdiction’. He adds that ‘a prima facie finding has no bearing whatsoever on the Tribunal’s final determinations at the merits stage’.⁴³⁹

A dispute on the admissibility of the claim in the MOX Plant case illustrates some difficulties that could arise if different adjudicators may deal with a case.⁴⁴⁰ The UK had argued that the matters of which Ireland complained ‘were governed by regional agreements providing for alternative and binding means of resolving disputes’.⁴⁴¹ ITLOS, however, considered that the dispute settlement procedures under those treaties dealt with ‘disputes concerning the ⁴³⁶ ICJ Certain criminal proceedings in France (Congo v. France), Order of 17 June 2003, §21. See also Rosenne (2005), p. 151.

⁴³⁷ ICJ Certain criminal proceedings in France (Congo v. France), Order of 17 June 2003, §§5-7. See Rule 38(5) stipulating “When the applicant State proposes to found the jurisdiction of the Court upon a consent thereto yet to be given or manifested by the State against which such application is made, the application shall be transmitted to that State. It shall not however be entered in the General List, nor any action be taken in the proceedings, unless and until the State against which such application is made consents to the Court’s jurisdiction for the purposes of the case”. See also Sztucki (1983), p. 221 and Rosenne (2005), p. 120. France also consented to the Court’s jurisdiction in Djibouti v. France, ICJ press release 10 August 2006, but there was no request for provisional measures, probably because the ICJ had previously denied such requests (Congo v. France, Order of 17 June 2003; Congo v. Belgium, Order of 8 December 2000).

⁴³⁸ In its first Order for provisional measures, in M/V ‘Saiga’ (No. 2) of 11 March 1998 ITLOS adopted the formulation of the ICJ that it need not finally satisfy itself that it has jurisdiction on the merits ‘and yet it may not prescribe such measures unless the provisions invoked by the Applicant appear prima facie to afford the basis on which the jurisdiction of the Tribunal might be founded’ (§29). Judge Laing points out that ITLOS could simply have quoted Article 290(1) UNCLOS, Separate Opinion Judge Laing, §10.

⁴³⁹ ITLOS M/V ‘Saiga’ (No. 2), Order of 11 March 1998, Separate Opinion Judge Laing, §10.

⁴⁴⁰ In 1983 Sztucki, p. 222 still noted that ‘the concept of parallel jurisdictions in the same case’ appeared to be ‘rather remote from international realities’.

⁴⁴¹ It argued that Ireland could not bring the case before the ‘Annex VII arbitral tribunal’, constituted pursuant to Article 287 and Article 1 Annex VII UNCLOS. It referred to the Convention for the Protection of the Marine Environment of the North-East Atlantic (the OSPAR Convention) and the EC and Euratom Treaty.

interpretation or application of those agreements, and not with disputes arising under the Convention'.⁴⁴² ITLOS first satisfied itself that prima facie the Annex VII arbitral tribunal would have jurisdiction.⁴⁴³ It then considered whether provisional measures were required pending the constitution of this tribunal.⁴⁴⁴ Subsequently the Arbitral Tribunal agreed with the finding by ITLOS that it had jurisdiction prima facie. It noted that both States were Parties to UNCLOS, that the Tribunal had been duly constituted, that Ireland had presented its case on the basis of various provisions of the Convention, that the dispute concerned the interpretation and application of this Convention and that there was 'nothing which manifestly and in terms excludes the Tribunal's jurisdiction'. Nevertheless it decided to suspend further proceedings on jurisdiction and merits in light of certain areas of European Community law 'as they appear to affect the dispute between the Parties before this Tribunal'. It noted that these had become more acute because the European Commission was examining the question whether to institute proceedings under Article 226 of the EC Treaty.⁴⁴⁵ The Tribunal suspended the proceedings 'bearing in mind considerations of mutual ⁴⁴² It considered that 'even if the OSPAR Convention, the EC Treaty and the Euratom Treaty contain rights or obligations similar to or identical with the rights or obligations set out in the Convention, the rights and obligations under those agreements have a separate existence from those under the Convention'. ITLOS MOX plant case (Ireland v. UK), Order of 3 December 2001, §§49 and 50.

⁴⁴³ ITLOS MOX plant case (Ireland v. UK), Order of 3 December 2001, §§61-62. ITLOS does this on the basis of Article 290(5) of UNCLOS, stipulating that it may prescribe, modify or revoke provisional measures 'if it considers that prima facie the tribunal which is to be constituted would have jurisdiction'. Given the fact that this function is specifically laid down by treaty and as long as ITLOS does not presume to determine anything more than the prima facie jurisdiction of such an arbitral tribunal, it does not violate the principle of compétence de la compétence. See Dumbauld (1932), p. 186 about a related situation, pointing out that because the power of the PCIJ to order provisional measures did not depend upon jurisdiction 'in the principal action', 'one court may provide a remedy pendente lite in aid of an action of which another court has cognizance'. This would be so in order to prevent a denial of justice in a case in which the other tribunal (with the jurisdiction on the merits) had no jurisdiction to grant provisional measures, provided that the parties were also bound by the obligatory jurisdiction of the PCIJ. An exception would apply if 'an inconsistent intention on the part of the parties was manifested', pp. 155-156. In the MOX Plant case the other Tribunal did not lack jurisdiction to use provisional measures, but had not yet been constituted, which made ITLOS the only tribunal to prevent the denial of justice referred to by Dumbauld.

⁴⁴⁴ It did not prescribe the provisional measures requested by Ireland, because it considered that in the short period before the constitution of the arbitral tribunal the urgency of the situation did not require these measures. Yet it did prescribe provisional measures of different nature. It referred to the duty to cooperate as a fundamental principle in the prevention of pollution of the marine environment under both the Convention and general international law. Under Article 290 UNCLOS it was appropriate to preserve the rights arising from this duty. Thus ITLOS ordered the cooperation of the Parties, which were to enter into consultation at once and to exchange information, monitor risks and devise preventive measures. ITLOS MOX Plant case (Ireland v. UK), Order of 3 December 2001. See in particular §§81, 82 and 89. See also section 3.7 on protection.

⁴⁴⁵ "In these circumstances there is a real possibility that the European Court of Justice may be seized of the question whether the provisions of the Convention on which Ireland relies are matters in relation to which competence has been transferred to the European Community and, indeed, whether the exclusive jurisdiction of the European Court of Justice, with regard to Ireland and the United Kingdom as Member States of the European Community, extends to the interpretation and application of the Convention as such and in its entirety". Arbitral Tribunal constituted pursuant to Article 287, and Article 1 of Annex VII, of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea for the dispute concerning the MOX Plant, international respect and comity which should prevail between judicial institutions both of which may be called upon to determine rights and obligations as between two States'.⁴⁴⁶

4.7 The duration of provisional measures

Provisional measures end with the final decision of the Court. The ICJ has determined that an Order for provisional measures may not continue following the adjudicator's decision that it has no jurisdiction.⁴⁴⁷ Moreover, proceedings for interpretation and revision of judgments by the ICJ are technically regarded as a new case.⁴⁴⁸

In his Separate Opinion in the Tuna cases ITLOS Judge Treves pointed out that Article 290(1) UNCLOS stipulates that provisional measures are meant to apply 'pending the final decision'. He considered that 'this expression should be read as meaning up to the moment in which a judgment on the merits has been rendered'. He noted that in case of measures requested under Article 290(5) UNCLOS, providing for the possibility that ITLOS prescribes provisional measures pending the institution of an arbitral tribunal for the resolution of a conflict between States, the provisional measures could apply until 'the judgment on the merits by the arbitral tribunal'. Of course the competent adjudicator⁴⁴⁹ may decide to revoke or modify the measures before the final decision on the merits.⁴⁵⁰ movement of radioactive materials, and the protection of the marine environment of the Irish Sea, The MOX Plant case (Ireland v. UK), Order No. 3, suspension of proceedings on jurisdiction and merits and request for further provisional measures, 24 June 2003, §21.

⁴⁴⁶ It observed that both the decisions of the ECJ and its own decision under the Convention would be final and binding. Arbitral Tribunal constituted pursuant to Article 287, and Article 1 of Annex VII, of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea for the dispute concerning the MOX Plant, international movement of radioactive materials, and the protection of the marine environment of the Irish Sea, The MOX Plant case (Ireland v. UK), Order No. 3, suspension of proceedings on jurisdiction and merits and request for further provisional measures, 24 June 2003, §§27 and 28. ITLOS Judge Treves had already referred to considerations of comity and 'economy of legal activity' in his Separate Opinion in the MOX Plant case, Order of 3 December 2001, Separate Opinion Judge Treves, §5. See further on the MOX Plant case Forster (2003) and Lavranos (2006). More generally see Treves (1999).

⁴⁴⁷ The ICJ has decided that its provisional measures lapse once it determines it has no jurisdiction, Anglo-Iranian Oil Co. case, Judgment of 22 July 1952. See generally on the duration of provisional measures Rosenne (2005), pp. 149-158.

⁴⁴⁸ Rosenne (2005), pp. 149-150. For an example see ICJ Request for interpretation of the judgment of 31 March 2004 in the case concerning Avena and other Mexican nationals (Mexico v. US), Order of 16 July 2008.

⁴⁴⁹ Under 290(1) or 290(5) UNCLOS.

⁴⁵⁰ Separate Opinion of Judge Treves, ITLOS Southern Bluefin Tuna cases, Order of 27 August 1999. The issue of duration is also relevant in the context of the related precautionary principle. The SPS Agreement provides in Article 5(7) that review of measures taken on the basis of precautionary principle shall take place 'within a reasonable period of time'. The European Commission, in its communication on the precautionary principle, has stressed that the temporary measures taken when scientific data are inadequate are provisional but that 'the provisional nature is not bound up with a time limit but with the development of scientific knowledge'. Commission of the European Communities, Communication from the Commission on the precautionary principle, 2 February 2000, COM (2000) 1, pp. 12 and 21. It notes on p. 28 that the WTO Appellate Body pointed out in the Hormones case that what constitutes 'a reasonable period of time' to review a precautionary measure was 'to be established on a case-by-case basis and depends on the specific circumstances of each case, including the difficulty of obtaining the

The Annex VII Arbitral Tribunal instituted under UNCLOS has pointed out that the Parties to the conflict before it must still respect the effects of the Orders of ITLOS prescribing provisional measures and ‘their own decisions made in conformity with it’ even after such Orders have been revoked. It noted that its Orders and the subsequent developments have had an impact on the perspectives and actions of the Parties.⁴⁵¹ Rosenne suggests, correctly, that ‘[t]here is no reason why this notion should not be given a wider application, in that way making the provisional measures proceedings an important element in the general procedures available to States for the pacific settlement of their international disputes.’⁴⁵²

5 ASSESSMENT OF URGENCY

5.1 Introduction

Provisional measures show that adjudicators believe the matter to be so urgent that measures should be taken, although they have not yet been able to evaluate all the evidence and arguments. For provisional measures an exhaustive and definitive examination of the evidence is not necessary. Waiting too long before taking them defeats their purpose. Still, how are the interests of urgency, on one hand, and reliability of information, on the other, balanced off against each other? In deciding whether or not to indicate provisional measures, a balance must be struck between the two.

This section sets out discussing the practice of the ICJ involving Parties that are more or less equal, at least in comparison to the situation of an individual requesting provisional measures against a State. Before the ICJ States may make requests for the use of provisional measures ‘at any time during the course of the proceedings’ (Article 73(1) Rules of Court). Obviously, if they request provisional measures later in the proceedings rather than at the initial stages, the States in question must equally show that the case is urgent. If a request has previously been denied, they must also show that the renewed request is based on ‘new facts’ (Article 75(3) Rules of Court).

In 1991 the ICJ noted that provisional measures are only justified if there is urgency ‘in the sense that action prejudicial to the rights of either party is likely to be taken before such final decision is given’.⁴⁵³ This brief description could refer to two types of urgency: material and temporal. The term ‘likely’ obviously refers to material urgency, but could also refer to the immediacy of the risk. The phrase ‘before such final decision is given’ relates to the initially indeterminate duration of provisional measures, in the sense that it is not clear when the final decision will be given.

This book distinguishes between criteria for assessment of temporal and material urgency.⁴⁵⁴ The first relates to the immediacy of risk and is discussed in section 5.2. The additional information necessary for the review and the characteristics of the provisional SPS measure’.

⁴⁵¹ Annex VII Arbitral Tribunal Southern Bluefin Tuna case, Award on Jurisdiction and Admissibility of 4 August 2000, §67, referring to ITLOS Southern Bluefin Tuna cases (New Zealand v. Japan; Australia v. Japan), Order of 27 August 1999.

⁴⁵² Rosenne (2005), pp. 157-158.

⁴⁵³ ICJ Passage through the Great Belt (Finland v. Denmark), 22 July 1991, §23.

⁴⁵⁴ The term temporal urgency or urgency in the temporal sense is taken from Judge Treves (ITLOS) who distinguishes between the ‘temporal dimension of the requirement of urgency’ and the ‘qualitative dimension’. See his Separate Opinion in the Southern Bluefin Tuna cases, Order of 27 August 1999. See further Rosenne (2005), pp. 135-148, esp. p. 136.

discussion of assessment of material urgency also includes the relationship with the preventive and precautionary principles.

5.2 Assessment of temporal urgency

In the Interhandel case (1957) the ICJ found there was no need to use provisional measures, relying upon a statement by the respondent State, made during the hearings on provisional measures, that it was not taking action at that time.⁴⁵⁵ Equally, in another case, upon the Applicant State's request to postpone further consideration of its earlier request for provisional measures, the ICJ considered that there was no urgency anymore.⁴⁵⁶

In the Passage through the Great Belt case (1991) the ICJ noted provisional measures are 'only justified if there is urgency in the sense that action prejudicial to the rights of either party is likely to be taken before such final decision is given'.⁴⁵⁷ Finland had objected to the construction of a bridge that could obstruct passage through the Great Belt, but the ICJ did not take the provisional measures requested. Instead it 'placed on record' Denmark's assurance that before the end of 1994 it would not cause physical obstruction of the East Channel. This meant that although Finland could not convince the ICJ to take provisional measures it did obtain 'a significant benefit from its request'.⁴⁵⁸ Moreover, the ICJ itself decided to accelerate the proceedings.⁴⁵⁹ It simply decided not to use provisional measures because of the abovementioned assurances by Denmark and because it expected the conclusion of the case before the end of 1994. Denmark had argued as well that, even upon completion of the bridge, there was no risk of irreparable prejudice and therefore no urgency. The Court, however, agreed with Finland that it might have a case for provisional measures if the passage would be obstructed before the decision on the merits. This meant that 'if the bridge was completed early (contrary to the respondent's assurances), or the decision on the merits were delayed beyond the end of 1994, Finland would be entitled to renew its request for interim protection with every prospect of success'.⁴⁶⁰

In Gabcikovo-Nagymaros (1997), when discussing whether there was a 'peril' referred to the requirement that a state of necessity (for the non-fulfilment of an international agreement) had to be 'grave' and 'imminent'. It noted that 'imminence' was synonymous with 'immediacy' or 'proximity' and went 'far beyond' the concept of 'possibility'. This did not exclude 'that a "peril" in the long term might be held to be "imminent" as soon as it is established, at the relevant point ⁴⁵⁵ ICJ Interhandel case (Switzerland v. US), 24 October 1957 (about this case see also section 2.3 of this chapter on provisional measures and jurisdiction on the merits). See also, e.g. ICJ Pulp mills on the river Uruguay (Argentina v. Uruguay), Order of 13 July 2006 denying the provisional measures requested by Argentina, among others, for lack of imminence, §75. The approach of the human rights adjudicators generally is equally strict, but exceptions have been developed in certain death penalty and expulsion cases where it is unclear how soon after a domestic decision execution of the death sentence or expulsion order will take place. In addition, in some death penalty cases provisional measures have been used when there was no imminent execution date, apparently in order to express moral condemnation. See further Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

⁴⁵⁶ ICJ Trial of Pakistani Prisoners of War (Pakistan v. India) 1973, §14. Petrén dissented because Pakistan did not withdraw its request.

⁴⁵⁷ ICJ Passage through the Great Belt (Finland v. Denmark), 22 July 1991, §23.

⁴⁵⁸ Merrills (1995), p. 112. On 10 September 1992 the case was removed from the Court's List of cases after the parties had settled the dispute.

⁴⁵⁹ See ICJ Passage through the Great Belt (Finland v. Denmark), 22 July 1991 and Merrills (1995), p. 112.

⁴⁶⁰ Merrills (1995), pp. 111-112.

in time, that the realisation of that peril, however far off it might be, is not thereby any less certain and inevitable'.⁴⁶¹

In 2003 Mexico requested the ICJ to take provisional measures on behalf of 52 Mexican nationals on death row in the US. The ICJ ordered provisional measures on behalf of three of them for whom an execution date was imminent because domestic remedies had been exhausted. They 'were at risk of execution in the following months, or even weeks'. The other Mexican detainees had not yet exhausted domestic remedies meaning that their executions were not impending and that there was no need yet for provisional measures.⁴⁶²

Most requests for provisional measures discussed by ITLOS relate to Article 290(5) UNCLOS.⁴⁶³ This is a provision dealing with the time period before the arbitral tribunal is installed. Eventually it is this tribunal that should determine the case. Once installed, this tribunal itself could also use provisional measures. While statements made by ITLOS or individual judges relate to this situation specifically, they still provide some information on the assessment of temporal urgency in general.

In the MOX plant case (2001) ITLOS decided not to order the provisional measures exactly the way Ireland had requested them. It did not consider that the urgency of the situation required this in the short period before the arbitral tribunal would be instituted. It referred specifically to the assurances given by the UK during the public hearings to the effect that there would be no import or export of fuel to and from the plant until a given date. It also noted that the UK had stated its hope to reach agreement on the institution of the arbitral tribunal 'within a short space of time'.⁴⁶⁴ Instead of ordering the provisional measures requested by Ireland it ordered different provisional measures relating to the duty to cooperate.⁴⁶⁵ In Malaysia v. Singapore (2003) it incorporated the assurances of Singapore in the prescription for provisional measures.⁴⁶⁶

⁴⁶¹ ICJ Gabcikovo-Nagymaros (Hungary v. Slovakia), Judgment of 25 September 1997, general list 1992, §54 (no provisional measures because of an agreement between the parties). Yet see ICJ Pulp mills on the river Uruguay (Argentina v. Uruguay), Order of 13 July 2006 denying the provisional measures requested by Argentina, among others, for lack of imminence, §75. See also Pulp mills on the river Uruguay (Argentina v. Uruguay), Order of 23 January 2007 (denying the provisional measures requested by Uruguay against the blockades by Argentinean citizens), §42.

⁴⁶² ICJ Avena and other Mexican nationals (Mexico v. US), Order of 5 February 2003, Avena and other Mexican nationals (Mexico v. US), Judgment of 31 March 2004, §21. See also e.g. ICJ Pulp mills on the river Uruguay (Argentina v. Uruguay), Order of 13 July 2006 (denying provisional measures, among others because 'the threat of any pollution is not imminent as the mills are not expected to be operational before August 2007 (Orion mill) and June 2008 (CMB mill)', §75).

⁴⁶³ See ITLOS Southern Bluefin Tuna Cases (New Zealand v. Japan; Australia v. Japan), Order of 27 August 1999; MOX Plant case (Ireland v. UK), Order of 3 December 2001; Land reclamation by Singapore in and around the straits of Johor (Malaysia v. Singapore), Order of 8 October 2003, M/V 'Saiga' (No. 2) case (St. Vincent and the Grenadines v. Guinea), Order of 11 March 1998 did not relate to Article 290(5).

⁴⁶⁴ ITLOS MOX plant case (Ireland v. UK), Order of 3 December 2001, §§77-81.

⁴⁶⁵ This in itself indicates that it considered that there was some form of temporal urgency. See the individual and dissenting opinions for some background on this decision. See also Rosenne (2005), pp. 147-148. See further section 3.7 (protection and reparation).

⁴⁶⁶ ITLOS Land reclamation by Singapore in and around the straits of Johor (Malaysia v. Singapore), Order of 8 October 2003. In an earlier case judge Treves pointed out that the requirement of urgency is 'inherent in the very nature of provisional measures'. He noted that Article 290(5) UNCLOS nevertheless explicitly mentions the requirement of urgency, which is therefore different from the normal requirement. It is stricter than when provisional measures are requested under Article 290(1) UNCLOS, which is the general provision on the competence of ITLOS to use provisional measures. This is so because 'there is no "urgency" under paragraph 5

5.3 Assessment of material urgency

5.3.1 Introduction

Apart from temporal urgency it is important to determine material urgency or risk of irreparable harm. The question arises to what extent evidence of risk and prima facie evidence of such risk differ or, more generally speaking, whether and how the evidentiary requirements on the merits could shed some light on the assessment of risk of irreparable harm pending the proceedings. The term ‘evidentiary requirements’ is used here to refer to the criteria to be met in order to prove a case as well as to the standard and burden of proof. These issues are interrelated and normally adjudicators do not clearly distinguish between them. Apart from the issue of evidentiary requirements there is also the issue of how the adjudicators evaluate this evidence, in other words the standard of review.⁴⁶⁷ Adjudicators have the inherent authority to determine which party carries the burden of proof.⁴⁶⁸ They also determine the related issue of the sources of legal presumption⁴⁶⁹ and point out the duty of cooperation.⁴⁷⁰ They are free to determine the if the measures requested could, without prejudice to the rights to be protected, be granted by the arbitral tribunal once constituted’. If there is such urgency pending the constitution of the arbitral tribunal, provisional measures may be used. Once constituted this tribunal may modify, revoke or affirm the measures taken under Article 290(5) UNCLOS and it may also order new provisional measures, ITLOS Southern Bluefin Tuna cases, Order of 27 August 1999, Separate Opinion of Judge Treves.

⁴⁶⁷ International adjudicators normally have a fact-finding authority. They may examine the facts proprio motu. Depending on the facts found by the adjudicator the claimant and respondent party may have to provide more, or less, evidence. Adjudicators may order the parties to provide information and documents and submit pleadings. Sometimes they have the power to examine witnesses and conduct in situ investigations. They may appoint independent experts and determine whether expert witnesses proposed by one of the parties can be heard. Moreover, they can take ‘judicial notice’, which means that certain facts do not need further proof.

⁴⁶⁸ The traditional approach to the burden of proof is that the party alleging certain facts must prove them. See e.g. Kazazi (1996), pp. 232-235 and pp. 369-370. The principle concerned is that of actori incumbit probatio/onus probandi actori incumbit. The ‘burdens of proof and of persuasion lie on the party that advances a point for adjudication’. They must do so by a preponderance of the evidence, Highet (1992), p. 46 and p. 70. Bringing indirect evidence is also allowed as long as it leads to reliable and reasonable conclusions. The parties usually have to prove issues of fact only, not the law itself. International tribunals are expected to take ‘judicial notice’ of international law. The principle concerned is that of iura novit curia.

⁴⁶⁹ Kazazi mentions general principles of law as the main source of legal presumptions in international procedure. When evaluating the evidence the adjudicator takes into account applicable presumptions ‘in favour of the party that carries the burden of proof and not refuted by the other party’. The burden may then shift from one party to the other because ‘presumptions affect the burden of proof insofar as they create prima facie evidence or proof in favour of the party that benefits from them’. He points out that presumptions may shift the burden but do not reverse it. Instead they create prima facie evidence in favour of the party claiming certain facts. It is possible that the other party cannot bring evidence against the presumption in question and the adjudicator rules in favour of the claimant party. This applies in particular when the presumption concerns a rule of ius cogens. “In such a case, an irrebuttable legal presumption has conclusive probative value and, depending on whether it supports the claim or not, it either relieves the proponent from the burden of proof or makes its burden impossible to meet”. Kazazi (1996), pp. 370-371.

⁴⁷⁰ Kazazi argues that the ‘duty of parties to cooperate in good faith in matters of evidence does not shift the burden of proof, as it is not the purpose of the rule to relieve the claimant of its obligation to prove its claims’. “It is only after the claimant has apparently done its best and all in admissibility of evidence and are not limited by certain technical rules of evidence that can be found in domestic law. Finally, they ‘determine the probative value to be given to each piece of evidence available to them’.⁴⁷¹

The issue of material urgency again triggers the question of the relationship between provisional measures, the rights claimed and the forms of reparation.⁴⁷² It is equally related to the issue of prejudgment.⁴⁷³ This section also discusses the relevance of the precautionary and preventive principles to understanding the concept of provisional measures.

5.3.2 Material urgency

Traditionally courts and other adjudicators have had to deal with urgent situations involving risk assessment. Assessment of material urgency for the use of provisional measures often implies an initial assessment of the main claim.⁴⁷⁴ If it does not, it is still important to clarify the substantive its power to secure evidence, and has actually produced some prima facie evidence in support of its case, that the duty of the respondent to produce the evidence exclusively in its possession commences”. He also notes that international tribunals do not have specific sanctions at their disposal to force a party to produce information and documents, Kazazi (1996), pp. 372-373. The duty of cooperation in providing information and documentation or the ‘collaboration of parties’ aims to ‘enable the tribunal to base its decision on as much evidence as possible’ and to preserve peace ‘through establishing justice and truth’. As a last resort measures such as taking note of a State’s failure to provide information or ‘drawing reasonable adverse inferences therefrom’ could be used ‘as a deterrent in order to encourage the parties to provide more information and documents’. He explains that adjudicators have sometimes drawn such an adverse inference against a party withholding evidence, but that mixed claims commissions have resorted to this more often than ‘international tribunals dealing solely with the claims of States in their own rights’, Kazazi (1996), pp. 373-374 and p. 380. This is not surprising given the fact that international tribunals dealing exclusively with the interests of States may assume equality between the parties with regard to the magnitude of the consequences of a finding as well as equality of arms in the production of evidence. On the other hand, as discussed in section 3.3 on the ICJ and the protection of the individual and in Part III of this book, proceedings involving individuals as well as States have to take into account the principle of effective protection of the individual. See in this respect the comments on the standard of proof used by the ICJ in the Genocide Convention case, 26 February 2007, e.g. the dissenting opinion of Vice-President Al-Khasawneh, §42; Gaeta (2007a), pp. 278-280 and Gaeta (2007b), p. 643; for a different approach see Milanović (2006), p. 595 and Gattini (2007), pp. 894-895. See also Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk), section 3.2.2 as well as Chapter VI (Disappearances). In its Judgment in Congo v. Uganda the ICJ also considered evidence contained in certain UN documents ‘to the extent that they are of probative value and corroborated, if necessary by other credible sources’. ICJ Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (DRC v. Uganda), judgment of 19 December 2005, §207. It referred to a ‘coincidence of reports from credible sources’, ‘persuasive evidence’ in the form of UN reports, consistent in the presentation of facts, supporting each other and ‘corroborated by other credible sources’. In this respect it referred to the Human Rights Watch Report ‘Ituri: covered in blood, ethnically targeted violence in northeastern DR Congo’, July 2003. See ICJ Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (DRC v. Uganda), Judgment of 19 December 2005, §209, See section 3 of this Chapter, focusing on this purpose of provisional measures in general international law and Part II of this book on the purpose of provisional measures in human rights cases.

⁴⁷¹ Kazazi (1996), pp. 374-376. See further on the issues of fact-finding and fact and law e.g. Lillich (1992) and Highet (1987), p. 75.

⁴⁷² Discussed in section 4.

⁴⁷³ Discussed in section 5 of this chapter.

⁴⁷⁴ See also section 3 of this chapter on the purpose of provisional measures.

law invoked, implicitly or explicitly, with the provisional measures.⁴⁷⁵ Sometimes respondent States have referred to the obligation of the party requesting provisional measures to show a reasonable prospect of success on the merits.⁴⁷⁶ Urgency and the gravity of the harm risked are interlinked. If the ICJ finds that the potential harm ‘would be irreparable’, this triggers a discussion of the ‘urgency’ criterion.⁴⁷⁷ In 1932 Dumbauld already considered that delay for the purpose of a hearing ‘is not unlimited, and must not be incompatible with the essentially urgent character of interim protection’. ‘In view of the summary nature of the procedure, the rules of evidence should be relaxed rather than made more rigid than usual’. In any case, apparently all that was required was a ‘prima facie showing of probable right and probable injury’.⁴⁷⁸

In the Nuclear Test cases (1973) the ICJ noted that the information did not exclude the possibility that the deposit on Australia’s territory of radioactive fall-out resulting from the tests performed by France could cause irreparable damage.⁴⁷⁹ Elkind pointed out that in these cases the ICJ ‘was willing to accept very slight proof as to the likelihood of irreparable injury’ while in the Aegean Sea case (1976) it required a ‘much stricter standard of proof’ of irreparable harm.⁴⁸⁰

In his Separate Opinion Judge Elias criticized the Court’s approach in that case because, as he put it, it meant that ‘the State which has the ability to pay can under this principle commit wrongs against another State with impunity, since it discounts the fact that the injury by itself might be sufficient to cause irreparable harm to the national susceptibilities of the offended State’. He considered that ‘might’ should no longer be ‘right’ in ‘today’s inter-State relations’.⁴⁸¹ While the ICJ considered that rights claimed by States might be protected through provisional measures, even though they concern the nature and extent of rights rather than their existence, in this case it found that circumstances did not require such measures.⁴⁸²

Elkind criticised the Court’s decision in the Aegean Sea case (1976) and considered that Greece had the burden to allege and prove irreparable injury and that ‘demonstrating that the interests sought to be protected were subjective or incapable of pecuniary ascertainment should have satisfied that onus’. Following this, ‘the burden of coming forward with the evidence to negate the claim of irreparable injury shifted to Turkey’. Because Turkey did not appear and did not present evidence to the contrary ‘the Court should have held that the case for irreparable ⁴⁷⁵ See also section 3.5 and 3.7 on the relationship with the rights claimed and the forms of reparation.

⁴⁷⁶ See also section 3.6 on prejudgment.

⁴⁷⁷ See Rosenne (2005), p. 135.

⁴⁷⁸ Dumbauld (1932), pp. 160-161.

⁴⁷⁹ ICJ Nuclear Tests cases (Australia v. France), Order of 22 June 1973, §29. Shahabuddeen acknowledges that the ICJ did not say that the possible damage might violate some possible right of the applicant. However, given the fact that the Court recognised the possibility that the Applicant might be able to show irreparable damage it was improbable that it did not assume that its rights might be at stake as well. Passage through the Great Belt (Finland v. Denmark), Order of 29 July 1991, Separate Opinion Judge Shahabuddeen, pp. 25-33. See further Goldie (1972-73), p. 497, also referring to the PCIJ Sino-Belgian Treaty case, Order of 8 January 1927.

⁴⁸⁰ Elkind (1981), p. 223. See, however, ICJ Nuclear Tests follow-up case, Order of 22 September 1995.

⁴⁸¹ ICJ Aegean Sea case, Order of 11 September 1976, Separate Opinion Judge Elias, p. 31.

⁴⁸² According to Thirlway (1994), p. 24 this decision seems to imply that the question whether there is a prima facie case on the merits does not arise if the other party has admitted the existence of the right to be protected. In reference to the Nuclear test cases, ‘where the very existence of a right to redress for damage caused by fall-out from nuclear tests was disputed’, he considered the criterion chosen by the ICJ, ‘while appropriate for the facts before it, does not lend itself for generalization’. As a ground rule he proposes that ‘if there is any requirement that a prima facie case be made out as a condition of provisional measures, this must be so in principle even where it is asserted as an extension of a recognized right’.

injury was established'. He pointed out that Article 53 did not require the ICJ either 'to coddle the non-appearing respondent to the extent of raising defences proprio motu'.⁴⁸³

Thus, Elkind considered that the ICJ erred in the Aegean Sea case with regard to the burden of proof for the likelihood of irreparable harm. He referred to two findings of law that were implicit in the Court's holding: '(a) that the question of what constitutes irreparable injury is solely a question of fact and (b) that the burden of proving irreparable injury rests with the plaintiff'. However, he noted, the Court only stated that the Turkish explorations 'might be' capable of reparation, which meant that it also might not be capable of such reparation.⁴⁸⁴

According to Sztucki, writing in the early 1980s, the ICJ was not strict about prima facie cases. He noted that it could order provisional measures without requiring the Applicant to show a prima facie case, while this was normally required under national laws and in the practice of the European Court of Justice.⁴⁸⁵

In 1991 Denmark argued that Finland's request for provisional measures in the Passage through the Great Belt case was inappropriate because there was 'not even a prima facie case' in favour of the Finnish claim. It argued that Finland should substantiate the right it claims 'to a point where a reasonable prospect of success in the main case exists'.⁴⁸⁶ Merrills notes that the ICJ 'was prepared to regard Finland as having satisfied any prima facie test that might be necessary, but stopped short of endorsing Denmark's argument that the merits of the principal claim are in fact relevant in proceedings relating to interim protection'.⁴⁸⁷ In his separate opinion Judge Shahabuddeen considered that the Applicant State indeed had to show a prima facie case 'in the sense of demonstrating a possibility of existence of the specific right'. Given the exceptional character of the procedure he argued that it was necessary for the requesting State to show some arguable basis for the existence of the right sought to be protected.⁴⁸⁸

At the same time it is often the Respondent that raises the question whether the right claimed indeed exists. In such situations there is no question of prejudgment. Moreover, a finding by the ICJ that there is a possibility of the existence of a right does not, in itself, constitute an interim judgment.⁴⁸⁹ Judge Shahabuddeen pointed out that it 'is improbable that the Court is bound by a mere assertion of rights even where these are manifestly incapable of existing in law'. In that sense 'the Court must be concerned with satisfying itself affirmatively of the possible existence of the rights claimed, the required degree of proof being dependent on the character and circumstances of the particular case'.⁴⁹⁰ He did not suggest that the requesting State 'should ⁴⁸⁴ Elkind (1981), p. 214.

⁴⁸³ Elkind (1981), p. 206.

⁴⁸⁵ Sztucki (1983), p. 259 (also for early examples of case law by the European Court of Justice).

⁴⁸⁶ ICJ Passage through the Great Belt (Finland v. Denmark), Order of 22 July 1991, §21.

⁴⁸⁷ ICJ Passage through the Great Belt case, Order of 22 July 1991. Merrills (1995), p. 114 points out that in the approach suggested by Denmark the strength of the case on the merits should be treated as a relevant circumstance. 'Although superficially attractive, such an approach would present many problems and has never been endorsed by the Court'. The ICJ noted that Denmark had not challenged the existence of a right of Finland of passage through the Great Belt. Instead the dispute was about the nature and extent of the passage. It found that 'such a disputed right may be protected by the indication of provisional measures' if it 'considers that circumstances so require', Passage through the Great Belt (Finland v. Denmark), Order of 22 July 1991, §22.

⁴⁸⁸ ICJ Passage through the Great Belt (Finland v. Denmark), Order of 22 July 1991, Separate Opinion Judge Shahabuddeen, p. 29. He also referred to Dumbauld's remark that provisional measures always constitute 'an exceptional remedy', (1932), p. 184.

⁴⁸⁹ ICJ Passage through the Great Belt (Finland v. Denmark), Order of 22 July 1991, Separate Opinion Judge Shahabuddeen, p. 30. See about prejudgment section 3.6.

⁴⁹⁰ ICJ Passage through the Great Belt (Finland v. Denmark), Order of 22 July 1991, Separate Opinion Judge Shahabuddeen, p. 30.

anticipate and meet each and every issue which could arise at the merits'. This would depend on the nature and circumstances of the case. He suggested the following standard: "What is important is that enough material should be presented to demonstrate the possibility of existence of the right sought to be protected".⁴⁹¹ Judge Shahabuddeen argued that it is reasonable to order provisional measures only if the Applicant State can show some possibility of success on the merits. After all, such measures often have an unequal impact on the parties.⁴⁹² The 'need to avoid any appearance of prejudgment' is 'of special importance in the sensitive field of litigation between States'.⁴⁹³ He reiterated that it is only necessary to show 'the possibility of the existence of the right claimed'. According to Merrills this means that 'the prima facie test could be satisfied (at least in theory) without going into the merits of the case in any detail'. He welcomes, however, the Court's reluctance to take this approach because 'if a prima facie test were to be formally required it would probably be impossible to prevent the parties from devoting a significant amount of their argument to the merits'. At the same time he acknowledges that, informally, it 'would be surprising if a preliminary view of the merits did not in practice influence the Court's approach to requests for interim protection to some degree'.⁴⁹⁴

In the Great Belt case (1991) Shahabuddeen referred to the Court's remark in its Order for provisional measures in the Hostages case (1979) that 'a request for provisional measures must by its very nature relate to the substance of the case since, as article 41 expressly states, their object is to preserve the respective rights of either party'.⁴⁹⁵ He discussed the fact that the Court goes into the merits of cases at the stage of provisional measures. This means that the Court considers that the State requesting provisional measures 'must satisfy the Court that it has an arguable case in favour of the existence of the rights sought to be preserved pending a final decision'.⁴⁹⁶ In this case, however, he agreed with the ICJ that there was no urgency. After all, Denmark showed full cooperation and undertook not to complete the disputed bridge before the Court's decision on the merits.

If the Respondent State provides assurances that it will avoid causing irreparable harm this can play a role in the determination that there is no urgency.⁴⁹⁷ In this context Merrills has pointed out that 'in an appropriate case the fact that the parties, and especially the respondent, are demonstrating a co-operative, responsible and law-abiding attitude is a factor which can be and has been given weight'. At the same time he stressed that 'if rights are genuinely threatened, something more than vague assurances of goodwill will be necessary before a request is refused'.⁴⁹⁸

⁴⁹¹ Id., p. 31.

⁴⁹² Merrills (1995), p. 115, notes that this approach would be consistent with the use of the prima facie test for jurisdiction to use provisional measures.

⁴⁹³ ICJ Passage through the Great Belt (Finland v. Denmark), Order of 22 July 1991, Separate Opinion Judge Shahabuddeen, p. 29. See about prejudgment section 3.6.

⁴⁹⁴ Merrills (1995), pp. 115-116.

⁴⁹⁵ ICJ US Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran (US v. Iran) (Hostages case), Order of 15 December 1979, §28. See also section 3.5 on the relationship between provisional measures and the claim.

⁴⁹⁶ ICJ Passage through the Great Belt (Finland v. Denmark), Order of 22 July 1991, Separate Opinion Judge Shahabuddeen, p. 33.

⁴⁹⁷ See e.g. ICJ Great Belt case, Order of 22 July 1991 and ITLOS MOX Plant case, Order of 3 December 2001.

⁴⁹⁸ Merrills (1995), p. 121. In Questions relating to the Obligation to Prosecute or Extradite (Belgium v. Senegal), Order of 28 May 2009, the ICJ took note of the assurances given by Senegal that it would not allow Mr. Habré to leave its territory before the Court has given its final decision, and found that the risk of irreparable prejudice to the rights claimed by Belgium was 'not apparent on the date of this Order', §§71-72 (Judge Cançado Trindade dissenting).

Thirlway referred to Judge Shahabuddeen's Separate Opinion, concluding that the State requesting provisional measures 'is required to establish the possible existence of the rights sought to be protected'.⁴⁹⁹ Judge Shahabuddeen himself referred to a statement by Judge Anzilotti who wrote that the Court, for its decision on provisional measures, takes 'into account the possibility of the right claimed (...) and the possibility of the danger to which that right was exposed'.⁵⁰⁰ While this statement was a dissent by a PCIJ Judge, Judge Shahabuddeen considered in 1991 that 'the general pattern of advocacy employed by counsel, and also the reaction of the Court on some occasions, as in the United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Teheran case, would appear to be objectively consistent with Judge Anzilotti's understanding of the law' as expressed above.⁵⁰¹ He noted that the interests of the respondent State required the Court to examine whether there was a possibility of the right claimed and a possibility of the danger to which that right was exposed. He considered that the requirement of prima facie evidence of the possible existence of the right would not be the same as a full examination on the merits. He pointed out that the 'possibility formula' proposed by Judge Anzilotti was to be preferred over the requirement of prima facie evidence because it implied even less risk of prejudgment.

Nevertheless, in international litigation the distinction between a prima facie test, a test whether there is a serious issue to be tried and a test whether there is a possible danger to a possible right is not that great.⁵⁰² In any case the risk of irreparable harm must be shown to some extent. Merrills has pointed out that the ICJ may have to consider 'both the probability of a certain event occurring and the consequences which may be expected if it does'.

"It is worth noting that any future event does not have to be certain, a probability is sufficient".⁵⁰³

In relation to the Southern Bluefin Tuna cases (1999) by ITLOS, Judge Treves noted that it seemed reasonable to hold 'that the prevention of serious harm to the southern bluefin tuna stock is the appropriate standard for prescribing measures'. He pointed out that this standard could apply to measures for the preservation of the rights of the parties exactly 'because these rights concern the conservation of that very stock'. In that sense he would have preferred that ITLOS had mentioned the prevention of serious harm to the stock as the standard for ordering provisional measures rather than (only) as the purpose of action to be taken by the parties.⁵⁰⁴ In the context of the provisional measures in the M/V 'Saiga' case ITLOS Judge Laing pointed out that comparable ICJ jurisprudence did not suggest that there is a 'prima facie standard by which this Tribunal must adjudge the existence and sufficiency of the circumstances and other elements which relate to the discretion to prescribe measures'. He considered that there was no persuasive doctrine to suggest this either. If jurisprudence about a prima facie standard at the provisional measures stage would exist, it 'would be unreliable, since such circumstances, elements and contextual situations are too varied to be submitted to a sole, and probably simplistic, standard'.

⁴⁹⁹ Thirlway (1994), p. 24.

⁵⁰⁰ PCIJ Polish Agrarian Reform and German Minority case, Order of 29 July 1933, Dissenting Opinion by Judge Anzilotti, series A/B, No. 58, p. 181.

⁵⁰¹ ICJ Passage through the Great Belt case (Finland v. Denmark), Order of 19 July 1991, Separate Opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen, p. 34.

⁵⁰² ICJ Passage through the Great Belt case (Finland v. Denmark), Order of 19 July 1991, Separate Opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen, pp. 28-36. See also section 3.6 on provisional measures and prejudgment.

⁵⁰³ Merrills (1995), p. 107.

⁵⁰⁴ Separate Opinion of Judge Treves, referring to §§70 and 77 of ITLOS Southern Bluefin Tuna cases, Order of 27 August 1999.

He noted that this conclusion was confirmed by ‘the discretionary nature of the functions of the Tribunal in proceedings on provisional measures’.⁵⁰⁵

Indeed, international adjudicators sometimes use the standard of ‘prima facie evidence’, but they do not indicate exactly what this means. According to Kazazi the stage of evidence referred to as prima facie is ‘an inevitable stage for the distribution of the burden of proof, without which there will be no case to require the respondent’s answer’.⁵⁰⁶ Judge Laing is correct in pointing out that to use a single inflexible standard at the stage of provisional measures would do no justice to the different contexts. Nevertheless, it does seem that international adjudicators apply some standard, and the concept of prima facie evidence for purposes of provisional measures seems sufficiently flexible.⁵⁰⁷

5.3.3 The preventive and precautionary principles

Provisional measures by the ICJ (and ITLOS) are often based on the principle of prevention of irreparable harm.⁵⁰⁸ The preventive and precautionary principles are principles that could trigger a policy (or judicial) decision to take temporary measures or that relax the evidentiary requirements for taking measures to prevent harm.⁵⁰⁹ If adjudicators apply these principles in their decisions on the merits, this approach may equally be reflected in their decisions on provisional measures. After all, the standard of risk to be met for provisional measures is anyhow more relaxed than the evidentiary standard in the main case. Since provisional measures and the preventive and precautionary principles have the common aim of preventing harm, information on the latter principles could potentially be useful to clarify the criteria for the use of provisional measures as well.

References to the precautionary principle in international documents on environmental law are of more recent date (second half of the 1980s) than references to the preventive principle. The latter principle can be traced back to international environmental documents of the 1930s.⁵¹⁰ The preventive principle is broader than the precautionary.⁵¹¹ References are normally made to the preventive principle when a causal relationship can already be established between the act or omission and serious or irreparable harm and when the probability of the risk can be established either quantitatively or qualitatively. In the latter case it should be possible to indicate, for

⁵⁰⁵ ITLOS M/V ‘Saiga’ (No. 2), Order of 11 March 1998, Separate Opinion of Judge Laing, §§2-13.

⁵⁰⁶ Kazazi (1996), pp. 326-327.

⁵⁰⁷ Black’s Law Dictionary, providing definitions on the basis of US law, defines prima facie as follows: at first sight; on the first appearance; on the face of it; so far as can be judged from the first disclosure; presumably; a fact presumed to be true unless disproved by some evidence to the contrary. It defines prima facie evidence, among others, as evidence good and sufficient on its face. “Such evidence as, in the judgment of the law, is sufficient to establish a given fact, or the group or chain of effects constituting the party’s claim or defence and which if not rebutted or contradicted, will remain sufficient”. Black’s Law Dictionary, West Publishing Co., St. Paul, Minn., 1990 (6th ed.).

⁵⁰⁸ See section 3 of this Chapter, focusing on this purpose of provisional measures in general international law.

⁵⁰⁹ See for in-depth discussions of various aspects of the precautionary principle e.g. Wibisana (2008); Vos/Van Calster (eds.) (2004); Douma (2003); Faure/Vos (eds) (2003); Marr (2003); Trouwborst (2002); O’Riordan/Cameron/Jordan (2001) and Freestone/Hey (1996). In literature on risk assessment ‘risk’ relates to cause and effect and refers to the probability or likelihood that this damage will indeed be caused as well as to the magnitude of this damage. This cannot be measured exactly. The term ‘uncertainty’ is used for a situation in which the probability and magnitude of the harm cannot be pinpointed.

⁵¹⁰ Sands (2003), p. 267.

⁵¹¹ Trouwborst (2002), p. 35.

instance, whether the risk is negligible, small or high. Depending on the value attached to a certain right or interest even scientific evidence of a slight risk could be sufficient to trigger the preventive principle and halt the act or remedy the omission. The preventive principle ‘seeks to minimise environmental damage as an objective in itself’.⁵¹² This means that States may be obliged to prevent harm to the environment not only if it involves cross-border harm but also if it involves harm to the environment within their own jurisdictions.⁵¹³ In that respect there is a clear correlation between human rights law and the preventive principle in environmental law.⁵¹⁴ Sands notes that the preventive principle ‘prohibits activity which causes or may cause damage to the environment in violation of the standards established under the rules of international law’.⁵¹⁵ The preventive principle is reflected in State practice, supported by domestic legislation and international standards as well as by the emphasis in international legal documents on the need to carry out environmental impact assessments and provide access to environmental information.⁵¹⁶

There is no generally accepted definition of the precautionary principle. In fact various States, adjudicators and commentators use ‘approach’, ‘principle’, ‘preventive’ and ‘precautionary’ in different ways. The precautionary principle becomes relevant if there is insufficient or conflicting evidence (e.g. conflicting risk assessments) on the causal relationship. It could also play a role if the probability of the risk cannot be determined although there is indeed scientific evidence about a causal relationship.⁵¹⁷ Traditionally the party alleging the risk was forced to provide sufficient scientific evidence of such risk, necessitating urgent action. This often meant that by the time such evidence was available the harm had already been done. This harm could be long lasting or even irreversible. The precautionary principle, first found in the legal systems of certain States,⁵¹⁸ was introduced exactly to deal with situations of scientific uncertainty about risks to the environment or to health. Given the gravity of the harm that could otherwise result, certain acts should be halted or certain omissions addressed without the obligation to wait for full scientific certainty about the risk.

One interpretation of the principle has been laid down in the Rio Declaration.⁵¹⁹ Principle 15 stipulates:

“In order to protect the environment, the precautionary approach shall be widely applied by States according to their capabilities. Where there are threats of serious or irreversible damage, lack of full scientific certainty shall not be used as a reason for postponing cost-effective measures to prevent environmental degradation”.

Many international and regional instruments, binding and non-binding, have referred to the principle.⁵²⁰ It is not yet firmly established as a rule of customary international law although it has widely been resorted to by policy makers. Many international legal documents (mainly involving environmental law) have referred to it, some of them in binding provisions.⁵²¹

⁵¹² Sands (2003), p. 246.

⁵¹³ See Sands (2003), p. 246 (setting it off against Principle 21 of the Rio Declaration, a principle flowing from State sovereignty).

⁵¹⁴ See further Chapter XV on Immediacy and risk in human rights adjudication, with specific references to the preventive and precautionary approach.

⁵¹⁵ Sands (2003), p. 247.

⁵¹⁶ For references see Sands (2003), p. 247. See also Chapter XIII on beneficiaries and consultation.

⁵¹⁷ See e.g. Trouwborst (2002), pp. 35-44.

⁵¹⁸ E.g. the Vorsorgeprinzip in Germany.

⁵¹⁹ Rio Declaration on environment and Development, June 1992, A/CONF.151/26 (Vol. I).

⁵²⁰ For an overview of such references see Trouwborst (2002).

⁵²¹ See the references in Sands (2003). Trouwborst (2002) and Douma (2003) argue that, in environmental law, the principle has acquired customary international law status.

As Sands puts it in relation to the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development (1992) and its statement that lack of full scientific certainty ‘shall not be used’ to prevent action:

“What remains open is the level at which scientific evidence is sufficient to override arguments for postponing measures, or at which measures might even be required as a matter of international law”.⁵²²

If precautionary or preventive measures would be required under international law the adjudicator could order them. If they are only allowed, the adjudicator could accept them as a justification by States for certain acts or omissions. The precautionary principle could be argued to support ‘shifting the burden’ of proof (even if not formally) so that companies or States planning to carry out a certain activity must show that there is no (impermissible) risk to the environment. While in some interpretations the damage risked does not need to be ‘serious’ or ‘irreversible’, in other interpretations the burden only shifts from the party alleging to the party allegedly causing the threat once it has been established that the damage risked would indeed be ‘serious’ or ‘irreversible’.⁵²³

Thus far the ICJ has not referred to the precautionary principle, even though in the 1995 French Nuclear Tests cases New Zealand and the intervening States had invoked it.⁵²⁴ In his dissent Judge Weeramantry did consider the precautionary principle and the fact that it could shift the burden of proof.⁵²⁵ Two years later, in Gabcikovo-Nagymaros (1997), the ICJ again failed to take into account the precautionary principle. This case dealt with Hungary’s argument that the suspension of works on a hydroelectric dam (under a bilateral treaty) could be justified because of a ‘state of necessity’. It invoked the argument of ecological necessity. According to the ICJ a state of necessity could not exist without a ‘peril’. It acknowledged that this word evoked the idea of ‘risk’ and that this was what distinguished ‘peril’ from material damage. However, ‘the mere apprehension of a possible “peril” could not suffice in that respect’.⁵²⁶ On the other hand, as Sands points out, the ICJ was examining the legal situation in 1989 when Hungary had suspended

⁵²² Sands (2003), p. 273.

⁵²³ See e.g. the examples given by Sands (2003), pp. 270-272. Sands notes about shifting the burden in the latter context that there is ‘growing evidence to suggest that this interpretation is beginning to be supported by state practice, even if it still falls short of having sufficient support to allow it to be considered a rule of general application’, p. 273 and references therein.

⁵²⁴ See ICJ Request for an examination of the situation in accordance with paragraph 63 of the Court’s judgment of 20 December 1974 in the Nuclear Tests case (New Zealand v. France), request by New Zealand, §105.

⁵²⁵ Request for an examination of the situation in accordance with paragraph 63 of the Court’s Judgment of 20 December 1974 in the Nuclear Tests cases, Order of 22 September 1995, Dissenting Opinion of Judge Weeramantry, pp. 317-362, in particular pp. 342-344. “New Zealand has placed materials before the Court to the best of its ability, but France is in possession of the actual information. The principle then springs into operation to give the Court the basic rationale for considering New Zealand’s request and not postponing the application of such means as are available to the Court to prevent, on a provisional basis, the threatened environmental degradation, until such time as the full scientific evidence becomes available in refutation of the New Zealand contention”. He considered that New Zealand would have been entitled to a consideration of its request for provisional measures. See also the Dissenting Opinion of Judge Ad Hoc Palmer, pp. 381-421, in particular p. 412.

⁵²⁶ ICJ Gabcikovo-Nagymaros (Hungary v. Slovakia), Judgment of 25 September 1997, §54. This case had been brought before the ICJ by common Agreement between the parties. It was included in this Agreement that the parties would not request provisional measures.

its work on the dam project and at that time ‘the precautionary principle had not yet emerged and could not realistically be applied as general international law’.⁵²⁷

The International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea (ITLOS) has been more willing to relax the evidentiary standard for the party claiming risk to the environment and, implicitly, to apply the precautionary principle. It seems to have taken provisional measures on the basis of the precautionary principle, or at least the precautionary approach, in the Southern Bluefin Tuna cases (1999). In this case it noted that the parties should act with ‘prudence and caution’ to prevent ‘serious harm’.⁵²⁸ It also noted that there was ‘scientific uncertainty’ about the measures to be taken.⁵²⁹ While it could not conclusively assess the scientific evidence presented by the parties, ‘measures should be taken as a matter of urgency to preserve the rights of the parties and to avert further deterioration of the southern bluefin tuna stock’.⁵³⁰ It ordered the parties, among others, not to conduct experimental fishing programs.⁵³¹ In their separate opinions Judge Treves and ad hoc Judge Shearer explicitly referred to the precautionary approach.⁵³²

While the precautionary principle involves situations of scientific uncertainty it is still necessary to provide some evidence of risk before it can be used as a justification for halting certain developments.

A question that has arisen, apart from the status of the principle and its applicability to health and other issues outside of environmental law,⁵³³ is whether it is mainly a principle to be used by policy makers or whether it also serves a function before the courts and other adjudicators. Clearly international adjudicators have to deal with it if States use it as a justification for an infringement upon the rights claimed by the other party. Yet in my view adjudicators may take into account the precautionary approach not just as a justification by States for their policy making (including certain acts or omissions) but also as an indication of how to approach the evidentiary requirements when dealing with a request for provisional measures.⁵³⁴

⁵²⁷ Sands (2003), p. 275.

⁵²⁸ See ITLOS Southern Bluefin Tuna cases (New Zealand v. Japan; Australia v. Japan), Order of 27 August 1999, §77.

⁵²⁹ Id., §79.

⁵³⁰ Id., §80.

⁵³¹ For the protective measures required in provisional measures see section 3.7 of this Chapter.

⁵³² Judge Treves noted in his Separate Opinion that he would have preferred it if the tribunal had explicitly stated that in the case at hand ‘the requirement of urgency’ was ‘satisfied only in the light of such precautionary approach’, §8; Ad Hoc Judge Shearer noted that the provisional measures were ‘rightly based upon considerations deriving from a precautionary approach’, p. 6. See about the precautionary principle or approach and the law of the sea Marr (2003).

⁵³³ In the Beef Hormones case the WTO Appellate Body noted that it was not clear whether the precautionary principle could already be considered a rule of customary international law. It pointed out, however, that it was ‘unnecessary, and probably imprudent’ for it to take a position on this question and that ‘the precautionary principle, at least outside the field of international environmental law, still awaits authoritative formulation’. WTO Appellate Body, report of 16 January 1998, WT/DS48/AB/R, §123. The industry has criticised the use of the precautionary principle in relation to policy on food safety as creating an impossible burden of proof for food products and ingredients, see e.g. Hathcock (2000).

⁵³⁴ As Treves notes, ‘the precautionary approach can be seen as a logical consequence of the need to ensure that, when the arbitral tribunal decides on the merits, the factual situation has not changed’. Separate Opinion of Judge Treves, ITLOS Southern Bluefin Tuna cases (New Zealand v. Japan; Australia v. Japan), Order of 27 August 1999, §9. He noted that the Order of the Tribunal had hinted at a precautionary approach, in particular in §77 in relation to the future conduct of the parties. He regretted that the order did not explicitly state that a precautionary approach was also necessary in the Tribunal’s assessment of urgency.

6 THE LEGAL STATUS OF PROVISIONAL MEASURES

It has not always been clear whether the provisional measures by the ICJ were legally binding. This was due mainly to the wording of Article 41 ICJ Statute, referring to the power to ‘indicate’ provisional measures, which ‘ought’ to be taken. Different from the ICJ Statute the more recent UN Convention on the Law of the Sea (UNCLOS) stipulates the power to ‘prescribe’ rather than ‘indicate’ provisional measures.⁵³⁵ In other words, its provisional measures are clearly legally binding.

The legal controversy on the legal status of provisional measures by the World Court had already started with the PCIJ Statute.⁵³⁶ Scholarly views differed as to the question whether the provisional measures of the PCIJ and ICJ were legally binding. Dumbauld, for instance, considered the provisional measures of the PCIJ not to be legally binding.⁵³⁷ Other authors adhered to a functional interpretation and argued that even if the wording of Article 41 was ambiguous (e.g. ‘indicate’), the power itself to indicate provisional measures was a necessary attribute of the judicial function. Fitzmaurice wrote that ‘(t)he whole logic of the jurisdiction to indicate interim measures entails that, when indicated, they are binding – for this jurisdiction is based on the absolute necessity, when the circumstances call for it, of being able to preserve, and to avoid prejudice to, the rights of the parties, as determined by the final judgement of the Court’.⁵³⁸ Various authors regard the obligation to respect provisional measures a general principle of law.⁵³⁹

⁵³⁵ See Article 290 UNCLOS and Article 25 of Annex VI of UNCLOS (Agreement relating to the implementation of Part XI of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea of 10 December 1982, New York, 28 July 1994).

⁵³⁶ In ICJ Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. US), Judgment of 27 June 1986 it re-emphasized its Order of 10 May 1984. It noted that it was ‘incumbent upon each party to take the Court’s indications seriously into account’. ‘Particularly is this so in a situation of armed conflict where no reparation can efface the results of conduct which the Court may rule to have been contrary to international law’, §§288-289. In Application of the Convention on the prevention and punishment of the crime of genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)), Order of 13 September 1993 (second request) the ICJ noted in passing that, unlike its final judgments, its Orders had no ‘binding force’ or ‘final effect’ ‘in the decision of any dispute’. It referred to the PCIJ decision in Free Zones of Upper Savoy and the District of Gex, Order of 19 August 1929. Nevertheless, it reiterated that Yugoslavia must immediately and effectively implement its ‘first order to prevent and cease any act of genocide’. But see the Separate Opinions by Judges Weeramantry and Ajibola, discussed infra. In a 1996 article Judge Oda wrote that the Court ‘has never taken an overt position in this respect but, as a matter of principle, the Court’s “Order” ought to be properly observed’ and ‘(i)f the later judgement on the merits is rendered in favour of the applicant State, the respondent State may be made responsible for any action taken in defiance of the provisional measures’, Oda (1996), p. 555. See also Beirlaen (1984-1985), pp. 739-775 and Rosenne (2005), p. 157 (on the Nicaragua case) and p. 179 (on the consequences of disrespect for the Court’s provisional measures before LaGrand).

⁵³⁷ Dumbauld (1932), p. 169. See also p. 173 (in the absence of express wording).

⁵³⁸ Fitzmaurice (1986), p. 584. See in general on the functional approach Elkind (1981).

⁵³⁹ See e.g. Collins (1992-III), p. 216. See also the remarks of Pescatore and Oellers-Frahm at the colloquium in Bernhardt (ed.) (1994b), pp. 121-122 and pp. 146-147 respectively. For the opposite view, see, eg. Herdegen, id., p. 126. Cançado Trindade recently observed a ‘doctrinal trend’ to consider provisional measures as ‘equivalent to a true general principle of law, common to virtually all national legal systems, and endorsed by the practice of national, arbitral, and international tribunals’, ICJ Questions relating to the obligation to prosecute or extradite

A provisional measure has no force of res iudicata as the decision on the merits still needs to be taken. It is, however, a general principle of law that, pending the proceedings before a Court, the status quo must be maintained.⁵⁴⁰ In 1953 Cheng put it as follows:

“The reason why an international tribunal may exercise this power even when its jurisdiction as to the merits is yet uncertain must be sought in the fact that the duty of the parties to maintain the status quo already exists independently of any judicial intervention”.⁵⁴¹

In the words of Crockett ‘(a)lthough [provisional measures] are not res iudicata, they do enrich or diminish a party’s legal position so that (...) monetary or restitutionary liability for a violation of an order indicating interim measures would be entailed. To hold that interim measures have no legal effect would be tantamount to rendering them nullities’.⁵⁴²

In his Separate Opinion in the Genocide Convention case (1993) Judge Weeramanthy argued that provisional orders are part of the inherent authority of a judicial tribunal, as a general principle and for reasons of practical necessity. One of the principles he mentioned in support of this view is ‘the wide and universal recognition of the enjoining powers of courts as an inherent part of their jurisdiction’.⁵⁴³ Equally, Judge Ajibola pointed out that provisional measures influence the outcome of the adjudication and should therefore be considered part of the judgment.⁵⁴⁴ After all ‘an order, like a judgement (and being incidental to it) ought not to be ineffective, artificial or illusory. It should be binding and enforceable, otherwise, ab initio, there may be a good and reasonable ground to question it being issued at all. The Court, it is submitted, should not be seen to act in vain’.⁵⁴⁵

In its judgment in LaGrand (2001) the ICJ finally determined that its provisional measures were legally binding. It applied a purposive interpretation to deal with the ambiguities of Article 41 ICJ Statute.⁵⁴⁶ It followed from the object and purpose of the Statute and from ‘the terms of Article 41 when read in their context’, that the power to indicate provisional measures entailed ‘that such measures should be binding, inasmuch as the power in question is based on the

(Belgium v. Senegal), Order of 28 May 2009, dissenting opinion of Judge Cançado Trindade, §13.

⁵⁴⁰ See PCIJ Electricity Company of Sofia and Bulgaria (Belgium v. Bulgaria), Order of 5 December 1939, p. 194.

⁵⁴¹ Cheng (1953), p. 273.

⁵⁴² Crockett (1977), p. 384.

⁵⁴³ ICJ Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)), Order of 13 September 1993, Separate Opinion Judge Weeramanthy.

⁵⁴⁴ ICJ Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, Provisional Measures (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)), Order of 13 September 1993, Separate Opinion Judge Ajibola, §5.

⁵⁴⁵ Ibid. See also Ajibola (1996).

⁵⁴⁶ It noted that it was faced with two texts (the French and the English), which were not ‘in total harmony’. It pointed out that both texts were equally authentic. It then referred to Article 33(4) Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, ‘which in the view of the Court again reflects customary international law’. This provision reads: “When a comparison of the authentic texts discloses a difference of meaning which the application of Articles 31 and 32 does not remove the meaning which best reconciles the texts, having regard to the object and purpose of the treaty, shall be adopted”. It then considered the object and purpose of the ICJ Statute together with the context of Article 41 Statute: “The context in which Article 41 has to be seen within the Statute is to prevent and Court from being hampered in the exercise of its functions because the respective rights of the parties to a dispute before the Court are not preserved”. ICJ LaGrand (Germany v. US), Judgment of 27 June 2001, §102.

necessity, when the circumstances call for it, to safeguard, and to avoid prejudice to, the rights of the parties as determined by the final judgment of the Court'.⁵⁴⁷ "The contention that provisional measures indicated under Article 41 might not be binding would be contrary to the object and purpose of the Article".⁵⁴⁸

The ICJ also referred to the principle 'universally accepted by the international tribunals and likewise laid down in many conventions (...) to the effect that the parties to a case must abstain from any measure capable of exercising a prejudicial effect in regard to the execution of the decision to be given, and, in general, not allow any step of any kind to be taken which might aggravate or extend the dispute'.⁵⁴⁹ It noted that it has frequently indicated Orders designed to avoid aggravating or extending disputes, which it had 'indicated with the purpose of being implemented'.⁵⁵⁰

The Court considered that there are no other sources or interpretations contradicting the Court's conclusions as drawn from the terms of Article 41, read in their context and in the light of the object and purpose of the Statute. Article 94 UN Charter did not prevent Orders made under Article 41 from having a binding character and neither did the preparatory work.⁵⁵¹

Since the Court's judgment in LaGrand its provisional measures cannot be considered other than legally binding.⁵⁵² Its decision did not seem to depend on the nature of the rights to be protected. In other words, the ICJ 'did not equivocate' in holding that its provisional measures were legally binding, 'nor did it narrow the application of its holding to death penalty cases, nor even danger to life cases'. It attributed 'legal effect to all its orders for provisional measures, irrespective of content and context'.⁵⁵³ In sum, the text of the ICJ Statute includes a reference to ⁵⁴⁷ ICJ LaGrand (Germany v. US), Judgment of 27 June 2001, §102.

⁵⁴⁸ Ibid.

⁵⁴⁹ It referred to PCIJ Electricity Company of Sofia and Bulgaria, Order of 5 December 1939.

⁵⁵⁰ The ICJ refers to several of its Orders, see §103 of LaGrand (Germany v. US), Judgment of 27 June 2001.

⁵⁵¹ See ICJ LaGrand (Germany v. US), Judgment of 27 June 2001, §109. Given the conclusions reached in interpreting the text of Article 41 in the light of its object and purpose, the Court did not consider it necessary to resort to the preparatory work in order to determine meaning of the Article. It did, however, point out that the preparatory work of the Statute did not preclude the conclusion that orders under Article 41 are binding. See §§104 and 105-107, discussing the travaux. With regard to the US claim that this particular Order was not legally binding because of the way it was phrased the ICJ pointed out that in fact this Order 'was not a mere exhortation'. "It had been adopted pursuant to Article 41 of the Statute". Thus it was legally binding and 'created a legal obligation for the United States', §110. Jennings (2002), p. 35 considers the Court should have paid more attention to the question of Article 94 UN Charter, as manifestly 'of crucial and practical importance'. See further Crocket (1977), p. 376. See in general on the Court's approach to the binding nature of provisional measures in LaGrand; Orakdelashvili (2002), pp. 116-121, pointing out, correctly, that the Court's approach can be explained by the principle of effectiveness, p. 119.

⁵⁵² For varying views on the reasoning of the Court, see e.g. Weckel (2005); Oellers-Frahm (2001a); Jennings (2002), Mennecke and Tams (2002) and Kammerhofer (2003). For a different approach see Yoshiyuki Iwamoto (2002), p. 365, somehow arguing that provisional measures should nevertheless 'have no binding force in cases where the criteria for indicating measures have not been satisfied, including the situation in which the rights to be protected may not fall within the scope of prima facie jurisdiction'. In such case, he considers, 'an order on provisional measures should not be conceived as a proper one'. "If it were, it would pose the risk of creating an 'interim judgment' or a binding decision over a matter which might be irrelevant to the actual dispute before the Court". Naming Breard and LaGrand as possible examples of such cases he seems to imply that it is for States to consider whether the criteria have been satisfied.

⁵⁵³ Harrington (2003), p. 76.

provisional measures and the Court's purposive interpretation of this text has resulted in the finding that provisional measures are binding in all cases.

7 FOLLOWING UP ON OFFICIAL STATE RESPONSES

The general rate of compliance with the ICJ's provisional measures is not impressive.⁵⁵⁴ It is not clear to what extent this relates to the fact that it was only in 2001 that the ICJ established the obligatory character of its provisional measures, but in the context of the Genocide Convention case (1993-2007) this has certainly been suggested.⁵⁵⁵

Apart from the responses of other States and other actors as well as the media, the follow-up of the ICJ itself is important because it indicates how seriously it takes its own Orders. What may also play a role in increasing effectiveness is the transparency of the Court's decision-making, particularly its reasoning. Judge Kooijmans has noted that 'a court should make clear in its reasoning that it is fully aware of the wider context and the complexity of the issues involved'. This would help 'make its legal assessments and conclusions comprehensible and thereby acceptable to litigant States whose leaders are no trained lawyers (even though they may be assisted by legal professionals), but are the main actors in the process of implementing the judgement'.⁵⁵⁶ This section, however, deals with the Court's monitoring of the implementation of its own provisional measures.

7.1 ICJ Rules on follow-up

In 1978 the ICJ formally included a Rule on follow-up in its Rules of Court. Article 78 stipulates that the ICJ 'may request information from the parties on any matter connected with the implementation of any provisional measures it has indicated'. The ICJ has generally requested such information in its initial Order, but Article 78 does not rule out the use of subsequent Orders, indicated proprio motu, to remind States of their obligations under Orders for provisional measures. The inclusion of Article 78 does not seem to have been inspired by humanitarian considerations, but rather more generally by considerations of effectiveness.⁵⁵⁷ In the Hostages case (1979) the ICJ for the first time noted in an Order for provisional measures that it would keep the case continuously under review.⁵⁵⁸ Later, in the context of Orders to halt the execution of a death sentence, it also specifically noted that the addressee States should inform it of the measures taken to comply with its Order.⁵⁵⁹ On the other hand, despite the serious nature of the ⁵⁵⁴ See e.g. Savadogo (2002), pp. 378-380. On compliance with its judgments see e.g. Paulson (2004) and Ajibola (1996) and Schwebel (1996a). For a thorough discussion of compliance with the ICJ's judgments and provisional measures, see in particular Schulte (2004).

⁵⁵⁵ ICJ Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)), Order of 13 September 1993, Separate Opinion Judges Weeramantry and Ajibola. See also, e.g., Gaffikin (1995), p. 460 and p. 468.

⁵⁵⁶ ICJ Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (Congo v. Uganda), Judgment of 19 December 2005, Separate Opinion of Judge Kooijmans, §4. See also Cassel (1999b), p. 887.

⁵⁵⁷ See Rosenne (2005), p. 178, referring to the two Orders in the Fisheries Jurisdiction cases, requesting the Applicant States to provide both the Court and the Respondent with all relevant information.

⁵⁵⁸ ICJ US Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran (US v. Iran) (Hostages case), Order of 15 December 1979.

⁵⁵⁹ ICJ Breard (Paraguay v. US), Order of 9 April 1998, LaGrand (Germany v. US), Judgment of 27 June 2001; Avena et al. (Mexico v. US), Order of 5 February 2003 and ICJ Request for cases in question, in its Orders in the Genocide Convention case (1993) and Congo v. Uganda (2000), it did not include a specific requirement for the addressee States to inform it of the measures taken in compliance.⁵⁶⁰

7.2 ITLOS Rules on follow-up

ITLOS does include in its Orders for provisional measures a formal obligation to report on measures taken in compliance. In Rule 95 of the ITLOS Rules of Procedure each Party ‘shall inform the Tribunal as soon as possible as to its compliance (...). In particular, each party shall submit an initial report upon the steps it has taken or proposes to take’. In its Orders prescribing provisional measures ITLOS includes the date by which the Parties are to submit their initial reports. It may also request further information.⁵⁶¹

7.3 Follow-up in death penalty cases

The US death penalty cases are particularly relevant in the context of a discussion on compliance. In the first case the ICJ ordered the US to halt the execution of Paraguayan national Angel Breard. The only step undertaken by the US in response was a letter sent by the Secretary of State Madeleine Albright to Jim Gilmore, the Governor of Virginia, asking him to halt the execution temporarily, because carrying it out at that time ‘could lead some countries to contend incorrectly that the US does not take seriously its obligations’.⁵⁶² At the same time, however, the Clinton administration urged the US Supreme Court not to halt the scheduled execution.⁵⁶³ Administration lawyers said the sole measure available to the US government for complying with the provisional measures was ‘persuasion’, not ‘legal compulsion through the (US) judicial system’.⁵⁶⁴ Angel interpretation of the judgment of 31 March 2004 in the case concerning Avena and other Mexican nationals (Mexico v. US), Order of 16 July 2008. See also Frontier Dispute case (Burkina Faso v. Mali), Order of 10 July 1986.

⁵⁶⁰ ICJ Application of the Convention on the prevention and punishment of the crime of genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)), Order of 8 April 1993 (Bosnia had invoked Article 78 Rules of Court in both requests for provisional measures, but without response by the Court, see Rosenne (2005), p. 178) and Armed activities on the territory of the Congo (Congo v. Uganda), Order of 1 July 2000. See also Land and maritime boundary between Cameroon and Nigeria (Cameroon v. Nigeria), Order of 15 March 1996.

⁵⁶¹ See Rosenne (2005), p. 180.

⁵⁶² Reuters, 14 April 1998. A reference was also made to the rather unfair justice systems in many parts of the world, see Amnesty International (1998), p. 4.

⁵⁶³ See e.g. Amnesty International (1998), p. 4, describing that the US government told the Supreme Court that the assistance of consular officials would not have changed the outcome of the proceedings and that for this reason no stay of execution should be granted despite the ICJ’s provisional measure. Thus, it seems, the same arguments were used by the US before the US Supreme Court (after the provisional measures were indicated), that were rejected by the ICJ. The Solicitor General argued, among others, that ‘the ICJ’s Order indicating provisional measures should not be accorded comity, not should it be considered binding by the Supreme Court’, Aceves (1998), p. 520. See also footnote 17: “David Andrews, the Legal Adviser of the Department of State, co-signed the amicus brief on behalf of the United States. Mr Andrews had appeared as the U.S. Agent before the ICJ barely a week earlier”. See also Wilson (1998), p. 9: “These government lawyers, who had purported to honor the international court’s jurisdiction the week before, now argued to the highest domestic court in the United States that the ICJ’s ruling was “not binding” and that its order was merely “precatory” in nature—in other words, that the ICJ’s ruling was not entitled to any legal deference in the U.S. courts”.

⁵⁶⁴ Reuters, 14 April 1998.

Francisco Breard was executed, as planned, on 14 April 1998 by the commonwealth of Virginia. After his execution Albright apparently said the US ‘did the right thing’.⁵⁶⁵

In cases in which provisional measures are requested and ordered, often the arguments of the Parties on the merits and those on the provisional measures are linked together. The US invoked arguments of federalism, separation of powers and domestic rules of procedure. Its Supreme Court had indicated that it must decide questions presented to it ‘on the basis of law’. ‘The Executive Branch, on the other hand,’ it stated, ‘in exercising its authority over foreign relations may, and in this case did, utilize diplomatic discussion with Paraguay. Last night the Secretary of State sent a letter to the Governor of Virginia requesting that he stay Breard’s execution. If the Governor wishes to wait for the decision of the ICJ, that is his prerogative. But nothing in our existing case law allows us to make that choice for him’.⁵⁶⁶ In effect this means it considered that a decision by the ICJ is not ‘law’, the US Supreme Court never makes new law, and the issue was solely a matter for ‘diplomatic discussion’. The US Supreme Court’s decision marked the end of Breard’s life, since the US government felt it could not do anything apart from requesting the Governor of Virginia to postpone the execution and urging the Supreme Court not to do that.⁵⁶⁷ The ICJ’s provisional measures were meant to ensure that the execution would not take place during the course of the proceedings before it. By ignoring these and executing Breard, the US not only showed disrespect for the ICJ, but also rendered it impossible to award the specific remedy claimed by Paraguay, namely restitutio in integrum.⁵⁶⁸

The ICJ did not have an opportunity to comment on the US disrespect for its Order to halt the execution of Paraguayan citizen Breard, as Paraguay requested a discontinuance of the case several months after Breard’s execution.⁵⁶⁹ In a way the Court’s Order to halt the execution of German citizen Walter LaGrand could be seen as a follow-up on the US non-compliance in Breard in that the Court pointed out that the responsibility of the Respondent State is engaged by the actions of all its composite parts and that the federal authorities must transmit the Order to, in this case, the Governor of Arizona, who was in turn obliged to act in compliance with the ICJ’s Order.⁵⁷⁰

Nevertheless, Walter Lagrand was executed. Different from Paraguay Germany maintained the case. Thus, in its judgment in LaGrand the ICJ did have the opportunity to follow-up on its Order for provisional measures. It determined that the US had not complied. It did note that this measure did not create an obligation of result and agreed that ‘due to the extremely late presentation of the request for provisional measures, there was certainly very little time for the ⁵⁶⁸ See further Rieter (1998) as well as the contributions in Agora, American Journal of International Law (1998); Aceves (1998); Klabbers (1998) and Wilson (1998). For a different approach see Bradley (1998-1999) arguing that the ‘internationalist conception’ of the relation between international and US law is inconsistent with the traditionally ‘dualist’ approach and unlikely to be to be accepted by US authorities.

⁵⁶⁵ Reuters, 16 April 1998.

⁵⁶⁶ US Supreme Court, Breard v. Greene, 523 U.S. 371 (1998) (14 April 1998).

⁵⁶⁷ See also Aceves (1998) p. 523 calling it ‘disquieting’ that the final decision on compliance with treaty obligations and provisional measures are entrusted to state rather than federal authorities and Wilson (1998), p. 1 wondering why it fell to a state governor ‘to effectively decide the legal force of a decision of an international tribunal’.

⁵⁶⁹ ICJ Breard (Paraguay v. US), Order of 9 April 1998; Request by Paraguay for a discontinuance (2 November 1998); Order of 10 November 1998 to remove the case from the List. As Paraguay initially expressed its intention to continue the case after the execution of its national, there has been speculation on possible pressure subsequently exerted on this State that could explain its request to remove the case from the List.

⁵⁷⁰ ICJ LaGrand (Germany v. US), Order of 3 March 1999, §28.

United States authorities to act'.⁵⁷¹ Nevertheless it observed that 'the mere transmission of its Order to the Governor of Arizona without any comment, particularly without even so much as a plea for a temporary stay and an explanation that there is no general agreement on the position of the United States that orders of the International Court of Justice on provisional measures are non-binding, was certainly less than could have been done even in the short time available'.⁵⁷² It also commented on the Solicitor General's letter to the US Supreme Court:

"The same is true of the United States Solicitor General's categorical statement in his brief letter to the United States Supreme Court that 'an order of the International Court of Justice indicating provisional measures is non-binding and does not furnish a basis for judicial relief'".⁵⁷³

The ICJ reflected on the decision of the Governor of Arizona as well:

"It is also noteworthy that the Governor of Arizona, to whom the Court's Order had been transmitted, decided not to give effect to it, even though the Arizona Clemency Board has recommended a stay of execution for Walter LaGrand".⁵⁷⁴

Finally, it commented on the decision of the Supreme Court which had rejected a separate application by Germany for a stay of execution, although 'it would have been open to the Supreme Court, as one of its members urged, to grant a preliminary stay'.⁵⁷⁵ The ICJ summarised the situation as follows: 'the various competent United States authorities failed to take all the steps they could have taken to give effect to the Court's Order'. The Order did not require the US to 'exercise powers it did not have', but it did impose the obligation to 'take all measures at its disposal to ensure that Walter LaGrand is not executed pending the final decision in these proceedings'. It found that the US did not discharge this obligation.⁵⁷⁶

In other words, in its judgment in LaGrand the ICJ clearly followed up the non-compliance with its Order, by singling out the roles of various US authorities and explain that it had not ordered anything out of the ordinary. Yet for several reasons it did not attach additional consequences to its finding of non-compliance. It observed that Germany, in its third submission, only requested the Court to 'adjudge and declare' that the US violated its international legal obligation to comply with the Order. It contained no other request regarding that violation. "Moreover, the Court points out that the United States was under great time pressure in this case, due to the circumstances in which Germany had instituted the proceedings". It further noted that 'at the time when the United States authorities took their decision the question of the binding character of orders indicating provisional measures had been extensively discussed in the literature, but had not been settled by its jurisprudence. The Court would have taken these factors into consideration had Germany's submission included a claim for indemnification'.⁵⁷⁷

The US attitude towards the provisional measures by the ICJ displayed in Breard and subsequently in LaGrand may be explained by a (latent) hostility towards international law and a high level of ignorance by some members of Congress and of some domestic courts as to its

⁵⁷¹ ICJ LaGrand (Germany v. US), Judgment of 27 June 2001, §111.

⁵⁷² Id., §112.

⁵⁷³ Id., §112.

⁵⁷⁴ Id., §113.

⁵⁷⁵ Id., §114.

⁵⁷⁶ Id., §115.

⁵⁷⁷ Id., §116. See also on the LaGrand Judgment: Orakhelashvili (2005); Cassel (2002); Fitzpatrick (2002); LaGrand Symposium (2002); Mckie (2002); Mennecke/Tams (2002); Orakhelashvili (2002); Rieter (2002); Schiffman (2002); Hirsch Ballin (2001); Oellers-Frahm (2001a).

contents and meaning.⁵⁷⁸ To some extent this situation appeared to be changing. Combined with the fact that some actors may gradually have become used to the idea of the ICJ's provisional measures and judgments in LaGrand and Avena, more and more critical voices in the US itself resort to arguments based on international and comparative law.⁵⁷⁹ The US respected the Order for provisional measures in Avena (2003).⁵⁸⁰ In response to the Judgment (2004) in this case the President this time gave a clear message to the Attorney General about the need to comply.⁵⁸¹

Yet, as noted, at the same time the US withdrew from the Optional Protocol to the VCCR, blocking any future efforts by other States to bring a conflict regarding this treaty to the ICJ for resolution.⁵⁸² In addition, the US Supreme Court has now found that 'neither the Avena Judgment on its own, nor the Judgment in conjunction with the President's memorandum, constituted directly enforceable federal law' precluding Texas from "applying state procedural rules that barred all review and consideration of Mr. Medellín's Vienna Convention claim".⁵⁸³

As discussed, the subsequent Order for provisional measures by the ICJ was based on a request for interpretation of the Avena judgment. In this context the discussion arose as to whether one could speak of a legal dispute on interpretation as required by Article 60 ICJ Statute.⁵⁸⁴ In its provisional measure itself the Court again included the obligation of the State to inform it of the implementation measures undertaken.⁵⁸⁵ In any case, subsequently both the US Supreme Court and the State of Texas ignored the ICJ's Order for provisional measures and Medellín was ⁵⁷⁸ See e.g. the reaction at the ICJ's provisional measures by a spokesperson for Jesse Helms (chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee) who, as Amnesty International puts it, 'appeared to have forgotten that the USA entered into the terms of the Vienna Convention voluntarily'. He condemned the Court's decision in the following words: "It is an appalling intrusion by the United Nations into the affairs of the State of Virginia. (...) There is only one court that matters here. That's the Supreme Court. There's only one law that applies. That's the United States Constitution". Cited in Amnesty International (1998), p. 4.

⁵⁷⁹ The US Supreme Court itself, for instance, has referred to international and comparative law in its decision on the death penalty for minors. Yet with regard to the VCCR it confirmed its earlier decision in Breard v. Greene, 523 U.S. 371, see Sanchez-Llamas v. Oregon, 548 U.S. 331 (2006). See also Medellín v. Dretke, 544 U.S. 660 and Kirgis (2006). See further Chapter XVII (Official responses) and opinion poll conducted by Knowledge Networks, 'Americans on International Courts and their Jurisdiction over the US', 11 May 2005, <www.worldpublicopinion.org/pipa/pdf/may06/Tribunals_May06_rpt.pdf>.

⁵⁸⁰ ICJ Avena (Mexico v. US), Order of 5 February 2003. The death sentence against Torres was commuted to life imprisonment and the other two beneficiaries were not executed either. See e.g. Murphy (2004), pp. 581-584 and Shelton (2004a).

⁵⁸¹ See section 3.3.7 of this Chapter.

⁵⁸² Most significant in this respect was the aforementioned quote of State Department spokesman Erel: 'we have a system of justice that provides people with due process and review of their cases, and it's not appropriate that there should be some international court that comes in and reverses decisions of our national courts' in: 'U.S. quits foreign inmate accord', CNN.com, 11 March 2005. This indicates at least a double message on the meaning of US obligations, this one meant for an internal rather than international audience.

⁵⁸³ US Supreme Court Medellín v. Texas, [US] 552 U.S. _ (2008), 128 S. Ct. 1346 (25 March 2008). See also section 3.3.7 of this Chapter.

⁵⁸⁴ ICJ Request for interpretation of the judgment of 31 March 2004 in the case concerning Avena and other Mexican nationals (Mexico v. US), Order of 16 July 2008. See further section 3.3.7 of this Chapter.

⁵⁸⁵ ICJ Request for interpretation of the judgment of 31 March 2004 in the case concerning Avena and other Mexican nationals (Mexico v. US), Order of 16 July 2008, §80.

executed.⁵⁸⁶ The Court has observed that the US failed to discharge of its obligation under its Order. This is not a very strong response, but at least it is combined with the observation that it is for the Court and not the parties to determine the Court's jurisdiction.

When States have agreed, under international law, to have the ICJ resolve any conflicts they may have regarding the interpretation of a treaty, these conflicts are certainly not resolved if individual states in a federation choose to ignore its Orders or Judgments and if they do so, the State concerned bears full responsibility.

7.4 Follow-up in the context of armed conflict

In its judgment in the Nicaragua case (1986) the ICJ specifically discussed the failure of the Parties to fully comply with its Order of provisional measures.⁵⁸⁷ In its judgment in Burkina Faso v. Mali (1986) the ICJ Chamber referred to its Order of January 1986 and noted 'with satisfaction that the Heads of State of Burkina Faso and the Republic of Mali have agreed "to withdraw all their armed forces from either side of the disputed area and to effect their return to their respective territories"',⁵⁸⁸

In the Genocide Convention case (1993) Bosnia requested additional provisional measures within four months of the Court's first Order. Instead, the ICJ reaffirmed that its previous Order

⁵⁸⁶ US Supreme Court 552 U.S. _ (2008), 128 S. Ct. 1346 (25 March 2008) (5-4 per curiam decision). One of the dissenters, Justice Breyer, pointed out that the execution should have been stayed, among others because of the ICJ Order; because 'legislation has been introduced in Congress seeking to provide the legislative approval necessary to transform our international legal obligations into binding domestic law. See Avena Case Implementation Act of 2008, H. R. 6481, 110th Cong., 2d Sess. (2008) (referred to committee, July 14, 2008)'; because 'prior to Medellín, Congress may not have understood the legal need for further legislation of this kind. That fact, along with the approaching election, means that more than a few days or weeks are likely necessary for Congress to determine whether to enact the proposed Legislation' and because 'to permit this execution to proceed forthwith places the United States irremediably in violation of international law and breaks our treaty promises'. He also pointed out that 'different Members of this Court seem to have very different views of what this case is about. In my view, the issue in this suit – what the majority describe as the "beginning premise" – is not whether a confession was unlawfully obtained from petitioner'(...). 'Rather, the question before us is whether the United States will carry out its international legal obligation to enforce the decision of the ICJ. That decision requires a further hearing to determine whether a conceded violation of the Vienna Convention (Texas' failure to inform petitioner of his rights under the Vienna Convention) was or was not harmless'. Obviously, the fact that non-compliance with the Court's judgment may be brought before the UN Security Council is simply one method of enforcement that cannot be used as an excuse for domestic courts not to implement international law obligations, especially those obligations that should indeed be regarded as self-executing for the reasons provided in the dissent by Breyer, in a domestic system in which treaties are in any case considered the supreme law of the land. See further on this case the contributions of the Medellín symposium (Suffolk Transnational Law Review 2008) such as the pertinent remarks by Paust, pp. 303-333 on the supremacy clause, self-execution and, in particular the role of the UN Security Council.

⁵⁸⁷ ICJ Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. US), Judgment on the merits of 27 June 1986, §§286-291. See also Reichler (2001). See on Nicaragua's attempt to renew its request for provisional measures Rosenne (2005), pp. 170-172.

⁵⁸⁸ ICJ Burkina Faso v. Mali, Judgment of 22 December 1986, §§177-178.

‘should be immediately and effectively implemented’.⁵⁸⁹ In this light its response in its judgment on the merits to Serbia’s non-compliance with its provisional measures was rather weak (2007).⁵⁹⁰

In its judgment in Congo v. Uganda (2005) it dealt with the issue of non-compliance, but only on request by the applicant State. It concluded that Uganda had not complied with its Order of July 2000. Congo had requested the Court to declare so, but it had not submitted specific evidence in this regard. Yet the Court pointed out that it had just found Uganda responsible for acts of killing, torture and other forms of inhuman treatment in violation of international human rights and humanitarian law carried out by its military forces against Congolese civilians.⁵⁹¹ Specifically it found violations of the right to life and the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment in international and African human rights treaties.⁵⁹² These violations had been continued after the Court’s Order for provisional measures.⁵⁹³ The ICJ added that it had in fact addressed its provisional measures to both Parties and that its finding on the non-compliance by Uganda did not mean that the Congo ‘did not also fail to comply’ with its measures.⁵⁹⁴

In a separate opinion Judge Kooyijmans considered that the Court should have dismissed Congo’s submission on Uganda’s non-compliance, as it had not met the burden of proof. He noted that the formulation chosen by the Court seemed ‘to indicate an awareness’ that neither Uganda nor the Congo had respected the provisional measures. He considered that it would have been ‘judicially sound’ not to have found that Uganda had not complied with its Order on provisional measures, although he had ‘no doubt whatsoever that Uganda breached its obligations under the Order’. Yet the evidentiary requirements and the purpose of provisional measures to protect the ‘legal interests of either party’ caused him to regret the ICJ’s finding that one of the Parties had violated the Order for provisional measures.⁵⁹⁵

The claims brought by the Congo related to acts that took place after the provisional measures were ordered while the counter-claims by Uganda, to the extent they were accepted by the Court, did not, making it more difficult for the Court to comment on violations of the provisional measures by Congo. The ICJ may have considered that its freedom to deal with information not based on the applications of the Parties is more limited at the stage of the merits

⁵⁸⁹ ICJ Application of the Convention on the prevention and punishment of the crime of genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)), Order of 13 September 1993 (second request), §53. See further Toufayan (2005), Gaffikin (1995) and Wiebalck (1995). See also Wellens (1998), p. 424 (“This conclusion not only reinforces the view of the Court as to the effects to be given to any order indicating provisional measures, but it also exemplifies sound judicial reasoning, keeping the balance between the awareness of the limits of the Court’s power over effective implementation and the need to closely reassess all the circumstances since the making of the previous order”).

⁵⁹⁰ Of course this also related to the fact that it did not find Serbia responsible for complicity, but only for failure to prevent. In this context it referred to the failure to observe its provisional measures as an element in establishing the State’s responsibility for failure to prevent. Yet it appeared to attach no other consequences to the State’s failure to observe its provisional measures.

⁵⁹¹ ICJ Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (Congo v. Uganda), Judgment of 19 December 2005, §345.

⁵⁹² Articles 6 (1) and 7 ICCPR; Articles 4 and 5 ACHPR; Article 38 (2) and (3) Convention on the Rights of the Child and Articles 1, 2, 3 (3), (4), (5) and (6) of its Optional Protocol on child soldiers. See ICJ Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (Congo v. Uganda), Judgment of 19 December 2005, §219.

⁵⁹³ ICJ Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (Congo v. Uganda), Judgment of 19 December 2005, §264.

⁵⁹⁴ Id., §265.

⁵⁹⁵ ICJ Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (Congo v. Uganda), Judgment of 19 December 2005, Separate Opinion of Judge Kooyijmans §§74-78.

than at the stage of provisional measures. Nevertheless, this may not be the case in the context of following up on its own Orders for provisional measures. The Court itself appears to be the most appropriate body to monitor compliance with its provisional measures. Proprio motu examination of publicly available materials is in fact warranted in this context even if the Parties fail in bringing such materials to the Court's attention. In addition, international organisations could take a more active approach, assisting the Court in its function of monitoring compliance with its provisional measures by invoking the possibility of Article 69(2) Rules of Court. This Article stipulates:

“When a public international organization sees fit to furnish, on its own initiative, information relevant to a case before the Court, it shall do so in the form of a Memorial to be filed in the Registry before the closure of the written proceedings. The Court shall retain the right to require such information to be supplemented, either orally or in writing, in the form of answers to any questions which it may see fit to formulate, and also to authorize the parties to comment, either orally or in writing, on the information thus furnished”.

Moreover, in certain cases the Court could implicitly invite such organisations to provide pertinent information by notifying them of relevant pending cases.⁵⁹⁶

Ad hoc judge Kateka attached a dissenting opinion to the Court's judgment. He invoked the ‘clean hands’ theory and considered that the Court's finding of Uganda's non-compliance showed a ‘lack of concern’ for the actions taken by the Congo to raise this issue against Uganda when it itself had committed grave violations of human rights and international humanitarian law.⁵⁹⁷

Yet when discussing the protection of human beings even-handedness should not play the role suggested by Kateka. Otherwise the actor suffering the consequences of this approach would be the individual, who in the present constellation can only be represented by his State. Rightly, the Court was not swayed by the ‘clean hands’ argument, which would have left the individual without any form of legal protection just because his State did not have clean hands.

Indeed, if a ‘clean hands’ theory would have a role to play, the Court could easily address it in its phrasing of provisional measures, as it did in this case by ordering both Parties to take the necessary measures to ensure full respect for fundamental human rights and the applicable provisions of humanitarian law. Moreover, the subsequent expression by the Court in its Judgment of an awareness that both Parties may have failed to comply with its Order seems sufficient to deal with any disingenuousness on the part of the Congo.

While the ICJ did point out that its Orders on provisional measures under Article 41 had binding effect⁵⁹⁸ and that they ‘created legal obligations which both Parties were required to comply with’, it simply found,⁵⁹⁹ that Uganda did not comply with its Order of 2000. It did not attach any specific consequences to this finding.⁶⁰⁰ As noted, in its judgment in the Genocide Convention case (2007) took a similar approach.⁶⁰¹ In any future cases of non-compliance it is to be hoped that the Court will take an approach that is gradually more robust.

⁵⁹⁶ See Article 43(2) of the Rules of Court, as amended 29 September 2005. The international organisations referred to in Article 69 are organisations of States.

⁵⁹⁷ ICJ Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (Congo v. Uganda), Judgment of 19 December 2005, Dissenting Opinion of Judge Kateka, §61.

⁵⁹⁸ Referring to LaGrand (Germany v. US), Judgment of 27 June 2001, §109.

⁵⁹⁹ It did so by 15 votes to 2 (Judge Kooijmans and Judge ad hoc Kateka dissenting).

⁶⁰⁰ Its finding on the obligation to make reparation for the injury caused was made before its finding on non-compliance with its provisional measures.

⁶⁰¹ CJ ICJ Application of the Convention on the prevention and punishment of the crime of genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)), 26 February 2007. More

8 CONCLUSION

As Judge Higgins wrote in 1997, ‘the evolving jurisprudence on provisional measures shows a growing tendency to recognize the human realities behind disputes of states’.⁶⁰² Generally speaking the rationale behind the use of provisional measures is to ensure a meaningful outcome of a case brought before a court or other adjudicator. More specifically, the traditional purposes of provisional measures as used by the ICJ are twofold. The first is the preservation of rights, the breach of which is both imminent (or already taking place) and likely to cause irreparable harm to the rights claimed. The second, applied only incidentally, is the preservation of proper legal proceedings. In other words, in the first case there should be a link between the right and remedy claimed and the provisional measure and in the second case there should be a link between the provisional measure and the purpose of having a fair and accurate procedure.⁶⁰³

On the other hand the ICJ has occasionally used provisional measures for reasons not necessarily closely related to the rights claimed or to the proceedings. It has taken provisional measures in border conflict cases, not only to maintain the status quo in relation to the claim, but also to prevent irreparable harm to civilians living in the border area. Their rights were not the (main) subject of a State’s request for provisional measures against another State but ‘collateral’ to the dispute.⁶⁰⁴ This would indicate that the ICJ, as an adjudicator not primarily dealing with human rights, has developed a certain sensitivity towards the plight of human beings caught up in conflicts between States. In any case it shows that in the practice of the ICJ the traditional twofold distinction may have been extended to a threefold distinction: to prevent irreparable harm to the claim, to the procedure or to individuals not central to the dispute.

Cançado Trindade has noted that human rights treaties have set limits to State voluntarism, creating a ‘new vision of the relations between public power and the human being, which is summed up, ultimately, in the recognition that the State exists for the human being, and not vice-versa’.⁶⁰⁵

As Crocket already pointed out in 1977, referring to the Court’s general power to order provisional measures, jurisdiction to do so ‘would appear to be more closely related to the inherent power of an international tribunal to determine its own jurisdiction than to the doctrine that jurisdiction is conferred through the consent of the parties’.⁶⁰⁶

The ICJ is not a human rights court. It does not even deal with individual complaints. Yet in spite of the limitations it is faced with as an adjudicator dealing only with inter-State complaints, it does seem to realise the importance of the protection of groups and individuals. Moreover, for conceptual reasons its use of provisional measures is relevant to the practice of the human rights adjudicators. It may be, for instance, that the unequivocal confirmation of the binding nature of its provisional measures in LaGrand will contribute to better compliance by States, not just of its own provisional measures,⁶⁰⁷ but also in the context of provisional measures by other international adjudicators. After all the ICJ referred to the inherent function of adjudicators to order preservation of the status quo pending the proceedings, invoking the general principle that States must not allow any step to be taken that might aggravate the dispute.

generally on this case, see e.g. Amerasinghe (2008); Ben-Naftali/Sharon (2008); Goldstone/Hamilton (2008); Dupuy (2007); Sivakumaran (2007); Sorel (2007) and Weckel (2007).

⁶⁰² Higgins (1997), p. 108.

⁶⁰³ This includes hearing both parties on the basis of equality of arms and preserving the evidence.

⁶⁰⁴ Higgins (1997), pp. 101-102 and pp. 107-108.

⁶⁰⁵ IACHR Blake v. Guatemala, Judgment on reparations of 22 January 1999, Separate Opinion Judge Cançado Trindade, §33.

⁶⁰⁶ Crocket (1977), p. 379.

⁶⁰⁷ Indeed, the US respected the subsequent provisional measures in Avena.

The ICJ's finding in LaGrand that its provisional measures are legally binding is not made dependent on the fact that basic rights of the human person were involved, but is simply part of its traditional function. The power to indicate binding provisional measures is required by the object and purpose of Article 41 ICJ Statute and 'based on the necessity, when the circumstances call for it, to safeguard, and to avoid prejudice to, the rights of the parties as determined by the final judgment of the Court'.⁶⁰⁸

At the same time some of the conflicts between States in which the ICJ orders provisional measures may indeed concern the rights of individuals and the (human rights) obligations of States towards them.⁶⁰⁹ This only underscores the importance of the inherent powers of adjudicators in this respect. In such cases its provisional measures may either aim to halt measures that could result in irreparable harm to a large group of people (armed activities, nuclear tests, etc), or aim at the (diplomatic) protection of specific individuals (halt execution of a death sentence; release persons held hostage).

Various aspects of the Court's orders for provisional measures specifically show its receptiveness to the fate of human beings. In the Chorzów factory (1927) case, concerning a request to grant a pecuniary claim at the provisional measures stage, rather than to secure rights basic to the human being, the PCIJ was strict and refused to order provisional measures. It considered that the request coincided with the claim on the merits and was in fact a request for an interim judgment. On the other hand, without breaking with Chorzów factory, the ICJ did take provisional measures in the Nuclear Test cases (1973).⁶¹⁰ While it did not explain the difference, it is likely, especially in light of subsequent cases, that it took into account the enormity of the possible consequences to the environment and population of the Applicant States. In the Hostages case (1979) it again ordered provisional measures overlapping to a great extent with the main claim. What distinguishes these cases from the Chorzów factory case is that they involved the fate of human beings.

The ICJ equally has relaxed the strict requirement that the Applicant State should not only specify the rights invoked in the context of the request for provisional measures, but that these should also be related to the main claim. This involves cases, for instance, of armed conflict in which the States may not necessarily be as interested in the fate of the people living in the disputed areas as the Court itself. It is particularly relevant in border conflict cases in which the Court has added references to so-called 'collateral' claims, involving 'collateral damage' to people. It may even be argued that the Court could introduce proprio motu a reference to the obligations of States vis-à-vis these people, based on the merest opening in this respect in one of the submissions of one of the Parties.⁶¹¹

In some cases, at the stage of provisional measures, the Court was yet to determine on the merits whether a certain act or omission by a State would indeed constitute a violation of the rights invoked by the other State (e.g. the Nuclear Test cases). In other cases it was clear that certain acts or omissions constituted a violation of the rights invoked, but the dispute related to evidence and/or imputability (e.g. Hostages case and DRC v. Uganda).

The ICJ has also taken into account the basic rights of the individual in its attitude towards procedural requirements. In a particularly urgent case it has used provisional measures in advance of a hearing on the use of provisional measures: in an Order to halt the imminent execution of an individual it was prepared to 'reward' the State involved for submitting the claim and request for provisional measures strategically late, as the individual facing execution could hardly be punished for his State being procedurally remiss. Had the claim only involved pecuniary interests, rather than the life of an individual, such decision would have been unlikely.

⁶⁰⁸ ICJ LaGrand (Germany v. US), Judgment of 27 June 2001, §102.

⁶⁰⁹ See generally e.g. Sohn (1982).

⁶¹⁰ Only two of the judges considered this approach incorrect, as rewarding an attempt to obtain an 'interim judgement'.

⁶¹¹ For a different approach see Yoshiyuki Iwamoto (2002).

In some cases States may invoke human rights treaties. Even if they act on the basis of diplomatic protection rather than erga omnes obligations they in fact ask the ICJ to interpret State obligations under human rights treaties and, therefore, to take into account the rights of the individuals concerned. In such cases the assessment of the risk involved and the role of the beneficiaries may differ from the approach normally taken by the ICJ in its use of provisional measures and approximate more closely the provisional measures taken by human rights adjudicators.⁶¹² At the same time, as noted, States may sometimes be involved in legal disputes that have developed into military conflict, with their citizens caught in the middle. If the States involved bring the case before the Court and request provisional measures, not particularly invoking the rights of the individuals, the ICJ nevertheless takes into account the basic rights of the individual. As a result the provisional measures ordered may differ from those requested. In general the Court seems to be more resourceful in drafting Orders for provisional measures different from those requested when the case involves the fate of human beings: it refers to the obligations of both Parties and it adds the obligation not to aggravate the dispute, referring to its task in the maintenance of peace and security.

The more recent decisions to take provisional measures in the consular protection/death penalty cases, on the one hand, and on mass human rights violations, on the other, are a confirmation of the progressive developments described by Higgins.⁶¹³ In this sense they constitute examples of the humanization of international law observed by various authors.⁶¹⁴

Already in 1960, in Honduras v. Nicaragua, the ICJ noted that the reference to ‘judicial decisions’ in Art 38(1)(d) of the ICJ Statute is not limited to ICJ case law alone. At the time the ECtHR was barely in existence and the other international adjudicators were not even established yet.⁶¹⁵ The subsequent Chapters deal with the judicial decisions by the human rights adjudicators in urgent cases since 1960. International human rights law may considerably enhance public international law in general and the ICJ extensively referred to it in its Advisory Opinion on the Wall in the occupied Palestinian territory (2004). It considered the text and object and purpose of human rights treaties, referred to the ‘constant practice’ of the supervisory bodies to these treaties, invoking their authoritative case law, General Comments and Concluding Observations.⁶¹⁶

⁶¹² The most interesting source for comparison would be the practice of the human rights adjudicators of using provisional measures in inter-State proceedings, but there is not much practice in this regard. Only the ECtHR has had to deal with requests for provisional measures in inter-State proceedings.

⁶¹³ Higgins (1997). For discussion of subsequent developments see e.g. Rieter (1998); Addo (1999); Feria Tinta (2001); Rieter (2002); Schabas (2002b); Orakhelashvili (2002); Shelton (2004a); Ghandhi (2004); Milano (2005); Dugard (2007); Higgins (2007); Pronto (2007); Bedi (2007). For an approach considering the Court’s new reasoning ‘artificial’ see Jennings (2002) and Yoshiyuko Iwamoto (2002).

⁶¹⁴ See e.g. Buergenthal/Sohn (1973); Van Boven (1982); Simma (1993); Buergenthal (1997); Higgins (1998); Meron (2000); Flinterman (2000); Kamminga (2001); Seiderman (2001); Cançado Trindade (2004); Meron (2006).

⁶¹⁵ ICJ Arbitration Judgment of the King of Spain of 1906 (Honduras v. Nicaragua), Judgment of 18 November 1960, pp. 204-217. See also the Separate Opinion of Judge Cançado Trindade in the judgment on preliminary objections in IACHR Constantine et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago, 1 September 2001, §34.

⁶¹⁶ ICJ Advisory Opinion on the Legal Consequences of the Construction of a Wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, 9 July 2004, §§107-114 and 136.

Cançado Trindade has pointed out that human rights law enables the law of treaties to evolve and to regulate legal relations between and within States and that by affirming contemporary legal principles human rights law in fact enriches and legitimises general international law.⁶¹⁷

Indeed, the practice of the ICJ indicates, albeit tentatively, that adjudicators not exclusively dealing with human rights may develop sensitivity for the plight of human beings caught up in conflicts between States, with its consequential effects on the concept of provisional measures.⁶¹⁸

⁶¹⁷ IACHR Blake v. Guatemala, Judgment on reparations of 22 January 1999, Separate Opinion Judge Cançado Trindade §§27-28. He also considered that the emphasis on positivism and on States as the main subjects of international law is simply a product of the time, rather than 'eternal and immutable truths'. In fact, given the growing importance of human rights, the 'almost mechanical application' of so-called truths, such as the autonomous will of the State, has become inappropriate. IACHR Blake v. Guatemala, Judgment on reparations of 22 January 1999, Separate Opinion Judge Cançado Trindade, §§28-29.

⁶¹⁸ As a Judge at the ICJ Cançado Trindade subsequently observed that 'we are living the infancy' of the ICJ's jurisprudential development relating to provisional measures. He noted that the Court had not yet pronounced on the autonomy of its Orders for provisional measures, nor on the legal consequences of non-compliance, nor on issues of state responsibility in this respect. Questions relating to the Obligation to Prosecute or Extradite (Belgium v. Senegal), Order of 28 May 2009, dissenting opinion Judge Cançado Trindade, §97.

CHAPTER II

THE USE OF PROVISIONAL MEASURES IN THE CONTEXT OF THE VARIOUS HUMAN RIGHTS SYSTEMS

1 INTRODUCTION

This Chapter introduces the human rights adjudicators referred to in this book: the Human Rights Committee (HRC), the Committee against Torture (CAT), the Inter-American Commission (CIDH)¹ and Court of Human Rights (IACHR), the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights (ACHPR), the European Commission and Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) and the Bosnia Human Rights Chamber. The other two UN Committees, the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD) and the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) are only mentioned briefly, lacking extensive practice with regard to the use of provisional measures. The same applies for the recently established African Court of Human and Peoples' Rights.

The Chapter sets out the rules on provisional measures in the context of the respective individual complaint systems. For each system it briefly sums up the situations in which provisional measures have been used, their context (institutional setting and the right of individual complaint), the power of the adjudicator to use provisional measures and the promptness with which it uses them and, finally, the sources about provisional measures used for this book (under the heading 'transparency or the lack thereof').²

The Chapter concludes with a brief discussion of the authority to use provisional measures, the importance of motivating them and the general issue of convergence and divergence.³ As to the latter, the overview presented in this Chapter serves to highlight commonalities as well as differences between the systems. This contextual information may help explain why the respective practices of the adjudicators, discussed in the subsequent chapters, converge or diverge.

2 HUMAN RIGHTS COMMITTEE

2.1 Introduction

The HRC, supervising compliance with the ICCPR, has mostly used provisional measures to halt execution of the death penalty. In addition it has used provisional measures to inquire about the health situation of detainees, to halt expulsions and corporal punishment, to find a missing person and to ensure access to counsel. Moreover, it has used them in cases involving indigenous culture (e.g. when a company is allowed to log trees in a traditional grazing area), in a family life case, in a case involving death threats and in a freedom of expression case (to halt the destruction of a painting).

¹ The Spanish acronym CIDH is used: Comisión Interamericana de Derechos Humanos, so as to distinguish it from IACHR. In this book IACHR stands for Inter-American Court of Human Rights.

² Because of variations in the availability of information the discussion on procedure and promptness is more extensive with regard to some systems than with regard to others.

³ The subsequent Chapters more extensively discuss the practice of the adjudicators. While this Chapter, for instance, deals with the competence of the various adjudicators to use provisional measures, Chapter XIV deals with the relevance of jurisdiction on the merits for the use of provisional measures and Chapter XVI deals with the legal status of these measures.

This section discusses the institutional setting of the provisional measures as used by the HRC and the right of individual petition, the power to order provisional measures, the promptness of the adjudicator in deciding on the use of provisional measures and the availability of information on the use of these measures.

2.2 The right of individual complaint: the HRC and the OP to the ICCPR

The ICCPR entered into force in 1976 and has 160 States parties.⁴ The HRC, consisting of 18 independent experts, supervises to what extent the States parties respect the ICCPR. The first Optional Protocol (OP) to the ICCPR lays down the right of individual complaint. It does not explicitly refer to the power to take provisional measures, but in 1977 the HRC included this possibility in its Rules of Procedure.⁵

In order to clarify the Committee's use of provisional measures it is sometimes helpful to consult not just its case law on the merits and inadmissibility, but also other sources of information on its interpretation of rights. The Committee's activities under the reporting procedure are one of three sources of information on its interpretation of rights. As part of the reporting procedure (under Article 40 ICCPR) States parties must periodically send in reports explaining how their legislation and practice answer to the obligations they assumed under the treaty. In a discussion that takes place in public a delegation of the State answers questions posed by Committee members. The HRC then publishes its official comments on the State report as Concluding Observations.⁶ The second source of information is the publication by the HRC of General Comments on specific rights or issues.⁷ In order to clarify the concept of provisional measures the third source of information is obviously the most important: the decisions of the HRC on individual complaints.

Bringing a case (an individual complaint) before the Committee is only possible if the State against which the complaint is directed has pre-committed itself to the individual complaint procedure under the first Optional Protocol (OP) to the ICCPR. Under this Protocol, 110 States have recognised the right of persons under their jurisdiction to submit individual complaints to the Committee.⁸

⁴ Treaty concluded in 1966, entered into force 1976, 160 States Parties according to the data provided by the UN High Commissioner on Human Rights (last updated 20 July 2007): <<http://untreaty.un.org>> (accessed 29 November 2007).

⁵ It did so as Rule 86. In August 2004 its Rules of Procedure were renumbered. Now Rule 92 is the Rule on provisional measures. Still, most of the quotes are from cases published prior to that date and they refer to Rule 86. This list provides an overview of the most relevant Rules:

Provisional measures	Rule 86 (old) → Rule 92 (new)
Transmission to State/request for information	Rule 91 (old) → Rule 97 (new)
Designation of Special Rapporteurs	Rule 89 (old) → Rule 95 (new)
Confidentiality	Rule 96 (old) → Rule 102 (new)

⁶ Where relevant this book also refers to these Concluding Observations. See generally Boerefijn (1999a).

⁷ Where relevant reference is made to these General Comments throughout this book.

⁸ Treaty concluded in 1966, entered into force 1976, 110 States Parties according to the data provided by the UN High Commissioner on Human Rights (last updated 11 October 2007): <<http://untreaty.un.org>> (accessed 29 November 2007). On exhaustion see Article 5 OP. As Harrington puts it, States have granted the right of individual petition to over a billion people in the world, Harrington (2003), p. 64.

The petitioners must claim to be a victim of a provision of the ICCPR. Individuals claiming such a violation before the HRC can do this only after they have exhausted domestic remedies. In other words, they must first try and get redress before the courts of the State against which they are bringing a claim. This way, this State has the opportunity to resolve and remedy the situation before it ends up at the international level. Only when they have exhausted domestic remedies or when no effective remedies are available, victims of human rights violations may resort to the Committee to find redress.⁹ Victims initiate such a complaint by writing a letter to the Committee's Secretariat in Geneva. When the letter contains insufficient information, the Secretariat specifies to the petitioner (usually called 'author' and sometimes 'applicant') the additional information necessary for the registration of the complaint.¹⁰ Petitioners do not need to travel to Geneva as the procedure is conducted entirely in writing. Both the petitioner and the respondent State have the opportunity to respond to each other's submissions. It is an adversary procedure based on equality of arms. The parties must comply with certain procedural requirements. The Committee has denied many claims as prima facie unsubstantiated. It has denied other claims because the alleged facts occurred before the ICCPR entered into force for the State in question. It also declares a complaint inadmissible if it is not based on any provision of the Covenant or is even contrary to the Covenant or if it includes insulting language to the State concerned.

For many individuals the Committee is the first (quasi-) judicial body dealing with their complaint about violations of Covenant provisions, because these were never properly addressed before domestic courts. In other cases domestic courts may have been uncertain about the proper interpretation of certain provisions. In such situations the Committee can provide the necessary clarifications.

The State parties against which complaints have been lodged vary considerably. Examples are Canada, Argentina, the Netherlands, Zambia, and Georgia. The subject matter varies as well. The Committee has ruled about issues ranging from disappearances to the right to equality. Many cases have dealt with the right to a fair trial or detention issues. The first cases under the OP, in the late 1970s and early 1980s, were almost all directed against Uruguay.¹¹

2.3 The power and promptness of the HRC to take provisional measures

2.3.1 Introduction

This section discusses the power to use provisional measures, the need to delegate this power, the promptness of the intervention with regard to certain issue areas, possible explanations for tardiness, the manner in which the Addressee State is contacted, other relevant Rules of Procedure and the possibility to take provisional measures proprio motu.

⁹ More generally on ICCPR law and the proceedings under the OP see e.g. Barkhuysen/Van Emmerik/Rieter (2008); Nowak (2005); Joseph/Schultz/Castan (2004); Vandenhole (2004); Conte/Davidson/Burchill (2004); Carlson/Gisvold (2003); Bayefsky (2002); Young (2002); Bayefsky (2001); De Zayas (2001), pp. 67-121; Scheinin (2001), pp. 129-145; Bayefsky (2000); Evatt (1998), pp. 86-115; Ghandhi (1998); Schmidt (1998), pp. 13-18; O'Flaherty (1996); McGoldrick (1994); Zwart (1994); and Schmidt (1992), pp. 645-659.

¹⁰ This book uses the term petitioner.

¹¹ Other Latin American countries such as Argentina, Chile or Paraguay ratified the OP much later, namely in 1986, 1992 and 1995 respectively.

2.3.2 The power of the HRC to use provisional measures

While the text of the OP itself does not include a reference to the use of provisional measures, the HRC has developed a practice of using them. Under Article 39(2) ICCPR the HRC shall establish its own rules of procedure. In March 1977 the HRC discussed these, including the introduction of a rule on provisional measures.¹² The issue that came up most often was the question whether the HRC had indeed the power to take provisional measures and, if so, whether it could delegate this power to subsidiary organs.¹³ It drafted the following Rule, then Rule 86, now Rule 92:

“The Committee may, prior to forwarding its Views on the communication to the State party concerned, inform that State of its Views as to whether interim measures may be desirable to avoid irreparable damage to the victim of the alleged violation. In doing so, the Committee shall inform the State party concerned that such expression of its Views on interim measures does not imply a determination on the merits of the communication”.

2.3.3 Promptness and delegation

The Committee is only in session three times a year. In 1977, during the drafting process of the Rule on provisional measures, Committee member Espersen (Denmark) already referred to the delays involved in the Committee’s procedures and mentioned the issue of the death penalty as an example. He emphasised the need to avoid irreparable harm to the petitioner. These delays ‘made it quite possible that the execution of a sentence by a State, especially the execution of the death penalty, would make the whole case obsolete’. The Rule should be such that ‘the Committee or a subsidiary group should be able to reach a quick decision on interim measures’.¹⁴ Several members of the HRC indeed considered that there should be an arrangement to deal with provisional measures in between sessions.¹⁵ Cold War politics, however, initially prevented the inclusion of a rule allowing delegation of the competence to take provisional measures to a Rapporteur or Working Group.¹⁶ Nevertheless, the text of the Rule did not exclude the possibility of a subsidiary ¹² In February and March 1977 the Secretary General had submitted ‘preliminary draft provisional rules of procedure’. These included the following rule on provisional measures: “The Committee, or the Group referred to under rule 88 below after consultation with the Chairman of the Committee, may at any time request the State party concerned to take interim measures in order to avoid irreparable damage to the victim of the alleged violation. In doing so, the Committee or the Group shall inform the State concerned that such a request does not imply a determination as to the admissibility or the substantive validity of the communication”. Preliminary draft provisional rules of procedure submitted by the Secretary-General, CCPR/C/L.2 and Add. 1 and 2, 28 February, 2 and 4 March 1977; draft Rule 86 was initially issued in CCPR/C/L.2/Add. 2 on 4 March 1977. See Yearbook of the Human Rights Committee 1977-1978, Vol. II, 1986. It was partly inspired by the Rules of Procedure of the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination. During its thirteenth and seventeenth meeting, chaired by Mavrommatis (Cyprus), the members of the Committee discussed this proposal.

¹³ Summary records of the meetings of the first session, thirteenth meeting, 29 March 1977 and seventeenth meeting, 31 March 1977, Yearbook of the HRC 1977-1978, Vol. I, CCPR/1 pp. 44-46 and 54.

¹⁴ Ibidem.

¹⁵ See Sir Vincent Evans (UK); Uribe Vargas (Colombia); Prado Vallejo (Ecuador); Espersen (Denmark); Opsahl (Norway) and Tomuschat (Federal Republic of Germany).

¹⁶ Several members, predominantly of Eastern European States, did not want to delegate the power to use provisional measures: Graefrath (former German Democratic Republic); Koulishev (Bulgaria); Movchan (USSR). See summary records of the meetings of the first session, 13th meeting, 29 March 1977 and 17th meeting, 31 March 1977, Yearbook of the HRC 1977-1978, body contacting the State on urgent matters. The summary records indicate that the Committee preferred to leave open this question for the time being.¹⁷

In response to the increasing number of petitions by persons on death row the HRC finally introduced a Special Rapporteur in 1987. This Rapporteur could then take provisional measures (at least those involving death penalty cases) in between sessions.¹⁸ After all, execution dates are not centred on HRC sessions.

Thus, after about ten years the HRC finally determined the unfinished discussion about the delegation of the power to issue provisional measures. As Tomuschat puts it:

“The death row cases made it abundantly clear that the original line of construing the Protocol, which led to the deletion, in Rule 86, of any reference to subsidiary bodies of the Committee,

Vol. I, CCPR/1, pp. 44-46 and 54. Ganji (Iran) considered that any group the HRC would establish would keep it informed of any views communicated to States. If the full Committee disagreed with those views, it could always adopt its own position. “Such instances were likely to be rare, however, since rule 86 provided that views on interim measures should be formulated after consultation with the Chairman of the Committee. It might be useful, nevertheless, to add a sentence in rule 86 stipulating that the views communicated to States concerning interim measures should be brought to the attention of the Committee at its first meeting after the transmission of the views in question”. Note that the eventual formulation does not refer to consultation with the Chairman.

¹⁷ The Annual Report 1977 to the General Assembly, describing the adoption of the Rules of Procedure at the Committee’s first session, presents the rule on provisional measures as providing that only the Committee but not a subsidiary body may inform a State party of its views whether such measures may be desirable. A/32/44, §56. The next Annual Report to the General Assembly refers to a decision the HRC did take to improve promptness in deciding on urgent cases. It notes that it ‘was suggested’ that the Committee’s application of Rule 86 ‘should not be subject to the prior inclusion of the communications in the lists of communications’. These lists were prepared by the Secretariat for the Committee’s convenience. The persons who suggested this were considering the urgency factor and wished to avoid the hurdle of this formal procedure: ‘(t)hus the Committee would be in a position to apply rule 86 at an early stage in urgent cases’ A/32/44, §175. While the Report does not explain whether all members agreed with this suggestion, it did not refer to any disagreement either. This could be interpreted as an acknowledgment of the possibility to use provisional measures at least prior to the admissibility declaration. See Chapter III on the relevance of admissibility and jurisdiction on the merits.

¹⁸ A/43/40, 28 September 1988, §656, in: Official Records of the Human Rights Committee 1987-1988, Vol. II, CCPR/7/Add. 1. The first 31 sessions the HRC used provisional measures only during sessions. It did so more than 20 times. Its speed ranged from twelve days to almost six months. The first time the HRC used provisional measures was on 21 July 1986, on behalf of Earl Pratt, 210/1986. This was the only time it did so that year. For budgetary reasons there was no proper meeting in the fall of 1986. This may account for the fact that the second time the HRC took provisional measures to halt an execution was seven months later. On the other hand, the Working Group of the HRC did convene between 8 and 10 December 1986 in order to deal with ‘urgent cases’. Apparently this did not result in the use of provisional measures. It was in 1987 that it was suddenly faced with many death penalty complaints. Seven months after its first provisional measure on this issue it used a provisional measure again, this time on behalf of Ivan Morgan, 225/1987, 24 March 1987. That same year it used twenty other such provisional measures. Lloyd Reece v. Jamaica (247/1987), (disc. 1993); Reid v. Jamaica, 20 July 1990; A.A. v. Jamaica, 30 October 1989; Kelly v. Jamaica, 8 April 1991; W.W. v. Jamaica, 26 October 1990; Carlton Linton v. Jamaica 22 October 1992; Michael and Desmond McLean v. Jamaica, 11 April 1991 and Campbell v. Jamaica, 30 March 1992. On 12 November alone it used provisional measures in eight different cases, all in order to halt an execution. On this day it decided to appoint one of its members as a Special Rapporteur on Death Penalty Cases.

was incompatible with the object and purpose of Rule 86 to enable the Committee swiftly and effectively to address any situation where irreparable harm is looming”.¹⁹

Possibly to satisfy those members of the Committee who were wary of delegating this power to a Rapporteur, the HRC decided to appoint Mr. Mavrommatis (Cyprus), known for his diplomatic approach, to this post. He was not very active in his use of provisional measures.²⁰ In fact, the pre-session Working Group took most of the provisional measures.²¹ It is not clear why he did not take provisional measures more often, since it was in fact his task to deal with the urgent cases when the HRC was not in session.

As of spring 1989 the Committee replaced the Special Rapporteur on Death Penalty cases with a Special Rapporteur on New Communications in order to deal with its increasing caseload. Her task was not only to deal with urgent cases in between sessions but also to authorize registration of all new cases and transmit them to States.²²

2.3.4 Explaining promptness and tardiness

2.3.4.1 INTRODUCTION

To examine the Committee’s promptness in taking provisional measures the first provisional measure decision in a given case, in relation to the date of initial submission, was taken as a point

¹⁹ Tomuschat (1995), p. 628.

²⁰ Presumably Mavrommatis started in his new function at the end of the Committee’s session, in December 1987. Only five cases are known in which he used provisional measures. In two of these, almost three months passed before he used them but in one case he took provisional measures within a day. Possibly the Secretariat sent telegrams on his behalf in other cases as well, but if this is the case the HRC failed to mention it in the final decision.

²¹ This involved more than 20 cases.

²² In its Annual Report 1989 the Committee does not yet mention the Special Rapporteur’s role with regard to provisional measures. A/44/40, §620 and Annex IX. While in another section the Report refers to the HRC’s requests not to carry out death sentences, it does not specify whether the full Committee, a Working Group, the old Special Rapporteur on Death Penalty Cases or the Special Rapporteur on New Communications decided on the provisional measures. In July 1991 the Committee adopted revised terms of reference for the mandate of the Special Rapporteur on New Communications. This included (b) ‘to issue rule 86 requests, whether coupled with a request under rule 91 or not’ and (c) ‘to inform the Committee at each session on action taken under rules 86 and 91’. The Special Rapporteur now takes the decision to transmit a complaint to the State party and to request provisional measures. Annex X, Mandate of the Special Rapporteur on New Communications, revised terms of reference adopted at the 1087th meeting, 24 July 1991, A/46/40, 10 October 1991, in: Official Records of the Human Rights Committee 1990/1991, Vol. II, CCPR/10/Add. 1. In 1987 the HRC requested the State not to carry out the death sentence before it had had an opportunity to consider further the question of admissibility. As of spring 1988 it used a different formulation, by requesting the State not to carry out the death sentence while it was considering the communication. This allowed for a longer duration of the provisional measure. This way the Committee would not need to renew the use of provisional measures after the case was declared admissible. Instead, it could just reiterate them in situations where a State seemed to move towards non-compliance. Even during sessions it is the Special Rapporteur on New Communications rather than the full Committee who decides on the use of provisional measures. Information obtained at the HRC Secretariat in Geneva, September 2003.

of reference.²³ After 1993 the HRC saw an increase in the use of provisional measures.²⁴ The actions of the subsequent Special Rapporteurs on New Communications have shown that, on occasion, it was possible to intervene within days. Yet it was only over time and with the introduction of modern communication methods that a practice developed of prompt intervention.²⁵ Since the Rapporteurs became accustomed to the use of e-mail, the HRC often used provisional measures within a day²⁶ or even on the same day,²⁷ depending also on resources and alertness at the Secretariat.²⁸

²³ While it is possible that the petitioner initially did not request provisional measures, but did so at a later date, not mentioned in the View, in the large majority of cases he requests this as part of his initial communication. Of course in some of these cases the HRC repeats its provisional measures. It must be noted that the promptness of the provisional measure may often depend more on the situation at the Secretariat in Geneva than on the attitude of the Rapporteur.

²⁴ In 1998 the number of provisional measures decreased. This may be related to the withdrawal of Jamaica from the Optional Protocol. Jamaica withdrew on 23 October 1997. This became effective on 23 January 1998. On 22 January 1998 the Rapporteur still took provisional measures in HRC Howell v. Jamaica (2003). The last example of such a decision sent to Trinidad and Tobago dates from 15 January 1999. See Rawle Kennedy v. Trinidad and Tobago, 28 March 1992. Trinidad and Tobago initially withdrew and re-entered with reservations on 26 May 1998. This would have become effective on 26 August 1998, but the HRC decided to declare admissible a complaint following that date. This decision, of 5 November 1999, related to a case submitted on 7 December 1998 and transmitted to the State with a provisional measure on 15 January 1999 (see 845/1998). Trinidad and Tobago denounced the Optional Protocol once more on 27 June 2000 (now without re-entering). This became effective on 27 September 2000. Some cases submitted before that date may still be pending and, upon final determination, may disclose information about the use of provisional measures.

²⁵ Promptness only improved substantially as of 1995. The majority of provisional measures were then issued within days.

²⁶ See e.g. HRC Michael Robinson v. Jamaica, 29 March 2000, initial submission of 9 December 1996, Rule 86/91 of 10 December 1996. In Brown v. Jamaica, 23 March 1999, the Secretary to the Governor General of Jamaica even commented to counsel on the 'commendable dispatch' of the Committee's request for a stay (letter by counsel of 20 November 1997). Counsel had submitted the request for provisional measures on 12 November 1997 and the Rapporteur transmitted the case under Rule 86/91 on 13 November 1997 (on file with the author).

²⁷ See e.g. HRC Mansaraj et al.; Gborie et al. and Sesay et al. v. Sierra Leone, 16 July 2001. Initial submission of 12 and 13 October 1998; Rule 86 equally on 12 and 13 October 1998; the 18 petitioners had all been sentenced to death on 12 October 1998. There was no right of appeal. See section 5 on the State party's attitude.

²⁸ Apart from the lack of resources at the Secretariat and the difficulty to obtain a response from the Rapporteur (initially because of more primitive means of communication) the lack of promptness in the use of provisional measures in the first years might also be explained by the decision of the Rapporteur only to intervene in the face of an actual execution date rather than upon receipt of the complaint. In the autumn of 1995 the HRC 'declared that the competence of the Special Rapporteur to issue, and if necessary to withdraw, provisional measures would continue up until the moment the Working Group on Communications took up the question of admissibility. When the Committee was not in session that competence would be exercised by the Chairman until the Working Group on Communications considered the substance of the case, in consultation, where necessary, with the Special Rapporteur', A/51/40, Vol. I, 1996, §381. It seems that in such cases the Chairman takes over the Rapporteur's task, while the Rapporteur deals with similar new cases. Subsequently the HRC did not provide any information that would indicate changes in the practice of taking provisional measures as a result of this decision. Rapporteur Scheinin reports that there would be at most two days a year in which he could not check his e-mail. Moreover,

In a presentation before CAT, Special Rapporteur Scheinin gave some information about the practical procedure before the HRC:

“Language problems, which could be very real, were resolved by the Secretariat; the Special Rapporteur needed to know only the essential elements of each case, which was set out for him by the Secretariat in a language at his command. A member of the Human Rights Committee could theoretically continue to serve as a special rapporteur for the duration of his term of office. In practice, the matter was reviewed every two years when the bureau of the Committee was convened, where upon, the Special Rapporteurs for New Communications and for Follow Up on Views were appointed”.²⁹

Scheinin noted that the Special Rapporteur of the HRC responsible for provisional measures intervenes at a much earlier stage than the pre-sessional working group reviewing draft decisions on admissibility. He intervened ‘at the moment when it became necessary to decide to register a communication, and it was generally then that a request addressed to the State party under rule 86 might be appropriate’.³⁰

2.3.4.2 DEATH PENALTY CASES

In some cases the HRC seems to have skipped several sessions before it used provisional measures. Any time it takes more than four months to use them it means not only that the Rapporteur did not deal with the case but also that the HRC itself skipped an earlier opportunity to deal with it.³¹ This may indicate the role of the Secretariat in suggesting cases for discussion. In any case, apart from exceptional circumstances, the Secretariat only approaches the Special Rapporteur and not the full Committee, even during sessions.³²

Tardiness of the full Committee or the Special Rapporteur in adopting provisional measures may relate to late receipt of information by the petitioner, to the question whether the Rapporteur can be reached quickly (e.g. through e-mail or by mobile phone) and to the question whether the Rapporteur reacts quickly.³³ It may also relate to shifts within the Secretariat in Geneva or to holiday periods at the Secretariat.³⁴ If the State only received the Note Verbale with the request for the provisional measures the day before the planned execution or on the day itself, this may also play some role in cases of non-compliance, at least to the extent that the State may use the late receipt as an excuse for having executed the petitioner in defiance of the Committee’s provisional measures.³⁵ Nevertheless, the HRC has determined that the State breaches its obligations the Secretariat could also get hold of him through mobile phone. Interview with Martin Scheinin, Geneva, April 2003.

²⁹ CAT Summary Records, 27th session, 13 November 2001, CAT/C/SR.487, 10 March 2003, §19.

³⁰ Id., §17.

³¹ See e.g. HRC A. H. v. Trinidad and Tobago, 31 October 1990 (more than eight months between submission and the use of provisional measures).

³² Information obtained at the Secretariat in Geneva, September 2003.

³³ At least one Special Rapporteur preferred to receive the complete file rather than the case summaries before he would make decisions. This may have resulted in delay.

³⁴ An example of the latter is 732/1997. Measures were taken within 18 days, while most provisional measures used during the period Pocar was Rapporteur were taken within days. In this case, however, the Christmas holiday took place subsequent to the submission and previous to the provisional measure.

³⁵ See HRC Glenn Ashby v. Trinidad and Tobago, 21 March 2002. Yet the main reason for disregarding the provisional measure in that case seems to be the fact that the deadline set by the JCPC was approaching, beyond which domestic law would forbid execution. In this case the

under the OP when it executes an alleged victim knowing that a case has been brought before the Committee, even if the Committee has not yet itself contacted the State with provisional measures.³⁶

In two Belarus cases the HRC was particularly tardy in requesting provisional measures. In fact it requested them only after the executions. In the one case it took provisional measures nine and a half months after the initial submission, while the execution had taken place at least three months earlier.³⁷ In the other case the interval between initial submission and the provisional measure was eleven months. Seven months previously Belarus had executed the petitioner. The Committee referred to the lack of promptness in its use of provisional measures in the following, rather oblique, terms:

“The Committee notes with regret that, by the time it was in a position to submit its Rule 86 request, the death sentence had already been carried out. The Committee understands and will ensure that cases susceptible of being subject of Rule 86 requests will be processed with the expedition necessary to enable its requests to be complied with”.³⁸

It is not clear what caused the extreme tardiness, but unavailability of resources at the Secretariat, in particular in relation to complaints in languages other than English, French or Spanish, may have played a role.³⁹

2.3.4.3 DETENTION AND DISAPPEARANCE CASES

The above discussion of prompt intervention involved death penalty cases. Obviously this promptness is also relevant in expulsion,⁴⁰ detention and disappearance cases as well as in those Secretariat handed the Rapporteur’s combined Rule 86/91 request to the Permanent Mission of Trinidad and Tobago in Geneva at 4.05 p.m. Geneva time on 13 July 1994. This was 10.05 a.m. Trinidad and Tobago time. According to the Permanent Mission this request was transmitted by facsimile to the Port-of-Spain authorities between 4.30 and 4.45 p.m. that day, Geneva time. In Trinidad and Tobago it was between 10.30 and 10.45 a.m. Mr. Ashby’s counsel continued the efforts to obtain a stay of execution throughout the night of 13 to 14 July 1994, both before the Court of Appeal in Trinidad and Tobago and before the JCPC in London. The JCPC issued an order to stay the execution shortly after 11.30 a.m. (London time) on 14 July. It appeared, however, that by that time Mr. Ashby had already been executed. It was 6.30 a.m. in Trinidad and Tobago when the JCPC issued its order. The Court of Appeal was also in session at the time of the execution, deliberating on whether it would order a stay of execution.

³⁶ See e.g. HRC Piandiong et al. v. the Philippines, 19 October 2000; Mansaraj et al. v. Sierra Leone, 16 July 2001 and Glenn Ashby v. Trinidad and Tobago, 21 March 2002. See further Chapters XVI (Legal status) and XVII (Official responses).

³⁷ HRC Anton Bondarenko and Natalia Schedko (submitted by the latter on behalf of her deceased son and herself) v. Belarus, 3 April 2003.

³⁸ HRC Igor Lyashkovich and Mariya Staselovich (submitted by the latter on behalf of her deceased son and herself) v. Belarus, 3 April 2003 §1.3. See also Anton Bondarenko and Natalia Schedko (submitted by the latter on behalf of her deceased son and herself) v. Belarus, 3 April 2003, §1.3.

³⁹ About this case see also Chapter XVII (Official responses) and Chapter XVIII (Follow-up by the adjudicators).

⁴⁰ In one early case (1978), in which there was no Special Rapporteur yet, the HRC seized the earliest opportunity to take provisional measures to halt an expulsion. This was around a month after initial submission. HRC O.E. v. S., 25 January 1978. In this case the petitioner had submitted a complaint on behalf of his son on 30 December 1977. The HRC used provisional measures on 25 January 1978, meaning that it took action within a month. In some cases involving indigenous culture. The discussion of prompt intervention and the use of provisional measures in detention cases relates to lack of medical treatment, whereabouts and access to counsel. In this type of cases the HRC has also used so-called ‘informal’ provisional measures, requesting information on the treatment and whereabouts under the rule on the transmission of cases and requests for clarification, rather than formally under the Rule on provisional measures.⁴¹ involving alleged threats to life and security in the receiving State the HRC did not use provisional measures. One such case was HRC P. L.-B. v. Canada, 556/1993, discontinued 17 April 1996 (request for urgent measures of 4 October 1993, initial submission of 5 October 1993, information about his deportation on 7 October 1993 and Rule 91 of 18 January 1994, letter State of 19 July 1994: the petitioner was not deported but he disappeared; on file with the author). In this case it did not use them partly because the timeframe between submission and the date of deportation appeared too short and the Secretariat was unable to contact the Rapporteur in time. Counsel for the petitioner had informed the HRC that he had ‘just learned a few minutes ago’ that his client’s removal from Canada would most likely take place in the evening of 7 October 1993. The HRC received this fax on this date. It was sent two days previously and refers to a submission of 4 October 1993. By the time it registered the case it had already received reports that the petitioner had been deported. Hence it only referred to Rule 91. Transmission under Rule 91 of 18 January 1994. In 2003 a petitioner was extradited subsequent to the initial submission of his case. In this case the HRC had not used provisional measures. Both the initial submission and the extradition took place on the same day, meaning that only a ‘same day Rule 86’ could have been effective. Technically this case involved a deportation, but with the same risk as extradition because a death sentence had already been pronounced against the petitioner in the receiving State. While the petitioner had requested provisional measures, the time-period for contacting the Rapporteur or another member of the HRC apparently was too short. HRC Judge v. Canada, 5 August 2003. See Chapter V (Expulsion) for a discussion of the Committee’s View in this case. It appears from the case file that the Secretariat attempted to contact two different members of the Committee on the day the case was submitted. As noted, the petitioner was deported on the same day. The reason Rule 86 was not used may lie in the difficulty of reaching the Special Rapporteur in the timeframe of hours rather than days. The Special Rapporteur transmitted the case to the State party more than a year later, on 20 August 1999.

41

The issues of lack of medical treatment in detention and unclear whereabouts of detained persons were among the early cases dealt with by the Committee, when the examination of individual complaints by international adjudicators was still new and more sensitive than it is now. This may account for the fact that it initially did not formally invoke its Rule on provisional measures in these cases. See the discussion in Chapter VI (Locating and protecting disappeared persons) and Chapter VII (detention). The case Juan E. Zelaya Blanco and Myriam Zelaya Dunaway (on behalf of Roberto Zelaya who later joined) v. Nicaragua, 20 July 1994, indicates that the practice of using informal rather than formal provisional measures, once developed in a given context (e.g. detention) continued to be used into the 1990s. Initially the petitioners (the brother and sister of Mr. Zelaya) wrote to the Secretary General of the UN in July 1988, among others referring to death threats made against their detained brother by a lieutenant. Five days later they received information that this lieutenant had been transferred following an investigation. While they observed that he was still in active military service and could continue to put other people at risk, the Committee could indeed conclude that the immediate threat against the alleged victim no longer existed. Letters of 22 and 26 July and 2 September 1988 (on file with the author). The official initial submission was sent two months later, in September 1988. The focus of the complaint was on the health of the alleged victim and in particular on the risk of prolonged experimentation with cortisones. The Working Group dealt with the case at the earliest opportunity, since there was not yet a Special Rapporteur on New Communications who could deal with cases in between sessions. Special Rapporteur Mavrommatis had only been appointed to deal with death penalty cases. At this time there was no longer a need to intervene in relation to the death threat, although it is not clear whether the HRC would have enquired about this

The urgency of some of the situations was not met with the requisite promptness. In Setelich it took the HRC four months to decide on the petitioner's first request to use provisional measures. Although it did not use provisional measures but inquired about the alleged victim's health instead, it would have been useful had it been able to move in a more timely fashion. Yet it must be borne in mind that this is an early case, brought before the HRC during the period before it had assigned one of its members with the task of dealing with communications in between sessions.⁴² Since the installation by the HRC of a Special Rapporteur dealing first with death penalty cases only and later with all new communications, the promptness has gradually increased.⁴³

Prompt intervention is also particularly important in disappearance cases. Different from the UN Working Group on Enforced Disappearances (WGED), the HRC has no specific guidelines on prompt intervention in disappearance cases. The WGED directly transmits cases that occurred within the three months preceding receipt of the information by the Group to the Minister of Foreign Affairs 'by the most direct and rapid means'.⁴⁴ otherwise. On the issue of death threats and the use of provisional measures see Chapter IX. While decision-making by the Working Group was prompt, in the circumstances, its implementation by the Secretariat was not. Between the Committee's decision to enquire about the alleged victim's health situation and access to medication and the transmittal of this decision to the State party there was an interval of more than three weeks. Rule 91 decision of 24 October 1988, CCPR/C/WG/34/D/328/1988, 8 November 1988 and Note Verbale of 17 November 1988 (on file with the author). The HRC requested, among others, information on the current state of health of Mr. Zelaya. In particular it requested the State to forward copies of his medical reports and to indicate the medication he was receiving. Zelaya was detained until March 1990. After his release he went to the US. The HRC declared the case admissible after he had already been released. See also Dave Marais v. Madagascar, 24 March 1984 in which the HRC used informal provisional measures to ensure access to counsel, two years after initial submission. In Muteba v. Zaire, 24 July 1984 a request for information about such access, together with requests about the state of health of the alleged victim, was sent within eight days. Informal provisional measures were sent on the same date as those in the case of HRC Manera Lluberis v. Uruguay, 6 April 1984. The decision to use provisional measures in A. et al. v. Angola, 810/1998, discontinued 1 August 2000 (initial submission of 13 February 1998; provisional measures of 10 March 1998) to provide access to counsel and court, was taken within a month of receipt of initial submission.

⁴² In Altesor v. Uruguay, 29 March 1982 the HRC was able to act within three weeks because it was in session at the time. Still, in some cases harm to a detainee's health could clearly become irreparable in three weeks time. In HRC Lafuente Penarrieta et al. v. Bolivia, 2 November 1987, it is not clear why the HRC did not request informal provisional measures in 1984, upon receipt of initial submission, or during or following the time the alleged victims were on a hunger strike, but rather in 1985.

⁴³ At least seven times before the introduction of a Special Rapporteur the HRC did not intervene during the upcoming session but instead skipped one or more sessions. Nine times it did indeed intervene at the upcoming session. Once this was even within eight days of the initial submission. See Muteba v. Zaire (124/1982).

⁴⁴ Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances, Revised methods of work of the Working Group, adopted 14 November 2001. The UN Working Group, not a treaty body, but one of the thematic mechanisms, has specifically delegated its power to the Chairperson, who can authorise the urgent appeals. If a person disappeared more than three months but less than a year previous to receipt of the information by the Secretariat the Chairperson may authorise transmission of the case in between sessions. In such cases there should be some connection with a case that did occur within the three-month period and the method of transmission is by letter. See <www.ohchr.org>. In this respect there does not appear to be extensive cross-fertilization between the adjudicator and the Working Group. See also Chapter VI on the practice of adjudicators with regard to using provisional measures in disappearance cases.

The case of Ana Rosario Celis Laureano v. Peru (1996) involved the urgent intervention of the UN Working Group on Disappearances as well as that of the HRC.⁴⁵

In Almeida de Quinteros v. Uruguay (1983)⁴⁶ the petitioner had submitted the case on behalf of her daughter and herself five years after her daughter was last seen. The HRC requested the State to confirm that Elena Quinteros, whose whereabouts had been unknown since 1976, was in detention. It requested the State to make known the place of detention.⁴⁷ Because five years had passed since her disappearance it is not surprising that the HRC did not use provisional measures. The likelihood that a disappeared person has died increases with every month the disappearance persists. The Committee's request to be informed of her whereabouts seems to be more a matter of principle and a necessary stage in acquiring information for a final determination than it is an attempt to informally intervene pending the proceedings in order to prevent irreparable harm.⁴⁸

⁴⁵ HRC Laureano Atachahua (on behalf of his granddaughter Ana Rosario Celis Laureano) v. Peru, 25 March 1996. The victim, who was a minor, had disappeared in August 1992. Her grandfather submitted his complaint to the HRC more than two months later, in October 1992. By then the UN Working Group had already registered her case. The HRC determined that it was not prevented from dealing with this case because, in light of the difference in the mandates of the Working Group and itself, the case could not be seen as dealing with the 'same matter'. In November 1992 the Peruvian Government informed the UN Working Group that the Prosecutor's Office in Huacho was investigating the case and that the Government had requested information from two Ministries: those of Defence and the Interior. The Prosecutor's Office had not yet found Ms. Laureano nor identified those responsible for her disappearance. More than half a year later, the HRC Special Rapporteur transmitted the case to the State party. By that time the UN Working Group had already appealed to the State twice. It is not clear whether the Rapporteur enquired about her health and whereabouts since the Committee's View does not provide information about the substance of the transmission. In its admissibility decision, in July 1994, the HRC only requested detailed information on the investigations carried out by the authorities. Given the lack of response by the State the likelihood of finding her alive after November 1992 seemed limited. The State party responded on 10 June 1993 drawing on information provided by its Ministry of Defence. "On 8 September 1992, the commander of the military base in Ambar inquired with the judge about the status of the case; on 11 September 1992, the judge confirmed that the girl had been abducted one month earlier, and that the judicial authorities seized of the matter attributed responsibility for the event to members of the military. On 21 September 1992, the Attorney-General of the Second Prosecutor's Office (Fiscal de la Segunda Fiscalía de la Nación) reported on the action taken by the Office until then; he issued a list of eight police and military offices and concluded that Ms. Laureano was not detained in any of these offices". HRC Laureano Atachahua (on behalf of his granddaughter Ana Rosario Celis Laureano) v. Peru, 25 March 1996, §4.1. Although the submission was two months after the disappearance and the Working Group on Disappearances had already been involved for a month, the HRC could have reacted immediately upon receipt of the submission instead of several months later. Beyond this report of 21 September 1992, the State does not seem to have investigated the matter. This also appears from the information provided by the UN Working Group, which had not been updated beyond November 1992. See also Chapter XI on the attitudes of addressee States and the follow-up by the adjudicators. See also Mojica v. Dominican Republic, 15 July 1994.

⁴⁶ HRC Almeida de Quinteros v. Uruguay, 21 July 1983.

⁴⁷ HRC Almeida de Quinteros v. Uruguay, 21 July 1983, com. no. 107/1981, CCPR/C/OP/2, at 138 (Rule 91 of 14 October 1983).

⁴⁸ See also HRC Thevaraja Sarma (submitted by his father S. Jegatheeswara Sarma) v. Sri Lanka, 16 July 2003. In this case the victim had been abducted in June 1990. The State party ratified the OP in October 1997 and the initial submission was of October 1999. See also Alfredo and Samuel Sanjuán Arévalo (submitted by their mother Elcida Arévalo Perez) v. Colombia, 3 November 1989, CCPR/C/37/D/181/1984, 22 November 1989 (no informal provisional measures, probably because the disappearance took place more than two years before initial submission).

Before the HRC introduced the Special Rapporteur on New Communications it intervened informally several times, requesting information on the whereabouts of an alleged victim.⁴⁹ In Tshishimbi v. Zaire (1996) the Special Rapporteur took formal provisional measures to discover the whereabouts of the alleged victim and prevent irreparable harm.⁵⁰ Subsequently the Committee expressed particular concern about the absence of cooperation in relation to the provisional measure by the Rapporteur.⁵¹ Nevertheless, the full Committee did not itself use formal provisional measures to follow-up on those of the Special Rapporteur. Instead, it reiterated the Rule 91 (current Rule 97) request 'to provide detailed information on the whereabouts of Mr. Tshishimbi and to indicate whether he was covered by the terms of the amnesty announced by the State party's new Government in the summer of 1994'. After all, nothing had been heard from him for two years, making it less likely that he was still alive. The use of provisional measures is particularly warranted in the context of recent disappearances or in the face of other indications that the alleged victim may still be alive.⁵² A relevant example is El Megreisi v. Libya (1994).⁵³ The petitioner had submitted a case on behalf of his brother almost two years after his disappearance. The HRC only requested information on his whereabouts and health seven months after initial submission.⁵⁴ Subsequently the El-Megreisi family learned that the petitioner's brother was still alive in April 1992, when he was suddenly allowed a visit by his wife. During this visit he could not comment on his conditions of detention. It was then that the HRC requested information on his health and whereabouts.⁵⁵

2.3.4.4 CASES INVOLVING THREATS TO INDIGENOUS CULTURE

The HRC has not been particularly prompt in its intervention on behalf of indigenous culture. The time between initial submission and the use of provisional measures varied from two and a half months (Länsman II)⁵⁶ to almost three and a half years (Lubicon Lake Band).⁵⁷ Waiting such a period before taking them considerably diminishes their practical use. When it did use provisional measures in the latter case it did so in light of the seriousness of the claim that the Lubicon Lake Band was on the verge of extinction.⁵⁸ In that light it would have been helpful if it had made the assessment earlier in the proceedings. It must be remembered, however, that this was the first ⁴⁹ Promptness varied from a few days to four months.

⁵⁰ In this case there was an interval of one month between the initial submission and the provisional measure.

⁵¹ HRC Tshishimbi v. Zaire, 25 March 1996.

⁵² See also Chapter VI (Locating and protecting disappeared persons).

⁵³ HRC Mohammed Bashir El-Megreisi (submitted by his brother Youssef El-Megreisi) v. Libya, 23 March 1994.

⁵⁴ It is not clear from the decision on the merits why it did not make this request immediately upon receipt of the complaint. Possibly it assumed that the disappearance was not sufficiently recent and therefore did not warrant provisional measures. It is also possible that the Rapporteur simply did not deal with the case sooner or that the Rapporteur preferred the use of informal provisional measures under Rule 91 (old) in this case. The View only refers to Rule 91, not to Rule 86, but it is also possible that Rule 86 was used nevertheless.

⁵⁵ Five months later the petitioner stated that at that time his brother was detained in a military camp in Tripoli of which the name and location were unknown. The next month, in its admissibility decision, the HRC repeated its request to the State about the current whereabouts, state of health and conditions of detention.

⁵⁶ HRC Länsman v. Finland (Länsman II), 30 October 1996.

⁵⁷ HRC Lubicon Lake Band v. Canada, 26 March 1990.

⁵⁸ See also Chapter X (Culture).

time the HRC formally used provisional measures in a case not involving the death penalty, expulsion or extradition. Moreover, there was no Rapporteur yet dealing with new communications in between sessions, which meant that the case was a recurring topic only during official sessions.

2.3.4.5 URGENCY AFTER REGISTRATION OF THE PETITION

In 2003 Special Rapporteur Scheinin acknowledged that the Secretariat does not inform him about new developments after he has authorised registration of a case. To his knowledge, no Rapporteur assigned to prepare a specific case for determination on the merits has intervened to alert the HRC about such developments that might warrant the use of provisional measures. Provisional measures taken after registration follow up on earlier provisional measures, rather than deal with new situations. He agreed that it would be useful to arrange for a procedure to deal with those urgent issues coming up following registration. As an example he referred to risks to a detainee on the verge of turning blind.⁵⁹

2.3.5 Contacting the addressee State with provisional measures

Especially if the treaty body only informs the agent of the State in Geneva (Permanent Mission) of the provisional measure, it is important to allow for time to transmit this information from there, by way of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, to the relevant (prison) authorities, often through the Ministry of Justice as well.⁶⁰

Within the United Nations it is diplomatic practice to address the diplomatic missions representing States, based in Geneva, rather than the governments directly. In urgent cases, however, this is not very practicable. By the time the provisional measure reaches the relevant authorities, irreparable harm may already have occurred. Hence, even in some of the early cases the HRC

⁵⁹ Interview by author with Special Rapporteur Scheinin, Geneva, April 2003. Thus far it does not appear that a formal decision has been made to arrange for such a procedure. Indeed HRC Polay Campos (submitted by his wife Espinoza de Polay) v. Peru, 6 November 1997 appears to be a rare exception in which the case rapporteur eventually suggests the use of provisional measures. On 5 March 1993 Ms. Espinoza de Polay submitted the case on behalf of her husband who was detained in Peru. She sent her submission from France. Only when the Committee declared this case admissible, three years after the initial submission, it requested the State to ensure medical treatment. While three Rapporteurs theoretically could have intervened (the initial submission in Polay Campos v. Peru was in March 1993, just before the session ending the Rapporteurship of Lallah and starting that of Chanet. Pocar started his Rapporteurship as of spring 1995), the practice at the Secretariat seems to have been such that the Rapporteur authorizing registration and transmission of the new case to the State may be informed about urgent matters at the same time. More importantly, the Special Rapporteur on New Communications does not receive information about subsequent developments that could put at risk the health of the petitioner, while the member of the Committee who is responsible for drafting the decision on the merits does not have the task of intervening urgently. Eventually, in Polay Campos the HRC did urge the State to provide medical treatment, but it only did so when it declared the case admissible. It is evident that it did not act with the same sense of urgency as it tends to do when it uses formal provisional measures. It eventually intervened upon a suggestion by Committee member Prado Vallejo who became the case Rapporteur. Letter of Prado Vallejo to the Geneva Secretariat, 2 July 1996 (on file with the author).

⁶⁰ The issuance of a provisional measure may also be useful information to submit in domestic court.

already sent a telegram directly to the Minister of Foreign Affairs as well as to the Deputy Prime Minister.⁶¹

In other cases the HRC also sent the provisional measure to the Advocate General of the State. It may address him as follows: 'please find enclosed the text of the urgent note verbale which we delivered to the Permanent Mission today'.⁶² In cases against Jamaica it developed the practice to address the Minister of Foreign Affairs and External Trade directly and send a copy to the Permanent Mission of Jamaica in Geneva. According to Special Rapporteur Scheinin, however, there is no consistent practice on whether the Secretariat contacts only the Permanent Mission or whether it contacts the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, other government ministries, prison wardens etc. as well.⁶³

Jamaica's attitude towards the manner in which it was informed of provisional measures in the early years becomes apparent in Reece v. Jamaica (disc. 1993).⁶⁴ Jamaica pointed out it wished to receive all the information together with the request for provisional measures. Its response serves as a reminder of the importance of providing full information with any decision to use provisional measures and, preferably, some motivation.⁶⁵ It also serves as a historical background showing that initially the means of communication were rather inefficient.⁶⁶

⁶¹ HRC O.W. v. Jamaica, 26 July 1988, and Earl Pratt and Ivan Morgan v. Jamaica, 6 April 1989.

⁶² HRC Ramcharan Bickaroo v. Trinidad and Tobago, 29 October 1997, Rule 86/91 decision of 5 October 1993 (on file with the author).

⁶³ Interview by the author with Special Rapporteur Scheinin, Geneva, April 2003.

⁶⁴ HRC Lloyd Reece v. Jamaica, 247/1987, discontinued upon receipt of the petitioner's instructions to withdraw, 28 April 1993; initial submission of 18 June 1987; Rule 86/91 of 25 November 1987 of 12 November 1987 (separate unpublished HRC decision, on file with the author). His death sentence was commuted on 6 June 1995. See also the follow-up case Lloyd Reece v. Jamaica, 14 July 2003.

⁶⁵ See further section 8.3 of this Chapter on publication and motivation. The HRC decided to take provisional measures on 12 November, but this decision was only transmitted to the State on 25 November 1987. It pointed out that a person under sentence of death had submitted the complaint. At the same time it noted that further factual information from the petitioner was necessary before the HRC could consider the question of admissibility. It relied on the State's willingness to cooperate with the HRC 'at this early stage in the consideration of the subject-matter'. Apparently, however, the State only received this decision thirteen days after the HRC had decided on it. On 8 December 1987 an official Note Verbale confirmed the message in the telegram. It was only with this Note Verbale that the Secretariat also transmitted the text of the complaint itself. Decision under Rule 86/91, 12 November 1987, CCPR/C/31/D/247/1987, transmitted on 25 November 1987 (by telegram) and Note Verbale by UN Secretariat to Jamaican Ministry of Foreign Affairs with a copy to the Permanent Mission, 8 December 1987 (on file with the author). In other words, there was an interval between the Committee's decision to take provisional measures and the Secretariat's action to inform the State, first by telegram and later by transmittal of the Note Verbale. A month later the Jamaican Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Trade and Industry responded to the telegram. While the Note Verbale referred to a telegram, the response referred to a telex. It may be assumed that the UN Centre for Human Rights sent its telegrams through its own telex system before it changed to using the fax. It noted that the telegram included the text of the Committee's decision to take provisional measures, which mentioned that a copy of the petitioner's communication would be transmitted separately. The State acknowledged that, under the Rules of Procedure, the HRC was only required to ensure that the text of a complaint is sent to the State party before it made a declaration on admissibility. It nevertheless felt that the HRC should make such communications available to the Government 'at the earliest possible opportunity, or at any rate, contemporaneously with the first request by the Committee for action by the State Party under the Protocol and its Rules'. It gave as an example the Committee's request under Rule 86. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs felt 'that from

The case of the late Rockliff Ross v. Guyana (disc. 1997)⁶⁷ shows the lengths to which the Secretariat of the HRC sometimes has to go in trying to get the message to the relevant authorities. Even though the pains taken were to no avail, the case serves as an interesting example showing the sequence of events in contacting the State party. Aguilar Urbina, the Chairperson of the HRC, had authorised both the registration of the case and the use of provisional measures. These were to be sent directly to the State party, more precisely to the Presidency and the Office of the Attorney General, because there was no Permanent Mission of Guyana in Geneva and the Permanent Mission in New York would only start its daily business after the execution. A member of the Geneva Secretariat dictated the contents of the Note Verbale with the provisional measure to an assistant of the Superintendent of the State Prison. The Superintendent himself could not be reached anymore, being 'out in the yard'. Earlier the Superintendent of the prison had said he could not interfere with the process and emphasised he was carrying out an executive order. Rockliff Ross was executed as planned.⁶⁸ that stage the relevant State Party should at least be seized of the nature of the complaint that has been made against it'. "Indeed, although Rule 86 has no express provisions on this question, it appears to proceed on the assumption that the State Party would already have been seized of the communication and hence of the complaint by the time a request for its action under that Rule has been made". Letter of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Trade and Industry of Jamaica to the Director of the United Nations Centre for Human Rights, 24 December 1987, reference number 50/151/1 regarding Lloyd Reece (247/1987) (on file with the author). From the Secretariat's reply to the Jamaican Ministry of Foreign Affairs it becomes apparent that Jamaica had made the same observation with regard to twelve other cases. These were 237/1987, 246/1987, 248/1987, 249/1987, 250/1987, 251/1987, 252/1987, 253/1987, 254/1987, 255/1987, 256/1987 and 257/1987. The Secretariat agreed with the State's argument that the text of a communication should be transmitted simultaneously with the relevant decision.

⁶⁶ "Nevertheless, given the special nature of the cases in question, the Committee requested the Secretariat, as an exception to the normal practice, to transmit the text of the decisions first by telegram, to be followed by a retransmittal of the decisions as soon as possible, under cover of Notes Verbales, enclosing at that time copies of the communications themselves. This, the Secretariat has tried to do as expeditiously as possible". It also suggested a solution for this problem: "Should the Ministry of Foreign Affairs consider it helpful, the Secretariat would be quite willing to consider the possibility of effecting transmittal of the Committee's decisions together with copies of the communications by telefax (if further cases of this nature do arise). For this purpose, the Secretariat would be grateful for learning the telefax number of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs". Note Verbale by the UN Secretariat (Centre for Human Rights) to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Jamaica of 15 January 1988 concerning 237/1987, 240/1987 and 246/1987 to 257/1987 (on file with the author).

⁶⁷ HRC (The late) Rockliff Ross v. Guyana, discontinued 10 December 1997, 703/1996 (on file with the author).

⁶⁸ At approximately 11:30 a.m. Chairperson Aguilar Urbina had authorised the provisional measures. Mr. Schmidt of the UN Secretariat would contact the Superintendent of the Prison. At 12:15 p.m. the Secretariat transmitted the Note Verbale of Aguilar to the Presidency by fax. Seven successive attempts to send this to the Attorney General failed. At 12:30 p.m. Schmidt was on the phone with the Superintendent of the prison, who said he could not interfere with the process and emphasised he was carrying out an executive order. Schmidt suggested him at least to check with the President's or the Attorney General's Office, which the Superintendent promised to do. Subsequent attempts (between 12:30 – 14:15 p.m.) to contact the Office of the Attorney General by phone and to reach the Presidency and the Chief Justice failed as well. Between 12:35 and 12:45 p.m. Schmidt dictated the contents of the Note Verbale with the provisional measure to an assistant of the Superintendent of the State Prison. The Superintendent himself could not be reached anymore, being 'out in the yard'. The request to have him paged or call back remained without result. The assistant promised to deliver the handwritten transcript to Sometimes a long time-span does not mean that the HRC did nothing. It may have taken action informally. A.A.T. v. Hungary (disc. 1994) serves as an example.⁶⁹ In this deportation case it took the HRC ten months to decide affirmatively on the use of provisional measures.⁷⁰ Yet this case hints at the importance of informal interventions. The Geneva Secretariat emphasised to the petitioner that if the authorities would decide to expel or extradite him to Iraq he should not hesitate to contact the Committee. Upon inquiry in Hungary the Committee found that there was indeed a valid court order for the expulsion of the petitioner and that a date had been set. Apparently, informal interventions on behalf of the HRC resulted in a stay of this domestic court order. Nevertheless, once it appeared that the expulsion was still imminent, the Special Rapporteur did transmit the case to the State party and requested it to halt deportation. Obviously, for this type of informal intervention there should be knowledge about the domestic situation and personal access to State decision-makers by a member of the HRC or its Secretariat.

2.3.6 Related Rules of Procedure

Next to the Rule on provisional measures itself (now Rule 92, previously Rule 86) there are some other Rules of Procedure with particular relevance to provisional measures: the Rule on the transmittal of a complaint to the State party and the possible enquiry of the Committee on specific points needing clarification by the State or the petitioner (now Rule 97, previously Rule 91), the Rule on the designation of special rapporteurs (now Rule 95, previously Rule 89), and the Rule on confidentiality (now Rule 102, previously Rule 96). Generally the Committee's provisional measures⁷¹ are simply included at the end of a Note Verbale directed to the respondent government. This Note Verbale normally transmits the complaint to the State concerned and provides it with the communication number of the case.⁷² The HRC sometimes uses provisional measures as part the Superintendent in the yard. At 14:15 p.m. the HRC received a reply from the Attorney General's Office, but none from the Superintendent's Office. The London-based NGO Interights sent Mr. Schmidt a fax on 6 June 1996 informing him that the execution took place at 8:00 a.m. Guyana time. Initial submission 2 June 1996 (received 3 June); telephone call by counsel at 11:00 a.m. Geneva time on 4 June; submission under Rule 86 on 4 June at 11:30 a.m. Geneva time; client scheduled for execution same day 8:00 a.m. (2:00 p.m. Geneva time), from file notes of 4 June 1996 and telephone chart (on file with the author) in: Rockliff Ross v. Guyana, discontinued 10 December 1997, 703/1996.

⁶⁹ HRC A.A.T. v. Hungary, 543/1993 (disc. 1994); initial submission of 10 August 1992; Rule 86/91 of 2 June 1993.

⁷⁰ The petitioner had requested provisional measures in August 1992 but the Rapporteur only used provisional measures in June 1993.

⁷¹ In its Views and Annual Reports the HRC itself tends to use the term 'interim measures'. As noted in the Introduction for the sake of consistency this book normally uses the term provisional measures.

⁷² Note Verbale is the term generally used to refer to official letters sent to the State involved, usually to the State's diplomatic representative at the UN in Geneva. This representative is expected to channel such letters to his government (usually the Ministry of Foreign Affairs). Often it also requests certain information from the State. The HRC usually includes its provisional measures in this 'transmission' to the State. In July 1991 the Committee adopted revised terms of reference for the mandate of the Special Rapporteur on New Communications. This included 'to issue rule 86 requests, whether coupled with a request under rule 91 or not' and 'to inform the Committee at each session on action taken under rules 86 and 91'. Annex X, Mandate of the Special Rapporteur on New Communications, revised terms of reference adopted at the 1087th meeting, 24 July 1991, A/46/40, 10 October 1991, in: Official Records of the Human Rights Committee 1990/1991, Vol. II, CCPR/10/Add. 1.

of its decision on admissibility rather than together with its earlier decision to transmit the case to the State. Sometimes it does both.

The Rule on confidentiality clarifies the level of access to information. Since 1997 the Committee has formally excluded provisional measures from its confidentiality rules. It declared decisions relating to provisional measures to be public information, not hampered by confidentiality limitations. Its paragraph 5 provides:

“Subject to paragraph 4, the Committee's decisions on inadmissibility, merits and discontinuance shall be made public. The decisions of the Committee or the Special Rapporteur designated pursuant to rule 95 paragraph 3, under rule 92 of this rule shall be made public. No advance copies of any Committee decision shall be issued”.

Paragraph 6 stipulates:

“The Secretariat is responsible for the distribution of the Committee's final decisions. It shall not be responsible for the reproduction and the distribution of submissions concerning communications”.

A limited interpretation of paragraph 6, making the Secretariat only responsible for the distribution of the HRC's final decisions, would make it difficult to envisage the implementation of the obligation to make public decisions on provisional measures.

2.3.7 Proprio motu use of provisional measures

Often petitioners submit hand-written complaints, without assistance of a lawyer, sometimes from death row. They may invoke any particular article of the Covenant. However, the HRC can derive the applicable rights from the facts of the case even if the petitioner did not specifically claim them. It is customary for the HRC, or rather initially its Secretariat, to indicate proprio motu under which articles issues seem to arise. For instance, based on the initial petition the HRC has inquired about the health of the petitioner's detained relatives while the petitioner apparently did not specifically request this.⁷³ On the basis of the facts mentioned in the complaint it also seems to have requested information on the whereabouts of a petitioner's relative.⁷⁴ In other words it took an informal provisional measure proprio motu.⁷⁵

Equally, if the complaint refers to the imposition of corporal punishment on the alleged victim, but the specific claims do not relate to it, the HRC can include an Article 7 claim proprio motu and use provisional measures to prevent the execution of the punishment. In the first two corporal punishment cases it is likely that members of the Committee noticed only at a rather late stage of the proceedings that the petitioner had been sentenced to corporal punishment. Then they raised the issue proprio motu. They could also have used provisional measures, but at this late stage the Committee may no longer have taken into account the possibility of taking provisional measures because the decision to take such measures is normally made during the initial stages of the proceedings. Now that the HRC has clearly found violations in the context of specific claims about corporal punishment it is likely that any mention of this punishment in a petition will trigger action by the Secretariat contacting the Special Rapporteur about the use of provisional measures in cases in which the punishment has not yet been executed.⁷⁶

⁷³ See e.g. HRC Valentini de Bazzano v. Uruguay, 15 August 1979. In Martinez Machado v. Uruguay, 4 November 1993, however, it did not inquire about the alleged victim's state of health, despite the great concern expressed by the petitioner. In Almirati Nieto (submitted by Almirati Garcia) v. Uruguay, 25 July 1983 it did not intervene proprio motu either, probably because of the lack of specificity about the urgency of the concern. See further Chapter VII (Detention).

⁷⁴ HRC Martinez Machado v. Uruguay, 4 November 1993.

⁷⁵ On this flexible approach, not applying non ultra petita in a strict manner, or not regarding as non ultra petita this type of assistance to the lay petitioner in formulating his claim, as long as it is based on the facts in the petition, is based on the protective function of the adjudicator and on the particular context. See further Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction). About informal provisional measures see Chapters VI (Disappearances) and VII (Detention).

The Committee has also used provisional measures upon request, but on the basis of a different right than that claimed by the petitioner. It introduced this proprio motu. This was the case in the Lubicon Lake Band v. Canada (1990) involving cultural survival. In this case the petitioner claimed a violation of Article 1 ICCPR and requested provisional measures. Before deciding on the request for provisional measures the HRC first introduced Article 27 ICCPR proprio motu as an alternative to the Article 1 ICCPR claim, which it held inadmissible. Then it took the provisional measures, requested, but on the basis of the claim it had introduced proprio motu.⁷⁷

⁷⁶ See further Chapter IV (Corporal punishment). In a case published the year before Sooklal (2001), the case Osbourne v. Jamaica (2000), it appears from the files in Geneva, but not from the View itself, that the Committee did use provisional measures. It did so on 23 June 1997. The petitioner had submitted his complaint that same month, on 12 June 1997. It was in this case that the HRC pointed out, for the first time, that imposition of corporal punishment in itself already constituted a violation of Article 7, even without the execution of this punishment. While the Committee published Matthews v. Trinidad and Tobago, the first case dealing with corporal punishment, in March 1998, more than two months after it used its provisional measure to prevent flogging in Osbourne v. Jamaica, it is unlikely that it already used provisional measures in Matthews. The complaint was of 11 October 1993 and the Committee declared it admissible, also with regard to the corporal punishment issue, two years later. Indeed the file does not refer to the use of provisional measures.

⁷⁷ HRC Bernard Ominayak, Chief of the Lubicon Lake Band v. Canada, 26 March 1990 (destruction of the natural habitat and Article 27). See also Chapters X (Culture) and XIV (Jurisdiction and admissibility). In situations claiming ongoing violations the HRC has sometimes taken into account new developments. In Bakhtiyari family v. Australia (2003) the Rapporteur adjusted his provisional measures in light of procedural developments. See HRC Bakhtiyari family v. Australia, 29 October 2003, §2.1: “On 27 March 2002, the Committee, acting through its Special Rapporteur for New Communications, pursuant to Rule 86 of the Committee's Rules of Procedure, requested the State party to refrain from deporting Mrs Bakhtiyari and her children, until the Committee had had the opportunity to consider their claims under the Covenant, in the event of a negative decision by the Minister for Immigration on their request in October 2001 to exercise his discretion to allow them to remain in Australia. Following the Minister's adverse decision and advice that Mrs Bakhtiyari and her children had applied to the High Court of Australia, this request to refrain from deportation was adjusted by the Special Rapporteur on New Communications, on 13 May 2002, to be conditional on an adverse decision on the application by the High Court”. Later the Committee observed that certain claims under Articles 17 and 23 ‘deriving from a separation of the family unit’ had been withdrawn after the father had been placed with his family. However, ‘the most recent information suggests that the State party is moving to remove Ms. Bakhtiyari and her children while proceedings in relation to Mr Bakhtiyari are in process’. HRC Bakhtiyari family v. Australia, 29 October 2003, §8.5. Thus, proprio motu it regarded these claims as still relevant and considered them sufficiently substantiated for purposes of admissibility.

2.3.8 Withdrawing provisional measures

Generally human rights adjudicators take provisional measures for a limited period and, based on the facts, they may decide to extend them or not to renew them at all after this period has lapsed. In some cases a specific decision was made to withdraw provisional measures.

In the Jouni Lämsman v. Finland II, involving Sami culture, the Rapporteur had used provisional measures in August 1995, but had immediately invited the State to inform him in case it did not agree with such measures, which the State promptly did. In November 1996 the Rapporteur set aside his provisional measures, apparently accepting the State's arguments. Later the case was declared admissible.⁷⁸ When a case is declared inadmissible the provisional measures are generally assumed to be set aside, unless a statement to the contrary is made.⁷⁹ Yet in another case involving the Sami Sara et al. v. Finland, the provisional measures were first maintained upon admissibility, but when the case was subsequently declared inadmissible, the Committee specifically noted that the provisional measures were set aside as well.

With regard to a discontinued extradition case, E.G. v. Canada (unpublished, but discontinued in 1997),⁸⁰ it appears from the file that the State party was keen on withdrawal of the provisional measures and the Rapporteur indeed decided that there was no need to maintain them. He had made this decision 'after careful consideration and upon reflection' and 'on the basis of the assurances obtained by the Canadian Government from United States authorities, to the effect that the death penalty will not be sought against and imposed on' the petitioner. As the Rapporteur normally points out in his decision to take provisional measures, he noted here as well that the withdrawal did not imply that the HRC had reached a decision on admissibility.⁸¹ In the letter sent by the Secretariat to counsel it was noted that the Rapporteur was 'satisfied that the Government of Canada has obtained the appropriate assurances from the United States authorities, both at the Federal and at the State level'.⁸² In May 1997 the petitioner withdrew his communication before the HRC. 'The answers provided by Canada in response to the communication have helped to clarify his legal situation and he feels that the assurances are now sufficient that the death penalty will not be imposed'.⁸³

⁷⁸ See the discussion in Chapter X (Protecting (indigenous) cultural and religious rights).

⁷⁹ The latter is further discussed in Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction and admissibility).

⁸⁰ E.G. v. Canada, 738/1997, disc. 17 November 1997, initial submission 5 January 1997, received 7 January 1997 with newspaper clipping of the Orlando sentinel of 18 September 1996, Rule 86/91 of 17 January 1997; withdrawal of Rule 86 (on file with the author).

⁸¹ Note verbale by the Special Rapporteur to the Permanent Mission of Canada in E.G. v. Canada (738/1997), 28 April 1997 (on file with the author).

⁸² Letter by the Secretariat to the petitioner's counsel, 28 April 1997 (on file with the author). The fact that in federal systems it is also important to take into account implementation at the level of the constituent State is something not only the human rights adjudicators, but also the ICJ has had to face. See e.g. its provisional measures to halt executions in LaGrand and Avena. See Chapter I.

⁸³ Letter by counsel to the HRC, 26 May 1997; In November 1997 the HRC decided to discontinue examination of the case, letter by the Secretariat to counsel informing about the decision, taken at the 61st session, to discontinue the case, 17 November 1997 (on file with the author).

2.4 Decisions of the HRC to take provisional measures: transparency or the lack thereof?

2.4.1 Introduction

The fact that the proceedings are conducted entirely in writing obviously means that the HRC does not conduct public hearings on the use of provisional measures. The request for provisional measures is usually included in the last paragraph of a Note Verbale sent to the State party. This request is not motivated⁸⁴ and Notes Verbales are not published.⁸⁵ In its Annual Report to the General Assembly it provides some general information on the use of provisional measures.⁸⁶ However, the main information about its use of provisional measures must be derived from its case law. This section refers to the different sources and shows that the Committee has not been very transparent in its use of provisional measures.

2.4.2 Secondary literature and visit of the Geneva Secretariat

There is no literature systematically analysing the HRC's use of provisional measures. Some general literature on the HRC has referred to provisional measures.⁸⁷ Only a handful of authors have more extensively dealt with the issue.⁸⁸ In addition some information was obtained at the Committee's secretariat in Geneva.⁸⁹

⁸⁴ There may be a recent change in this respect, judging from HRC Dissanayake, Mudiyansele Sumanaweera Banda v. Sri Lanka, 22 July 2008, where the Committee notes in its decision on the merits that the petitioner had requested provisional measures to the effect that he be granted respite from the execution of the sentence of hard labour, but that in March 2005 the Special Rapporteur denied this request 'on the ground that working in a print shop did not appear to come within the terms of article 8, paragraph 3(b)', §1.2.

⁸⁵ This section deals with the available information on the Committee's provisional measures. Only in the early years it sometimes separately published a provisional measure.

⁸⁶ See the paragraph in the Report on the Committee's consideration of communications under the Optional Protocol. Incidentally the HRC also mentions provisional measures in its Concluding Observations on certain States Parties' reports.

⁸⁷ Literature discussing the HRC's procedure in general only briefly refers to provisional measures. See, e.g. Bayefsky (2002), pp. 64 and p. 165; De Zayas (2001), pp. 79-81; O'Flaherty (1996) p. 28; Zwart (1994), pp. 14-16; McGoldrick (1994), pp. 131-132, p. 202; Zwaak (1991), p. 82. Discussion is more extensive in Joseph/Schultz/Castan (2004), pp. 25-28; Barkhuysen/Van Emmerik/Rieter (2002), pp. 84-89 and (2008), pp. 106-112; Ghandhi (1998), pp. 57-65 and p. 425; the following articles have also referred to the HRC's use of provisional measures: Pasqualucci (2005); Schmidt (1998); Kamminga (1996) and Van Boven (1994). As apparent from the title, Interim Measures Indicated by International Courts, Bernhardt (ed.) (1994) does not deal with the HRC's provisional measures but only with measures indicated by courts.

⁸⁸ Harrington (2003), pp. 55-87 and Tomuschat (1995), pp. 624-634. See also Malinverni (2005), pp. 63-75; Schabas (2005), pp. 77-90; Naldi (2004), pp. 445-454 (on legal status); Van Boven/Flinterman/Rieter (1999), pp. 908-909 and Rieter (1999), pp. 1136-1145 (both on Dutch compliance with provisional measures by CAT).

⁸⁹ The author visited the Geneva Secretariat on 12-22 October 1998; 29 March-5 April 2003 and 24-30 August 2003. She wishes to thank HRC members Martin Scheinin, Sir Nigel Rodley (April 2003), Fausto Pocar and Cecilia Medina Quiroga (October 1998) as well as various (former) staff members dealing predominantly with the HRC, but also with CAT, including Marcus Schmidt, Paul Oertly, Antonie Cardon, Carla Edelenbosch and Jacob Möller. In October 1998 only the files recently closed (and some pending files) were available, not those already archived. Some

2.4.3 Drafting history Rule 86 (current Rule 92)

The drafting history of Rule 86 provides some information on the Committee's approach towards the concept of provisional measures in the first years of its existence. In this respect the HRC discussed three issues: its authority to use provisional measures; urgency and delegation of the authority to use provisional measures to subsidiary organs;⁹⁰ and the relationship of provisional measures with the admissibility and merits of a case pending before it.⁹¹

2.4.4 Separate publication of decisions on provisional measures

While the HRC normally does not publish its Notes Verbale, including the references to Rule 86, in the early stages it took separate decisions to issue provisional measures and published some of them.⁹² This provides additional information on how the HRC has approached the issue, at least in the early years. In 1978 it made public a provisional measure to halt a deportation.⁹³ In 1986, moreover, on two separate occasions it made public a specific provisional measure to halt an execution.⁹⁴ These provisional measures are separate decisions instead of a sentence in an unpublished Note Verbale to the government concerned. It is clear from these decisions that the request for information (then under Rule 91) and the use of provisional measures are closely interrelated. In the first death penalty case, X v. S (1986), the HRC considered that it had insufficient information to deal with the admissibility of the case. It requested the State party to clarify certain matters involving the right of appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (JCPC) in London and the issue of statutory time limits. Apart from this it requested the State party not to carry out the death sentence against the petitioner before the HRC had had the opportunity to consider further the question of admissibility. The Committee indicated that this further consideration would take place during its next session.⁹⁵ It later joined the case with another.⁹⁶ The final deci-files, moreover, were missing. In one week in March/April and one in August 2003 it was made possible to consult several archived files (some of them relating to files that had been pending in October 1998). The author is grateful for the decision of March 2003 by a meeting of members of the HRC and HRC staff granting her access to these archived files with regard to decisions about the use of provisional measures. This decision was based on what was then Rule 96(5) of the Rules of Procedure (currently Rule 102(6)). Within the limited time period available a selection was made on the basis of death penalty cases from the time period in which the HRC did not mention its use of provisional measures in its decisions on the merits and inadmissibility, other cases in which questions arose about the use of provisional measures, recently discontinued cases (of which the communication numbers were available) and cases the author was alerted to in October 1998 that could not be properly consulted then. It must be noted that case files do not always provide information about the use of provisional measures either: until about 1995 there was no formal exchange between Secretariat and Special Rapporteur about these measures. There would just be a phone call and, normally, a note in the file about the decision taken.

⁹⁰ See later in this Chapter.

⁹¹ See Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction and admissibility).

⁹² The reason that it did so in the early stages may have been that, different from subsequently, these were decisions by the full Committee.

⁹³ HRC O.E. v. S., 25 January 1978 and 26 July 1978, com. no. 22/1977, CCPR/C/OP/1 at 5 and 6. See further Chapter V on halting refoulement.

⁹⁴ HRC X v. S (210/1986 of 21 July 1986) and X v. S (252/1987 of 13 November 1987), both published in Selected Decisions vol. II, under the heading 'interlocutory decisions', CCPR/C/OP/2.

⁹⁵ HRC X v. S, 210/1986. Since 210/1986 was one of the cases in Pratt and Morgan v. Jamaica it is now clear that the State in X v. S was Jamaica. It is not clear why the HRC initially chose to keep the State anonymous. Possibly, it did so because it was publishing the decision on provisional sion in both cases is Pratt and Morgan v. Jamaica (1989).⁹⁷ The second time it separately published a provisional measure in a death penalty case was in a case that was also called X v. S (1987).⁹⁸ This case is different in the sense that here the HRC requested the information from the petitioner and not from the State. This request for information and the provisional measures request to the government are nevertheless interrelated.⁹⁹ Similarly, there have been separate publications in relation to early detention cases in which the HRC requested information about the health and/or whereabouts of the alleged victims.¹⁰⁰

Unlike the Committee did initially, when it decided for provisional measures in full session, the Rapporteurs, first the one on Death Penalty Cases and later the one on New Communications, do not draft formal transmission and provisional measures decisions. Clearly they do not provide a motivation why provisional measures would be necessary. In the weeks preceding a session the Working Group on Communications could also decide on provisional measures. It does not motivate its provisional measures either.

2.4.5 Information in the Annual Reports

The HRC gives some cursory information on its use of provisional measures in its Annual Reports. It mentioned that during its 29th and 30th sessions (22 March-27 July 1987) it had used them to halt executions vis-à-vis two States parties.¹⁰¹ It also mentioned a mysterious situation in which it invoked provisional measures ‘in a case concerning a group of persons, in respect of whom the State party was requested to take steps to avoid irreparable damage’.¹⁰²

In its Annual Report of 1988 the HRC clarified an issue brought up when the Rule was drafted. The Committee finally determined what to do with urgent situations arising in between sessions.¹⁰³

In its 1989 Annual Report it also pointed out that some petitioners sentenced to death and awaiting execution ‘claimed to be innocent of the crimes of which they were convicted and further allege that they were denied a fair hearing’. The Committee used provisional measures ‘in view of the urgency of the communications’. Again, the report indicated that during that period there were only two addressee States.¹⁰⁴ measures when it had not yet decided on the merits and it believed the State would be more willing to cooperate if the Committee did not yet identify it.

⁹⁶ See 225/1987.

⁹⁷ HRC Earl Pratt and Ivan Morgan v. Jamaica, 6 April 1989.

⁹⁸ See 252/1987.

⁹⁹ As yet there is no inadmissibility decision or final View available on this interlocutory decision X v. S. It is most likely that the case was discontinued.

¹⁰⁰ See Chapter VII (Detention). In the third volume of the Selected Decisions of the HRC the table of contents refers to ‘interlocutory decisions’, with the subheading ‘decisions transmitting a communication to the State party (rule 91) and requesting interim measures of protection (rule 86)’. In fact under this heading two inadmissibility decisions simply refer to provisional measures in death penalty cases. O.W. v. Jamaica, 26 July 1988 (inadm.), 227/1987 and N.A.J. v. Jamaica, 26 July 1990 (inadm.), 246/1987, CCPR/C/OP/3, pp. 11-16.

¹⁰¹ A/42/40, §404, in: Yearbook of the Human Rights Committee 1987, Vol. II, CCPR/6/Add. 1.

¹⁰² A/42/40, §405, in: Yearbook of the Human Rights Committee 1987, Vol. II, CCPR/6/Add. 1, referring to the 30th session. This may be the case of Bernard Ominayak, Chief of the Lubicon Lake Band v. Canada, 26 March 1990, CCPR/C/38/D/167/1984, 28 March 1990 because in 1986 the HRC used provisional measures in that case, see Chapter X on protecting cultural survival.

¹⁰³ See under ‘timing and procedure’, section 2.3 of this Chapter.

¹⁰⁴ A/44/40, 29 September 1989, §634, in: Official Records of the Human Rights Committee 1988/1989, Vol. II, CCPR/8/Add. 1.

Apart from some information on the HRC's practice of issuing provisional measures, including information about the delegation of the authority to issue them to a Special Rapporteur,¹⁰⁵ the Annual Reports also provide the names of the Special Rapporteurs during the period in question.¹⁰⁶

2.4.6 Information in the Committee's Views and inadmissibility decisions

The fact that there is no complete record of its provisional measures, let alone of the substance of these measures, does not mean that the HRC did not use them. Closer investigation of its case law uncovers many of these measures. Whether or not provisional measures were used in individual cases must normally be ascertained from references made in the Committee's decisions on the merits (Views) and its inadmissibility decisions.¹⁰⁷ Apart from such references, the HRC rarely discusses provisional measures. At times it does not even mention in its Views that it has used them.¹⁰⁸

¹⁰⁵ A/52/40, Vol. I, 1997, §467 (Pocar transmitted 46 new communications under Rule 91 and an unspecified number of Rule 86 decisions); A/53/40, 1998, §433 (Pocar transmitted 57 new communications under Rule 91, while 'in other cases' he used Rule 86); A/54/40, 1999, §398 (Kretzmer transmitted 44 new communications under Rule 91 and used Rule 86 in 10 cases). A/55/40, Vol. II, 2000, §§14 and 546 (Kretzmer transmitted 66 communications and used provisional measures 11 times); A/56/40, Vol. I, 2001, §15 (Kretzmer transmitted 32 communications and used provisional measures twice. Scheinin transmitted 31 communications, four times he also used Rule 86; in §99 the Committee mentions that during the period covered by this Annual Report, the Special Rapporteurs transmitted 60 new communications (not 63) and issued provisional measures in 7 cases (not 6)).

¹⁰⁶ As noted, the Annual Reports only provide general information. See e.g. A/46/40, 1991, §§669 and 692 (this report does not mention how many communications were transmitted to the State, let alone how many provisional measures); A/47/40, 1992, §617 (Lallah transmitted 30 new communications under Rule 91); A/48/40, 1993, §772 (Chanet transmitted 35 new communications under Rule 91); A/49/40, Vol. I, 1994, §386 (Chanet transmitted 26 communications under Rule 91); A/50/40, Vol. I, 1995, §492 (Chanet and Pocar transmitted 38 new communications); A/51/40, Vol. I, 1996, §378 (Pocar transmitted 62 new communications under Rule 91).

¹⁰⁷ The Committee's Views and inadmissibility decisions are found in the Annexes to the HRC's Annual Report to the General Assembly. Admissibility decisions, on the other hand, are not made public, not even after publication of the Committee's decision on the merits. One exception is Rawle Kennedy v. Trinidad and Tobago, public admissibility decision of 2 November 1999. It is therefore not possible to refer systematically to useful information included in these decisions. In this book incidentally references are made based on information from the files in Geneva.

¹⁰⁸ Sometimes the HRC appears to have used provisional measures only as part of the admissibility decision. This seemed to be the case in HRC Bernhard Lubuto v. Zambia (1995), meaning it took the HRC three and a half years before it used its provisional measures. Bernhard Lubuto v. Jamaica, 31 October 1995. In §4.4 of the View, the Committee notes that it declared the communication admissible on 30 June 1994 and it also notes that it had requested the State party, under Rule 86, not to carry out the death sentence against the petitioner pending the case. The initial submission was of 1 January 1990. From the references to Rule 86 in this paragraph one would almost conclude that it only used the provisional measure as part of the admissibility decision. Nevertheless, the file shows provisional measures were used already on 23 February 1990. The case file, however, shows provisional measures were used within two months. In other words, the assumption based on the View is incorrect and can be explained by the Committee's failure to provide the exact information in this decision. Equally, in George Graham and Arthur

2.4.7 Dividing decisions in time-periods depending on the availability of information

Depending on the information they provide, the decisions of the Committee may be divided in several categories. The first category covers the period between August 1977 and April 1991. These older Views and inadmissibility decisions mention all decisions of the Committee in relation to the case, including decisions to take provisional measures.¹⁰⁹ In other words, the format of the cases is such that information on their use can be identified in the View or decision itself.

Apart from the interlocutory decisions mentioned above, on provisional measures separately published, for this period this research examined the Committee's use of provisional measures in twenty inadmissibility decisions and three Views dealing with the death penalty,¹¹⁰ all in the early period from 1988 to April 1991. There was also one case dealing with deportation,¹¹¹ one dealing with the protection of indigenous culture¹¹² and several informal provisional measures (under Rule 91) dealing with the health of detainees.¹¹³

During the period from April 1991 to March 1996 the format of the decisions changed. The HRC did no longer provide the information on the use of provisional measures in the text of the Views itself. In his 1995 article Tomuschat qualifies this change in format as 'deplorable'. He points out that 'the measure in which requests under Article 86 are made and heeded or disregarded by States is an important feature of any proceeding'.¹¹⁴ Fortunately, in this period it is often still possible to find out whether provisional measures were taken in a certain case because the HRC mentions this on the cover page of the View in question.¹¹⁵ Research with regard to this period uncovered provisional measures in a large number of inadmissibility decisions and Views.¹¹⁶

In the period from July 1996 to August 1998 the Committee again changed the format of its Views, but this did not improve matters. As a general rule, the Committee did not mention prior Morrison v. Jamaica, 25 March 1996 the HRC did not immediately use provisional measures, but seemingly only several years after the initial submission, after one of the petitioners had died during a prison incident. In fact the file shows that it did not use them at the admissibility stage in October 1994, but earlier, in October 1992. The initial submission was of 18 March 1991; Rule 86/91 was of 25 October 1992.

¹⁰⁹ They can be found under 'Documentation References' on the cover page, with a reference to the document number.

¹¹⁰ In this period the HRC published 206 Views and inadmissibility decisions. Between 1988 (when it started to use provisional measures in death penalty cases) and April 1991 it published 89 of these 206 cases.

¹¹¹ HRC O.E. v. S (22/1977).

¹¹² HRC Ominayak v. Canada, 26 March 1990.

¹¹³ See Chapter VII.

¹¹⁴ Tomuschat (1995), p. 629.

¹¹⁵ As of July 1994 the Committee's Views inform the reader (on the cover page) that the provisional measure 'is not issued in document form'. This means that they no longer include the (internal) document number of the decision of provisional measures on the cover page of the View. The date of the transmittal of the provisional measure to the State Party is still mentioned.

¹¹⁶ In total, in the approximately 200 Views and inadmissibility decisions published during this period, the HRC referred to provisional measures more than 60 times. It did so mainly, but not exclusively, in death penalty cases. Sometimes the HRC describes the transmittal of the communication under (former) Rule 91, but fails to mention its use of provisional measures in this respect. The use of these measures may still be mentioned on the cover page or in the text of the decision. In relation to the admissibility decision, the HRC may mention its renewed request for interim protection under Rule 86, although the cover page does not mention the Rule 86 of that date. See e.g., Michael Sawyers and Michael and Desmond McClean v. Jamaica, 11 April 1991.

decisions on the cover page anymore and did not refer to them in the decision itself either.¹¹⁷ This means that it is not clear from the case law whether it used provisional measures during this period and, if so, in which cases. Although from the situations involved one could assume the HRC had used them, this could only be confirmed through information collected at the Secretariat of the Committee in October 1998, April and August 2003.¹¹⁸ This period covers more than 100 inadmissibility decisions and Views, none of them referring to provisional measures while, in fact, the HRC had indeed used provisional measures in at least 50 cases. Since 1997 the Rule on publicity and confidentiality stipulates that decisions to use provisional measures ‘shall be made public’. In this light one might have expected the Committee, in addition to mentioning the use of provisional measures in its Views, to publish these measures separately as well or otherwise to summarise them in its Annual Reports. Surprisingly, however, this new rule initially did not even trigger a restoration of the old format of the Committee’s Views, at least mentioning in which cases provisional measures had been used.

It took two years, until the October 1998 session, before the HRC mentioned its use of provisional measures on the cover page again. These cover pages, however, were published neither on the treaty body database of the High Commissioner on Human Rights nor in the Committee’s Annual Report.¹¹⁹ Between October 1998 and March 2002 the HRC published 147 inadmissibility decisions and Views. In more than 20 of these cases the HRC used provisional measures.¹²⁰ The foregoing means that the information about the use of provisional measures during the six-year period from July 1996 until March 2002 has been particularly inaccessible. The HRC remedied this lack of transparency in March 2002 when it started to refer again to its provisional measures in a way that is accessible to the public, in other words, on publicly available cover pages and/or in the text of the Views themselves.¹²¹

¹¹⁷ It concerned the period from 16 July 1996 to 19 August 1998.

¹¹⁸ The author visited the secretariat in Geneva in October 1998. At the time only the files recently closed (and some pending files) were available, not those already archived. Some files, moreover, were missing. In one week in March/April and one in August 2003 it was made possible to consult several archived files (some of them relating to files that had been pending in October 1998). The author is grateful for the decision of March 2003 by a meeting of members of the HRC and HRC staff granting her access to these archived files with regard to decisions about the use of provisional measures. This decision was based on what was then Rule 96(5) of the Rules of Procedure (currently Rule 102(6)). Within the limited time period available a selection was made on the basis of death penalty cases from the time period in which the HRC did not mention its use of provisional measures in its decisions on the merits and inadmissibility, other cases in which questions arose about the use of provisional measures, recently discontinued cases (of which the communication numbers were available) and cases the author was alerted to in October 1998 that could not be properly consulted then. It must be noted that case files do not always provide information about the use of provisional measures either: until about 1995 there was no formal exchange between Secretariat and Special Rapporteur about these measures. There would just be a phone call and, normally, a note in the file about the decision taken.

¹¹⁹ Category IV in the table of cases (from 19 August 1998 to March 2002). It seems that, mistakenly, these cover pages had not been included in the decisions as made public. Consultation of the internal search system in Geneva (‘ODS search’) in April 2003, by entering communication numbers of cases in which Rule 86 was expected to have been used, uncovered only twelve cases mentioning Rule 86 on the (internal) cover page. There are, however, several other cases in which provisional measures were used during this period. Only a search of the case files uncovered this. There was even one case (614/1995) in which the internal cover pages did in fact mention previous decisions, including under Rule 91, but failed to mention that the Rapporteur had used Rule 86 as well.

¹²⁰ Again, this number is not necessarily exhaustive.

¹²¹ Category V in the table of cases (as of March 2002).

It must be kept in mind that this division is based on the type of information available. It only indicates the format in which the HRC has presented its decisions, but is not meant to indicate possible trends in its use of provisional measures.¹²²

2.4.8 The relevance of discontinued cases

Provisional measures have not just been used in cases that were subsequently published (in Views and inadmissibility decisions), but also in cases that were later discontinued. If death penalty cases are discontinued this is usually because counsel had no other intention than to halt the execution. Following the stay a new avenue for appeal may have been opened or, as is often the case, the Secretariat was unable to contact the petitioners or their counsel. In death penalty cases this may equally indicate that the death sentence has been commuted so that counsel lost interest in the case. In expulsion cases, however, the fact that the alleged victim cannot be reached, clearly does not mean that the case has been solved. He may have been forcibly returned. In cases in which counsel is unable to contact his clients (usually after deportation, sometimes after prison transfers) the HRC has sometimes tried to find them through the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees. Usually, however, the search remains ineffective. This means that once a petitioner has been removed from the territory of the addressee State, this often marks the end of the individual complaint proceeding against that State. In relation to the death penalty and expulsion there are many discontinued cases, such as the above.

By September 1997 the HRC reported a total number of 115 discontinued or withdrawn cases.¹²³ As the communication numbers of these cases are not known it is not possible to check in which of them the HRC used provisional measures. It is only since the fall of 1998 that the HRC mentions the communication numbers of those cases it decided to discontinue.¹²⁴ This was the result of the new rule concerning confidentiality and it meant, among others, that all final decisions would be made public, including decisions to discontinue a case. Still, the HRC does not indicate whether provisional measures were used in these cases. Thus, it is only possible to refer to these cases incidentally.¹²⁵ This chapter refers to known cases in which the HRC used provisional measures, as well as those in which counsel requested the use of provisional measures to no avail.¹²⁶

¹²² The drop in provisional measures under Category IV as compared to Category III, for instance, seems to relate more to the denunciation of the OP by Jamaica and Trinidad and Tobago, dramatically diminishing the number of provisional measures than to the difference in source.

¹²³ A/52/40, §456.

¹²⁴ A/53/40.

¹²⁵ See e.g. HRC A.A.T. v. Hungary (543/1993) for an example of a case in which provisional measures were used but that was later discontinued because it had been solved (on file with the author). In some cases counsel asked for discontinuance after, for instance, the promise that permanent residence visas would be granted, or after the victim's release and changes in the law.

¹²⁶ See e.g. HRC A.B. v. Canada (622/1995); J.P.A.F. v. Canada (620/1995); P.L.-B. v. Canada (556/1993) and J.C.A. v. Costa Rica (725/1996) and X. v. Australia (776/1997), for examples of discontinued cases in which counsel's request for provisional measures had been denied. In some cases it is not clear whether provisional measures were used. O. v. France (715/1996), for instance, concerned an impending deportation to Spain but it is not clear whether they were used. In one case, R. v. Canada (652/1995), the petitioner did not request provisional measures and the HRC did not grant them, but there was a discussion about serious hardship. It was possible to examine the case files of eight discontinued cases mentioned in the Committee's reports to the General Assembly relating to sessions 53-56. In fact provisional measures were not applied in these cases. See e.g. HRC Coloma v. Russia (607/1995); Schier v. New Zealand (892/1999); Lee-

2.4.9 No information on pending cases

On the basis of the available material it is possible to draw tentative conclusions about the situations the HRC has dealt with and the protective measures required by its (informal) decisions on provisional measures. No comprehensive information is available on the direction the present Committee is taking, by way of its Rapporteur. This is so, exactly because it is necessary to await the publication of the cases on the merits. It is only occasionally that information becomes available in advance of publication of the decision on the merits.

In some cases involving executions in violation of its provisional measures the HRC has made public official statements.¹²⁷ In other cases counsel or others may have informed the press.¹²⁸

Alexander v. Australia (723/1996); Huat v. Australia (681/1996); Nielson v. Australia (545/1993); Espinosa v. Ecuador (551/1993). One of the cases mentioned as discontinued was in fact concluded with a View. In Gutierrez Vivanco v. Peru (678/1996) the HRC found a violation of Article 14. Provisional measures played no role. There were two cases that related to deportation. In one of them the petitioner did not request provisional measures and the HRC did not grant them, but there was a discussion about serious hardship, see Richardson v. Canada (652/1995). In the other the petitioner did request Rule 86 but the HRC did not grant it. The case was discontinued following the petitioner's expulsion, see A.B. v. Canada (622/1995). Four other case files relating to these sessions were not available. According to Secretariat staff at least two of these four cases were not applicable: HRC Agatanova v. Latvia (764/1997) and Kravchenko v. Latvia (713/1996). While the latter case related to deportation, the petitioner's wife had already been deported before he submitted the case. In Williams v. New Zealand (773/1997) the petitioner had requested the HRC to use provisional measures to request the State to make available kidney dialysis so as to prevent irreparable harm. The HRC did not do so and eventually the case was discontinued. See Chapter XII (Other situations). The fourth case, O. v. France (715/1996) concerned an impending deportation to Spain. It is not clear whether provisional measures were used. It was also possible to examine some other files of discontinued cases, some of earlier periods, on the assumption that they might relate to deportation or death penalty cases. Two of these cases appeared to be inapplicable. HRC Nunes v. Jamaica, (745/1997) and Sahli v. France (629/1995). Five of them did involve the use of provisional measures to halt an execution. See e.g. HRC Frank McKnight v. Jamaica (729/1996), Rule 86 of 4 December 1996; case discontinued on 29 July 2003. In H.M. v. Jamaica, (595/1994) the HRC used provisional measures on 8 November 1994. In April 1995 the petitioner withdrew the case following reclassification of his sentence from capital to non-capital on 20 March 1995. His counsel pointed out that their client's sentence had been commuted to life imprisonment. They withdrew the case because their objective for requesting the Committee's recommendations had been fulfilled. Letter of 18 April 1995. Hence, at its 54th session the HRC decided to discontinue the case, letter of 3 August 1995. See also E.P. v. Trinidad and Tobago (636/1995), Rule 86 of 27 June 1995, discontinued 29 July 2003 (on file with the author). In Rockliff Ross v. Guyana, 703/1996, the State executed the petitioner despite provisional measures. See also Reece v. Jamaica, 247/1987, both discussed Chapter III (Executions). In several cases the HRC failed or refused to use provisional measures to halt a deportation. See e.g. HRC P.L.-B v. Canada (556/1993); J.P.A.F. v. Canada (620/1995); A.B. v. Canada (622/1995); J. v. Canada (685/1996) and J.C.A. v. Costa Rica (725/1996). In total, this book refers to nine discontinued cases in which the HRC used provisional measures. As noted, five of them dealt with halting executions. One dealt with halting the execution of a detention order. HRC V. v. Spain, 495/1992. Three cases dealt with halting expulsion or extradition. HRC O.E. v. S., 22 /1977; A.A.T. v. Hungary, 543/1993 and E.G. v. Canada, 738/1997. One case, finally, dealt with providing access to counsel and court. HRC A. et al. v. Angola, 810/1998.

¹²⁷ See public statements following the execution of Ashby, HRC Summary Record of the 1352nd meeting: Trinidad and Tobago, 26 July 1994; Dante Piandiong et al. v. the Philippines, 19

Until the HRC decides to publish its provisional measures separately for those who wish to consult them, to issue press releases in some of these cases or at least an overview of its provisional measures in its Annual Report, the information on the use of provisional measures will become available only upon publication of its final Views and inadmissibility decisions.¹²⁹

In my view, after publication of the final Views, the previous admissibility decision should be made available as well. If it is advisable to ‘anonymise’ the (alleged) victim, initials could be used instead of the full names. Moreover, the Committee should always discuss the procedure under a separate heading and include references to the provisional measures taken. It would be preferable if it also provided a short explanation of the purpose of the provisional measure. In any case a specification should be included in the note verbale sent to the State. In my opinion this would enhance the authoritativeness of the provisional measure.

2.4.10 Construing the purpose of provisional measures from the Committee’s case law

The lack of consistent references to and explanations for the use of provisional measures necessitates an approach drawing conclusions from the factual situations, the rights claimed and the eventual decisions on the merits and reparation. In this light, it is necessary not only to present the conclusions, together with references to the sources, but to present as well the construction of this source material. This is so precisely because the findings are construed and cannot be found as such in the text of the decisions.

If sufficient case law is available on certain issues, for instance on the death penalty, it is not necessary to present the issue on a case-by-case basis. If there are only a limited number of (diverse) cases available on an issue, however, such approach is indeed warranted. In some cases the context provided in the relevant Views themselves is insufficient and additional information is derived from other sources such as NGO reports and Concluding Observations by the HRC in relation to State reports under Article 40 ICCPR.

October 2000. See also Mansaraj et al.; Gborie et al. and Sesay et al. v. Sierra Leone, 16 July 2001 and Glenn Ashby v. Trinidad and Tobago, 21 March 2002. See further press release, ‘Human Rights Committee deplores the execution of six individuals in Uzbekistan’, 24 July 2003. The petitioners who were executed were Muzaffar Mirzaev (case 1170/2003), Shukrat Andasbaev (case 1166/2003), Ulugbek Ashov (case 1165/2003), Ilkhon Babadzhonov and Maksud Ismailov (case 1162/2003), and Azamat Uteev (case 1150/2003). In addition see Barno Saidova v. Tajikistan, 8 July 2004. In other cases NGOs sometimes make available information. While the case of Ahani was still pending, sources other than the HRC had already made available information about the provisional measures and the fact that Canada nevertheless deported him. Amnesty International urgent action of 17 May 2002 and Amnesty International Annual Report 2003, p. 67. Mansour Ahani v. Canada, 29 March 2004, CCPR/C/80/D/1051/2002, 15 June 2004. See the discussion of this case in Chapter V (Expulsion). The Asian Human Rights Commission made public information about the use of provisional measures to the effect that Sri Lanka would protect Michael Anthony Fernando and his family against threats. See e.g. the urgent appeals on its website, <www.ahrchk.net> (consulted on 5 August 2004). See further about this case Chapter IX (Threats).

¹²⁸ An example is a newspaper article referring to a ‘Geneva based United Nations human rights panel’, which agreed to examine the Bakhtiyari family’s case on 28 March 2002 and had recommended Australia not to deport the children until it had been able to determine the case. Richard C. Paddock, ‘A family apart in Australia’, Los Angeles Times, 10 April 2002, reproduced at <www.carad-wa.org> (consulted 9 April 2003). The HRC published its decision on the merits in 2003: Bakhtiyari v. Australia, 29 October 2003. See further in Chapter V on halting expulsion and Chapter VII on detention situations involving risks to health and safety.

¹²⁹ In September 2002 the Special Rapporteur reported he had used more than 20 provisional measures, many of them involving conditions of detention (health care) and expulsion. Interview of author with Special Rapporteur Martin Scheinin, Maastricht 20 September 2002.

3 CAT, CEDAW AND CERD

3.1 Introduction

In light of their adjudicatory function, in light of the object and purpose of the treaties and the individual petition system, the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD), supervising the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (ICERD),¹³⁰ and the Committee against Torture (CAT) supervising the Convention against Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (ICAT),¹³¹ have included in their Rules of Procedure the possibility of taking provisional measures.

For the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW),¹³² the possibility of individual complaint was only recently introduced, by way of an Optional Protocol. This Protocol includes an explicit article on provisional measures. The same applies to the even more recent UN Convention against Disappearances, which has not yet entered into force. It explicitly provides for the possibility (and obligation) to take urgent action.

CAT has an established practice with regard to provisional measures while CERD has never used them and the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) has only just started its practice. Dealing with complaints under the most recent individual complaint mechanism, CEDAW has used provisional measures in 2003, requesting the State to take protective measures to prevent irreparable harm to the petitioner because of domestic violence.¹³³

CAT takes almost all its provisional measures under Article 3 (non-refoulement).¹³⁴ Yet there is one case in which it took them in order to protect family members and witnesses against threats and another case in which it did so in the context of the State's obligation to act against impunity.¹³⁵ As the majority of its case law deals with the question whether or not there would be a real risk of torture in the receiving or requesting State, most of its case law will be dealt with in Chapter XV about provisional measures and assessment of risk.

While CERD has never used provisional measures as of yet there are situations in which it could feasibly use them in the future.¹³⁶ Article 2(1)(a) CERD stipulates that States refrain from ¹³⁰ ICERD was concluded in 1965 and entered into force in 1969. It has 173 States parties (as of 18 July 2007).

¹³¹ ICAT was concluded in 1984 and entered into force in 1987. It has 145 States parties (as of 2 October 2007).

¹³² CEDAW was concluded in 1979 and entered into force in 1981. There are 185 States parties (as of 20 July 2007).

¹³³ CEDAW A.T. v. Hungary, 26 January 2005. See further Chapter IX (Threats).

¹³⁴ Between 1993 and 2003 CAT took provisional measures in more than 80 cases involving non-refoulement. See Chapter V (Non-refoulement) and Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

¹³⁵ CAT B.M'.B v. Tunisia (inadm.), 5 May 1994 and Suleymane Guengueng et al. v. Senegal (involving former Chadian dictator Habré), Press release Human Rights Watch, 23 April 2001, 'United Nations asks Senegal to hold Ex-Chad Dictator', <www.hrw.org/justice/habre> (accessed 22 June 2005); confirmed formally in Note Verbale CAT to HRW of 27 April 2001, <<http://www.hrw.org/french/themes/habre-legal.htm>> (accessed 22 June 2005).

¹³⁶ Until 2000 the number of cases decided by CERD was extremely small. See Van Boven (2000a) and Van Boven (2001a), also referring to the 'modest number of communications received and considered'. Before 2000 the Committee published decisions (views and inadmissibility racial discrimination and ensure that public authorities and institutions refrain from such discrimination. Article 3 obliges States to prevent racial segregation and apartheid and Article 4 to take immediate and positive measures against incitement of racial hatred. Article 5 lays down the security of the person including the protection from violence or bodily harm (Article 5(b)),¹³⁷ the right to vote (Article 5(c)) and social, economic and cultural rights such as the right to housing, health care and education (Article 5(e)). This right is of particular importance when children are involved.¹³⁸ Article 6 refers to the undertaking to ensure effective protection and remedies including reparation and satisfaction.

If CERD would decide to take provisional measures this would likely be in the context of widespread and systematic discrimination or in an extreme individual case.¹³⁹ In this respect there may be similarities with its practice to take preventive measures including early warning and urgent procedures with regard to situations requiring its immediate attention outside of the regular process of commenting on State reports.¹⁴⁰ When it initiated this practice in 1993 it referred to the conclusion by the fourth meeting of the chairpersons that the human rights treaty bodies had an important role to play not only in responding to human rights violations but also in seeking to prevent them. Each treaty body should consider whether procedural innovations would be required to enable it to take all possible measures within its competence in order to prevent human rights violations and monitor more closely emergency situations.¹⁴¹

It is perhaps not surprising that the treaty body dealing with the smallest number of individual petitions was the first and, thus far, only body to institute a formal process for urgent situations. The HRC did decide, in April 1991 that it could request periodic emergency reports, but has decisions) in nine cases. Between 2000 and August 2007 another 29 cases were concluded with an inadmissibility decision or decision on the merits (based on UN statistical survey of 15 August 2007).

¹³⁷ See Chapter IX (Threats) on the use of provisional measures by other adjudicators to protect against such threats.

¹³⁸ See also Chapter XIII (Protection).

¹³⁹ See Chapter XI discussing provisional measures in the Inter-American system to prevent mass expulsion and by the Bosnia Chamber to halt forced eviction. As noted in Chapter I (ICJ), in October 2008 the ICJ ordered provisional measures to the effect that both Parties shall refrain from any act of racial discrimination and from sponsoring, defending or supporting such acts; that they shall facilitate humanitarian assistance; and that they shall refrain from any action which might prejudice the respective rights of the Parties or might aggravate or extend the dispute. ICJ Application of the International Convention on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, (Georgia v. Russian Federation), 15 October 2008 (by a 8-7 vote).

¹⁴⁰ This became part of its regular agenda in 1994. See its working paper on this issue, A/48/18, Annex III. The General Assembly has supported this approach, see e.g. General Assembly resolution 48/90, 20 December 1993, A/RES/48/90, 16 February 1994: "Encourages the Committee to continue to exert its efforts to enhance its contributions in the area of prevention of racial discrimination, including early warning and urgent procedures". The distinction between early warning measures and urgent procedures is not always clear in practice, but the former would be aimed at addressing existing problems in order to prevent escalation while the latter would respond to 'problems requiring immediate attention to prevent or limit the scale or number of serious violations of the Convention'. See e.g. the Annual Report of CERD to the General Assembly, 22 September 1995, A/50/18, §§20-24. See e.g. Van Boven (1998), pp. 165-182.

¹⁴¹ Fourth meeting of Chairpersons of the human rights treaty bodies, 42nd session, A/47/628, §44.

not often used this method.¹⁴² The other treaty bodies have, on occasion, asked for special reports.¹⁴³

This section discusses the right of individual petition and the power of CERD, CAT and CEDAW to order provisional measures, the promptness of CAT in deciding on the use of provisional measures and the availability of information on the use of these measures.¹⁴⁴

3.2 The right of individual complaint and CERD, CAT and CEDAW

CERD consists of eighteen, CAT of ten and CEDAW of twenty-three independent experts. Like the decisions of the HRC, the decisions of the other UN supervisory bodies dealing with individual complaints must be seen in their wider context, including the tasks of these bodies under the reporting procedure.¹⁴⁵ Similar to the HRC they publish Concluding Observations on State reports as well as General Comments on specific issues.¹⁴⁶

CAT's Rapporteur for follow-up to State party reports and gender issues has pointed out that the follow-up procedure has been established to ensure compliance with Article 2 ICAT. Matters for which CAT requested measures in the context of its follow-up procedure should meet three criteria: 'they must be urgent, protective and achievable within one year'.¹⁴⁷ These references, especially to urgency and to the criterion of protective measures, are relevant as well in the context of provisional measures. Also relevant is the response by the Chairperson of CAT to a remark by the representative of China. The Chairperson noted:

¹⁴² See A/50/40, §§36 and 39. For examples see Boerefijn (1999a), pp. 255-283 (on reporting under exceptional circumstances).

¹⁴³ The International Federation for Human Rights (FIDH) notes that the UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (a committee not currently dealing with individual petitions) 'is the quickest at examining situations, which are not dealt with by state party reports'. These 'consist in sending letters to the relevant governments, expressing the concern of the Committee in relation to the information gathered and asking for factual information in response'. The FIDH adds that these examinations are 'carried out outside any well-defined procedure'. In this respect the Committee seems to prefer 'to justify its reaction within the framework of its follow-up to earlier recommendations' although urgency is indeed 'one of the factors in sending letters of concern'. International Federation for Human Rights, Progress report on implementation of FIDH program (2000-2001), treaty monitoring bodies: mechanisms to be supported, report 322/2, December 2002, p. 20.

¹⁴⁴ On 4 April 2008 the UN Working Group on the Optional Protocol adopted by consensus a draft for an Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and sent it for consideration to the Human Rights Council. This draft also includes an Article 5 on interim measures, which refers to the discretion of the supervisory committee to 'transmit to the State Party concerned for its urgent consideration a request that the State Party take such interim measures as may be necessary in exceptional circumstances to avoid possible irreparable damage to the victim or victims of the alleged violations'.

¹⁴⁵ See e.g. Flinterman (2003), pp. 621-624; Bayefsky (2002); Bayefsky (2001); Ingelse (2001); Alston/Crawford (2000); Bayefsky (2002); O' Flaherty (1996).

¹⁴⁶ CERD and CEDAW have regularly issued General Comments. CAT, thus far, has only published a General Comment on Article 3 ICAT (non-refoulement) and one on Article 2 on Implementation of Article 2 by States Parties, see further Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

¹⁴⁷ See CAT Summary Record of the 662nd Meeting, 19 May 2005, CAT/C/SR.662, 2 June 2005, §5 (Ms. Gaer, US, Rapporteur for follow-up to State party reports and gender issues).

“It was standard practice to raise questions about individual cases during the dialogue with States parties, most of which had not been reluctant to reply. However, as a rule, such cases were not mentioned in the conclusions and recommendations”.¹⁴⁸

Article 22 ICAT lays down the right of individual complaint against States that have specifically recognised CAT’s competence in this regard.¹⁴⁹ The same applies to Article 14 ICERD.¹⁵⁰ The individual complaint procedure under the Optional Protocol to the Women’s Convention entered into force on in December 2000.¹⁵¹ CEDAW’s first decision on the merits concerned protection against domestic violence.¹⁵² In this case it also used provisional measures. The proceedings of CERD, CAT and CEDAW do not significantly differ from those of the HRC.¹⁵³

3.3 Power and promptness of CAT and CEDAW to take provisional measures and the possibilities of the new Committee against Disappearances

3.3.1 Introduction

As noted, CERD was the first UN treaty body introducing provisional measures in its Rules of Procedure. Rule 94(3) is phrased as follows:

“In the course of its consideration, the Committee may inform the State party of its views on the desirability, because of urgency, of taking interim measures to avoid possible irreparable damage to the person or persons who claim to be victim(s) of the alleged violation. In doing so, the Committee shall inform the State party concerned that such expression of its views on interim measures does not prejudice either its final opinion on the merits of the communication or its eventual suggestions and recommendation”.

¹⁴⁸ See CAT Summary Record of the 662nd Meeting, 19 May 2005, CAT/C/SR.662, 2 June 2005, §32.

¹⁴⁹ Of the States parties to the ICAT 61 have also recognised the right of individual petition, 17 of them since 2000. Japan, the UK and the US have only recognised the inter-State procedure that has never been used as of yet. See UN statistical survey, updated 23 November 2007 untreaty.un.org (accessed 11 July 2005). About the treaty itself and the process leading up to its conclusion and ratification see Burgers/Danelius (1988) and Boulesbaa (1999). About the individual complaint procedure and case law see Doerfel (2005); Gorlick (1999); pp. 479-495, esp. pp. 484-492; Ingelse (2001); Gorlick (2000), pp. 117-177, esp. pp. 150-164.

¹⁵⁰ Since 2000, the number of States parties to the ICERD that recognised the competence of CERD to receive and consider communications under Article 14 ICERD increased from 31 to 51. See UN statistical survey, 15 August 2007.

¹⁵¹ The right of individual complaint under the OP to the CEDAW has been recognised by 89 States. See UN statistical survey, 8 November 2007.

¹⁵² CEDAW A.T. v. Hungary, 26 January 2005. See also Boerefijn (2005a), pp. 470-480.

¹⁵³ See section 2 of this Chapter on the HRC. See also Chapter XIV on admissibility and jurisdiction. CAT often refers to the ‘complainant’, CEDAW to the ‘author’ and CERD to the ‘petitioner’. Generally about the proceedings see Complaint Procedures, Fact Sheet No. 7/Rev.1 and The United Nations Human Rights Treaty System: An introduction to the core human rights treaties and the treaty bodies, Fact sheet no. 30, June 2005; Hannum (2004); Bayefsky (2002); Barkhuysen/Van Emmerik/Rieter (2008); Amnesty International Handbook to combat racial discrimination (2001); Tanaka/Nagamine (2001); O’Flaherty (1996); Zwaak (1991).

While CERD has never invoked it as of yet, the Rule did serve as a source of inspiration when the HRC was drafting its Rules of Procedure.¹⁵⁴

Rule 108 of CAT's Rules of Procedure stipulates:

- “1. At any time after the receipt of a complaint, the Committee, a working group, or the Rapporteur(s) for new complaints and interim measures may transmit to the State party concerned, for its urgent consideration, a request that it take such interim measures as the Committee considers necessary to avoid irreparable damage to the victim or victims of alleged violations.
2. Where the Committee, the Working Group, or Rapporteur(s) request(s) interim measures under this rule, the request shall not imply a determination of the admissibility or the merits of the complaint. The State party shall be so informed upon transmittal.
3. Where a request for interim measures is made by the Working Group or Rapporteur(s) under the present rule, the Working Group or Rapporteur(s) should inform the Committee members of the nature of the request and the complaint to which the request relates at the next regular session of the Committee.
4. The Secretary-General shall maintain a list of such requests for interim measures.
5. The Rapporteur for new complaints and interim measures shall also monitor compliance with the Committee's requests for interim measures”.

As noted, the OP to the Women's Convention explicitly refers to the power to take provisional measures. Its Article 5 stipulates:

- “1. At any time after the receipt of a communication and before a determination on the merits has been reached, the Committee may transmit to the State Party concerned for its urgent consideration a request that the State Party take such interim measures as may be necessary to avoid possible irreparable damage to the victim or victims of the alleged violation.
2. Where the Committee exercises its discretion under paragraph 1 of the present article, this does not imply a determination on admissibility or on the merits of the communication”.¹⁵⁵

Article 31 International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance¹⁵⁶ provides for an optional individual complaint procedure. Its section 4 stipulates:

¹⁵⁴ See section 2.4 of this Chapter.

¹⁵⁵ Rule 63 Rules of Procedure CEDAW-Committee (A/56/38, Annex 1): “1. At any time after the receipt of a communication and before a determination on the merits has been reached, the Committee may transmit to the State party concerned, for its urgent consideration, a request that it take such interim measures as the Committee considers necessary to avoid irreparable damage to the victim or victims of the alleged violation. 2. A working group or rapporteur may also request the State party concerned to take such interim measures as the working group or rapporteur considers necessary to avoid irreparable damage to the victim or victims of the alleged violation. 3. When a request for interim measures is made by a working group or rapporteur under the present rule, the working group or rapporteur shall forthwith thereafter inform the Committee members of the nature of the request and the communication to which the request relates. 4. Where the Committee, a working group or a rapporteur requests interim measures under this rule, the request shall state that it does not imply a determination of the merits of the communication”. CEDAW's Working Group on Communications under the OP to the CEDAW has recommended deletion of the words ‘or rapporteur’ in this rule, leaving it for the working group to deal with requests for provisional measures, see its Report of its ninth session, 26 February 2007, in: Sessional/Annual Report of Committee CEDAW/C/2007/111/WGCOP/L.1, §8(g).

¹⁵⁶ Adopted 20 December 2006, not yet entered into force (by December 2008: 71 signatories and one ratification (Albania)).

“4. At any time after the receipt of a communication and before a determination on the merits has been reached, the Committee may transmit to the State Party concerned for its urgent consideration a request that the State Party will take such interim measures as may be necessary to avoid possible irreparable damage to the victims of the alleged violation. Where the Committee exercises its discretion, this does not imply a determination on admissibility or on the merits of the communication”.

Yet in urgent cases the Committee may address even States parties that have not recognized the individual complaint procedure under Article 31. The innovative Article 30 introduces the possibility for the Committee to intervene upon a request ‘by relatives of the disappeared person or their legal representatives, their counsel or any person authorized by them, as well as by any other person having a legitimate interest’ that ‘a disappeared person should be sought and found’. In fact when it considers that a range of procedural requirements is met, it ‘shall request the State Party concerned to provide it with information on the situation of the persons sought, within a time limit set by the Committee’.¹⁵⁷

3.3.2 Promptness and delegation

In 2002 CAT introduced its new Rules of Procedure, creating the Special Rapporteur on New Complaints and Interim Measures to enhance consistency and speed. Following a proposal by Committee member Mavrommatis Rule 108 refers to ‘Rapporteur(s)’ rather than to ‘Rapporteur’. Mavrommatis had pointed out that ‘in view of the urgency of requests for interim measures the Committee should envisage having an alternate to such a rapporteur, who would be able to deal immediately with a case in the absence of the Rapporteur for New Complaints’.¹⁵⁸

Previously the Secretariat transmitted each new communication to the Chairman, ‘who consulted the other members of the Committee about it’.¹⁵⁹

“In appointing the rapporteur for a given communication, language considerations were taken into account, since the rapporteur often had to examine the dossier in depth. The procedure was therefore pragmatic rather than systematic, but was perhaps less effective than that of the Human Rights Committee”.¹⁶⁰

Most information about the promptness of CAT’s provisional measures is available over the period 1993-2003 and is unlikely to reflect the increased promptness suggested by the 2002 decision to assign one member of CAT with the task to deal with provisional measures. In the period under review it generally took the Committee a few weeks to decide on provisional measures. There are some instances in which it was able to take them on the day on which it received the petition.¹⁶¹ There are also cases in which it took them half a year after the petitioner requested

¹⁵⁷ On the procedural requirements see Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction and admissibility).

¹⁵⁸ CAT Summary Records 28th session, 6 May 2002, CAT/C/SR.513, 15 May 2002, §92.

¹⁵⁹ Summary Records 27th session, 13 November 2001, CAT/C/SR.487, 10 March 2003, §20 (Burns, Canada).

¹⁶⁰ Ibidem.

¹⁶¹ See CAT Mutombo v. Switzerland, 27 April 1994 (petition and provisional measure 18 November 1993) and P.S.S. v. Canada, 13 November 1998 (petition and provisional measure 5 May 1997).

them.¹⁶² In one case it took provisional measures within a day, but the petitioner was deported on that same day. The State argued that it had received the Note Verbale too late.¹⁶³

Initially CAT used provisional measures almost automatically in any Article 3 case. Later a Special Rapporteur was introduced. As provisional measures are considered to be ‘fairly intrusive’ the Rapporteur would ask the secretariat to make a quick assessment on the substance of the complaint and whether there was prima facie evidence of risk. This resulted in the use of provisional measures in a lower percentage of cases.¹⁶⁴

In 2005 the representative of Sweden pointed out that when CAT requested provisional measures ‘it would be helpful if the request was forwarded at a reasonable time, in other words before 6 p.m. on a Friday evening’.¹⁶⁵ The Rapporteur on interim measures pointed out that ‘while he always tried to observe the 24 hour rule, it was sometimes necessary to ask the State party for further information’.¹⁶⁶ This seems to indicate that, since the institution of a Rapporteur, an attempt is made to take provisional measures within a day of receipt of a request to that end.

The Rules of Procedure by the CEDAW foresee delegation of the authority to take provisional measures to a working group or rapporteur, but the Working Group on Communications has suggested the deletion of the reference to ‘or rapporteur’.¹⁶⁷ On 20 October 2003 the used provisional measures for the first time.¹⁶⁸

¹⁶² See e.g. X, Y and Z v. Sweden, 6 May 1998 (provisional measures on behalf of Z on 22 November 1996; initial submission 27 June 1996).

¹⁶³ CAT J.A.G.V. v. Sweden, 11 November 2003 (provisional measure and expulsion of 23 July 2002); see also Z.T. v. Australia, 19 November 2003 in which the petition dated from 4 January 2000 and the provisional measure was sent on 26 January 2000, on which day the State expelled the petitioner.

¹⁶⁴ About 60 to 70 % according to an estimate made at the secretariat in Geneva in October 2003. Yet see Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk), section 3.2.4 under the heading ‘assessment of risk by CAT’.

¹⁶⁵ See Summary Record of the 662nd Meeting, 19 May 2005, CAT/C/SR.662, 2 June 2005, §24 (Ms. Sundberg, representative Sweden).

¹⁶⁶ See Summary Record of the 662nd Meeting, 19 May 2005, CAT/C/SR.662, 2 June 2005, §36 (Mr. Mavrommatis, Rapporteur on interim measures). See also Chapter XV on immediacy and risk.

¹⁶⁷ See Rule 63. Yet its Working Group on Communications under the Optional Protocol has suggested the deletion of the words ‘or rapporteur’, see its Report of its ninth session, 26 February 2007, in: Sessional/Annual Report of Committee CEDAW/C/2007/111/WGCOP/L.1, §8(g).

¹⁶⁸ See CEDAW A.T. v. Hungary, 26 January 2005 (the petitioner sent a request on 10 October; 2003; 10 days later provisional measures were used; a corrigendum was sent on 17 November 2003 and a follow-up on 13 July 2004). Based on information provided by Prof. Flinterman, member of the Working Group, Maastricht 10 June 2005, Beate Schöpp-Schilling, Chairperson of the Working Group on individual petitions, used these provisional measures upon consultation with other members of the Working Group. At the time CEDAW was the only UN treaty body based in New York rather than Geneva. When the Optional Protocol introducing the right of individual complaint entered into force, members of its staff visited Geneva for two weeks to inform themselves about the practices of the other treaty bodies. Obviously this included the practices with regard to provisional measures. There were weekly contacts (e-mail and phone) for purposes of coordination. The person with overall responsibility for the individual petition procedures in Geneva was previously active for CEDAW in New York, which may also be helpful for the integration of working methods. In 2008 the Committee transferred to Geneva.

3.3.3 Proprio motu

The text of the CAT's Rule on provisional measures does not exclude their proprio motu use and as most complaints involve Article 3 (non-refoulement) it would be very rigid, and disagree with the purpose of the Rule, to insist on an explicit invocation by the petitioner in such cases where the petitioner already mentions a date of expulsion and argues before CAT that such expulsion would violate the principle of non-refoulement.¹⁶⁹ The text of the OP to the Women's Convention does not preclude proprio motu use of provisional measures either and neither does the text of CEDAW's Rules of Procedure.

3.3.4 Withdrawing provisional measures

As noted, generally human rights adjudicators take provisional measures for a limited period and, based on the facts, they may decide to extend them or not to renew them at all after this period has lapsed. Moreover, in practice the HRC, the Inter-American Commission and Court and the ECtHR have been known to lift provisional measures upon receipt of pertinent information on changed circumstances or lack of urgency or risk.¹⁷⁰ Nevertheless, since 2002 the CAT's Rule on provisional measures (Rule 108) explicitly invites the State to protest against the use of provisional measures:

“6.The State party may inform the Committee that the reasons for the interim measures have lapsed or present arguments why the request for interim measures should be lifted.
7.The Rapporteur, the Committee or the Working Group may withdraw the request for interim measures”.¹⁷¹

A reason for the inclusion of this rule may be the letters received by a few states threatening withdrawal from the individual complaint system. These States had done so at a strategic moment in time, just after the withdrawals by Jamaica and Trinidad and Tobago from the OP to the ICCPR. This may have been why CAT formally introduced this ‘mini procedure’ in which the State is informed of the possibility to request a withdrawal of the provisional measures.

In 2003 some members of the secretariat expressed the fear that this new rule would be used by States as a tool for taking provisional measures less seriously.¹⁷² Indeed, discomfort about the ¹⁶⁹ CAT has also declared petitions admissible in which the petitioner, not assisted by counsel, does not specifically invoke Article 3 ICAT but indicates a fear of torture upon expulsion. In such cases it has also used provisional measures. See e.g. CAT V.L. v. Switzerland, 20 November 2006 (provisional measures 14 January 2005).

¹⁷⁰ See e.g. Chapter XV on immediacy and risk.

¹⁷¹ Former Rules 108(9) and 110(3) of CAT's Rules of Procedure did not contain such invitation. Rule 108(9) was as follows: “In the course of the consideration of the question of the admissibility of a communication, the Committee, or a working group or a special rapporteur designated under rule 106, paragraph 3, may request the States parties to take steps to avoid possible irreparable damage to the person or persons who claim to be victim(s) of the alleged violation. Such a request addressed to the State party does not imply that any decision has been reached on the question of the admissibility of the communication”. Former Rule 110(3) stipulated: “In the course of its considerations, the Committee may inform the State party of its views on the desirability, because of urgency, of taking interim measures to avoid possible irreparable damage to the person or persons who claim to be victim(s) of the alleged violation. In doing so, the Committee shall inform the State party concerned that such expression of its views on interim measures does not prejudice its final views on the merits of the communication”. See Rules of Procedure 1984 as amended during the 13th session, A/50/44 Annex 4.

new rule also appears from the statements by members of the Committee itself. During the drafting process of the mandate of the Rapporteur on New Complaints and Interim Measures Committee member Mariño (Spain) had argued that it would ‘be more prudent to authorise the Rapporteur to act in conjunction with the plenary or the Bureau or, at the very least, in consultation with the Chairman’ when deciding to withdraw provisional measures. ‘Given that a person’s life could be at stake’ the Rapporteur should not be empowered to act alone on this matter. While he did not wish to ‘cast doubts on the sound judgment of the Rapporteur’, he did wish to ‘make sure that appropriate safeguards were in place’.¹⁷³ González Poblete (Chile) responded that ‘the most important task was to establish uniform criteria and uniform jurisprudence’. To achieve this ‘the Rapporteur would report to the Committee on his or her decisions and Committee would indicate what corrective action needed to be taken in the future, if required’.¹⁷⁴ The full Committee did not adopt the suggestion by Mariño about the need for consultation before provisional measures would be withdrawn.

The reference in each ‘request’ for provisional measures by the Special Rapporteur to the fact that this ‘request could be reviewed in the light of observations provided by the State party on the admissibility or on the merits’ would indeed appear to trigger more requests for withdrawal. Yet the new Special Rapporteur certainly did not automatically heed to States’ requests for such withdrawals. In April 2002 the Special Rapporteur denied a request by Germany to withdraw the Committee’s provisional measures.¹⁷⁵ Germany had taken this course of action while it was the first time provisional measures had ever been requested against it.

Another example of CAT not immediately heeding to a State’s request for a withdrawal of provisional measures is one taken in December 2003 in which a reference to the possibility of withdrawal had been added: “The Rapporteur indicated that this request could be reviewed in the light of new arguments presented by the State party”. CAT also noted that the State party acceded to this request.¹⁷⁶ In February 2004 ‘the State party challenged the admissibility of the communication and requested the Committee to withdraw its request for interim measures, pursuant to Rule 108, paragraph 7, of the Committee’s rules of procedure’. The View notes that the petitioner objected to the State party’s motion for withdrawal of the provisional measures, but it does not specify what was the Committee’s response. It only notes that the Secretariat informed the State party that admissibility and merits would be examined separately.¹⁷⁷ Subsequently it found the ¹⁷² Yet it was also suggested that the Committee would not mention any withdrawals in its Views because then it would look like CAT made a mistake if it had to withdraw and it could discourage petitioners. In fact it appears that the Committee has referred to withdrawals and State’s requests for withdrawals and to the extent that it has not, such lack of transparency would not enhance the Committee’s credibility.

¹⁷³ CAT Summary Records, 28th session, 16 May 2002, CAT/C/SR.527, 29 May 2002, §25.

¹⁷⁴ CAT Summary Records, 28th session, 16 May 2002, CAT/C/SR.527, 29 May 2002, §26.

¹⁷⁵ In November 2002 the State party had submitted its observations on the admissibility of the complaint ‘together with a motion asking the Committee to withdraw its request for interim measures, pursuant to Rule 108, paragraph 7, of the Committee’s rules of procedure’. Counsel asked the Committee to maintain its provisional measures ‘until a final decision on the complaint has been taken’. ‘On 4 April 2002, the Committee, through its Rapporteur on new communications and interim measures, decided not to withdraw its request for interim measures’. See §1.3. Eventually in this case it did not find a violation of Article 3 ICAT. The petitioner had ‘failed to establish a foreseeable, real and personal risk of being tortured if he were to be returned to Turkey’. CAT did welcome the ‘State party’s readiness to monitor the complainant’s situation following his return to Turkey’ and requested it to ‘keep the Committee informed about said situation’. CAT M.A.K. v. Germany, 12 May 2004, §13.9.

¹⁷⁶ CAT R.T. v. Switzerland, 24 November 2005 (inadm.), §1.2.

¹⁷⁷ Id., §1.3.

claim manifestly unfounded and declared the case inadmissible. In light of cases such as these it would seem that informing States of the possibility to request withdrawal of provisional measures is simply a gesture to placate them.

3.4 Decisions of CAT and CEDAW to take provisional measures: transparency or the lack thereof?

Like the HRC, CEDAW and CAT do not publish their provisional measures separately.¹⁷⁸ The request is usually included in the last paragraph of a Note Verbale to the State party.

Unless one of the parties decides to make public the information on the use of provisional measures pending the case information will only be available upon publication of the decision on the merits.¹⁷⁹ References to the use of provisional measures in their decisions usually are not very

¹⁷⁸ Rule 74 Rules of Procedure CEDAW (Confidentiality of communications) provides:

“1. Communications submitted under the Optional Protocol shall be examined by the Committee, working group or rapporteur in closed meetings. 2. All working documents prepared by the Secretariat for the Committee, working group or rapporteur, including summaries of communications prepared prior to registration and the list of summaries of communications, shall be confidential unless the Committee decides otherwise. 3. The Committee, working group or rapporteur shall not make public any communication, submissions or information relating to a communication prior to the date on which its views are issued. 4. The author or authors of a communication or the individuals who are alleged to be the victim or victims of a violation of the rights set forth in the Convention may request that the names and identifying details of the alleged victim or victims (or any of them) not be published. 5. If the Committee, working group or rapporteur so decides, the name or names and identifying details of the author or authors of a communication or the individuals who are alleged to be the victim or victims of a violation of rights set forth in the Convention shall not be made public by the Committee, the author or the State party concerned. 6. The Committee, working group or rapporteur may request the author of a communication or the State party concerned to keep confidential the whole or part of any submission or information relating to the proceedings. 7. Subject to paragraphs 5 and 6 of the present rule, nothing in this rule shall affect the right of the author or authors or the State party concerned to make public any submission or information bearing on the proceedings. 8. Subject to paragraphs 5 and 6 of the present rule, the Committee’s decisions on admissibility, merits and discontinuance shall be made public. 9. The Secretariat shall be responsible for the distribution of the Committee’s final decisions to the author or authors and the State party concerned. 10. The Committee shall include in its annual report under article 21 of the Convention a summary of the communications examined and, where appropriate, a summary of the explanations and statements of the States parties concerned, and of its own suggestions and recommendations. 11. Unless the Committee decides otherwise, information furnished by the parties in follow-up to the Committee’s views and recommendations under paragraphs 4 and 5 of article 7 of the Optional Protocol shall not be confidential. Unless the Committee decides otherwise, decisions of the Committee with regard to follow-up activities shall not be confidential”. The Rules of Procedure of CAT do not specifically refer to confidentiality pending the individual complaint proceedings.

¹⁷⁹ For an example of information about provisional measures by CAT made available pending the proceedings, see CAT Suleymane Guengueng et al. v. Senegal (involving former Chadian dictator Habré), Press release Human Rights Watch, 23 April 2001, ‘United Nations asks Senegal to hold Ex-Chad Dictator’, <www.hrw.org/justice/habre> (accessed 22 June 2005); confirmed formally in Note Verbale CAT to HRW of 27 April 2001, <<http://www.hrw.org/french/themes/habre-legal.htm>> (accessed 22 June 2005) About this case see Chapter XII (Other cases).

extensive. In the secondary literature reference is made to provisional measures only in passing.¹⁸⁰ CEDAW published its decision on the merits in A.T. v. Hungary in January 2005. It did devote a separate section to the provisional measures it had taken in accordance with Article 5(1) of the Optional Protocol.¹⁸¹ In addition, different from the HRC, CAT does seem to refer more consistently to situations in which it refused to take provisional measures.

In May 2001 the CAT had a discussion about its use of provisional measures. This discussion may have been triggered by critical comments of certain States. Committee member Camara (Senegal), who presented a background paper, pointed out that the Rules of Procedure ‘did not specify the kind of interim measures to be taken in order to prevent irreparable damage resulting from a violation of the Convention’.

“He had therefore reviewed the Committee’s practice, which was often based on individual decisions by the rapporteurs for the communications concerned, in an attempt to identify a general rule”.¹⁸²

The background paper itself is not available, but apparently it listed the circumstances in which Rapporteurs in individual cases had recommended the use of provisional measures, as well as the conditions in which they did not.¹⁸³ Camara noted that when a State had accepted the right of individual petition, ‘it accepted that an external body might take decisions it would not like’.¹⁸⁴

“There was no point in having a Convention if the Committee was always supposed to condone the action of States. An effort should be made to improve communications with States, since they appeared willing to accept interim measures whenever an explanation of the reasons for them was provided”.¹⁸⁵

Initially CAT planned to draft a General Comment ‘on interim measures requested by the Committee under article 22 of the Convention’.¹⁸⁶ Apparently it later decided against drafting such a Comment.¹⁸⁷ In November 2001 the Committee had a meeting with the Special Rapporteur

¹⁸⁰ O’Flaherty (1996), pp. 162-163 briefly mentions the possibility of provisional measures. See more specifically Barkhuysen/Van Emmerik/Rieter (2008), pp. 106-112 and Ingelse (2001), p. 179, p. 180, p. 188. See also the references in Chapter XV on assessment of risk. The author visited the Geneva Secretariat on 12-22 October 1998; 29 March-5 April 2003 and 24-30 August 2003. She would like to thank various staff members dealing predominantly with the HRC, but also with CAT, including Marcus Schmidt, Paul Oertly, Antonie Cardon, Carla Edelenbos and Carmen Rueda Castañón.

¹⁸¹ CEDAW A.T. v. Hungary, 26 January 2005, §§4.1-4.8. As to other requests by petitioners for provisional measures, see the information that the five member Working Group on Communications under the Optional Protocol turned down a request for provisional measures (unspecified), see its Report of its ninth session, 26 February 2007, in: Sessional/Annual Report of Committee CEDAW/C/2007/111/WGCOP/L.1, §4.

¹⁸² CAT Summary Record, 26th session, 15 May 2001, CAT/C/SR.479/Add.1, 25 May 2001, §5.

¹⁸³ See further Chapter XV on assessment of risk.

¹⁸⁴ CAT Summary Record, 26th session, 15 May 2001, CAT/C/SR.479/Add.1, 25 May 2001, §5.

¹⁸⁵ Summary Record, 26th session, 15 May 2001, CAT/C/SR.479/Add.1, 25 May 2001, §27. See further Chapter XVII (Official responses).

¹⁸⁶ The Summary Records refer to document CAT/C/XXVI/Misc.11, which is not publicly available.

¹⁸⁷ Committee member Gaer (US) criticised the background paper. She ‘suggested that it was unnecessary to identify countries or cases by name when citing the Committee’s jurisprudence’. She also questioned the references to the General Comments of another supervisory body and pointed out that the text ‘should be carefully revised to ensure that it was gender-neutral’.

for New Communications of the HRC to hear about that Committee's practice with regard to provisional measures. HRC Special Rapporteur Scheinin discussed the authority of the HRC, the range of cases in which it used provisional measures and other related issues. CAT member El Masry (Egypt) asked Scheinin whether the same Rapporteur was responsible for registering a petition and for the procedure with regard to provisional measures and whether 'he received guidelines' from the HRC. Scheinin confirmed that the same Rapporteur dealt with both issues, about which there were no written guidelines.

"[T]he rapporteurs applied the criteria set out in the Optional Protocol and the Committee's jurisprudence, which was often very extensive, although in certain cases the rapporteur had to innovate".¹⁸⁸

Scheinin pointed out that having a Special Rapporteur to take such measures 'had the dual advantage of ensuring consistency' and 'of proceeding rapidly in urgent cases'.

"Another practical advantage of the institution of Special Rapporteur for New Communications was that there was no need to justify the requests for interim measures of protection. The Special Rapporteur had full latitude in making such requests and, where necessary, withdrawing them".¹⁸⁹

It is not clear why the institution of a Special Rapporteur diminishes the need to justify provisional measures. Given the reference to 'full latitude' the reason for wishing not to justify provisional measures may lie in the need for ultimate flexibility. It is also possible that in this context the term 'justify' specifically relates to 'justify oneself' or 'answer to' the State, rather than to 'motivate', 'provide reasoning' or 'substantiate'. After all, motivation or substantiation are requirements inherent to authoritative adjudication, while international adjudicators, being independent, do not have to 'answer to' a State. Some form of substantiation of their provisional measures should be possible without losing too much flexibility. Nevertheless, Burns, the Chairman of CAT, and Mavrommatis, who subsequently became its Special Rapporteur on New Complaints and Interim Measures, seemed to agree with Scheinin. Burns pointed out that the CAT 'could only endorse the reasons given – consistency and speed – to explain the usefulness of having a special rapporteur' and that 'he himself never gave explanations when addressing requests for interim measures to States parties'.¹⁹⁰ According to Mavrommatis:

"[I]t would be desirable to avoid making such requests too systematically to States parties because some of them would be likely, especially for the sake of shortening the proceedings, to denounce the Optional Protocol, as had happened in the past. Ways had to be found to reconcile that imperative with the need to avoid having to justify the request for interim measures".¹⁹¹

Rather than substantiating its provisional measures in order to enhance their authority and persuasiveness, Mavrommatis' advice would be to limit the number of provisional measures. When he refers to 'the need to avoid having to justify the requests for interim measures' he must mean

Summary Records, 26th session, 15 May 2001, CAT/C/SR.479/Add.1, 25 May 2000, §8 (see also §26).

¹⁸⁸ Summary Record, 27th session, 30 November 2001, CAT/C/SR.487, 10 March 2003, §§21-22.

¹⁸⁹ Id., §4.

¹⁹⁰ Id., §7.

¹⁹¹ Id., §8.

something else than the conviction that the adjudicator does not have to ‘answer to’ the State. It may be that he simply fears additional resources would be necessary if they were to do so.¹⁹²

A few years later Mavrommatis noted, as the Special Rapporteur for New Communications and Interim Measures, that ‘(a)lthough some States had requested the Committee to establish guidelines on criteria for requesting interim measures, the Committee considered that guidelines could be restrictive’. Instead he emphasized that CAT did not take provisional measures automatically in non-refoulement cases.¹⁹³

4 THE INTER-AMERICAN HUMAN RIGHTS SYSTEM

4.1 Introduction

The situation in which precautionary and provisional measures have been used in the Americas most often is for the protection of witnesses, human rights defenders and others against threats. Other measures related to halting the execution of a death sentence, locating and protecting disappeared persons, halting a deportation and protecting the health and dignity of detainees. The precautionary and provisional measures of the Inter-American Commission and Court show the seriousness of the situation in which these adjudicators must operate, in particular in countries such as Colombia and Guatemala.

In the Inter-American system precautionary and provisional measures have been used as well to protect indigenous culture, judicial independence or even freedom of speech. There have also been cases involving arbitrary detention, mass expulsion and the psychological well-being of minors whose biological parents had disappeared. Often the provisional and precautionary measures, particularly those involving protection against threats, aim at protecting a large number of beneficiaries and they are sometimes maintained over a long period of time. In most cases the President of the Court first used urgent measures, which were later ratified by the full Court.

This section explains the obligations of members of the OAS under the American Convention on Human Rights and the American Declaration on the Rights and Duties of Man. It also describes the right of individual complaint and the different roles of the Commission and Court in the Inter-American system, the power of the Commission and Court to order provisional measures and their promptness in doing so and, finally, the transparency of the information they make available on the use of provisional measures.

¹⁹² See further section 8.3 of this Chapter. Scheinin pointed out that the withdrawal by some Caribbean States from the OP to the ICCPR was not due to the Committee’s practice with regard to provisional measures, but had arisen ‘from a complex situation in which the States involved had also been subject to the jurisdiction of the Privy Council in London’, Summary Record, 27th session, 30 November 2001, CAT/C/SR.487, 10 March 2003, §13. It seems that certain critical States have simply exploited CAT’s fear for similar withdrawals from the individual petition system under the ICAT, a system not facing this complex situation. See further Chapter XVII on the official responses of Addressee States.

¹⁹³ “If there was no prima facie case for the threat of torture, the complaint was refused. Interim measures would be refused if the Committee considered that persons were attempting to use the procedure to prolong their stay in a certain country. Each case was considered very carefully, and as much information as possible was requested from all parties. A new procedure had been introduced whereby, if there was no prima facie case, the State party concerned was informed that the case might be reviewed at a later date pending receipt of further information”. Summary Records, 34th session, 19 May 2005, CAT/C/SR.662, 2 June 2005, §4 (Mavrommatis). See further Chapter XIII on reparations and XV on immediacy and risk.

4.2 Right of individual complaint and the Inter-American Commission and Court

4.2.1 Introduction

Of the 35 countries of the Americas, 34 countries are active members of the Organisation of American States (OAS).¹⁹⁴ The Inter-American Human Rights system has two supervisory organs, the Commission and the Court. The OAS created the Commission in 1959, long before the Court came into existence. The Court was introduced in 1969 by the American Convention on Human Rights (ACHR). In 1969 the General Assembly agreed on the text of the ACHR.¹⁹⁵ At present 21 of the 24 State Parties have recognised the contentious jurisdiction of the Court.¹⁹⁶ This includes important countries such as Brazil and Mexico (both federal States), Colombia, Peru, Argentina and Chile and non-Latin American countries such as Suriname and Haiti.

Different from the complaint system under the ICCPR and the ECHR the petitioner does not need to be the actual victim. Article 44 of the American Convention provides:

“Any person or group of persons, or any nongovernmental entity legally recognised in one or more member states of the Organization, may lodge petitions with the Commission containing denunciations or complaints of violation of this Convention by a State Party”.

Before the entry into force of the ACHR, in 1978, the member States of the OAS already had human rights obligations under the OAS Charter and the American Declaration on the Rights and Duties of Man. Equally, those OAS members that have not ratified the Convention, or have ratified it without recognising the jurisdiction of the Court to deal with individual complaints, still have obligations under the American Declaration.

At present, ten OAS members have not ratified the American Convention: six Caribbean Islands, Guyana, Belize, The United States and Canada. This list of non-members now includes Trinidad and Tobago as well. Trinidad used to be a State party to the ACHR but it denounced the Convention.¹⁹⁷

4.2.2 Inter-American Commission

As noted, the establishment of the Commission pre-dates the entry into force of the ACHR. It is an organ of the OAS under the OAS Charter (Article 53). The Commission is composed of seven members elected in their individual capacity by the General Assembly of the OAS. The General Assembly is the supreme organ of the OAS that, among others, has the power to decide the gen-

¹⁹⁴ The participation of the government of the 35th country, Cuba, has been suspended since 1962: Resolution VI in: “Eighth Meeting of Consultation of Ministers of Foreign Affairs, serving as Organ of Consultation in application of the Inter-American Treaty for Reciprocal Assistance, Punta del Este, Uruguay, January 22-31, 1962, Meeting Documents,” Organization of American States, OEA/Ser.F/II.8, doc. 68, pp. 17-19. According to the Commission the State itself is still a party to OAS Charter and, thus, has obligations under the American Declaration. See, e.g., its Report on Cuba, Chapter IV, Annual Report 2001. See in general about the OAS and human rights: Gómez (1998), pp. 173-197. See also Taillant/Picolotti (1998), pp. 117-134.

¹⁹⁵ It entered into force on 18 July 1978.

¹⁹⁶ As of 24 December 2007. On 26 May 1998 (effective a year later), Trinidad and Tobago denounced the ACHR. Before that time there were 22 States that had recognized the competence of the Court and 26 State parties. Dominica, Grenada and Jamaica have ratified the ACHR, but not the competence of the Court.

¹⁹⁷ Denunciation of 26 May 1998, which became effective on 26 May 1999. The Court may still deal with cases initiated before this.

eral action and policy of the OAS and determine the structure and function of its organs (Article 54a OAS Charter). Article 106 of the OAS Charter provides that the principal function of the Inter-American Commission ‘shall be to promote the observance and protection of human rights and to serve as a consultative organ of the Organization in these matters’. This article also announces the creation of an Inter-American Convention on human rights that shall determine ‘the structure, competence, and procedure of this Commission, as well as those of other organs responsible for these matters’.¹⁹⁸

Roughly, the monitoring function of the Commission can be divided in a reporting task, an adjudicatory task and the task to represent the petitioners in the cases it decides to send to the Court. As part of its reporting task, its delegations visit countries. Afterwards, the Commission prepares country reports. This is especially important in dealing with gross and systematic violations.¹⁹⁹ Furthermore, the Commission adjudicates individual complaints. It may do so based either on the Declaration or on the ACHR. According to Article 20 of the Statute of the Inter-American Commission of Human Rights, approved by the General Assembly of the OAS in October 1979, the Commission monitors compliance with the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man for those States that have not yet ratified the ACHR.²⁰⁰ The Declaration already dates from 1948. The Ninth International Conference of American States, the same Conference that created the OAS, approved it several months before the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

The Inter-American Commission’s competence to take action and examine individual complaints with respect to member States of the OAS that are not party to the ACHR is based on the OAS Charter and on the practice the Commission has established. The General Assembly’s adoption of the Statute of the Commission has confirmed this practice.²⁰¹

In addition the ACHR has assigned the Commission with a clear function monitoring the rights contained in it. Under this Convention the Commission may examine cases brought under Article 44 ACHR and may subsequently decide to bring a case before the Court, if the State involved has recognised the competence of the Court. States parties to the Convention that have not

¹⁹⁸ Charter of the Organisation of the American States, as amended by the “Protocol of Buenos Aires”, signed on February 27, 1967, at the Third Special Inter-American Conference; by the “Protocol of Cartagena de Indias”, approved on December 5, 1985, at the Fourteenth Special Session of the General Assembly; by the “Protocol of Washington”, approved on December 14, 1992, at the Sixteenth Special Session of the General Assembly; and by the “Protocol of Managua”, adopted on June 10, 1993, at the Nineteenth Special Session of the General Assembly.

¹⁹⁹ See generally Medina Quiroga (1988).

²⁰⁰ This Article stipulates that the Commission has the following specific powers in relation to those member States of the OAS not parties to the ACHR: “a. to pay particular attention to the observance of the human rights referred to in Articles I, II, III, IV, XVIII, XXV and XXVI of the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man; b. to examine communications submitted to it and any other available communication, to address the government of any member state not a Party to the Convention for information deemed pertinent by this Commission, and to make recommendations to it, when it finds this appropriate, in order to bring about more effective observance of fundamental human rights; and, c. to verify, as a prior condition to the exercise of the powers granted under subparagraph b. above, whether the domestic legal procedures and remedies of each member state not a Party to the Convention have been duly applied and exhausted”.

²⁰¹ See the Inter-American Commission’s Annual Reports. See generally Buergenthal (1982), pp. 231-245 and Buergenthal (1975), pp. 828-836. About a similar argument with regard to the UN Charter and the Universal Declaration see e.g. Sohn (1982), pp. 1-64. See further Chapter XVI (Legal Status).

recognised the competence of the Court still have obligations under the Convention, as monitored by the Commission.

The Commission takes admissibility decisions and decisions on the merits. In urgent cases, it may take a decision to request a State to take precautionary measures or (in cases where the State involved has recognised the competence of the Court) request the Court to order provisional measures.

Article 51 ACHR stipulates that if the matter discussed in the Commission's report, setting forth the facts and stating its conclusions (under Article 50 ACHR), has not been settled or submitted to the Court, the Commission makes pertinent recommendations and prescribes a period within which the State is to take remedial measures.²⁰² Upon expiry of such period the Commission shall decide (by an absolute majority of its members) whether the State has taken adequate measures and whether to publish its report.

Initially the Commission deals with all individual complaints.²⁰³ The Commission or a State Party may bring a case before the Court, but the petitioner may not. In the past the Commission brought cases before the Court only sparingly, but during the last decade the number has increased. With its new Rules (2001/2003) a significant change is introduced in how the Commission will deal with cases against States that have recognised the contentious jurisdiction of the Inter-American Court. While for a long period most cases were not sent to the Court, by now most of them are.²⁰⁴ Article 43 of the Rules, dealing with the report on the merits and Article 44, dealing with referral of the case to the Court, establish that the petitioner has one month to present a position as to whether the case should be submitted to the Court. Article 44 specifically lays down that the Commission 'shall' refer the case to the Court when it considers that the State has not complied with the recommendations of its report on the merits.²⁰⁵ This leads exception only

²⁰² Following the examination of the evidence, the Commission prepares a report stating the facts and conclusions regarding the case (Article 46 (2)). It then transmits the report with its recommendations (Article 47 (1)). When the matter has not been settled within three months from the date of the transmittal of the report to the state, the Commission may submit it to the Court or, in the alternative, the Commission may set forth its opinion and conclusions, including its pertinent recommendations. It then prescribes a period within which the government in question must take the measures that are incumbent upon it to remedy the situation examined (Article 47). Upon expiry of the prescribed period the Commission decides by the vote of an absolute majority of its members whether the State has taken suitable measures and whether to publish its report (Article 48).

²⁰³ Article 61 ACHR, See §2.2.

²⁰⁴ About the case law of the Commission see the Commission's website (<www.cidh.org>), with the Annual Reports, the cases published by the Commission (since 1974), press releases (since 1993), information on Rapporteurships, etc. and see the Inter-American Human Rights Digest, Repertorio de Jurisprudencia by Grossman/Goldman/Martin/Rodríguez-Pinzón (only in Spanish): <<http://www.wcl.american.edu/humright/hracademy/iadigest.cfm>> and database for Inter-American Commission reports (session reports 1960-1969), Annual Reports (1970-1998) and Special Reports (1962-2001) at: <<http://www.wcl.american.edu/pub/humright/digest/Inter-American/index.html>>. See further Wilson (2001), Index of individual case reports of the Inter-American Commission (1994-1999), pp. 353-647.

²⁰⁵ The Court and several commentators had criticised the fact that the Commission used to send only some cases to the Court. Some members of the Commission's staff, however, considered that sending all cases to the Court would delude from the standing of the Commission. Interview with Christina Cerna, Washington D.C., 18 October 2001. See in general about the procedure before the Commission and/or the Court: Medina Quiroga/Nash Rojas (2007); Pasqualucci (2003); Gomez (2001), pp. 111-126; Faúndez Ledesma (1999); Buergenthal/Cassel (1998), pp. 539-571; Krsticevic (1998), pp. 413-448; Farer (1998), pp. 515-536; Gomez (1998a), pp. 213-240; Harris/Livingstone (1998); Cançado Trindade (1998a), pp. 133-149 and (1998b), pp. 1-27

when an absolute majority of the members of the Commission decides not to refer the case. As only the State and the Commission can act before the Court, the Commission's role changes from that of an 'adjudicator' to that of a 'litigator'. It turns into the representative of the petitioner. In an attempt to remedy the (appearance of) conflict in this regard it has established the practice, during the Court hearings, to include the petitioner in its team and to take on the more generally formulated role to act to defend the Inter-American system. The Commission and the petitioner may in fact have different positions and bring different arguments.

To sum up, the Commission can take on different roles to promote the observance and protection of human rights (Article 111 OAS Charter): a conciliatory, an informal advisory and an adjudicatory role.²⁰⁶ In addition it has the completely different task of representing the petitioners before the Court in cases it had previously adjudicated itself.

4.2.3 The Inter-American Court

The Inter-American Court has distinguished itself in its proactive use of provisional measures to prevent irreparable harm to persons.²⁰⁷ It consists of seven judges 'elected in an individual capacity from among jurists of the highest moral authority and of recognised competence in the field of human rights, who possess the qualifications required for the exercise of the highest judicial functions in conformity with the law of the state of which they are nationals or of the State that proposes them as candidates'.²⁰⁸ The OAS General Assembly elects them from a panel of candidates proposed by the States Parties to the Convention.²⁰⁹

The Court applies and interprets the ACHR. To do this, it has both an adjudicatory jurisdiction and the competence to issue Advisory Opinions, for instance on the interpretation of certain articles.²¹⁰ As part of its adjudicatory role it takes decisions on provisional measures, preliminary objections, merits and reparations.²¹¹ Since the political organs of the OAS do not play a role in follow-up it also tries, together with the Commission, to supervise and monitor the compliance of States with its Judgments and provisional measures. The flexibility of the Commission and Court in this respect may help achieve effective protection of persons against human rights violations.²¹²

The Court can only examine those individual complaints that the Commission has previously examined.²¹³ In other words, the Commission deals with all individual complaints first.

and (1998c), pp. 573-604; Dulitzky (1998), pp. 363-390; Nikken (1996), pp. 25-44; Pinto (1998), pp. 169-184; Vivanco (1998), pp. 51-72; Davidson (1997); Fix-Zamudio (1996), pp. 19-32; Nieto Ravia (1996), pp. 397-418; Nieto Navia (1994), pp. 369-418 and Fix-Zamudio (1989), pp. 8-64.

²⁰⁶ The informal advisory role is not related to the Inter-American Court's function, later introduced in the ACHR, to issue Advisory Opinions upon request.

²⁰⁷ It has equally distinguished itself on two interrelated levels, firstly through its analysis of human rights obligations both in its Advisory Opinions and in contentious cases. Worth mentioning are the 1988 landmark cases of Velásquez Rodríguez, Judgment of 29 July 1988 and Godínez Cruz, Judgment of 20 January 1989, both against Honduras. The Court established State responsibility for disappearances, which were violations of the right to personal freedom, personal integrity as well as the right to life. Ever since it has emphasised the obligation to prevent, to investigate and punish human rights violations. Secondly it has distinguished itself in its Judgments on remedies and reparations, see also Chapter XIII (Protection).

²⁰⁸ Article 52 ACHR. See also, e.g. Faúndez Ledesma (1998), pp. 185-210; Picado (1996), pp. 19-32; Pasqualucci (1996a), pp. 877-899; Pasqualucci (1995), pp. 794-806; Gros Espiell (1988), pp. 456-466.

²⁰⁹ Article 53 ACHR.

²¹⁰ See e.g. Buergenthal (1985), pp. 1-27.

²¹¹ If necessary, it also issues Interpretations of Judgments on the Merits or on Reparations.

²¹² See also Chapter XVIII (Follow-up).

²¹³ Article 61 ACHR.

Only the Commission or a State Party may bring a case before the Court. In the past the Commission did so only sparingly,²¹⁴ yet during the last decade the number of cases brought before the Court has increased. The Commission's new Rules of Procedure have laid down that it shall refer a case to the Court when it considers that the State has not complied with its decision on the merits. In the last decade, within the confines of the Convention text, the Court is increasingly giving the petitioners (and victims) the possibility to directly contact the Court in cases pending before it.²¹⁵ As of June 2001, when the Court's new Rules of Procedure became applicable, the petitioner is able to present arguments and claims independently, once the Commission (or the State) has brought a case before the Court.²¹⁶

4.3 Power and promptness of the Inter-American Commission and Court

4.3.1 Introduction

Article 63(2) deals with provisional measures to prevent irreparable harm to persons:

"In cases of extreme gravity and urgency, and when necessary to avoid irreparable damage to persons, the Court shall adopt such provisional measures as it deems pertinent in the matters it has under consideration. With respect to a case not yet submitted to the Court, it may act at the request of the Commission".

It appears from the last sentence that the Commission may request the Court to act with respect to a case not yet submitted to the Court.²¹⁷ Obviously the Commission cannot do this in relation to ²¹⁴ See e.g. Buergenthal (2005), p. 15.

²¹⁵ See in general about the case law and proceedings before the Commission and Court: Shelton (2004b), pp. 127-141; Pasqualucci (2003); Faúndez Ledesma (1999); Buergenthal/Cassel (1998), pp. 539-571; Cançado Trindade (1998a), pp. 133-149; Pinto (1998), pp. 169-184; Davidson (1997) and Volio Jiménez (1996), pp. 287-298.

²¹⁶ Rules of Procedure December 2000, with amendments that entered into force January 2003. About procedural changes see Pasqualucci (2003), pp. 18-25; Gomez (2001), pp. 111-126; Cançado Trindade (1998), pp. 1-27; Gomez (1998a), pp. 213-240; Krsticevic (1998), pp. 413-448; Méndez/Cox (1998); Nikken (1996), pp. 25-44; Vivanco (1998), pp. 51-72 and Padilla (1995). See e.g. the Court's refusal to order an extension of its provisional measures in the Raxcacó Reyes et al. case (Guatemala), on behalf of Mr Valenzuela Ávila, 20 April 2006, because his case was unrelated to the Raxcacó Reyes et al. case and the pending provisional measures, and involved a case still pending before the Commission, meaning that it was the Commission that could request the Court to order provisional measures involving that matter, but not the petitioner. See further Chapter XIII (Protection), the section on beneficiaries. For the case law of the Court see the Court's website <<http://www.corteidh.or.cr/>> as well as <<http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/iachr/iachr.html>> (basic documents, case law, Annual Reports, Press Releases). See also the Inter-American Human Rights Digest, Repertorio de Jurisprudencia by Grossman/Goldman/Martin/Rodríguez-Pinzón (only in Spanish): <<http://www.wcl.american.edu/humright/hracademy/iadigest.cfm>>; the contributions on the Inter-American system by Medina Quiroga, Martín and Rodríguez Pinzón in the Netherlands Quarterly of Human Rights; Buergenthal/Shelton (1995).

²¹⁷ The Statute of the Commission provides in Article 19 (c) that the Commission shall have the power 'to request the Inter-American Court of Human Rights to take such provisional measures as it considers appropriate in serious and urgent cases which have not yet been submitted to it for consideration, whenever this becomes necessary to prevent irreparable injury to persons', Statute of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, approved by Resolution N1 447 taken by

States that have not ratified the ACHR or States that have ratified the Convention but have not accepted the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court.²¹⁸

The Commission usually takes its own precautionary measures before it applies to the Court to take provisional measures. Its authority to do so is based on its function of adjudicating petitions under the OAS Charter as well as under the ACHR.²¹⁹ It formally laid down this possibility in its Regulations of 1980 and it can be found in Article 25 of the Commission's new Rules, which entered into force on 1 May 2001. This Article provides:

- “1. In serious and urgent cases, and whenever necessary according to the information available, the Commission may, on its own initiative or at the request of a party, request that the State concerned adopt precautionary measures to prevent irreparable harm to persons.
2. If the Commission is not in session, the President, or, in his or her absence one of the Vice-Presidents, shall consult with the other members, through the Executive Secretariat, on the application of the provision in the previous paragraph. If it is not possible to consult within a reasonable period of time under the circumstances, the President, or, where appropriate, one of the Vice-Presidents shall take the decision on behalf of the Commission and shall so inform its members.
3. The Commission may request information from the interested parties on any matter related to the adoption and observance of the precautionary measures.
4. The granting of such measures and their adoption by the State shall not constitute a prejudgment on the merits of a case”.²²⁰ the General Assembly of the OAS at its ninth regular session, held in La Paz, Bolivia, October 1997.

²¹⁸ The last sentence (‘a case not yet submitted’) could also be interpreted to imply that the Commission may only request provisional measures if it will later bring the case before the Court on the merits as well. On the other hand, the inclusion of the word ‘yet’ may also simply distinguish between cases already pending before the Court and those still pending before the Commission, without implying anything more than an assumption that, at a later stage, the latter will be submitted to the Court as well. In any case, the word does not justify lifting a provisional measure when the Commission has not yet submitted a case to the Court within a certain time frame.

²¹⁹ About their legal status see Chapter XVI.

²²⁰ Rules of Procedure of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, approved by the Commission at its 109th special session held from December 4 to 8, 2000. Entry into force on 1 May 2001 according to Article 78. The Spanish and English texts are equally authentic. Its previous Rules, then called Regulations, dealt with precautionary measures in Article 29: “The Commission may, at its own initiative, or at the request of a party, take any action it considers necessary for the discharge of its functions. In urgent cases, when it becomes necessary to avoid irreparable damage to persons, the Commission may request that provisional measures be taken to avoid irreparable damage in cases where the denounced facts are true. If the Commission is not in session, the Chairman, or in his absence, one of the Vice-Chairmen, shall consult with the other members, through the Secretariat, on implementation of the provisions of Paragraphs 1 and 2 above. If it is not possible to consult within a reasonable time, the Chairman shall take the decision on behalf of the Commission and shall so inform its members immediately. The request for such measures and their adoption shall not prejudice the final decision”. Regulations of the Inter-American Commission of Human Rights, Approved by the Commission at its 660th Meeting, 49th Session, held on 8 April, 1980, and modified at its 64th Session, 840th Meeting, held on 7 March, 1985, at its 70th Session, 938th Meeting, held on 29 June, 1987, and at its 90th Session, 1282nd Meeting, held on 21 September, 1995. The text of this regulation about its precautionary measures used the term ‘provisional measures’. Article 25 of the new Rules does not reproduce the first paragraph of Article 29 of the old Regulations because that paragraph was

The reason for the increase in precautionary and provisional measures in the last decade is not that they were not necessary in the past. In the 1970s and 1980s few States in the hemisphere even had elected governments and evidence of gross human rights violations in that period is abundant. The changes seem to lie in the institutional development of the tool.

Commissioner Juan Mendez refers to two advantages of taking precautionary measures first and going to the Court for provisional measures only later. Firstly, if the Commission does not go to the Court directly, it has more ammunition. The other advantage is that the Commission, through the Executive Secretariat, can do it directly from Washington D.C. It can be done in one hour, while when the Commission applies to the Court it has to prepare a statement and so does the Court. When the Court is not in session the Secretariat of the Court contacts the President. Even though the Court's Secretariat will usually act on it swiftly, it still takes another couple of steps. Mendez notes that if the matter is very urgent the Commission probably requests the Court to take provisional measures and takes its own precautionary measures at the same time, without waiting for the Court's reaction. According to him the benefit of the system is that it is so flexible that you can adapt it to the degree of emergency.²²¹

In the last decade the Commission's practice in using the tool of precautionary measures has become more elaborate. There are a few different layers of decision-making providing some extra flexibility. NGOs are aware that under its Rules of Procedure and practice, the Commission has to make a 'case' of any petition received, including of an originally free-standing petition for precautionary measures. Often, however, they file a petition and at the same time they file separately for precautionary measures. This is to emphasise the urgency of the case, possibly for fear that the Executive Secretariat will take less seriously such request when it is filed as part of a petition.²²² For instance, when a case deals with the displacement of communities, petitioners may say that this is going to happen any time soon, it may even happen tomorrow. In such cases the President of the Commission may take precautionary measures without first consulting the rest of the Commission.

Another approach is not to act on the urgent petition for precautionary measures but to act immediately on the formal petition by giving it a number and passing it on to the government. Even though in that case the Commission itself does not say it is taking a precautionary measure, because of the fact that it is passing the petition on to the government so quickly and because the petitioners' request for urgent measures is included, the State knows that it is a matter to which they have to pay attention.

The third possibility is to inform the State that it has received a request for precautionary measures and to request it to give its version of the situation so that the Commission can decide whether or not to act on the request. Several times States have solved the problem at that stage. For instance, they have released persons in detention. This way, this third possibility is an intermediate step that is not a formal decision but it may work nevertheless.

The fourth possibility is indeed taking a precautionary measure asking a State to act in a certain way or to refrain from acting and giving it several weeks or months to comply.

The fifth possibility the Commission has when it is faced with urgent situations, is to go directly to the Court and request it to take provisional measures. Governments tend to fear the Court's provisional measures more than the Commission's precautionary measures.²²³ not specific to the issue of precautionary measures. The addition 'under the circumstances' following 'within a reasonable period of time' in Article 25(2) is already implicit in 'reasonable' and seems redundant ²²¹ Interview by author with Commissioner Juan Mendez, Washington D.C., 17 October 2001.

²²² Id.

²²³ Commissioner Juan Mendez mentioned these five layers of decision-making during an interview by the author in Washington D.C., on 17 October 2001.

The first case in which the Commission went straight to the Court to request a provisional measure was the case Bustíos Rojas. Upon request of the petitioners (Americas Watch), the Commission went to the Court without first using its own precautionary measures.²²⁴

States may want to avoid placing the Commission in a position where it has to go to the Court. Generally they fear having to attend the Court's hearings, where they have to account for their acts or omissions in public. If they comply with the Commission's precautionary measures, or even anticipate them, they may be able to avoid the attention of the press as well.

As part of its considerations the Court often specifically refers to the fact that the State failed to respond to the Commission's precautionary measures as one of the indications of urgency warranting an Order by the Court.²²⁵ Yet strong views have also been expressed arguing against the Commission's use of precautionary measures before going to the Court to request provisional measures: '(t)he Commission's insistence in its practice with regard to prior precautionary measures may, in some case, have negative consequences for the potential victims and create one more obstacle for them. In certain cases, it can constitute a denial of justice at the international level'.²²⁶

In the Matter of Children Deprived of Liberty in the "Complexo do Tatuapé" of FEBEM regarding Brazil the Commission had continued using its own precautionary measures for a long time while repeatedly receiving reports of beneficiaries killed.²²⁷

4.3.2 The Commission's Rules of Procedure (2000/2003)

In 2000 the Commission substantially amended its Rules of Procedure.²²⁸ The new Rules on the Commission's admissibility decisions and the criteria for sending a case to the Court are important in the context of its precautionary measures.

The possibility to take precautionary measures is useful not only in relation to States that have not recognised the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court, but also to those that have. It gives the Commission more flexibility. Of course this is the case only inasmuch as the Commission does not fail to resort to the Court when the case is ready or when the exigencies of the situation so require. With the present Rules of Procedure this risk is considerably diminished.

4.3.3 The Court's competence

First and foremost Article 63(2) ACHR establishes the Court's competence. The Statute of the Court does not further elaborate on its competence to take provisional measures.²²⁹

²²⁴ See the urgent measures ordered by the Court's President in Bustíos Rojas, 5 June 1990, as confirmed by the full Court in its Order for provisional measures of 8 August 1990.

²²⁵ See, e.g., IACHR James, Briggs, Noel, Garcia and Bethel cases, Order for provisional measures, 14 June 1998, James et al. cases, Order of the President for urgent measures, 25 October 2001 and Order for provisional measures, 26 November 2001.

²²⁶ See Cançado Trindade's individual opinion in IACHR Matter of the persons imprisoned in the "Dr. Sebastião Martins Silveira" Penitentiary in Araraquara, São Paulo regarding Brazil, Order of 30 September 2006, §30, referring to his Separate Opinion in the Matter of Mery Naranjo et al., §§5-11 and in the Matter of Gloria Giral de García-Prieto et al., §§7-13.

²²⁷ See IACHR Matter of Children Deprived of Liberty in the "Complexo do Tatuapé" of FEBEM, Order of 17 November 2005, Separate Concurring Opinion of judge Cançado Trindade criticizing this.

²²⁸ The Statute, as approved by the General Assembly provides that the 'Commission shall prepare and adopt its own Regulations, in accordance with the present Statute'. Indeed, the Commission previously called its Rules of Procedure 'Regulations'. It amended the Rules slightly in 2003. These Rules, as amended, entered into force in January 2004.

As is clear from Article 25 of the Rules, the President of the Court may use so-called ‘urgent measures’ when the Court is not in session. The President basically grants ‘provisional measures’ provisionally so that any provisional measures later decided by the full Court may still have their intended function. Later, usually following a public hearing in the matter, the full Court ratifies these in an Order for provisional measures. Thus far, there are no known instances where the full Court decided not to ratify the President’s urgent measures other than for reasons that the situation meanwhile had been solved already. The Court lifts its provisional measures when they are no longer necessary.

4.3.4 Delegation and consultation

Different from the Rules of Procedure of the HRC and CAT, the Rules of the Inter-American Commission specifically refer to consultation within the Commission about the use of provisional measures.²³⁰ Article 6 of the Rules provides that the Commission shall have as its board of officers a President, a first Vice-President and a second Vice-President. If consultation on the use of precautionary measures has not been possible within a reasonable period of time, the President or one of the Vice-Presidents shall take the decision on behalf of the Commission. Since 2001 the ²²⁹ Statute of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights, adopted by the General Assembly of the OAS at its Ninth Regular Session, held in La Paz, Bolivia, October 1979 (Resolution 4.4.8). Article 25 of its Rules of Procedure, dating from 2000 (with paragraphs 3 and 6 added in 2003), provides: “1. At any stage of the proceedings involving cases of extreme gravity and urgency, and when necessary to avoid irreparable damage to persons, the Court may, at the request of a party or on its own motion, order such provisional measures as it deems pertinent, pursuant to Article 63(2) of the Convention. 2. With respect to matters not yet submitted to it, the Court may act at the request of the Commission. 3. In contentious cases already submitted to the Court, the victims or alleged victims, their next of kin, or their duly accredited representatives, may present a request for provisional measures directly to the Court. 4. The request may be made to the President, to any judge of the Court, or to the Secretariat, by any means of communication. In every case, the recipient of the request shall immediately bring it to the President’s attention. 5. If the Court is not sitting, the President, in consultation with the Permanent Commission and, if possible, with the other judges, shall call upon the government concerned to adopt such urgent measures as may be necessary to ensure the effectiveness of any provisional measures that may be ordered by the Court at its next session. 6. The beneficiaries of urgent measures or provisional measures ordered by the President may address their comments on the report made by the State directly to the Court. The Inter-American Commission of Human Rights shall present observations to the State’s report and to the observations of the beneficiaries or their representatives. 7. The Court, or its President if the Court is not sitting, may convoke the parties to a public hearing on provisional measures. 8. In its Annual Report to the General Assembly, the Court shall include a statement concerning the provisional measures ordered during the period covered by the report. If those measures have not been duly implemented, the Court shall make such recommendations as it deems appropriate”. Rules of Procedure of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights, approved by the Court at its 49th Regular Session held from 16 to 25 November 2000, entered into force on 1 June 2001, amended November/December 2003 (including the addition of §§3 and 6), entered into force 1 January 2004. The Permanent Commission referred to in Rule 25 (5) is composed of ‘the President, the Vice-President and any other judges the President deems it appropriate to appoint, according to the needs of the Court’. See Article 6 (1) Rules.

²³⁰ As noted, Rule 63(3) of CEDAW’s Rules of Procedure stipulates that when a Working Group or Rapporteur has decided to take provisional measures they ‘shall forthwith thereafter inform the Committee members of the nature of the request and the communication to which request relates’.

Vice-Presidents can now take this decision as well. As becomes clear from Article 25(2) the other members of the Commission must be informed when the President or either Vice-President has requested a State to adopt precautionary measures. Apart from a special provision on precautionary measures (Article 25), the Rules of Procedure also include specific references to serious or urgent cases in Articles 29 and 30. Article 29, on the initial processing of individual petitions, lays down in paragraph 2 that the Executive Secretary shall immediately notify the Commission in serious or urgent cases. Article 50 of the Rules stipulates that this provision, just like the Rule on precautionary measures, also applies to the procedure of petitions with regard to OAS member States not a party to the ACHR.²³¹

Article 30, on the admissibility procedure, provides in paragraph 4: 'In serious or urgent cases, or when it is believed that the life or personal integrity of a person is in real or imminent danger, the Commission shall request the promptest reply from the State, using for this purpose the means it considers most expeditious'. The Commission may refer here to the means of communication (telephone, fax, etc.) of precautionary measures, as well as to other measures such as an informal request during a country visit or simply giving priority to examining that case.

While responsiveness sometimes depends slightly on the efficiency of the individual staff members, the CIDH generally is capable of responding quickly and in a manner that is focused on the situation.²³²

The CIDH was the first international body to speak out on the situation of the 'unlawful combatants' at Guantanamo Bay. Subsequently various UN special mechanisms and treaty bodies have dealt with their situation, yet the CIDH remains the only international adjudicator with competence to deal with complaints against the US. Indeed it has shown its 'capacity to respond quickly and effectively to urgent concerns raised by counter-terrorism measures, when domestic mechanisms of protection may be absent or ineffective'.²³³

Whereas in its adjudicatory role the Court deals only with States that have recognised its contentious jurisdiction, the Commission deals with all members of the OAS. This is relevant in relation to the Commission's competence to take precautionary measures. It can take them both with regard to States that have ratified the ACHR and with regard to those that have not. As discussed in the previous section member States of the OAS who have not ratified the ACHR must still answer to the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights.

With respect to State parties to the Convention, the Commission's competence is based on the ACHR. The Statute provides in Article 19 that the Commission has several special powers with respect to the States parties to the American Convention on Human Rights. One of these is ²³¹ With regard to the initial processing of petitions Article 34(2) of the old Regulations had provided that 'in serious or urgent cases or when it is believed that the life, personal integrity or health of a person is in imminent danger, the Commission shall request the promptest reply from the government, using for this purpose the means it considers most expeditious'.

²³² In the context of disappearances it was the Inter-American Commission that was the first to use provisional measures, in the 1970s and 1980s. In any case it had authorised the Executive Secretary to intervene in some urgent cases in its name. Generally this happened when someone had claimed that a person had disappeared after an arrest. Such intervention normally consisted of writing a letter, sometimes sending a telegram. At other times it was a telephone-call to the relevant State's Ambassador to the OAS, based in Washington D.C. and sometimes even a long distance call to the Foreign Ministry or to some other contact in the State. The Commission used these methods to express an interest in the fate and whereabouts of the recently disappeared person. It seems that the Executive Secretary did this quite often but the practice was also very discretionary. It may well be that many urgent complaints just received the regular case treatment. Interview of author with Juan Méndez, Washington D.C., 17 October 2001. In the 1980s he was working as a practitioner at the NGO Human Rights Watch.

²³³ Tittmore (2006), p. 401.

‘to request the Inter-American Court of Human Rights to take such provisional measures as it considers appropriate in serious and urgent cases which have not yet been submitted to it for consideration, whenever this becomes necessary to prevent irreparable injury to persons’.

The Commission can only ask the Court to take provisional measures when the State concerned has recognised the Court’s jurisdiction, but it may use precautionary measures with regard to all member States of the OAS.²³⁴

The terminology used by the Commission in relation to its precautionary measures differs. The Commission sometimes says it ‘issued’ precautionary measures and sometimes it says it decided to ‘take’ them. Often it simply states it requested a government to take the necessary steps to prevent irreparable harm to persons. Generally, petitioners request the Commission to ‘take’ or ‘issue’ precautionary measures, while the Commission, in turn, asks the State to ‘take’ or ‘adopt’ precautionary measures. In other words both the Commission’s decision itself to take precautionary measures and the protective measures required are called ‘precautionary measures’. The Commission holds periodic meetings determining whether precautionary measures must be maintained or not. When it does not maintain them, it often also notes that it ‘filed’ the case, meaning lifted or archived it.

4.3.5 Promptness

Since the Inter-American Court is not permanently in session it is usually the President who takes action in urgent cases in the periods between the sessions. The first time the Court became involved in the issue of provisional measures to prevent the execution of a death sentence was when the President of the Court ordered urgent measures in the cases of James, Briggs, Noel, Garcia and Bethel in May 1998. Judge Salgado-Pesantes, who was President of the Court at the time, ordered Trinidad and Tobago to take all necessary measures to preserve the lives of these six persons ‘so that the Court may examine the pertinence of the provisional measures requested by the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights’. The President sometimes refers to his consultation with the other members of the Court.²³⁵ In any case, the Rules of Procedure provide that the President consults with the Permanent Council before he orders urgent measures. The full Court has confirmed such Orders and has sometimes noted that the President had used them ‘in conformity with the provisions of the Convention and the Rules of Procedure and the information presented in the matter’.²³⁶ It has also noted that it was ‘convenient to hear the arguments of the State and the Commission with regard to this matter in a public hearing’.²³⁷

Trinidad’s first six reports, responding to the Court’s Orders and to those of the President, argued that Trinidad could not stay an execution until the Warrant of Execution had been issued and read.²³⁸ The Commission pointed out that the fact that there were only five to seven days between the reading of a Warrant of Execution and the execution itself ‘would impede the Court’s ²³⁴ See further Chapter XVI (Legal status).

²³⁵ IACHR James et al. cases, Order of the President for urgent measures, 29 June 1998; James et al. case, Order of the President for urgent measures, 13 July 1998; James, Briggs, Noel, Garcia and Bethel cases, Order of the President for urgent measures, 22 July 1998 and Order of the President for urgent measures, 25 October 2001 all refer to consultation; the President’s Orders of 11 May and 19 June 1999, on the other hand, do not refer to consultation.

²³⁶ IACHR James et al. cases, Orders for provisional measures, 14 June and 29 August 1998, 25 May and 25 September 1999 and 26 November 2001.

²³⁷ IACHR James, Briggs, Noel, Garcia and Bethel cases, Order for provisional measures, 14 June 1998 (‘convenient’ is the literal translation used in the official English text of the original ‘conveniente’, but it is likely that the Court meant something like ‘suitable’).

²³⁸ See IACHR James et al. cases, Order for provisional measures, 29 August 1998.

ability to issue effective provisional measures'.²³⁹ Trinidad's professed impossibility to stay an execution in advance of the reading of the Execution Warrant, combined with the fact that there is only a limited period of time (e.g. five to seven days) between this reading and the intended execution, indeed makes it very difficult for the Court to order provisional measures in a timely manner. The death row prisoner must first contact the NGO or lawyer dealing with his case who, in turn, must contact the Commission, which in turn approaches the secretariat of the Court. The Court's staff then communicates with the President who orders urgent measures. These must arrive in time to halt the execution.²⁴⁰ As noted, in cases that are themselves already pending before the Court the petitioners may now directly approach the Court without having to go through the Commission.

The Inter-American Court does not normally provide information on the time span between the Commission's receipt of urgent information on an execution and its resort to the Court. Yet some cases have shown that the Commission is able to respond very swiftly.²⁴¹ The State is generally late in informing a prisoner of his execution date. Sometimes the Commission leaves the Court little time to deal with an urgent case.²⁴² In other instances, it is the Court that waits until the day before the execution with its order for provisional measures.²⁴³

4.3.6 Proprio motu

The Inter-American Commission can take precautionary measures proprio motu.²⁴⁴ An example is the La Tablada case, which did not arise from any individual submission. The petitioner just ²³⁹ IACHR James et al. cases, Order for provisional measures, 29 August 1998.

²⁴⁰ See also under the heading 'timing' in this paragraph.

²⁴¹ On 25 June 1998 Mr. Thomas had been informed that he would be hanged in five days. The next day the petitioners informed the Commission about this. On the same day the Commission unsuccessfully appealed to the Court to include him as a beneficiary in the James et al. provisional measures. James et al. cases, Order of the President for urgent measures, 29 June 1998. Another example is when on 17 June 1999 the Commission informed the Court that on that same date the State had read a warrant of execution to one of the beneficiaries of the Court's provisional measures, Mr. Briggs, and that this execution would be carried out in five days. James et al. cases, Order for provisional measures, 16 August 2000.

²⁴² There have also been times when the Commission was not that swift and did not leave the Court much reaction time. One of them also concerns the case of Mr. Briggs. In February and May 1999 Trinidad requested the Court to 'confirm' that he was not a beneficiary any more. On that same day the Secretariat requested the Commission to submit an urgent report on the situation of Mr. Briggs within 24 hours. The Commission requested an extension of four days, which included the weekend. The President granted this extension. James et al. case, Order for provisional measures, 25 May 1999. On the day the Commission presented its report the Court ordered the provisional measures to be maintained. In his Concurring Opinion Judge Cançado Trindade referred to the little time that was available to the Court to decide on this Order: 'the few hours that the Court disposed of' (in fact, the Spanish text says 'de que dispuso la Corte', referring to the little time the Court had, rather than the time it 'disposed of') 'the merciless pressure of time' and the Commission's document 'submitted to the Court a couple of hours ago'.

²⁴³ On 29 June 1998 the President of the Court ordered urgent measures on behalf of Mr. Thomas. His execution was scheduled early the next morning, which meant that these measures were barely in time. James et al. cases, Order of the President for urgent measures, 29 June 1998. The Commission requested the Court to include Mr. Hilaire as a beneficiary, four days before his scheduled execution. The President ordered urgent measures on his behalf three days later, again only on the day before his scheduled execution. James et al. cases, Order of the President for urgent measures, 13 July 1998.

²⁴⁴ See Article 25(1) of the Commission's Rules of Procedure ('on its own initiative').

asked for a provisional measure.²⁴⁵ Yet the Commission seldom uses such precautionary measures proprio motu. It already deals with a great number of cases and it also considers it is in a better position when it can say that there was a specific request to take action, even if it is only a telephone call. In theory, however, the Commission could act upon its own initiative if something comes to its attention, for instance based on public knowledge.²⁴⁶

Since the introduction of the Office of the OAS Special Rapporteur on Freedom of Expression the Commission has been more pro-active in the use of precautionary measures to protect journalists and it has even informed specific journalists of the possibility of requesting the Commission's precautionary measures.²⁴⁷ While this is not the same as proprio motu use of provisional measures, it clearly is approaching the potential beneficiary proprio motu.

The Commission can also go to the Court and ask for provisional measures on its own initiative. An example of where the Commission acted without a request is the Chipoco case. Yet the Court observed that this was a matter still pending before the Commission, which had 'not submitted information to the Court sufficient to support the adoption of such measures, which requires the Commission to have gathered preliminary evidence to support a presumption of the truth of the allegations and of a situation whose grave seriousness and urgency could cause irreparable harm to persons'.²⁴⁸

As to the Court, if a case is still pending before the Commission it cannot order provisional measures proprio motu. It can only order them upon request by the Commission. Once a case is pending before the Court the Rules of Procedure have given the petitioner a more independent role. Not only the Commission, but also the petitioner can request provisional measures. At this stage the Court can also order them proprio motu.²⁴⁹ Thus, the monopoly of the Commission with regard to triggering the Court's decision whether or not to order provisional measures only applies to those cases that are not yet pending before the Court. In such cases the petitioner depends ²⁴⁵ See also Chapter VII (Detention situations) and Chapter XIII (Protection).

²⁴⁶ Interview of author with Juan Mendez, Washington D.C., 17 October 2001.

²⁴⁷ See e.g. CIDH Annual Report 2006, 3 March 2007, Volume II, Report of the Office of the Special Rapporteur for Freedom of Expression, p. 1, §§7-8 and p. 9, §18.

²⁴⁸ IACHR Chipoco (Peru), Order of 27 January 1993 (refusing request for provisional measures). Previously the President had already decided not to order urgent measures, Order of President of 14 December 1992. On evidentiary requirements see Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

²⁴⁹ See Article 63(2) ACHR and 25(3) of the Court's Rules of Procedure. In its Annual Report 2005, p. 76, the Court included charts indicating that provisional measures were requested 96 times (including requests for extensions) and rejected three times; in six cases the Court used them proprio motu (see also section 4.3 of Chapter XIII (Protection) on the importance of ascertaining the wishes of the beneficiaries in this respect), nine were on request of the victim, 80 on request of the Commission and one based on an agreement by the petitioners, the State and the Commission. 75 % of the provisional measures relates to cases pending before the Commission and 25 % to cases pending before the Court. The Court's Annual Report 2007 referred to a total of 118 requests for provisional measures. It noted that in 10 cases the measures requested were rejected and that 32 belonged to requests to expand provisional measures already adopted. It also pointed out that 26 % of the provisional measures requested were related to contentious cases processed before the Court, while 74 % related to proceedings still pending before the Commission. The great majority (93) of the provisional measures were requested by the Inter-American Commission. Again the Court mentioned that it ordered six provisional measures on its own motion (meaning that it did not use them proprio motu since the publication of its Annual Report 2005); again it mentioned that one was requested by common agreement by the Commission, the alleged victims and the State and 18 were requested by the alleged victims or their representatives, indicating that the number of such requests doubled since 2005. See Annual Report 2007, p. 76.

on the Commission's decision that its own precautionary measures are insufficient and that, pursuant to the last sentence of Article 63(2), the Court's provisional measures are warranted.

At the end of 2001 the Secretary of the Inter-American Court decided to assign the task to prepare provisional measures to one staff member. The question arises whether this is a desirable approach. After all, provisional measures constitute an integral part of the case. For a decision whether or not to take them it is necessary to examine all information available. Such a division of labour would mean a duplication of work. Nevertheless, this approach has been suggested with regard to the ECtHR as well and it could have benefits.²⁵⁰ According to Garry instituting a separate body with expertise in analysing requests for provisional measures 'might also be beneficial to the individual applicants for whom a thoroughly knowledgeable and expeditious review of the request is often a matter of life or death'.²⁵¹ Expertise on provisional measures is necessary, but these measures should not be dealt with in a manner divorced from the main case.

During an on-site visit in Peru the Inter-American Commission had received information about harassment to which Mr. Mezarina was subjected, allegedly by members of the Peruvian army. There had been an attack on his life in November 1998. Unknown persons had fired at him twice when he was leaving his home. In February 1999 the Commission granted precautionary measures on his behalf and on behalf of his family. In light of the Commission's reference to its country visit, it may be that it more or less decided this precautionary measure on a proprio motu basis. In March 1999 Peru informed the Commission that it had adopted specific measures. Subsequently, 'the parties' continued presenting information on the issue.²⁵² The reference to 'the parties' may either mean that there indeed had been a petitioner from the start (which probably means that the Commission did not use its power to take precautionary measures proprio motu) or that later an NGO came forward to represent the beneficiary.²⁵³

4.4 Decisions by the Inter-American Commission and Court to take provisional measures: transparency or the lack thereof?

4.4.1 Introduction

Different from the UN adjudicators the Inter-American Commission and the Inter-American Court (especially the latter), have been more forthcoming in providing information about their use of provisional measures.²⁵⁴ Secondary literature has addressed the issue as well.²⁵⁵

²⁵⁰ See e.g. Buquicchio-de Boer (1998), p. 236.

²⁵¹ Garry (2001), p. 402.

²⁵² CIDH Annual Report 1999, Chapter III C.1, §49.

²⁵³ In the alternative the beneficiary himself remained in touch with the Commission and was referred to as a party.

²⁵⁴ As set out in this section they have published more information on their use of provisional measures than the UN committees. The author visited the Secretariat of the Inter-American Commission, Washington, D.C. (18 September-22 October 2001). She would like to thank members of the Commission Robert Goldman, Juan Mendez and Claudio Grossman; staff members Brian Tittemore, Veronica Gomez, Elisabeth Abi-Mershed, Ignacio Alvarez, Ariel Dulitzky and Christina Cerna; as well as Rick Wilson (Washington College of Law), Viviana Krsticevic (CEJIL), the Guatemala Human Rights Commission, Diego Rodríguez (Washington College of Law) and Claudia Martín (Washington College of Law). She also would like to thank Judge Thomas Buergethal (The Hague, 19 July 2001) and Douglas Cassel (then Northwestern University School of Law, Chicago, 7 September 2001). She visited the Secretariat of the Inter-American Court, San José, Costa Rica (23 October-10 December 2001). She would like to thank President Cançado

4.4.2 The Commission

Official information on the Commission's early use of precautionary measures is lacking.²⁵⁶ Apparently, during the 1970s the Commission's President would sometimes – very informally – contact a State if the Commission felt a person was at risk. He did so simply for humanitarian reasons and did not specifically refer to the State's obligations under the OAS Charter or the ACHR.²⁵⁷ In 2001 one of the members of the Commission recalled that in the 1970s and 1980s, when he himself brought cases before the Commission as a petitioner, the Commission developed a practice of urgent intervention in the context of the disappearances.²⁵⁸

Between 1979 and 1989 the Commission focused primarily on other activities, such as preparing Country Reports, rather than on individual petitions. Yet as part of its other activities the Commission has intervened in urgent situations as well.

Since 1989, when the Court issued its first Judgments, not only the Court, but also the Commission has dealt more intensively with individual complaints. This may mean that it has used precautionary measures more often since then, although references to precautionary measures prior to 1996 are only found incidentally.²⁵⁹

It is only since its Annual Report 1996, published in March 1997, that the Commission includes a specific section on its use of precautionary measures. In this Annual Report the Commis-

Trindade and staff members Pablo Saavedra-Alessandri, Emilia Segares-Rodríguez, Paula Lizano, Olger González-Espinoza, María Auxiliadora Solano, Lilly Ching; former under-Secretary of the Court Victor Rodríguez, Charles Moyer (Inter-American Institute of Human Rights, formerly Secretary of the Court and Commission); and Alejandra Nuño (CEJIL Costa Rica). She also attended the public hearings on provisional measures in the Centro Pro case against Mexico, where the murder of human rights lawyer Digna Ochoa was discussed (after the withdrawal of provisional measures), and the hearings on reparations in the Bamaca case against Guatemala (a case in which witnesses were in need of protection against threats also after the judgment on the merits was published).

²⁵⁵ See e.g. Medina Quiroga/Nash Rojas (2007), pp. 70-71 (precautionary measures) and pp. 93-94 (provisional measures); Bonifaz Tweddle (2006), pp. 55-97; Pasqualucci (2005), pp. 1-49; Cançado Trindade (2005), pp. 145-163; Shelton (2005b), pp. 165-176; Pasqualucci (2003), pp. 219-325; Cançado Trindade (2003), pp. 162-168; González-Espinoza (2002); Padilla (1998), pp. 1189-1196; Buergenthal (1994), pp. 69-94; Aguiar-Aranguren (1994), pp. 19-37.

²⁵⁶ In general the Commission's early decisions on admissibility and merits are difficult to access. See Wilson (American University), in his introduction to the 1994 version of an index to the Inter-American Commission's case law, at the University of Minnesota search database <<http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/cases/commission.htm>>. See also Gilman (1998), pp. 261-290.

²⁵⁷ Interviews by author with Christina Cerna, Washington D.C., 18 October 2001 and Charles Moyer, San José, Costa Rica, 20 November 2001.

²⁵⁸ Interview by author with Commissioner Juan Méndez, Washington D.C., 17 October 2001. In the 1980s he was working as a practitioner at Human Rights Watch.

²⁵⁹ The 1997 case docket of CEJIL, the main NGO bringing cases before the Inter-American Commission and Court, gives some information on the cases it has dealt with prior to 1998. This case docket is simply a reference document used within CEJIL. It was not intended for publication and it does not claim to be complete. It mentions 153 cases. In 36 of these it requested the Commission to take precautionary measures. It is not clear whether the Commission always followed this request. In seven of these cases CEJIL also requested the Commission to seek provisional measures from the Court. It requested the Commission to take precautionary measures in eight cases involving Colombia and in ten cases involving Guatemala. The other countries were Mexico (five), El Salvador and Dominican Republic (three times each), Honduras and Bolivia (twice each) and Peru, Brazil and Guyana (once each). CEJIL case docket 1997, on file with the author.

sion presented its precautionary measures in the order in which it received requests for such measures by petitioners.²⁶⁰ In later Annual Reports the Commission presents the precautionary measures per State in chronological order.²⁶¹ Its presentation generally includes the name of the person(s) on whose behalf the Commission used precautionary measures and usually a very brief summary of facts. Furthermore, the Commission mentions the rights of the persons exposed to grave and imminent danger, the number it has assigned to the case (if any) as well as the name of the State involved and the date on which the Commission decided on the precautionary measures.²⁶²

The quality of the information given in the Annual Reports on the Commission's use of precautionary measures seems to depend on the desk officer at the Executive Secretariat, working on a specific country. This is particularly relevant in light of the question to what extent the Annual Report provides an explanation for the use of precautionary measures in the cases it describes. It is possible that for budgetary reasons the Commission has chosen not to coordinate the information it presents.²⁶³

As the Commission does not formally reject petitioners' requests for precautionary measures, there is no documentation available on its decision not to take them.²⁶⁴ This means that its conditions for taking precautionary measures must be derived from the information it provides on those situations where it did take them.

Before 2000 the Commission already published both its Admissibility and its Inadmissibility Reports, with 'the essential purpose of establishing clear and objective criteria for the process-

²⁶⁰ See CIDH Annual Report 1996, Chapter II, §4.

²⁶¹ See e.g. CIDH Annual Report 1997, Chapter III, §2(a).

²⁶² As of Spring 2008 the Commission also provides a functioning link on its website through which the sections of its Annual Reports discussing precautionary measures may be accessed directly.

²⁶³ In 2002, for instance, the Commission received 4.1 % of the total OAS budget. Speech by Dr. Juan Méndez, President of the Inter-American Commission of Human Rights at the inauguration of the 114th regular session of the Inter-American Commission of Human Rights, 25 February 2002, <www.cidh.org/discursos>. Méndez noted that the Commission's overall budget for that financial year was $ 3.1 million USD and that it spent approximately two-thirds on staff salaries and benefits. He pointed out that '[t]he remainder barely covers the costs of preparing and holding two regular sessions and one special session publishing an annual report, covering performance contract fees, and paying for supplies and similar items'. 'As a result on-site visits, dealings with the Inter-American Court, and the Commission's other activities in promoting and protecting human rights have to be financed with voluntary contributions from member states and assistance from observer nations'. The Court's Annual Report 2005, published in 2006, referred to the Commission's budget at constituting 4.29 % of the OAS budget. The Commission has since included a link to 'Financial resources' on its website, which presents a graph for the OAS 2006 adjusted budget indicating 4.6 % of the budget distributed to the Commission ($ 3,728.3). See <<http://www.cidh.org/financiro.eng.htm>> (consulted 10 August 2008).

²⁶⁴ Cançado Trindade has pointed out that 'the decisions of the Commission and the Court concerning both precautionary and provisional measures, respectively, should always be motivated, as a guarantee of respect for the adversary principle – which is a general principle of law – so that the petitioners have certainty that the matter they submitted has been duly and carefully considered by the international instance, and so that the meaning of the decision taken by the latter is clear'. This applied also to the Commission's decision to deny a request for precautionary measures: 'this decision should be duly justified'. IACHR Matter of the persons imprisoned in the "Dr. Sebastião Martins Silveira" Penitentiary in Araraquara, São Paulo (Brazil), Order of 30 September 2006, Separate Opinion Judge Cançado Trindade, §30, referring to his Separate Opinions attached to Mery Naranjo et al. (Colombia), Order of 22 September 2006, §§5–11 and Gloria Giralte de García Prieto et al. (El Salvador), Order of 26 September 2006, §§7–13.

ing of individual petitions both for the states and for the representatives of the victims of human rights violations'.²⁶⁵ Nevertheless, there sometimes is a lack of transparency, both with regard to the decision-making on which cases to speed up and send to the Court and with regard to the use of precautionary measures.²⁶⁶

In order to address the problem of the lack of transparency of the procedure in 2000 the Commission introduced a provision in its Rules of Procedure. Article 44(2) reads as follows:

"The Commission shall give fundamental consideration to obtaining justice in a particular case, based, among others, on the following factors: (a) the position of the petitioner; (b) the nature and seriousness of the violation; (c) the need to develop or clarify the case law of the system; (d) the future effect of the decision within the legal systems of the Member States; and, (e) the quality of the evidence available".

The petitioner and the representative of the State attend the hearings before the Inter-American Commission. The Commission does publicize that it has had a hearing as well as some of its contents. Both parties are free to publicize their visions on the matter but the meetings themselves are not open for the public and the press.

In some of its admissibility decisions the Inter-American Commission refers to its use of precautionary measures and sometimes it provides information on State replies, etc. Since 1996 it includes a short section on its use of precautionary measures in its Annual Report. This has already improved the transparency of the Commission's use of this tool. The information provided, however, is not very consistent and does not generally analyze the replies of States. It is possible that the Commission fears that more detail on State replies would diminish the effectiveness of its precautionary measures because State parties could use non-compliance by other States as an excuse for their own non-compliance. It may also be possible to explain the inconsistency in reporting by the chronic lack of resources under which the Commission's Secretariat is forced to operate.

Obviously, the Secretariats of the various adjudicators have an important role to play in the day to day proceedings and drafting of documents, including the preparation of decisions on provisional measures. After all the petitions and State responses arrive at these Secretariats and the adjudicators can only function effectively when their members are assisted by the staff working at these Secretariats.²⁶⁷ The Inter-American Commission has expressed itself publicly about this and related issues, partly to address speculations in domestic press. In 2005 it published a Resolution in which it distanced itself from public statements made by one of its members both involving the status of its precautionary measures and with regard to its decision-making on these measures. Commissioner Gutiérrez had publicly indicated to a Mexican newspaper that the relevant province in Mexico 'had no obligation to comply with precautionary measures', because they were ‘only observations issued from the Secretariat, not from the Commission’.²⁶⁸ The remark had caused alarm among the petitioners and others in Mexico. The beneficiary of the precautionary measures reportedly decided to leave the province in question because of the statements. Gutiérrez had also attacked the Executive Secretary as having ‘usurped’ the Commission’s functions, being the person who ‘decides to admit and process all the files in relation to questions on the merits and precautionary measures’.²⁶⁹ Moreover, while he was in Colombia, in November 2004, he had stated that precautionary measures were not binding. The remarks by the Commissioner were particularly problematic in light of the serious situations in Colombia, involving death threats, and the fact that this State had never protested that the Commission’s precautionary measures would not be legally binding. Finally, he had publicly commented on statements of the Inter-American Commission with regard to his State of nationality (Venezuela).

²⁶⁵ CIDH Annual Report 1997, Chapter III, §§5-6.

²⁶⁶ In the past, when there was no policy to send cases to the Court, the lack of transparency with regard to decision-making on when to send a case to the Court was even greater. On the one hand the need for transparency and motivation required the Commission to give reasons in its Annual Report for not having sent a case to the Inter-American Court. On the other hand, some members of the Commission and its staff perceived a risk that doing this might undermine the integrity and effectiveness of the Commission's final decisions, for instance when the Commission did not deem a case strong enough to present to the Court. Nevertheless, in my view providing no information and explanation why a case was not sent to the Court might actually enhance the risk of speculation, which could also undermine effectiveness.

²⁶⁷ This observation could equally be made with regard to permanent international courts as well as domestic courts.

In the Resolution the Commission noted that the various opportunities it had given Gutiérrez to comply with his juridical and ethical obligations had been to no avail. It pointed out that it had ‘the legal and moral obligation to report on this situation to the member States, the organs of the OAS and civil society, and to respond publicly to the notions put forth by Commissioner Freddy Gutiérrez Trejo’.²⁷⁰ The Commission reaffirmed the international obligation of member States to comply with its precautionary measures.²⁷¹ The Resolution also reiterated the ethical and legal commitment of members of the Commission to refrain from participating in the discussion of a matter if they are nationals of the State concerned.²⁷² With regard to its decision-making it noted that the precautionary measures had in fact been adopted with the majority vote of its members and that when the Commission was not in session such vote would take place through conference calls or by electronic means, in accordance with Article 17(5) of its Rules of Procedure.²⁷³

In July 2007 the Commission referred the same Commissioner once more. It stated that he had repeatedly abused his position as a Rapporteur in order to attack the institutional integrity of the Commission. It also stated that he had made false statements regarding matters and cases pending and had made numerous public statements even with regard to cases pending involving his own country. The other members of the Commission decided to replace him in the functions and responsibilities that were assigned to him as a Rapporteur.²⁷⁴

In July 2008 the Commission adapted and expanded Article 15 of its Rules of Procedure regarding Rapporteurships and Working Groups, which originally consisted of two paragraphs only. Among others the article now includes parameters for the designation of Rapporteurships and membership in Working Groups and it includes the explicit option to replace a special rapporteur ‘for reasonable cause’ by an absolute majority.

For its discussion of precautionary measures this chapter predominantly draws on the information provided in the Commission’s Annual Reports since 1996. In 1996 the Commission

²⁶⁸ CIDH Resolution 1/05, 8 March 2005.

²⁶⁹ Ibidem.

²⁷⁰ CIDH Resolution 1/05, 8 March 2005.

²⁷¹ See further Chapter XVI on legal status.

²⁷² See more generally about the independence and impartiality of members of the Commission and the Court e.g. Faúndez Ledesma (1998), pp. 185-210.

²⁷³ CIDH Resolution 1/05, 8 March 2005, by all members of the Commission other than Gutiérrez. The latter’s comment was attached to the Resolution.

²⁷⁴ CIDH Resolution 3/07, 17 July 2007.

took less than thirty precautionary measures.²⁷⁵ In the next five years it took fifty or more precautionary measures each year.²⁷⁶

Two approaches of the Commission (and its staff) are particularly helpful with regard to transparency: the fact that it now publishes statistics about its precautionary measures in its Annual Reports and the fact that it sometimes publishes press releases specifically about compliance with its own precautionary measures and with the Court's provisional measures.²⁷⁷ Recently it has even made available video and audio of hearings involving a State's compliance with its precautionary measures.²⁷⁸ It has also made a separate link to 'precautionary measures' on the main page of its website, providing information even on recent precautionary measures that have not yet been included in an Annual Report.²⁷⁹

4.4.3 The Court

Despite the lack of any meaningful budget the Court has been able to make its decision-making on the use of provisional measures more transparent than any other human rights adjudicator.²⁸⁰

²⁷⁵ Annual Report 1996. These were Brazil (4), Colombia (4), Dominican Republic (3), Ecuador (1), El Salvador (1), Guatemala (8), Honduras (2), Mexico (5) and US (1).

²⁷⁶ In its Annual Report 2006, published in March 2007, the CIDH included a table referring to 57 precautionary measures in 1997; 54 in 1998; 52 both in 1999 and in 2000; 50 in 2001; 91 in 2002; 56 in 2003, 37 in 2004; 33 in 2005 and 37 in 2006.

²⁷⁷ See e.g. CIDH, Press Release, 'IACHR Expresses concern over the situation of Yvon Neptune', 19/05, 6 May 2005; 'Inter-American Commission on human Rights expresses its concern over the situation in the Urso Branco prison in Brazil', 13/04, 19 March 2004; 'Executive Secretary of the IACHR concerned over the death threats against Human Rights Defenders in Haiti', 28/01, 9 November 2001; 'Inter-American Commission on Human Rights requests precautionary measures to protect Claudy Gassant, the judge investigating the murder of reporter Jean Dominique', 13/01, 6 July 2001 and Press release (urging the OAS to call off the execution of federal death row inmate Garza), 11/01, 15 June 2001; all at: <www.cidh.org>. Furthermore it is interesting to note that, in the press releases on precautionary measures, the Commission has introduced a practice of attaching background information (less than half a page) on its mandate and composition, evidently intended to inform the media. See e.g. press release 'IACHR calls upon the United States to postpone execution of juvenile offender Alexander Williams', 7/02, 19 February 2002. See also Chapters XVII (Official State responses) and XVIII (Follow up).

²⁷⁸ See e.g. CIDH Video and Audio of the hearing on Precautionary Measures for the Detainees at the Guantánamo Bay Naval Base, held on October 28, 2008, during the Commission's 133rd period of sessions, link provided in CIDH press release 02/09, 'IACHR welcomes order to close Guantanamo detention center', 27 January 2009, at <http://www.cidh.org/Comunicados/English/2009/02-09eng.htm> (consulted 27 January 2009).

²⁷⁹ See e.g. <http://www.cidh.org/medidas/2009.eng.htm> (consulted 27 January 2009).

²⁸⁰ In 2005 the Court received less than two percent of the OAS budget. Following the presentation by the President of the Court of the 1999 Annual Report on the work of the Court to the Committee on Juridical and Political Affairs of the Permanent Council of the OAS, Annual Report of the Inter-American Court 2000, III.6, sixteen delegations congratulated the Court for the excellent work performed during 1999 and hoped that the OAS would continue to support the Court. "In this respect, they expressed themselves in favor of reintegrating at least US$ 100,000.00 of the US$ 150,500.00 cut from the Court's budget for 2000 by the OAS Program-Budget Committee, so that the Court could conduct at least three sessions in 2000 and translate and publish its annual report for that year. Likewise, they expressed the hope that the Court's budget would be increased as of 2001, as it has been frozen since 1998". On 12 October 2000 the OAS General Assembly approved the Court's budget for the year 2001 in a total of US$ 1,284,700. In other words the Court must work with a little over a million US dollars, Annual Report Inter-American Court 2000, Chapter VII. See also the General Secretariat's Report on the

From the start the Inter-American Court has published its provisional measures separately, first in its Annual Reports, later also in its 'Series E' on provisional measures.²⁸¹ The same applies to the President's decision to take urgent measures in advance of any Court decision.

The Court hearings on provisional measures are public and contribute significantly to the persuasiveness of its Orders for provisional measures. Moreover, since September 2001 its provisional measures are also accessible directly on the website of the Court.²⁸² They are motivated, references are made to public hearings held on requests for provisional measures and they regularly include concurring opinions.²⁸³ The Court also issues press releases specifically referring to its provisional measures and both the Commission and the Court provide overviews of their provisional measures in their Annual Reports.²⁸⁴

Yet given the relevance of the Court's provisional measures for other systems as well as for the English speaking petitioners and States of the American system it would be substantially increase the accessibility of the information if good translations were regularly provided.²⁸⁵ budget execution of the regular fund 2001 as presented to the Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Affairs, 18 September 2001(MAN/AS/150/01), p. 6, <www.oas.org/consejo/CAAP/documentos.htm>. The latter Report speaks of a total OAS budget of 76 million US dollars, which means that the Court received 1.7 % in 2001. In a table published in its 2005 Annual Report, published in 2006, the IACHR refers to 1,82 % of the OAS Annual Budget that is reserved for the Court. Both in 2005 and 2006 the budget was US$ 1,391,300. The budget set by the OAS clearly did not take account of the increased case load of the Court. The budget for 2007 was somewhat larger: 1,656,300 and for 2008 it was 1,756,300 (IACHR Annual Report 2007, p. 6). In a speech of 27 November 2006 President Sergio García Ramírez referred to the 26.3 percent increase in the Court's regular budget and the increase in the funds from external donations, Annual Report 2007, p. 55.

²⁸¹ This includes introductions by the President of the Inter-American Court: Fix-Zamudio (1996), pp. V-IX; Cançado Trindade (2000), pp. VII-XVIII; Cançado Trindade (2001), pp. V-XX. See also the separate publication on the Court's website (often only in Spanish; in cases involving Brazil often only in Portuguese).

²⁸² See <<http://www.corteidh.or.cr>>. The website of the University of Minnesota Human Rights Library is an accessible alternative, though not up-to-date: <<http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/iachr/iachr.html>>.

²⁸³ On dissenting and separate opinions before the Inter-American Court generally see Gros Espiell (1988), pp. 456-466.

²⁸⁴ They both provide statistics as well. See e.g. IACHR Annual Report 2005, with 25 tables, pp. 65-81, including tables relating to provisional measures, such as the number of public hearings held on provisional measures, p. 79. In addition, in 2007 the Court introduced the practice of making available on its website the official pleadings of several cases. Again the Court is the first human rights adjudicator doing so in a manner comparable to that of the ICJ.

²⁸⁵ The translation into English of provisional measures that were originally written in Spanish has sometimes been unclear or inaccurate. Moreover, quotations in these provisional measures from earlier decisions on the merits or reparations (and even from provisions of the treaty) often appeared to have been translated anew, rather than copied from the original translation or official text. In spite of a chronic lack of resources some oversight on the accuracy and consistency of translations would be useful. A fully functioning search system of the case law, including the provisional measures, would be the next step.

5 THE AFRICAN HUMAN RIGHTS SYSTEM

5.1 Introduction

An African Court on Human and Peoples' Rights was installed in 2006 with an explicit mandate to order provisional measures. In July 2008 the African Union (AU) adopted a Protocol aimed at the merger of this Court with the Court of Justice. The new African Court of Justice and Human Rights also has the power to order provisional measures. Lacking Court practice this book only refers to the practice of the Commission, whose mandate to use provisional measures is based on its Rules of Procedure.

The African Commission, monitoring compliance with the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights (ACHPR), has used provisional measures to halt executions; to protect against threats and ensure security; to intervene in a detention situation and ensure medical treatment; to halt deportation; to protect indigenous culture; to allow the return of a person to his home country and to allow the return of a body for burial; to intervene on behalf of journalists detained without charge and to release detainees or bring them before a court.

This section discusses the institutional setting of the provisional measures as used in the African system and the right of individual petition, the power to order provisional measures, the promptness in deciding on the use of provisional measures and the availability of information on the use of these measures.

5.2 The right of individual complaint before the African Commission and Court

In 1981 the Organisation African Unity, the predecessor of the AU,²⁸⁶ adopted the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights (ACHPR). This Charter entered into force in 1986. It has 53 States parties (all AU member States). The African Commission, monitoring compliance with its provisions, consists of 11 members. Its Secretariat was inaugurated in June 1989 and is based in Banjul (The Gambia), yet its sessions are often held in other States in Africa.²⁸⁷ Its function is both promotional (Article 45(1)) and protective (Article 45(2)). Under its protective mandate it must 'ensure' the protection of human and peoples' rights. In this context it examines State Reports and individual communications.²⁸⁸ The African Commission has also instituted Special Rapporteurs on prisons and prison conditions; on women's rights; on freedom of expression; on human rights defenders; on extra-judicial, summary or arbitrary executions; on refugees, asylum seekers and internally displaced persons in Africa. Some of these Rapporteurs also apply an urgent action procedure. These urgent actions may relate to persons that have not submitted any ²⁸⁶ Constitutive Act of the African Union, Lomé, Togo, 11 July 2000 (based on the Sirte Declaration of the Organisation of African Unity's Assembly of Heads of State and Government, Fourth Extraordinary Summit, Libya, 9 September 1999). The Constitutive Act entered into force 26 May 2001. The headquarters of the AU are in Addis Ababa (Ethiopia). See generally about Africa and human rights Heyns (2004); Zeleza/McConaughay (2004); Lloyd/Murray (2004), pp. 165-187; Bekker (2004), pp. 293-299; Naldi (1999); Welch (1995); specifically on the African Union and human rights: Murray (2004) and Udombana (2002), pp. 1177-1261. About the role of the African Union's predecessor, the OAU, see e.g. Naldi (2002), pp. 1-35.

²⁸⁷ See Ouguergouz (2003), pp. 505-507.

²⁸⁸ Formally its mandate is to examine State communications and 'other communications'.

complaint before the Commission.²⁸⁹ The interrelation between the Commission's provisional measures and the urgent actions by its Special Rapporteurs has not yet been formally clarified.

The ACHPR also includes a provision on early warning in emergency situations. Under Article 58(3) the Commission should refer cases of emergency to the Chairman of the Assembly of Heads of State and Government. As Ankumah observes, this Assembly had 'a reputation of failing to condemn human rights abuses by African governments'. She speculates about what Idi Amin would have done with a complaint about violations in Uganda in the late 1970s, when he was the Chairman of the Assembly.²⁹⁰

As noted, part of the Commission's mandate is 'protective' (Article 45(2)). Under this mandate it must 'ensure' the protection of human and peoples' rights. The main procedure discussed in the Charter is the inter-State complaint procedure, which has rarely been used (Articles 47-54).²⁹¹ On the basis of the phrase 'communications other than those of States parties' in Article 55 ACHPR the Commission has accepted individual complaints. It accepts complaints by individuals and by NGOs and it does not apply a victim requirement. In this respect the practice developed by the Commission is similar to that of the Inter-American Commission, although for the latter the absence of victim requirement is apparent from Article 44 ACHR.

The procedure is otherwise similar to that of the other adjudicators.²⁹² In the Ogoni case (2002) the African Commission made clear that the 'uniqueness of the African situation and the special qualities of the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights imposes upon the African Commission an important task. International law and human rights must be responsive to African circumstances'.²⁹³

In 1998 the Heads of State and Government of the OAU (now AU) adopted the Protocol to the African Charter establishing an African Court on Human and Peoples' Rights. It has been installed in Arusha, Tanzania and the new judges were sworn in on 2 July 2006. The African Commission or States that have ratified the Protocol can bring cases before the Court (Article 5). In addition the Court can provide Advisory Opinions.²⁹⁴ Direct access to the Court is possible for individuals and NGOs when the State against which they complain has made a declaration to this effect accepting the competence of the Court to receive cases under Article 5(3) Protocol.²⁹⁵ As ²⁸⁹ About the Rapporteurs see e.g. Evans/Murray (2002), pp. 280-304; Harrington (2001), pp. 247-267 and Murray (2000), pp. 22-24.

²⁹⁰ Ankumah (1996), p. 40. See also Murray (2000), pp. 24-25.

²⁹¹ See ACHPR Congo v. Rwanda, Burundi and Uganda, com. nr. 227/99, 15th Annual Activity report 1001-2.

²⁹² See e.g. ACHPR, Information Sheet No. 2 Guidelines of the submission of communications (10 pp.) and No. 3 Communication Procedure (10 pp.). See in general about the case law and proceedings before the Commission Heyns & Killander (2006), pp. 509-543; Murray (2004), pp. 193-204; Flinterman/Ankumah (2004), pp. 171-188; Heyns/Viljoen (2004), pp. 129-143; Mugwanya (2003); Ouguergouz (2003); Udombana (2003a), pp. 1-37; Evans/Murray (2002); Pityana (2002), pp. 219-245; Naldi (2001), pp. 109-118; Nmehielle (2001); Odinkalu (2001), pp. 225-246; Umozurike (2001), pp. 707-712; De Wet (2001), pp. 713-729; Murray (2000); Heyns/Viljoen (1999), pp. 421-445; Umozurike (1997) and Ankumah (1996).

²⁹³ "Clearly, collective rights, environmental rights, and economic and social rights are essential elements of human rights in Africa. The African Commission will apply any of the diverse rights contained in the African Charter. It welcomes this opportunity to make clear that there is no right in the African Charter that cannot be made effective". ACHPR The Social and Economic Rights Action Center and the Center for Economic and Social Rights v. Nigeria (Ogoni case), October 2001, §68.

²⁹⁴ See e.g. Van der Mei (2005b), pp. 27-46.

²⁹⁵ "The Court may entitle relevant Non Governmental organizations (NGOs) with observer status before the Commission, and individuals to institute cases directly before it, in accordance with article 34 (6) of this Protocol". As of 15 October 2007, 24 States had ratified the Protocol on the noted, in July 2008 the AU adopted a Protocol aimed at the merger of this Court with the Court of Justice.²⁹⁶ The Protocol on the African Court of Human and Peoples' Rights will remain in force for a transitional period. The new Protocol does not make provision for direct access to the Court by individuals or NGOs either. Once more they can only bring petitions to the Human Rights Section of the new Court against States that have made a specific declaration to this effect. In addition to State parties and the African Commission the African Committee of Experts on the Rights and Welfare of the Child, African Intergovernmental Organizations accredited to the Union or its organs and African National Human Rights Institutions can also bring petitions (Article 30 of the 2008 Protocol).

As there is not practice so far, the interrelationship between the African Commission and either African Court is not yet clear.²⁹⁷

5.3 Power and promptness in the African system

The African Charter does not contain a specific article on provisional measures, but Rule 111 of the Commission's Rules of Procedure stipulates:

"1. Before making its final views known to the Assembly on the communication [sic], the Commission may inform the State party concerned of its views on the appropriateness of taking provisional measures to avoid irreparable damage being caused to the victim of the alleged violation. In so doing, the Commission shall inform the State party that the expression of its views on the adoption of those provisional measures does not imply a decision on the substance of the communication.

2. The Commission, or when it is not in session, the Chairman, in consultation with other members of the Commission, may indicate to the parties any interim measure, the adoption of which seems desirable in the interest of the parties or the proper conduct of the proceedings before it.

3. In case of urgency when the Commission is not in session, the Chairman in consultation with other members of the Commission, may take any necessary action on behalf of the Commission. As soon as the Commission is again in session, the Chairman shall report to it on any action taken".²⁹⁸

African Court on Human and Peoples' Rights. See the official website of the African Union: <www.africa-union.org>. This source does not indicate which of those States specifically recognised the competence of the Court to receive cases under Article 5(3) Protocol. Some States that have ratified the Protocol had not previously explicitly recognized an individual complaint mechanism, such as the individual complaints procedure under the ICCPR (e.g. Rwanda, Burundi and the Comoros).

²⁹⁶ The Protocol on the Statute of the African Court of Justice and Human Rights was adopted at the 11th African Union (AU) Summit of July 2008. It merges the 1998 Protocol on the African Court of Human and Peoples' Rights and the 2003 Protocol of the African Court of Justice (ratified by 15 AU States).

²⁹⁷ On the creation of the 1998 Protocol and the potential of the African Court on Human and Peoples' Rights (given the text of the Protocol), see e.g. Padilla (2005), pp. 185-194; Van der Mei (2005), pp. 113-129; Ouguergouz (2003), pp. 681-683; Pityana (2003), pp. 110-129; Harrington (2002), pp. 305-334; Udombana (2000), pp. 1-5 and Krisch (1998), pp. 713-726. On the announced institution of a Court of the African Union see e.g. Viljoen/Baimu (2004), pp. 241-267.

²⁹⁸ ACHPR Rules of Procedure of 6 October 1995 (<www.achpr.org>). Previously this was Rule 109, Rules of Procedure, 1 February 1988, see Murray/Evans (2001), p. 161.

Article 27(2) of the Protocol to the African Charter establishing the African Court on Human and Peoples' Rights (1998) stipulates:

"In cases of extreme gravity and urgency, and when necessary to avoid irreparable harm to persons, the Court shall adopt such provisional measures as it deems necessary".

The words 'shall adopt' indicate the importance attached to provisional measures while 'such provisional measures as it deems necessary' refers to the discretion of the Court. It is not yet clear how the complementarity between the Commission and the Court would work out with regard to provisional measures. In the text of the 1998 Protocol there is no arrangement similar to that in Article 63(2) ACHR whereby the Commission requests the Court's provisional measures in cases that can be brought before the Court but at that time are still pending before the Commission.²⁹⁹

Article 35 of the Protocol on the Statute of the African Court of Justice and Human Rights (2008) stipulates:

1. The Court shall have the power, on its own motion or on application by the parties, to indicate, if it considers that circumstances so require any provisional measures which ought to be taken to preserve the respective rights of the parties.
2. Pending the final decision, notice of the provisional measures shall forthwith be given to the parties and the Chairperson of the Commission, who shall inform the Assembly".

It is assumed that the change in phrasing from 'cases of extreme gravity and urgency, and when necessary to avoid irreparable harm to persons', in the 1998 Protocol, to 'if it considers that circumstances so require any provisional measures which ought to be taken to preserve the respective rights of the parties', in the 2008 Protocol, aims at a broader range of situations than just those to prevent irreparable harm to persons, because the provision applies to both the Human Rights Section and to the General Affairs Section.

The text of Article 27(2) of the 1998 Protocol does not rule out the proprio motu use of provisional measures by the African Court and neither does the text of Article 111 of the Commission's Rules of Procedure for provisional measures by the Commission. The text of Article 35 of the 2008 Protocol explicitly refers to proprio motu use.

The available primary sources provide insufficient information on the promptness of the Commission's interventions.³⁰⁰ In light of the lack of resources and other problems at the Commission's secretariat, it may be assumed that promptness in a given case depends also on the resourcefulness of individual Commissioners.³⁰¹

²⁹⁹ See Articles 2 and 8 Protocol to the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights.

³⁰⁰ See section 5.4. Some decisions do provide information relevant as to promptness, see e.g. ACHPR B. v. Kenya, November/December 2004 (inadm.), 2004 AHRLR 67. In this case the request was received on 21 October 2003. The Secretariat prepared a draft appeal to the State (in a case involving judicial independence) and sent it to the chairperson of the Commission on 24 October. The latter replied by e-mail on 28 October, determining that an appeal letter should not be sent until the Commission had examined the matter during the next session in November. In March 2004 the petitioner withdrew the complaint, considering that the State was now addressing the situation.

³⁰¹ While discussing the practice of Special Rapporteurs in the context of the African Commission, Harrington (2001), pp. 247-267 lists several criteria, such as expertise, resources, willingness to devote time and the independence of the Commissioner. These criteria may also play a role in the Commission's use of provisional measures. The 2005 Guidelines excluding senior civil servants and diplomatic representatives from Commission membership, BC/OLC/66/Vol. XVIII will be

5.4 Decisions to use provisional measures: transparency or the lack thereof?

As part of human rights adjudication in the African system provisional measures could help prevent irreparable harm, but thus far they have received little attention.³⁰² Initially it was difficult even to access the decisions on the merits by the African Commission in individual cases, also because the drafters of the Charter had not intended to create easy access.³⁰³ Yet the Commission has now made available on its website its Annual Activity Reports including its decisions in individual cases.³⁰⁴ Moreover, in July 2004 the Centre for Human Rights of the University of Pretoria published the first volume of African Human Rights Law Reports and it has continued these publications since.³⁰⁵

The Commission does not publish information on its use of provisional measures, let alone the texts themselves of the communications sent to the States under Rule 111.³⁰⁶ It has published few press releases, especially in comparison to the Inter-American Commission, and the press releases it did publish, did not relate to provisional measures. Recently the Special Rapporteur on human rights defenders in Africa has published a range of press releases that sometimes refer to ongoing threats and therefore aim at prevention. These may also be indicative of how communications under Rule 111 are formulated.³⁰⁷ Yet this is only the case to the extent that these press releases were prepared by the Secretariat and not by the Rapporteur herself. The Annual Activity Reports or the publication of the University of Pretoria, with the relevant case law, sometimes do helpful to ensure independence, see Heyns/Killander (2006), pp. 524-525. See also Udombana (2003b), pp. 485-488, discussing the lengthy proceedings before the African Commission and the 'absolute necessity' of the power of a human rights tribunal to order provisional measures, p. 488.

³⁰² For a discussion see e.g. Flauss (2005a), pp. 231-239; Ouguergouz (2003), pp. 741-742; Udombana (2003b), pp. 479-532 (discussing various systems, but paying due attention to the African system); Naldi (2002), pp. 1-9, Nmehielle (2001), pp. 232-236 (and pp. 299-301 about the Court); for references see e.g. Murray (2000a), p. 20 (footnote 99) and Ankumah (1996), p. 41 (the rule on provisional measures is an 'effort to give meaning to the provisions guaranteed by the Charter').

³⁰³ Article 59(3) ACHPR stipulates that the Assembly formally adopts the Commission's annual Activity Reports, which include its decisions in individual cases: Article 59(1) "All measures taken within the provisions of the present Chapter shall remain confidential until such a time as the Assembly of Heads of State and Government shall otherwise decide. (2) The report on the activities of the Commission shall be published by its Chairman after it has been considered by the Assembly of Heads of State and Government".

³⁰⁴ See <www.achpr.org>. About openness/ confidentiality and resource limitations see e.g. Murray (2000b), pp. 169-173 and pp. 160-161. See also Ouguergouz (2003), pp. 680-681.

³⁰⁵ The 2004 publication included 97 findings of the African Commission before 31 December 2000. See African Human Rights Law Reports, <www.chr.up.ac.za> (African Human Rights Centre, University of Pretoria). The African Human Rights Centre has since published subsequent African Human Rights Law Reports. Previously the Institute for Human Rights and Development, a pan-African NGO, also published a compilation of the Commission's decisions between 1994 and 1999. Very useful is also the website of the University of Minnesota's African Human Rights Resource Center, which lists the case law of the African Commission alphabetically: <<http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/africa/comcases/allcases.html>>. Another useful internet source is <http://www.chr.up.ac.za/hr_docs/themes/theme02.html>. See further the documents in Heyns (2005) and Murray/Evans (2001).

³⁰⁶ On the lack of transparency see also Julia Harrington (2001), pp. 247-267.

³⁰⁷ See ACHPR Special Rapporteur on human rights defenders in Africa, Adv. Reine Alapini-Gansou, on specific cases of harassment, detention, assassination. E.g. Press release on the harassment of Mr. Jean-Paul Noël Abdi, Djibouti, 16 March 2007.

not refer to (informal) provisional measures while they may have been taken, because the official publication of the decision on the merits or inadmissibility does not always refer to procedural decisions.³⁰⁸ Yet some additional information about the use of provisional measures by the African Commission can be found in press releases by NGOs.³⁰⁹

6 THE EUROPEAN HUMAN RIGHTS SYSTEM

6.1 Introduction

Most provisional measures by the (former) European Commission and by the European Court involve halting expulsion and extradition (Articles 2 and 3 ECHR). There are also a few provisional measures involving direct violation of Articles 3 and 4 by the addressee State (halting executions or intervening in detention situations and intervening in the conditions of 51 asylum seekers in tents in the burning sun, without sanitation in no-man's land between Spain and Morocco). Incidentally the Commission or Court have also used provisional measures in situations varying from ensuring access to court, halting the destruction of an embryo in an IVF case and preserving evidence.

This section discusses the institutional setting of the provisional measures as used in the European system and the right of individual petition, the power to order provisional measures, the promptness of the adjudicator in deciding on the use of provisional measures and the availability of information on the use of these measures.

6.2 The right of individual complaint

The European human rights system is the oldest regional system. It has been instituted under auspices of the Council of Europe. This organisation was inaugurated in 1949. Presently it has 47

³⁰⁸ In earlier, unofficial, versions of the decisions references were sometimes made to provisional measures. This appears to have been the case e.g. in Vera and Orton Chirwa v. Malawi, 1995, §3: "After international protest, the sentences were commuted to life imprisonment. The Chirwas were held in almost complete solitary confinement, given extremely poor food, inadequate medical care, shackled for long periods of time within their cells and prevented from seeing each other for years". See also Degli (on behalf of Corporal N. Bikagni) et al. v. Togo, published in abbreviated undated version, 7th Annual Activity Report and (2000) AHRLR 315 (ACHPR 1994). See e.g. <<http://dcregistry.com/users/ACHPR/index3.html>> (consulted 20 October 2007) for the initial decision of March 1995, §14 ("On 19 September 1994, the Commission, under Rule 109, called on the government of Togo to take the necessary measures to prevent irreparable prejudice to Corporal Bikagni"). Thus, in some cases, given the subject matter, (informal) provisional measures may have been used.

³⁰⁹ See e.g. Minority Rights Group, Statement on the human rights situation of Endorois of Kenya 36th session of the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights (23 November-7 December 2004) and press release, 24 January 2005, <www.minorityrights.org> (accessed on 25 July 2005). In this submission it drew attention to the provisional measures that the Commission had granted during its 35th session on 1 June 2004, urging the government of Kenya 'to take immediate steps to ensure that no further issuance of mining concessions or transfers of parts to the land occurred prior to the case being concluded' in order to prevent irreparable damage to the traditional lands of the Endorois community around the Lake Bogoria region, through government sanctioned mining operations. See further Chapter X (cultural rights).

members.³¹⁰ The Council of Europe has introduced almost 200 treaties, the most important of which is the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). The Convention was concluded in 1950 and entered into force in 1953. The permanent European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) consists of 47 judges, a number equal to the number of Contracting States (Article 20 ECHR). The Court is divided in Chambers of seven judges. The Grand Chamber (seventeen judges) handles important cases referred to it by the Chamber to which a case was initially brought or through a system of internal appeal.³¹¹

The Court only deals with civil and political rights, which have been interpreted to include positive obligations as well.³¹² The range of rights covered is more limited than that of the Inter-American and, especially, the African human rights system, but its individual complaint system is being used to the full. The ECHR 'represents a very distinct form of international instrument and – in many respects – its substance and process of application are more akin to those of national constitutions than to those of 'typical' international treaties'.³¹³

Protocol 11 to the ECHR entered into force in 1998 and introduced a complete overhaul of the European human rights system, predominantly in order to address the ever increasing case-load of the Court. In the original system a European Commission on Human Rights, set up in 1954 and comparable to the Inter-American and African Commissions, initially dealt with cases. It declared them (in)admissible and published reports on the merits (so-called Article 31 reports). The Commission and the State concerned could decide to take the case to the European Court of Human Rights, in existence since 1959. If not, the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe would finally decide on the question whether there had been a violation or not. Sometimes it would take a decision different from that of the Commission. This old system is still relevant because the European Commission often used provisional measures. In this respect it set the stage for the practice of the current permanent Court.

With the entry into force of the 11th Protocol the Commission was abolished.³¹⁴ The Court became permanent and its jurisdiction became compulsory for all States parties to the Convention. The Committee of Ministers now only monitors compliance with the Court's judgments, a ³¹⁰ To understand the broader context of provisional measures taken in the human rights system of the Council of Europe two other regional organisations in Europe must be mentioned that sometimes deal with human rights issues: the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE), a 55 member security organisation (including non-European States), including its High Commissioner on National Minorities, the Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights, the High Commissioner on Freedom of the Media and the Conflict Prevention Centre of the Secretariat of the OSCE, on the one hand, and the European Union on the other hand.

³¹¹ Given the excessive workload of the Court, in 2004 Protocol 14 was accepted to streamline proceedings. It will enter into force upon ratification by Russia.

³¹² See e.g. Mowbray (2004); Van der Velde (2002); Vlemminx (2002); Lawson (1995) and Forder (1992). See further Chapter XIII on the protective measures required. In addition to the rights in the Covenant the following Protocols are in force: Protocol 1 (property, education and elections), Protocol 4 (no imprisonment for debt, freedom of movement; no expulsion of citizens, no collective expulsion of aliens), Protocol 6 (abolition of the death penalty, war time exception possible), Protocol 7 (appeal in criminal cases; procedural safeguards expulsion aliens; compensation for wrongful conviction; no double jeopardy; equality between spouses), Protocol 12 (general prohibition of discrimination) and Protocol 13 (abolition of the death penalty without exceptions). The Council of Europe also introduced the European Social Charter and its Protocols (including a collective complaint system).

³¹³ ECtHR Concurring Opinion Judge Garlicki, §4, ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Öcalan v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 May 2005.

³¹⁴ While the new Court started functioning in November 1998, the Commission continued to exist until the end of October 1999 in order to deal with those cases it had previously declared admissible.

role more suitable for a political body.³¹⁵ While the new Court took over the functions of the Commission, it seems that it does not always have the opportunity to fulfil all of the fact-finding and conciliatory functions previously fulfilled by the Commission.³¹⁶

Article 34 ECHR (right of petition) stipulates protection for the alleged victims in unhindered submission of complaints and participation in the proceedings. Moreover, anyone participating in the proceedings (as petitioners, counsel, witnesses, experts, advisers, etc.) enjoys immunity from legal process in respect of acts before the Court, as well as freedom to correspond with the Court and freedom to travel in order to attend hearings in Strasbourg.³¹⁷

Different from the Inter-American and African system there is a so-called ‘victim requirement’, meaning that for the complaint to be declared admissible the petitioner must in fact allege to be the victim of the violations complained of. This means that the role of NGOs is less prominent than in the other two regional systems.³¹⁸

As noted, one of the main purposes of Protocol 11 was to be able to deal with the steadily increasing caseload, which by 1997 amounted to 4,750. At present, however, the Court is struggling to keep up with an even more staggering stream of applications.³¹⁹ To address the problem of overburdening various proposals have been made, including the introduction of a certiorari system similar to that used by the U.S. Supreme Court. Yet a pick-and-choose approach would not do justice to the petitioner’s right to redress about violations of the ECHR.

If a certiorari system would be introduced, the Court should still address all claims involving risks of irreparable harm to persons. Introduction of a certiorari system that does not take into account urgent cases would constitute an irreparable blow to the protective function of the Court. At the same time when such a system would still address all urgent claims, clarity about the types of cases suitable for the use of provisional measures would then be even more warranted, lest some petitioners would try and infuse an urgent element in a claim that might otherwise be denied.

³¹⁵ On follow-up see Chapter XVIII. In general about the supervisory mechanism applied at the time and the proposed changes see Klerk (1995).

³¹⁶ In 1999 the Office of the Commissioner for Human Rights was established. This Commissioner does not only have a role in the sphere of promoting and facilitating, but is also mandated to identify problems, visit member States and publish reports.

³¹⁷ European Agreement relating to Persons Participating in Proceedings of the European Court of Human Rights (ETS no. 161), adopted 1996, entered into force 1999, 35 State parties as of 3 September 2007.

³¹⁸ Different from the system under the OP to the ICCPR, companies and other non-governmental entities may petition the ECtHR as long as they claim to be victims of a violation against themselves. Obviously NGOs may represent or assist the alleged victims and submit amicus curiae briefs. See further on the role of NGOs Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4 on the beneficiaries of provisional measures. More generally on the law and procedure before the ECtHR (and the old Commission) see e.g. Practice Direction on Institution of Proceedings, 1 November 2003, supplementing Rules 45 and 47 of the Rules of Court, see <www.echr.coe.int>, under ‘Basic texts’, ‘Practice Directions’; Mowbray (2007); Leach (2007); Ovey/White (2006); Van Dijk/Van Hoof/Van Rijn/Zwaak (2006); Van de Lanotte/Haeck (2005); Barkhuysen/Van Emmerik/Rieter (2002/2008); Clements/Mole/Simmons (1999); Van der Velde (1997); Harris/Boyle/Warbrick (1995); Gomien/Harris/Zwaak (1997); Schokkenbroek (1996); Klerk (1995); Cohen-Jonathan (1994), pp. 97-111; Zwart (1994); Lawson/deBlois (1994); Zwaak (1991) and Ergec/Velu (1990), pp. 818-991.

³¹⁹ In 2006 the Court had delivered 1560 judgments and struck out or declared inadmissible 28,160; 89,887 cases were pending, see ECtHR Annual Report 2006, May 2007, p. 115.

6.3 Power and promptness in the European system

6.3.1 Introduction

When the ECHR was drafted in the late 1940s and early 1950s no provision was made for the possibility to take provisional measures.³²⁰ The International Juridical Section of the European Movement had included a provision on such measures in its draft convention of 12 July 1949, but if discussion took place on the issue this is not reflected in the travaux préparatoires. The proposed Article 35 was similar to Article 41 ICJ Statute.³²¹

It was not long after the Convention entered into force, in 1953, that it became clear that if the rights in the Convention were to have practical meaning and if the Convention-bodies were to truly perform their task, these bodies should have the possibility to indicate to the Parties that provisional measures are warranted in a given case.

As early as 1957, the Commission sent an urgent request to the Government of the United Kingdom not to execute Nicolaos Sampson until the Commission had been fully informed of the circumstances of the case. The Commission stated it had decided to make this request in order to prevent “any irreparable act”.³²² This could be called an informal provisional measure, not based on a specific Rule on provisional measures. Yet in two less serious cases, decided in 1958 and 1963, the Commission refused to take provisional measures, considering that the Convention did not give it the competence to order them.³²³

In 1964 it again took informal provisional measures, this time to halt an extradition.³²⁴ In fact since then an informal practice developed in which the Commission requested – and obtained – the cooperation of Governments in urgent cases involving extradition or expulsion.

In 1970 the Acting President of the Commission once more requested a State not to execute persons, in this case any of the 34 suspects in a criminal case in Greece, during the proceedings before the Commission.³²⁵ The executions did not take place.³²⁶ In 1974 the Commission decided ³²⁰ The Convention was signed in Rome, 4 November 1950.

³²¹ See Nørgaard (1994), pp. 278-297 and references therein.

³²² See EComHR Application of the ECHR to the Island of Cyprus (Greece v. United Kingdom), Article 31 report of the Commission, No. 176/56, 26 September 1958, p. 34. This request was respected, see further Chapter III (Executions).

³²³ EComHR X. v. Federal Republic of Germany, 22 March 1958 (“Whereas the Convention does not contain any such obligations binding upon the High Contracting Parties as invoked by the Applicant; whereas, moreover, the Convention does not contain any provision giving the Commission competence to order provisional measures; whereas it therefore appears that the application is in this respect incompatible with the provisions of the Convention; whereas it should, in pursuance of Article 27, paragraph 2, of the Convention, accordingly be rejected”) and X. and Y. v. Belgium, 18 December 1963 (“whereas the fact that the Commission is dealing with a case does not have suspensive effect and the Commission is not empowered to order protective measures (see the decision on the admissibility of Application No. 297/57, Volume II, p. 213); whereas, far from obliging national courts to wait for the Commission to complete its work before they complete theirs, the Convention, in principle, provides for the opposite solution (Article 26) and assigns a mainly subsidiary role to the collective guarantee machinery set up by it”).

³²⁴ EComHR X v. Austria and Yugoslavia, 30 June 1964 (inadm.); provisional measure on 14 February 1964. See also S.B. v. FRG, 19 December 1969 (struck off), provisional measure on 7 January 1965 and 24 April 1965.

³²⁵ See Partial Decision of the Commission as to the admissibility of the application, The Second Greek case, application No. 4448/70, Denmark, Norway and Sweden v. Greece, report of the Commission on the present state of the proceedings, adopted on 5 October 1970, p. 11. Both cases and both requests for provisional measures were brought before the Commission by States, to make official its theretofore informal practice of using provisional measures by including a provision on provisional measures in its Rule 36 of its Rules of Procedure.³²⁷ The Court did so in 1982. Almost all provisional measures taken before the entry into force of Protocol 11 were the Commission's. The old Court did not often deal with provisional measures. Yet its Rules of Procedure did include a rule on provisional measures: Rule 36, which entered into force in January 1983. The President could take provisional measures at the request of one of the parties, the Commission, the petitioner or 'any other person concerned', or proprio motu. Nevertheless, most cases in which provisional measures were used were either solved at the admissibility stage and struck out, or declared inadmissible so that the provisional measure did not apply any longer. Moreover, of those cases in which the Commission did make a decision on the merits, not all were later determined by the Court.³²⁸

Presently the Court's procedure on provisional measures is called 'Rule 39 procedure'. Rule 39 stipulates:

"The Chamber or, where appropriate, its President may, at the request of a party or of any other person concerned, or of its own motion, indicate to the parties any interim measure which it considers should be adopted in the interests of the parties or of the proper conduct of the proceedings before it".³²⁹

On the basis of the wording of the Rule on provisional measures, one may conclude that many circumstances could give rise to a request for provisional measures. As will be seen in the subsequent chapters, however, the Commission and Court have interpreted this provision rather strictly. They have been taken mostly in cases of imminent expulsion or extradition involving prima facie evidence of a real risk of torture, inhuman treatment or life threatening situation in the receiving State.³³⁰ The President of the Section may consult the other members of the seven judge panel constituted for the case in order to decide on the use of provisional measures.³³¹ It has been under the state complaint procedure (Article 24 ECHR (pre-Protocol 11), rather than by individuals under the individual complaint procedure (Article 25 ECHR pre-Protocol 11).

³²⁶ See also Chapter XVIII (Official responses). EComHR Amerktane v. UK (1973) was only submitted to the Commission after the UK authorities had already sent the alleged victim from Gibraltar to Morocco. The petitioners claimed he had subsequently been tortured and sentenced to death. The Commission decided to give priority to the case, possibly because he was still facing execution at the time of submission. No information is available about whether it informally inquired with the UK government about the situation of Amerktane in Morocco, including possible diplomatic interventions on his behalf by the government to prevent his execution. In fact he was executed in January 1973. The case was subsequently settled with his widow. Amekrane v. UK, 11 October 1973 (adm.).

³²⁷ Article 36 ECHR (pre-Protocol 11) stating that the Commission shall draw up its own rules of procedure. It did so on 13 December 1974. In its 1993 Rules of Procedure, Rule 36 was phrased as follows: "The Commission, or when it is not in session, the President may indicate to the parties any interim measure the adoption of which seems desirable in the interest of the parties or the proper conduct of the proceedings before it". Revised version as adopted by the Commission on 12 February and 6 May 1993 and entered into force on 28 June 1993.

³²⁸ The old Court did take provisional measures in Soering v. UK, Vijayanathan & Pusparajah v. France, Chahal v. UK and Ahmed v. Austria. See Chapter V (Non-refoulement).

³²⁹ "2. Notice of these measures shall be given to the Committee of Ministers. 3. The Chamber may request information from the parties on any matter connected with the implementation of any interim measure it has indicated".

³³⁰ Articles 2 and 3 ECHR.

³³¹ See Garry (2001), p. 401, referring to an interview with Judge Pellonpää, Section IV, 16 June 2000.

pointed out by one of the judges of the permanent Court, in reference to the Öcalan case, that the efficiency of decision-making on the use of provisional measures would have been influenced negatively if the judges had not been available on a permanent basis.³³²

When provisional measures were used, the former Commission often decided to give the case precedence as well, according to Rule 33:

“The Commission shall deal with applications in the order in which they really become ready for examination. It may, however, decide to give precedence to a particular application”.

Precedence or priority, however, was not only given simultaneously with provisional measures to prevent irreparable harm, but also in other cases, such as where priority treatment of a case could ensure that petitioners with terminal illnesses could still be informed of the decision on the merits.³³³ Under Rule 41 the current permanent Court can give priority to urgent cases too.³³⁴ It has the policy to do so in cases in which it also decided to order provisional measures, but it does give priority in other cases as well.³³⁵

6.3.2 Inter-State cases

As noted, the UN adjudicators have never dealt with complaints brought by States against other States. Regionally, thus far, only the European system has dealt with a few significant inter-State cases.³³⁶ In two of the very early inter-State cases the European Commission used provisional measures to halt the execution of death sentences.³³⁷

³³² See Thomassen (2008), p. 931. Wilhelmina Thomassen was a member of the Court between 1998 and 2004.

³³³ See e.g. EComHR B. v. France, 12 July 1991 (adm.) (priority decision 19 April 1991). This case subsequently came before the ECtHR on 18 October 1991 as X v. France, undated priority decision; petitioner died 2 February 1992; judgment of 31 March 1992. See also, e.g., EComHR R.M. v. UK, 14 April 1994 (inadm.), priority decision of 21 October 1993.

³³⁴ See e.g. ECtHR Pretty v. UK, 29 April 2002.

³³⁵ Judge Myjer provides a non-exhaustive list that is applied by the Court with some measure of flexibility. The Court considers that ‘cases should be considered as urgent and granted priority under Rule 41’, if: “a. the existing situation which the applicant complains about poses a risk to his life or health; b. there exist other circumstances connected with the applicant’s person, warranting special urgency in dealing with the application; c. the case concerns particularly serious violations of human rights that might require a fact-finding mission; d. Rule 39 was applied in the case”. Other situations referred to include those concerning systemic or endemic problems or cases considered as appropriate for being dealt with as a pilot case, cases where the applicant ‘is in a precarious situation by reason of his or her age or state of health’ or ‘is in detention and there is a prima facie indication attending to the right to liberty and security of a person’. See Myjer (2007), p. 1074.

³³⁶ Recently see the ECtHR’s provisional measures in Georgia v. Russia. ECtHR Press release issued by the Registrar, ‘European Court of Human Rights grants request for interim measures’, 12 August 2008. Both the African and Inter-American Commission have now dealt with an inter-State case as well, but in these cases no provisional measures were used. See ACHPR Congo v. Rwanda, Burundi and Uganda, com. nr. 227/99, 15th Annual Activity report 1001-2 and CIDH Nicaragua v. Costa Rica, 8 March 2007 (inadm.).

³³⁷ See the aforementioned Application of the ECHR to the Island of Cyprus (Greece v. United Kingdom), Article 31 report of the Commission, No. 176/56, 26 September 1958, p. 34 (to halt the execution of Sampson in Cyprus) and Partial Decision of the Commission as to the

6.3.3 Delegation and promptness

In the old system of a non-permanent Commission and Court, the decision-making procedure for when the request for provisional measures arrived at the Commission's Secretariat, the slightly differed depending on whether the Commission was or was not in session at the time. If the Commission was in session, one of its members was instantly appointed as a rapporteur. He would examine the case – a further enquiry might be made by telephone or fax – and present a proposal to the Commission. If the case was 'particularly urgent', he could do this at any time during the session.³³⁸ When the Commission was not in session, the Commission's President or Acting President (the President of either Chamber) dealt with the request.³³⁹ At the Secretariat, the 'lawyer best qualified to deal with it' – given his or her language or legal system – obtained relevant information from the petitioner or his or her lawyer (on the basis of a questionnaire to be filled in by the petitioner or otherwise by completing a check-list on the basis of the available information)³⁴⁰ and, among others, made a brief summary of the case and gave a provisional opinion as to the merits of the request.³⁴¹ This was then discussed with the Secretariat's senior lawyer responsible for all provisional measures. Following this, the senior lawyer, or someone standing in for her, would immediately contact the President or Acting President by telephone. Relevant documents might be sent by fax. As soon as the Commission was again in session, any action undertaken was brought to its attention.³⁴²

Once the decision to apply Rule 36 was made, the Government concerned was contacted immediately, usually by fax, but sometimes also by telephone. When provisional measures were used the respondent Government was usually notified of the petition at the same time and invited to comment on its admissibility and merits. Rule 46 laid down that:

'In any case of urgency, the Secretary of the Commission, may, without prejudice to the taking of any other procedural steps, inform a High Contracting party concerned in an application, by any available means, of the introduction of the application and of a summary of its objects'.

The Secretary did not send this 'communication' to the respondent government, however, when a Commission session was imminent, so that the matter could be discussed by the Commission as a whole.³⁴³ In that case the President or Acting President did not 'communicate' the case, but he did already take the provisional measure.

The promptness of the Commission's earliest – informal – provisional measures varied from more than four months to the same day. Its promptness subsequently varied as well from around eight months to the same day.

admissibility of the application, The Second Greek case (Denmark, Norway and Sweden v. Greece), 5 October 1970, §11 (to halt the execution of Karageorgas).

³³⁸ EComHR Directive concerning the implementation of interim measures pursuant to rule 36 of the Commission's Rules of procedure, January 1997, p. 3, point III, §2.

³³⁹ The President or Acting President could not take a decision on provisional measures where this concerned their own state of citizenship: Directive concerning the implementation of interim measures pursuant to rule 36 of the Commission's Rules of procedure, January 1997, p. 1, point I, §1.

³⁴⁰ EComHR Directive concerning the implementation of interim measures pursuant to rule 36 of the Commission's Rules of procedure, January 1997, p. 2, point II§2.

³⁴¹ Id., p. 1, point I §1.

³⁴² See Rule 34(3) of the Commission's Rules of Procedure.

³⁴³ EComHR Directive concerning the implementation of interim measures pursuant to rule 36 of the Commission's Rules of procedure, January 1997, p. 3, point II §3 sub (b).

Soering v. UK (1989) was the first case in which the Court faced a situation in which it itself was called upon to take provisional measures.³⁴⁴ In this case the Commission had used provisional measures. Subsequently, after the case had been brought before the Court, the President decided to use provisional measures as well. Yet, there was a period of time in which the petitioner was without the protection of provisional measures. This was not problematic in this particular case because the UK, in a good faith application of the Convention, decided not to extradite Soering. Nevertheless, the Court decided to amend its Rules of Procedure so that, unless the President of the Court would decide differently, the Commission's provisional measures would remain applicable when the case was sent to the Court.

Different from the Inter-American system, the former European system did not specifically take into account situations considered urgent by the Commission that were not yet pending before the Court.

Buquicchio-de Boer has noted that the Commission often received requests for provisional measures by fax on Friday afternoons 'just hours before an expulsion'. Some Member States carried out deportations on weekends.³⁴⁵ The permanent Court has a greater chance to deal promptly with requests. Nevertheless, petitioners are informed that requests for provisional measures should be sent during working hours (8am-6pm Monday through Friday), this should not be done outside of working hours 'unless this is absolutely unavoidable'. In addition, petitioners are recommended to already submit their urgent request in advance of the final domestic decision, so as to enable the Court to act as quickly as possible in case a person will be removed soon after the final domestic decision has been given.³⁴⁶

The European Commission would put on hold its normal planning and examine the request as soon as possible. When not in session the President would decide 'in collaboration with a senior member of the Commission's legal Secretariat'.³⁴⁷

Since the entry into force of Protocol 11 petitioners address their requests to the Registry of the Court and the underlying cases are immediately assigned to a Section. The President of the Section in question will decide on the request for provisional measures. Some Presidents consult with other members of their Section. Judge Pellonpää, for instance, would bring the case before the Section for a vote, if he had any doubts and if time permitted him to do so. Often Presidents will at least consult 'a judge familiar with the country at issue (who will give a recommendation on acceptance or refusal of the application with supporting reasons) and its law in addition to analysing documentation provided in the application'.³⁴⁸

In this respect the approach of the HRC is rather different. If the Special Rapporteur has the nationality of the State against which the complaint is made the Secretariat contacts the Chairperson or another member of the Committee to decide on the use of provisional measures.³⁴⁹ It seems that the emphasis of the ECtHR is on acquiring as much information as possible, on the assumption that the national judge would indeed be able to provide inside information. The emphasis of the HRC, on the other hand, is on independence and impartiality.

At times the European Court and its staff have to take a range of actions in order to ensure that the relevant government is informed of the use provisional measures. In the Shamayev case (2005), the petitioners were removed from their cells and the request for provisional measures on behalf of eleven of them in order to prevent their extradition to Russia was received by the Court

³⁴⁴ ECtHR Soering v. UK, Judgment of 7 July 1989.

³⁴⁵ Buquicchio-de Boer (1998), pp. 229-236.

³⁴⁶ ECtHR Practice Direction, Requests for interim measures, 5 March 2003. See further Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk). See also Chapter XVI (Legal status), and XVII (Official responses) on the tendency by some States to make sure petitioners are unable to send a request to the Court.

³⁴⁷ Buquicchio-de Boer (1998), pp. 233-234.

³⁴⁸ Garry (2001), p. 414, referring to an interview of 16 June 2000.

³⁴⁹ See e.g. HRC Lämsman III v. Finland, 17 March 2005.

around 4 PM. At 6 PM the government of Georgia was informed, through its permanent representative in Strasbourg, that the Court had ordered provisional measures. The names of the persons concerned were dictated to the representative of the permanent representation by phone. Given technical problems and failed attempts by the staff to have them resolved, the decision of the Court was formally repeated to the vice-president of justice of Georgia only at 7:45 PM, which could only be confirmed by telecopy at 7:57 PM. Meanwhile, at 7:10 PM the petitioners were extradited.³⁵⁰

6.3.4 Proprio motu

Sometimes petitioners who are not represented by a lawyer are less likely to request provisional measures, but they might, nevertheless, ask for the adjudicator's intervention. This was already the case with the former European Commission, which regarded this as a request for such measures as well.³⁵¹

On occasion the Court has even addressed itself to the petitioner under Rule 39, requesting a halt to a hunger strike. It does so proprio motu, often in response to a request by the petitioner about improvements in detention conditions, a prison transfer etc.³⁵²

Rule 39 stipulates that the relevant Chamber of the ECtHR, or its President, may take provisional measures on its own initiative or on the request of the petitioner. They may also do so on the request of 'any other person concerned'. In this respect the possibilities for NGOs are wider than is generally the case in the European system. Moreover, apart from NGOs, individuals such as witnesses to the human rights violation complained of may approach the ECtHR when they receive threats, requesting provisional measures on their behalf, also if they are not themselves parties to the case.³⁵³

6.4 Decisions to use provisional measures: transparency or the lack thereof?

Most handbooks on the ECHR only refer to provisional measures in passing.³⁵⁴ A few articles have paid specific attention to the practice of the former European Commission on Human Rights and/or the current Court with regard to provisional measures.³⁵⁵ A few articles also refer to statis-³⁵⁰ ECtHR Chamaïev et autres c. Géorgie et Russie, 12 April 2005, §§474-475.

³⁵¹ See: EComHR Directive concerning the implementation of interim measures pursuant to rule 36 of the Commission's Rules of procedure, January 1997 ('(w)here the applicant requests the Commission, expressly or in substance') and Nørgaard (1994), pp. 280-281. See also EComHR Ennslin, Baader and Raspe v. FRG, 8 July 1978 (inadm.), discussed in Chapter XII (Other situations), section 2.10 (preserving evidence).

³⁵² Following the example of the Commission, in 1983 the old Court introduced a reference to addressing the petitioner in its Rule 36. The present Court may do so as well. See also Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4 (beneficiaries).

³⁵³ See also Pasqualucci (2005), p. 36. See Chapter IX on the use of provisional measures to protect against death threats and harassment.

³⁵⁴ Recent handbooks devote more attention to the issue, see e.g. Barkhuysen/Van Emmerik/Rieter (2008), pp. 48-53; Van Dijk/Van Hoof/Van Rijn/Zwaak (2006), pp. 110-119; Leach (2005), pp. 38-42; Vandelanotte/Haack (2005), pp. 435-486 and Barkhuysen/Van Emmerik/Rieter (2002), pp. 39-44.

³⁵⁵ Haack/Burbano Herrera/Zwaak (2008), pp. 41-63; Rieter (2007); Rieter (2006), pp. 736-739; De Salvia (2005), pp. 177-194; Rieter (2005a), pp. 25-44; Rieter (2005b), pp. 320-324; Rieter (2004), pp. 73-87; Rieter (2003a), pp. 1074-1076; Rieter (2003b), pp. 23-27; Spielmann/Spielmann (2000), pp. 1346-1358; Buquicchio-de Boer (1998), pp. 229-236, tics provided by the ECtHR following the entry into force of Protocol 11.³⁵⁶ The Registry of the Court itself has indicated that in 2007 the Court had received ‘approximately 1,060 requests for interim measures and granted 252 of them’.³⁵⁷

The available information on the use of provisional measures by the European Commission is haphazard at most.³⁵⁸ Specific information about decision-making with regard to provisional measures often is only made available when a State did not respect them.³⁵⁹

Following the entry into force of Protocol 11 and Rule 39 the Court’s Registry adapted its practice by automatically registering requests for provisional measures rather than only after the decision is made to accept or reject a request. According to Garry ‘[a]utomatic registration has the Nørgaard (1994), pp. 278-297; Bernhardt (1994a), pp. 95-114; Giardina (1993), pp. 791-802; MacDonald (1992), pp. 703-740; Nørgaard/Krüger (1988), pp. 109-117; Zwart (1985a), pp. 562-571; Rogge (1977), pp. 1569-1570; Eissen (1969), pp. 252-256.

³⁵⁶ See Haeck/Burbano Herrera (2003), pp. 625-676 and Garry (2001), pp. 399-432. There are various articles and case notes specifically discussing Cruz Varas v. Sweden (1991) and Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 4 February 2005 (Grand Chamber), see also Chapter XVI on the legal status of provisional measures.

³⁵⁷ ECtHR Press release issued by the Registrar, ‘Inappropriate use of interim measures procedure’, 21 December 2007.

³⁵⁸ See e.g. Nørgaard/Krüger (1988), pp. 109-117; EComHR Cruz Varas v. Sweden, Report of 7 June 1990 and Buquicchio-de Boer (1998), pp. 229-236.

³⁵⁹ A case in point is EComHR Lynas v. Switzerland, 6 October 1976 (inadm.). In this case the petitioner claimed that the Swiss authorities, in deciding on his extradition to the United States, exposed his life to danger since CIA agents were after him. On the morning of 22 December 1975 the Secretary of the Commission learnt of the application (sent 18 December) and immediately submitted the petitioner’s request ‘for an immediate approach to the Swiss Government’ to the President of the Commission. At 10.45 the Secretary informed the Swiss Government that the application had been lodged. At 12.10 the President of the Commission was contacted. He immediately made an order for provisional measures and decided that the petition should be given precedence. The Federal Justice Division of the Swiss Government was notified by telephone at 12.15. The representative of the Justice Division informed the Secretary that the petitioner had just been taken to a plane, which had not yet taken off; he stated that the Federal Councillor in charge of the Justice and Police Department would be immediately informed of the order made by the President of the Commission. The notification of the order was confirmed the same day (22 December 1975) by a letter from the Secretary. The Commission was subsequently informed that the petitioner had been extradited to the US on 22 December 1975. Another example is EComHR Cruz Varas v. Sweden, 7 June 1991, §§65-70. The President of the European Commission decided to apply Rule 36 on 6 October 1989, 9 AM. Ten minutes later the agent of the Swedish Government was informed by telephone. At noon the Commission confirmed this by telefax. In the meantime the Secretariat of the competent Ministry had been informed (at 9.20 AM). At 12.45 PM the matter was presented to the competent Minister. “However, according to information given by the Government, the Minister could not take any action since the matter had already been decided by the Government and was pending before another authority”. In the meantime the petitioner had requested the National Immigration Board to stay the enforcement of the expulsion. “At that time the Board was aware of the present application to the Commission and of the Commission’s indication under Rule 36”. At 4.40 PM Mr. Cruz Varas was deported to Chile. His wife and son went into hiding in Sweden. That same year Sweden also ignored a provisional measure on behalf of a petitioner who was subsequently deported to Jordan. The agent of the Government had been informed by phone at 4.10 pm. The decision was confirmed by fax on 5.38. Two days later Sweden nevertheless expelled the petitioner. Provisional measure of 19 October 1989 in: Mansi v. Sweden, 9 March 1990 (struck out) and 7 December 1989 (adm.)

effect of making applications available to the public from the very beginning'.³⁶⁰ Indeed such registration would be a prerequisite for making such information available. Nevertheless, this effect seems overstated given the fact that members of the public would have to travel to Strasbourg and indicate which specific case file they would like to consult.

In general, since the entry into force of Protocol 11, memorials and other documents filed with the Court's Registry in principle are accessible to the public (Article 40(2) ECHR).³⁶¹ As noted, potential petitioners and other interested persons have to travel to Strasbourg and should indicate beforehand exactly which documents they need. General requests to look, for instance, at files on cases against one particular State are not granted. This applies equally to requests to consult all files in a given period involving requests for provisional measures by petitioners, or to all decisions to grant such request by the Court.³⁶² In most cases no hearings are held, but if they are held, they are public. Thus far, however, there is no public information on cases in which the Court held such a hearing at the stage of provisional measures.

A brief reference to the use of provisional measures may be found in decisions on the merits and inadmissibility decisions. Decisions not to grant provisional measures generally are not mentioned at all. Case law is available on the internet through the HUDOC search database.³⁶³ Older cases are available to a certain extent, but if necessary, one may make a copy of a particular case from the bound volumes of unpublished cases at the Court's library in Strasbourg. The information on many cases of the former Commission that were struck from the roll can only be consulted in bound volumes at the Registry in Strasbourg.³⁶⁴

Decisions to take provisional measures are not published separately and do not include an explanation. Some cases are pending for a long time. This means that a new practice may develop with regard to provisional measures with which most practitioners, governments and scholars are unfamiliar because most information on the use of provisional measures is only published in judgments on the merits and inadmissibility decisions. The Information Notes prepared by the Court do have an entry on the use of Rule 39 from which some information can be derived on the use of provisional measures in ongoing cases.

For attorneys that take asylum cases only occasionally and for others interested in the developments, information with regard to provisional measures simply is not very accessible. Even for seasoned asylum attorneys who keep each other informed about the Court's use of provisional measures, it would be useful if the Court itself made available this information as most attorneys are not yet in touch with all asylum attorneys in all member States of the Council of Europe.

A helpful development was the publication, in 2003, of a Practice Direction on provisional measures by the President of the Court.³⁶⁵ Moreover, there have been a few cases in which the ³⁶⁰ Garry (2001), p. 414.

³⁶¹ For exceptions see Rules 33(3) en 99(4).

³⁶² "You must give the details of each case you wish to consult. It is not possible to deal with general requests, for example to consult the files of all cases against a particular State or all the files relating to a particular subject". See: Consultation of files, 7 November 2002, <www.echr.coe.int/eng/General.htm> (consulted 22 July 2004).

³⁶³ See <www.echr.coe.int>.

³⁶⁴ The author visited the Secretariat of the European Commission on Human Rights, Strasbourg (13-17 October 1997). She would like to thank Maud Bucchicchio-de Boer, Nico Mol, Agnes van Steijn, Marie-Thérèse Schoepfer, Wolfgang Peukert, Michèle De Salvia, Caroline Ravaux, Wolfgang Larcher, Wolfgang Strasser and Leo Zwaak. She also would like to thank Ties Prakken (counsel in the Öcalan case, Maastricht, interview of 18 March 1999) and the late Henry Schermers (Leyden, interview of 3 March 1998) as well as Yvonne Klerk, Stijn Franken, Jouke Osinga, René Bruin and Mark Jansen who have been helpful in providing information.

³⁶⁵ ECtHR Practice Direction on Interim Measures, 5 March 2003. See <www.echr.coe.int> 'Basic texts', 'Practice Directions'.

Court issued a press release about the (non)-use of provisional measures, but these are exceptional.³⁶⁶

In addition, the cause of transparency was served in two provisional measures directed against the Netherlands involving expulsion to Somalia in 2004, in which the Court gave some explanation of its use of provisional measures.³⁶⁷ It added an explanatory remark to the State in order to stem an increasing number of individual complaints by persons similarly situated.

“The President had regard to the current situation in northern Somalia and in particular to the absence of an effective public authority capable of providing protection to the applicant, who submits that he belongs to a minority and that he has no family or clan ties in northern Somalia. The President further noted that there was no guarantee that the applicant would be admitted to northern Somalia”.³⁶⁸

In the second case it added the following explanation for its use of provisional measures: it had used them ‘in the light of the information currently available concerning the situation of internally displaced persons in Puntland’. The measures would apply until the Court had studied the new Dutch country report on Somalia, on the basis of which the Dutch executive decides on asylum petitions. Depending on the information in this Report the Court would then decide to hold a fact-finding hearing in Strasbourg, hearing experts with personal knowledge about Somalia.³⁶⁹ Subsequently the Court was faced with a flood of cases against the UK involving the situation in Sri Lanka. Here the Court issued a press release providing some reasoning referring to the general situation of risk.³⁷⁰

³⁶⁶ See the first provisional measure in the case Öcalan, press release 4 March 1999 (access to his Turkish counsel) and ECtHR (Section 2) Shamayev and 12 others v. Georgia and Russia, 36378/02, Rieter (2003b). See also ECtHR press release 337 of 30 June 2004 in which the Court referred to a decision of the previous day not to grant the request by lawyers of Saddam Hussein to order the UK not to transfer him to the Iraqi interim government without prior receipt of a declaration that the death penalty would not be imposed. See <www.echr.coe.int/eng/General.htm>.

³⁶⁷ See Rieter (2005a), pp. 25-44. This concerned cases against the Netherlands to prevent expulsion of persons to Somalia. See also Rieter (2006), pp. 736-739.

³⁶⁸ See President ECtHR, Note Verbale with provisional measure, 3 May 2004, in case 15243/04, published in the Dutch journal JV 226 (Jurisprudentie Vreemdelingenrecht). Asylum counsel in the Netherlands make a scan of the Notes Verbales they receive with information about provisional measures directed to the State and make these available at ‘Vluchtweb’ <www.vluchtweb.nl>, a subscription-based website maintained by the Dutch NGO Vluchtelingenwerk (Dutch Council for Refugees). Some information is also freely available at the website of the Vereniging Asieladvocaten en -juristen Nederland, <www.vajn.org> (organization of Dutch asylum lawyers). Moreover, one attorney has made available examples of procedures before the ECtHR, listing several procedures initiated by various attorneys and posting the text of some Notes Verbales with provisional measures, see <<http://www.collet.nu/ehrm.htm>>.

³⁶⁹ Ibid. In the context of these cases members of the Strasbourg staff wrote a brief advisory for Dutch attorneys. See Kempees/Mol/Van Steijn (2004), pp. 299-300. On provisional measures in non-refoulement cases see Chapter V. On the group of beneficiaries see section 4 of Chapter XIII (Protection).

³⁷⁰ ECtHR NA. v. UK, 17 July 2008, §§21-22. In this case the Court’s request fell on deaf ears. The UK refused to halt the deportation of Tamils to Sri Lanka as a general measure and the Court was forced to order provisional measures 342 times. See also Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4.4.2.

In order to strengthen the provisional measures decisions it sends to States, it appears that the ECtHR has, at least since 2006, added references to the fact that ignoring provisional measures could constitute a violation of Article 34 ECHR.³⁷¹

At the end of 2007 the Registrar of the ECtHR also published a Press Release warning petitioners not to submit inappropriate requests for provisional measures.³⁷²

7 THE BOSNIA HUMAN RIGHTS CHAMBER

7.1 Introduction

The Bosnia Human Rights Chamber was introduced in the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina (Dayton Peace Agreement) in 1995, as part of a transitional justice approach.³⁷³ It has ordered provisional measures to halt executions, find a disappeared person, ensure medical examination in detention and improve health conditions in a refugee camp, but most of its provisional measures relate to halting forced evictions. It has also used them to halt exhumation of the body of the petitioner's deceased wife from a Muslim cemetery, to protect religious sites, to secure ballots, to suspend constructions, to safeguard documentary evidence and in the context of legislation.

This section discusses the institutional setting of the provisional measures as they were used by the Bosnia Chamber and the right of individual petition, the power to order provisional measures, its promptness in deciding on the use of provisional measures and the availability of information on the use of these measures.

7.2 The right of individual complaint

In 1995 the State of Bosnia and Herzegovina (State of BiH) had not yet ratified the ECHR. Annex 6 to the Dayton Peace Agreement instituted the Human Rights Commission encompassing the Office of the Ombudsperson and the Human Rights Chamber. The Chamber was a temporary hybrid tribunal for the settlement of disputes about human rights during the first post-war period in the former Yugoslavia. Other relevant initiatives, part of the Dayton Agreement, are the Constitutional Court of BiH, the Commission for Real Property Claims (under Annex 7) and the ombudspersons of the Federation of BiH and Republika Srpska.

³⁷¹ See e.g. ECtHR Ben Khemais v. Italy, 24 February 2009, §18; C.B.Z. v. Italy, 24 March 2009, §13; O. v. Italy, 24 March 2009, §16 as well as several other judgments against Italy published on 24 March 2009. On the violation of Article 34 see the discussion of the case Mamatkulov in Chapter XVI (Legal status).

³⁷² ECtHR Press release issued by the Registrar, 'Inappropriate use of interim measures procedure', 21 December 2007.

³⁷³ General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina, signed and entered into force Paris 14 December 1995, agreed between the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (the "Parties"). See in general, for instance: Küttler (2003), pp. 47-68; Gomien (2001), pp. 763-770; Nowak (2001), pp. 778-780; O'Flaherty (2001), pp. 749-762; Nowak (2000a), pp. 141-208; Nowak (1999a), pp. 285-289; Nowak (1999b), pp. 95-106; Benedek (1999); Gomien (1999), pp. 107-120; Haller (1999), pp. 25-29; Hicks (1999), pp. 127-148; Kälin (1999), pp. 59-66; Leuprecht (1999), pp. 15-18; Neussl (1999), pp. 290-302; O'Flaherty (1999), pp. 6-13; Pajic (1998), pp. 1-12 and Nowak (1997), pp. 174-178.

Several international organisations and institutions played a role in the post-conflict period, including the operation of the Chamber. The Office of the High Representative was created under the Dayton Peace Agreement. The High Representative is at the same time the EU's Special Representative.³⁷⁴ Other existing organisations, such as the OSCE, the Council of Europe, the NATO and the United Nations Mission in BiH (including the International Police Task Force) also play (or have played) a role in the transition process (and economy) in Bosnia.³⁷⁵

The facts complained of should fall within the jurisdiction of the parties to the Annex: the State of Bosnia and Herzegovina (BiH) with its constituent parts: the Federation of BiH and the Republica Srpska.

The Chamber could consider allegations of violations of the ECHR and its Protocols,³⁷⁶ as well as allegations about discrimination under several other international treaties, including the ICCPR (and its two Protocols), ICESCR, ICAT, ICERD and CEDAW, the Geneva Conventions I-IV and Protocols I and II, the Convention on the Reduction of Statelessness and the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities.

The Bosnia Chamber was a hybrid tribunal because it consisted of both international and domestic members applying international norms directly in the national system. Eight of the fourteen members of the Chamber were international members, appointed by the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe. Four members were appointed by the Federation of BiH and two by the Republica Srpska. Michèle Picard (France) was the President. The staff of the Secretariat numbered around 45 in 2002.³⁷⁷ Approximately ten of them were international staff.

The Chamber could also be called an adjudicator sui generis. It was instituted on the basis of an international treaty, at the same time it is considered an institution of the State of BiH, but is not its Constitutional Court: "One must, therefore, assume that it is an institution sui generis with a predominantly international element".³⁷⁸

The Rules of Procedure have largely been inspired by those of the ECtHR and the former Commission, but 'the procedure is less formalistic and contains important differences'.³⁷⁹ There are also separate Rules dealing with particular institutions, for instance, about the relations with the Ombudsperson. The Ombudsperson could submit cases to the Chamber, but petitioners could also directly resort to it without going through the Ombudsperson first.³⁸⁰

In April 2002 the State of BiH became a member of the Council of Europe and ratified the ECHR. In a Press Release of June 2003 Amnesty International emphasized the importance of the Bosnia Chamber. It noted that the 'unique mandate of the Chamber has enabled it to consider issues relating to human rights violations specific to the context of Bosnia-Herzegovina, where discrimination in the enjoyment of many human rights has been widespread and access to justice minimal'. It added: "The continuing and rising number of applications being submitted to the Chamber indicates that for people in Bosnia-Herzegovina, the Chamber is acting as a last and possibly only avenue of justice".³⁸¹

³⁷⁴ See the website of the High Representative: <<http://www.ohr.int/>>.

³⁷⁵ See e.g. Alefsen (1999), pp. 149-154 and Hicks (1999), pp. 127-148.

³⁷⁶ See e.g. Pajic (1999), pp. 33-44 and Mol (1998), pp. 27-69.

³⁷⁷ Bosnia Chamber Annual Report 2002, p. 8.

³⁷⁸ Nowak (1997), p. 176.

³⁷⁹ Ibid.

³⁸⁰ See Title IV. On the relation with the ombudsperson, see e.g. Gelmamez, (1999), pp. 277-329. See also Haller (1999), pp. 25-32. For the website of the current Office of the Ombudsperson see <www.ohro.ba>. In general about the procedure and case law of the Chamber see Küttler (2003); Dakin (2002); Nowak (2001), pp. 771-793; Nowak (2000a), pp. 182-190; Berg (1999); Neussl (1999), pp. 290-302; Aybay (1997), pp. 529-558 and Nowak (1997), pp. 174-178.

³⁸¹ Amnesty International, Press Release, Bosnia-Herzegovina: Abolition of Human Rights Chamber leaves citizens unprotected, 11 June 2003.

Despite these and similar arguments put forward in favour of extending the Chamber's mandate, it was decided not to do so. The mandate of the Chamber expired on 31 December 2003. Those cases received by the Bosnia Chamber on or before that date were dealt with by a Human Rights Commission within the Constitutional Court of BiH in 2004. The Constitutional Court is meant to deal with all human rights cases received after that date.

7.3 The power and promptness of the Bosnia Human Chamber

7.3.1 Introduction

Article X (1) of Annex 6 to the Dayton Peace Agreement provides (in relevant part):

“The Chamber shall have the power to order provisional measures, to appoint experts, and to compel the production of witnesses and evidence”.

Article VIII, 2(f) on the jurisdiction of the Chamber stipulates:

“Applications which entail requests for provisional measures shall be reviewed as a matter of priority in order to determine (1) whether they should be accepted and, if so (2) whether high priority for the scheduling of proceedings on the provisional measures request is warranted”.³⁸²

This means that the authority to take provisional measures was granted in the treaty itself. Rule 36 of the Chamber's own Rules of Procedure then specifies:

- “1. Applications entailing requests for provisional measures shall be reviewed as a matter of priority. The Chamber, or when it is not in session, the President, shall determine in particular whether such applications should be accepted and, if so, whether high priority for the scheduling of proceedings on the provisional measures requested is warranted.
2. The Chamber or, when it is not in session, the President, shall decide whether, in the interest of the parties or the proper conduct of proceedings, any provisional measures should be ordered under Article X para. 1 of the Agreement.
3. The Chamber or, when it is not in session, the President, shall bring any such order to the notice of the party concerned by any available means with a view to ensuring its effective implementation in accordance with the Agreement.
4. Where the President has ordered any provisional measures she or he shall report her or his action to the Chamber under para. 3 of Rule 33”.³⁸³

Article XI, 1(b) of Annex 6 also refers to provisional measures. At first sight this is a strange provision, because it grants the Chamber the power ‘to include an order for provisional measures ³⁸² See also Article XI (Decisions): “1. Following the conclusion of the proceedings, the Chamber shall promptly issue a decision, which shall address: (a) Whether the facts found indicate a breach by the Party concerned of its obligations under this Agreement; and if so (b) what steps shall be taken by the Party to remedy such breach, including orders to cease and desist, monetary relief (including pecuniary and non-pecuniary injuries), and provisional measures”. And Article XII (Rules and Regulations) “The Chamber shall promulgate such rules and regulations, consistent with this Agreement, as may be necessary to carry out its functions, including provisions for preliminary hearings, expedited decisions on provisional measures, decisions by panels of the Chamber, and review of decisions made by any such panels”.

³⁸³ Rule 36 Rules of Procedure of the Human Rights Chamber, Sarajevo, adopted on 13 December 1996.

in its final decision on the merits of a case'. Chapter XIII discusses the relationship between the protective measures required pending the proceedings and as a form of reparation, but in order to indicate a relationship between concepts it is generally useful to distinguish them first. The Chamber seems to have found a way to interpret this provision: "This power might be used to regulate the position of the parties before the decision becomes final and binding, or pending the full implementation of the decision".³⁸⁴ Indeed, pending implementation it may often be useful to follow up on the situation of the victims in order to make sure that nothing happens that could prevent further implementation.³⁸⁵

7.3.2 Delegation

Pursuant to the reference in the Dayton Peace Agreement about priority treatment of requests for provisional measures the Chamber gives precedence to such requests.³⁸⁶ With the reference to the situation when the Chamber is not in session this system also made included a reference to delegation of the authority to take provisional measures from the Chamber to its President, in order to ensure prompt and effective protection. Rule 33, on action by the Chamber in specific cases, specifies in section 3 that the Vice-President may also 'take any necessary action on behalf of the Chamber', if the President is 'prevented from carrying out his duties'. The Vice-Presidents of the two Panels were the next in line to take such action and, in case they were not available, a judge with seniority.³⁸⁷ Whoever took the decision to take provisional measures in between sessions shall inform the full Chamber during the next session.

In urgent cases the Chamber could order provisional measures within one or two days.³⁸⁸ A Handbook drafted by the former Registrar of the Chamber notes:

"In order to enable the secretariat to act quickly on such a request, the applicant's submissions must be as complete as possible. They may initially be sent by facsimile. It is highly advisable not to leave the intervention request to the last minute, as the secretariat has no duty officers processing a request during a weekend or a public holiday".³⁸⁹

Another provision that takes into account promptness is Rule 48, providing that 'in any case of urgency, the Registrar may, without prejudice to the taking of any other procedural steps, inform the respondent Party in an application, by any available means, of the introduction of the application and of a summary of its subject-matter'.

If the Chamber orders provisional measures, it normally immediately transmits the application itself to the respondent Party for 'factual or legal observations to be submitted by that party as a matter of urgency'.³⁹⁰

³⁸⁴ See Bosnia Chamber Annual Report 2000 (under the heading 'provisional measures').

³⁸⁵ The Inter-American Court only considers a case closed once the State has fully implemented it. Before such time it may maintain provisional measures, for instance to protect witnesses. See further Chapter XIV discussing jurisdiction and Chapter XVIII on follow-up.

³⁸⁶ See also Rule 35.

³⁸⁷ See e.g. Rules 9, 10 and 4, Bosnia Chamber Annual Report 1999 and Berg Handbook (1999), p. 9.

³⁸⁸ Response by Peter Kempees, Registrar of the Chamber, 8 March 2001, by e-mail (on file with the author).

³⁸⁹ Berg Handbook (1999), p. 9.

³⁹⁰ See Berg Handbook (1999), p. 10, referring to 'President's Standing Order no. 1'.

7.3.3 Proprio motu use and withdrawal of provisional measures

Rule 36 itself does not refer to the authority to take provisional measures proprio motu, but Rule 33(1) states that the Chamber may, proprio motu or at the request of a party, take any action which it considers expedient or necessary for the proper performance of its duties under the Agreement.³⁹¹

Rule 36(5) stipulates that the Chamber shall withdraw an order for provisional measures whenever it is 'no longer justified'. It is the Chamber as a whole that decides so, 'by formal decision'. In deciding whether or not to maintain provisional measures information provided by other international organisations plays a role, for instance from OSCE officers, officers of the UN International Police Taskforce or the Human Rights Field Operation of the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights.³⁹²

7.3.4 Continuity

To put the Chamber's provisional measures in context it is useful to know that, under Rule 16 of the Rules of Procedure, the Ombudsperson may also take such measures.³⁹³

As noted, upon expiry of the Chamber's mandate, on 31 December 2003, a Human Rights Commission within the Constitutional Court of BiH dealt with those cases received by the Bosnia Chamber on or before that date.³⁹⁴ It could not accept new applications, but in ongoing cases that require provisional measures this Commission, or its President may take provisional measures.³⁹⁵

³⁹¹ The Berg Handbook (1999), p. 10 simply notes that Rule 36 may also be applied on the Chamber's own motion. It then adds that an 'injunction could also be issued against an applicant'. It does not give examples in which the Chamber had done so. It is not clear whether the Chamber formally decided that it could do so, or whether the author of the handbook, legal secretary of the ECtHR and legal officer of the former European Commission, has assumed this based on the fact that the Chamber has taken over many rules and practices of the Strasbourg bodies. In a footnote the Handbook refers to the practice of the former European Commission to recommend petitioners to stop their hunger strike. See further on this issue Chapter XIII, section 4 on the beneficiaries of provisional measures.

³⁹² Berg Handbook (1999), p. 10. OSCE officers also play a role in monitoring compliance with Chamber decisions, including Orders for provisional measures, see e.g. Annual Reports 1999 and 2000 of the Bosnia Chamber, in its overview of cooperation with international institutions in BiH and Periodic Report of the Human Rights Field Operation in the former Yugoslavia of the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, April 1998, §§27-29.

³⁹³ See e.g. the Ombudsperson's Annual Reports, under 'Interim measures'. Between May 1997 and the end of January 1998, for instance, she took provisional measures 59 times. On the ombudsperson see also Raguz (1999), pp. 121-124.

³⁹⁴ As of July 2005 the website of this Commission <<http://www.hrc.ba/commission>> only refers to three members. It refers to two other persons from BiH that must be appointed, while 2(1) of its Rules of Procedure refers to 'the two international members'.

³⁹⁵ See Rule 34 Rules of Procedure Human Rights Commission within the Constitutional Court of BiH, adopted January 2004: "(1) Applications entailing requests for provisional measures shall be reviewed as a matter of priority. The Commission, or when it is not in session, the President, shall determine in particular whether such applications should be accepted and, if so, whether high priority for the scheduling of proceedings on the provisional measures requested is warranted. (2) The Commission or, when it is not in session, the President, shall decide whether, in the interest of the parties or the proper conduct of proceedings, any provisional measures should be ordered under Article X paragraph 1 of the Agreement. (3) The Commission or, when it is not in session, the President, shall bring any such order to the notice of the Party concerned by any available means with a view to ensuring its effective implementation in accordance with the

The Constitutional Court of BiH consists of six citizens of the State of BiH (four selected by the Federation of BiH and two by Republica Srpska) and three international judges appointed by the President of the ECtHR. It started its work in 1997.³⁹⁶

7.4 Decisions to use provisional measures: transparency or the lack thereof?

Like all other human rights adjudicators, apart from the Inter-American Court, the Bosnia Chamber did not publish its provisional measures separately. References to these measures are instead found in the decisions on inadmissibility and merits.³⁹⁷ These decisions refer to all requests for provisional measures, also those it did not grant, making it possible to examine the type of cases in which it does not consider them warranted. Another useful approach by the Chamber was its specific, though brief, discussion of its use of these measures in its Annual Agreement. (4) Where When [sic] the President has ordered any provisional measures he or she shall report her his or heris [sic] action to the Commission under paragraph 3 of Rule 31. (5) Whenever an order for provisional measures is no longer justified, the Commission shall, by a formal decision, withdraw it". See also Rule 33 (on priority) and 31(1) (on action in specific cases).

³⁹⁶ See Rule 78 Rules of Procedure Constitutional Court BiH: (1) The Chamber may, until the adoption of a final decision, upon a request of a party, issue any interim measure it deems necessary in the interest of the parties or the correct conductance of the proceedings before the Court. (2) Exceptionally, the President of the Court may, if it is not possible to convene a session of the Chamber, issue an interim measure such as is referred to in paragraph 1 of this Article. (3) The plenary Court may, on its own motion, issue an interim measure such as is referred to in paragraph 1 of this Article. (4) A decision on an interim measure such as is referred to in paragraph 1 of this Article shall be submitted immediately to the adopter of the challenged act and to the parties to the proceedings. (5) The Chamber or President of the Court, if they find it appropriate, may also decide to forward a decision on a measure such as is referred to in paragraph 1 of this Article to other authorities. (6) The Chamber or the President of the Court shall submit a decision on an interim measure referred to in paragraph 1 of this Article to the plenary Court for information. (7) A decision on an interim measure such as is referred to in paragraph 1 of this Article shall have legal effect, until the plenary Court decides otherwise. (8) The Chamber or the President of the Court may request information from the parties on every issue relating to an interim measure. (9) In the event that an interim measure is no longer justified, the Chamber or the President of the Court shall annul it. (10) Proceedings for the adoption of an interim measure shall be urgent. See also Rule 10 (1) The Chamber shall consist of the President of the Court and two Vice-Presidents from among the judges elected by the competent legislative authorities of the Entities. The President of the Court shall preside over the Chamber. (2) The Chamber shall decide by a majority of votes of the members of the Chamber on the joining or separation of cases and on requests for the adoption of interim measures. The Chamber shall adopt a proposal for a decision on admissibility which shall be submitted to the Grand Chamber or the plenary Court for verification. (3) The Chamber shall submit a decision on an interim measure to the plenary Court for information.

³⁹⁷ Different from the HRC, it is the practice of the Chamber to mention any Orders (and requests for such Orders) in the final decision (Peter Kempees, 12 March 2001, by e-mail (on file with the author). The bound volumes of these decisions are not widely available outside of BiH, but the cases can be accessed on the internet. The Chamber shares its site with that of the human rights commission within the constitutional court of BiH. The site includes a search database with all the decisions of the former Human Rights Chamber see: <<http://www.hrc.ba/>> (last accessed 10 January 2008). This database includes all decisions until July 2003, as well as decisions on admissibility and merits until May 2005.

Reports.³⁹⁸ In the secondary literature only Berg, the legal secretary of the ECtHR and former Registrar of the Human Rights Chamber, devotes some more specific comments to ‘intervention in urgent matters’.³⁹⁹

8 CONCLUSION

8.1 The authority to use provisional measures

8.1.1 Introduction

The Inter-American Court is able to order provisional measures based on the explicit text of the treaty. The same applies to CEDAW and the new African Court, as well as to the former Bosnia Chamber. The Inter-American Commission, African Commission, European Commission and Court, HRC, CAT and CERD have included in their Rules of Procedure the possibility to use provisional measures. Indeed, even if the text of the treaty is not explicit about the authority to use provisional measures in the context of individual complaints, in practice this authority is deemed part of the function of the adjudicator assigned to deal with individual complaints under a given human rights treaty. Apart from CERD, all human rights adjudicators regularly use provisional measures. Just with regard to the inter-State complaint proceedings in the human rights treaties, which have not often been used in any case, the practice of using provisional measures is very limited.⁴⁰⁰

It is submitted that human rights adjudicators have the implied power to use provisional measures.⁴⁰¹ After all human rights adjudication has the function of determining, on the basis of a legal procedure, the obligations of States in a legal conflict with an individual or individuals involving human rights. This function is particularly pressing in the face of threats of irreparable harm to persons.⁴⁰² Provisional measures are necessary in order to prevent such harm pending the proceedings.

If the human rights treaty also includes inter-State proceedings it should be possible to use provisional measures in these proceedings as well. After all, even the ICJ – the obvious inter-State adjudicator – has used provisional measures in the face of irreparable harm to persons.⁴⁰³

³⁹⁸ See especially its Annual Reports 2000, 1999 and 1998 (on average devoting half a page on the issue). These Reports are accessible at the website of the human rights commission within the constitutional court of BiH: <<http://www.hrc.ba/>> (last accessed 10 January 2008).

³⁹⁹ Berg (1999), pp. 8-11. See further Küttler (2003), pp. 70-72; Nowak (2001), p. 777; Gelmamez (1999), pp. 309-310 and Aybay (1997), p. 545. The author would like to thank Jacob Möller (judge in the Bosnia Chamber, Geneva 1998), Therese Nelson and Peter Kempees (staff of the Chamber) for the information they provided.

⁴⁰⁰ See Chapter III (Executions) with two early examples from the European system.

⁴⁰¹ In this respect Pasqualucci (2005), distinguishes between the inherent authority of courts and the implied power of quasi-judicial bodies. In this book, however, the argument is made that all human rights adjudicators (courts and so-called ‘quasi-judicial bodies’) have the implied power to take provisional measures to properly perform their function of addressing individual complaints. Chapter XVI on the legal status of provisional measures further elaborates on this.

⁴⁰² For a discussion of the purpose of provisional measures in human rights cases (in relation to irreparable harm) see conclusion Part II.

⁴⁰³ See Chapter I on the ICJ and provisional measures to protect individuals.

8.1.2 Proprio motu use

The HRC often receives information on the basis of which it concludes that the petitioner is asking for provisional measures. An example is a hand-written note with the text: 'I am going to be executed on 5 March', without a specific request for provisional measures. On the other hand it is not clear whether the HRC could use provisional measures based on information from sources other than the petitioner. Different from the HRC the rules on provisional measures by the Inter-American Commission and Court and the European Court of Human Rights specifically provide for the possibility of proprio motu use of provisional measures.

In a human rights approach the authority to use provisional measures should indeed include the authority to use them proprio motu. Especially in cases in which potential beneficiaries are unable to contact the adjudicator directly, the adjudicator should be able, in light of the purpose of provisional measures, to intervene on its own motion on the basis of other credible information.

8.1.3 Delegation

If a court or other adjudicator only convenes periodically it becomes necessary to delegate the authority to use provisional measures to one member of the court or adjudicatory body. Without this option the usefulness of provisional measures is seriously reduced because they are tardy or even used only after the irreparable harm has already been done.⁴⁰⁴ In other words, without the possibility to delegate the power to use provisional measures these measures will be deprived of their protective function.

Once the HRC started to receive a substantial number of urgent petitions (relating to impending executions) it decided to delegate its authority to use provisional measures to one of its members, who as the Special Rapporteur on New Communications could then deal with these in between sessions. The Committee against Torture waited somewhat longer with taking a similar decision, but has now assigned a Special Rapporteur to deal with these cases as well. In some systems the provisional measures taken in between sessions have a different status and name, for instance 'urgent measures'. The President of the Inter-American Court, upon consultation with other members of the Court, only takes 'urgent measures' and calls for a meeting of the full Court. It is the Court that uses the provisional measures proper. While such approach is interesting, it is not necessary as long as the member to whom the authority has been delegated indeed reports about the use of all provisional measures. Following this, the adjudicator should ratify, expand upon or lift the provisional measure. An obligation to consult other members of the Court or Committee in advance could be useful as well, but this should not be required at the cost of expedience.

8.2 Publication and motivation of provisional measures

In the context of the ICJ's provisional measures it has been argued that, generally speaking, international adjudicators should hold public hearings on the use of provisional measures.⁴⁰⁵ Such hearings may indeed help enhance the persuasive force of provisional measures and play a role in follow-up, because they would offer a formalized forum for dialogue between the parties on this issue. Nevertheless, they are not always practicable and their absence does not significantly diminish the authority of provisional measures that are substantiated and publicly accessible. In practice, however, only the Orders of the Inter-American Court are published and motivated.⁴⁰⁶ In the other systems the use of provisional measures is simply mentioned in the decision on the merits or inadmissibility. The unpublished letters to the parties informing them of decisions about provisional measures normally do not clarify the criteria for their use either.

⁴⁰⁴ See also Pasqualucci (2005), p. 36.

⁴⁰⁵ See the individual opinion of judge Buergenthal in LaGrand (Germany v. US), Judgment of 27 June 2001. See also Addo (1999), pp. 713-732 and Cassel (2002), p. 886.

Most adjudicators do not formally reject requests by petitioners to take provisional or precautionary measures. Thus, it is not possible to systematically trace failed attempts to convince them to take such measures. Systematic references to refusals to use provisional measures are only found in the decisions by the Inter-American Court, the Bosnia Chamber and, to some extent, the Committee against Torture.⁴⁰⁷ This lack of references by the other adjudicators is unfortunate because cases in which the petitioners failed to convince the adjudicators to take provisional measures could give particular insight into their approach to the concept.

Many provisional measures in the European system have been taken in cases that were not published. These cases can only be examined in Strasbourg. This book makes reference mainly to those cases that are easily verifiable. An exception is made for the practice of the HRC because for several years it failed to mention its use of provisional measures in its final decision altogether. Without reference to information derived from the case files the practice discussed would not be representative. Because eventually an opportunity was offered to examine case-files in Geneva on the Committee's practice with regard to provisional measures it was decided to make them more widely available in this book.⁴⁰⁸

It is remarkable that information about the use of urgent appeals by Special Rapporteurs under the non-legal proceedings is more systematically made available, at the latest in their Annual Reports. Often Special Rapporteurs also make use of press releases. The international and regional adjudicators, on the other hand, do not regularly issue press releases and they do not consistently make available information on the particular protective measures required. It could be argued that adjudicators should have even more reason than theme Rapporteurs to motivate and publish their decisions on provisional measures.

This book emphasises the importance of motivation and accessibility of an adjudicator's provisional measures, increasing the authority of the measures used and providing insight in the approach of the adjudicators to the concept.⁴⁰⁹ This transparency and accessibility is all the more important because, as is argued in Chapter XVI, provisional measures are legally binding.⁴¹⁰ This provides more concrete tools to domestic courts as well.⁴¹¹

It might be said that providing a motivation for the use of provisional measures would already anticipate the final determination of the case. Yet in that case it would be the use itself of the measures rather than the motivation that would anticipate the decision on the merits. Motivation only serves to clarify the basis for using provisional measures and to make visible the most important criteria applied by the adjudicator. If this already indicates a certain direction the adju-

⁴⁰⁶ See Rieter (2005a), p. 42. The Inter-American Court is also the only human rights adjudicator that convenes hearings specifically to deal with requests for provisional measures.

⁴⁰⁷ The HRC did not keep record of these requests, meaning that statistical data are not available either. In its Information Notes the ECtHR occasionally also refers to cases in which it refused to take provisional measures.

⁴⁰⁸ This book indicates which information is on file with the author.

⁴⁰⁹ Rieter (2005a), p. 40. See also Rieter (2003), p. 24.

⁴¹⁰ On the importance of motivation in response to the increased status of these measures in the European system in particular, Rieter (2005a), pp. 41-42.

⁴¹¹ For an example see Rieter (2005a), pp. 29-32. The need for motivation of provisional measures in the European system was confirmed in Haeck/VanDeLanotte (2005), pp. 468-469, in which it was noted that the binding nature of provisional measures as well as the need to enable domestic courts to act in the face of failure by the executive both argue in favour of motivating provisional measures. See also Rieter (2006), pp. 736-739.

dicator may take, this is very likely to happen as well if he omits making explicit such a motivation. Adjudicators like the ICJ, with a more general mandate, not only involving human rights, have also motivated their orders for provisional measures. The motivation and publication of the Orders of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights is commendable and States have never complained that this anticipated the eventual decision. In human rights cases involving the risk of irreparable harm to persons the rule of non-anticipation by the adjudicator of the decision on the merits simply means that provisional measures should not dictate the direction of the ultimate determination of the main conflict. This approach is based on the threat of irreparable harm to persons on the one hand and the difference in availability of evidence and time for evaluation of this evidence at different stages of the proceedings. The assessment of the evidence for the purpose of provisional measures should not prejudice the eventual decision. It should be clear, for instance, that the final decision is based on an evaluation of all the available evidence and arguments on the basis of the principle audi alteram partem.⁴¹² After all adjudicators should make available the information to both parties and allow them the opportunity to respond. In fact this principle should apply already pending the proceedings to any follow-up decision with regard to the provisional measures initially taken.

On the other hand, because provisional measures cannot go further in the required protection than an eventual decision on reparations would, they already give an indication on substantive law. This is all the more reason for the adjudicator to motivate its decisions to use provisional measures. If the rationale of provisional measures is explained these measures become more persuasive. Moreover, both the State and the petitioner may be able to provide a more focused response. The provisional measure would be substantiated by referring to the authority to use it, the purpose of preventing irreparable harm to persons⁴¹³ and the applicable articles as well as by noting that the decision is made in light of the urgency of the situation and based on prima facie evidence of an imminent risk of irreparable harm. The adjudicator could also refer to previous decisions on the legal status of provisional measures, indicate the follow-up information required as well as the relevant time limits.⁴¹⁴ For adjudicators that do not yet motivate their use of provisional measures substantiation in this form would not imply an inordinate increase of the workload of the adjudicator and its staff. It would only require one extra page in a Note Verbale or order to the government (sent for information to the petitioners) that could partially be standardised.⁴¹⁵

Accessibility, transparency, coherence and consistency in the use of provisional measures should be increased, among others by making public the decisions and by including reasoning. One of the aims of the research is in fact to assist in this process by collecting, systematizing and analysing the relevant information.

8.3 Convergence or divergence?

The introduction to this chapter noted that the overview was aimed to serve to highlight commonalities as well as differences between the systems. As to the commonalities, the systems are facing ⁴¹² The principle audi alteram partem/audiatur et altera pars (both parties are to be heard in the course of a judicial procedure), may be considered a general principle of law. Cheng (1953) has pointed out that the principle translates into practice 'the fundamental requirement of equality between the parties in judicial proceedings', p. 291.

⁴¹³ This is further discussed in the Conclusion to Part II.

⁴¹⁴ For a discussion of the official responses by addressee States, the legal status of provisional measures and follow-up see the subsequent Chapters.

⁴¹⁵ The Inter-American Court uses such a standardised model, adding the relevant information for the case at issue.

common problems and issues, which may sometimes result in converging interpretations, occasionally consciously (often referred to as ‘dialogue’ or ‘cross-fertilization’), at other times more indirectly.⁴¹⁶ As to the possible divergences in the approaches of the adjudicators with regard to provisional measures these are mainly due to the differences between the systems.⁴¹⁷ These divergences are explored to clarify the use of provisional measures that are situated, as discussed in Chapter XII, on a continuum beyond the common core, but still within the outer limits of the concept.⁴¹⁸

In other words, the differences and commonalities in the systems may help to explain why the respective practices of the adjudicators converge or diverge with regard to the use of provisional measures. Awareness of convergence and divergence may in turn enhance the understanding of the common core and outer limits of the current concept of provisional measures in human rights adjudication.⁴¹⁹ The question also arises whether (regional) context could fully determine the outer limits of the concept of provisional measures in human rights cases or whether there are outer limits beyond which adjudicators cannot go in any system without depriving the concept of independent meaning.⁴²⁰

To the extent information is available, the subsequent chapters examine the divergences and convergences in the approaches of the human rights adjudicators towards provisional measures with regard to the aspects mentioned in the Introduction to this book (the protection required, the relationship with reparation and the (group of) beneficiaries; the relevance of admissibility and jurisdiction on the merits, the assessment of temporal urgency and risk, the legal status, the official responses of addressee States and the follow-up).

Are the international and regional adjudicators moving towards a more uniform approach to the concept of provisional measures? This study aims to identify what, if any, is the underlying ⁴¹⁶ See e.g. Weiser (2004), pp. 116-117 (and references therein): “[T]he human rights domain is especially conducive to international and transnational influences because of the numerous ‘genealogical’ links between national, regional and international human rights standards”. See further Slaughter (2003), pp. 191-219; Slaughter (2000), pp. 1103-1124; Slaughter (1994), pp. 99-135. In general on comparing various human rights systems, see e.g. Buergethal (2005); Cançado Trindade (2004); Udombana (2003b), pp. 479-532; Jayawickrama (2002); Fix-Zamudio (2000), pp. 507-533; Ramcharan (2000), pp. 324-326; Helfer (1999), pp. 285-379; Pool/Mayhew (1999), also referring to the domestic case law made accessible through the NGO Interights; Carozza (1998), pp. 1217-1237 (discussing uses and misuse of comparative law in international human rights, taking the ECtHR as an example); Dulitzky (1997), pp. 33-74; Helfer/Slaughter (1997), pp. 273-391; Sohn (1996), pp. 33-56; Ni Aolain (1995), pp. 101-142; Merrills (1993); Partsch (1989), pp. 1-9 and Cançado Trindade (1987).

⁴¹⁷ As ITLOS pointed out in its Order for provisional measures in the Mox Plant case, ‘the application of international law rules on interpretation of treaties to identical or similar provisions of different treaties may not yield the same results, having regard to, inter alia, differences in the respective contexts, objects and purposes, subsequent practice of parties and travaux préparatoires’. ITLOS the MOX Plant case (Ireland v. UK), Order for provisional measures of 3 December 2001, §51.

⁴¹⁸ In this respect regional systems may set the stage and move forward at a greater pace, possibly to be followed by international adjudicators. See e.g. Van Boven (1995), p. 23: ‘in devising regional (or sub-regional) systems for the promotion and protection of human rights, the following three criteria should duly be taken into account so as to give the regional approach a value additional to the universal approach: (i) its pioneering or innovative character, (ii) the introduction of a higher level of protection, (iii) the fulfilment of clearly established needs of a particular region (or sub-region)’.

⁴¹⁹ It is assumed that the concept is dynamic rather than frozen in time.

⁴²⁰ The latter refers to the ability of the phrase to be used in communication resulting in some form of common understanding.

interpretative approach as to the nature of provisional measures that the human rights adjudicators have in common. As the adjudicators generally do not make explicit the rationale for using provisional measures, an attempt is made to derive it from their judgments on the merits and admissibility. The conclusions drawn with regard to a possible underlying interpretative approach are supported by the fact that this book also examines whether more than one system has used provisional measures in a given circumstance.

As noted in the Introduction, when the underlying approaches of all adjudicators, as well as the specific practice of at least two of them converge, this study speaks of a common core.

It is assumed that if the adjudicators indeed move towards a more uniform approach this will make the provisional measures more persuasive to domestic courts, the executive and the legislator. In addition it presumably is more 'costly' for a State's international image to ignore such provisional measures because of their enhanced legitimacy.

States dealing with supervisory mechanisms under various human rights treaties have sometimes emphasized the importance of coordination. This does not just apply to coordination between the UN treaty bodies,⁴²¹ but also between regional and international human rights adjudicators, as well as human rights and general international adjudicators, such as the ICJ.⁴²² For instance, States have sometimes referred to the case law of the ECtHR implying that CAT or the HRC should follow its example. Even States that are not themselves subject to the jurisdiction of the ECtHR have sometimes argued that the UN bodies should take the same approach as that Court.⁴²³ The Dutch government has tried to justify ignoring a provisional measure by CAT, among others, by pointing to the different case law of the ECtHR.⁴²⁴ The case law of the two petition mechanisms 'differed in terms of the extent to which the burden of proof lay with the State party'. There was a 'clear need' for the international and the European body 'to reach some measure of agreement on their interpretation of the rules, since it was essential for asylum-seekers and European Governments to know the exact limits of the protection provided by international law'.⁴²⁵

As an example of an international law concept on which the approaches of the various adjudicators may differ, this research on provisional measures aims to contribute to the ongoing discussion on the proliferation of international adjudicators and the 'fragmentation' of international ⁴²¹ On this see e.g. Rasmussen, member of CAT, who has argued for additional meeting time. He pointed out that the lack of contact with the UN Special Rapporteur against torture and other UN bodies 'was attributable to time constraints, not to the fact that the Committee did not find such cooperation beneficial'. Summary Records, 34th session, 19 May 2005, CAT/C/SR.662, 2 June 2005, §63.

⁴²² Specifically on the relation between human rights case law and general international law, see e.g. Borgen (2005); Toufayan (2005); Caflisch/Cançado Trindade (2004), pp. 5-62; Oellers-Frahm (2001b), pp. 67-104; Cohen-Jonathan (1999), pp. 767-789; Simma (1995), pp. 153-235; Cançado Trindade (1987) and Sohn (1982), pp. 1-64. See also Kamminga's Final Report on the Impact of International Human Rights Law on General International Law, presented on behalf of the Committee of Human Rights Law and Practice of the International Law Association (ILA), July 2008, made available on SSRN: <<http://ssrn.com/abstract=1150664>> (consulted 5 August 2008); on the role of international and regional adjudicators, including issues such as subsidiarity, judicial activism and restraint, see e.g. Carozza (2003), pp. 38-79; Benvenisti (1999), pp. 843-854; Mahoney (1990), pp. 57-88 and Schachter (1983), pp. 813-821.

⁴²³ See e.g. the remarks by Canada in the context of proceedings before the HRC, CAT and Inter-American Commission (see Chapter XVII (Official responses)).

⁴²⁴ See further Chapter XVI (Legal status).

⁴²⁵ Statement by Mr. Dumoré (Netherlands), Summary Record of the Committee against Torture, 24th meeting, 11 May 2000, CAT/C/SR.426, 13 February 2001, §4, see also Chapter XV on assessment of risk and XVII (Official responses).

law, or in any case the importance of coherence in the application of international law.⁴²⁶ Already in 1971 the ICJ stated: 'an international instrument has to be interpreted and applied within the framework of the entire legal system prevailing at the time of its interpretation'.⁴²⁷

Article 31(3)(c) Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (VCLT) is particularly relevant as an expression of the aim of increasing coherence in the law applied to different subject matters. It reflects the principle of systemic integration, referring to 'any relevant rules of international law applicable in the relations between the parties' as an element that must be taken into account with the context when interpreting a treaty provision. A presumption exists of consistency of the text to be interpreted with general international law, unless this would undermine the object and purpose of the particular system.⁴²⁸

International human rights law may to some extent be seen as a 'regime'. Krasner has explained 'regime' as 'a set of implicit or explicit principles, norms, rules, and decision-making procedures around which actors' expectations converge in a given area of international relations'.⁴²⁹ Indeed, human rights adjudicators, alleged victims, NGOs and States appear to have assumed, even if implicitly, the principle of effective protection to prevent irreparable harm to persons as a fundamental norm around which the human rights system is built. At the same time, in light of the principle of systemic integration, this special 'regime' does not, and should not weaken general international law.

As the purpose of this regime is the protection of human rights, any resort to 'external' general rules, also applicable outside of the regime, is legitimate in any case as long as this is conducive to their protection. Insofar as general international law is truly in the process of humanization,⁴³⁰ resort to international law rules that harm the effective protection of human rights is becoming increasingly less likely. From a systematic perspective it is important for the human rights adjudicators as well to pursue consistency and coherence in the application of general concepts and principles of international law. The Conclusion to this book will return to the issue of consistency and coherence for those instances in which this situation does occur and the object and purpose of the human rights system would in fact be undermined by applying the interpretation advanced by general international adjudicators such as the ICJ.⁴³¹

⁴²⁶ See e.g. ILC, Report of the Study Group, Finalized by Martti Koskenniemi, Fragmentation of international law: difficulties arising from the diversification and expansion of international law, A/CN.4/L.682, 13 April 2006; Conclusions of the ILC Study Group, Fragmentation of international law: difficulties arising from the diversification and expansion of international law, A/CN.4/L.702, 18 July 2006; Wellens/Huesa-Vinaixa (2006); Simma (2004), pp. 845-847; Pauwelyn (2003); Slaughter (2003), pp. 191-219; Higgins (2003), pp. 21-51; Charney (2002), pp. 369-380; Dupuy (2002); Koskenniemi/Leino (2002), pp. 553-579; Reed (2002), pp. 219-237; Buergethal (2001), pp. 267-275; Sands (2001), pp. 527-558; Hafner (2000); speech of ICJ President Guillaume to the UN General Assembly, 27 October 2000; the various contributions in NYU Symposium Issue 'The Proliferation of International Tribunals: Piecing Together the Puzzle', (1999), pp. 679-933; Helfer/Slaughter (1997), pp. 273-391; Charney (1999a); Heyns/Killander (2006), pp. 540-543; Wellens (1994), pp. 3-37; Partsch (1989), pp. 1-9.

⁴²⁷ ICJ Advisory Opinion Legal Consequences for States of the Continued Presence of South Africa in Namibia (South West Africa) notwithstanding Security Council Resolution 276 (1970), 21 June 1971, §53.

⁴²⁸ See Sands (1999), p. 104. The rule invoked must both be relevant and applicable between the parties. The latter means that it must be legally binding (based on customary law, treaty or general principle). For an explicit reference to Article 31(3)(c) see e.g. ICJ Oil Platforms (Iran v. US), 6 November 2003, §41. See further e.g. McLachlan (2005), pp. 279-320; Higgins (2003), pp. 1-20; Pauwelyn (2003); Conforti (2007), pp. 6-18.

⁴²⁹ Krasner (1983), p. 2.

⁴³⁰ See also Chapter I, section 3.4.

⁴³¹ See the suggestion by Sands (1999), p. 104.

The African Commission is explicitly authorized to ‘draw inspiration from’ rules of international law other than those found as such in the ACHPR or to take those ‘into consideration’ (see Articles 60 and 61 ACHPR). The African Court even ‘shall apply’ the provisions of the ACHPR as well as ‘other instruments ratified by the States concerned’ (Article 7 Protocol).⁴³² The older instruments, in particular the ECHR, are not explicit in this respect, but nevertheless cross-fertilization does appear to take place. In some cases even the ECtHR has explicitly referred to the case law of other adjudicators.⁴³³

Obviously it is more difficult to find a common understanding of legal concepts and achieve convergence in interpretation with regard to a large number of States from different regions of the world. Yet if all adjudicators have a similar interpretative approach to certain phenomena and legal texts, this would validate that interpretation for the time being.⁴³⁴ Cross-fertilization can make an interpretation more convincing and more coherent from the perspective of the development of a body of international case law.

The practice that has been developed by human rights adjudicators in the application of the human rights treaties subsequent to their entry into force is relevant when a given treaty is applied domestically, as well as when other international adjudicators invoke the provisions of that treaty. International adjudicators may do so either directly, as the ICJ has done,⁴³⁵ or in order to inform the meaning of the particular treaty they supervise. In both cases they consider the subsequent practice of the relevant treaty bodies as well.⁴³⁶

The drafters of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (VCLT) did not take into account the fact that many modern treaties, such as those aimed at the protection of human rights, have introduced expert bodies interpreting the meaning of the treaty provisions, often even through adjudication of complaints by individuals against States parties.⁴³⁷ Nevertheless, even the text of Article 31(3)(b) VCLT, ‘any subsequent practice in the application of the treaty which establishes the agreement of the parties regarding its interpretation’, does not preclude a dynamic interpretation involving subsequent developments. After all, it may be assumed that States parties ratified human rights treaties, including the supervisory mechanisms, in good faith, meaning that the human rights adjudicators established by these treaties have genuinely been assigned the task of monitoring compliance with and therefore interpret the provisions of the treaty.⁴³⁸ Thus the practice developed by the human rights adjudicators could be said to establish the agreement of the parties regarding their interpretation, exactly because these adjudicators were created under ⁴³² See also Ouguergouz (2003), p. 735.

⁴³³ See e.g. ECtHR Kurt v. Turkey, 25 May 1988 (on disappearances); Issa v. Turkey, 16 November 2004 (on extraterritorial application); and, specifically on provisional measures: Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 4 February 2005 (Grand Chamber). On the latter judgment see also Chapter XVI (Legal status). For overviews of references by domestic (and international) adjudicators to international case law, see e.g. Final and Interim Reports of the Committee on International Human Rights Law and Practice of the International Law Association (ILA) on the impact of findings of the United Nations human rights treaty bodies, 2004 and 2002.

⁴³⁴ As noted, it is assumed that the concept of provisional measures is dynamic rather than frozen in time.

⁴³⁵ See e.g. ICJ Legal consequences of the construction of a wall in the occupied Palestinian territory, Advisory Opinion of 9 July 2004, §§107-113.

⁴³⁶ See e.g. Report of the Committee on International Human Rights Law and Practice of the International Law Association, at the Berlin Conference (2004), pp. 629-630; McCorquodale (2004), pp. 477-504; Herdegen (2004), p. 125; Simma (1995), p. 234.

⁴³⁷ See also Report of the Committee on International Human Rights Law and Practice of the International Law Association, at the Berlin Conference (2004), p. 629.

⁴³⁸ See also Helfer/Slaughter (2005), pp. 3-58.

the treaty in order to interpret it.⁴³⁹ In light of the object and purpose of the human rights treaty, which is not traditionally inter-State, as well as of the individual complaint mechanism included in the treaty, one may conclude that there is no need for the consent of each State party with each and every finding by these adjudicators.⁴⁴⁰ They have agreed to, and signed up for, a 'process' of treaty interpretation by an expert body functioning as an adjudicator in the context of the individual complaint procedure.⁴⁴¹

In 1948 ICJ Judge Alvarez already noted 'that an institution, once established, acquires a life of its own, independent of the elements which have given birth to it, and it must develop, not in accordance with the views of those who created it, but in accordance with the requirements of international life'.⁴⁴² Two years later he pointed out that, because of the 'exigencies of modern life', there is a rapid elaboration of new rules of law, 'effected by means which are different from those of former times'. "The common view that international law must be created solely by States is, therefore, not valid to-day – nor indeed has it ever been".⁴⁴³

⁴³⁹ See also Report of the Committee on International Human Rights Law and Practice of the International Law Association (ILA), at the Berlin Conference (2004), p. 629 and the HRC agreeing with this approach in its draft General Comment 33 (2nd revised version, 18 August 2008), §18 (arguing this in relation to the 'general body of jurisprudence' generated by the HRC and referring to the Berlin Conference report). This position is no longer reflected, though, in the advance unedited version of its General Comment 33, CCPR/C/GC/33, 5 November 2008. See further ILA Committee on International Human Rights Law and Practice Final Report on the Impact of International Human Rights Law on General International Law, July 2008, §3.2, also noting that '(a)lthough the International Court of Justice has not formally endorsed such an approach implicitly it has adopted this course of action, e.g. in its advisory opinion on The Wall in which it closely follows the findings of the UN human rights treaty bodies'. Of course States will sometimes argue that adjudicators overstepped their mark and tried to create rather than interpret the law, which is still an argument that strikes a chord with many. This is a discussion that cannot be avoided. It means in any case that adjudicators must motivate their findings, with a thorough and coherent legal analysis. See also Mahoney (1990), pp. 57-88, arguing, in the context of the practice of the ECtHR, that judicial activism and judicial self-restraint are two sides of the same coin.

⁴⁴⁰ In his discussion of Article 31 VCLT Sorel (2006), pp. 1289-1334, extensively deals with the teleological and dynamic/evolutive interpretation by various adjudicators (e.g. ICJ, ICTY, ECJ, ECtHR) and notes that Article 31 has left behind traditional voluntarism. An argument has also been made that States may be understood to have acquiesced in the role of the supervisory bodies as interpreting the law to such effect that it comes to constitute subsequent practice. See Report of the Committee on International Human Rights Law and Practice of the International Law Association, at the Berlin Conference (2004), p. 629. This may be different only when there is considerable protest by a range of States parties. After all, different from the traditional system of issuing objections to treaty reservations by other States, in this context States would indeed have a self-interest in voicing their disagreement with the interpretation by an international adjudicator, as this may have an impact on their own obligations under the treaty in question. This study does not address the question what is the level and range of such protest and what are its consequences.

⁴⁴¹ On the law as a process approach in general see Higgins (1994), pp. 1-16, esp. p. 8. See further Hey (2003).

⁴⁴² ICJ Conditions of admission of a State to membership in the United Nations (Article 4 of the Charter), Advisory Opinion of 28 May 1958, Individual Opinion Judge Alvarez, p. 68.

⁴⁴³ ICJ Competence of the General Assembly for the admission of a State to the United Nations, Advisory Opinion of 3 March 1950, Dissenting Opinion Judge M. Alvarez, p. 13. He also pointed out that '(i)t would be meaningless to speak of solidarity, interdependence, co-operation, the general interest, human happiness, etc., if States could continue to exercise all their rights freely and without restriction', p. 14. Next to the institutions he referred to in 1948, he now noted that a

Apart from the relevance of the subsequent practice developed by the adjudicators to the interpretation of treaty provisions, ‘judicial decisions’ also constitute ‘subsidiary means for the determination of international law’ (Art 38(1)(d) ICJ Statute). These may be domestic or international judicial decisions. The phrase ‘judicial decisions’ is used, rather than ‘court decisions’. This potentially includes the decisions made in individual cases by treaty monitoring bodies or WTO Panels and Appellate Body. The argument is often made that such decisions are ‘quasi-judicial’, but even if that is the case, what could be argued to be most relevant is the range of States whose obligations are covered by the interpretation, rather than the exact legal status of the findings.⁴⁴⁴ In other words, a decision of a domestic court, which may be binding on one particular State, certainly has less legal authority vis-à-vis other States, than the interpretation by a treaty monitoring body. Nevertheless, the findings by domestic courts and other domestic adjudicators may be used as subsidiary means for the determination of international law. In this vein the decisions of treaty bodies on individual complaints against States could equally, and more suitably, serve as subsidiary means for the determination of this law.

A joint Separate Opinion attached to the ICJ Judgment in Congo v. Rwanda (2006) made some important remarks about the case law of the human rights adjudicators.⁴⁴⁵ It pointed out, among others, that ‘the treaty bodies set up under certain United Nations conventions may well be central to the whole efficacy of those instruments’.⁴⁴⁶ It also drew attention to new trends discernable from the practice of human rights adjudicators, which ‘have not followed ‘the laissez faire’ approach to reservations attributed to the International Court’s Advisory Opinion of 1951’.⁴⁴⁷ Significantly, it pointed out:

“The practice of such bodies is not to be viewed as ‘making an exception’ to the law as determined in 1951 by the International Court; we take the view that it is rather a development to cover what the Court was never asked at that time, and to address new issues that have arisen subsequently”.⁴⁴⁸ treaty itself acquires a life of its own. “Consequently, in interpreting it we must have regard to the exigencies of contemporary life, rather than to the intentions of those who framed it”. ICJ Competence of the General Assembly for the admission of a State to the United Nations, Advisory Opinion of 3 March 1950, Dissenting Opinion Judge M. Alvarez, p. 18. In other words, the ‘interpretation of treaties must not remain immutable’. Ibid.

⁴⁴⁴ On the legal status of provisional measures see Chapter XVI.

⁴⁴⁵ On the case law by the various human rights systems regarding Jurisdiction, admissibility and provisional measures in human rights adjudication see Chapter XIV.

⁴⁴⁶ ICJ Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (new application: 2002) (DRC v. Rwanda), Judgment on jurisdiction of the Court and admissibility of the application of 3 February 2006, Separate Opinion Judges Higgins, Kooijmans, Elaraby, Owada and Simma, §21.

⁴⁴⁷ They referred to the practice of the European Court of Human Rights, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights and the Human Rights Committee supervising the ICCPR, with its General Comment 24.

⁴⁴⁸ Separate Opinion Judges Higgins, Kooijmans, Elaraby, Owada and Simma, §16.

CONCLUSION

Part I provides the basis on which the development of the concept of provisional measures in human rights adjudication is examined.

For conceptual reasons the ICJ's use of provisional measures is relevant to the practice of the human rights adjudicators. The practice of the ICJ is discussed in Chapter I. The chapter found that the practice of the ICJ with regard to provisional measures shows that adjudicators not exclusively dealing with human rights may develop sensitivity for the plight of human beings caught up in conflicts between States. This has also helped develop the concept of provisional measures. In cases involving the fate of human beings the ICJ has ordered provisional measures overlapping to a great extent with the main claim. In other cases, but for the same reason, it has also relaxed the strict requirement that the Applicant State should not only specify the rights invoked in the context of the request for provisional measures, but that these should be related to the main claim as well. The ICJ has further taken into account the basic rights of the individual in its attitude towards procedural requirements for the use of provisional measures. Finally, when the case involves the fate of human beings the Court seems to be more resourceful in drafting Orders for provisional measures different from those requested: it refers to the obligations of both Parties and it adds the obligation not to aggravate the dispute, referring to its task in the maintenance of peace and security.

From the practice of the ICJ three purposes of provisional measures may be perceived to prevent irreparable harm, namely to the claim, to the procedure or to individuals not central to the dispute. The question arises whether this is the case as well in the practice of the human rights adjudicators. This question is addressed in Part II.

The ICJ's finding in LaGrand that its provisional measures were legally binding is not made dependent on the fact that basic rights of the human person were involved, but is simply part of its traditional function. The power to indicate provisional measures was required by the object and purpose of Article 41 ICJ Statute and 'based on the necessity, when the circumstances call for it, to safeguard, and to avoid prejudice to, the rights of the parties as determined by the final judgment of the Court'.¹ The question arises whether the binding nature of provisional measures in human rights adjudication is dependent on the purpose of the specific provisional measures or equally applies across the board, even though the particularly serious nature of the harm to be prevented in some cases may have played a role in the finding provisional measures legally binding. This question is dealt with in Part III.

Finally the practices developed by the human rights adjudicators with regard to provisional measures and discussed in the subsequent Parts in turn are relevant to the ICJ. After all the reference to 'judicial decisions' in Article 38(1)(d) of the ICJ Statute is not limited to ICJ case law alone.

Chapter II of Part I discussed the use of provisional measures by the human rights adjudicators in the context of the right to individual complaint. Human rights adjudicators have the inherent authority to use provisional measures. If the human rights treaty also includes inter-State proceedings it should be possible to use provisional measures in these proceedings as well. As appears already from the practice before the ICJ, States may also institute proceedings (partly) involving human rights violations. Pending these proceedings the ICJ has also granted provisional measures. The authority to use provisional measures includes the authority to use them proprio motu. Especially in cases in which potential beneficiaries are unable to contact the adjudicator directly, the adjudicator should be able to intervene on its own motion on the basis of other credible information. The inherent authority to order provisional measures, based on the principle of effective protection, also implies the possibility of delegation. Without the possibility to delegate the power to use provisional measures to one member of the court or adjudicatory body these measures will be deprived of their protective function. After all, various adjudicators only convene periodically. Generally speaking over time the human rights adjudicators have improved the promptness with which they decide on provisional measures. They have done so indeed partly by introducing a mechanism of delegation and partly because of an improvement in rapid communication methods.

¹ ICJ LaGrand (Germany v. US), Judgment of 27 June 2001, §102.

This book emphasises the importance of motivation and accessibility of an adjudicator's provisional measures. In most systems the transparency of decision-making on provisional measures is insufficient. The availability of information is not very balanced over the different bodies. The Inter-American Court of Human Rights publishes its decisions on provisional measures separately and these decisions are motivated. The other systems, however, offer virtually no explanations on the use of provisional measures. Their use is simply mentioned in the decision on the merits or inadmissibility. The unpublished letters to the parties informing them of decisions about provisional measures normally do not clarify the criteria for their use either. In addition, most adjudicators do not formally reject requests by petitioners to take provisional measures. Thus it is not possible to systematically trace failed attempts to convince them to take such measures. Systematic references to refusals to use provisional measures are only found in the decisions by the Inter-American Court, the Bosnia Chamber and, to some extent, the Committee against Torture. The lack of references by the other adjudicators is unfortunate because cases in which the petitioners failed to convince the adjudicators to take provisional measures could give particular insight into their approach to the concept. Accessibility, transparency, coherence and consistency in the use of provisional measures should be increased, among others by making public the decisions and by including reasoning. One of the aims of this research is to assist in this process by collecting, systematizing and analysing the relevant information.

The current lack of transparency in the practice of most adjudicators made an impact on the methodology used in this book. Given the breadth of systems and subject matters discussed, and as most provisional measures are not published, exhaustive discussion of the practice with regard to all subject matters dealt with by all the adjudicators when using provisional measures is not possible. It is not necessary either since this book takes an illustrative rather than an exhaustive approach. The cases discussed are selected because they are informative about a particular aspect of provisional measures. Typical cases are discussed providing insight into the features of provisional measures that the various systems have in common. Similar cases are also mentioned in which other adjudicators confirmed the approach taken in these typical cases or in which they chose to take a different approach. The book also examines atypical cases (Chapter XI) in order to explore the outer limits of the concept. It makes reference mainly to those cases that are easily verifiable. An exception is made for the practice of the HRC because for several years it failed to mention its use of provisional measures in its final decision altogether. Without reference to information derived from the case files the practice discussed would not be representative. Because eventually an opportunity was offered to examine case files in Geneva on the Committee's practice with regard to provisional measures it was decided to make the information retrieved more widely available in this book.

In the context of requests by petitioners for provisional measures the systems are facing common problems and issues, which may sometimes result in converging interpretations, occasionally consciously (often referred to as 'dialogue' or 'cross-fertilization'), at other times more indirectly. Are the international and regional adjudicators moving towards a more uniform approach to the concept of provisional measures? This study aims to identify what, if any, is the underlying interpretative approach as to the nature of provisional measures that the human rights adjudicators have in common. This is particularly relevant for the assessment of the provisional measures used by an adjudicator while its constituent treaty does not explicitly mention this possibility. As the adjudicators generally do not make explicit the rationale for using provisional measures, an attempt is made to derive it from their judgments on the merits and admissibility. The conclusions drawn with regard to a possible underlying interpretative approach are supported by the fact that this book also examines whether more than one system has used provisional measures in a given circumstance. As noted in the Introduction, when the underlying approaches of all adjudicators, as well as the specific practice of at least two of them converge, this study speaks of a common core.

Awareness of convergence and divergence may enhance the understanding of the common core and outer limits of the current concept of provisional measures in human rights adjudication. As to the possible divergences in the approaches of the adjudicators with regard to provisional measures these are mainly due to the differences between the systems. These divergences are explored to clarify the use of provisional measures that are situated, as discussed in Chapter XII, on a continuum beyond the common core, but still within the outer limits of the concept. The question also arises whether (regional) context could fully determine the outer limits of the concept of provisional measures in human rights cases or whether there are outer limits beyond which adjudicators cannot go in any system without depriving the concept of independent meaning.

It may be more difficult to find a common understanding of legal concepts and achieve convergence in interpretation with regard to a large number of States from different regions of the world. Yet if all adjudicators have a similar interpretative approach to certain phenomena and legal texts, this would validate that interpretation for the time being.² Cross-fertilization can make an interpretation more convincing and more coherent from the perspective of the development of a body of international case law. It is assumed that if the adjudicators indeed move towards a more uniform approach this will make the provisional measures more persuasive to domestic courts, the executive and the legislator. In addition it presumably is more 'costly' for a State's image to ignore such provisional measures because of their enhanced legitimacy.

Article 31(3)(c) Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (VCLT) is particularly relevant as an expression of the aim of increasing coherence in the law applied to different subject matters. It reflects the principle of systemic integration, referring to 'any relevant rules of international law applicable in the relations between the parties' as an element that must be taken into account with the context when interpreting a treaty provision. A presumption exists of consistency of the text to be interpreted with general international law, unless this would undermine the object and purpose of the system.

The practice that has been developed by human rights adjudicators in the application of the human rights treaties subsequent to their entry into force is relevant when a given treaty is applied domestically, as well as when other international adjudicators refer to the provisions of that treaty. International adjudicators may do so either directly, as the ICJ has done in its Wall opinion, or in order to inform the meaning of the particular treaty they supervise. In both cases they consider the subsequent practice of the relevant treaty bodies as well. This is so either as law applicable in the relations between the parties or as the authoritative interpretation of a treaty provision that is conceptually similar, which interpretation could therefore serve as a source of inspiration or even indicate underlying general principles of law or interpretation.

In addition, apart from the relevance of the subsequent practice developed by the adjudicators to the interpretation of treaty provisions, 'judicial decisions' also constitute 'subsidiary means for the determination of international law' (Article 38(1)(d) ICJ Statute). These may be domestic or international judicial decisions. The term ‘judicial decisions’ is used, rather than ‘court decisions’. Judicial decisions potentially include the decisions made in individual cases by treaty monitoring bodies or WTO Panels. The argument is often made that such decisions are ‘quasi-judicial’, but even if that is the case, what could be argued to be most relevant is the range of States whose obligations are covered by the interpretation, rather than the exact legal status of the findings. In other words, a decision of a domestic court, which may be binding on one particular State, certainly has less legal authority vis-à-vis other States, than the interpretation by a treaty monitoring body. Nevertheless, the findings by domestic courts and other domestic adjudicators may be used as subsidiary means for the determination of international law. In this vein the decisions of treaty bodies on individual complaints against States could equally, and more suitably, serve as subsidiary means for the determination of this law.

² As noted, it is assumed that the concept of provisional measures is dynamic rather than frozen in time.

The subsequent Parts discuss the practice of the human rights adjudicators with regard to their use of provisional measures. Further dialogue about the concept within, as well as between the various systems, will undoubtedly enhance the quality and persuasiveness of provisional measures by human rights adjudicators. Meanwhile, for this research ‘information-rich’ cases have been selected in order to gain insight into the concept of provisional measures in human rights adjudication. Some of them relate to situations in which (almost) all human rights adjudicators have used provisional measures, others concern unusual situations.

By abstracting from individual cases and systems the subsequent chapters examine patterns with regard to the various aspects mentioned in the introduction and, if possible, point out best practices. As noted in the Introduction to this book, the latter are based on the following criteria: accessibility, motivation and consistency, responsiveness to the specific situation, consultation and follow-up. These criteria are selected as they are considered either to make provisional measures more convincing to the addressee State or to be necessary for the effectiveness of these measures in protecting the individual.

PART II

PURPOSE

INTRODUCTION

Provisional measures in international human rights adjudication have been referred to as ‘a practical and necessary device for preventing irreversible harm to either party’s case such as the destruction of crucial evidence pertaining to the facts or danger to an individual applicant’s health and well-being (...). They are also important for ensuring that the proceedings of the case are properly handled’.¹ As Cançado Trindade, judge at the Inter-American Court, has pointed out, in human rights law excessive formalism is unwarranted. In the past such formalism has sometimes given the impression that procedure was an end in itself, rather than a means to achieve justice, while in fact provisional measures are judicial guarantees of a preventive character. The concept is evolutive. The transposition of preventive measures from national to international law did not appear to have changed the object of provisional measures, at least not in interstate relations. Yet the most recent transposition from inter-State relations to international human rights law has indeed changed the purpose of provisional measures.²

Part I, discussing the practice of the ICJ and ITLOS (Chapter I) and introducing the human rights systems dealt with in this book (Chapter II), provided the setting for a discussion of the purpose of provisional measures as used by the human rights adjudicators.

The question arises whether the purpose of provisional measures used in the human rights systems differs from the purpose of such measures as applied by the ICJ and ITLOS.

The ICJ has ordered provisional measures also when there would be no irreparable harm to the claim but instead to rights ‘collateral’ to the claim. It may be assumed that adjudicators specifically dealing with human rights may equally take provisional measures in such circumstances. Like the ICJ, the human rights adjudicators have generally invoked the traditional concept of ‘irreparable’ rather than ‘intolerable’ or ‘unendurable’ harm.³ As this Part will show, preventing irreparable harm is in fact the main purpose of the provisional measures by human rights adjudicators, while it is just one of the purposes of provisional measures in general international law.⁴

There is less clarity, however, about the types of situations that would result in such harm. Adjudicators have used provisional measures in a wide variety of situations, generally without specifying their approach to the concept of irreparable harm. One question that arises, for instance, is whether they use provisional measures to prevent irreparable harm to a wide range of human rights (referred to in this book as irreparable harm to the claim), or to prevent irreparable

¹ Garry (2001), p. 404.

² The Inter-American Court now uses this argument, which was introduced by Cançado Trindade, in its Orders for provisional measures, see e.g. Peace Community of San José de Apartadó, Order of 24 November 2000, 12th Considering Clause, following the previous Order of the President in the same case, 9 October 2000, ninth Considering Clause and referring to the Order of the President in the Constitutional Court case (Peru), 7 April 2000, §§10-11.

³ Elkind has pointed out with regard to the provisional measures by the ICJ, that these measures are necessary when the injury is ‘unendurable’ or ‘intolerable,’ rather than ‘irreparable’. The petitioner ‘cannot be expected to put up with it pending the outcome of the dispute’. Elkind (1981), p. 223. See further Chapter I (ICJ). Elkind’s terminology has not been adopted, but in fact it seems incorporated in the concept of irreparable harm as used by the adjudicators.

⁴ See further Chapter I of this book.

harm to a smaller range of human rights intimately related to basic conditions of life in dignity (referred to in this book as irreparable harm to persons).

Most constituent documents or Rules of Procedure for different adjudicators have specified irreparable harm simply as harm to the victim of the alleged violation.⁵ The criterion for the Inter-American Court specifically is to prevent irreparable harm to persons.⁶ This is also the relevant criterion for the Inter-American Commission.⁷ The Protocol to the African Charter, instituting an African Court, applies a similar reference.⁸

The Rules of Procedure of the ECtHR (and the former Commission), on the other hand, do not refer to irreparable harm at all. Instead the Rule on provisional measures is formulated broadly: ‘any interim measure, the adoption of which seems desirable in the interest of the parties or the proper conduct of the proceedings before it’. Rule 111 of the Rules of Procedure of the African Commission has it both ways. In the first paragraph it refers to avoiding ‘irreparable damage being caused to the victim’ and in the second to ‘any interim measures, the adoption of which seems desirable in the interest of the parties or the proper conduct of the proceedings before it’.

While Annex 6 of the Dayton Peace Agreement specifically includes an entry on provisional measures, it gives no indication of their purpose and the text of the Rule on provisional measures in the Chamber’s Rules of Procedure is taken from the Rules of Procedure of the ECtHR. This means that the text does not specify the type of situations in which the Bosnia Chamber is expected to take provisional measures.

On the basis of the wording of the Rules on provisional measures of the ECtHR and the European Commission one may conclude that many circumstances could give rise to their use of provisional measures. In practice, however, both adjudicators have interpreted this provision rather strictly. They have taken provisional measures mostly in cases of imminent expulsion or extradition involving prima facie evidence of a real risk of torture, inhuman treatment or life

⁵ For the HRC the Rule on provisional measures speaks of avoiding ‘irreparable damage to the victim of the alleged violation’ (Rule 92/Rule 86 old). Both Rule 108(1) of CAT’s Rules of Procedure and Article 5 of the Optional Protocol to the Women’s Convention speak of avoiding irreparable damage to the victim or victims of the alleged violations. CERD does so as well, only more circumspectly. Rule 94(3) of CERD’s Rules of Procedure refers to avoiding ‘possible irreparable damage to the person or persons who claim to be victim(s) of the alleged violation’. The African Commission also speaks of avoiding irreparable damage ‘to the victim of the alleged violation’ (Rule 111 Rules of Procedure).

⁶ Article 63(2) ACHR.

⁷ “In serious and urgent cases, and whenever necessary according to the information available, the Commission may, on its own initiative or at the request of a Party, request that the state concerned adopt precautionary measures to prevent irreparable harm to persons”. The significance of the comma, followed by the word ‘and’ is unclear. It may be that the Commission can order precautionary measures both in ‘serious and urgent cases’ and ‘whenever necessary according to the information available’. In any case, the precautionary measures still aim at the prevention of irreparable harm to persons. It is not clear how ‘urgent cases’ are clarified by the addition of ‘and whenever necessary according to the information available’ and by the addition of ‘serious’ nor is it clear whether the Commission intends to extend or restrict the possibility to take precautionary measures. See Rule 25.

⁸ Article 27(2) OP to the ACHPR: “In cases of extreme gravity and urgency, and when necessary to avoid irreparable harm to persons, the Court shall adopt such provisional measures as it deems necessary”. Article 35 of the Protocol on the Statute of the African Court of Justice and Human Rights (2008) does not include this reference, probably because the power to order provisional measures is broader because the provision applies to both the Human Rights Section and to the General Affairs Section.

threatening situation in the receiving State.⁹ Yet it turns out that, based on the same text, the Bosnia Chamber has in addition used provisional measures to halt forced eviction.¹⁰

Chapter II, introducing the human rights systems, pointed out that the Inter-American Court is the only adjudicator that publishes its provisional measures as well as motivates them. In addition, even though the Inter-American Commission does not publish its precautionary measures themselves, it does publish in its Annual Report a yearly overview of its practice in using these measures. Moreover, in its decisions on the merits it adds a brief explanation of its use of precautionary measures. It appears, furthermore, that like the Inter-American Court in its Orders, the Commission does motivate, to some extent, the measures themselves in its Notes Verbales to the Addressee States. Generally the Commission points out in its letter to the petitioner informing it about the precautionary measures taken vis-à-vis the State that it considers necessary the adoption of concrete measures, with an urgent character, in order to protect the life and personal integrity of certain people, often mentioned by name. Sometimes it refers to a particular group of people. Such letter also notes that the precautionary measure is without prejudice to other actions deemed pertinent by the government.¹¹ The Commission considers that all concrete measures ‘need be’ or ‘must be’¹² adopted urgently¹³ in order to protect the personal integrity and the life of the persons mentioned.¹⁴

The other human rights adjudicators neither publish nor motivate their provisional measures. In a few situations the HRC has provided information about its approach towards provisional measures, but generally this must be derived from the context as apparent from its decisions on the merits. The object and purpose of a treaty, the essence of a right and the prevention of irreparable harm are issues that are closely related. Hence when discussing the HRC’s practice with regard to the use of provisional measures it is helpful to refer to its General Comments dealing with the issue of reservations, states of emergency and the meaning of Article 2 ICCPR (general legal obligations). These may help determine which actions or omissions it would consider to cause irreparable harm. The HRC emphasises, for instance, that limitations of rights may in no case ‘be applied or invoked in a manner that would impair the essence of a Covenant right’.¹⁵ In its General Comment on Article 4 ICCPR (states of emergency) it affirmed that Articles 6 (right to life) and 7 (prohibition of torture and cruel treatment) are non-derogable. It pointed out that the inclusion in the Covenant of these rights as rights that could not be derogated from even during emergency situations was recognition of the peremptory nature of these rights.¹⁶ In other words, the Committee qualifies these rights as rules of ius cogens. This statement may also reflect its awareness of the irreparable nature of violations of these rights.

⁹ Articles 2 and 3 ECHR.

¹⁰ See Chapter XI on halting mass expulsion and forced eviction.

¹¹ Information derived from viewing several such letters at the Offices of the NGO CEJIL in Washington, DC (October 2001) and San Jose, Costa Rica (December 2001). Most cases involve a request to the government to protect certain people against threats to their life or physical integrity.

¹² The Commission uses phrases like: ‘que deben adoptarse’ or ‘considera necesaria’.

¹³ The phrase used is ‘con carácter urgente’.

¹⁴ In such cases the Commission also seeks that the government takes timely measures for the immediate investigation of the denounced acts so as to identify and punish those responsible. See further Chapter XIII (Protection and reparation).

¹⁵ See HRC General Comment No. 24 on reservations, 4 November 1994; General Comment No. 29 on states of emergency, 24 July 2001 and General Comment No. 31, ‘The nature of the general legal obligation imposed on States parties to the Covenant’ (on Article 2), 29 March 2004.

¹⁶ HRC General Comment 29 on Article 4 (states of emergency), 31 August 2001, §11.

The following statement gives some indication as to the Committee's approach to the purpose of provisional measures.

"Flouting of the Rule, especially by irreversible measures such as the execution of the alleged victim or his/her deportation from the country undermines the protection of Covenant rights through the Optional Protocol".¹⁷

The statement emphasises the importance of provisional measures for the prevention of actions of an irreversible nature. It is not clear whether the use of the word 'especially' means that the Committee could also use provisional measures in contexts not constituting irreversibility. It is clear, however, that flouting its provisional measures would always undermine the protection, through the Optional Protocol, of Covenant rights and especially in cases in which the provisional measures were intended to halt irreversible measures.

Beyond such specific statements, information about the purpose of the provisional measures by the relevant adjudicators and the precise protection required must be derived from the claims, the findings on the merits¹⁸ and the recommendations for reparation.¹⁹

The HRC has pointed out that provisional measures are essential to the Committee's role under the OP.²⁰ Its general reference to the obligation of States not to frustrate its consideration of a case²¹ may be seen as an obligation not to harm the procedure, but it does not indicate whether this obligation eventually relates to harm to the person or the claim. The reference, on the other hand, to the obligation not to prevent the HRC from expressing its Views²² may be seen as an obligation not to cause irreparable harm to the claim.

In Mamatkulov (2005) the ECtHR pointed out: "Even before the provisions regulating the question of interim measures came into force, the Commission had not hesitated to ask respondent Governments for a stay of execution of measures liable to make the application pending before it devoid of purpose".²³ This statement from the European system equally seems to refer to preventing irreparable harm to the claim.

Part II examines whether in practice the irreparable harm to be prevented is harm to the claim or to persons. Even if irreparable harm to the victim of the alleged violation (the criterion for the international adjudicators and the African Commission) is understood as irreparable harm to persons (the criterion for the Inter-American Commission and Court and the African Court), this in itself does not clarify the types of situations in which the adjudicators would use provisional measures to prevent such harm. Part II discusses those situations in which most human rights adjudicators have used provisional measures on the one hand and those that are specific mainly to one system on the other. It analyses known instances of provisional measures in a variety of situations, examining what type of urgent action the adjudicator has undertaken and, if there is no explicit reference to provisional measures, whether this action may nevertheless amount to such measures. Occasionally, it also refers to situations in which provisional measures would have been feasible or in which petitioners unsuccessfully requested them.²⁴

¹⁷ HRC Dante Piandiong, Jesus Morillos and Archie Bulan v. the Philippines, 19 October 2000, §5.4.

¹⁸ See further section 3 in the Chapters III-XI.

¹⁹ See Chapter XIII (Protection).

²⁰ See e.g. HRC Dante Piandiong et al., 19 October 2000, §5.4.

²¹ Id., §5.2.

²² Id., §5.1.

²³ ECtHR (Grand Chamber) Mamatkulov and Askarov v. Turkey, 4 February 2005, §106.

²⁴ Clearly, decisions by the adjudicators not to use provisional measures could help clarify their approach towards the concept of these measures, in particular their outer limits. Public information about such decisions, however, is rare.

All chapters pay attention to the relationship between provisional measures and the merits of the relevant cases. After all, the question arises whether provisional measures should be taken in cases in which a finding of a violation is unlikely. This does not relate to evidentiary requirements alone, an issue discussed in Chapter XV on assessment of risk, but also to substantive issues. If the adjudicators would never find on the merits that States have obligations under these articles, the purpose of provisional measures could not be preventing irreparable harm to the claim. Their purpose would only be the protection of the right of individual petition as such.

The argument in this book rests on the assumption that provisional measures are taken to prevent a violation from taking place or to stop a continuing violation. Thus, for cases in which provisional measures have been requested, it is important to establish what type of obligations the adjudicators have found on the merits, in order to see whether an order to take provisional measures pending the proceedings may be justified by the case law on the merits. The question must be addressed whether there is an apparent right and whether its violation would result in irreparable harm.

Another assumption in this book is that provisional measures are aimed at ensuring that if the adjudicator would subsequently find that a given act or omission would constitute a violation, the most adequate form of reparation could still be implemented.

The term ‘irreparable’ appears to be the generic term applied in the context of provisional measures. Yet it is argued that a distinction must be made between irreversible harm to the claim (or procedure), on the one hand and irreparable harm to the person(s) involved on the other. The subsequent chapters will clarify this distinction. The destruction of a painting, for instance, is discussed as irreversible harm to the claim of the artist not to have it destroyed.²⁵ The destruction of evidence is discussed as an example of irreversible harm to the procedure.²⁶ Part II argues that in certain cases irreversible harm to the claim in fact would constitute irreparable harm to persons as well.²⁷ Moreover, in some cases irreversible harm to the procedure would equally constitute irreparable harm to persons, albeit to persons other than the petitioner.²⁸ This book will argue that the use of provisional measures to prevent acts that are reversible is beyond the outer limits of the concept of provisional measure, while their use to prevent acts that are not only irreversible, but also irreparable is more likely to fall within the core common to the practice of all human rights adjudicators. Violations of rights causing irreparable harm must be prevented since a return to the status quo ante is impossible after the irreversible has taken place (irreversibility), while the nature of the harm implies that such violations can never be repaired by financial compensation (irreparability).

In order to establish the common core and outer limits of the concept of provisional measures currently applied by human rights adjudicators Part II discusses a selection of cases in which the human rights adjudicators have referred to the use of provisional measures.

Separate chapters are devoted to those situations in which the use of provisional measures by human rights adjudicators seems widespread, or in which their use is at least more than incidental, as long as more than one adjudicator has used them in that situation. Examples of situations in which only one system has used them are all discussed together in one chapter. Yet apart from the practice of the adjudicators with regard to the actual use of provisional measures, their practice with regard to the case law on the merits is deemed relevant as well, in order to establish the underlying rationale that the use of provisional measures may have in common.

In order to clarify the development of the concept, the selection of cases discussed covers the range of human rights claims in the context of which provisional measures are known to have been used or refused. Examples that could have particular relevance to an international context of ²⁵ See Chapter XII, section 2.11.

²⁶ See Chapter XII, section 2.10.

²⁷ See Chapters III-XI.

²⁸ See Chapter IX on protecting against death threats and harassment.

counterterrorism measures are referred to as well. Moreover, cases were selected involving individual as well as collective beneficiaries of provisional measures and State obligations to act as well as to abstain from acting.

Part II starts with Chapter III on provisional measures to halt executions, Chapter IV on provisional measures to halt corporal punishment and Chapter V on provisional measures to halt expulsion or extradition in non-refoulement cases. They show that such measures have been used by all relevant adjudicators, not just in the post 2001 counter-terrorism era but already from the inception of the individual complaint proceedings. Chapters VI (Locating and protecting disappeared persons) and VII (Intervening timely in detention situations involving risks to health and dignity) discuss provisional measures to protect the life and personal integrity of persons in (secret) detention. Again, from the start human rights adjudicators have used provisional measures in such circumstances, but their current relevance is evident as well. A less obvious type of provisional measures, incidentally used by some adjudicators, involves respect for procedural rights such as due process in detention. Chapter VIII discusses this practice and shows that in fact these measures have only been used in cases ultimately aimed at the protection of life and personal integrity.

While Chapters III to VIII all involve the protection of persons that already are under the physical control of government authorities (in some form of detention), Chapter IX deals with the protection of persons that generally are not (yet) detained but whose lives and personal integrity are at risk because of their views, activities or belonging to a particular group. It discusses the practice, firmly established in the Inter-American system, of ordering provisional measures to protect against death threats and harassment. It notes that more recently most other adjudicators have begun to use such provisional measures as well, the ECtHR being the last. This Chapter argues that in the European system this type of provisional measure is indeed warranted as well. Death threats do not just take place outside of the Council of Europe. Certain of the member States of this organisation also fail to protect persons against death threats and harassment. Some governments refer to the 'war on terror' in order to justify labelling human rights defenders, journalists and others as 'enemies of the State'. This makes these people vulnerable to threats and attacks against their lives and physical integrity.

Chapters X and XI discuss provisional measures of a different type. They are different because they partly involve collective rights and because strictly speaking they do not relate to the right to life and personal integrity. Chapter X deals with the practice, established in some systems, of ordering provisional measures for the protection of (indigenous) cultural and religious rights. Chapter XI discusses the (limited) practice, developed in the Americas and by the Bosnia Chamber, to halt mass or arbitrary expulsion and forced eviction.

Chapter XII deals with the continuum between common core and outer limits of the concept of provisional measures by discussing examples of situations in which only one human rights adjudicator has used provisional measures as well as some examples of cases in which adjudicators have explicitly refused to use them.

The last chapter of Part II discusses the relation between the substance of the provisional measures on the one hand (e.g. act or abstention) and the measures or forms of reparation that could possibly be ordered upon an eventual finding of a violation (Chapter XIII) on the other hand. This chapter also discusses some issues with regard to the beneficiaries of provisional measures.²⁹

Based on common elements relevant to the concept of provisional measures in human rights cases, the Conclusion to be found at the end of this Part presents a theoretical framework for the purpose of provisional measures in human rights adjudication. It clarifies the meaning of irreparable harm to the claim, persons or the procedure and indicates which of them is crucial to the use of provisional measures in human rights adjudication.

²⁹ It also briefly refers to the addressees of provisional measures. The official responses of addressee States are discussed in Chapter XVII.

While the conclusions to the individual chapters already take the first step in this respect, the Conclusion to Part II argues more closely what types of provisional measures belong to the common core, what types may be situated somewhere beyond the common core but still within the outer limits and what currently constitute the outer limits of the concept.

It combines theoretical with practical criteria. While the argument is based on what seems to be a common underlying rationale for the use of provisional measures in human rights adjudication, this book qualifies as belonging to the common core those types of provisional measures that not only share the underlying common rationale but are also actually used by more than one adjudicator.

Thus, with regard to the purpose of provisional measures the Conclusion to Part II indeed presents the current common core of the concept as well as its outer limits, applying the criteria of irreversible and irreparable harm.

CHAPTER III

HALTING EXECUTIONS

1 INTRODUCTION

The international and regional human rights adjudicators dealing with a range of human rights have all used provisional measures to halt executions.¹ Even the ICJ, which does not have a specific human rights function, has made use of provisional measures to halt executions.² This chapter discusses the practice of the human rights adjudicators in this regard. The issue of prejudgment discussed in Chapter I (ICJ) is also relevant in the practice of the human rights adjudicators. Provisional measures to halt an execution serve as an example. Thus this chapter deals with the issue of prejudgment as well. The subsequent chapters on provisional measures used in specific situations will not return to this issue as no new aspects are highlighted in the case law regarding those situations.

The question arises whether provisional measures should be taken in cases in which a finding of a violation is unlikely. This does not relate to evidentiary requirements alone,³ but also to substantive issues. As noted in the introduction to Part II, the argument in this book rests on the assumption that there is a link between provisional measures and the possible decision on the merits. In this approach the first question to be dealt with is whether certain conduct would constitute a violation of any of the treaty provisions invoked or at least whether the rights invoked are capable of being interpreted such that a violation could be concluded. If not, this book argues that the use of provisional measures would be inappropriate.

The next question, which is addressed in Chapter XIII, is whether a violation of the rights invoked would result in the impossibility of an appropriate form of reparation. In other words, could such violations constitute irreparable harm? If answered in the affirmative this would warrant the use of provisional measures in order to prevent or halt these violations.⁴

Most of the practice discussed in section 2 is based on provisional measures only mentioned in the decisions on the merits, but not published separately. One reason for discussing decisions on the merits to help explain the use of provisional measures (section 3) thus is the fact that these decisions constitute the only information publicly available. This chapter concludes by discussing available information on the relationship between provisional measures and the decision on the merits.

¹ Even for the specialized treaty bodies (CAT, CEDAW, CERD) an intervention would be feasible in the context of a death sentence based on statements extracted under torture or based on a discriminatory trial.

² ICJ Case concerning the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations (Paraguay v. US), Order of 9 April 1998 (Breard case); LaGrand (Germany v. US), Order of 27 June 2001; Avena and other Mexican Nationals (Mexico v. US), Order of 5 February 2003 and Interpretation Avena, Order of 16 July 2008, as discussed in Chapter I.

³ See Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

⁴ See Chapter XIII (Protection).

2 PRACTICE

2.1 Introduction

Provisional measures to halt executions have been used in all three regional human rights systems, as well as by the HRC.⁵ The European Commission was the first to use them, as discussed under the next heading. The African Commission⁶ and the Bosnia Chamber have used provisional measures to halt executions as well.⁷ The HRC and the Inter-American Commission and Court, finally, have used provisional measures to halt the execution of a great number of persons. While briefly referring to the European system first, this section takes as a point of reference the practices of the HRC and the Inter-American Commission and Court.

2.2 ECHR

The first known example of a provisional measure to halt an execution dates from 1957. The European Commission on Human Rights sent an urgent request to the Government of the United Kingdom not to execute Nicholas Sampson, a twenty-two year old journalist from Cyprus, until it had been fully informed of the circumstances of the case.⁸ Under the provisions of the Emergency Regulations the Nicosia Special Court had sentenced him to death for carrying firearms.⁹

⁵ The other specialized UN conventions (ICAT, CEDAW and ICERD) do not deal specifically with the death penalty.

⁶ See e.g. ACHPR (African Commission) Constitutional Rights Project (in respect of Akamu and Others) v. Nigeria, provisional measure of 22 October 1991; Constitutional Rights Project (in respect of Lekwot and 6 others) v. Nigeria, provisional measure of 16 February 1993; International Pen, Constitutional Rights Project, Interights on behalf of Ken Saro-Wiwa Jr. and Civil Liberties Organisation v. Nigeria, provisional measure somewhere between 2 and 9 November 1995 (secret execution 10 November 1995); Avocats sans Frontières (on behalf of Bwampamye) v. Burundi, provisional measure of 13 December 1999; Interights et al. (on behalf of Mariette Bosch) v. Botswana, provisional measures of 27 March 2001 (execution on 31 March 2001) and Interights (on behalf of Husaini et al.) v. Nigeria, provisional measures of 6 and 8 February 2002 (also sent to the African Union).

⁷ See Bosnia Chamber Sretko Damjanović v. Fed. BiH, provisional measure of 16 December 1996; Nail Rizvanović v. Fed. BiH, provisional measure of 2 September 1997 and Borislav Herak v. Fed. BiH, provisional measure of 10 November 1997.

⁸ See also Chapter II (Systems).

⁹ Earlier he had been found not guilty of the murder of a police sergeant. The previous year the Government of Greece had lodged a complaint against the UK in connection with Cyprus. In the beginning of July the Commission received an urgent letter by Greece pointing out that Sampson's execution appeared imminent. Letter by the Agent of the Greek Government, 1st July 1957, also mentioning that this case has 'deeply stirred the population of the island, which is apparently very anxious and disturbed about the fate of the young journalist'. EComHR Application of the ECHR to the Island of Cyprus (Greece v. UK), 26 September 1958 (Article 31 report), p. 33. It was on that day that the Sub-Commission intervened. During the hearings, in July 1957, President of the Commission drew the attention to this decision. "In addition, the Sub-commission received on 1st July 1957 an urgent letter from the Agent of the Greek Government regarding the case of Nicolas Sampson. This letter gave rise to the Sub-commission's decision of the same day, a Decision which has already been communicated to you. The Sub-Commission desired to be thoroughly informed of the facts of the case". EComHR Application of the ECHR to the Island of Cyprus (Greece v. UK), 26 September 1958 (Article 31 report), p. 37.

The Commission stated it decided to make this request in order to prevent ‘any irreparable act’.¹⁰ The UK did not carry out the execution.

The next time the European Commission intervened to halt an execution was equally in an inter-State case but this time it was to halt an execution by Greece itself. In 1970, during the Greek Colonels’ regime, the Acting President of the Commission requested the State not to execute any of the 34 suspects in a criminal case during the proceedings before the Commission.¹¹ The executions did not take place.

The Convention organs did not have to intervene in death penalty cases anymore until the Court was faced with the case of Öcalan v. Turkey. In 1999 it ordered Turkey not to execute Öcalan during the proceedings before it.¹² At the time this State was the only original member of the Council of Europe that still retained the death penalty. It abolished it in 2002.

2.3 Inter-American Commission and Court

At least since the early 1990s the Inter-American Commission makes use of precautionary measures to halt executions.¹³ An example is its first precautionary measure on behalf of Shaka Sankofa, at the time still called Gary Graham.¹⁴ This is one of the many cases before the Commis-

¹⁰ See EComHR Application of the ECHR to the Island of Cyprus (Greece v. UK), 26 September 1958 (Article 31 report), p. 34 (the death sentence should not be carried out until the Sub-commission had been fully informed as to the facts of the case and had had the opportunity to present its observations). The European Commission did not have a Rule on provisional measures at the time. See generally Chapter XVII on official responses. See also Eissen (1969), p. 254 and p. 258. The death sentence of Nikolaos (or Nikos) Sampson was commuted to a life sentence, to be served in the UK. Later he received amnesty and when Cyprus gained formal independence from the UK in 1960, he returned. In 1974 he was installed as President of Cyprus by a coup d’état staged by Greek-Cypriot nationalists and remained so for eight days, until the Turkish invasion of Northern Cyprus. He was sentenced to a prison term, which for medical reasons he was allowed to serve in France (Encyclopedia Britannica 2001). He did not serve this sentence and upon return to Cyprus in 1990 he was briefly detained. In March 1992 he brought a case before the European Commission for a violation of Article 5 ECHR: Sampson v. Cyprus, 9 May 1994 (inadm.).

¹¹ On 8 April 1970 the public Prosecutor requested the death penalty for Karageorgas. The European Commission used informal provisional measures on 11 April, requesting Greece to suspend the execution of the death sentences against the thirty-four accused persons. On 12 April the domestic court sentenced Karageorgas to life imprisonment. See Partial Decision of the Commission as to the admissibility of the application, The Second Greek case (Denmark, Norway and Sweden v. Greece), 5 October 1970, §11. Both cases and both requests for provisional measures were brought before the Commission by States, under the State complaint procedure (former Article 24 ECHR), rather than by individuals under the individual complaint procedure (former Article 25 ECHR).

¹² ECtHR Öcalan v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 May 2005 (second provisional measure of 30 November 1999 in order to stay the execution (first provisional measure: access to his Turkish counsel, see press release 4 March 1999).

¹³ As discussed in Chapter II the Inter-American Commission’s provisional measures are called ‘precautionary measures’.

¹⁴ CIDH Gary T. Graham, now known as Shaka Sankofa v. US, 15 June 2000 (adm.). The initial petition was of 26 April 1993 by the International Human Rights Law Clinic at the Washington College of Law, American University. The state of Texas had first scheduled him to be executed on 29 April 1993. On 27 April 1993 the Commission sent a note to the Governor of Texas requesting a stay. His execution was subsequently stayed ‘as a consequence of various domestic sion involving the US death penalty. It was a case involving juvenile death penalty and a credible claim of innocence. In October 1993 the Commission took precautionary measures noting that the beneficiary was 17 years old at the time of the offence for which he was sentenced to death, that his case ‘dealt with the most important right, the right to life, and a mistake on the part of the authorities could result in irreparable harm’.¹⁵

In October 2004 the US Supreme Court decided that the Constitution did not allow the execution of offenders who were below the age of 18 when their crimes were committed.¹⁶ Until that time the Inter-American Commission had continued to take precautionary measures to halt the execution of juvenile offenders. In February 2002, for instance, it did so on behalf of Alexander Williams whose execution by the State of Georgia was scheduled for the next day. It alleged that the execution of a person who was below the age of eighteen when he committed the offence would violate his right to life under Article I of the American Declaration. Moreover, it would also violate fundamental norms of customary law.¹⁷

Another case involving the US relates to the federal death penalty. In Garza the Inter-American Commission took precautionary measures and in its admissibility decision (2001) it held that the failure of an OAS Member State ‘to take steps to preserve a condemned man’s life while his case was being reviewed by the Commission was inconsistent with the state’s basic human rights obligations’.¹⁸ It also took precautionary measures on behalf of Victor Saldaño, an Argentine citizen sentenced to death in Texas. His Hispanic background had been taken into account in determining ‘future dangerousness’.¹⁹ Despite the fact that the US generally does not respect the Commission’s precautionary measures, many individuals and NGOs in the US con-legal proceedings’. His first new execution date had been set for 3 June 1993. On 1 June the Commission again requested the Governor to stay his execution. The Commission formally opened his case on 3 August 1993 and transmitted the pertinent parts of the petition to the State. On the same day it requested the Governor of Texas once more to suspend the execution. During a hearing on 4 October the petitioners requested the Commission to take precautionary measures pursuant to Article 29(2) of its Regulations. This may lead to the conclusion that the petitioners (and the Commission itself) considered the notes the Commission sent before only as informal precautionary measures.

¹⁵ CIDH Gary T. Graham, now known as Shaka Sankofa v. US, 15 June 2000 (adm.), §15. He was executed on 22 June 2000.

¹⁶ US Supreme Court, Roper v. Simmons, 543 U.S. 551 (2005). This ruling affected 72 juvenile offenders in 12 US states. Between 1985 and 2003 Texas executed 13 juvenile offenders, Virginia 3 and Oklahoma 2. South Carolina, Florida, Georgia and Missouri each executed one person who was below 18 at the time of the offence.

¹⁷ Several days after it received the initial petition, on 6 December 2000, the Commission issued precautionary measures for the first time in order to investigate his claim. It reiterated these on 15 February 2002 and again on 19 February, the day before the scheduled execution.

¹⁸ CIDH Juan Raúl Garza v. US, 4 April 2001 (adm.).

¹⁹ On 5 June 2000 the US Supreme Court revoked his death sentence and returned his case to the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals. By letter of 10 November 2000 the US informed the Commission that it had received information from the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals about a public hearing that would be held on 30 December 2000, later postponed until 8 February 2001, Annual Report 2000, §50. This Court has since affirmed his death sentence finding that, among others, the confession of error by the prosecutor in his case, in admitting expert testimony at the sentencing face that race or ethnicity was a factor in determining future dangerousness, did not permit it on remand to consider the admissibility of that testimony as the defendant should have objected against the use of this expert testimony at trial, Saldaño v. State, 70 S.W. 3d 873 (Tex. Crim. App. 2002) (13 March 2002).

tinue to resort to it.²⁰ It is the only international adjudicator that examines complaints against the US.²¹

The Commission has dealt with many death penalty cases, mainly from the United States and Trinidad and Tobago, but also with regard to Guatemala, Jamaica, Grenada and the Bahamas. Of the Caribbean States, Jamaica and Trinidad and Tobago are the most notable. The Commission has requested a stay of execution in many cases 'so that it could investigate thoroughly the charges made in connection with the case and the presumed violation' of their fundamental rights.²² It has also formulated the rationale for the use of the precautionary measures by stating that executing petitioners before the Commission has been able to examine their claims would cause irreparable harm.²³

Apart from Guatemala and Barbados, and initially Trinidad and Tobago, none of the death penalty States in the Americas have recognised the jurisdiction of the Inter-American Court. In 1998 the Court ordered provisional measures for the first time in order to halt executions on behalf of several persons from Trinidad and Tobago, whose cases were pending before the Commission.²⁴ Trinidad had recognised the Court's jurisdiction in 1991 and withdrew its recognition in May 1998.²⁵ The Court has since dealt with one situation involving Barbados²⁶ and two involving Guatemala, currently the only State in Latin America imposing the death penalty.²⁷

²⁰ See Chapter II on the obligations of OAS States under the American Declaration. See also Chapter XVII on the official responses of addressee States.

²¹ The US has not ratified the OP recognising the right of individual complaint under the ICCPR. It has not ratified the ACHR either. The Inter-American Commission deals with complaints against the US on the bases of the US obligations under the OAS Charter, including the American Declaration. See further Chapter II (Systems) and XVI (Legal status).

²² For CIDH Annual Report 1997 see e.g. Neville Lewis, Case 11.825, 20 November 1997; Leroy Lamey, Case 11.826, 20 November 1997; Peter Blaine, Case 11.827, 19 November 1997.

²³ See e.g. CIDH Denton Aitkin v. Jamaica (2 May 2000) and Dave Sewell (4 December 2000), Annual Report 2000, §§38-39.

²⁴ It had previously taken precautionary measures on their behalf but these proved unsuccessful. The provisional measures can be found as the James et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago cases. In 2002 the Court issued its Judgment in Hilaire, Constantine et al. and Benjamin et al. Not all beneficiaries protected under the James et al. Order for provisional measures are included in this Judgment of 21 June 2002. This book discusses this Judgment to the extent it may clarify the purpose of provisional measures. See section 4 of this Chapter. See further Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction and admissibility).

²⁵ See Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction and admissibility).

²⁶ IACHR Case of Boyce et al. v. Barbados, Judgment of 20 November 2007 (ordering, among others, a commutation of the death sentence of the victim that was still facing the death penalty, in order to guarantee the non-repetition of the violations of the rights addressed in the judgment, §127). See the previous Orders for provisional measures of 25 November 2004 and 14 June 2005. In the judgment the Court referred to these measures as follows: "The Court had ordered the State to adopt provisional measures on behalf of all four victims for the purpose of preserving their 'lives and physical integrity [...]' so as not to hinder the processing of their cases before the Inter-American system" (supra, paras. 31-33). Since their cases have now reached this Tribunal, which has already analyzed violations of the American Convention by Barbados to their detriment in accordance with its contentious jurisdiction, the Court considers that the purpose of the provisional measures has been met. In light of the above, and further considering that Mr. Atkins passed away in 2005, that Messrs. Boyce and Joseph's death sentences have been commuted to life in prison, and that the Court has ordered the State to formally commute the death sentence of Mr. Huggins, this Court hereby lifts the provisional measures ordered on behalf of all of the victims. Accordingly, the Tribunal considers that the State's obligations within the framework of these procedural measures are superseded by those that are ordered in the present Judgment as of

In its Orders for provisional measures the Court generally refers to Article 1(1) ACHR, stating that this article ‘imposes on States Parties the obligation to respect the rights and freedoms set out in that treaty and to ensure to all persons subject to their jurisdiction the free and full exercise of the said rights and freedoms’.²⁸ Moreover, ‘as the Court has repeatedly held, it is the responsibility of the State to adopt measures to protect all persons subject to its jurisdiction’²⁹ and ‘this duty is particularly compelling in the case of persons currently the subject of a proceeding before the supervisory organs of the American Convention’.³⁰

In Orders involving death penalty cases it also considers that ‘if the State were to execute the alleged victims, this would lead to an irreparable situation, as well as constitute conduct incompatible with the object and purpose of the Convention’.³¹

In his Concurring Opinion to the Court’s Order to halt executions in James et al. Cançado Trindade elaborated on the ‘eminently preventive dimension’ of the Court’s provisional measures. He pointed out that the constitutive elements of provisional measures (extreme gravity and urgency on the one hand and the prevention of irreparable harm to persons on the other) to date were ‘present and persistent’ in this case. These elements ‘transform the provisional measures of protection into a true jurisdictional guarantee of preventive character’.³²

In light of the constitutive elements of provisional measures and their legal nature Cançado disagreed with ‘the doctrinal trend which beholds in the provisional measures ordered by the Inter-American Court at the request of the Commission measures of an exceptional order, to be restrictively interpreted by virtue of their innovating character’.³³ He considers this doctrinal trend to be static and conservative.³⁴ It is difficult to see how provisional measures could still have an innovative character, as he claims, in such an approach. He may mean that scholars normally tend to take a cautious approach to the use of provisional measures, cherishing their exceptional character exactly because the protection required in those measures is indeed innovative. In that light, his statement indicates his belief that such measures should, contrary to this trend, nevertheless be ordered more often and in new types of situations as well.

2.4 HRC

The great majority of provisional measures by the HRC deals with the death penalty. More than 160 cases were examined in which the HRC used provisional measures in the context of this the date of its notification”. IACHR Case of Boyce et al. v. Barbados, Judgment of 20 November 2007, §129.

²⁷ Guatemala accepted the Court’s contentious jurisdiction on 9 March 1987.

²⁸ See e.g. IACHR Boyce and Joseph v. Barbados, Order of 25 November 2004.

²⁹ See e.g. IACHR Raxcacó et al. v. Guatemala, Order of 30 August 2004, 5th ‘Considering’ clause and Sarayaku Indigenous Community v. Ecuador, Order of 6 July 2004, 4th ‘Considering’ clause.

³⁰ IACHR Raxcacó et al. v. Guatemala, Order of 30 August 2004, 5th ‘Considering’ clause; Gómez Paquiyauri v. Ecuador, Order of 7 May 2004, 6th ‘Considering’ clause; and Urso Branco Prison v. Brasil, Order of 22 April 2004, 5th ‘Considering’ clause.

³¹ See IACHR James et al., Order of 26 November 2001, 12th ‘Considering’ clause; Raxcacó et al., 30 August 2004, 9th ‘Considering’ clause; Boyce and Joseph v. Barbados, 25 November 2004, 9th ‘Considering’ clause.

³² See e.g. IACHR James et al. cases, Order of 25 May 1999.

³³ See IACHR James et al. cases, Order of 25 May 1999, Concurring Opinion Cançado Trindade, §10.

³⁴ IACHR James et al. cases, Order of 25 May 1999, Concurring Opinion Cançado Trindade, §11.

penalty.³⁵ Most of them were taken since spring 1993.³⁶ While in death penalty cases this international adjudicator has virtually always used them, this research is based on the premise that the decision to do so is, or should be, related to its case law on the merits.³⁷ The petitions in death penalty cases in which provisional measures were taken generally invoked the right to a fair trial. The HRC has been extensive in its case law on fair trial and the right to life. Section 4 on the relationship between provisional measures and the merits, first refers to more general remarks on this link and then focuses on the most important claims made in death penalty cases before the HRC, in order to clarify the function of provisional measures to halt executions.

3 RELATION BETWEEN PROVISIONAL MEASURES TO HALT EXPULSION OR EXTANT EXECUTION AND THE EXPECTED DECISION ON THE MERITS

3.1 Introduction

What is the relation between a prima facie claim and the use of provisional measures? Do human rights adjudicators use provisional measures in all cases involving petitioners facing the death penalty or is the decision to use them based on the existence of an apparent right?

The first step in addressing this question is to make explicit the rights invoked for the use of provisional measures to halt an execution.

Article 6(1) ICCPR recognises the inherent right to life of every human being. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his life. Article 6(2) stipulates that in ‘those countries which have not abolished the death penalty’ this sentence may only be imposed under strict conditions in conformity with the provisions of the ICCPR and only for the most serious crimes. Article 6(4) lays down the right of all persons sentenced to death to seek pardon or commutation. It establishes that amnesty, pardon, or commutation may be granted in all cases. In conjunction with 14(5) it provides that no execution should take place pending appeal or other recourse procedure, nor pending pardon or commutation proceedings. Article 6(5) forbids the death penalty for persons who were ³⁵ This section discusses the Committee’s decisions in death penalty cases over the period July 1986 to July 2003. Occasionally, references are made to case law decided after this period. In almost all cases referred to the HRC used provisional measures pending the proceedings. There are some death penalty cases, however, in which it did not use provisional measures because the State had already commuted the sentence. See Chapter II on the accessibility of information on provisional measures. The HRC may equally have used provisional measures in cases that have not yet been concluded. In all but one case it seems to have used provisional measures in order to halt an execution. The exception was a request to halt the imposition itself of the sentence rather than just its execution: Victor Domukovsky, Zaza Tsiklauri, Petre Gelbakhiani and Irakli Dokvadze v. Georgia, 6 April 1998 (provisional measures of 10 March 1995 and 5 July 1996).

³⁶ There is no great difference in the frequency with which the HRC used provisional measures previous to and following the institution of the Special Rapporteur on Death Penalty Cases. Subsequently, with the institution of the Special Rapporteur on New Communications, frequency initially diminished, but later increased. Apart from factors such as an increase in the number of petitions, this may also depend on the personal attitude of the Rapporteur in question. While the introduction of a Special Rapporteur on Death Penalty cases opened a possibility to deal with urgent cases in between sessions, the Rapporteur did not make use of this possibility as often as he could have. On the other hand, pending sessions the HRC took provisional measures quite often during the period this Rapporteur was in function. See also Chapter II.

³⁷ Equally, there should be such a link with the reparation eventually recommended, see Chapter XIII (Protection).

below the age of 18 when the crime occurred for which they stand trial or are convicted. Article 6(6) emphasises that nothing in the article shall be invoked to delay or prevent the abolition of capital punishment. A contemporary interpretation of the prohibition of cruel treatment and the right to life is evidenced in both the Second Optional Protocol (Second OP) abolishing the death penalty and decisions by national and international courts.³⁸ The last 15 years an increasing number of States have abolished the death penalty, 67 of which have ratified the Second OP.³⁹ Jamaica has been the State that the HRC has dealt with most often to halt an execution. It has also dealt with Trinidad and Tobago, Barbados, Guyana, St. Vincent and the Grenadines (the Americas), Zambia and Sierra Leone (Africa), South Korea and The Philippines (Asia), Belarus, Russia, Ukraine, Uzbekistan, Tajikistan (Europe and Central Asia).⁴⁰

In the regional systems provisional measures have also been used to halt executions. The African system is not very elaborate on the right to life. Article 4 ACHPR simply stipulates that human beings are inviolable and that every human being 'shall be entitled to respect for his life and the integrity of his person'. "No one may be arbitrarily deprived of his right". Fourteen African States have abolished the death penalty for all crimes, nineteen States are not actively applying the death penalty and 21 others retain and apply this penalty.⁴¹

Article 2(1) ECHR lays down that every one's life shall be protected by law. "No one shall be deprived of his life intentionally save in the execution of a sentence of a court following his conviction of a crime for which this penalty is provided by law". Subsequently the Member States of the Council of Europe adopted Protocol No. 6 on the abolition of the death penalty in peace time (1983).⁴² This development was completed with its adoption of Protocol No. 13 on the abolition of the death penalty in all circumstances (2002).⁴³ The Commission and Court have only dealt with three States: UK, Greece and Turkey. Presently, all Member States of the Council of Europe, except Russia, have abolished the death penalty.⁴⁴ Abolition has become a condition of membership of the Council of Europe.⁴⁵

Of the Members of the Organisation of American States (OAS) that still apply the death penalty only Guatemala and Barbados have also recognised the competence of the Inter-American Court. Until May 1999 this applied to Trinidad and Tobago as well.⁴⁶ Article 4 ACHR provides

³⁸ See e.g. the abolition of the death penalty by the South African Constitutional Court: S v Makwanyane and Mchunu, 1995 (2) SACR 1 (CC). Generally on the death penalty in international law see e.g. Schabas (2002a); Schabas (1996) and Hood (2002).

³⁹ Ratification status as of 3 September 2008. According to Amnesty International by 2007 137 countries in the world had abolished the death penalty in law or practice, Amnesty International report 2008.

⁴⁰ In general about international developments see the reports of the UN Special Rapporteur on Summary and arbitrary executions, also referring to the Rapporteur's urgent appeals to halt executions. Trinidad & Tobago and Jamaica have now withdrawn from the individual complaint proceedings under the First OP. See e.g. Chapters XIV (Jurisdiction and admissibility) and XVII (Official responses).

⁴¹ See Chenwi's book (2007) on the abolition of the death penalty in Africa, referring to 13 abolitions in law and practice, p. 25 (and referring to 7 African countries having ratified the 2nd OP to the ICCPR), pp. 51-52. In addition Rwanda abolished the death penalty in July 2007.

⁴² Council of Europe Treaty Series 114; concluded 28 April 1983; entry into force 1 March 1985 (ratified by all member States of the Council of Europe except Russia, which has signed but not yet ratified).

⁴³ Council of Europe Treaty Series 187; concluded 3 May 2002; entry into force 1 July 2003 (40 ratifications as of 7 September 2008).

⁴⁴ Ukraine ratified Protocol No. 6 in 2000 and since also ratified Protocol 13. The membership of retentionist Belarus is pending since 1993.

⁴⁵ Council of Europe Resolution 1044 (1994).

⁴⁶ This State denounced the ACHR on 26 May 1998. This became effective on 26 May 1999.

that no one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his life. This Convention, which was signed in 1969, stipulates that States that have abolished the death penalty shall not re-establish it (Article 4(3) ACHR). Countries that have not abolished the death penalty may only impose this penalty for the most serious crimes, in accordance with a law establishing such punishment, enacted prior to the commission of the crime. They may only impose this penalty, moreover, pursuant to a final judgment. States shall not extend their death penalty law to 'crimes to which it does not presently apply'. They shall in no case inflict capital punishment for political offences or related common crimes (Article 4(4)). They shall not impose this punishment upon persons who were below the age of eighteen or more than seventy years of age at the time the crime was committed, nor to pregnant women (Article 4 (5)). Finally, this article provides that every person condemned to death shall have the right to apply for amnesty, pardon or commutation of sentence. States shall not impose capital punishment 'while such a petition is pending a decision by the competent authority' (Article 4 (6)). In 1990 a separate Protocol on the abolition of the death penalty was adopted.⁴⁷

The American Declaration is less elaborate on the right to life than the ACHR. Article I provides: "Every human being has the right to life, liberty and the security of his person". The Commission and the Court have considered that the Declaration must be interpreted in light of the Convention.⁴⁸ They have specified the obligations of States with regard to Article 1 of the Declaration and Article 4 ACHR. While States in the Americas generally have an abolitionist tradition, this applies mainly to the Latin-American States.⁴⁹ Many common law countries in the Americas, with the notable exception of Canada, have not abolished the death penalty. The United States (US) and several Caribbean States still actively apply it.

Apart from the right to life the international and regional treaties also include a prohibition of torture and cruel or degrading treatment or punishment. This has also been relevant in the context of death penalty cases.⁵⁰ Article 7 ICCPR stipulates that no one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. The text of Article 3 ECHR is similar, but without reference to 'cruel'. Article 5 ACHPR provides that 'every individual shall have the right to the respect of the dignity inherent in a human being' and that 'all forms of exploitation and degradation of man particularly slavery, slave trade, torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment and treatment shall be prohibited'. Article 5 ACHR, finally, stipulates in paragraph 1: "Every person has the right to have his physical, mental and moral integrity respected". Paragraph 2 specifically prohibits torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment or treatment.

As noted, none of the human rights adjudicators, apart from the Inter-American Court (and to some extent the Inter-American Commission), have published or motivated their provisional measures. After mentioning a few cases by the Inter-American Court this section attempts to derive information from the decisions on the merits in death penalty cases about the types of death penalty situations in which the adjudicators use provisional measures. The focus is on the practice of the HRC, but in the context of the right to life references are also made to the approach of the ECtHR and the Bosnia Chamber. It specifically examines whether the practice of the HRC makes sense in light of its general approach towards the purpose of its provisional measures.

⁴⁷ OAS Treaties Series No. 73, adopted 8 June 1990. As of September 2008 there were 9 ratifications, <www.cidh.org>.

⁴⁸ See also Chapter II (Systems).

⁴⁹ The only Latin-American country still applying it is Guatemala.

⁵⁰ Specifically about the death penalty as cruel punishment, see e.g. Nowak (2000b) and Schabas (1996).

After all it has made some explicit statements about this purpose in some cases involving non-compliance with its provisional measures.⁵¹

3.2 Prejudgment

If in a request by petitioners for provisional measures the facts complained of relate to other aspects of the main case, not directly constituting a situation of urgency, the adjudicator will declare (this part of) the request for provisional measures inadmissible. The Inter-American Court has emphasized that it may not examine ‘any arguments other than those which are directly and strictly related to situations of extreme gravity and urgency which require the adoption of protection measures to avoid irreparable damage to persons. Any other arguments or facts may only be examined and determined by the Court when considering the merits of contentious cases brought before the Court’.⁵²

This means that if it is ‘not possible to assess the facts at issue without giving an opinion on the merits of the case’ using provisional measures ‘implies revising the conformity of the facts denounced by the alleged victims to the American Convention’. ‘The opinion on the merits of a case submitted to the Court must be issued in the judgment rendered in that case rather than in a decision regarding the adoption of provisional measures. In fact, the latter may imply a prior judgment via an interlocutory proceeding, determining some of the facts submitted to the consideration of the Court and their consequences’.⁵³

Yet the situation is different when the irreparable harm is related to the main claim. The Inter-American Commission and Court have made some statements regarding provisional measures to halt executions that may clarify the issue of prejudgment and provisional measures.

In death penalty cases the Inter-American Commission requested stays of execution ‘to give it time to fully examine the allegations made in the petition, on the grounds that, executing (...) before the Commission could investigate the case would cause irreparable harm’.⁵⁴ It bases its request ‘on the fact that, should the State execute the victim before the Commission had an opportunity to examine the case, any eventual decision would be rendered moot in terms of the efficacy of potential remedies’.⁵⁵ It referred to remedies such as a recommendation of commutation of sentence and pointed out that such mootness would cause the victim irreparable harm.⁵⁶

⁵¹ About the legal status of provisional measures see Chapter XVI and about the follow-up by the adjudicators see Chapter XVIII.

⁵² IACHR Matter of Adrián Meléndez-Quijano et al. (El Salvador), Order of 26 November 2007, 9th ‘Considering’ clause, referring to various cases including Matter of Luisiana Ríos et al. (Venezuela), Order of 3 July 2007, 9th ‘Considering’ clause.

⁵³ IACHR Matter of Adrián Meléndez-Quijano et al. (El Salvador), Order of 26 November 2007, 10th ‘Considering’ clause, referring to Matter of Castañeda-Gutman (Mexico), Order of 25 November 2005, 6th ‘Considering’ clause and Matter of Luisiana Ríos et al. (Venezuela), Order of 3 July 2007, 11th ‘Considering’ clause. In Meléndez-Quijano the previous provisional measures to protect the beneficiaries were reiterated, but the Court found inadmissible the petitioners’ request ‘for the provisional suspension of “all the administrative and judicial proceedings started against Adrián Meléndez-Quijano”’.

⁵⁴ E.g. CIDH Annual Report 2000, §47.

⁵⁵ Ibid.

⁵⁶ See e.g. CIDH 6 January 1999, Wayne Matthews, Case 12.076; 21 January 1999, Alfred Frederick and Natasha De Leon, Cases 12.082 and 12.093; 4 March 1999, Vijay Mungroo and Phillip Cholatal, Cases 12.11 and 12.112; 12 April 1999, Naresh Boodram and Joey Ramiah, Case 12.129; 28 April 1999, Nigel Mark, Case 12.137; 1 May 1999, Wilberforce Bernard and Steve Mungroo, Cases 12.140 and 12.141; 8 May 1999, Peter Benjamin and Krishendath

In the operational part of its Order the Court often orders the State to take all necessary measures to preserve the life (and physical integrity) of the beneficiaries ‘so as not to hinder the processing of their cases before the Inter-American system’.⁵⁷ In his first Order for urgent measures the President of the Inter-American Court pointed out:

“It is imperative to note that this does not imply a declaration on the merits of the request, but simply acknowledges the possibility of such a decision, which leads to the conclusion that the stay of the executions of the petitioners is necessary to guarantee the integrity of the Inter-American system for the protection of human rights”.⁵⁸

This also refers to the procedural considerations aimed at safeguarding the Inter-American human rights system as a whole. Both the Inter-American Court and its President have noted the relationship between the merits and the provisional measures, often in connection with the remark that the cases included in the Commission’s request have not yet been submitted to the Court. The Court noted, for instance, that for that reason its consideration of ‘the issues at hand’ is:

“based not upon the merits of said Cases but upon the State’s procedural obligations as a Party to the American Convention. Therefore, the Court cannot, in a provisional measure, consider the merits of any arguments pertaining to issues other than those which relate strictly to the extreme gravity and urgency and the necessity to avoid irreparable damage to persons. Such other issues are properly brought before the Court only through contentious cases or requests for advisory opinions”.⁵⁹

At other times the President simply stated that since the case had not been submitted to the Court, ‘the adoption of urgent measures does not imply a decision on the merits of the existing controversy by the petitioners and the State’.⁶⁰ In the first example the Court noted that its consideration of the issues was not based on the merits of the cases but on the State’s procedural obligations under the ACHR. In the second example a decision on the merits is not implied by the adoption of urgent measures. In other words, their adoption does not result, implicitly, in a determination on the merits. In both cases the result is that ‘the Court will study the request of the Commission in light of the existence of a situation of extreme gravity and urgency and the necessity to avoid irreparable damage to persons, elements to be taken into account in conformity with Article 63(2) of the Convention’.⁶¹

Seepersad, Cases 12.148 and 12.149; 11 May 1999, Calvin Dial and Andrew Dottin, Case 12.145; 20 May 1999, Anthony Johnson and Allan Phillip, Cases 11.718 and 12.115; 21 May 1999, Narine Sooklal, Case 12.152; 25 May 1999, Amir Mowlah, Case 12.153; 3 June 1999, Mervyn Parris and Francis Mansingh, Cases 12.156 and 12.157.

⁵⁷ See e.g. IACHR James et al. cases, Order for provisional measures, 14 June 1998, 29 August 1998, 25 May 1999 and 26 November 2001.

⁵⁸ IACHR James, Briggs, Noel, Garcia and Bethel cases, Order of the President for urgent measures, 27 May 1998.

⁵⁹ IACHR James et al. cases, Order for provisional measures, 29 August 1998. See also, Order for provisional measures, 26 November 2001.

⁶⁰ IACHR James et al. cases, Order of the President for urgent measures, 29 June 1998. See also those of 27 May 1998, 13 July 1998 and 25 October 2001.

⁶¹ IACHR James et al. cases, Order for provisional measures, 26 November 2001.

The President of the Inter-American Court has pointed out that by adopting urgent measures, this Presidency is ensuring that the Court may carry out effectively its conventional mandate.⁶² The full Court simply considered:

“That the cases included in the request for amplification have not been submitted to the Court and the consideration of the issues at hand is, consequently, based upon the State’s procedural obligations under the Convention in relation to the processing of the Provisional Measures of protection and therefore does not imply a prejudgment on the merits. As a result, the Court will study the request of the Commission in light of the existence of a situation of extreme gravity and urgency and the necessity to avoid irreparable damage to persons, elements to be taken into account in conformity with Article 63(2) of the Convention”.⁶³

Indeed, the Inter-American Court has considered that the cases in which it took provisional measures were ‘not before the Court’. It noted that the purpose of provisional measures in international human rights law was ‘to protect fundamental human rights by seeking to avoid irreparable damage to persons’. Their adoption ‘does not imply a decision on the merits of the controversy between the petitioners and the State’. “Upon ordering such measures, this Tribunal is ensuring only that it may faithfully exercise its mandate pursuant to the Convention in cases of extreme gravity and urgency”.⁶⁴

While the Inter-American Court explains that its consideration is ‘based upon the State’s procedural obligations under the Convention in relation to the processing of the Provisional Measures of protection and therefore does not imply a prejudgment on the merits’, it does refer to the Commission’s statement that the claims pending before it ‘if proven, tend to establish violations of the American Convention’.⁶⁵

Since the President’s first Order for urgent measures to halt executions, the Court and its President have pointed out that the execution of the death penalty in the cases of the alleged victims ‘would necessarily affect the Court’s consideration of the Commission’s request by rendering moot the object of any eventual decision in their favor’.⁶⁶ Thus, there is a relationship between the merits of the case (and possible reparation)⁶⁷ and the prevention of irreparable harm intended with the Court’s provisional measures.

The relationship between the merits of the case and the prevention of irreparable harm is also relevant because provisional measures may be used to prevent a State from anticipating the Court’s Judgment and pre-empting it. Some consideration of substantive law is relevant in this

⁶² IACHR James et al. cases, Order of the President for urgent measures, 25 October 2001.

⁶³ IACHR James et al. cases, Order for provisional measures, 26 November 2001.

⁶⁴ See e.g. IACHR Raxcacó et al., Order of 30 August 2004 (11th ‘Considering’ clause); Carlos Nieto et al., Order of 9 July 2004 (10th ‘Considering’ clause); and Sarayaku Indigenous Community, Order of 6 July 2004 (2nd ‘Considering’ clause) and Boyce and Joseph, Order of 25 November 2004 (10th ‘Considering’ clause).

⁶⁵ IACHR James et al. cases, Order of the President for urgent measures, 26 November 2001. See also James et al. case, Order of the President for urgent measures, 11 May 1999. That same month, on the other hand, the Court had also pointed out that when it considers requests for provisional measures in cases still pending before the Commission its ‘consideration of the issues at hand’ is ‘based upon the State’s procedural obligations as a Party to the American Convention, rather than on the merits of each Case’. Thus, the elements the Court takes into account when it studies the Commission’s request are ‘the existence of a situation of extreme gravity and urgency and the necessity to avoid irreparable damage to persons’. See e.g. James et al. case, Order of 25 May 1999.

⁶⁶ See IACHR James, Briggs, Noel, Garcia and Bethel cases, Order of the President for urgent measures, 27 May 1998 and further Orders.

⁶⁷ See also Chapter XIII (Protection).

respect. At the same time the Inter-American Court itself is expected not to predetermine its decision on the merits by ordering provisional measures. Traditionally, courts have tried to balance those two conflicting rules (non-anticipation and no predetermination), in light of the importance of balancing the interests of the parties in a conflict pending before them. Yet the situation is different for adjudicators dealing with human rights issues, exactly because the parties are not two States but the State on the one hand and an individual or group of individuals on the other. This makes the situation inherently unequal, increasing the task of the adjudicator. In this respect the statements of the Inter-American Court are sufficiently general in nature to be relevant as well to the situation of the other human rights adjudicators.

3.3 The published Orders of the Inter-American Court to halt executions

In its Orders for provisional measures the Inter-American Court specifically refers to the rights claimed. An examination of the various Orders in the James et al. case shows that the omission, in some cases, of a reference to the protection of physical integrity in addition to the protection of life is not necessarily based on a specific decision on the part of the Court and its President.⁶⁸

With regard to five new beneficiaries in the James et al. case the Court noted that they all complained about the mandatory nature of the death penalty.⁶⁹ Other complaints included failure to supply full disclosure to the defence, delay in bringing the person involved to trial (3x), improper treatment in detention (5x), conditions of detention (2x), statements taken by coercion (3x), failure to advise right to an attorney, inadequacy of counsel and no trial by a competent, independent and impartial tribunal. The Court pointed out that if the State would execute the petitioners 'it would create an irremediable situation'. It 'would be incompatible with the object and purpose of the Convention'.⁷⁰ In the reports Trinidad initially supplied to comply with the Court's Order it pointed out that it had followed due process in all the cases in which the Court had now ordered provisional measures.⁷¹

With regard to those beneficiaries involved in the Court's Judgment in Hilaire et al. (2002) it is possible to illustrate a relationship with the merits. First of all, all cases included in the Judgment dealt with the mandatory death penalty. The Commission also claimed other violations.⁷² In two cases it claimed a violation of Article 5(6) for failure to take efforts for the reform and 'social re-adaptation' of the petitioner as an essential aim of his punishment. This request is interesting

⁶⁸ See for instance IACHR James et al. case, Order for provisional measures, 27 May 1999 and Order of President for urgent measures, 19 June 1999 and Order of 25 October 2001 in which the Court ordered the State to take all necessary measures to preserve the lives of the beneficiaries without mentioning their physical integrity. See the Orders of 25 September 1999, 16 August 2000 and 24 November 2000 for examples where physical integrity is explicitly mentioned. In this light not too much meaning must be attached either to the change from the phrase 'physical integrity' to that of 'personal integrity' used in the Court's Order of November 2001 and in most Orders involving other situations. It seems reasonable to assume that the Inter-American Court intended to include the protection of physical integrity in all its Orders to halt executions.

⁶⁹ IACHR James et al. cases, Order of the President for urgent measures, 25 October 2001; Order for provisional measures, 26 November 2001. In one case the Commission had already declared admissible the claims of the petitioner: Case of Balkissoon Roodal, 10 October 2001 (adm.).

⁷⁰ IACHR James et al. cases, Order for provisional measures, 26 November 2001. The majority of beneficiaries was later included in the cases Hilaire, Constantine et al. and Benjamin et al.

⁷¹ IACHR James et al. cases, Order for provisional measures, 29 August 1998.

⁷² E.g. a violation of the right to respect for the physical, mental and moral integrity, as laid down in Article 5(1), the right not to be subjected to cruel, inhumane or degrading punishment or treatment in violation of Article 5(2).

because it means that the Commission, at least in certain circumstances, takes the approach that the death penalty as such or, alternatively, the death row phenomenon, or certain aggravated forms of this phenomenon would run counter to the essential aims of punishment laid down in human rights treaties. Earlier, British lawyers had suggested this approach in cases before the HRC.

In June 2002 the Court issued its Judgment. It found that the State had violated the right to life of all 32 petitioners (Articles 4(1) and 4(2)) in conjunction with Article 1(1). It also found a violation of Article 2 ACHR (obligation to adopt the necessary legislative or other measures). Trinidad had violated, moreover, their right to humane treatment (Articles 5(1) and 5(2)). Finally, it found 32 violations of the right of every person condemned to death to apply for amnesty, pardon or commutation of sentence, laid down in Article 4(6). With regard to 30 of them, the Court found a violation of the right to trial within a reasonable time (Articles 7(5) and 8(1)) and with regard to eleven of them a violation of the right to judicial protection (Articles 8 and 25). On top of all these violations the Court found that Trinidad arbitrarily deprived Joey Ramiah of his right to life in violation of Article 4 ACHR by executing him pending the proceedings.⁷³ Subsequently the provisional measures were maintained on behalf of those petitioners still under sentence of death.⁷⁴

In Boyce and Joseph v. Barbados (2004) the Inter-American Court pointed out that ‘in this case the measures mandated are designed to allow the organs of the Inter-American system of human rights protection to evaluate the possible existence of a violation of Articles 2, 4, 5 and 8 of the American Convention’.⁷⁵ In 2007 the Court found the State in violation of various provisions of the ACHR.⁷⁶ It ordered, among others, that the State must commute the death sentence of Michael McDonald Huggins and adopt the necessary measures to ensure that the death penalty is not imposed in a way that violates the rights and freedoms guaranteed in the ACHR and, in particular, that it not be imposed by means of a compulsory judgment; it must also take legislative or other measures to eliminate the effect of a provision in its Constitution that makes it impossible to contest ‘existing laws’; and, the State’s obligations arising from the Court’s provisional measures in this case should be replaced by the obligations specified in the judgment.⁷⁷

Already in 1983 the Inter-American Court had pointed out that States that still applied the death penalty were not to extend it to situations to which it did not previously apply. Its unanimous advice was ‘that the Convention imposes an absolute prohibition on the extension of death penalty and that, consequently, the State Party cannot apply the death penalty to crimes for which such a penalty was not previously provided for under its domestic law’. The Court also found, unanimously, ‘that a reservation restricted by its own wording to Article 4(4) of the Convention does not allow the Government of a State Party to extend by subsequent legislation the applica-

⁷³ See IACHR Hilaire, Constantine and Benjamin et al. v. Trinidad & Tobago, 21 June 2002.

⁷⁴ See e.g. IACHR James et al., Order of 28 February 2005. See further on maintaining provisional measures e.g. Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction and admissibility).

⁷⁵ IACHR Boyce and Joseph v. Barbados, Order of 25 November 2004, 7th ‘Considering’ clause. See also 1st ‘Having seen’ clause: the provisional measures are taken so as not to hinder the processing of their cases before the Inter-American system.

⁷⁶ IACHR Boyce et al. (Barbados), Judgment on Preliminary Objection, Merits, Reparations and Costs, 20 November 2007 (finding that Barbados had violated the Articles 4(1) and 4(2) ACHR (Right to Life), in relation to Article 1(1) (obligation to respect rights); it had also violated Article 2 (Domestic Legal Effect), in relation to Articles 1(1), 4(1), 4(2) and 25(1) (Judicial Protection); and Articles 5(1) and 5(2) ACHR (Right to Humane Treatment) in relation to Article 1(1), all to the detriment of Lennox Ricardo Boyce, Jeffrey Joseph, Frederick Benjamin Atkins and Michael McDonald Huggins).

⁷⁷ IACHR Boyce et al. (Barbados), Judgment on Preliminary Objection, Merits, Reparations and Costs, 20 November 2007.

tion of the death penalty to crimes for which this penalty was not previously provided'.⁷⁸ In Raxcacó Reyes v. Guatemala (2005) the Court found a violation of the prohibition to extend the death penalty to situations to which it did not previously apply (Article 4(2)).⁷⁹ It also found that this State's domestic legislation, punishing by death any type of kidnapping, violated the principle in Article 4(2) that the death penalty should be limited to the worst crimes only.⁸⁰

3.4 Unpublished provisional measures to halt executions

3.4.1 Introduction

In order to clarify the relationship with the merits in the unpublished provisional measures by the HRC (and most other human rights adjudicators), it is all the more important to know what the claims were in cases in which provisional measures were taken. An examination of known cases in which the HRC took provisional measures in death penalty cases shows that apart from the right to life itself (Article 6), the rights most regularly claimed by detainees on death row are the right to a fair trial (Article 14), the security of person and pre-trial rights (Article 9), the prohibition of torture or cruel treatment (Article 7) and the right to humane treatment in detention (Article 10).

The subsequent sections deal with various components of the case law on the death penalty. The focus is on the approach of the HRC, but where relevant references are made to other adjudicators. Section 3.4.2 deals with the right to life as such and refers to the case law of the ECtHR and Bosnia Chamber. Section 3.4.3 discusses rights relating to the person sentenced to death: juvenile death penalty and mandatory death penalty. Section 3.4.4 involves rights relating to the death penalty proceedings and, finally, section 3.4.5 deals with the significance of the death row phenomenon, including its impact on individual petitioners.

⁷⁸ See IACHR Restrictions to the death penalty, Advisory Opinion OC-3/83, 8 September 1983. Before its provisional measures in James et al. and its Judgment in Hilaire, Constantine and Benjamin et al., the Inter-American Court only dealt with the issue of the death penalty as part of its advisory function. In this Advisory Opinion the Commission had requested the Court's Advisory Opinion in light of three cases pending before it in which Guatemala has executed persons on the basis of trials before Courts of Special Jurisdiction. On the basis of its reservation to Article 4(4) ACHR Guatemala had justified its extension of the death penalty to crimes for which this penalty was not previously provided under its domestic law. Article 4(4) stipulates: "In no case shall capital punishment be inflicted for political offences or related common crimes". In reference to the Court's Advisory Opinion the Commission subsequently found Guatemala in violation of Article 4 ACHR. Resolution 15/84 of the Commission against Guatemala (cases 8094, 9083 and 9080), 3 October 1984, Informe Anual 1984-1985. Only the Commission could deal with these cases as a contentious matter, because Guatemala just accepted the Court's contentious jurisdiction in March 1987.

⁷⁹ IACHR Raxcacó Reyes v. Guatemala, 15 September 2005, §§57-66.

⁸⁰ IACHR Raxcacó Reyes v. Guatemala, 15 September 2005, §§67-72. See also Hilaire, Constantine et al., Benjamin et al. v. Trinidad & Tobago, 21 June 2002, §§106-108. See further on the case of Case of Raxcacó Reyes et al. (Guatemala), the Court's Order of 21 November 2007 deciding, among others, to lift the provisional measures adopted by the Court in favor of Pablo Arturo Ruiz Almengor, but to reiterate to the State that it must maintain the necessary measures to protect the life of Bernardino Rodríguez Lara so as not to obstruct the processing of his case before the inter-American system for the protection of human rights; and to remind the State that, in its judgment Raxcacó Reyes v. Guatemala, 15 September 2005, as a measure of non-repetition it had ordered the State abstain from applying the death penalty and executing those convicted of the crime of kidnapping or abduction.

3.4.2 The right to life as such

The adjudicators have to deal with treaty texts on the right to life that were drafted when the death penalty was still common in many States. Thus, these texts often refer to States in which the death penalty is still applied, simply posing limitations to their use. The question arises whether provisional measures have been taken also in cases in which a violation was later found on the basis of a more dynamic interpretation of the provisions on the right to life or only in such cases in which there would likely be a violation even on the basis of a restrictive interpretation.

3.4.2.1 ECtHR

In the Soering case (1989) the ECtHR established that capital punishment under certain conditions was still permitted by Article 2(1) ECHR.⁸¹ It acknowledged that subsequent practice could remove a textual limit on the scope for dynamic or evolutive interpretation of Article 3 ECHR. In the circumstances of the case it found that the extradition of Soering to the US would violate Article 3 because of the death row phenomenon in the state of Virginia.⁸² In this case both the Commission and the ECtHR used provisional measures. The decisions on the merits do not further clarify whether they would equally use such measures in other cases involving the death penalty.

Only very recently the ECtHR slightly adapted its approach to the right to life as such. In Öcalan v. Turkey (2005) the Grand Chamber agreed with the First Section of the ECtHR, which decided in 2003 that both the concepts of inhuman and degrading treatment and the legal position with regard to the death penalty had ‘undergone a considerable evolution’ since the entry into force of the Convention and indeed since its Soering judgment.

“The de facto abolition noted in that case in respect of twenty-two contracting States in 1989 has developed into a de jure abolition in forty-three of the forty-four Contracting States and a moratorium in the remaining State which has not yet abolished the penalty, namely Russia”.

All States have signed and all but three have ratified Protocol No. 6. The practice is ‘further reflected’ in the policy of the Council of Europe creating a death penalty free zone by requiring abolition as a condition of membership.

“Such a marked development could now be taken as signalling the agreement of the Contracting States to abrogate, or at the very least to modify, the second sentence of Article 2 §1, particularly when regard is had to the fact that all Contracting States have now signed Protocol No. 6 and that it has been ratified by forty-one States. It may be questioned whether it is necessary to await ratification of Protocol No. 6 by the three remaining States before concluding that the death penalty exception in Article 2 has been significantly modified. Against such a consistent background, it can be said that capital punishment in peacetime has come to be regarded as an unacceptable ... form of punishment which is no longer permissible under Article 2”.⁸³

Yet it subsequently retracted somewhat from this statement by replaying its argument that by opening for signature Protocol No. 13 (on the abolition of the death penalty in all circumstances) the Contracting States had ‘chosen the additional method of amendment of the text of the Convention in pursuit of their policy of abolition’. It did acknowledge that ‘this final step toward complete abolition of the death penalty’ could also ‘be seen as confirmation of the abolitionist trend in the practice of the Contracting States’. Thus, Protocol 13 ‘does not necessarily run counter to the view that Article 2 has been amended in so far as it permits the death penalty in times of peace’.⁸⁴ Taken together this statement seems to lean towards construing Article 2 as no longer permitting the death penalty. Nevertheless, the Grand Chamber subsequently agreed with the Chamber that there was no need to reach ‘any firm conclusion’ on this issue because ‘even if Article 2 were to be construed as still permitting the death penalty’ it would in any case be contrary to the Convention ‘to implement a death sentence following an unfair trial’.⁸⁵ It agreed with the Chamber’s reasoning that the implementation of the death penalty following an unfair trial would not be permissible.⁸⁶ The Chamber had pointed out that Article 2 ‘ranks as one of the most fundamental provisions of the Convention’.

⁸¹ ECtHR Soering v. United Kingdom, Judgement of 7 July 1989.

⁸² See later in this Chapter under the heading ‘death row phenomenon’. On provisional measures to halt extradition see Chapter V.

⁸³ ECtHR Grand Chamber Öcalan v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 May 2005, §163, quoting Öcalan v. Turkey (First Section), 12 March 2003, §§189-196.

“Even if the death penalty were still permissible under Article 2, the Court considers that an arbitrary deprivation of life pursuant to capital punishment is prohibited”.

The Chamber determined that Öcalan had not had a fair trial so that his execution would have resulted in a violation of Article 2. This conclusion ‘must inform’ the Court’s opinion when it considers whether the imposition of the death penalty had resulted in a violation of Article 3 ECHR. The Court found such a violation because Öcalan had spent several years facing execution on the basis of an unfair trial.

“In the Court’s view, to impose a death sentence on a person after an unfair trial is to subject that person wrongfully to the fear the he will be executed. The fear and uncertainty as to the future generated by a sentence of death, in circumstances where there exists a real possibility that the sentence will be enforced, must give rise to a significant degree of human anguish. Such anguish cannot be dissociated from the unfairness of the proceedings underlying the sentence which, given that human life is at stake, becomes unlawful under the Convention”.⁸⁷

In Öcalan the ECtHR indicated that the execution of the petitioner would constitute a violation of Article 2 because his trial had been unfair. The Inter-American Court has equally considered that, as long as the execution itself is not carried out, the imposition of the death penalty without due process does not result in a violation of the right to life.⁸⁸ Like the ECtHR this Court has held that

⁸⁴ ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Öcalan v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 May 2005, §164.

⁸⁵ ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Öcalan v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 May 2005, §165. The Grand Chamber continues its approach in Soering with regard to the traditional method of amendment and the interpretation of Article 3 ECHR. It considers that ‘the fact that there are still a large number of States who have yet to sign or ratify Protocol No. 13’ may presently prevent it ‘from finding that it is the established practice of the Contracting States to regard the implementation of the death penalty as inhuman and degrading treatment’ contrary to Article 3. It believes that this may be so because the rights in Article 3 are non-derogable, ‘even in times of war’.

⁸⁶ The Court imposing the penalty must be independent and impartial and ‘the most rigorous standards of fairness’ must be observed ‘in the criminal proceedings both at first instance and on appeal’. Grand Chamber, Öcalan v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 May 2005, §166, quoting Öcalan v. Turkey (First Section), 12 March 2003, §§201-204. The Court referred to the irreversible nature of an execution, ECOSOC Resolution 1984/50, the decisions of the HRC, the Inter-American Court judgment Hilaire, Constantine and Benjamin et al. v. Trinidad and Tobago and that Court’s Advisory Opinion on consular assistance.

⁸⁷ ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Öcalan v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 May 2005, §164.

⁸⁸ See IACHR Fernán Ramírez v. Guatemala, 20 June 2005, §103.

having suffered adverse conditions of detention and having been sentenced to death after a trial in violation of the principle of due process constituted a violation of the right to respect for each person's physical, mental and moral integrity and the prohibition of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment (Article 5 (1)(2)).⁸⁹

Thus, the Court did not find a violation of Article 2 for the imposition of the death penalty following an unfair trial, but only indicated that the execution of the petitioner would constitute such violation. Its alternative argument based on Article 3 is somewhat strained because there would be anguish in any case, independent of the fairness of the proceedings. Moreover, the first sentence seems to imply that a person can also rightfully be subjected to the fear of execution, while the Chamber previously emphasized that capital punishment in peace time has come to be regarded as unacceptable. While the Court was unwilling to explicitly construe Article 2 as excluding the death penalty, replicating the conundrum created in Soering with the 'traditional method of amendment' approach,⁹⁰ it would have been more convincing for it to have found a violation of Article 2 for imposition of the death penalty after an unfair trial rather than a violation of Article 3. The Court's approach perpetuates an unclear situation with regard to provisional measures that could arise particularly in non-refoulement cases. The question arises whether it would use provisional measures in cases in which imposition of the death penalty would be likely, but execution may not necessarily follow because the death penalty is not applied actively at the time of the decision on provisional measures. The ECtHR, for instance, refused to take provisional measures to halt the transfer of Saddam Hussein to the Iraqi Interim Government, which did not actively apply the death penalty at the time. After he was handed over the Interim Government re-instated the penalty. While this may be predominantly an issue of assessment of risk, the Court's complicated reasoning, regarding Articles 2 and 3 may in itself have repercussions for the use of provisional measures.

The interpretation by the ECtHR of Articles 2 and 3 ECHR in the Soering and Öcalan judgments is not entirely convincing. The Court's acknowledgment, in Soering, that subsequent practice could remove a textual limit on the scope for dynamic or evolutive interpretation of Article 3 is indeed consonant with the longstanding view that the ECHR is a living instrument. Nevertheless, the Court used Protocol No. 6 (on the abolition of the death penalty in peace time) not to show a practice and conviction on the part of the member States of the Council of Europe, but to establish that the Contracting Parties intended the normal method of amendment of the text in order to introduce a new obligation to abolish the death penalty. Protocol 6, however, was adopted to lay down and secure, and certainly not to limit, the interpretation of Article 2 ECHR. Reflecting the contemporary standards of justice in Europe, the Protocol takes into account the subsequent practice and codification. In his Concurring Opinion Judge De Meyer considered that the death penalty is not consistent with the present state of European civilisation. 'Extraditing somebody in such circumstances', he said, 'would be repugnant to European standards of justice, and contrary to the public order of Europe'.⁹¹ It is unfortunate that in Öcalan the Court stuck with its traditional inter-state 'treaty amendment' approach. Its members seem to have in mind images of politicians conspiring together to indicate to the Court that it should not meddle. While there may be some truth to such images in other contexts, including with regard to human rights issues, given the general attitude within the Council of Europe vis-à-vis the death penalty, the approach of judge Garlicki in his Concurring Opinion appears more realistic. He points out that 'it can no longer be disputed that – on the European level – there is a consensus as to the inhuman nature of the death penalty'.

⁸⁹ IACHR Fermin Ramírez v. Guatemala, 20 June 2005, §§114-120.

⁹⁰ Or as Garlicki calls it, 'a doctrine of pre-emption', ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Öcalan v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 May 2005, Concurring Opinion Judge Garlicki, §5.

⁹¹ ECtHR Soering v. United Kingdom, Judgement of 7 July 1989, Concurring Opinion Judge De Meyer.

“Therefore, the fact that governments and politicians are preparing a formal amendment to the Convention may be understood more as a signal that capital punishment should no longer exist than as a decision pre-empting the Court from acting on its own initiative”.⁹²

In fact the Court is not acting on its own initiative, but simply interpreting the provisions invoked. Yet in its interpretation it should not box itself into a corner, away from its normal ‘living instrument’ approach. This living instrument approach is particularly warranted in the context of the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment. After all the Court considers Articles 2 and 3 to be the most fundamental rights in the Convention. Garlicki correctly points out that the Court ‘seems to be convinced that there is no room for the death penalty even within the original text of the Convention [b]ut at the same time, it has chosen not to express that position in a universally binding manner’. He considers the Court ‘could and should have gone further in this case’.⁹³ The ECHR ‘represents a very distinct form of international instrument and – in many respects – its substance and process of application are more akin to those of national constitutions than to those of ‘typical’ international treaties’.⁹⁴

“[A]s long as the member States have not clearly rejected a particular judicial interpretation of the Convention’, it is ‘legitimate to assume’ that ‘the Court has the power to determine the actual meaning of words and phrases which were inserted into the text of the Convention more than fifty years ago’. “In any event, and this seems to be the situation with regard to the death penalty, the Court may so proceed when its interpretation remains in harmony with the values and standards that have been endorsed by the member States”.⁹⁵

While the Court could have gone further on the merits, it did use provisional measures, which indicates that they have been taken also in cases in which a violation later could have been found on the basis of a more dynamic interpretation of the provisions on the right to life.

3.4.2.2 BOSNIA AND PROTOCOL NO. 6 TO THE ECHR (ABOLITION IN PEACE TIME)

The Bosnia Chamber has specifically interpreted Protocol No. 6 to the ECHR on the abolition of the death penalty in peace time. The petitioner had submitted that his execution would violate his human rights as guaranteed by Annex 6 of the Peace Agreement. The respondent Party had argued that the execution would be covered by Article 2 of Protocol No. 6 and would not involve any violation of the petitioner’s rights. The Chamber used provisional measures in 1996 and 1997. On the merits it pointed out that Article 1 of the Protocol prohibited both the imposition and the execution of the death penalty. This prohibition is absolute and subject only to the exception in Article 2. The obligations under the Protocol became effective in December 1995 when the General Framework Agreement entered into force. The Chamber then proceeded with its interpretation of Article 2 of the Protocol. It noted that, as an exception to the rule, it should be ‘narrowly interpreted’. After all the right to life was one of the most fundamental provisions in the ECHR.⁹⁶ It considered that before the exception could apply ‘there must be specific provision in ⁹² ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Öcalan v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 May 2005, Concurring Opinion Judge Garlicki, §5.

⁹³ Id., §2.

⁹⁴ Id., §4.

⁹⁵ Ibid.

⁹⁶ Bosnia Chamber Sretko Damjanović v. Fed. BiH, 5 September 1997 (merits), §29. See also Herak v. Fed. BiH, 12 June 1998, §§ 50-51.

domestic law authorising the use of the death penalty in respect of defined acts committed in time of war or of imminent threat of war’.

“The law must define with adequate precision the acts in respect of which the death penalty may be applied, the circumstances in which it may be applied, and the concepts of ‘time of war or imminent threat of war’. Article 2 requires that before it can apply the legislature should have considered and defined the circumstances in which, exceptionally in the context of a legal system where the death penalty has been abolished, such penalty may nevertheless be applied in respect of acts committed in time of war or imminent threat thereof”.⁹⁷

The provisions on the basis of which the petitioner was sentenced to death were not restricted to ‘time of war or imminent threat of war’. Neither did they have the necessary precision.⁹⁸ Moreover, the obligation in the Constitution to secure the rights and obligations in the international agreements listed in Annex I made the death penalty provisions inapplicable as a matter of national law, because of the Second OP to the ICCPR.⁹⁹ The Second OP imposed ‘an absolute prohibition, without the possibility of any reservation or exception, on the imposition or carrying out of the death penalty in time of peace’. Since Bosnia was not in a state of war anymore, executing the petitioner would be contrary to the Second OP.¹⁰⁰ The domestic law authorising execution of the death penalty in peace time was inconsistent with the Constitution because of the Constitution’s general obligation to ‘secure the highest level of internationally recognised human rights’. According to the Bosnia Chamber the obligation to secure the other human rights agreements (including the Second OP to ICCPR) without discrimination included ‘both an obligation to secure the rights in question to all persons and an obligation to do so without discrimination’.¹⁰¹

“Where one of the human rights agreements referred to imposes a clear, precise and absolute prohibition on a particular course of action, the only way in which the obligation to secure the right in question to all persons without discrimination can be carried out is by giving effect to the prohibition”.¹⁰²

⁹⁷ Bosnia Chamber Sretko Damjanović v. Fed. BiH, 5 September 1997 (merits), §32. See also Herak v. Fed. BiH, 12 June 1998, §49.

⁹⁸ Bosnia Chamber Herak v. Fed. BiH, 12 June 1998, §§ 50-51.

⁹⁹ Id., 12 June 1998, §§52-56, referring to Articles I, II(4) and II(1) of the Constitution (as set out in Annex 4 to the General Framework Agreement). In the earlier case Damjanović the Chamber’s formulation was less precise, triggering a concurring opinion by Nowak and Möller. They pointed out that under the Constitution the right not to be executed ‘is an absolute right and all organs of the State of BH and its entities have the constitutional obligation to secure this right’. Referring to Article II(4) of the Constitution they explained that the Constitutional obligation to secure the right not to be executed had to be distinguished from the international obligations under Annex 6 and the jurisdiction of the Chamber to consider complaints about violations of the Second OP to the ICCPR only in case of alleged or apparent discrimination.

¹⁰⁰ Bosnia Chamber Sretko Damjanović v. Fed. BiH, 5 September 1997 (merits), §36 and Herak v. Fed. BiH, 12 June 1998, §54.

¹⁰¹ Bosnia Chamber Sretko Damjanović v. Fed. BiH, 5 September 1997 (merits), §37 and Herak v. Fed. BiH, 12 June 1998, §56.

¹⁰² Bosnia Chamber Sretko Damjanović v. Fed. BiH, 5 September 1997 (merits), §37 and Herak v. Fed. BiH, 12 June 1998, §56.

3.4.2.3 HRC AND THE RIGHT TO LIFE AS SUCH

The HRC has struggled with issues similar to those of the ECtHR. In the extradition cases Kindler v. Canada and Ng v. Canada (1993) it had to decide on the right to life and the relationship between Articles 6(1) and (2) as well as on the relevance of the death row phenomenon in the context of Article 7. It has, thus far, interpreted Article 6 ICCPR rather than the Second Optional Protocol (1987), abolishing the death penalty (Second OP).¹⁰³

In fact the HRC took the same approach of reading Article 7 in light of Article 6(2). It concluded that ‘capital punishment as such, within the parameters of Article 6, paragraph 2, does not per se violate Article 7’.¹⁰⁴ Moreover, it referred to its previous jurisprudence on the death row phenomenon and interpreted the ECtHR decision on the death row phenomenon, Soering v. UK, restrictively, by emphasizing this Court’s analysis of the specific situation of Soering over its discussion of the death row phenomenon in general. It then distinguished Kindler’s situation from Soering’s by stating that the facts of the case differed as to age, mental state and conditions on death row, which in Kindler’s case was in Pennsylvania, and in Soering’s case in Virginia. It also noted that in Soering there was a simultaneous request for extradition by a State where the death penalty would not be imposed.¹⁰⁵ In Ng v. Canada the Committee reasoned along the same lines as in Kindler (1993). The dissenters, similarly, followed their reasoning in that case. The Committee stated that it was aware that ‘by definition, every execution of a sentence of death may be considered to constitute cruel and inhuman treatment within the meaning of Article 7 of the Covenant’. At the same time it noted that Article 6(2) permitted the imposition of capital punishment. It also pointed out, however, that any method of execution must be designed in such a way as to avoid conflict with Article 7. The petitioner had provided ‘detailed information that execution by gas asphyxiation may cause prolonged suffering and agony and does not result in death as swiftly as possible, as asphyxiation by cyanide gas may take over 10 minutes’. The HRC pointed out that the State had had the opportunity to refute these allegations, but had failed to do so.¹⁰⁶ It considered that Canada could reasonably have foreseen that the petitioner, if sentenced to death, would be executed in a way that amounts to a violation of Article 7, because execution by gas asphyxiation did not meet the test of ‘least possible physical and mental suffering’.¹⁰⁷ Consequently Canada had failed to comply with its obligations under the Covenant by extraditing Ng without having sought assurances that he would not be executed.¹⁰⁸

¹⁰³ Adopted 15 December 1987, entered into force 11 July 1991, G.A. Res. 44/128, 44 UN GAOR Supp. (No. 49) at 206, A/44/49 (1989). The reason for this is the fact that the extradition cases dealing with this issue were all against Canada. While this State has abolished the death penalty it is not yet a party to the OP2. Australia is a party, but in A.R.J. v. Australia the HRC concluded that there was no real risk of the death penalty. This meant it did not need to discuss the Second OP. From the View it is not clear whether it may have used provisional measures, with this Protocol in mind but the files show that the HRC indeed did so in light of the Second OP (on file with the author).

¹⁰⁴ HRC Kindler v. Canada, 30 July 1993.

¹⁰⁵ Id. Note that the Supreme Court of Zimbabwe, for instance, has interpreted Soering much less restrictively. Section 3.4.5 of this Chapter discusses the issue of the death row phenomenon.

¹⁰⁶ HRC Ng v. Canada, 5 November 1993, §16.3. “Rather, the State party has confined itself to arguing that in the absence of a norm of international law which expressly prohibits asphyxiation by cyanide gas, ‘it would be interfering to an unwarranted degree with the internal laws and practices of the United States to refuse to extradite a fugitive to face the possible imposition of the death penalty by cyanide gas asphyxiation’”.

¹⁰⁷ HRC Ng v. Canada, 5 November 1993, §16.4.

¹⁰⁸ Five members of the HRC would have found a violation of Article 7 on different grounds. Pocar and Lallah considered that because they would find a violation of Article 6, they would necessarily find a violation of Article 7 as well. Aguilar Urbina pointed out that the death penalty

In Judge v. Canada (2003) the HRC reversed Kindler. It recognised that it should ensure consistency and coherence of its jurisprudence but noted that ‘there may be exceptional situations in which a review of the scope of application of the rights protected in the Covenant is required’. As examples it mentioned situations ‘where an alleged violation involves that most fundamental of rights – the right to life – and in particular if there have been notable factual and legal developments and changes in international opinion in respect of the issue raised’. The Kindler decision dated from ten years prior. It noted that ‘since that time there has been a broadening international consensus in favour of abolition of the death penalty, and in states which have retained the death penalty, a broadening consensus not to carry it out’.

Paragraphs 2 to 6 ‘have the dual function of creating an exception to the right to life in respect of the death penalty and laying down limits on the scope of that exception’. The HRC acknowledged that by interpreting paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 6 in this way abolitionist and retentionist States parties were treated differently. This was ‘an inevitable consequence of the wording of the provision itself’. It also pointed out that many delegates participating in the drafting process already saw the death penalty as an ‘anomaly’ or a ‘necessary evil’. The Committee noted that it would appear logical to interpret the rule in Article 6(1) ‘in a wide sense’ and to interpret Article 6(2) narrowly.¹⁰⁹

Given the fact that the HRC overturned its previous case law it is not surprising that some members attached an individual opinion.¹¹⁰ Lallah underscored the importance of the decision and as such constituted cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment in violation of that article and not only in case of gas asphyxiation. In any case he considered that the application of the death penalty was subsumed by the violation of Article 6. See §11 of Ng v. Canada. Chanet considered that the HRC had engaged in ‘questionable discussion’ when it assessed the suffering caused by cyanide gas and took ‘into consideration the duration of the agony’. She wondered whether it would find no violation if the agony lasted nine minutes, now it has deemed unacceptable an agony lasting more than ten minutes. She noted that a strict interpretation of Article 6 could have prevented this debate. Wennergren, finally, quoted one of the dissenting justices of the US Supreme Court in a 1992 case denying an individual a stay of execution by gas asphyxiation in California. Justice John Paul Stevens wrote: ‘The barbaric use of cyanide gas in the Holocaust, the development of cyanide agents as chemical weapons, our contemporary understanding of execution by lethal gas, and the development of less cruel methods of execution all demonstrate that execution by cyanide gas is unnecessarily cruel’. Wennergren considered that this summarised ‘in a very convincing way’ why the use of this method amounts to a violation of Article 7. He also explained that he did not consider execution by lethal injection acceptable either ‘from a point of view of humanity’ but at least this did ‘not stand out as an unnecessarily cruel and inhumane method of execution, as does gas asphyxiation’. On the other hand, two other members of the HRC would not have found a violation of Article 7 at all. Herndl emphatically disagreed with the HRC’s finding of a violation of Article 7 because of the execution method. He criticised the fact that the HRC gave only one reason to substantiate its finding of a violation, namely that the execution method did not meet the test of the ‘least possible physical and mental suffering’. He considered it futile to attempt to establish categories of execution methods, because it was ‘futile to attempt to quantify the pain and suffering of any human being subjected to capital punishment’. This was so, as long as ‘such methods were not manifestly arbitrary and grossly contrary to the moral values of a democratic society, and as long as such methods are based on a uniformly applicable legislation adopted by democratic processes’. Ando equally disagreed with the finding of a violation of Article 7. The only thing he was certain of was that the article ‘prohibits any method of execution which is intended for prolonging suffering of the executed or causing unnecessary pain to him or her’.

¹⁰⁹ HRC Judge v. Canada, 5 August 2003, §10.5.

¹¹⁰ Committee member Solari Yrigoyen, for instance, provided an alternative text. He would have preferred an approach in which the Committee had found a violation of Article 14(5) because of added three observations. He recalled that while it was ‘encouraging’ to note a ‘broadening international consensus in favour of the abolition of the death penalty’, it was ‘appropriate to recall that, even at the time when the Committee was considering its views in Kindler some 10 years ago, the Committee was quite divided’ in relation to Article 6. He pointed out that no less than five members of the Committee dissented in that case ‘precisely on the nature, operation and interpretation of Article 6(1) of the Covenant’. To illustrate this he appended their individual opinions in Kindler (1993) to his separate opinion in Judge (2003).¹¹¹ While Judge was deported to the US before the HRC could take provisional measures, this case clarifies that such measures vis-à-vis non-death penalty States should always be used in refolement cases involving a real risk of imposition of the death penalty.

3.4.3 The right to life and the person of the petitioner

This section focus on two issues pertaining to the person of the petitioner: the death penalty for minors and the mandatory death penalty. The first issue is that of the death penalty for minors. The Inter-American Commission has found that not only had a norm of customary international law emerged prohibiting juvenile death penalty, but that this norm was of ‘a sufficiently indelible the automatic review of the petitioner’s death sentence in absentia. This would result in a violation of Article 6. His approach may originate from a wish not to overrule previous case law. Chanut clearly subscribed to the Committee’s new approach, which she had advocated more than ten years previously in Kindler, but considered that the Committee should not have given an opinion in this case about Article 14(5). She considered that while the HRC could ‘declare itself competent to assess the degree of risk to life (death sentence) or to physical integrity (torture), it is less obvious that it can base an opinion that a violation has occurred in a State party to the Covenant on a third State’s failure to observe a provision of the Covenant’. The HRC had examined this claim and declared it inadmissible for failure to substantiate. In other words, Chanut considered that the HRC should not have examined this claim for admissibility ratione materiae in the first place. She argued that now that the HRC directly addressed the fundamental question of the compatibility with Article 6 of extradition without assurances, the issue of the irregularity of the procedure followed in the third State became irrelevant because an abolitionist State cannot expel or extradite a petitioner to a State where he could be executed. About deportation and extradition in the face of risks of an unfair procedure in the receiving or requesting State (the third State) Chanut noted that while the HRC ‘can ascertain that a State party has not taken any undue risks, and may perhaps give an opinion on the precautions taken by the State party to that end, it can never really be sure whether a third State has violated the rights guaranteed by the Covenant if that State is not a party to the procedure’. She mentioned some of the other problems involved: what if the third State is not a party to the ICCPR or the OP? ‘Does the obligation of a State party to the Covenant in its relations with third States cover all the rights in the Covenant or only some of them? Could a State party to the Covenant enter a reservation to exclude implementation of the Covenant from its bilateral relations with another State?’.

¹¹¹ HRC Judge v. Austria (2003). He also observed that other provisions of the ICCPR may be relevant in interpreting Article 6(1). He noted in particular Articles 5(2) and 26. Finally, he observed that the Supreme Court of Canada’s decision in Burns was encouraging, although he wondered about its remark that assurances against the death penalty must be obtained ‘subject to exceptions’. He was not sure whether it was possible conceptually to envisage such exceptions, ‘given the autonomy of Article 6(1) and the possible impact of Article 5(2) and also Article 26 which governs the legislative, executive and judicial behaviour of States parties’. ‘That, however, is a bridge to be crossed by the Committee in an appropriate case’. The dissents by Ando and Solari Yrigoyen did not relate to the interpretation of Article 6(1). All members participating in the decision agreed with this interpretation. Pursuant to Rule 85 Wedgwood (US) did not participate in the adoption of the View.

nature' to constitute a norm of ius cogens.¹¹² Imposition of the death penalty for crimes committed below the age of 18 constitutes a violation of the right to life under Article I of the American Declaration. Execution of a person in such circumstances would be 'a further grave and irreparable violation' of the right to life.¹¹³

The HRC has also found a violation of Article 7 in a case of a minor on death row. In Johnson v. Jamaica (1998) the petitioner's age was not a factor in finding a death row phenomenon in violation of Article 7, but the imposition of the death sentence itself was void ab initio – and as such in violation of Article 7 – because of the violation of Article 6(5) forbidding the death penalty for persons under 18 at the time of the crime.¹¹⁴

The other issue that has arisen is whether the mandatory death penalty is prohibited or not. The Inter-American Commission¹¹⁵ and Court have considered it is indeed prohibited.¹¹⁶ The Court, for instance, found a violation of Article 4(1) ACHR because domestic legislation prevented courts from establishing the degree of culpability of a convicted person and compelled the ¹¹² Apart from the fact that the rejection by States of the juvenile death penalty was virtually uniform, it referred to the non-derogable nature of the relevant treaty provisions and pointed out that 'the acceptance of this norm crosses political and ideological boundaries and efforts to detract from this standard have been vigorously condemned'. CIDH Domingues v. US, 22 October 2002, §85. When discussing on the merits whether the American Declaration prohibits the execution of persons convicted of a crime committed when they were below the age of 18 the Inter-American Commission has interpreted its provisions 'in the context of pertinent developments in customary international law and the norms of jus cogens'. It has taken into account 'evidence of relevant state practice as disclosed by various sources, including recitals in treaties and other international instruments, a pattern of treaties in the same form, the practice of the United Nations and other international governmental organisations, and the domestic legislation and judicial decisions of states'. CIDH Domingues v. US, 22 October 2002, §54. See further e.g. Shaka Sankofa (Gary Graham) v. US, 29 December 2003 and Patterson v. US, 7 March 2005. For an earlier approach by the Commission see Roach and Pinkerton v. US, 22 September 1987.

¹¹³ See e.g. CIDH Domingues v. US, 22 October 2002, §§87 and 112.

¹¹⁴ HRC Clive Johnson v. Jamaica, 20 October 1998. See also Alfredo Baroy v. the Philippines, 31 October 2003 (inadm.). In this case the HRC used provisional measures both to halt the petitioner's execution and to speedily determine his age and treat him as a minor in the meantime. Subsequent to this provisional measure a domestic court reduced his sentence, 'for reasons other than alleged minority', to reclusion perpetua. Thus, the HRC considered that the issues with regard to alleged violations of Article 6 had become moot. Nevertheless it observed that 'sentencing a person to death and placing him or her on death row in circumstances where his or her minority has not been finally determined raises serious issues under articles 10 and 14, as well as potentially under article 7, of the Covenant'. It noted, however, that at the time of its consideration of the case domestic remedies had not been exhausted.

¹¹⁵ See e.g. CIDH Lamey, Mykoo, Montique & Daley v. Jamaica, 4 April 2001 (the mandatory death penalty, excluding consideration of the individual circumstances of each offender and offence results in arbitrary deprivation of life in violation of Article 4 (1) ACHR; this also precludes 'any effective review by a higher court as to the propriety of a sentence of death in the circumstances of a particular case', which cannot be reconciled with the fundamental principles of due process under Articles 4 and 8; moreover, it 'deprives an individual of the most fundamental rights without considering whether this exceptional form of punishment is appropriate in the circumstances of the individual's case', which is contrary to the essential respect for the dignity of the individual, underlying Article 5) and CIDH Thomas v. Jamaica, 3 December 2001.

¹¹⁶ IACHR Hilaire, Constantine et al., Benjamin et al. v. Trinidad & Tobago, 21 June 2002, §105 and IACHR Raxcacó Reyes v. Guatemala, 15 September 2005.

indiscriminate imposition of the death penalty.¹¹⁷ The international adjudicator has taken a similar approach. In fact both the Inter-American Commission and Court have referred to the HRC's case law in this respect, while it, in turn, seems to have been inspired by the Inter-American case law. In all cases involving the mandatory death penalty the HRC also used provisional measures, even when it had not yet interpreted Article 6 as prohibiting such penalty. In Thompson v. St. Vincent & the Grenadines (2000)¹¹⁸ it found the mandatory death penalty, as applied in this State, in violation of Article 6(1), since it was 'based solely upon the category of crime for which the offender is found guilty, without regard to the defendant's personal circumstances or the circumstances of the particular offence'.¹¹⁹ In Kennedy v. Trinidad and Tobago (2002)¹²⁰ the Committee confirmed the decision in Thompson by establishing that mandatory capital punishment for certain categories of crime may indeed constitute a violation of Article 6(1).¹²¹ Counsel had argued, following the decision of the Inter-American Commission in Hilaire v. Trinidad and Tobago (1999),¹²² that the mandatory death sentence constituted a violation of Articles 6(1), 7 and 26 ICCPR. This decision seems to have followed US Supreme Court decisions declaring the mandatory death sentence to be unconstitutional.¹²³ The HRC has considered that 'such a system of mandatory capital punishment would deprive the author of the most fundamental of rights, the right to life, without considering whether this exceptional form of punishment is appropriate in the circumstances of his or her case'. Discretionary measures by the executive, such as the right to ¹¹⁷ IACHR Hilaire, Constantine et al., Benjamin et al. v. Trinidad & Tobago, 21 June 2002, §103.

¹¹⁸ HRC Mr. Eversley Thompson v. St. Vincent & the Grenadines, 18 October 2000.

¹¹⁹ Lord Colville dissented. He considered that the HRC was diverting from its earlier Views. He believed that the majority had founded its opinion on civil law rather than common law and disagreed with the view that there could be full compliance with Article 6(4) and still a violation of Article 6(1). Kretzmer wrote the second dissent, co-signed by Amor, Yalden and Zakhia. Note that, apart from Lord Colville himself, one of the other dissenters, Yalden, indeed came from a common law country (Canada), while some of the others may have been influenced by common law thinking. At the same time Bhagwati (India), Evatt (Australia) and Henkin (US) who were in the majority, all are from common law countries as well. Moreover, it is the US Supreme Court that initiated the jurisprudence on the mandatory death penalty. For an earlier case in which the HRC found a violation of Article 6(2) rather than 6(1) see: Lubuto v. Zambia, 31 October 1995.

¹²⁰ HRC Kennedy v. Trinidad and Tobago, 26 March 2002.

¹²¹ In HRC Xavier Evans v. Trinidad and Tobago, 21 March 2003, the death sentence was commuted several years before the petitioner submitted his case to the HRC. This means that Rule 86 was not used. Because of this commutation the HRC determined that the application of mandatory capital punishment in this case did not give rise to a claim under the OP.

¹²² See CIDH Hilaire v. Trinidad & Tobago, 21 April 1999 (Report 66/99) as referred to in IACHR Hilaire, Constantine et al., Benjamin et al. v. Trinidad & Tobago, 21 June 2002, §23. The Commission brought the case before the Court on 23 May 1999, arguing that the mandatory death penalty violated Articles 1(1), 4(1), 5(1), 5(2), 5(6) and 8(1) ACHR. In its subsequent submissions of Constantine et al. and Benjamin et al. it omitted the reference to Article 5(6) on social re-adaptation etc.).

¹²³ See e.g. US Supreme Court, Woodson v. North Carolina 428 U.S. 280 (1976), arguing that respect for human dignity, underlying the relevant provision in the constitution, required 'consideration of aspects of the character of the individual offender and the circumstances of the particular offense as a constitutionally indispensable part of imposing the ultimate punishment of death'. The statute in question 'impermissibly treats all persons convicted of a designated offense not as uniquely individual human beings, but as members of a faceless, undifferentiated mass to be subjected to the blind infliction of the death penalty', pp. 303-305).

seek pardon or commutation, while obligatory under the ICCPR, were insufficient to secure adequate protection of the right to life.¹²⁴

In Carpo et al. v. the Philippines (2003) the HRC raised the issue of the mandatory death penalty proprio motu. The Rapporteur may intuitively take provisional measures in a case in which, based on the facts, the HRC later invokes a claim proprio motu.¹²⁵ Wedgwood and Ando did not agree with the Committee's choice to deal with the claim proprio motu nor with the Committee's approach towards the mandatory death penalty.¹²⁶ On the other hand, they did agree with the use of provisional measures in this case. In subsequent cases the HRC raised the issue of the mandatory death penalty again.¹²⁷ In Pagdayawon Rolando v. the Philippines (2004), for instance, the Committee first used provisional measures and later found a violation of Article 6(1).¹²⁸ The UN Special Rapporteur on arbitrary executions has confirmed this approach by the HRC, Inter-American Commission and Court and several domestic courts. "Making such a penalty mandatory – thereby eliminating the discretion of the court – makes it impossible to take into account mitigating or extenuating circumstances and eliminates any individual determination of an appropriate sentence in a particular case". "The adoption of such a black and white approach is entirely inappropriate where the life of an accused is at stake. Once the sentence has been carried out it is irreversible".¹²⁹

¹²⁴ HRC Thompson v. St. Vincent and the Grenadines, 18 October 2000 and Kennedy v. Trinidad and Tobago, 26 March 2002. See also Jaime Carpo et al. v. Philippines, 28 March 2003 (Ando and Wedgwood dissenting). In this case Amor and Yalden were in fact with the majority and did neither join Ando's dissent nor that of Wedgwood. The other three dissenters in the earlier two cases are no longer members of the HRC.

¹²⁵ HRC Jaime Carpo et al. v. Philippines, 28 March 2003 (Ando and Wedgwood dissenting).

¹²⁶ Wedgwood pointed out that the initial communication by the petitioners was 'well after publication of the Committee's earlier opinions on the question of mandatory death penalties'. They had had the advice of professional legal counsel who had decided not to raise such a claim. However, it is in fact normal practice of the HRC to take up issues proprio motu and the argument that counsel should have known about the HRC's earlier decisions on the mandatory death penalty also works the other way around, because it should have come as no surprise to the State either that the HRC would bring up this issue based on its earlier Views. Nevertheless, Wedgwood correctly points out that the HRC could have referred the issue of mandatory sentencing to the State party for comment. In other words, the case law is clear on the principle of mandatory death penalty and the HRC could easily bring it up as part of its practice to raise issues proprio motu, deriving from the facts of the case, without violating procedural equality. It could, however, have requested the State party to provide it with a copy of the opinion of the trial court in order to determine whether the facts of the case indeed amounted to mandatory sentencing.

¹²⁷ It noted from the domestic judgments that the death penalty was imposed automatically and found a violation of Article 6(1) ICCPR. Only Committee member Ando objected, referring to his individual opinion in Carpo. The Committee's Special Rapporteur had used provisional measures in Rayos as well. HRC Ramil Rayos v. the Philippines, 27 July 2004. While Scheinin, Chanet and Lallah fully agreed with the Committee's finding that the petitioner's mandatory death penalty was an arbitrary deprivation of life, they considered that the HRC should have followed its interpretation in Judge v. Canada. It should have found that the State equally violated Article 6 by re-introducing capital punishment in 1993 after abolishing it in 1987. They pointed out that the distinction between abolition and a moratorium was decisive in this respect.

¹²⁸ HRC Pagdayawon Rolando v. the Philippines, 3 November 2004 (Wedgwood and Ando dissenting).

¹²⁹ See e.g. Press release of the Special Rapporteur on extrajudicial, summary or arbitrary executions, 'Expert on arbitrary executions calls on Singapore government not to carry out

3.4.4 The right to life and the fairness of the proceedings

The provision that a death sentence may be imposed only in accordance with the law and not contrary to the provisions of the ICCPR implies that ‘the procedural guarantees therein prescribed must be preserved, including the right to a fair hearing by an independent tribunal, the presumption of innocence, the minimum guarantees for the defence, and the right to review by a higher tribunal’.¹³⁰ Consequently, if no further appeal is available, the imposition of a death sentence ‘upon the conclusion of a trial in which the provisions of the Covenant have not been respected’ constitutes not only a violation of Article 14 (fair trial) but a violation of the right to life (Article 6) as well. Thus, the HRC has pointed out that if the final death sentence was passed without due respect for the requirements of Article 14 it must hold that there has also been a violation of Article 6.¹³¹ These requirements include ‘the right to a fair hearing by an independent tribunal, the presumption of innocence, the minimum guarantees for the defence, and the right to review of conviction and sentence by a higher tribunal’.¹³²

In its General Comment on the right to a fair trial, the Committee pointed out that the rights specifically enumerated in Article 14 ICCPR are ‘minimum’ guarantees. Their observance does not always ensure the fairness of a hearing. The right to a fair trial is broader than the sum of the individual guarantees, and depends on the entire conduct of the trial.¹³³

Thus, the HRC considers that any violation of the right to a fair trial in a death penalty case automatically results in a violation of the right to life as well. Chapter XIII (Protection) shows that this relationship with the right to life is reflected also in the remedy the HRC considers warranted if it finds a violation. This is relevant as well for the use of provisional measures.

Death penalty cases in which the adjudicators have taken provisional measures relate to a range of claims. This section first discusses specific issues regarding the fairness of the proceedings dealt with by the regional adjudicators: trial in public and the prohibition of forced confessions, the right to consular notification, freedom from ex post facto laws, the independence and impartiality of the judiciary, rights of amnesty, pardon or commutation and the prohibition to execute persons pending judicial or administrative proceedings. It then specifically refers to the most important claims in death penalty case in which the HRC has taken provisional measures: right to counsel, adequate time and facilities to prepare a defence, right to appeal and effective mandatory death sentence’, 15 November 2005. The appeal by Rapporteur Alston was made on behalf of Nguyen Tuong Van, awaiting execution for attempting to traffic almost 400 grams of pure heroin. He pointed out that while the Singapore Court of Appeal had considered several cases decided by the JCPC ‘it failed to examine the most important case of all’, which was Boyce and Joseph v. the Queen (2004), pointing out that ‘No international human rights tribunal anywhere in the world has ever found a mandatory death penalty regime compatible with international human rights norms’.

¹³⁰ HRC General Comment 6, 30 April 1982, §7.

¹³¹ See, e.g., HRC Daniel Pinto v. Trinidad and Tobago, 20 July 1990 (Wennergren dissenting); Carlton Reid v. Jamaica, 20 July 1990 (Wennergren dissenting); Paul Kelly v. Jamaica, 8 April 1991; Trevor Collins v. Jamaica, 25 March 1993; Garfield Peart and Andrew Peart v. Jamaica, 19 July 1995; George Graham and Arthur Morrison v. Jamaica, 25 March 1996; Clifford McLawrence v. Jamaica, 18 July 1997; Abdool Saleem Yasseen and Noel Thomas v. Republic of Guyana, 30 March 1998; Silbert Daley v. Jamaica, 31 July 1998; Clarence Marshall v. Jamaica, 3 November 1998; Conroy Levy v. Jamaica, 3 November 1998; Christopher Brown v. Jamaica, 23 March 1999 and Azer Garyverdy Ogly Aliev v. Ukraine, 7 August 2003.

¹³² HRC General Comment 6, 30 April 1982, §7.

¹³³ HRC General Comment 13, 13 April 1982, §5. The HRC has since replaced this General Comment with its General Comment 32, 23 August 2007, see §31. For specific references to necessary aspects for the right to fair trial in cases involving the death penalty see §§10, 17, 38, 51.

representation on appeal, fair trial aspects of detention and delay and undue delay and the lack of a written judgment by domestic courts.

3.4.4.1 TRIAL IN PUBLIC AND THE PROHIBITION OF FORCED CONFESSIONS

While the African Charter does not specifically mention the right to public trials, the African Commission, drawing guidance from international human rights law and practice, has found that Article 7 does not allow in camera trials.¹³⁴

The rule that no one shall be compelled to testify against himself or to confess guilt (Article 14(3)(g) ICCPR) is closely related to Article 7 on the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment. The HRC has noted that Article 14(3)(g) 'must be understood in terms of the absence of any direct or indirect physical or psychological pressure from the investigating authorities on the accused, with a view to obtaining a confession of guilt. A fortiori, it is unacceptable to treat an accused person in a manner contrary to Article 7 of the Covenant in order to extract a confession'.¹³⁵ Hence the HRC has found that for the purpose of guaranteeing a fair trial Article 14(3)(g) also implies the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment.¹³⁶

3.4.4.2 THE RIGHT TO CONSULAR NOTIFICATION

An example of a claim dealt with in the Inter-American system involves the right of consular notification. In 1999 the Inter-American Court issued an Advisory Opinion dealing with the human rights obligations of the members of the OAS who were also States Parties to the Vienna Convention of Consular Relations. The Court considered that executing a foreign national who had not been notified of his or her right to contact his consulate, and had not been able to remedy this violation once informed of this right was an arbitrary deprivation of life.¹³⁷ The Inter-American Commission has used precautionary measures several times to halt executions of persons who had not been informed of their right of consular notification.¹³⁸

¹³⁴ ACHPR Civil Liberties Organisation et al. v. Nigeria, April/May 2001, §§35-39.

¹³⁵ See e.g. HRC Paul Kelly v. Jamaica, 8 April 1991; Glenford Campbell v. Jamaica, 30 March 1992, and Albert Berry v. Jamaica, 7 April 1994.

¹³⁶ See e.g. HRC Paul Kelly v. Jamaica, 8 April 1991 and General Comment 32, on Article 14, 23 August 2007, §§6, 41 and 60. See also ACHPR Malawi African Association et al. v. Mauritania, May 2000, §95 and Civil Liberties Organisation et al. v. Nigeria, April/May 2001, §40.

¹³⁷ IACHR The right to information on Consular assistance in the framework of guarantees of the due process of law, Advisory Opinion OC-16/99, 1 October 1999. See also the ICJ LaGrand judgment of 27 June 2001, discussed in Chapter I.

¹³⁸ See e.g. CIDH Humberto Leal García v. US, 30 January 2007, §47; Rubén Ramírez Cárdenas v. US, 30 January 2007, §48; Heriberto Chi Aceituno v. US, 28 September 2007, §50 (see also CIDH press release 35/08, 8 August 2008 condemning his execution) and José Ernesto Medellín v. US, 6 December 2006 and 3 January 2007. See also decision on the merits, 24 July 2008 (determining 'that the State violated Articles I, XVIII and XXVI of the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man against Mr. Medellín, with respect to the criminal conviction that led to his death sentence. Among other aspects, the IACHR determined that as a result of the State's failure to fulfill its obligation, under Article 36.1 of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, to inform Mr. Medellín of his right to consular notification and assistance, the criminal process against him did not meet the minimum standards of due process and a fair trial required under Articles XVIII and XXVI of the American Declaration. The Commission concluded that if

3.4.4.3 FREEDOM FROM EX POST FACTO LAWS

The Inter-American Court has also dealt with freedom from ex post facto laws. In Fermin Ramírez v. Guatemala (2005) it pointed out that the procedural guarantees delimiting the State's power to prosecute and punish individuals in a democratic society are particularly important in the context of the death penalty.¹³⁹ In order to establish his dangerousness, the sentencing tribunal had changed the legal qualification of the crime and introduced (and held as established) new facts and circumstances that the petitioner had not been charged with.¹⁴⁰ The Inter-American Court added that the introduction of the criterion of future dangerousness in the domestic legislation was incompatible with the freedom from ex post facto laws in Article 9 ACHR.¹⁴¹

3.4.4.4 INDEPENDENCE AND IMPARTIALITY OF THE JUDICIARY

One very important claim relates to the independence and impartiality of the judiciary. In Öcalan the ECtHR found that the petitioner had not been tried by an independent and impartial tribunal within the meaning of Article 6(1) ECHR, which was not in conformity 'with the strict standards of fairness required in cases involving capital sentence'.¹⁴² He had to 'suffer the consequences of the imposition of that sentence for nearly three years'. The imposition of the death penalty 'following an unfair trial by a Court whose independence and impartiality were open to doubt amounted to inhuman treatment in violation of Article 3'.¹⁴³

Although it had already found that the execution of the petitioner would violate Protocol No. 6 the Bosnia Chamber considered whether the execution would be in conformity with Article 2 ECHR.¹⁴⁴ It pointed out that the procedural guarantees in death penalty cases must be 'of the the State executed Mr. Medellín based on those proceedings, it would commit an irreparable violation of his fundamental right to life, protected by Article I of the American Declaration. The IACHR thus recommended, among other things, that the State vacate the death penalty imposed on Mr. Medellín and hold a new trial in accordance with the protections prescribed under the American Declaration-equality, due process, and a fair trial, including the right to competent legal representation', see press release 33/08 of 6 August 2008, condemning his execution). See also the ICJ's provisional measures in the Avena interpretation case, Chapter I.

¹³⁹ IACHR Fermin Ramírez v. Guatemala, 20 June 2005, §78.

¹⁴⁰ Id., §§65-80. It referred to the principle of coherence or correlation between the charge and the sentence, meaning that the sentence should be based only on the facts and circumstances in the original charges. It referred to ECtHR Pelissier and Sassi v. France, 25 March 1999, §§51-54 (observing that Article 6 (3)(a) ECHR gives the defendant the right 'to be informed not only of the cause of the accusation, that is to say the acts he is alleged to have committed and on which the accusation is based, but also the legal characterization given to those acts').

¹⁴¹ IACHR Fermin Ramírez v. Guatemala, 20 June 2005, §§87-98. The Court also found a violation of a the minimum guarantee of prior notification of the charges (Article 8 (2)(b)) and of adequate time and means for the preparation of the defence (Article 8 (2)(c)).

¹⁴² ECtHR Grand Chamber Öcalan v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 May 2005, §174.

¹⁴³ ECtHR Grand Chamber Öcalan v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 May 2005, §§174 (but see partly Dissenting Opinion Wildhaber, Costa, Caflisch, Türmen, Garlicki and Borrego Borrego arguing that the domestic court had been independent and impartial; see also the partly Dissenting Opinion by Costa, Caflisch, Türmen and Borrego Borrego arguing that even if the domestic court had not been independent and impartial this would not have constituted a breach of Article 3).

¹⁴⁴ Bosnia Chamber Sretko Damjanović v. Fed. BiH, 5 September 1997 (merits). See, however, the concurring opinion of Nowak and Möller pointing out that it was irrelevant whether the imposition of the death penalty before December 1995 was in accordance with the law at that time and whether the sentence was imposed by an independent and impartial court after a fair highest order'.¹⁴⁵ A strict approach must be taken to the requirements of independence and impartiality of judges. It pointed out that members of the District Military Court that convicted the petitioner were not legally protected against removal. Such protection 'must normally be considered an essential requirement of independence'. In this case the relevant court 'lack a sufficient appearance of independence' and could therefore not be regarded as a 'court' for the purposes of Article 2(1) ECHR.¹⁴⁶ The African Commission has also emphasized the importance of an independent and impartial judiciary.¹⁴⁷ In the Saro-Wiwa case it found that the special tribunals in Nigeria violated Article 7(1)(d) African Charter 'because their composition is at the discretion of the executive branch'.¹⁴⁸ In violation of this article, tribunals composed of persons belonging largely to the executive branch of government create the 'appearance, if not actual, lack of impartiality', simply by their composition and '(r)egardless of the character of the individual members of such tribunals'.¹⁴⁹ It has also found that the composition alone of the Special Courts in Sudan violated Article 7 (1)(d) by creating 'the impression, if not the reality, of lack of impartiality'. The government had the duty to provide the structures necessary for the exercise of this right. "By providing for courts whose impartiality is not guaranteed, it has violated article 26". The Commission added that the State had violated both articles as well by dismissing more than 100 'judges who were opposed to the formation of special courts and military tribunals' "To deprive courts of the personnel qualified to ensure that they operate impartially thus denies the right to individuals to have their case heard by such bodies".¹⁵⁰ trial or not because after the entry into force of the Dayton Peace Agreement execution of a death penalty would constitute 'a violation of the constitutional obligation to secure the absolute right not to be executed', as contained in Article 1 Second OP, listed in Annex I of the Constitution.

¹⁴⁵ Bosnia Chamber Sretko Damjanović v. Fed. BiH, 5 September 1997 (merits), §38.

¹⁴⁶ Id., §§40-42. See also Herak v. Fed. BiH, 12 June 1998.

¹⁴⁷ See also Chapter XII, section 2.9, discussing provisional measures to protect independence of the judiciary.

¹⁴⁸ ACHPR International PEN et al. (on behalf of Ken Saro-Wiwa) v. Nigeria, 31 October 1998, §86.

¹⁴⁹ ACHPR Constitutional Rights Project (in respect of Zamani Lakwot and 6 others) v. Nigeria, October 1994, §§13-14. See also Constitutional Rights Project (in respect of Akamu et al.) v. Nigeria, undated/8th Annual Activity Report/1995, §12. It also found a violation in a case against Mauritania. "Withdrawing criminal procedure from the competence of the Court established within the judicial order and conferring it to an extension of the executive necessarily compromises the impartiality of the Court, to which the African Charter refers. Independent of the quality of the persons sitting in such jurisdictions, their very existence constitutes a violation of the principles of impartiality and independence of the judiciary and, thereby, of article 7(1)(d)". Moreover, by establishing a section within the special domestic tribunal, responsible for matters relating to state security, Mauritania was 'reneging on its duty to guarantee the independence of the Court' in violation of Article 26 ACHPR. ACHPR Malawi African Association et al. v. Mauritania, 11 May 2000, §§98-100.

¹⁵⁰ ACHPR Amnesty International et al. v. Sudan, November 1999, §§68-69. In an unedited version of a decision against Malawi (that cannot be found as such in the official version) the Commission considered that under Article 7(1)(a) and (c) ACHPR individuals have a right to be tried by a court that is not only impartial, but also competent. This 'follows from the other articles and the spirit of the Charter' "To fail to ensure that judges have legal training and that rules of evidence are applied illustrates that the government has neglected its duty to provide courts that are of sufficient competence to satisfy Article 26 of the Charter". Achutan (on behalf of Aleke Banda) and Amnesty International (on behalf of Orton and Vera Chirwa) v. Malawi, October/November 1994, at <dcregistry.com/users/ACHPR/index2.html>.

3.4.4.5 RIGHTS OF AMNESTY, PARDON OR COMMUTATION AND THE PROHIBITION TO EXECUTE PERSONS PENDING JUDICIAL OR ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEEDINGS

There have also been claims about the procedural rights involving requests for amnesty, pardon or commutation. The HRC seems to take a more restrictive approach than the Inter-American Court. In Fermin Ramírez v. Guatemala (2005) the Inter-American Court found a violation of Article 4(6) because an appropriate possibility for requesting clemency was lacking. It pointed out that clemency formed part of the international corpus iuris.¹⁵¹ In Kennedy v. Trinidad and Tobago (2002) the HRC decided that the right to seek commutation was not governed by the procedural guarantees of Article 14 and that it was within the discretion of States to spell out the modalities of the exercise of this right.¹⁵²

Yet, no execution should take place pending appeal or other recourse procedure, nor pending pardon or commutation proceedings (Article 6(4) jo. 14(5) ICCPR). A similar provision can be found in Article 4(6) ACHR. This is directly related to the purpose of the provisional measures: halting executions pending the proceedings before the HRC. As one member of the Committee put it, its Rule on provisional measures 'had in fact been designed to guarantee' that those sentenced to death should be able to exhaust all remedies.¹⁵³

3.4.4.6 RIGHT TO COUNSEL

The extensive case law of the HRC, in cases in which it previously used provisional measures, indicates the types of situations in which provisional measures are likely to be invoked in the future as well. One situation obviously is that involving complaints regarding the right to counsel.

The HRC has determined it is 'imperative' or 'axiomatic' that 'legal assistance be available at all stages of the proceedings in capital cases'.¹⁵⁴ This includes any preliminary hearings and the relevant appeals as well.¹⁵⁵ Equally, the absence of an assigned counsel during summing up constitutes ineffective assistance of counsel in violation of this article.¹⁵⁶ The HRC has equally noted ¹⁵¹ IACHR Fermin Ramírez v. Guatemala, 20 June 2005, §§104-110.

¹⁵² HRC Kennedy v. Trinidad and Tobago, 26 March 2002.

¹⁵³ HRC Summary Record of the 1352nd meeting: Trinidad and Tobago, 26 July 1994, CCPR/C/SR/1352, 31 July 1996, §21 (Bruni Celli; Venezuela).

¹⁵⁴ See e.g. HRC Frank Robinson v. Jamaica, 30 March 1989 (provisional measures were not applied in this case since his death sentence was already commuted before he petitioned the HRC). See further E.B. v. Jamaica, 26 October 1990, §5.4. See also W.W. v. Jamaica, 26 October 1990; Daniel Pinto v. Trinidad and Tobago, 20 July 1990; Carlton Reid v. Jamaica, 20 July 1990; Paul Kelly v. Jamaica, 8 April 1991; Raphael Henry v. Jamaica, 1 November 1991; Glenford Campbell v. Jamaica, 30 March 1992; Trevor Collins v. Jamaica, 25 March 1993; Robinson LaVende v. Trinidad and Tobago, 29 October 1997; Abdool Saleem Yasseen and Noel Thomas v. Republic of Guyana, 30 March 1998; Clarence Marshall v. Jamaica, 30 November 1998 and Christopher Brown v. Jamaica, 23 March 1999.

¹⁵⁵ See e.g. HRC Osbourne Wright and Eric Harvey v. Jamaica, 27 October 1995 and Clarence Marshall v. Jamaica, 3 November 1998 (a violation of Article 14(3)(d) because the court commenced and proceeded through a whole day of the preliminary hearing without informing the petitioner of his right to legal representation).

¹⁵⁶ HRC Christopher Brown v. Jamaica, 23 March 1999. The Committee recalled that the State party should ensure that counsel, once assigned, provide effective representation of the accused. It considered that 'it should have been apparent to the trial judge that counsel was not providing that the denial of legal aid constitutes a violation of Article 14(1) jo. 2(3).¹⁵⁷ Still, ‘the mere absence of the defence counsel at some limited time during the proceedings does not in itself constitute a violation of the Covenant’. It ‘must be assessed on a case-by-case basis whether counsel’s absence was incompatible with the interests of justice’.¹⁵⁸ It is axiomatic in capital cases that the accused be represented not only for the trial but also for the preliminary inquiry.¹⁵⁹ In a case against Ukraine the HRC considered a violation of Article 14(1) that the petitioner had no counsel during the first five months of detention. During this period he had been interrogated by police officers and the capital crime of which he was accused was being reconstructed without his participation. In the same case it also found a violation of Article 14(3)(d) because the Supreme Court heard his case in his absence and in the absence of his counsel.¹⁶⁰ Indeed, Article 14(3)(d) also stipulates the right to be tried in one’s presence. In one case against Georgia the HRC noted that it was uncontested that the petitioners were forced to be absent during long periods of the trial, that one of the petitioners was not represented for part of the trial and that two others were represented by lawyers whose services they had refused. They were not allowed to conduct their own defence or to be represented by lawyers of their choice.¹⁶¹ The HRC has also pronounced itself on the availability of information to the defendant. In a 1997 case against Jamaica the petitioner did not have the documents of a statement in which someone else confessed to the murder for which the petitioner had been sentenced to death. The Committee noted that the State party had not explained why this alleged statement was never made available to him or to his counsel. It found that the failure to provide him with legal aid had denied him the opportunity to have inquiries made about the matter and to pursue such domestic legal remedies as may have been available to him.¹⁶²

Regional adjudicators have also dealt with this issue. In Öcalan, for instance, the ECtHR found a violation of the rights of the defence because the petitioner had no access to a lawyer while in police custody, he ‘was unable to communicate with his lawyers out of the hearing of officials, restrictions had been imposed on the number and length of his lawyers’ visits to him, he effective representation of the accused’. This should have been apparent ‘at the latest when he noticed that counsel was absent when he started his summing-up’.

¹⁵⁷ HRC Rawle Kennedy v. Trinidad and Tobago, 26 March 2002.

¹⁵⁸ HRC Clarence Marshall v. Jamaica, 3 November 1998.

¹⁵⁹ HRC Steve Shaw v. Jamaica, 2 April 1998. See also Clive Johnson v. Jamaica, 20 October 1998. In this case the State party had not contested that the petitioner was not represented during the preliminary hearing but had merely stated that there was no indication that he had requested a lawyer. The Committee considered that “when the author appeared at the preliminary hearing without a legal representative, it would have been incumbent upon the investigating magistrate to inform the author of his right to have legal representation and to ensure legal representation for the author, if he so wished”. See further Christopher Brown v. Jamaica, 23 March 1999. In this case the HRC noted from the trial transcript that the petitioner’s representative was absent during the deposition of two prosecution witnesses at the preliminary hearing and that the magistrate continued the hearing of the witnesses and only adjourned when the petitioner indicated that he did not wish to cross-examine the witnesses himself. After two adjournments where the lawyer again did not turn up, the judge appointed new counsel for the petitioner, but this counsel declined to cross-examine the witnesses. The Committee found a violation of Article 14(3)(d). “In the present case, the Committee is of the opinion that the magistrate, when aware of the absence of the author’s defence counsel, should not have proceeded with the deposition of the witnesses without allowing the author an opportunity to ensure the presence of his counsel”.

¹⁶⁰ HRC Azer Garyverdy ogly Aliiev v. Ukraine, 7 August 2003.

¹⁶¹ It found a violation of Article 14(3)(d) in respect of all four petitioners. HRC Victor P. Domukovsky, Zaza Tsiklauri, Petre Gelbakhiani and Irakli Dokvadze v. Georgia, 6 April 1998.

¹⁶² This amounted to a violation of Article 14(3)(d) in conjunction with Article 2(3) ICCPR. HRC Maurice Thomas v. Jamaica, 3 November 1997.

was unable to consult the case-file until an advanced stage of the proceedings and his lawyers did not have sufficient time to consult the file properly'.¹⁶³

The African Commission has noted that 'especially in serious cases, which carry the death penalty, the accused should be represented by a lawyer of his choice'. "The purpose of this provision is to ensure that the accused has confidence in his legal counsel. Failure to provide for this may expose the accused to a situation where he will not be able to give full instructions to his counsel for lack of confidence".¹⁶⁴ Assigning of military counsel to accused persons, against their objections, 'and especially in a criminal proceeding which carries the ultimate punishment' violates Article 7(1)(c) ACHPR.¹⁶⁵ Giving sentencing tribunals the power to veto the choice of counsel of defendants is 'an unacceptable infringement' of the right to freely choose one's counsel. "There should be an objective system of licensing advocates, so that qualified advocates cannot be barred from appearing in particular cases. It is essential that the national bar be an independent body which regulates legal practitioners, and that the tribunals themselves not adopt this role, which will infringe on the right to defence".¹⁶⁶ The African Commission added that it was desirable for indigent defendants that they were represented 'at state expense', but 'even in such cases, the accused should be able to choose from a list the preferred independent counsel "not acting under the instructions of government but responsible only to the accused"'.¹⁶⁷

3.4.4.7 ADEQUATE TIME AND FACILITIES TO PREPARE A DEFENCE

The HRC explains the right to have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of the defence as an important element of the guarantee of a fair trial and a corollary or 'emanation' of the principle of equality of arms. Particularly in capital cases it is axiomatic that sufficient time must be granted to the accused and counsel and this requirement applies to all stages of the judicial proceedings.¹⁶⁸ At the same time 'the State party cannot be held accountable for lack of preparation or alleged errors made by defence lawyers unless it has denied the author and his counsel time to prepare the defence or it should have been manifest to the court that the lawyers' conduct was incompatible with the interests of justice'.¹⁶⁹ In the absence of information or objection from the State party the HRC found a violation of Article 14(2) in Saidov v. Tajikistan

¹⁶³ This constituted violations of Article 6(1), together with Article 6 (3)(b)(c). See ECHR (Grand Chamber), Öcalan v. Turkey, Judgment of 12 May 2005, §173.

¹⁶⁴ ACHPR Civil Liberties Organisation et al. v. Nigeria, April/May 2001, §28.

¹⁶⁵ Id., §31.

¹⁶⁶ ACHPR Amnesty International et al. v. Sudan, November 1999, §64. See also Constitutional Rights Project v. Nigeria, 26th ordinary session, 13th Annual Activity Report, §12.

¹⁶⁷ ACHPR Civil Liberties Organisation et al. v. Nigeria, April/May 2001, §29. The Commission referred to early case law of the HRC involving Uruguay and to its own Resolution on the Right to Recourse and Fair Trial (1992). See also ACHPR Malawi African Association et al. v. Mauritania, May 2000, §96 (no access or restricted access to counsel and insufficient time to prepare for the defence in violation of Article 7(1)(c)) and idem, §97 (Article 7(c)(1) requires charges in language defendants understand).

¹⁶⁸ HRC Clifton Wright v. Jamaica, 27 July 1992; Paul Kelly v. Jamaica, 8 April 1991; Aston Little v. Jamaica, 1 November 1991; Leaford Smith v. Jamaica, 31 March 1993 and Alrick Thomas v. Jamaica, 31 March 1992.

¹⁶⁹ See e.g. HRC Errol Smith and Oval Stewart v. Jamaica, 8 April 1999. It has discussed Article 14 (3)(b) and (e) in other situations as well. See e.g. Yasseen and Thomas v. Guyana, 30 March 1998.

(2004). ‘Due to the extensive and adverse pre-trial coverage by state-directed media’ the petitioner’s right to be presumed innocent had been violated.¹⁷⁰

3.4.4.8 RIGHT TO APPEAL AND EFFECTIVE REPRESENTATION ON APPEAL

In some States the issue of the availability of legal aid for constitutional motions is of crucial importance.¹⁷¹ The ICCPR does not require States to provide for several instances of appeal, but if domestic law provides for further instances Article 14(5) requires that the convicted person indeed has access to each of them.¹⁷² In death penalty cases the availability of legal representation is a prerequisite for a fair hearing. This also applies to hearings on constitutional issues, especially as these are often quite complicated. When the HRC refers to the requirements of a fair hearing in such cases, it does not argue that Article 14(3)(d) is directly applicable, but it states that in death penalty cases the requirements found in Article 14(3)(d) must be read into Article 14(1).¹⁷³

The right to a fair trial extends to the right to review by a higher tribunal according to law (Article 14(5) ICCPR). The Committee takes ‘according to law’ in Article 14(5) to mean that when domestic law provides for more than one instance of appeal in criminal cases, the convicted person must indeed have effective access to each of these instances of appeal.¹⁷⁴ Of course it is a prerequisite for Article 14(1) that the petitioner is informed about the date of the appeal hearing before it takes place.¹⁷⁵ The most important factor the HRC has examined in relation to the right to effective representation during appeal is whether counsel had abandoned (grounds for) the appeal. It has found violations of Article 14(3)(d) and (5) when counsel had abandoned all grounds of appeal and when the court had not ascertained whether this was in accordance with the wishes of the client.¹⁷⁶

¹⁷⁰ HRC Gaibullodzhon Ilyasovich Saidov (submitted by his wife Barno Saidova) v. Tajikistan, 8 July 2004.

¹⁷¹ See the discussion of exhaustion of domestic remedies and the use of provisional measures, Chapter XIV, section 2.2.2.

¹⁷² See, e.g., HRC Anthony Currie v. Jamaica, 29 March 1994; Lloyd Grant v. Jamaica, 31 March 1994; Patrick Taylor v. Jamaica, 18 July 1997; Desmond Taylor v. Jamaica, 2 April 1998 (Ando, Bhagwati, Buergenthal and Kretzmer dissenting) and Steve Shaw v. Jamaica, 2 April 1998 (Ando, Bhagwati, Buergenthal and Kretzmer dissenting). See also Clive Johnson v. Jamaica, 20 October 1998 (in this case the Committee considered that, in light of its other findings it was not necessary to address counsel’s claim that the absence of legal aid for the purpose of filing a constitutional motion in itself constituted a violation of the Covenant).

¹⁷³ The HRC has also found a violation of Article 14(3)(d) because of the denial of legal aid ‘which contributed to the further delay in the author’s application for leave to appeal to the Privy Council’. Maurice Thomas v. Jamaica, 3 November 1997. See further Raphael Henry v. Jamaica, 1 November 1991 and Robinson LaVende v. Trinidad and Tobago, 29 October 1997. The Inter-American Commission has made a similar argument, invoking Articles 8(1) and 25 ACHR, see e.g. CIDH Lamey, Mykoo, Montique and Dalton v. Jamaica, 4 April 2001, (fifth recommendation); Joseph Thomas v. Jamaica, 3 December 2001 (fourth recommendation); Denton Aitken v. Jamaica, 21 October 2002 (fifth recommendation) and Sewell v. Jamaica, 27 December 2003 (fourth recommendation).

¹⁷⁴ HRC Raphael Henry v. Jamaica, 1 November 1991.

¹⁷⁵ HRC Alrick Thomas v. Jamaica, 31 March 1992.

¹⁷⁶ HRC Carlton Reid v. Jamaica, 20 July 1990; Paul Kelly v. Jamaica, 8 April 1991; Trevor Collins v. Jamaica, 25 March 1993; Tony Jones v. Jamaica, 6 April 1998. See also e.g. George Graham and Arthur Morrison v. Jamaica, 25 March 1996; Rickly Burrell v. Jamaica, 18 July 1996; McCordie Morrison v. Jamaica, 3 November 1998, and Errol Smith and Oval Stewart v. Jamaica, 8 April 1999. On this issue see also Spronken (2001), pp. 447-449.

The African Commission has pointed out about the right of appeal that Article 7(1)(a) ACHPR is clearly violated by the ‘foreclosure of any avenue of appeal to competent national organs in a criminal case attracting punishment as severe as the death penalty’.¹⁷⁷ “For an appeal to be effective, the appellate jurisdiction must, objectively and impartially, consider both the elements of fact and of law that are brought before it”.¹⁷⁸ All provisions of Article 7(1) are ‘mutually dependent, and where the right to be heard is infringed, other violations may occur, such as detentions being rendered arbitrary’. “Especially sensitive is the definition of ‘competent’, which encompasses facets such as the expertise of the judges and the inherent justice of the laws under which they operate”.¹⁷⁹ In 2000 the African Commission found Sierra Leone in violation of due process (Article 7(1) (a) ACHPR) for executing 24 soldiers without having granted them the right of appeal.¹⁸⁰ Moreover, it found a violation of the right to life (Article 4), stressing this right ‘is the fulcrum of all other rights. It is the fountain through which other rights flow, and any violation of this right without due process amounts to arbitrary deprivation of life’.¹⁸¹

3.4.4.9 UNDUE DELAY

There is a clear link between the right to be brought promptly before a judicial officer (Article 9(3) ICCPR) and the right to habeas corpus (Article 9(4)). This link often shows itself in the issue of access to legal representation.¹⁸² Moreover, the right of persons charged with a criminal offence to be informed promptly and in detail of the charges against them (Article 14 (3)(a)) is closely related to, but more precise than, Article 9(2). Article 9(2) stipulates that anyone who is arrested shall be informed, at the time of arrest, of the reasons for his arrest and shall be promptly informed of any charges against him. However, as long as Article 9(3) is indeed complied with, a violation of Article 9(2) does not necessarily imply a violation of Article 14(3)(a).¹⁸³ In other words, as long as the authorities have complied with Article 9(3), Article 14(3)(a) does not require them to provide the details of the nature and cause of the charge immediately upon arrest.¹⁸⁴

¹⁷⁷ ACHPR Civil Liberties Organisation et al. v. Nigeria, April/May 2001, §35. See also Constitutional Rights Project (in respect of Lakwot and 6 others) v. Nigeria, 1995, §11 and Constitutional Rights Project (in respect of Akamu et al.) v. Nigeria, undated/8th annual activity report 1995, §11.

¹⁷⁸ ACHPR Malawi African Association et al. v. Mauritania, 11 May 2000, §94.

¹⁷⁹ ACHPR Amnesty International et al. v. Sudan, November 1999, §61.

¹⁸⁰ They were executed on 19 October 1998, some of them in violation of provisional measures by the HRC, see e.g. Chapter XVII (Official responses). The Sierra Leonean NGO Forum of Conscience brought the case before the African Commission five days after the executions took place.

¹⁸¹ ACHPR Forum of Conscience v. Sierra Leone, October/November 2000, §19. As noted, the initial submission in this case was five days after the execution, which explains why no provisional measures were used.

¹⁸² HRC Stephens v. Jamaica, 18 October 1995. The HRC found a violation of Article 9(3) because of a delay of eight days, but it did not find a violation of Article 9(4) because there was no evidence that the petitioner or his legal representative had requested a prompt decision on the lawfulness of his detention. The availability of counsel seems crucial, since in other cases in which it found violations of Article 9(3) the HRC mentioned the denial of access to legal representation as an aggravating factor. In such cases it did find a violation of the right to habeas corpus (Article 9(4)). See also Glenford Campbell v. Jamaica, 30 March 1992; Albert Berry v. Jamaica, 7 April 1994 and Clifford McLawrence v. Jamaica, 18 July 1997.

¹⁸³ HRC Clifford McLawrence v. Jamaica, 18 July 1997, see especially §5.9.

¹⁸⁴ Id. In this case, however, the Committee had found a violation of Article 9(3) when it stated that a delay of one week in a capital case could not be deemed compatible with that paragraph and

The General Comment on the right to liberty and security of persons (Article 9) stipulates that ‘pre-trial detention should be an exception and as short as possible’.¹⁸⁵ The Committee has found that, in the absence of a satisfactory explanation by the State party, a delay ranging from 23 months to more than three years in bringing the petitioner to trial, during which he is kept in pre-trial detention, constituted not only a violation of Article 14(3)(c) but also of the entitlement to trial within reasonable time or release (Article 9(3)).¹⁸⁶ The HRC may also find a violation of Article 9(3) but not of 14(3)(c). If the HRC only recommends commutation in the context of a violation of Article 14, this choice is significant as provisional measures used in cases involving a claim of a violation of Article 9 alone do not seem to be related to the right to reparation.¹⁸⁷ It has concluded that a delay of almost four years between the judgment of the Court of Appeal and the beginning of the retrial, a period during which the petitioner was kept in detention, cannot be deemed compatible with the provisions of Articles 9(3) and 14(3)(c), ‘in the absence of any explanations from the State party justifying the delay’.¹⁸⁸ In other cases it declared the claim inad-neither could the pre-trial detention of more than 16 months. The Committee had indeed found a violation of Article 9(2) when it stated that it must rely on the petitioner’s statement that he was only apprised of the charges for his arrest when he was first taken to the preliminary hearing almost three weeks after the arrest. It noted that the duty to inform the accused under Article 14(3)(a) is ‘more precise’ than that for arrested persons under Article 9(2). Given the fact that in this case the Committee had concluded that the State had not complied with Article 9(3) its reasoning in declaring no violation of Article 14(3)(a) is puzzling.

¹⁸⁵ HRC General Comment No. 8 on the right to liberty and security of persons (Article 9), 30 June 1982.

¹⁸⁶ See e.g. HRC Christopher Brown v. Jamaica, 23 March 1999; Steve Shaw v. Jamaica, 2 April 1998; Beresford Whyte v. Jamaica, 27 July; Anthony Finn v. Jamaica, 31 July 1998; Clive Smart v. Trinidad and Tobago, 29 July 1998; Zephiniah Hamilton v. Jamaica, 23 July 1999; Desmond Taylor v. Jamaica, 2 April 1998; E. Henry and E. Douglas v. Jamaica, 25 July 1996 and Oral Hendricks v. Guyana, 22 October 2002.

¹⁸⁷ See further Chapter XIII (Protection). In the following two cases provisional measures were used, but the claim was not based on Article 9 ICCPR alone. Andrew Perkins v. Jamaica, 30 July 1998, the petitioner was only brought to trial after one year and nine months, and remanded in custody for that period. The HRC found a violation of Article 9(3) but deemed that, in the circumstances, there was no need to address the question of whether the delay also constitutes a violation of Article 14(3)(c). See also Everton Morrison v. Jamaica, 27 July 1998. The delay of 1,5 year between arrest and trial was only a ‘matter of concern’ but did not amount to a violation of Article 9(3) ‘since he was detained on a murder charge’ nor of Article 14(3)(c) ‘because the preliminary enquiry took place during that period’. Medina Quiroga dissented on this issue arguing that ‘if a delay is a matter of concern the Committee cannot conclude that there is no violation unless the State has given an explanation about the reasons for the delay’. She pointed out that the Committee itself had taken this position when it decided on the admissibility of the claim and invited the State ‘to provide more precise information as to the investigations carried out during the period between the arrest and the preliminary enquiry and to inform the Committee of the exact dates of the preliminary hearings’. As the State simply responded to this request by repeating its earlier statement, she concluded that the Committee should have found a violation of Article 9(3).

¹⁸⁸ HRC Leroy Shalto v. Trinidad and Tobago, 4 April 1995. See also Sahadeo v. Guyana, 1 November 2001. In another case it found that the delay of one year and nine months between the Court of Appeal judgment that a re-trial should take place and the beginning of the re-trial could not be attributed solely to the State party and thus did not disclose a violation of the Covenant. Christopher Brown v. Jamaica, 23 March 1999. In the absence of any circumstances justifying it, the HRC did consider that a delay of one year and eleven months between trial and appeal constituted a violation of Article 14(3)(c) and (5). Samuel Thomas v. Jamaica, 31 March 1999; see also Clifford McLawrence v. Jamaica, 18 July 1997 (delay of two years and seven months; in missible noting that it was clear that such delays in the appeal proceedings were essentially attributable to the petitioner.¹⁸⁹

About the relevance of the economic situation as a justification for undue delay the HRC has pointed out that ‘the rights set forth in the Covenant constitute minimum standards which all States parties have agreed to observe’.¹⁹⁰

3.4.4.10 THE LACK OF A WRITTEN JUDGMENT BY DOMESTIC COURTS

Some claims based on Article 14(3)(c) and 14(5) ICCPR have related specifically to the lack of written judgment by domestic courts.¹⁹¹ This has been relevant in many cases involving Jamaica. In Clement Francis v. Jamaica (1995)¹⁹² the HRC found that the ‘inordinate delay in issuing a note of oral judgment’ entailed a violation of Article 14 paragraphs 3(c) and 5, ‘although it appears that the delay did not ultimately prejudice the author’s appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council’.

The lack of written judgment on appeal results in a denial of the possibility to effectively appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (JCPC) in London. The JCPC allegedly routinely dismisses petitions that are not accompanied by the written judgment of the lower court. The Jamaican Constitution provides for appeals from a decision of the Jamaican Court of Appeal to the JCPC. Thus, the failure of the Court of Appeal to issue a written judgment resulted in a violation of Article 14(5).¹⁹³ Equally, the HRC has determined that the dismissal of an application for leave to appeal, ‘without reasons given and in the absence of a written judgment’ constitutes a violation of Article 14(5).¹⁹⁴ When the Court of Appeal does not produce a written judgment the petitioner is prevented from effectively petitioning the JCPC for special leave to appeal.¹⁹⁵ this case it even observed that in the absence of any State party justification it would make such a finding in similar circumstances in other cases. This was a clear warning to the State party for future cases); Silbert Daley v. Jamaica, 31 July 1998 (delay of two years and seven months); Errol Smith and Oval Stewart v. Jamaica, 8 April 1999 (delay of two years and one month) and Errol Johnson v. Jamaica, 22 March 1996 (delay of four years and three months).

¹⁸⁹ HRC Clive Smart v. Trinidad and Tobago, 29 July 1998. The Committee referred to the contents of an addendum in the Court of Appeal judgement that stated: “It was clear to us all that the appellant was attempting by this manoeuvre to beat the Pratt and Morgan deadline as best he could”. Sometimes it has noted that delays were not entirely attributable to the State party, as the petitioners themselves had requested adjournments. See e.g. Abdool Saleem Yasseen and Noel Thomas v. Republic of Guyana, 30 March 1998 and Lennon Stephens v. Jamaica, 18 October 1995.

¹⁹⁰ HRC Bernhard Lubuto v. Zambia, 31 October 1995. It acknowledged the difficult economic situation of the State party, but considered that the period of eight years between the arrest and the final decision of the Supreme Court, dismissing his appeal, was incompatible with the requirements of Article 14(3)(c).

¹⁹¹ See also Chapter XIV on the relationship with admissibility and jurisdiction.

¹⁹² HRC Clement Francis v. Jamaica, 25 July 1995. See also Aston Little v. Jamaica, 1 November 1991, finding a violation of Article 14(5).

¹⁹³ HRC Raphael Henry v. Jamaica, 1 November 1991.

¹⁹⁴ HRC George Winston Reid v. Jamaica, 8 July 1994.

¹⁹⁵ HRC Raphael Henry v. Jamaica, 1 November 1991. See also Victor Francis v. Jamaica, 24 March 1993. In Anthony Currie v. Jamaica, 29 March 1994 the petitioner pointed out fifteen years had passed since he was originally charged with murder and almost thirteen years since the Court of Appeal orally dismissed his appeal. No written judgment had been issued as yet. Challenging Jamaica’s statement that the JCPC had examined his case, he stated that the Privy

3.4.5 The death row phenomenon

There are at least four levels at which the death row phenomenon may come into play. The first level consists of being sentenced to death and waiting to be executed at a predetermined point in time in a predetermined, often routinised and ‘medicalised’ manner. The second level consists of the length of the wait (days/5 years/18 years/32 years?).¹⁹⁶ The third level relates to the circumstances of the wait, such as a separate death row and a rigid regime.¹⁹⁷ The final level consists of individual circumstances such as age, mental history. If step one triggers the death row phenomenon, the other steps (the length of the wait, the circumstances on a specific death row and personal factors) simply show types of aggravation. The question arises whether the HRC would use provisional measures in any or all of these situations.

While in the more recent Öcalan case the ECtHR took provisional measures to halt an execution, in Soering v. UK it did so to halt extradition to a death penalty State.¹⁹⁸ On the merits it found that the UK would violate Article 3 ECHR rather than Article 2 on the right to life (since, as noted, the majority had a strictly textual interpretation of the latter article). Its argument for finding a violation of Article 3 was based on the risk of exposure to a so called ‘death row phenomenon’.¹⁹⁹ This issue may become relevant as well in the context of a person not awaiting extradition, but already on death row, awaiting execution. As established in the Court’s case law, ill treatment must attain a minimum level of severity if it is to fall within the scope of Article 3.²⁰⁰ The ECHR concluded that the circumstances relating to a death sentence could give rise to an issue under Article 3. It gave as examples the manner in which the sentence is imposed or executed, the personal circumstances of the condemned person and disproportionality to the gravity of the crime committed, as well as the conditions of detention while awaiting execution.

“Present day attitudes in the Contracting States to capital punishment are relevant for the assessment whether the acceptable threshold of suffering or degradation has been exceeded”.

The Court concluded that extradition of Soering would result in a violation of Article 3.

“Having regard to the very long period of time spent on death row in such extreme conditions, with the ever present and mounting anguish of awaiting execution of the death penalty, and to the personal circumstances of the applicant, especially his age and mental state at the time of the offence, the applicant’s extradition to the US would expose him to real risk of treatment going beyond the threshold set by art. 3. A further consideration of relevance is that in the particular

Council merely denied him leave to appeal, because he was unable to meet the requirements of its rules of procedure.; see also Paul Kelly v. Jamaica, 8 April 1991; Lenford Hamilton v. Jamaica, 21 March 1994 and Trevor Collins v. Jamaica, 25 March 1993.

¹⁹⁶ In the case S v. Makwanyane and Mchunu of the Constitutional Court of South Africa, 1995 (2) SACR 1 (CC), Justice Kentridge, for instance, has said: ‘the mental agony of the criminal, in its alternation of fear, hope and despair must be present even when the time between sentence and execution is measured in months or weeks rather than years’.

¹⁹⁷ In Missouri persons sentenced to death are incarcerated together with other long-term prisoners, rather than on a separate death row, see: Lombardi, Sluder & Wallace (1997), pp. 2-11. If it would be the physical circumstance of a separate death row alone that would trigger the death row phenomenon, Missouri would not produce it.

¹⁹⁸ On provisional measures to halt refoulement see Chapter V.

¹⁹⁹ The following discussion is partly based on Rieter (2002b). See on the death row phenomenon, e.g. Schmidt (2000); Schabas (1996) and Schabas (1994).

²⁰⁰ ECtHR Ireland v. United Kingdom, Judgment of 13 Dec. 1977; Tyrer v. United Kingdom, Judgment of 25 April 1978 (the Court, referring to the convention as a ‘living instrument’ declared birching minors to be contrary to article 3 of the Convention).

instance the legitimate purpose of extradition could be achieved by another means which would not involve suffering of such exceptional intensity or duration”.

It noted, moreover:

“However well-intentioned and even potentially beneficial is the provision of the complex of post-sentence procedures in Virginia, the consequence is that the condemned prisoner has to endure for many years the conditions on death row and the anguish and mounting tension of living in the ever-present shadow of death”.

The strength of the wording used by the Court indicates the importance that must be accorded to this anguish and mounting tension. It seems Soering’s youth and his mental state at the time are only taken into account as contributory factors.²⁰¹ They are not necessary to establish that the death row phenomenon violates Article 3.²⁰² Thus, in this interpretation any situation that could expose a person to the death row phenomenon would constitute a violation of Article 3.

In Reyes v. Guatemala (2005) the Inter-American Court found the conditions of detention of a person sentenced to death to violate his right to physical, psychological and moral integrity. In reference to testimony by a psychologist that the detainee was suffering from post traumatic stress and psychosomatic illnesses caused by his situation, awaiting his execution, the Court found a violation of the prohibition of cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment contrary to Article 5(2) ACHR.²⁰³

Unlike the ECtHR and the Inter-American Court the HRC, as the only international adjudicator, has not accepted that the so called death row phenomenon violates the prohibition of cruel treatment under the ICCPR. The HRC usually declares inadmissible claims relating to the death row phenomenon, without even discussing them on the merits.²⁰⁴ The remoteness of a favourable decision on the merits would make doubtful the use of provisional measures involving only a claim about this phenomenon.

Thus, different from domestic and regional courts,²⁰⁵ the HRC has thus far maintained that detention for a specific period of time does not amount to a violation of Article 7 and 10(1) ‘in the

²⁰¹ See also Shea (1992) (convincingly arguing that the death row phenomenon, rather than the specific facts in the case, was the main criterion in the Soering judgment); for a different approach see: Lillich (1991); see also Quigley/Shank (1989).

²⁰² As subsequent cases on removal to a death penalty State often were struck out or declared inadmissible, they do not clarify the position of the Strasbourg organs, see e.g. Venezia v. Italy, 21 October 1996 (struck out as domestic court had forbidden the extradition); Aylor-Davis v. France, 20 January 1994 (inadm.), (inadmissible for lack of real risk of exposure to death penalty, thanks to recipient State party’s credible assurances against the death penalty) In such cases involving possible removal to a death penalty State, the Commission always used provisional measures to prevent the removal while the case was pending. However, this does not need to be linked to the prevention of irreparable harm in the context of the death row phenomenon: all States involved have now ratified Protocol 6, meaning that the provisional measure could have been to prevent irreparable harm to the right to life of the petitioner. The fact that the Court used provisional measures to prevent Turkey from executing Öcalan may be more significant, as Turkey had not ratified Protocol 6 at the time. See Grand Chamber Öcalan v. Turkey, 12 May 2005.

²⁰³ IACHR Raxcacó Reyes v. Guatemala, 15 September 2005, §§94-102.

²⁰⁴ Part of this discussion is derived from Rieter (2002b). See further Nowak (2000b) and Schmidt (2000).

²⁰⁵ Such as the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and the Zimbabwe Supreme Court.

absence of some further compelling circumstances'.²⁰⁶ The Committee has been unwilling to consider detention conditions in relation to the death row phenomenon. These complaints, it considered, must be addressed separately.²⁰⁷

The HRC has often found violations of Articles 7 and/or 10 for beatings, threats and general conditions on death row.²⁰⁸ The Committee has not yet found a circumstance that is so compelling ²⁰⁶ See e.g. HRC Errol Johnson v. Jamaica, 22 March 1996. See further Ramcharan Bickaroo v. Trinidad and Tobago, 29 October 1997 (almost 16 years); Ramcharan Bickaroo v. Trinidad and Tobago, 29 October 1997 and Robinson LaVende v. Trinidad and Tobago, 29 October 1997 (in an individual opinion Bhagwati, Chanet, Prado Vallejo and Yalden criticised the majority's lack of flexibility; this joint individual opinion covered the cases of Bickaroo and LaVende; Gaitan de Pombo also approved the individual opinion but did not sign it; see also Henkin in Simpson v. Jamaica, 31 October 2000, attaching an individual opinion noting that, like several of his colleagues, he continued to be troubled by the Committee's formulation of the relevant principles with regard to the death row phenomenon; nevertheless, he concurred in the Committee's conclusion that the circumstances of the petitioner's case did not constitute a violation of Article 7, 'according to the jurisprudence of the Committee as formulated in previous cases' because he did not consider the present case 'an appropriate vehicle for re-examining and reformulating' the principles involved). In the extradition case Cox v. Canada, 31 October 1994 Committee member Ban (Hungary) emphasised that the decisive factor for the death row phenomenon should be psychological rather than physical. "Although I accept the notion that physical conditions play an important role when assessing the overall situation of prison inmates on death row, my conviction is that the decisive factor is rather psychological than physical; a long period spent awaiting execution or the granting of pardon or clemency necessarily entails a permanent stress, an ever increasing fear which gradually fills the mind of the sentenced individual, and which, by the very nature of this situation, amounts -depending on the length of time spent on death row- to cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment, in spite of every measure taken to improve the physical conditions of the confinement". He disagreed with the Committee's holding that the petitioner had adduced no evidence showing, for instance, that there would be unreasonable delays imputable to Pennsylvania. He referred to counsel's submission that 'nobody had been executed in Pennsylvania for more than twenty years, and there are individuals awaiting execution on death row for as much as fifteen years'. Wennergren pointed out that Pennsylvania had not executed anyone in more than twenty years. Prisoners sentenced to death are segregated from other prisoners. The fact that they are awaiting execution for so many years can be explained by the fact that Pennsylvania does not consider it appropriate to proceed with executions, rather than because those on death row avail themselves of all types of judicial appellate remedies. If this State 'considers it necessary, for policy reasons, to have resort to the death penalty as such but not necessary and not even opportune to carry out capital sentences, a condemned person's confinement to death row should, in my opinion, last for as short a period as possible, with commutation of the death sentence to life imprisonment taking place as early as possible'. "A stay for a prolonged and indefinite period of time on death row, in conditions of particular isolation and under threat of execution which might by unforeseeable changes in policy become real, is not, in my opinion, compatible with the requirements of article 7, because of the unreasonable mental stress that this implies".

²⁰⁷ See e.g. HRC Christopher Brown v. Jamaica, 23 March 1999.

²⁰⁸ See e.g. HRC McTaggart v. Jamaica, 31 March 1998 (severe beatings, belongings burnt including letters from his lawyers, a trial transcript and a copy of his petition to the Privy Council); Michael Freemantle v. Jamaica, 24 March 2000; Carlton Linton v. Jamaica, 22 October 1992 (physical abuse, a mock execution set up by prison wardens and denial of adequate medical care); Irvine Reynolds v. Jamaica, 3 April 1997; Everton Morrison v. Jamaica, 27 July 1998; Willard Collins v. Jamaica, 1 November 1991; Tony Jones v. Jamaica, 6 April 1998; Randolph Barrett and Clyde Sutcliffe v. Jamaica, 30 March 1992; Michael Robinson v. Jamaica, 29 March 2000 (excessive force) and Victor Domukovsky, Zaza Tsiklauri, Petre Gelbakhiani and that, in combination with the length of time spent on death row, it would result in inhuman or degrading treatment. In most cases if it pronounces on inhuman treatment, the Committee generally finds a separate violation of the Covenant. The fact that this inhuman treatment took place on death row seems to have no specific significance for the Committee.

Short of finding a death row phenomenon, the HRC sometimes did find violations in cases of ill treatment that are specific to persons on death row. It found, for instance, that waiting almost 20 hours before informing prisoners of a stay of execution and removing them from the death cell was a violation of Article 7.²⁰⁹ It also found violations of Articles 7 and 10(1) in a case where the petitioner was repeatedly taunted and threatened about his impending execution, in graphic detail.²¹⁰

Possibly the HRC did find a death row phenomenon in some very specific cases. In Francis v. Jamaica (1995)²¹¹ it found a violation of Articles 7 and 10(1).

“Whereas the psychological tension created by prolonged detention on death row may affect persons in different degrees, the evidence before the Committee in this case, including the author’s confused and incoherent correspondence with the Committee, indicates that his mental health seriously deteriorated during incarceration on death row. Taking into consideration the author’s description of the prison conditions, including his allegations about regular beatings inflicted upon him by warders, as well as the ridicule and strain to which he was subjected during the five days he spent in the death cell awaiting execution in February 1988, which the State party has not effectively contested, the Committee concludes that these circumstances reveal a violation of Jamaica’s obligations under Articles 7 and 10, paragraph 1, of the Covenant”.²¹²

The petitioner was entitled to an ‘effective remedy, including appropriate medical treatment, compensation and consideration for an early release’.

Another case in which the Committee mentioned the psychological impact of death row is Williams v. Jamaica (1997).²¹³ It found violations of Articles 7 and 10(1) because the material before it indicated that the petitioner’s mental condition seriously deteriorated during his incarceration on death row. He did not receive any, or at least inadequate, medical treatment for his mental condition.²¹⁴ At the time of the decision the petitioner had been removed from death row, Irakli Dokvadze v. Georgia, 6 April 1998 (a finding of torture for severe beatings, physical and moral pressure including concussion and broken bones, wounding and burning, scarring, torture and threats to family). See also Chapter VI on ongoing detention situations and Chapter IX on death threats and harassment.

²⁰⁹ HRC Earl Pratt and Ivan Morgan v. Jamaica, 6 April 1989.

²¹⁰ HRC Dwayne Hylton v. Jamaica, 15 July 1994.

²¹¹ HRC Clement Francis v. Jamaica, 25 July 1995 (no provisional measures because the death sentence had already been commuted; provisional measures were used on behalf of other petitioners in earlier case, C.F. v. Jamaica, 28 July 1992 (inadm.).

²¹² HRC Clement Francis v. Jamaica, 25 July 1995.

²¹³ HRC Nathaniel Williams v. Jamaica, 4 November 1997 (classified as non-capital in 1992; the petitioner was re-sentenced to serve a further ten years at the General Penitentiary before becoming eligible for parole).

²¹⁴ Counsel had indicated that the petitioner had already displayed signs of mental disturbance at the time of the trial in December 1988. He also referred to correspondence from inmates on death row stating that the petitioner had severe mental problems and was unable to write himself. He referred to a report of a psychiatric examination in March 1992 observing that the petitioner ‘had four sticks of wooden matches occluding his left external auditory conduct (ear) which he explained was to shut out the ‘voices’ which he constantly heard discussing him’. This doctor diagnosed Williams as ‘suffering from schizophrenia of a paranoid type, unspecified personality but he was still suffering this mental condition. The Committee noted that in this case the requisite remedy for the violation of Articles 7 and 10(1) included, in particular, an entitlement to appropriate medical treatment.

In both cases the Committee took into account the psychological impact of detention on death row on the convicted prisoner. Still, it did not literally call this impact a 'death row phenomenon'. It simply condemned the lack of adequate medical treatment and called for appropriate medical treatment. The difference in remedy between the two cases can be explained by the fact that in Francis the Committee had also found a violation of Article 14(3)(c) and (5) in relation to the 'inordinate delay in issuing a note of oral judgment in his case'.

Thus, at present the HRC does not consider that a State is in violation of the Covenant if it executes a petitioner after a long period on death row. Its comments imply that it should strive to prevent executions. At the same time it recommends commutation or release only if it finds a specific violation of Article 14. It has not found that a violation of other articles, such as Articles 7 and 10, also resulted in a violation of Article 6, and that, therefore, a death sentence must be commuted.²¹⁵ Nor did it find, between 1991 and 1998, that violation of articles other than Article 14, should result in a commutation even if not a violation of Article 6. Paradoxically, this reasoning leads to the conclusion that declaring that the death row phenomenon does not violate Article 7 is the only method used by the Committee itself to reduce recourse to the death penalty in cases where it did not find a violation of Article 14. Of course, the Committee does act to reduce recourse to the death penalty in cases of unfair trial. Clearly, if a State executes a prisoner in an expedited manner, without remedying an unfair trial, this will violate the Covenant. The real dilemma for the HRC is not the legal implication of a decision that the death row phenomenon would violate Article 7, but the actual implication that the State would decide to execute a prisoner before he has had a chance to communicate to the HRC about such a violation. Such situation would only leave the HRC the option of deciding in its Concluding Observations to the State party's report under Article 40 ICCPR, that a prisoner had been executed in violation of the right of petition. If the HRC found a violation of Article 14, it would be particularly unsatisfactory if the HRC only had the possibility to refer to this as part of its Concluding Observations to the State party's report. It might very well be the case, moreover, that this way the Committee will never know of these cases.

In cases in which a prisoner would be able, after all, to petition the HRC if it would have set a clear deadline for the stay on death row, this fact could 'provide' the State party with the argument that it was respecting this deadline in executing the prisoner in disregard of provisional measures indicated by the Committee. In my view, these factual implications are the real dilemma. It did not matter what the HRC did, as the JCPC decision in Pratt and Morgan v. Attorney General (1993) had already triggered the aforementioned negative effect. More recently, this domestic court has tried to remedy this effect by clearly establishing that States could not execute prisoners in violation of the right to fair trial arguing this is necessary in order to limit the length of time on death row so as not to violate the prohibition of cruel treatment. The HRC could take a similar approach. Nevertheless, as long as there is no indication that it may be ready to change its case law in this respect, the Rapporteur should not use provisional measures in cases only claiming a death row phenomenon, because on the merits the Committee would not find a violation.

disorder and anxiety and depression, in keeping with the circumstances of his incarceration. He recommended that the author should benefit from regular psychotropic medication'. Counsel visited the petitioner on death row on 18 December 1992. He noted that Williams did not understand the questions he put to him and a senior prison officer as well as other inmates on death row told counsel that the petitioner was ill. His repeated requests for authorisation of a further medical examination had been unsuccessful.

²¹⁵ See further Chapter XIII (Protection), discussing the relationship between provisional measures and reparation.

This way the provisional measures would serve no function, within the individual complaint system, other than to postpone the inevitable.

The ECtHR has taken an approach that is different from that of the majority of the HRC. The European Court stated about the long period of time on death row: 'just as some lapse of time between sentence and execution is inevitable if appeal safeguards are to be provided to the condemned person, so it is equally part of human nature that the person will cling to life by exploiting those safeguards to the full'.²¹⁶

An element of delay between the lawful imposition of a death sentence and the exhaustion of available remedies is inherent in the review of a death sentence. Therefore even prolonged periods of detention under a severe custodial regime on death row cannot generally be considered to constitute cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment if the convicted person is merely availing himself of appellate remedies.²¹⁷

Committee member Chanet noted in dissent: 'I consider that the author can not be expected to hurry up in making appeals so he can be executed more rapidly'.

The HRC does attach importance to the question of what caused the delay. It considers that 'prolonged periods of detention under a severe custodial regime on death row cannot generally be considered to constitute cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment if the convicted person is merely availing himself of appellate remedies'.²¹⁸

That a convicted person makes use of a constitutional right for review of his case does not make his stay on death row less cruel. The fact that the prisoner clings to his life is only natural and cannot be used to argue that the time-period spent in expectation of his execution does not subject him to cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment. The prisoner's only choice is between death and death row.

4 CONCLUSION

The three regional systems, the HRC and the Bosnia Chamber have all used provisional measures to halt executions. Especially the HRC and the Inter-American Commission and Court have used such measures very often.

All adjudicators have stressed that their use of provisional measures does not imply a decision on the merits. The Inter-American Court has acknowledged the relationship between the merits of the case and the provisional measures used pending the case. It must be ensured that the State does not anticipate the case by taking action pre-empting that which is requested on the merits. At the same time the adjudicator may not prejudge the case at the stage of provisional measures. What this means in practice is that, as the Inter-American Court has put it, it 'cannot, in a provisional measure, consider the merits of any arguments pertaining to issues other than those which relate strictly to the extreme gravity and urgency and the necessity to avoid irreparable damage to persons'.²¹⁹

²¹⁶ The Supreme Court of Zimbabwe, like the European Court, considered the likely effect of the delay to be the proper test, and not the cause of the delay. When the sentence was death, the cause of the delay was immaterial, because the dehumanising character of the delay was unaltered. Per curiam it was decided '(i)t was highly artificial and unrealistic to discount the mental agony and torment experienced on death row on the basis that the condemned prisoner could have shortened his suffering by not making maximum use of the judicial process available. The cause is irrelevant for it fails to lessen the degree of suffering of the condemned person'. In approval, the Supreme Court an Indian case and the ECtHR Soering case.

²¹⁷ HRC Randolph Barrett and Clyde Sutcliffe v. Jamaica, 6 April 1992.

²¹⁸ See HRC Earl Pratt and Ivan Morgan v. Jamaica, 30 March 1992.

²¹⁹ IACHR James et al. cases, Order for provisional measures, 29 August 1998.

This chapter focussed on the unpublished provisional measures by the HRC, dealing with various components of the case law on the death penalty. Among others it dealt with the right to life as such, also referring to the case law of the ECtHR and Bosnia Chamber. The chapter observed that the ECtHR did use provisional measures in cases in which it subsequently could have gone further on the merits. In other words they have been taken also in cases in which a violation later was not, but could have been found on the basis of a more dynamic interpretation of the provisions on the right to life. The Bosnia Chamber's use of provisional measures to halt an execution fits clearly in its case law on the merits. The case law by the HRC on the right to life as such has only recently been clarified. Judge v. Canada (2003) shows that vis-à-vis non-death penalty States such measures should always be used in refolement cases involving a real risk of imposition of the death penalty, also when there are no specific concerns regarding the fairness of the proceedings or the person to be sentenced to death in the requesting State. Yet before this clarification the HRC had already used provisional measures in such cases.

Next to the right to life as such this chapter also discussed rights relating specifically to the person sentenced to death. Both the Inter-American Commission and Court and the HRC have found that the death penalty for minors and the mandatory death penalty are forbidden. This makes it obvious that provisional measures should be used pending proceedings involving such claims. It then examined case law referring to several aspects affecting the fairness of death penalty proceedings. The most important claims in death penalty cases in which the HRC has taken provisional measures involve the right to counsel, adequate time and facilities to prepare a defence, right to appeal and effective representation on appeal, fair trial aspects of detention, undue delay and the lack of a written judgment by domestic courts. The chapter indicated the varying prospect of success with such claims. Finally, this chapter dealt with the significance of the death row phenomenon, including its impact on individual petitioners and discussed the limited prospect of success on the merits. In this respect the question arises why the HRC decided to take provisional measures virtually automatically in all death penalty cases to halt executions. In view of the fact that in many cases it may then have to declare, on the basis of its previous case law, that there was no violation, one may wonder whether the object of the provisional measure was simply to postpone the suffering until after the expected finding. This would be an unsatisfactory approach to the concept of provisional measures. If the HRC (in majority) does not consider a certain situation to be in violation of the Covenant and the claim only relates to this issue while there is no indication that it will change its case law, the Rapporteur should not use provisional measures. The main example is the death row phenomenon claim. While there would be good reasons for the Committee to change its case law and find a violation of Article 7 ICCPR in at least some circumstances, as long as there are no indications that it might do so, the Rapporteur should not use provisional measures in relation to such claims.

CHAPTER IV

HALTING CORPORAL PUNISHMENT

1 INTRODUCTION

Thus far only the HRC and the Inter-American Commission have used provisional measures to halt corporal punishment. It is argued that the other human rights adjudicators would also order such provisional measures if faced with a complaint regarding the impending execution of a sentence (or disciplinary measure) of corporal punishment. After all, the prohibition of corporal punishment is widespread and based on the existing case law on the merits.¹

On the one hand, provisional measures to halt the execution of corporal punishment are similar to those to halt the execution of a death sentence. In both cases these measures appeal to the State to refrain, pending the proceedings, from carrying out a practice that, as Rodley has put it, applies rather than violates national law.² On the other hand, in the relation of these measures to the merits provisional measures to halt the execution of corporal punishment differ from those halting the execution of a death sentence. As becomes clear in section 3 of this chapter, with regard to corporal punishment the case law on the merits is rather more straightforward and uncontroversial, while the previous chapter showed that the case law on the merits regarding the situations in which the death penalty is prohibited is more complicated and therefore the choice to use provisional measures is too.

2 THE PRACTICE OF THE ADJUDICATORS TO TAKE PROVISIONAL MEASURES TO HALT CORPORAL PUNISHMENT

In June 1997, in Osbourne v. Jamaica (2000), the HRC ordered Jamaica to halt the execution of a sentence of 10 strokes of the tamarind switch.³ Counsel had argued that the use of this switch was an inherently cruel, inhuman and degrading punishment and that the actual procedure employed for flogging and whipping ‘appears to be largely at the discretion of the implementing prison authorities’.⁴ This also emphasized the risk of abuse of power.⁵ In response, Jamaica invoked the

¹ See section 3.

² Rodley (1999), p. 309.

³ HRC Osbourne v. Jamaica, 15 March 2000. This is also the first case published by the HRC that deals specifically with the issue of corporal punishment. The legislation described the tamarind switch as ‘three lengths of twigs of the tamarind tree, each forty-four to forty-eight inches long and not more than one-quarter of one inch in diameter, trimmed smoothly so that there shall be no protrusion of knots or joints and bound together with cotton twine’, Article 244(A)(3)(a) The Prison (Amendment) Rules, 7 April 1965, No 115, reproduced at <<http://www.corpun.com/japrr1.htm>> (consulted 26 April 2007).

⁴ In both Trinidad and Tobago and Jamaica flogging has taken place with the so-called cat-o-nine tails. In Jamaica the Prison (Amendment) Rules, no. 105 of 1965 explain this instrument as follows: ‘a rope whip consisting of a round wooden handle twenty inches long, and one to one and on-half inches in diameter with nine thongs of cotton cord and not more than three sixteenths of an inch in diameter and knotted at the end or whipped at the end with cotton twine’. In Jamaica the prison director could choose whether the disciplinary punishment would consist of flogging

permissibility of the sentence under domestic law as a justification for a violation of the ICCPR. The HRC, however, pointed out on the merits that ‘the constitutionality of the sentence is not sufficient to secure compliance also with the Covenant’.⁶ The second time the HRC used provisional measures to stop a State from carrying out a sentence of corporal punishment (six strokes of the tamarind switch) was in 1998 in the case of Higginson v. Jamaica (2002).⁷

The Inter-American Commission has also used precautionary measures at least once in order to halt the execution of a flogging sentence, in a case against the Bahamas. It did so in February 2003 immediately upon confirmation from the petitioner that his sentence had not yet been or whipping. Flogging would be inflicted with the cat-o-nine tails on the back of the prisoner between the shoulders and the waist. Whipping would be inflicted with a tamarind switch on the prisoner’s buttocks.

⁵ He invoked the affidavit of a former detainee who had already suffered the execution of a sentence of corporal punishment. E.P. had been sentenced to four years hard labour and six strokes of the tamarind switch. He was scheduled for release on 1 March 1997 after he had been granted a remission of his sentence for good behaviour. In his affidavit he stated that on the day before his release more than twelve correctional officers took him from his cell to another section of the prison. He protested when he realised that they were going to carry out the sentence of flogging. As a result, one of the officers hit him in the stomach. He stated that ‘an unnecessary number of prison warders (25) were present at the time of the whipping and that this added to his humiliation’, Osbourne v. Jamaica, 15 March 2000, §3.3. “He was then seized, blindfolded and ordered to remove clothing from the lower part of his body. When this was done, he was forced to lean forward across a barrel and one of the warders placed his penis in a slot in the barrel. He was then strapped in that position and struck across the buttocks with an instrument that he was unable to see”. Affidavit as discussed in Osbourne v. Jamaica, 15 March 2000, §3.3. He also noted that the doctor was the only outsider present and that this doctor did not examine him after the whipping. Affidavit as discussed in Osbourne v. Jamaica, 15 March 2000, §3.3. The Amnesty International report ‘Jamaica; a summary of concerns: a briefing for the Human Rights Committee’, October 1997, AI Index: AMR 38/07/97 referred on p. 15 to petitions filed with the HRC by Errol Pryce and George Osbourne, which were still pending at the time. The petition of Errol Pryce included an affidavit describing the circumstances of his whipping. He was the first person whipped by court order in over 20 years. Amnesty International describes the same circumstances as mentioned in the affidavit by E.P. to which the HRC refers in its View in Osbourne v. Jamaica. The only additional information it provides is that the person whipping Errol Pryce was wearing a hood covering his face and a long gown concealing his body. Newspaper articles have also referred to this case, e.g. ‘Court of appeal to decide on flogging’, B. Gayle, staff reporter, The Gleaner, 28 April 1998 and ‘Jamaican court abolishes flogging’, Reuters, CNN, 18 December 1998. In 2004 the HRC published its Views in this case, finding a violation of Article 7: Errol Pryce v. Jamaica, 15 March 2004.

⁶ HRC Osbourne v. Jamaica, 15 March 2000, §9.1. It was its firm opinion that the imposition of corporal punishment constituted cruel, inhuman and degrading punishment in violation of Article 7 ICCPR, even if it had not been carried out. Under Article 2(3)(a) ICCPR Jamaica was ‘under an obligation to provide Mr. Osbourne with an effective remedy, and should compensate him for the violation. The State party is also under an obligation to refrain from carrying out the sentence of whipping upon Mr. Osbourne. The State party should ensure that similar violations do not occur in the future by repealing the legislative provisions that allow for corporal punishment’.

⁷ HRC Higginson v. Jamaica, 28 March 2002. Higginson submitted his complaint in January 1997. He had been sentenced to several years of imprisonment with hard labour as well as six strokes of the tamarind switch. In this case the petitioner was not represented by counsel in the proceedings before the HRC. The Rapporteur used provisional measures a year later. Jamaica’s denunciation of the OP did not play a role yet as it became effective only on 23 January 1998.

carried out. The State acknowledged receipt of this request, noting that it had been ‘referred to the relevant authorities for their attention’.⁸

3 RELATION BETWEEN PROVISIONAL MEASURES TO HALT CORPORAL PUNISHMENT AND THE EXPECTED DECISION ON THE MERITS

As to punishments for disciplinary offences, Article 31 UN Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners points out that corporal punishment ‘shall be completely prohibited’.⁹ The aversion against corporal punishment is apparent as well in UN Rules dealing with juveniles in detention.¹⁰ Moreover, the punishment is prohibited in international humanitarian law.¹¹ Doctrinally it is not surprising that the HRC used provisional measures to halt corporal punishment. Already in its General Comment on Article 7 ICCPR (1992) it had pointed out that the prohibition of cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment must extend to corporal punishment.¹²

⁸ CIDH Prince Pinder v. Bahamas, 12 October 2005 (adm.), §11. The petition was based on the American Declaration. The Commission repeated its request almost two months later, but received no response other than an acknowledgment of receipt, §13 (precautionary measures of 4 February, acknowledgment of receipt of 8 April 2003; reiteration of precautionary measure on 30 May 2003; acknowledgment of receipt 30 June 2003). No information is provided in the 2003 Annual Report’s overview of precautionary measures. See also decision on the merits of 15 October 2007.

⁹ Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners, Adopted by the First United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, held at Geneva in 1955, and approved by the Economic and Social Council by its resolution 663 C (XXIV) of 31 July 1957 and 2076 (LXII) of 13 May 1977. On the language used see Rodley (1999), p. 316.

¹⁰ See e.g. United Nations Rules for the Protection of Juveniles Deprived of their Liberty, G.A. res. 45/113, annex, 45 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 49A), p. 205, A/45/49 (1990); United Nations Guidelines for the Prevention of Juvenile Delinquency (The Riyadh Guidelines), G.A. res. 45/112, annex, 45 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 49A), p. 201, A/45/49 (1990) and Standard Minimum Rules for the Administration of Juvenile Justice (“The Beijing Rules”), G.A. res. 40/33, annex 40 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 53), p. 207, A/40/53 (1985). The Commentary to the latter notes: “The provision against corporal punishment is in line with article 7 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from Being Subjected to Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, as well as the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment and the draft convention on the rights of the child”.

¹¹ See e.g. Rodley (1999), pp. 314-316.

¹² See e.g. HRC General Comment 20, 4 March 1992, §5. Like the HRC, CAT has equally shown a special interest in the abolition of corporal punishment. Such punishment ‘could constitute in itself a violation in terms of the Convention’. CAT Concluding Observations on Jordan, A/50/44, 1 May 1995, §169. See also, e.g., its Concluding Observations on Namibia, A/52/44, 6 May 1997, §150. In addition, the Committee on the Rights of the Child, supervising the Convention on the Rights of the Child, has confirmed ‘the obligation of all States parties to move quickly to prohibit and eliminate all corporal punishment and all other cruel or degrading forms of punishment of children’. Committee on the Rights of the Child General Comment No. 8 (2006) on “The right to protection from corporal punishment and other cruel or degrading forms of punishment (Articles 19; 28(2); and 37)”, CRC/C/GC/8, 2 March 2007, §2. UN Charter-based bodies have confirmed this approach: Commission on Human Rights, Res. 1997/38, E/CN.4/1997/150, April 1997 and Res. 2000/43, E/CN.4/Res. 2000/43, 20 April 2000: “Corporal punishment, including of children, can amount to cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment or even to torture”. The consecutive Special Rapporteurs on Torture (Kooijmans, Rodley, Van

The individual cases in which the HRC dealt with corporal punishment all relate to Jamaica and Trinidad and Tobago.¹³ In the latter State the punishment is still possible.¹⁴ No one but the court and the President can repeal a prisoner's flogging sentence. Flogging is also used as a means of prison discipline.¹⁵ The case of Errol Pryce v. Jamaica (2004) had been submitted in May 1997, subsequent to the carrying out of corporal punishment on the petitioner in February of that year.¹⁶ While the HRC only published its Views in 2004, this case had triggered considerable interest in 1997 and may have drawn the attention of the HRC to the possibility of using provisional measures to halt corporal punishment.¹⁷

Boven, Nowak) have taken the view that corporal punishment is inconsistent with the prohibition of torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment enshrined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. See e.g. Rapporteur Van Boven's interim report to the General Assembly A/57/173, 2 July 2002, §48, confirming the approach of the other Rapporteurs. The urgent action sent by Rapporteur Nowak to the Bahamas on behalf of a person sentenced to eight lashes with a 'cat-of-nine-tails', on 10 October 2006, confirms this view, A/HRC/4/33/Add.1., 20 March 2007, p. 16.

¹³ In most Caribbean States corporal punishment is a remainder of slavery times and was used mainly until the Second World War. For information on other sentences of flogging, next to that of Osbourne, see Amnesty International's Annual Reports 1995, 1996 and 1998. See also Amnesty's report 'Jamaica: A summary of concerns, A briefing for the Human Rights Committee, October 1997, AI Index: AMR 38/07/97. In later Annual Reports, following 1998, Amnesty International does not further discuss corporal punishment in Jamaica (the Jamaica Court of Appeal declared corporal punishment unconstitutional in December 1998).

¹⁴ Amnesty International's Annual Report 1994 refers to the case of an eleven-year-old boy who was sentenced to twenty strokes with a leather belt for possession of cocaine. He had no opportunity to appeal the sentence as it was carried out immediately. Its Annual Report 1995 mentions that subsequently there was a court hearing in this case in which the boy sought redress and compensation. See further Annual Reports 1996, 1997 and 1998. See also Amnesty International, Trinidad and Tobago: woman sentenced to corporal punishment, March 1996, AI Index: AMR 49/07/96. In its Annual Report 1999 it pointed out that at least three people may have been whipped in 1998. They had been sentenced that same year. It noted that the Court of Appeal reportedly described as 'monstrous' the fact that in August one person received fifteen lashes while the appeal of his conviction and sentence was still pending.

¹⁵ Flogging is mainly carried out at the maximum-security prison of Carrera Island, which has a special 'whipping room'. "The naked prisoner is placed face down on an adjustable bench and handcuffed. He never knows who delivers the blows – the officer is masked or the prisoner's face is turned. Many people are present during a flogging, including the prison doctor, the infirmary officer, the prison superintendent, and several other senior officials. The doctor is responsible for examining the prisoner's heart rate, blood pressure, respiratory rate and other signs both before and after the flogging. S/he can suspend the flogging or whipping if s/he considers that the prisoner is physically unfit to withstand the punishment". Amnesty International, Trinidad and Tobago: woman sentenced to corporal punishment, March 1996, AI Index: AMR 49/07/96, p. 2.

¹⁶ HRC Errol Pryce v. Jamaica, 15 March 2004 (finding a violation of Article 7). Amnesty International had earlier reported on this case: Amnesty International report 'Jamaica; a summary of concerns: a briefing for the Human Rights Committee', October 1997, AI Index: AMR 38/07/97. The Special Rapporteur on Torture had equally referred to it: E/CN.4/1999/61, §§399-403.

¹⁷ See further HRC Higginson v. Jamaica, 28 March 2002. Again it pointed out that it was its 'consistent opinion' that corporal punishment violates Article 7, 'irrespective of the nature of the crime that is to be punished or the permissibility of corporal punishment under domestic law'. In its Concluding Observations, under the reporting procedure (Article 40), it has also addressed the issue: see e.g. its Concluding Observations in relation to Sudan CCPR/C/79/Add. 85, 5 November 1997: "Flogging, amputation and stoning, which are recognised as penalties for

In Matthews v. Trinidad and Tobago (1998)¹⁸ the petitioner had claimed violations of Art. 10(1) ICCPR because of the conditions of detention, in particular the sanitary conditions. In passing, he mentioned that he had been sentenced to 20 years imprisonment and 20 strokes with a birch. While he did not claim a violation with respect to corporal punishment, the Committee raised the issue proprio motu, recalling its General Comment on Article 7 ICCPR. In its admissibility decision it requested Trinidad and Tobago to inform it whether the punishment had already been carried out.¹⁹ The HRC may have used provisional measures in this case, but given the fact that it only raised the issue proprio motu when discussing admissibility it is unlikely that it did so.²⁰

The Committee could also have concluded already in this case that the imposition of the punishment in itself was a violation of Article 7. It could have pointed out in the decision on the merits that the State party was under an obligation not to carry out the sentence of 20 strokes with a birch, as it indeed did in the later case of Sooklal v. Trinidad and Tobago (2001).²¹ In that case the petitioner was serving a prison sentence and was sentenced to twelve strokes with the birch. His complaint related to Articles 9(3) and 14(3)(c) but the Committee pointed out, again proprio motu, that the facts of the case also raised an issue under Article 7 ICCPR. It referred to its decision in the abovementioned Osbourne v. Jamaica (2000), a case in which it had used provisional measures. In that case it had decided on the merits that, irrespective of the brutality of the crime that was to be punished, it was ‘the firm opinion of the Committee’ that corporal punishment constituted cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment.²² In the Sooklal case it found that by imposing the sentence of whipping with the birch Trinidad had violated Article 7 ICCPR. In other words, the imposition of the sentence was already a violation, even if it had not been carried out. This time it did point out, in the paragraph discussing the entitlement to an effective remedy, that if the State had not yet executed the sentence of corporal punishment it was under an obligation not to do so.²³ It appears, however, that pending the proceedings before it, it did not order provisional measures proprio motu in this case, while it could have done so.

The ECtHR already determined in Tyrer v. UK (1978) that Article 3 ECHR did not allow for corporal punishment:

criminal offences, are not compatible with the Covenant. (...) By ratifying the Covenant, the State party has undertaken to comply with all its articles; penalties which are inconsistent with articles 7 and 10 must be abolished”. See also Concluding Observations about Iraq’s fourth periodic report CCPR/C/79/Add.84, 5 November 1997 (expressing deep concern about the use of punishment such as amputation and branding, pointing out that such punishments should cease immediately).

¹⁸ HRC Matthews v. Trinidad and Tobago, 31 March 1998.

¹⁹ When it discussed the merits, however, it noted that the State had not provided any information on the issue and that the petitioner himself had not raised it. It considered that this implied ‘that the punishment, if imposed on him, may not have been carried out’. The Committee noted that it ‘maintains that corporal punishment is incompatible with the provisions of article 7 of the Covenant, but makes no finding in this respect in the present case’. HRC Matthews v. Trinidad and Tobago, 31 March 1998, §7.2.

²⁰ This is a case from the time period during which the HRC did not provide information on the use of provisional measures in its Views. A consultation of the file in Geneva confirms that the note verbale to the State party of 5 January 1994 was transmitted under Rule 91 (transfer of petition to State and requests for information) alone. A further Rule 91 decision of 4 April 1995 did not refer to the issue either (on file with the author).

²¹ HRC Boodlal Sooklal v. Trinidad and Tobago, 25 October 2001.

²² HRC Osbourne v. Jamaica, 15 March 2000.

²³ HRC Boodlal Sooklal v. Trinidad and Tobago, 25 October 2001.

“The very nature of judicial corporal punishment is that it involves one human being inflicting physical violence on another human being. Furthermore, it is institutionalised violence that is in the present case violence permitted by the law, ordered by the judicial authorities of the State and carried out by the police authorities of the State (...). Thus, although the applicant did not suffer any severe or long-lasting physical effects, his punishment – whereby he was treated as an object in the power of the authorities – constituted an assault on precisely that which it is one of the main purposes of Article 3 (art. 3) to protect, namely a person’s dignity and physical integrity. Neither can it be excluded that the punishment may have had adverse psychological effects”.²⁴

As judicial corporal punishment and disciplinary corporal punishment in detention (administrative punishment) no longer exist in Europe, the ECtHR has dealt with no further cases in this respect.

In Doebbler v. Sudan (2003) the African Commission found that the punishment of flagellation was a violation of the right to respect for physical integrity and human dignity (Article 5 ACHPR).²⁵ In this light, should it deal with a complaint involving a sentence of corporal punishment that has not yet been executed, its use of provisional measures may be expected.

As discussed in section 2 of this Chapter in 2003 the Inter-American Commission has already used provisional measures to halt corporal punishment in a complaint involving the American Declaration. In this case it found on the merits (2007) that:

“While there is no evidence before the Commission that Mr. Pinder has actually been subjected to corporal punishment, the Commission considers that the jurisprudence makes it palpably clear that the mere anticipation of flogging is within the parameters of the cruel, inhuman and degrading elements of judicial corporal punishment. Corporal punishment is not simply about the actual pain or humiliation of a flogging, but also about the mental suffering that is generated by anticipating the flogging”.²⁶

²⁴ ECtHR Tyrer v. UK, 25 April 1978, §33. It added, also at §33: “The institutionalised character of this violence is further compounded by the whole aura of official procedure attending the punishment and by the fact that those inflicting it were total strangers to the offender. Admittedly, the relevant legislation provides that in any event birching shall not take place later than six months after the passing of sentence. However, this does not alter the fact that there had been an interval of several weeks since the applicant’s conviction by the juvenile court and a considerable delay in the police station where the punishment was carried out. Accordingly, in addition to the physical pain he experienced, Mr. Tyrer was subjected to the mental anguish of anticipating the violence he was to have inflicted on him”. Moreover, at §35: “The indignity of having the punishment administered over the bare posterior aggravated to some extent the degrading character of the applicant’s punishment but it was not the only or determining factor”.

²⁵ ACHPR Curtis Francis Doebbler v. Sudan, May 2003.

²⁶ CIDH Prince Pinder v. Bahamas, 15 October 2007 (merits), §35. Both the Court of Appeal of the Bahamas and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council had identified flogging as inhuman and degrading, but because of a so-called ‘savings clause’ they decided to nevertheless dismiss the complaint. They had held that corporal punishment is permitted under the Constitution of the Bahamas by virtue of Article 17 (2), which provides that ‘nothing contained in or done under authority of law shall be held inconsistent with or in contravention of this Article to the extent that the law in question authorizes the infliction of any description of punishment that was lawful in the Bahama Islands immediately before 10 July 1973’. See CIDH Prince Pinder v. Bahamas, 12 October 2005 (adm.), §§14 and 17, referring to the Court of Appeal judgment of 29 January 1999 and the Privy Council judgment of 15 July 2002. See also the criticisms of a similar ‘savings clause’, which ‘has the past prevail into the future’, by Judge García Ramírez in his Separate Opinion to IACHR Caesar v. Trinidad and Tobago, 11 March 2005, §§24-28 and by Judge Jackman.

By this time the Inter-American Court itself, in Caesar v. Trinidad and Tobago (2005) had confirmed unequivocally that such punishment is prohibited under the ACHR. In this case, involving a punishment of 15 strokes with the ‘cat-o-nine-tails’, the Commission had not used precautionary measures as the punishment had already been carried out. The Commission had found a violation of the right to humane treatment (Article 5 ACHR) and subsequently brought the case before the Court. The Court pointed out that the practices of torture as well as other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment all ‘constitute a violation of peremptory norms of international law’, independent of any codification.²⁷ The Court noted ‘the growing trend towards recognition, at international and domestic levels, of the impermissible character of corporal punishment, with regard to its inherently cruel, inhuman and degrading nature’.²⁸ Consequently, State Parties to the ACHR, under Articles 1(1) and 5, are ‘under an obligation erga omnes to abstain from imposing corporal punishment, as well as to prevent its administration, for constituting, in any circumstance, a cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment’.²⁹ It considered that judicial corporal punishment by flogging, as applied in the law and practice of Trinidad and Tobago, by its very nature reflected ‘an institutionalization of violence, which although permitted by the law, ordered by the State’s judges and carried out by its prison authorities, is a sanction incompatible with the Convention’.³⁰ In fact, corporal punishment by flogging constituted as such a form of torture and therefore was ‘a violation per se of the right of any person subjected to such punishment to have his physical, mental and moral integrity respected, as provided in Article 5(1) and 5(2), in connection with Article 1(1) of the Convention’.³¹ The Court determined that ‘the corporal punishment by flogging, as it was examined in the instant case, must be considered as a form of torture and is, therefore, contrary per se to Article 5(1) and 5(2) of the Convention and to peremptory norms of international law’.³² The Court’s finding that corporal punishment constitutes a violation of the prohibition cruel treatment (and in some cases, such as that of Caesar involving flogging, even torture)³³ brings any provisional measures ordered to halt the execution of such punishment firmly within the common core of the concept. This is confirmed by the Court’s express reference to peremptory norms of international law. Thus, should the Inter-American Court deal with a complaint involving a sentence of corporal punishment, imposed at a time when the State party had recognized the jurisdiction of the Court,³⁴ but which has not yet been executed, the Court would most certainly order provisional measures.

4 CONCLUSION

Only two adjudicators, the HRC and the Inter-American Commission, have used provisional measures to order a halt to the execution of a sentence of corporal punishment and their practice in this regard is limited. Yet the existing case law on the prohibition of corporal punishment is straightforward. This punishment is contrary to the prohibition of torture and/or cruel treatment, as has been widely accepted among the various human rights adjudicators. The fact that they have ²⁷ IACHR Caesar v. Trinidad and Tobago, 11 March 2005, §70.

²⁸ Id., §70.

²⁹ Id., §70.

³⁰ Id., §73.

³¹ Id., §73.

³² Id., §88. See also §73.

³³ The Court spoke of flogging as ‘in absolute contravention to the Convention’ and it spoke of the ‘aberrant character of such punishment’, IACHR Caesar v. Trinidad and Tobago, 11 March 2005, §130.

³⁴ See further Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction).

not developed an extensive practice of using provisional measures in this regard seems to be based more on the fact that they have not received requests to this effect. Those States that still use corporal punishment (several States applying a version of shari'a law and a decreasing number of Caribbean States) mostly have not recognized individual complaint mechanisms and in most of the States that have recognized such mechanisms, this punishment has been abolished. Moreover, in those States in which corporal punishment is still applied that have recognized international mechanisms for individual complaint a tradition to resort to such mechanisms is yet to be developed. What is clear from the case law on the merits, as well as from other international statements and legal documents, is that would they be faced with requests for provisional measures to halt corporal punishment, the human rights adjudicators would grant these requests. In fact this type of provisional measures belongs to the common core of the concept as it aims to prevent irreparable harm to persons.³⁵

³⁵ See further Conclusion Part II.

CHAPTER V

HALTING EXPULSION OR EXTRADITION IN NON-REFOULEMENT CASES

1 INTRODUCTION

Human rights adjudicators take provisional measures to halt a deportation, expulsion or extradition pending the proceedings, based on the requirement of non-refoulement. The non-refoulement principle is laid down, among others, in the UN Refugees Convention. Article 33(1) defines this principle as follows:

“No Contracting State shall expel or return (“refouler”) a refugee in any manner whatsoever to the frontiers of territories where his life or freedom would be threatened on account of his race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or particular political opinion”.¹

The human rights adjudicators have also read this principle into the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment included in the respective human rights treaties and virtually all human rights adjudicators have used provisional measures in the context of claims involving non-refoulement.

The previous chapter on halting executions already discussed the treaty provisions and case law involving the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment, which are also relevant in the context of non-refoulement. This chapter specifically addresses the question which situations involving claims of non-refoulement have warranted provisional measures. In expulsion or extradition, are the rights invoked at least capable of being interpreted such that a violation could be concluded? As noted, this book argues that the use of provisional measures would otherwise be inappropriate.

2 PRACTICE

2.1 Introduction

CAT and the ECtHR have used provisional measures almost exclusively to ensure respect for the principle of non-refoulement. Yet most of the case law of these adjudicators is devoted to the evidentiary requirements for finding a violation, an issue which is further discussed in Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk), rather than to the interpretation and scope of the rights. The Inter-American Commission and the HRC have used provisional measures less often to halt expulsion or extradition, but their practice in this regard nevertheless provides useful information on preventing irreparable harm.

¹ See 1951 Convention relating to the status of refugees, entered into force 22 April 1954 (143 State Parties as of 1 September 2005); 1967 Protocol relating to the status of refugees, entered into force 4 October 1967 (143 State Parties as of 1 September 2005); some States have ratified the Protocol but not the Convention itself, see e.g. the US and Venezuela. About the UN High Commissioner on Refugees see e.g. <www.unhcr.ch>. Generally about the rights of refugees see e.g. Macklin (1995), pp. 251-277; Cançado Trindade (1997); Gorlick (1999); Clark (1999); Nicholson/Twomey (1999); Smeulers (2002), pp. 45-52 and references and Goodwin-Gill (2007).

2.2 CAT

The UN Committee against Torture has used its provisional measures almost exclusively to halt expulsion and extradition. Article 3 UN Convention against Torture stipulates:

“No State Party shall expel, return (refouler) or extradite a person to another State where there are substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture”.

This is the article most often invoked in petitions to the CAT. The Committee has devoted a specific General Recommendation to Article 3.² Many cases have been submitted especially from Canada, Switzerland and Sweden. Other addressee States have included Australia, Venezuela, France and the Netherlands. The reason why the Committee has not yet dealt with complaints against some of the other States Parties that have nevertheless recognised its competence to do so may simply be that lawyers from those States have not yet found their way to Geneva.³

The UN Convention against Torture is the only human rights treaty with a specific provision on non-refoulement. As noted, on the merits the cases dealt with by CAT are particularly relevant for the discussion of evidentiary requirements and most often the reason for the use of provisional measures or for denying petitioners’ requests in this respect simply lies in CAT’s preliminary assessment of the evidence of risk.⁴

In 1993 it started to examine the first petitions. It became clear immediately that most complaints would involve the principle of non-refoulement and would include a request for provisional measures. During the first years the Committee took provisional measures in almost all of these cases and very often it found a violation on the merits. Some of the States involved showed their unhappiness about this, which appears to have resulted, at least for a period of time, in decisions by the Committee to decrease the number of cases in which it would find a violation. It also took provisional measures less often.⁵ Nevertheless it has used them regularly and has also made some strong statements on the merits both with regard to the need to protect petitioners with and without refugee status against refoulement.

In Agiza v. Sweden (2005) CAT recalled ‘that the Convention’s protections are absolute, even in the context of national security concerns, and that such considerations emphasise the importance of appropriate review mechanisms. While national security concerns might justify some adjustments to be made to the particular process of review, the mechanism chosen must continue to satisfy article 3’s requirements of effective, independent and impartial review’.⁶

It has also confirmed the authority of the UNHCR when it comes to petitioners who have been recognized as a refugee. In Elif Pelit v. Azerbaijan (2007) it noted that the petitioner ‘was ² CAT General Comment No. 1: Implementation of Article 3 of the Convention in the context of Article 22, 21 November 1997. See further Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

³ Of the States parties to the ICAT 61 have also recognised the right of individual petition. See <<http://www2.ohchr.org/english/bodies/ratification/9.htm>> (last updated 18 April 2008). The Committee has dealt with individual complaints against 21 of these States, mostly involving the issue of non-refoulement. About the individual complaint procedure and case law see Doerfel (2005); Ingelse (2001); Gorlick (2000); Gorlick (1999).

⁴ See Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk). In some cases States ignored the provisional measures decided upon by CAT, see e.g. Tebourski v. France, 1 May 2007; Dar v. Norway, 11 May 2007 (in which the State subsequently facilitated the petitioner’s return to Norway) and Singh Sogi v. Canada, 16 November 2007. State party responses are further discussed in Chapter XVII and the legal status of provisional measures in Chapter XVI.

⁵ This is further discussed in Chapter XV on immediacy and risk.

⁶ CAT Ahmed Hussein Mustafa Kamil Agiza v. Sweden, 20 May 2005, §13.8. See also Van Boven (2006), pp. 746-758 and Joseph (2005), pp. 339-346.

recognised as a refugee in Germany, as it had been concluded that she would be at risk of persecution if she was returned to Turkey. Her refugee status remained valid at the time of her deportation to Turkey by the State party authorities'. The Committee recalled Conclusion No. 12 of the UNHCR's Executive Committee 'On the extraterritorial effect of the determination of refugee status', pursuant to whose letter (f) "the very purpose of the 1951 Convention and the 1967 Protocol implies that refugee status determined by one Contracting State will be recognized also by the other Contracting States".⁷

2.3 HRC

Apart from CAT, with its explicit reference to non-refoulement, the other human rights adjudicators read the principle of non-refoulement into the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment. The HRC has recognised the principle on the basis of the obligations of States under Article 7 ICCPR (prohibition of torture and cruel treatment) and Article 6 (right to life), in light of the undertaking in Article 2 to ensure the rights in the Covenant to all individuals within its territory and subject to its jurisdiction.

It has also dealt with requests for provisional measures to halt an impending extradition, expulsion, deportation or other form of forced return until it had been able to determine whether this would result in a violation of the principle of non-refoulement underlying Articles 6 and 7 ICCPR.

The earliest known expulsion case in which it used provisional measures dates from 1978, a year after it had published its first decision on the merits. It involves an unspecified State. The Committee intervened almost nine months after it adopted its Rules of Procedure. In this case, O.E. v. S. (1978), it decided to inform the State of the Committee's view 'that pending further consideration of the case, the alleged victim, having sought refuge in S, should not be handed over or expelled to country X'.⁸ The case represents the earliest explicit use of provisional measures by the HRC, not only in expulsion cases but in general. Insufficient information is available about the existing threat in country X. It is not clear whether there was a real risk of the death penalty in that country or a real risk of torture or ill treatment.

Since this case the HRC has taken provisional measures on behalf of a number of persons in extradition cases. Most of them were facing the death penalty in the requesting State.⁹ Canada extradited both Kindler and Ng to the United States in September 1991 after the Supreme Court of Canada had rendered judgment in their cases. It did so in spite of the Committee's provisional measures taken earlier that month.¹⁰ The HRC used provisional measures not only in the cases Kindler v. Canada and Ng v. Canada but also in a few other extradition cases. In K.C. v. Canada

⁷ CAT Elif Pelit v. Azerbaijan, 1 May 2007, §11.

⁸ In the same letter, but before mentioning Rule 86, it already asked the State party to inform the HRC whether it was contemplating the deportation or extradition of the alleged victim to country X. It also requested the petitioner to provide information in substantiation of his claim of violation of the Articles 7, 9, 13, 14 and 15 ICCPR. O.E. v. S., 25 January 1978.

⁹ See HRC Kindler, Ng, Cox and E.G. v. Canada and Weiss v. Austria. Weiss was not facing the death penalty. All other cases relate to Canada and to extradition requests from the US. Canada abolished the death penalty in 1976. Article 6 of the 1976 Extradition Treaty between Canada and the US provides: "When the offence for which extradition is requested is punishable by death under the laws of the requesting State and the laws of the requested State do not permit such punishment for that offence, extradition may be refused unless the requesting State provides such assurances as the requested State considers efficient that the death penalty shall not be imposed or, if imposed, shall not be executed".

¹⁰ See also Chapter XVII on the official State responses.

(inadm. 1992) and in the follow-up case Cox v. Canada (1994), for instance, the petitioner equally requested the HRC 'to adopt interim measures of protection because extradition of the author to the United States would deprive the Committee of its jurisdiction to consider the communication, and the author to properly pursue his communication'. This means that counsel clearly provided a specific rationale for the use of provisional measures, relating to the right to individual complaint and the consequent possibility for the HRC to properly consider such complaints. The HRC Special Rapporteur took provisional measures 'to defer the author's extradition until the Committee had had an opportunity to consider the admissibility of the issues placed before it'.¹¹ E.G. v. Canada (disc. 1997), another extradition case in which provisional measures were used, equally involved the death penalty.¹² The petitioner had submitted he had 'an arguable case' of a breach of the ICCPR. One of the arguments related to execution by electric chair. Another argument was that of the risk of a death sentence for a federal drugs charge involving large quantities of marijuana, which would not meet the 'most serious crimes' standard in the ICCPR.¹³

There are also expulsion cases in which the HRC used provisional measures to halt refoulement (regarding Articles 6 and 7 claims) and one case in which it requested the State to halt the return of the petitioner in light of the right to family life (Articles 17 and 23 claim).¹⁴

As noted, the HRC first took provisional measures to halt an expulsion in 1978. Surprisingly, according to the available information the next time it used provisional measures in an expulsion case was in 1993.¹⁵ In A.A.T. v. Hungary (disc. 1994)¹⁶ the petitioner submitted that a deportation to Iraq would jeopardise his life and security. Apparently the authorities had already issued a deportation order. He had been a soldier in the Iraqi army for two years. He claimed that he deserted at the outbreak of the Gulf war in 1991, because he refused to fight for Saddam Hussein in what he felt was a senseless war. He added that he lost five members of his family during the war. Several months after his arrival in Hungary he was arrested by the police and charged with robbery. He claimed to be innocent and the victim of confusion. Following informal inter-

¹¹ HRC K.C. v. Canada, 29 July 1992 (inadm.); Cox v. Canada, 31 October 1994. In the View the HRC mentions 12 January 1993 (§4.1). On the cover page, on the other hand, it mentions 20 April 1993.

¹² HRC E.G. v. Canada (738/1997), initial submission of 5 January 1997 (received 7 January 1997), Rule 86/91 of 17 January 1997; withdrawal of Rule 86 on 28 April 1997; petitioner's request to withdraw the case of 26 May 1997. On 17 November 1997 the HRC informed the petitioner that it had discontinued the case (on file with the author).

¹³ The Canadian Minister of Justice had authorised his extradition without asking assurances against the death penalty, in reference to a sworn affidavit by a State prosecutor stating that the prosecution declined to seek the death penalty for the murder he had been charged with under Florida law. The petitioner noted, however, that he might be sentenced to death under federal law. From the court file establishing probable cause, rather than from the extradition request itself, it appeared that the US government had evidence that the petitioner was involved in a conspiracy to possess marijuana involving a quantity in excess of 1.000 kilos. The petitioner had been advised that if the US could prove that the killing for which he was charged in State court was part of the overall drug activity, the federal prosecutor could seek the death penalty pursuant to federal law. The federal prosecutor had refused to indicate whether he would seek the death penalty and Canada had not obtained assurances from him that it would not be imposed. The petitioner requested the HRC to use provisional measures under Rule 86 and ten days after the receipt of this request the HRC indeed used Rule 86. Initial submission of 5 January 1997; note verbale to the Permanent Representative of Canada of 17 January 1997 (on file with the author). In general on Kindler, Ng and Cox, see e.g. Harrington (2006), pp. 82-134.

¹⁴ The latter case is discussed in Chapter XII (Other situations).

¹⁵ As noted, in 1991 and 1992 it used provisional measures to halt extraditions.

¹⁶ HRC A.A.T. v. Hungary, 543/1993 (disc. 1994); initial submission of 10 August 1992; Rule 86/91 of 2 June 1993 (on file with the author).

ventions the Special Rapporteur used provisional measures in June 1993. Apparently the case was subsequently solved.¹⁷

The petitioner's husband in G.T. v. Australia (1997),¹⁸ a case similar to A.R.J. v. Australia (1997),¹⁹ had been convicted for importing around 240 grams of heroin from Malaysia into Australia. While he was in prison he applied for refugee status. The Refugee Tribunal refused his application because, although it considered that there was indeed a 'real chance' that he would face imposition of the death penalty in Malaysia, this did not constitute persecution in terms of the Refugee Convention.²⁰ The Note Verbale to the State referred explicitly to the fact that Australia had abolished the death penalty and had acceded to the Second OP on the abolition of the death penalty.²¹

In the later case of Ahani v. Canada (2004)²² the HRC used provisional measures for the State to refrain from deporting the petitioner to Iran 'until the Committee has had an opportunity to consider the allegations, in particular those that relate to torture, other inhuman treatment or even death as a consequence of the deportation'. Mansour Ahani feared torture and ill treatment if he were to be returned. The State nevertheless deported him.²³ Reportedly he was briefly detained upon his return to Iran and has not been heard from since. There have been several other cases as well in which the HRC used provisional measures to halt refoulement. These include cases against Australia,²⁴ Canada,²⁵ France,²⁶ Denmark²⁷ and Kyrgyzstan.²⁸

¹⁷ In August 1994 the HRC sent the petitioner the message that it had discontinued examination of his case. This was sent to him at an address in Hungary, which may mean that he had not been deported. Correspondence from 10 August 1992 to 17 August 1994 in A.A.T. v. Hungary (543/1993), (on file with the author).

¹⁸ HRC Mrs. G.T. v. Australia, 4 November 1997.

¹⁹ HRC A.R.J. v. Australia, 28 July 1997. The alleged victim was an Iranian citizen detained in Western Australia. The Australian Refugee Review Tribunal did express sympathy for the applicant 'in that should he return to Iran it is likely that he would face treatment of an extremely harsh nature', yet he could not be considered a refugee because he did not have a well-founded fear of being persecuted for one of the reasons stated in the Refugee Convention. Instead, his fear arose out of his conviction for a criminal act. The Federal Court of Australia, in turn, determined that the Refugee Review Tribunal had not erred 'in finding that he did not attract Refugee Convention protection'. It pointed out that it was not dealing with the question whether or not the petitioner could be returned to another country or be permitted to remain in Australia on another basis. Like the Refugee Review Tribunal it noted that the risk of unfair trial, imprisonment and torture was 'a matter of serious concern'. Finally, on 11 January 1996, the petitioner was informed that the Minister for Immigration and Ethnic Affairs was not prepared to exercise his discretion to allow him to remain in Australia. The HRC used provisional measures on 3 April 1996.

²⁰ The petitioner expected the federal court to confirm her husband's deportation and referred to a letter from the Australian office of Amnesty International opposing his forcible return since it believed that he would face the death penalty in Malaysia as a result of his conviction in Australia. Pending the case the HRC requested the State not to deport the petitioner's husband to Malaysia 'or to any country where he would likely face the death sentence'. See §4.1.

²¹ HRC Note Verbale of 17 June 1996 in G.T. v. Australia, 706/1996 (on file with the author).

²² HRC Mansour Ahani v. Canada, 29 March 2004.

²³ See Chapter XVII (Official responses).

²⁴ See HRC Omar Sharif Baban (also on behalf of his son Bawan Heman Baban) v. Australia, 6 August 2003 (initial submission of December 2000, provisional measures of September 2001 after receiving information that the case was listed for a domestic court hearing in October 2001). Apparently, however, the petitioner and his son had escaped from Villawood Detention Centre already in June. 'Their current precise whereabouts are unknown' (see §§1.2, 2.1 and 2.6). Subsequently the HRC concluded that domestic remedies were still available in respect of the claim under Article 7 and therefore declared it inadmissible (§6.4). It did find violations of Article 9(1) and (4) ICCPR. See further about this case Chapter VII (detention situations involving risks to health and safety). In Ali Aqzar Bakhtiyari and Roqaiha Bakhtiyari (also on behalf of their five children) v. Australia, 29 October 2003 the HRC used provisional measures to halt the deportation of Mrs. Bakhtiyari and her children in March 2002. Subsequently, the Special Rapporteur adjusted his provisional measures ‘to be conditional on an adverse decision on the application by the High Court’. This case too is particularly relevant in the context of another type of provisional measures, discussed in Chapter VII (Detention). Nevertheless, the petitioners had also argued that the State had been in error in finding that they were not Afghan nationals and that if returned to Pakistan they would be sent on to Afghanistan where they feared exposure to violations of Article 7 (see §§1.2 and 3.1). In that light the Rapporteur had used provisional measures to halt their expulsion. In May 2003 the petitioners again requested provisional measures because the removal would amount to a breach of Articles 7, 17, 23(1) and 24. The Rapporteur renewed his request not to expel them (see §7.2). In October 2003 the HRC declared inadmissible the claim under Article 7 for failure to substantiate. It found violations of Article 9(1) and (4). Given ‘the number and age of the children, including a newborn, the traumatic experiences of Mrs Bakhtiyari and the children in long-term immigration detention in breach of article 9 of the Covenant, the difficulties that Mrs Bakhtiyari and her children would face if returned to Pakistan without Mr Bakhtiyari and the absence of arguments by the State party to justify removal in these circumstances’, the HRC considered that removing them without the final determination in Mr Bakhtiyari’s proceedings would constitute arbitrary interference in the family of the petitioners in violation of Articles 17(1) and 23(1) (§9.6). See also Chapter XIII on the relationship with forms of reparation. In D. and E. and their two children v. Australia, 11 July 2006, pending the proceedings, on 12 February 2002, the Special Rapporteur requested the State to provide information, ‘on an urgent basis’, on whether the petitioners were under a real risk of deportation while their case was being considered by the HRC; the Committee trusted that the State would not deport them before it had received such information and had an opportunity to consider whether the request for provisional measures should be granted. Two months later the State replied that ‘it was in the process of considering the request for information by the Special Rapporteur on the possibility of whether there is a real risk or removal’ of the petitioners from Australia while the HRC was examining the case. It announced that it would not remove the petitioners until the request had been considered, §1.2. On 11 April 2006 counsel informed the HRC that the petitioners had obtained a temporary protection visa and therefore there was no need to proceed with the case under Article 7, §3.3. They did wish to maintain the case under Articles 9 and 24. On the merits the Committee found a violation of Article 9(1) ICCPR for their continued immigration detention for three years and two months ‘without any appropriate justification’, §7.2.

²⁵ In HRC Daljit Singh v. Canada, 30 March 2006 (inadm.), on 5 November 2004, the Committee had used another qualified provisional measure, namely for the State not to deport the petitioner before providing the HRC with information on whether it intended to remove him to India and before providing it with its observations pursuant Rule 97 (old Rule 91). On 9 November 2004, following a request for clarification, the HRC requested the State not to deport the petitioner to India before the State had made its observations on admissibility and merits and before the HRC had acknowledged receipt of these observations, §1.2. Subsequently the HRC declared the case inadmissible as insufficiently substantiated.

²⁶ In HRC Samira Karker on behalf of her husband Salah Karker v. France, 26 October 2000, it is not evident from the text of the View why the HRC used provisional measures. The case involved an Islamist sentenced to death in Tunisia in 1997. He had refugee status since 1998, but the Minister of the Interior decided to expel him in order to protect French territory. This expulsion did not appear to be imminent. The HRC used Rule 86 half a year after the initial submission of 18 September 1998. It appears from the case file that the provisional measure was to halt his expulsion to Tunisia pending the examination of the case. In other words, the Rapporteur decided

In a case against Sweden the HRC has also used provisional measures of a different nature, but in the context of the refoulement of a petitioner (who was handed over by the Swedish authorities to ‘some ten foreign agents in civilian clothes and hoods’ where later ‘investigations by the Swedish Parliamentary Ombudsman, disclosed that the hooded individuals were United States’ and Egyptian security agents’) and the subsequent ill treatment and torture he had suffered, as well as the risks his Swedish counsel considered he was facing because of Swedish authorities contacting him in Egypt. Counsel had noted this in response to arguments by Sweden against the admissibility of the case (with regard to, e.g. counsel’s authorization and the delay in the submission before the HRC). In response the HRC, on 16 January 2006, ‘in light of counsel’s comments on the State’s submissions (...) and of the material before the Committee related to the author’s situation, requested, pursuant to Rule 92 of its Rules of Procedure, that the State party take necessary measures to ensure that the author was not exposed to a foreseeable risk of substantial personal harm as a result of any act of the State party in respect of the author’.²⁹ Thus this is not a provisional measure to halt refoulement, as the deportation had already taken place before the case was submitted to the HRC. It could be seen as a provisional measure to protect against death threats and harassment, but the difference is that Sweden must abstain from action in respect of the petition so that he would not be exposed to a risk of ‘substantial personal harm’.

To return to the issue of halting refoulement, Section 3.3 discusses cases in which the HRC took provisional measures to halt expulsion in the context of ‘lack of proper care’ in the receiving State.

2.4 European Commission and Court

Most of the provisional measures taken by the European Commission on Human Rights have involved the principle of non-refoulement. At least since 1964 it has used provisional measures in this context.³⁰ An example of an early case is Becker v. Denmark (1976), involving the impending expulsion of 199 children to Vietnam. The Commission decided to request the State ‘not to take any steps in the meanwhile’ that ‘might prejudice the conduct of the present proceedings’ and, more specifically, to delay ‘any final movement of the children’ pending the proceedings before to use this provisional measure just in case his expulsion would become imminent after all. Hence, the provisional measure did not relate to the question, also raised by the Working Group, about ‘which measures the State party has taken to review regularly the situation of Mr. Karker and the necessity of the continuation of the order against him’. See §6.2. Eventually, the HRC found no violation of Articles 12 and 13 and considered that the claim under Article 9 was inadmissible ratione materiae. See also Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

²⁷ HRC Jonny Rubin Byahuranga v. Denmark, 1 November 2004. On 9 July 2004 the HRC used provisional measures not to deport him before it had had an opportunity to address the continued need for these measures and on 30 July 2004 it prolonged these until the closing date of the session in November of that year. On the merits it found that expulsion would indeed result in a violation of Article 7 ICCPR (Wedgwood and Yalden dissenting).

²⁸ HRC Maksudov & Rakhidov; Tashbaev & Pirmatov v. Kyrgyzstan, 16 July 2008 (provisional measures of 6 March 2006, 8 June 2006 and 13 June 2006; on 9 August 2006 they were nevertheless handed over to Uzbek law enforcement authorities). See §§1.2, 8.1-8.9 and 10.1-10.3.

²⁹ HRC Mohammed Alzery v. Sweden, 25 October 2006, §2.3.

³⁰ See EComHR X v. Austria and Yugoslavia, 30 June 1964 (inadm.), provisional measure of 11 March 1964 (previously, on 14 February 1964, already communicated by phone).

it. At the same time it decided to give precedence to the petition.³¹ Initially, some provisional measures were taken informally, rather than based explicitly on the Rules of Procedure.³²

Often cases in which the European Commission had used provisional measures were subsequently closed or by the time they were brought before the Court there was no longer any risk of expulsion or extradition. Thus, the previous ECtHR did not often have occasion to use provisional measures. It did so for the first time in 1989 in the extradition case Soering v. UK.³³ The new permanent Court was suddenly faced with many more requests for provisional measures because there was no longer a Commission to deal with the bulk of these requests. The European Commission and Court have taken provisional measures on behalf of persons alleging a real risk of cruel treatment or torture or to their life itself upon deportation to a specific State for reasons as varied as membership of a persecuted minority, being charged with adultery³⁴ or with membership of a terrorist organisation³⁵ or because they were risking female genital mutilation.³⁶ Exceptionally, they have also done so in the context of a risk of 'lack of proper care' in the receiving State.³⁷

The Court has pointed out that the protection afforded by Article 3 ECHR is wider than that provided by Article 33 Refugees Convention.³⁸ This means that it has also used provisional measures on behalf of persons not considered refugees.³⁹

The Court denies most of the requests for provisional measures, mostly in light of an assumed lack of 'evidence' of future risk,⁴⁰ but also because while it may be convinced that the situation complained of will indeed occur, it does not consider that this would constitute a type of harm that would be irreparable.⁴¹

³¹ EComHR Becker v. Denmark, 3 October 1975 (inadm.), provisional measure of 18 July 1975.

³² See e.g. EComHR X. v. Austria and Yugoslavia, 30 June 1964 (inadm.); X v. Federal Republic of Germany, 22 December 1967 (adm.) and 19 December 1969 (Article 31 report); Mohamed Kerkoub v. Belgium, 15 December 1971 (inadm.); Tossum Dolani v. Belgium, 31 May 1972 (inadm.) (invoking provisional measures 'conformément à la pratique généralement suivie dans des affaires analogues') and X. v. the Netherlands, 27 May 1974 (struck out; invoking provisional measures 'conformément à la pratique de la Commission dans des cas de ce genre').

³³ ECtHR Soering v. UK, 7 July 1989.

³⁴ See e.g. EComHR Jabari v. Turkey, 11 July 2000 (provisional measure of 26 February 1998).

³⁵ See e.g. ECtHR Shamayev et al. v. Georgia and Russia, 16 September 2003 (inadm.) (provisional measures to Georgia on 4 October 2002).

³⁶ See e.g. ECtHR Lunguli v. Sweden, 1 July 2003 (struck out) (provisional measures of 13 September 2002).

³⁷ See further section 3 of this Chapter on the relationship with the merits.

³⁸ See e.g. ECtHR Ryabikin v. Russia, 19 June 2008, §118 and Ahmed v. Austria, 17 December 1996, §41.

³⁹ See e.g. the provisional measures ordered in Ryabikin in March 2004 (they were lifted in September 2005, probably for lack of immediacy of the risk, as subsequently the Court did find that extradition to Turkmenistan would result in a violation of Article 3) and the measures used by the Commission on behalf of Ahmed on 15 December 1994 and by the Court on 2 October 1996, Ahmed v. Austria, 17 December 1996.

⁴⁰ See further Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

⁴¹ See e.g. Gary McKinnon v. UK, initial decision of 12 August 2008 by the Acting President to apply Rule 39 to the effect that the petitioner should not be extradited to the US before a given time so as to allow the Court to examine the request at the earliest opportunity (28 August). On 28 August 2008 the Court decided to refuse his request. ECtHR press release, 'European Court of Human Rights refuses request for interim measures by Gary McKinnon', 28 August 2008. McKinnon was alleged to have gained unauthorised access to military computers in the US from his home in the UK. His complaint was mainly under Article 3 ECHR about the conditions of detention he would face if he were convicted in the US.

While the Court normally does not provide reasoning for its use of provisional measures, on occasion it has included some explanatory sentences in certain Notes Verbales to States in order to prod these States to take action and prevent a flood of cases from petitioners in a similar position.⁴² Indeed, on the merits it has pointed out that in case of group persecution there is no need to show that the petitioner has been especially ‘singled out’ for persecution, the test used in Vilvarajah (1991).⁴³ If the Court deals with a situation of large scale violations concerning a whole minority there is no need for establishing ‘further special distinguishing features’.⁴⁴

In 2008 the ECtHR confirmed the absolute nature of the prohibition of refoulement, also in the context of persons suspected of terrorism.

“The concepts of ‘risk’ and ‘dangerousness’ in this context do not lend themselves to a balancing test because they are notions that can only be assessed independently of each other. Either the evidence adduced before the Court reveals that there is a substantial risk if the person is sent back or it does not. The prospect that he may pose a serious threat to the community if not returned does not reduce in any way the degree of risk of ill treatment that the person may be subjected to on return”.⁴⁵

2.5 African Commission

In 1969 the Organisation of African Unity (OAU), the predecessor of the African Union, adopted a specific convention on refugees, with an expanded refugee definition encompassing those who ⁴² See e.g. President ECtHR, Note Verbale with provisional measure, 3 May 2004, in case 15243/04, published in the Dutch journal JV 226 (Jurisprudentie Vreemdelingenrecht). See further Rieter (2005a), pp. 25-44 and Rieter (2006), pp. 736-739. This concerned cases against the Netherlands to prevent expulsion of persons to Somalia. Upon the motivated provisional measures, a return moratorium was decided for members of minority groups and persons who had no family or clan relations in northern Somalia and subsequently, following a provisional measure on behalf of a Somali petitioner belonging to a majority clan, and relating to all Somali who would be internally displaced upon being sent to Northern Somalia, a deportation moratorium for all Somali asylum-seekers who do not originate from one of the so-called safe areas. See also NA. v. UK, 17 July 2008, which concerned even a greater number of cases involving imminent expulsion to Sri Lanka. After 20 provisional measures, on 23 October 2007 the Court pointed out that, ‘having regard to the security situation in Sri Lanka ‘Rule 39 had been applied on each occasion an interim measure had been requested by an ethnic Tamil’. It referred to ‘the strain which the processing of numerous Rule 39 applications places on judicial time and resources’ and ‘concluded that, pending the adoption of a lead judgment in one or more of the applications already communicated, Rule 39 should continue to be applied in any case brought by a Tamil seeking to prevent his removal’. The hope was expressed that the Government would ‘assist the Court by refraining for the time being from issuing removal directions in respect of Tamils’. The State responded that it was ‘not in a position to assist the Court by refraining from issuing removal directions in all such cases on a voluntary basis’. See §21. The Court had since used provisional measures in ‘respect of three hundred and forty-two Tamils’, §22. See also Chapter XIII (Protection) and XVII (Official State responses).

⁴³ ECtHR Vilvarajah v. UK, 30 October 1991.

⁴⁴ ECtHR Salah Sheekh v. the Netherlands, 11 January 2007. See also Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

⁴⁵ ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Saadi v. Italy, 28 February 2008, §139 (confirming ECtHR Chahal v. UK, 15 November 1996). The Inter-American Court had previously confirmed the absolute nature also in the context of detention, see e.g. Medina Quiroga (2005), pp. 142-143.

fled armed conflict and civil war.⁴⁶ This indicates that the Commission may take a more elaborate approach to non-refoulement than the 1951 United Nations Convention on the Status of Refugees and its 1967 Protocol.

Moreover, similar to the ICCPR and the other two regional human rights treaties the African Convention on Human and Peoples' Rights itself includes provisions on the right to life and integrity (Article 4 ACHPR), the prohibition of cruel treatment and torture (Article 5) and safeguards against expulsion (Article 12(4)), which seem to imply a prohibition of refoulement. Indeed, the practice of the African Commission appears to confirm the approach of the HRC and the ECtHR in this respect. An example of a case in which the African Commission used provisional measures to halt a deportation involves the allegation that a deportation from Namibia (where the alleged victim had lived for the last 25 years) to Angola would put him at a 'real risk of torture and extra judicial death'. Angola had accused him of being a UNITA rebel. The petitioner alleged a violation of Articles 4 (life and integrity), 5 (prohibition of cruel treatment and torture) and 12(4) ACHPR (safeguards against expulsion). In February 2001 the African Commission wrote to the minister of foreign affairs of Namibia expressing concern over the impending deportation. While the next year it declared the case inadmissible for non-exhaustion of domestic remedies, the fact that it used provisional measures to halt deportation suggests that its approach to the prohibition of cruel treatment and the right to life is similar to that of the other human rights adjudicators.⁴⁷ In this case the Commission did not expressly invoke Rule 111 but in substance its action pending the case constitutes a provisional measure.⁴⁸ At the end of the decision it specifically added a note about its intervention. Its arguments emphasize the importance of preventing irreparable harm to the victim.⁴⁹

2.6 Inter-American Commission

In the Americas the Cartagena Declaration expanded upon the 1951 United Nations Convention on the Status of Refugees and its 1967 Protocol.⁵⁰ It was inspired, among others, by the work of ⁴⁶ OAU Convention Governing the Specific Aspects of Refugee Problems in Africa, 1001 UNTS 45, signed 10 September 1969, entered into force 20 June 1974. Article 1(2): "The term 'refugee' shall also apply to every person who, owing to external aggression, occupation, foreign domination or events seriously disturbing public order in either part or the whole of his country of origin or nationality, is compelled to leave his place of habitual residence in order to seek refuge in another place outside his country of origin or nationality". Article 2(3) provides: "No person shall be subjected by a Member State to measures such as rejection at the frontier, return or expulsion, which would compel him to return to or remain in a territory where his life, physical integrity or liberty would be threatened for the reasons set out in Article 1, paragraphs 1 and 2".

⁴⁷ ACHPR Interights (on behalf of Jose Domingo Sikunda) v. Namibia, May 2002 (inadm.). It has also used provisional measures on behalf of persons who had already been deported; for one person to the effect that he would be allowed to return, for the other, who had since died, that his body could be returned to Zambia for burial, Amnesty International v. Zambia, 5 May 1999 (on behalf of William Banda and John Chinula). See also Chapter XIII (Protection) and Chapter XI (Mass expulsion).

⁴⁸ About the informal provisional measures of the HRC see Chapter VII (Detention).

⁴⁹ See further Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction and admissibility).

⁵⁰ Several Latin American countries have collaborated to face the situation of refugees and displaced persons in the Americas. In 1984 ten governments and experts from twelve countries held a colloquium in Cartagena de Indias (Colombia) on the international protection of refugees in Central America, Mexico and Panama. This resulted in the Cartagena Declaration on Refugees, adopted at 'Coloquio Sobre la Proteccion Internacional de los Refugiados en America the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights⁵¹ and by the OAU Convention. The Declaration extended its definition of a refugee in Central America to people threatened by, among others, internal conflicts, massive violations of human rights and generalised violence.⁵²

Unlike the ECtHR, the Inter-American Court has not yet used provisional measures to halt refoulement, but this appears to be due to the types of cases that have been brought before it by the Commission and not to any lack of underlying rationale for their use in this context. Were the Commission to deal with a non-refoulement case against a State that has recognized the Court, and request the Court's provisional measures, it is likely that the Court would order these, given its general approach to the prevention of irreparable harm to persons. Thus far the Court has used

Central, México y Panamá: Problemas Jurídicos y Humanitarios', Cartagena, Colombia, 22 November 1984.

⁵¹ In conclusion 3 of the Cartagena Declaration it was noted that 'in view of the experience gained from the massive flows of refugees in the Central American area, it is necessary to consider enlarging the concept of a refugee, bearing in mind, as far as appropriate and in the light of the situation prevailing in the region, the precedent of the OAU Convention (Article 1, paragraph 2) and the doctrine employed in the reports of the Inter-American Commission of Human Rights'. See also the Commission's Annual Report 1981-1982: Informe Anual 1981-1982, Capítulo 6, §4 referring to the 1965 Annual Report.

⁵² "Hence the definition or concept of a refugee to be recommended for use in the region is one which, in addition to containing the elements of the 1951 Convention and the 1967 Protocol, includes among refugees persons who have fled their country because their lives, safety or freedom have been threatened by generalised violence, foreign aggression, internal conflicts, massive violation of human rights or other circumstances which have seriously disturbed public order". Conclusion 3 of the Cartagena Declaration on Refugees. Conclusion 5 reiterated 'the importance and meaning of the principle of non-refoulement (including the prohibition of rejection at the frontier) as a corner-stone of the international protection of refugees. This principle is imperative in regard to refugees and in the present state of international law should be acknowledged and observed as a rule of jus cogens'. In 1987 the Presidents of five Central-American States signed the Esquipulas II Accord to collaborate in their attempts to find solutions to displacement and to devise plans for social and economic development alleviating 'the poverty, landlessness, and social exclusion that were at the roots of the conflicts'. Statement by UN Deputy High Commissioner for Refugees Gerald Walzer, San José, 5 December 1994, to mark the 10th anniversary of the Cartagena Declaration on Refugees, 'the Cartagena Declaration: a decade of progress', Refugees Magazine, 1 March 1995 (<www.unhcr.ch/cgi-bin/texis/vtx/>, consulted on 11 June 2002). In this Accord the participating States committed to give refugees and displaced persons immediate protection and assistance, especially with regard to health, education, work and security and to facilitate their repatriation or resettlement, always on a voluntary and individual basis. Acuerdo de Esquipulas II, point 8, Guatemala, 7 August 1987 (see the website of the Central-American Parliament: <www.parlacen.org.gt/>, consulted 15 June 2002). Based on these political commitments, the UN was able to organise the first International Conference on Central American Refugees (CIREFCA) in 1989. The governments involved signed a Plan of Action in which they committed themselves to enact specific measures with respect to refugees, displaced persons and repatriates. They also promised to treat refugees in a non-discriminatory way. See: Declaration and Concerted Plan of Action in Favour of Central American Refugees, Returnees and Displaced Persons, Report of the Secretary-General, Office of the UNHCR, 31 October 1989; and Resolution of the OAS General Assembly, Los Refugiados Centroamericanos y la Conferencia Internacional sobre Refugiados Centroamericanos, 18 November 1989, ANG/RES. 1021 (XIX-0/89). Yet as we will see one of the main refugee problems in the 1990s, involving Haitians fleeing to the US and the Bahamas, concerned States not involved in CIREFCA.

provisional measures to halt deportation in the context of complaints about arbitrary and mass expulsion.⁵³

The Inter-American Commission, on the other hand, has taken various precautionary measures in the context of the principle of non-refoulement inherent in Article 5(2) ACHR and explicit in the more limited Article 22(8) ACHR (on the right to asylum).⁵⁴ Information about the precautionary measures used by the Inter-American Commission in non-refoulement cases is available as of the early 1990s. The addressee States have included the US, Canada, the Bahamas, Peru and the Dominican Republic. Some of these States have not yet ratified the ACHR, necessitating resort to the American Declaration. Evidently, in such cases there is no recognition of the Court either, making the Commission the only adjudicator capable of intervening in urgent situations.⁵⁵

This section devotes particular attention to the information-rich Haitian refugees case in which the Inter-American Commission specifically discussed its use of precautionary measures in its decision on the merits.⁵⁶ This case against the US clearly illustrates the fact that Article I of the ⁵³ See Chapter XI on mass expulsion and forced eviction. In his concurring opinion to the Court's Advisory Opinion on the Juridical conditions and rights of undocumented workers, 17 September 2003, Judge Cançado Trindade did refer to the principle of non-refoulement.

⁵⁴ As noted in Chapter II (Systems), the Inter-American Commission has been involved with the problem of refugees on the basis of provisions in the Declaration and the Convention. Both documents include articles dealing with asylum and non-refoulement. Article XXVII of the Declaration provides: "Every person has the right, in case of pursuit not resulting from ordinary crimes, to seek and receive asylum in foreign territory, in accordance with the laws of each country and with international agreements". According to the Commission this article contains two criteria, which are cumulative. The first is that the right to seek and receive asylum must be in accordance with the laws of the country of which asylum is sought. The second is that this right must be in accordance with international agreements. It found that the effect of the dual cumulative criteria in the article was that 'if the right is established in international but not in domestic law, it is not a right which is recognised by Article XXVII of the Declaration'. Article 22(7) ACHR lays down a similar provision. In other words, the Commission observes that, were it only to consult these articles, the Inter-American system would not provide, directly or indirectly, the rule of non-refoulement. These provisions, however, are not the only ones that are relevant. For State Parties to the Convention the principle of non-refoulement is expressly laid down in Article 22(8) ACHR: "In no case may an alien be deported or returned to a country, regardless of whether or not it is his country of origin, if in that country his right to life or personal freedom is in danger of being violated because of his race, nationality, religion, social status, or political opinions". Moreover, it is implied in Article 5(2) ACHR: "No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman, or degrading punishment or treatment".

⁵⁵ See also Chapter II (Systems).

⁵⁶ CIDH The Haitian Centre for Human Rights et al. v. United States (Haitian refugees case), 13 March 1997, §1 (referring to 1 October 1990 as the day the Commission received the petition) and §12 (referring to 3 October 1990). For a background on this case, focussing on the proceedings in the US, see e.g. Ratner (1998), pp. 187-220; Koh (1994b), pp. 139-173 and Koh (1994), pp. 999-1025. The Inter-American Commission has not only dealt with the problems of refugees as part of its adjudicatory function but also in its Annual Reports. In its Annual Report 1993 the Commission made special mention of the military coup in Haiti in 1991 and the massive exodus of Haitians to which the ensuing severe repression and difficult economic conditions had led. It noted that more than 50,000 of them went to countries such as the US and the Bahamas and many of them died at sea. "Thousands others were 'turned back' on the high seas in keeping with the United States' controversial policy for screening the Haitian boat people". CIDH Annual Report 1993, Chapter II. Already in 1985, the Commission noted that the principle of non-refoulement in Article 22(8) ACHR could not protect directly those refugees dealing with a State not a party to the ACHR. Of course, according to the Cartagena Declaration, the general principle of non-refoulement 'should be' observed as a rule of ius cogens. Yet there was no political American Declaration complements the UN Refugee Convention. Several organisations representing Haitian refugees had filed a petition against the US in 1990. This petition concerned the US practice of stopping ('interdicting') boats with Haitians on the high seas and returning them to Haiti. It alleged that many of these boat people had a reasonable fear that they would be persecuted if returned to Haiti. The authorities nevertheless denied them a proper forum to process their refugee claims. While the petition was pending before the Commission the representatives made certain requests, including:

"To seek immediate, interim relief from the United States Government in the form of temporary suspension of the Haitian Migrant Interdiction program, and the deportation of interdicted Haitians to Haiti until the restoration of lawful order in Haiti, and the subsiding of the grave personal danger that now faces Haitians from random and state-sponsored violence".⁵⁷

In response, the Commission sent several notes to the US, including a telex of 4 October 1991 sent to the US Secretary of State, James Baker. In this telex it issued an emergency request that could be qualified as a precautionary measure. It did not, however, identify specific victims but rather challenged the policy as such. The interesting aspect is that the Commission based itself on a Resolution of the OAS Ad Hoc Meeting of Ministers of Foreign Affairs:

"It has decided pursuant to paragraph 4 of Resolution 1/91 of the Ad Hoc Meeting of Ministers of Foreign Affairs, entitled 'Support to the Democratic Government of Haiti,' to request that the United States Government suspend its policy of interdiction of Haitian Nationals who are attempting to seek asylum in the United States and are being sent back to Haiti, because of the danger to their life, until the situation in Haiti has been normalized".⁵⁸

The telex presumably was the Commission's reply to the petitioners' Emergency Application for Provisional OAS Action to Halt the United States' Policy of Interdicting and Deporting Haitian Refugees, filed on 3 October 1991. Among others, this petition stated that the US policy deprived Haitians 'of a fair opportunity to articulate and substantiate claims for political asylum'. The petitioners pointed out that a Haitian who avoided interdiction at high sea and arrived in the US had at least a five percent chance of 'being considered to possess a legitimate asylum claim', while an interdicted Haitian would only have a .005 percent likelihood to be so considered. They argued that '(t)he strength of the asylum claim did not suddenly change once Haitian boat people mechanism monitoring those States that had not ratified the Convention. CIDH Informe Anual 1984-1985, Capítulo IV, Desplazamientos en la Región y Protección de Refugiados. Vis-à-vis OAS member States that have not yet ratified the ACHR it is not only the abovementioned right to seek and receive asylum in the American Declaration (Article XXVII) that is relevant with regard to the principle of non-refoulement, but especially Article I of the Declaration, providing that every human being has the right to life, liberty and the security of his person. In fact, in the Inter-American system this article complements the provisions of the UN Refugee Convention and its Protocol. Not only the Commission's Annual Reports and its case law but also its Special Country Reports may clarify the obligations of States under the Convention or the Declaration. A case in point is the Commission's Special Report on Canada (2000). In this Report it pointed out that the right to asylum in Article XXVII of the Declaration was itself a means to safeguard the fundamental right to liberty, integrity and life in Article I. It pointed out as well that 'the effective protection of substantive rights requires an adequate procedural framework for their implementation'. Such framework must provide mechanisms effectively establishing whether a person meets the applicable standard of risk. CIDH Canada Report 2000, §104.

⁵⁷ CIDH The Haitian Centre for Human Rights et al. v. United States (Haitian refugees case), 13 March 1997, §11(a).

⁵⁸ Id., §13.

got around the interdiction programme, instead, what changed was the opportunity to be heard'.⁵⁹ The Commission sent its telex the day after receipt of the petitioners' request.

In February 1992 the petitioners filed another Emergency Application. They argued that the US, by maintaining its interdiction programme despite the coup, had 'deprived Haitians fleeing the military junta of a fair opportunity to articulate and substantiate claims of political asylum'. Five days later they submitted a Supplemental Filing in Support of this Emergency Application pointing out that Haitian soldiers were present on the docks when the interdictees were repatriated and asked for their names and addresses. Later many of them were arrested at home or at pre-established roadblocks. Several of them were killed and some were tortured.⁶⁰ On that same day the Commission sent a note to James Baker to the effect that:

"The Inter-American Commission on Human Rights notes that the return of the Haitians from the United States recommenced on February 3, 1992 and that the implementation of the present policy will result in the transfer of some 12,000 Haitians. Given the uncertain situation in Haiti, the Members of the Commission unanimously and respectfully request the United States Government to suspend, for humanitarian reasons, the return of Haitians".⁶¹

During a hearing, a year later, the petitioners argued the admissibility of the petition, requested precautionary measures and presented documentary evidence about the health condition of the Haitians held at Guantanamo Bay. They also presented three witnesses who testified, among others, on why the 'in country processing' by the US of the asylum requests in Haiti itself was not working. Two weeks later the Commission approved a report in which it took the following precautionary measures:

- "a. It called upon the United States Government to review, as a matter of urgency, its practice of stopping on the high seas vessels destined for the USA with Haitians and returning them to Haiti without affording them an opportunity to establish whether they qualify as refugees under the Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees, or as asylum-seekers under the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man.
- b. It called upon the United States Government to ensure that Haitians who were already in the United States are not returned to Haiti without a determination being made as to whether they qualify for refugee status, under the Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees, or as asylees [sic] under the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man.
- c. It placed itself at the disposal of the parties concerned with a view to reach a friendly settlement of this matter on the basis of respect for the human rights recognized in the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man.
- d. It stated that this request is without prejudice to the final decision in this case".⁶²

⁵⁹ Id., §6.

⁶⁰ Id., §§7-10.

⁶¹ Id., §14. See also Press Communiqué 2/92, following the 81st session of the Commission, which closed on 14 February 1992: 'the Commission studied with concern the situation of the boat people, i.e., those Haitian citizens who are being returned to Haiti, particularly from the base at Guantanamo. It asked its Chairman to address a letter to the Secretary of State of the United States, asking that the return of Haitian citizens to their country be suspended on humanitarian grounds, so long as the danger and systematic human rights violations by now known to exist in that country persist', Annual Report 1991 (Annex).

⁶² CIDH precautionary measures of 12 March 1993, The Haitian Centre for Human Rights et al. v. United States (Haitian refugees case), 13 March 1997, §17. The Commission also dealt with the situation of the Haitian refugees more generally, rather than only as part of this case. In its Annual Report 1993, for instance, it refers to a Declaration it issued on their situation. It called on Seven months later the Commission declared the petition admissible and pointed out that its precautionary measures of March 1993 remained in force.⁶³ Six months afterwards the petitioners urged the Commission to issue a decision on the merits as soon as possible because of the ‘continuing deterioration of the human rights situation in Haiti and ongoing reports of abuse of Haitians forcibly repatriated by the Government of the United States without political asylum interviews’.⁶⁴ The petitioners did not ask the Commission to repeat its precautionary measure, but instead they urged it to give the case priority.⁶⁵ Nevertheless, the Commission did not specifically respond to the petitioners’ request and it decided on the merits only three years later.

2.7 Bosnia Chamber

The Bosnia Chamber has also taken provisional measures ordering the respondent Parties ‘to take all necessary steps to prevent the applicants from being taken out of the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina by the use of force’. It did so in the context of a petition invoking a range of rights: the prohibition of torture or inhumane or degrading treatment, the right to liberty and security of person, the right to a fair trial, the right to respect for family life, the prohibition of expulsion of nationals, procedural safeguards in relation to the expulsion of aliens and Protocol 6 on the abolition of the death penalty. The petitioners were nevertheless handed over to the US forces based in Bosnia as part of the Stabilization Force led by the NATO. They were then transferred to the US military detention centre at Guantanamo Bay.⁶⁶ In two other cases the petition was lodged after the alleged victims had already been transferred to Guantanamo. In one the petitioner’s wife requested the Chamber to order a provisional measure to the effect that he would be ‘treated humanely whilst in any form of detention’. The Chamber decided to reject this request.⁶⁷ In the member States ‘to take emergency measures to prevent the dangers suffered by Haitians fleeing repression and persecution who are nonetheless being repatriated’, Annual Report 1993 (1a).

⁶³ CIDH The Haitian Centre for Human Rights et al. v. United States (Haitian refugees case), 13 October 1993 (adm.); see also merits report of 13 March 1997, §19(d).

⁶⁴ Letter of 26 April 1994, CIDH The Haitian Centre for Human Rights et al. v. United States (Haitian refugees case), 13 March 1997 (merits), §42. In September 1994 the Commission still informed the petitioner that it would decide on the merits later that year. See Koh (1994), p. 1018 (footnote 84).

⁶⁵ See also Chapter XVII (Official responses).

⁶⁶ Bosnia Chamber Boudellaa, Lakhdar, Nechle and Lahmar v. BiH and Fed.BiH, 11 October 2002 (adm. & merits).

⁶⁷ Bosnia Chamber Mustafa Ait Idir v. BiH and Fed. BiH, 4 April 2003 (adm. & merits). Such provisional measures would, however, have been appropriate given the responsibility of the respondent parties for having allowed him to become exposed to the situation at Guantanamo Bay. Apparently the Chamber is reluctant to recognize that extraterritorial obligations may continue beyond the transfer of authority over a detainee to a third State. After all, it did use provisional measures to halt the deportation of the other petitioners, confirming the approach of the ECtHR and the other human rights adjudicators about the responsibility of the sending State. In this case it could not order such measures because the petitioner had already been transferred. Because the respondent parties ignored the provisional measures in the first case, by February 2002 the petitioners were still in the same situation, detained at Guantanamo Bay. The request of Mustafa Ait Idir’s wife was appropriate. Some form of intervention by the State responsible for exposing a petitioner to serious violations by another State is certainly warranted. Such an approach is in fact to be preferred over simply waiting until the decision on the merits and granting (financial) compensation upon the finding of a violation. In other words it would have been appropriate for the Chamber to order some form of intervention. Even before the specific reports about torture and ill-treatment in Iraq (e.g. the Abu Graib prison operating under US other case the petitioner's lawyer also requested provisional measures, but this request seemed less appropriate. His counsel requested the Chamber, 'as a provisional measure, to issue a decision declaring that the criminal investigation against the applicant was not in accordance with the law'. The Chamber rejected this request.⁶⁸

The next section specifically discusses some situations that indicate a relationship between the provisional measures taken pending the case and the (expected) decision on the merits.

3 RELATION BETWEEN PROVISIONAL MEASURES TO HALT EXPULSION OR EXTRADITION AND THE EXPECTED DECISION ON THE MERITS

3.1 Introduction

How do the decisions on the merits by the various adjudicators clarify the types of non-refoulement claims for which adjudicators are likely to use provisional measures? This section discusses the responsibility for future violations in another State and the specific issue of whether non-death penalty States are allowed to extradite persons without asking assurances against the death penalty. It then deals with the scope of the principle of non-refoulement. The focus is on the question whether the principle of non-refoulement extends to the prohibition of ill treatment and whether provisional measures have been used in such cases. The discussion mainly involves the issue of life imprisonment and so-called 'lack of proper care' issues. This is discussed under the heading ratione materiae, as it deals with more substantive issues. The other issues involving the scope of the principle are taken together and briefly discussed under the heading ratione personae. They relate more to issues involving the addressee and victim. The focus here is on issues of extra-territorial obligation (intermediary States, non-State actors and extraordinary renditions). In all these cases the question arises whether provisional measures may be used.

3.2 Future violations in another State

3.2.1 Introduction

A discussion on the use of provisional measures to ensure respect for the extraterritorial obligations of States starts with the issue of future violations in another State. After a general discussion of the State's obligation 'to ensure', a question will be singled out that arose in the earlier practice of the HRC: the ICCPR and the reintroduction of the death penalty through extradition.

authority) and Cuba (the US facility at Guantanamo Bay) it was clear that the detainees at Guantanamo had no access to court and counsel and were not even informed of the charges against them, nor were they aware of what would happen to them. It is well known that such situations exponentially increase the risk of ill-treatment and torture. Moreover, information about attempts by the US to limit the internationally recognised interpretation of the prohibition of torture was already publicly available. See also Chapters XIII (Protection) and XV (Immediacy and risk).

⁶⁸ Bosnia Chamber Belkasem Bensayah v. BiH and Fed. BiH, 4 April 2003.

3.2.2 Obligation ‘to ensure’

Article 3 UN Convention against Torture is more explicit than the other human rights treaties in laying down a prohibition of non-refoulement. This also makes obvious the Committee’s use of provisional measures to halt such refoulement. As noted, the CAT devoted a General Recommendation to this principle. For treaties other than the UN Convention against Torture, with its explicit inclusion of the principle of non-refoulement, it is important to address the issue of the responsibility of States not only to deal with past violations, but also with violations that are likely to take place in the future and in another State. When an adjudicator were to determine on the merits that the sending State has no responsibility for exposing a petitioner to violations in another State, the use of provisional measures to halt such expulsion pending the proceedings would be inappropriate.

The Inter-American Commission, the European Commission, the ECtHR and the Bosnia Chamber have equally recognized the principle of non-refoulement in the context of the prohibition of torture and inhuman treatment, the right to life and the obligation of State Parties to secure these rights to everyone within their jurisdiction.

Already in 1959 the European Commission pointed out that ratification of the ECHR must be understood as agreeing to restrict the right to control the entry and exit of foreigners.⁶⁹ A few years later it confirmed this, specifically mentioning the prohibition of inhuman treatment in Article 3.⁷⁰ It had used provisional measures in this case in 1964.⁷¹ Although the Commission declared the case inadmissible, it confirmed that it had ‘frequently held that expulsion and, considering this case holds that, repatriation of a person may in certain exceptional circumstances raise an issue under the Convention and in particular under Art. 3’.⁷² Later it specified that a decision to deport, extradite or expel a person to face conditions falling within the scope of Article 3 incurred the responsibility of the contracting State under Article 1 ECHR.⁷³ This interpretation ‘is based upon the unqualified terms of Article 3 of the Convention, and the requirement which read in conjunction with Article 1 imposes upon the Contracting Parties to the Convention to protect ‘everyone within their jurisdiction’ from the real risk of such treatment, in the light of its irremediable nature’.⁷⁴

The European Court addressed the responsibility issue when it decided in Soering v. UK (1989) that State Parties have an ‘inherent obligation’ under Art. 3 ECHR not to extradite a person facing a real risk of exposure to torture, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.⁷⁵ As Judge De Meyer stated in his concurring opinion in this case:

⁶⁹ EComHR X v. Sweden, 30 June 1959.

⁷⁰ EComHR Kuzbari v. Germany, 26 March 1963 (it is not clear whether provisional measures were used) and X v. Austria and Yugoslavia, 30 June 1964 (inadm.), provisional measures 14 February and 11 March 1964.

⁷¹ EComHR X v. Austria and Yugoslavia, 30 June 1964 (inadm.), provisional measures 14 February and 11 March 1964. See also X v. Germany, 22 December 1967 (adm.); 19 December 1969 (struck out), informal provisional measures in April 1965. See also Amekrane v. UK, 11 October 1973 (adm.). In this case there were no provisional measures as the removal had already taken place. See further X v. Belgium, 29 May 1961 (inadm.). In this case no information is available about the use of provisional measures.

⁷² EComHR Becker v. Denmark, 3 October 1975, p. 233. See further Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

⁷³ EComHR Altun v. Germany, 3 May 1983 (adm.), p. 219. See also 7 March 1984 (struck out).

⁷⁴ See EComHR Kirkwood v. UK, 12 March 1984 (inadm.), under ‘the law’, §3 (last paragraph).

⁷⁵ ECtHR Soering v. UK, 7 July 1989. While Article 3 of the UN Convention against Torture spells out a specific obligation, based on the ‘abhorrence of torture’, this ‘does not mean that an

“When a person's right to life is involved, no requested State can be entitled to allow a requesting State to do what the requested State itself is not allowed to do”.⁷⁶

Moreover, a departure from the principle that the Convention institutions would not discuss ‘potential violations’ was necessary ‘in view of the serious and irreparable nature of the alleged suffering risked, in order to ensure the effectiveness of the safeguard provided’ by Article 3.⁷⁷

Soering was the first case in which the ECtHR used provisional measures to halt an extradition. Moreover, Soering illustrates the special character of Article 3. The ECtHR pointed out that the sending State has no power over the practices of the receiving State and that Art. 1 ECHR ‘cannot be read as justifying a general principle to the effect that, notwithstanding its extradition obligations, a Contracting State may not surrender an individual unless satisfied that the conditions awaiting him in the country of destination are in full accord with each of the safeguards of the Convention’.⁷⁸ Thus, it is the fundamental nature of Article 3 that triggers the responsibility of the sending State, rather than its human rights obligations in general.⁷⁹ The HRC has taken a similar approach. Article 2 ICCPR stipulates that each State party ‘undertakes to respect and ensure to all individuals within its territory and subject to its jurisdiction’ the rights recognised in the ICCPR. According to the General Comment on this article (2004) this obligation ‘entails an obligation not to extradite, deport, expel or otherwise remove a person from their territory, where there are substantial grounds for believing that there is a real risk of irreparable harm, such as that contemplated by Articles 6 and 7 of the Covenant, either in the country to which removal is to be effected or in any other country to which the person may subsequently be removed’.⁸⁰ This also means that the State should make the relevant judicial and administrative authorities aware of the need to ensure such compliance with the ICCPR.

More than ten years previously, in its General Comment on Article 7 ICCPR (1992), the HRC already noted that States must not, by extraditing or expelling persons, expose them to the danger of torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. Moreover, before it published this General Comment the HRC had used provisional measures three times in an extradition case and once, in 1978, in an expulsion case.⁸¹ This shows that already in 1978 the HRC implicitly accepted the principle of non-refoulement.⁸² Like the European Commission before it, the HRC made this decision at the provisional measures stage. It considered there was no need to essentially similar obligation is not already inherent in the general terms of Article 3’. The Court pointed out that another interpretation ‘would plainly be contrary to the spirit and intendment of the Article’ and ‘hardly be compatible with the underlying values of the Convention’, §88.

⁷⁶ Compare also Article 16 ILC Articles on State Responsibility (aid or assistance in the commission of an internationally wrongful act).

⁷⁷ ECtHR Soering v. UK, 7 July 1989, §90. See also Cruz Varas et al. v. Sweden, 20 March 1991 and Vilvarajah et al. v. UK, 30 October 1991, confirming this approach with regard to expulsion.

⁷⁸ ECtHR Soering v. UK, 7 July 1989, §86.

⁷⁹ Strictly speaking Lawson (1999), p. 245 is correct in considering that the responsibility of the UK is based on its failure, in violation of Article 1, to ensure Soering’s rights under Article 3. Thus, a failure to ensure other rights in the Convention could also trigger State responsibility. In light of similar approaches by the ECtHR in other contexts – including its approach to provisional measures, see the Conclusion to Part II and see Chapter XVI (Legal status) – the fact that it refers to Article 3 specifically may indicate that its underlying rationale for its interpretation of Article 1 may be the exceptional importance of certain rights in the Convention.

⁸⁰ HRC General Comment on Article 2 ICCPR, the nature of the general legal obligation imposed on States parties to the Covenant, 21 April 2004, §12.

⁸¹ For the expulsion case see HRC O.E. v. S., 25 January 1978, for the extradition cases see Kindler v. Canada and Ng v. Canada, provisional measures of 26 September 1991 and K.C. v. Canada, provisional measure of 12 March 1992.

⁸² It did not publish any information, however, on whether it discussed this issue at the time.

await determination of this legal issue on the merits before using provisional measures for the first time in such a case.

The HRC has determined that State parties must ensure that they carry out all other legal commitments, including bilateral treaty obligations, ‘in a manner consistent with the Covenant’.⁸³

“The starting point for consideration of this issue must be the State party’s obligation, under article 2, paragraph 1, of the Covenant, namely, to ensure to all individuals within its territory and subject to its jurisdiction the rights recognized in the Covenant. The right to life is the most essential of these rights”.⁸⁴

It noted that extradition as such was outside the scope of the Covenant but that ‘a State party’s obligation in relation to a matter itself outside the scope of the Covenant may still be engaged by reference to other provisions of the Covenant’.⁸⁵

Kindler v. Canada (1993) is the first case the HRC decided on the merits on the existence of future violations in another State.⁸⁶ The issue in such cases is not whether the alleged victim’s rights have been or are likely to be violated by the receiving State, which often is not even a party to the OP, but whether the sending State would expose him to a real risk of a violation of his rights under the Covenant by extraditing him. The HRC found that the State returning the potential victim could be held responsible under the Covenant for exposing him to danger to his life or physical integrity in the receiving State, perpetrated by persons unrelated to the sending State.⁸⁷ While a State party is ‘not required to guarantee the rights of persons within another jurisdiction’, it may be in violation of the ICCPR if it ‘takes a decision relating to a person within its jurisdic-

⁸³ HRC Ng v. Canada, 5 November 1993, §14.1.

⁸⁴ Ibid.

⁸⁵ See HRC Kindler v. Canada, 25 October 1993, §6.1; Ng v. Canada, 5 November 1993, §6.1 and Cox v. Canada, 31 October 1994, §10.3, all referring to M.A. v. Italy, 10 April 1984 (inadm.), §13.4: “There is no provision of the Covenant making it unlawful for a State party to seek extradition of a person from another country”. See also, e.g., Aumeeruddy-Cziefra et al. v. Mauritius, 9 April 1981, §9.2. Yet Aguilar Urbina has pointed out that the Committee’s statement that extradition as such was outside the scope of application of the Covenant was ‘remiss-and even dangerous’. He considered that, in a narrow sense, extradition would be included within the procedures regulated by Article 14 ICCPR (fair trial). See Ng v. Canada, 5 November 1993, dissenting opinion Aguilar Urbina, §1-3.

⁸⁶ Referring to human rights treaties as living instruments, HRC Kindler v. Canada, 25 October 1993, §9.2; Ng v. Canada, 5 November 1993, §9.2; Cox v. Canada, 31 October 1994, §7.1. In Cox v. Canada Herndl and Sadi dissented, seemingly considering that the reference to ‘in good faith’ in Article 31 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties did not refer to the way States should interpret and carry out a treaty but rather to the way international bodies such as the HRC should ascertain and carry out the intention of the parties to the treaty.

⁸⁷ See e.g. HRC Kindler v. Canada, 25 October 1993. In Cox v. Canada, 31 October 1994 Committee member Ban (Hungary) pointed out that his position (on a violation of Article 7) was ‘strongly motivated by the fact that through Mr. Cox’s surrender to the United States, the Committee would lose control over an individual at present within the jurisdiction of a State party to the Optional Protocol’. See also decisions by domestic courts, not only confirming the ‘non-refoulement’ principle, but also determining that removal without assurances against the death penalty could not be allowed: South African Constitutional Court Mohamed and another v. President of Republic of South Africa and others, 28 May 2001, CCT 17/01 (2001); Canadian Supreme Court, United States v. Burns, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 283 (15 February 2001); Hoge Raad (Dutch Supreme Court) 30 maart 1990 RvdW 1990, 76, Nederlandse Jurisprudentie 1991, No. 249, March 30 1990 (the Short case, also reported in English, in ILM 29 (1990), pp. 1375 ff.).

tion, and the necessary and foreseeable consequence is that that person's rights under the Covenant will be violated in another jurisdiction'.⁸⁸

"That follows from the fact that a State party's duty under article 2 of the Covenant would be negated by the handing over of a person to another State (whether a State party to the Covenant or not) where treatment contrary to the Covenant is certain or is the very purpose of the handing over. For example, a State party would itself be in violation of the Covenant if it handed over a person to another State in circumstances in which it was foreseeable that torture would take place. The foreseeability of the consequence would mean that there was a present violation by the State party even though the consequence would not occur until later on".⁸⁹

The Inter-American Commission has equally read the principle of non-refoulement in the right to life and security of Article I of the Declaration. In the Haitian Refugees case (1997) it found that, pursuant to this Article, the US had violated the right to life 'of those unnamed Haitian refugees identified by the petitioners' who 'were interdicted by the United States, repatriated to Haiti, and later lost their lives after being identified as "repatriates"'. In this respect it also noted the international case law on a specific type of extra-territorial obligations, providing that if a State party's extradition or expulsion of a person within its jurisdiction would result in a real risk of violation of this person's human rights in another jurisdiction, the State party may itself be in violation of this treaty.⁹⁰ The Commission also concluded that the act of interdicting the Haitians on the high seas and 'placing them in vessels under their jurisdiction, returning them to Haiti, and leaving them exposed to acts of brutality by the Haitian military and its supporters constitutes a breach of the right to security of the Haitian refugees' under Article I.⁹¹

⁸⁸ HRC Kindler v. Canada, 25 October 1993, §6.2.

⁸⁹ Ibid.

⁹⁰ It also referred to ECtHR and HRC case law.

⁹¹ Still, in this case the Commission started out examining the aforementioned Article XXVII of the Declaration laying down the right to seek and receive asylum. It dealt first with the criterion of conformity with international instruments and referred to the 1951 Convention relating to the Status of Refugees and its 1967 Protocol. It noted its belief 'that international law had developed to a level at which there is recognition of a right of a person seeking refuge to a hearing in order to determine whether that person meets the criteria in the Convention'. The Haitian Centre for Human Rights et al. v. United States (Haitian refugees case), 13 March 1997, §155. The Commission referred to Article 33 (1) of the Refugees Convention, laying down the principle of non-refoulement. It noted that the US Supreme Court had 'construed this provision as not being applicable in a situation where a person is returned from the high seas to the territory from which he or she fled'. This domestic court had held specifically, that the principle of non-refoulement in Article 33 'did not apply to the Haitians interdicted on the high seas and not in the United States' territory'. US Supreme Court, Sale, Acting Commissioner, Immigration and Naturalization Service, et al. v. Haitian Center Council, INC, et al., 509 U.S. 155, (21 June 1993). The Commission did not agree with the US Supreme Court's finding and pointed out that it shared the view of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in her amicus curiae brief to the Supreme Court, that 'Art. 33 had no geographical limitations', §157. The finding, however, that the US had breached its treaty obligations under Article 33 Refugee Convention did not suffice for finding a breach of Article XXVII Declaration. Under that article the right to seek and receive asylum must be in accordance with the domestic laws of the country in which refuge is sought. The Commission noted that in fact the US had recognised and acknowledged the right of Haitian refugees to seek and receive asylum in the US both prior to and subsequent to the Supreme Court decision. It also noted that the article provides for a right to seek and receive asylum in 'foreign territory' and that the US had, by interdicting Haitians on the high seas, violated their right to seek and receive asylum in some foreign territory other than the US, such as the Dominican

The Commission has specified that an ‘essential aspect’ of the right to personal security in Article I of the Declaration is the ‘absolute prohibition of torture, a peremptory norm of international law creating obligations erga omnes’.⁹² It pointed out that while a person could be deprived of his refugee status under the Refugee Convention, the prohibition of torture as a norm of ius cogens applied ‘beyond the terms of the 1951 Convention’. Returning to their home country ‘persons who have been subject to certain forms of prosecution such as torture’, it noted, ‘would place them at a risk which is impermissible under international law’. It referred to the American Declaration and Article 3 UN Convention against Torture and emphasised:

“The fact that a person is suspected of or deemed to have some relation to terrorism does not modify the obligation of the State to refrain from return where substantial grounds of a real risk of inhuman treatment are at issue”.⁹³

The Bosnia Chamber has confirmed the abovementioned approach by the ECtHR in Soering and pointed out that the respondent Parties are liable for extradition or expulsion giving rise to an issue under Articles 2 and 3 (‘or, exceptionally, under Articles 5 and/or 6’). This liability ‘arises from the positive obligation enshrined in Article I of the Agreement and Article 1 of the Conven-

Republic, Jamaica, the Bahamas, Cuba, Venezuela, Suriname, Honduras, etc. The Commission found that the US ‘summarily interdicted and repatriated Haitian refugees to Haiti without an adequate determination of their status, and without granting them a hearing to ascertain whether they qualified as “refugees”’. It found that the dual criteria test of the right to seek and receive asylum in ‘foreign territory’ had been satisfied and, hence, the US had violated the article, §162. It is clear, however, from its case law, that even when the asylum seeker is not intercepted on the high seas but in a State that always denied the right to seek and receive asylum in its domestic law (so that it would not be possible to claim a violation of Article XXVII), the Commission could still find a violation of Article I, because this article implies the principle of non-refoulement.

⁹² CIDH Canada Report 2000, §118.

⁹³ CIDH Canada Report 2000, §154. The Inter-American Commission also referred to a judgment of the ECtHR: Chahal v. United Kingdom, 15 November 1996, §§79-80. In its Concluding Observations to the fourth periodic report of Canada the HRC equally expressed concern ‘that Canada takes the position that compelling security interests may be invoked to justify the removal of aliens to countries where they may face a substantial risk of torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment’. It referred to its General Comment on Article 7 and recommended a revision of this policy ‘in order to comply with the requirements of article 7 and to meet its obligation never to expel, extradite, deport or otherwise remove a person to a place where treatment or punishment that is contrary to article 7 is a substantial risk’. See CCPR/C/79/Add. 105, adopted on 6 April 1999, §13. In HRC Ahani v. Canada, 29 March 2004, counsel had pointed out that the Canadian Supreme Court had envisaged extraordinary situations in which Canada could return a person even when there was a substantial risk of torture. She emphasised that this was contrary to the absolute ban on torture in international law, §6.4. In the context of the Supreme Court of Canada’s decision in Suresh Weiser (2004), p. 141 (accompanying footnote) considers that ‘it is particularly astounding for the court to suggest that the prohibition against torture can ever be derogated from’. The Inter-American Commission also dealt with the case of Suresh albeit only initially in the context of non-refoulement, see its precautionary measures of 16 January 1998, CIDH Suresh v. Canada, 27 February 2002 (adm.), §8. In Ahani v. Canada, 29 March 2004, neither the domestic courts nor the HRC itself had determined whether a substantial risk of torture existed in the case of the petitioner. Thus, the latter would express ‘no further view on this issue other than to note that the prohibition of torture, including as expressed in article 7 of the Covenant, is an absolute one that is not subject to countervailing considerations’. Ahani §10.10.

tion to secure the rights and freedoms in regard to all persons within their jurisdiction'. To extradite a person to another State where there was a substantial risk of a violation of the above articles 'would be against the general spirit of the Convention and of the Agreement'.⁹⁴

The obligation to cooperate in the international fight against terrorism did not relieve the respondent Parties from their obligation to ensure respect for the rights protected in the Agreement. The Chamber referred to the 'Guidelines of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe on human rights and the fight against terrorism' (2002), as 'an authoritative clarification of the principles deriving from the Convention'. The Committee of Ministers recalled that 'it is not only possible, but also absolutely necessary, to fight terrorism while respecting human rights'. The Guidelines restated Convention principles: an extradition may only be granted if there are adequate guarantees that the requested person will not be sentenced to death. Moreover, extradition 'may not be granted when there is serious reason to believe that the person whose extradition has been requested will be subjected to torture or to inhumane or degrading treatment or punishment'.⁹⁵

In the three cases involving petitioners detained in Guantanamo Bay the Chamber, among others, found violations of their right not to be subjected to the death penalty (Protocol 6). Considerable uncertainty existed regarding the charges that would be brought against the petitioners, the applicable law and what sentence would be sought. This uncertainty did not exclude the imposition of the death penalty. "This risk is compounded by the fact that the applicants face a real risk of being tried by a military commission that is not independent from the executive power and that operates with significantly reduced procedural safeguards". The Chamber also referred to the potentially unlimited duration of the petitioners' detention. The uncertainties involved gave rise to an obligation by the respondent Parties to seek assurances from the US against imposition of the death penalty. Yet, BiH and Fed. BiH had failed to do so.⁹⁶

Similar reasoning applies to the African Commission's use of provisional measures to halt a deportation.⁹⁷ All human rights adjudicators have used provisional measures in these circumstances before deciding on the merits on the principle of non-refoulement. While the case in which the African Commission took provisional measures was later declared inadmissible, this decision was unrelated to the merits of the case.⁹⁸ The principle of non-refoulement has equally

⁹⁴ Bosnia Chamber Boudellaa, Lakhdar, Nechle and Lahmar v. BiH and Fed. BiH, 11 October 2002, §259. The Chamber pointed out that the cases involving handing over the petitioners to US forces did not call for 'extra-territorial application' of the Agreement. The Agreement did not cover the actions of the US nor require the Parties to impose observance of the rights protected in the Agreement on the US, §258. See also Bensayah v. BiH and Fed. BiH, 7 March 2003, §182.

⁹⁵ Bosnia Chamber Boudellaa, Lakhdar, Nechle and Lahmar v. BiH and Fed. BiH, 11 October 2002, §259. The Chamber pointed out that the cases involving handing over the petitioners to US forces did not call for 'extra-territorial application' of the Agreement. The Agreement did not cover the actions of the US nor require the Parties to impose observance of the rights protected in the Agreement on the US, §§265-267. See also Bensayah v. BiH and Fed. BiH, 7 March 2003, §183.

⁹⁶ Bosnia Chamber Boudellaa, Lakhdar, Nechle and Lahmar v. BiH and Fed. BiH, 11 October 2002, §§270-300; Bensayah v. BiH and Fed. BiH, 4 April 2003, §§185-199; Ait Idir v. BiH and Fed. BiH, 4 April 2003, §§139-153. It recalled the relationship in international human rights law between the fairness of the trial and the imposition of the death penalty. It found that 'as a matter of experience intimately related' to the 'principle of human rights law' as laid down in Safeguard No. 5 of the 1984 'Safeguards guaranteeing protection of the rights of those facing the death penalty', courts that are 'not fully independent from the executive power and that offer reduced procedural safeguards and limitations on the right to legal assistance' are more likely to impose the death penalty.

⁹⁷ ACHPR Interights (on behalf of Jose Domingo Sikunda) v. Namibia, May 2002 (inadm.).

⁹⁸ The case was declared inadmissible for non-exhaustion of domestic remedies.

been recognized by the UN Special Rapporteur on Torture⁹⁹ and the ICTY.¹⁰⁰ In fact, the prohibition of torture, from which the principle of non-refoulement is derived, is a peremptory norm of international law or ius cogens.¹⁰¹

3.2.3 The ICCPR and re-introduction of the death penalty through extradition

With regard to the HRC another issue to be addressed when discussing the appropriateness of provisional measures is its approach to the right to life and the relationship between Article 6(1) and (2) ICCPR.¹⁰² Article 6 ICCPR prohibits the expansion of the scope of the death penalty. The article is often interpreted as not allowing reinstatement of the death penalty after it has been abolished.¹⁰³ Yet in Kindler v. Canada (1993), in Ng and in Cox, the HRC argued that Article 6(1) must be read together with 6(2).¹⁰⁴ This meant that Article 6(2), rather than Article 6(1), was applicable in case of extradition of a non-death penalty State to a death penalty State. Canada would only violate Article 6(1) ‘(i)f Mr. Kindler had been exposed, through extradition from Canada, to a real risk of a violation of Article 6(2) in the United States’.¹⁰⁵ In light of its analysis

⁹⁹ See e.g. UN Special Rapporteur on Torture, Theo van Boven, (the ‘principle of non-refoulement is an inherent part of the overall absolute and imperative nature of the prohibition of torture and other forms of ill-treatment’), 1 August 2004, A/59/324, §28 and UN Special Rapporteur on Torture Manfred Nowak, 30 August 2005, A/60/316, §29 (referring to the ‘absolute principle’ of non-refoulement).

¹⁰⁰ See ICTY Prosecutor v. Furundzija, case IT-95-17/I-T, 10 December 1998, 38 ILM 317 (1999) where the Yugoslavia Tribunal pointed out that the prohibition of torture as laid down in human rights treaties was an absolute right, which could not even be derogated from in times of emergency. It noted that this was linked to the fact that it is a peremptory norm. It then stated: “This prohibition is so extensive that States are even barred by international law from expelling, returning or extraditing a person to another State where there are substantial grounds for believing that the person would be in danger of being subjected to torture”, §144. See also Manfred Nowak, referring to the principle of non-refoulement as ‘an important general principle of international law’: Ait Idir v. BiH and Fed. BiH, 4 April 2003, §1 of his partly dissenting opinion.

¹⁰¹ See e.g. ICTY Prosecutor v. Furundzija, case IT-95-17/I-T, 10 December 1998, 38 ILM 317 (1999), §§144-154; Prosecutor v. Delacic and Others, case IT-96-21-T, 16 November 1998, §454; Prosecutor v. Kunarac, cases IT-96-23-T and IT-96-23/1, 22 February 2001, §466; ECtHR Case of Al-Adsani v. the United Kingdom, 21 November 2001, §61; HRC General Comment 29 (under 11); IACHR Cantoral Benavides v. Peru, Judgment of 18 August 2000 and Maritza Urrutia v. Guatemala, Judgment of 27 November 2003 (‘The absolute prohibition of torture, in all its forms, is now part of international jus cogens’, §92); Cartagena Declaration, Conclusion 5, which calls the non-refoulement principle itself a rule of ius cogens; CIDH Special Report on Canada (2000), §154; see also Allain (2002), pp. 533-558 (concluding that the principle of non-refoulement itself has become a rule of ius cogens); see also the various references to decisions of domestic courts in Smeulers (2002), p. 83 and see e.g. Seiderman (2001), p. 275; Bassiouni (1996), p. 68; Alleweldt (1996), p. 1; Burgers/Danelius (1988), p. 12; Verdross/Simma (1984), p. 819; O’Boyle (1977), p. 687.

¹⁰² See also Chapter III on halting executions.

¹⁰³ See e.g. HRC General Comment no. 6, CCPR/C/21/Rev. 1, pp. 4-5; UN Special Rapporteur on Extra-judicial, Summary or Arbitrary Executions Report on his mission to the USA, UN Doc. E/CN.4/1998/68/Add.3, 22 January 1998, p. 3.

¹⁰⁴ See HRC Kindler v. Canada, 30 July 1993; Chitat Ng v. Canada, 5 November 1993; Cox v. Canada, 31 October 1994.

¹⁰⁵ HRC Kindler v. Canada, 30 July 1993.

of the requirements of Article 6(2) the Committee pointed out that the petitioner had not claimed a violation of Article 14 (fair trial), that he was over eighteen years of age when the crime was committed and that the penalty was imposed for a very serious crime.

The majority opinion in Kindler is surprising since it would seem that the exception of Article 6(2) is not applicable to Canada, which does not have the death penalty.¹⁰⁶ Indeed, Kindler gave rise to several strong dissents.¹⁰⁷ The same happened in other cases involving the death penalty.¹⁰⁸ The decision led to a construction of Art. 6 that made its constituent parts meaningless, ¹⁰⁶ See HRC Roger Judge v. Canada, 5 August 2003, in which the HRC indeed reversed its case law on this point.

¹⁰⁷ HRC Kindler v. Canada, 30 July 1993. Wennergren emphasised that Article 6(1) guaranteed to every human being the inherent right to life. “The other provisions of article 6 concern a secondary and subordinate object, namely to allow States parties that have not abolished capital punishment to resort to it until such time they feel ready to abolish it (...). It would appear to be logical to interpret the fundamental rule in article 6(1) in a wide sense, whereas paragraph 2, which addresses the death penalty, should be interpreted narrowly”. Article 6(2), he argued, is merely an exception or ‘dispensation’ for those States that have not abolished the death penalty but ‘what article 6, paragraph 2 does not’, he noted, ‘is to permit States parties that have abolished the death penalty to reintroduce it at a later stage’. The fact that Article 6(2) is applicable to the US, he considered, should not be construed so as to absolve Canada from its own obligations under Article 6(1). Lallah, in his dissent, also stated that Article 6(2) is not applicable to Canada, since Canada had abolished the death penalty. Pocar equally stated that Article 6(2) merely tolerates the death penalty, within certain limits and in view of future abolition, and that States that have abolished it should not reintroduce it, neither directly nor indirectly. Chanet observed that the HRC, in order to conclude that Canada had violated Article 6, was forced to undertake a joint analysis of paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 6. The fact that the Committee found it necessary to use both paragraphs in support of its argument, ‘clearly shows that each paragraph, taken separately, led to the opposite conclusion, namely, that a violation had occurred’. Since Article 6(2) only refers to countries in which the death penalty has not been abolished, this ‘rules out the application of the text to countries which have abolished the death penalty’ (italics omitted). The Committee erred, she said, by subjecting Canada, ‘as if it were a non-abolitionist country, to a scrutiny of the obligations imposed on non-abolitionist States’. ‘This analysis shows’, she noted, ‘that, according to the Committee, Canada, which had abolished the death penalty on its territory, has by extraditing Mr. Kindler to the United States re-established it by proxy in respect of a certain category of persons under its jurisdiction’. She did not think this type of ‘reintroduction by proxy’ was authorised by the Covenant. Being merely an implicit recognition of the existence of the death penalty, Article 6(2) could not be regarded as an authorisation to re-establish this penalty. Aguilar Urbina noted that the majority had interpreted the exception extensively by reading Article 6(1) in light of Article 6(2). He pointed out that it should be the reverse as Article 6(2) is the exception to the rule in Article 6(1) and should therefore be interpreted restrictively. Article 6(2) constituted a limitation on the application of the death penalty for those States that had not abolished it, while for those that had abolished it, Article 6 ‘represents an insurmountable barrier’ against reintroduction. He noted that the spirit of the article was to eliminate the death penalty as a punishment and he emphasised the absolute nature of the article as a non-derogable right. He pointed out that Canada’s abolition of the death penalty prevented it from applying it directly or indirectly (‘through the handing-over to another State’).

¹⁰⁸ Apart from being an unwarranted extensive interpretation of the provision itself, it ran counter to the proviso in Article 6(6) that ‘nothing in this article shall be invoked (...) to prevent the abolition of capital punishment’. Dissenting opinion Chanet, HRC Kindler v. Canada. In Cox v. Canada, 31 October 1994, she noted that by undertaking a joint analysis of Article 6(1) and Article 6(2) ICCPR the HRC made three legal errors. The first was that it applied to an abolitionist State a text that has been, ‘expressly and without ambiguity, reserved exclusively’ to

while human rights provisions should be interpreted in such a way as to provide individuals with the most meaningful protection.¹⁰⁹ The majority interpretation over-emphasised one paragraph in the Covenant, thereby ignoring the overall purpose of the article and the Convention as a whole, including the prohibition of cruel treatment in Art. 7. The HRC acknowledged this when it overturned Kindler (1993) in Judge v. Canada (2003).¹¹⁰

As noted, the HRC used provisional measures in all extradition cases involving risk of the death penalty. It did so in K.C. and Cox while the complaint did not seem to be based on arguments other than those that had already been dismissed in Kindler and Ng. This means that the HRC would be unlikely to find a violation on the merits if the petitioner would be extradited. Nevertheless, pending the proceedings it used provisional measures. In Judge v. Canada (2003) this friction between the provisional measures and the end result was solved.¹¹¹ non-abolitionist States. The second was that it considered the simple implicit recognition of its existence as an authorisation to re-establish the death penalty in a State that has abolished it. This is an extensive interpretation that clashes with the meaning of Articles 6(6) and 5(2) ICCPR. Those texts, taken together, forbid a State to selectively apply the death penalty. The third mistake was a consequence of the previous two. When the HRC considers that Canada is implicitly authorised by Article 6(2) to re-establish the death penalty and apply it in certain cases, the Committee submits Canada to the obligations imposed on non-abolitionist States as if it had not abolished the death penalty. She also pointed out that the State could have requested assurances under the bilateral treaty and the fact that it did not do so meant that it deliberately exposed persons in the situation of Mr. Cox to the application of the death penalty in the requesting State. This constituted discrimination as well, in violation of Articles 2(1) and 26 ICCPR. She considered the approach of Canada, leaving the choice of requesting assurances or not in the hands of a government deciding on the basis of its criminal law policies, an arbitrary deprivation of the right to life in violation of Article 6(1).

¹⁰⁹ It is clear that, even when the Convention was formulated, the underlying goal was the abolition of the death penalty. This would make a major contribution to respect for the right to life. Subsequent developments, including the adoption of the Second OP, only enhanced this view.

¹¹⁰ HRC Judge v. Canada, 5 August 2003. As a significant factor the HRC referred to the fact that, since Kindler, Canada itself, in the Supreme Court case of US v. Burns (2001), had recognised ‘the need to amend its own domestic law to secure the protection of those extradited from Canada’. It noted that the ICCPR should be interpreted as a ‘living instrument’ and the rights protected under it ‘should be applied in context and in the light of present-day conditions’, §10.3. In reference to the provision on interpretation in the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, it pointed out that Article 6(1) ICCPR constitutes the general rule. Its purpose is to protect life. States that have abolished the death penalty are obliged under this paragraph to protect life in all circumstances. As noted, paragraphs 2 to 6 ‘have the dual function of creating an exception to the right to life in respect of the death penalty and laying down limits on the scope of that exception’. ‘Among these limitations are that found in the opening words of paragraph 2, namely, that only States parties that ‘have not abolished the death penalty’ can avail themselves of the exceptions created in paragraphs 2 to 6. For countries that have abolished the death penalty, there is an obligation not to expose a person to the real risk of its application. Thus, they may not remove, either by deportation or extradition, individuals from their jurisdiction if it may be reasonably anticipated that they will be sentenced to death, without ensuring that the death sentence would not be carried out’. See §10.4.

¹¹¹ Two cases against Australia, a State party that had abolished capital punishment and had ratified the Second OP, had already indicated its evolving position on this particular issue. Rather than the question whether the application of capital punishment would violate the Covenant it addressed the question ‘whether there was a real risk of capital punishment as such’. See HRC G.T. v. Australia, 4 November 1997 and A.R.J. v. Australia, 28 July 1997. The reasoning of the HRC was similar in both cases. It did not find violations of Articles 6 and 7. In one case it noted Article 1 of the Second OP, but it established that Australia would not violate this article because Judge was a fugitive who had been sentenced to death in Pennsylvania, but he escaped and fled to Canada. Following conviction for two robberies Canada ordered him to be deported. He requested a stay until Canada would seek and receive an extradition request from the US, but he was removed on the day of his submission to the HRC. The Special Rapporteur was not in a position to use provisional measures.¹¹² If he had been removed under the bilateral extradition treaty between the US and Canada the latter could have asked for assurances against execution. The HRC noted that the speed of the removal appeared to have been an ‘attempt to prevent him from exercising his right of appeal to the Court of Appeal’.¹¹³ It found that the State party ‘failed to demonstrate that the author’s contention that his deportation to a country where he faces execution would violate his right to life, was sufficiently considered’. The decision to deport the petitioner was taken arbitrarily and in violation of Article 6 together with Article 2(3) ICCPR.¹¹⁴ He was entitled to an appropriate remedy ‘which would include making such representations as are possible to the receiving state to prevent the carrying out of the death penalty on the author’.¹¹⁵

3.3 Findings ratione materiae

3.3.1 Introduction

While the prohibition of refoulement is explicitly included in the UN Convention against Torture (ICAT) it is considered only to relate to the limited definition of torture in Article 1 of the Convention. As noted, according to CAT the principle of non-refoulement does not apply to the prohibition of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment in Article 16 ICAT.¹¹⁶

the death penalty was not a foreseeable and necessary consequence of his deportation. There were some other claims in this case, relating to the right to family life (Articles 17 and 23), but the Committee found that they were inadmissible for insufficient substantiation. Although it declared the Article 9 claim admissible, it found that the deportation would not amount to a violation by Australia of that article. The State party had argued that preventive detention was not automatic in Malaysia and was ‘not likely to occur in the instant case, taking into account T.’s limited knowledge of the trafficking in which he was involved’. Since the petitioner had not challenged this information and only relied on the existence of certain legislation, the State’s information was the decisive factor in the Committee’s assessment of the risk involved. See more generally Chapter XV on assessment of risk.

¹¹² See Chapter II (Systems), section 2.4 on the power and promptness of the HRC.

¹¹³ HRC Judge v. Canada, 5 August 2003, §10.8.

¹¹⁴ Id., §10.9. Irrespective of the fact that it had not yet ratified the second OP (aiming at the abolition of the death penalty) Canada, as a State party that has abolished the death penalty, had violated Article 6(1) by deporting the petitioner to the US ‘without ensuring that the death penalty would not be carried out’. Thus, it established ‘the crucial link in the causal chain that would make possible the execution of the author’, §10.6. The State had submitted that its conduct should be assessed in light of the law applicable at the time when the alleged violation took place. However, the HRC considered that the protection of human rights was evolving and that ‘the meaning of Covenant rights should in principle be interpreted by reference to the time of examination’, §10.8.

¹¹⁵ See HRC Judge v. Canada, 5 August 2003, §12. Solari Yrigoyen suggested a different, more precise, remedy. The State party was ‘to do everything possible, as a matter of urgency to avoid the imposition of the death penalty or to provide the author with a full review of his conviction and sentence’. He also added the customary obligation to ensure that similar violations do not occur in the future. See further Chapter XIII (Protection).

¹¹⁶ See CAT B.S. v. Canada, 14 November 2001 and T.M. v. Sweden, 18 November 2003 (but see partly dissenting opinion by Fernando Mariño Menéndez).

It does not apply either to situations that do not fit the limited definition of torture in this Convention (only if 'inflicted by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity'; only pain or suffering not arising from, inherent in or incidental to 'lawful sanctions'). Thus, Article 3 ICAT only deals with non-refoulement in case of risk of torture and it refers to the limited definition of torture in Article 1.¹¹⁷ Obviously, this approach has implications for the use of provisional measures. CAT has only used them in the context of claims about a real risk of torture in the receiving or requesting State. Article 7 ICCPR, on the other hand, is not restricted by a limited definition of torture. Moreover, it also prohibits expulsion in the face of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.¹¹⁸ The same applies for the provisions in the regional human rights treaties.¹¹⁹

In its General Comment on Article 7 ICCPR (1992) the HRC pointed out that the distinctions between the different kinds of punishment or treatment would depend on the nature, purpose and severity of the treatment applied. It was not necessary 'to draw up a list of prohibited acts or to establish sharp distinctions'. In any case, the prohibition of Article 7 extends to corporal punishment as well as to acts that cause mental suffering to the victim. Moreover, prolonged solitary confinement may amount to a violation of Article 7 as well.¹²⁰

In light of the Committee's interpretation of Article 6 ICCPR in the decades before Judge v. Canada (2003) the question arises how it interpreted Article 7. After all, in these cases it had used provisional measures to halt deportations in death penalty cases while it did not accept on the merits that this would constitute a violation of Article 6 (right to life). As discussed in the chapter on halting executions, in Ng v. Canada the HRC considered that Canada could reasonably have foreseen that the petitioner, if sentenced to death, would be executed in a way that amounts to a violation of Article 7, because execution by gas asphyxiation did not meet the test of 'least possible physical and mental suffering'.¹²¹ Consequently Canada had failed to comply with its obliga-

¹¹⁷ Yet 'lawful' has been argued to refer to international law as well. After all, international human rights norms may not be violated either. See e.g. Smeulers (2002), p. 53 and Alleweldt (1996), p. 94. CAT has pointed out that corporal punishment does not fall under the exception of 'lawful sanctions'. See further Ingelse (2001), p. 278.

¹¹⁸ See also Ingelse (2001), p. 397 (pointing out that most provisions in the Convention against Torture and their interpretation by CAT 'did not extend beyond and sometimes do not even extend as far as the case law of the Human Rights Committee').

¹¹⁹ See e.g. ECtHR Soering v. UK, 7 July 1989, §88 and Vilvarajah et al. v. UK, 30 October 1991, §103.

¹²⁰ HRC General Comment 20 [44], 3 April 1992, A/47/40 (1992), annex VI, p. 193, §§6 and 11. See El-Megreisi v. Libya, 23 March 1994, §5.4 ('by being subjected to prolonged incommunicado detention in an unknown location', the petitioner was the victim of torture and cruel and inhuman treatment). See also Mukong v. Cameroon, 21 July 1994, §9.4. The ECtHR (third section) has found a violation of Art. 3 when a petitioner was 'kept in solitary confinement for an excessive and unnecessarily protracted period, that he was kept for at least seven months in a cell that failed to offer adequate protection against the weather and the climate, and that he was kept in a location from which he could only gain access to outdoor exercise and fresh air at the expense of unnecessary and avoidable physical suffering'. See Mathew v. the Netherlands, 29 September 2005, §217. If there is a general practice in a requesting State of exposing certain (extradited) persons to such treatment provisional measures to halt their extradition would be appropriate. See also an earlier case like Dhoest v. Belgium, 14 May 1987 (no violation Article 3), in which the European Commission on Human Rights had refused to take provisional measures and later found no violation of Article 3 (for evidentiary reasons) and just noted that prolonged solitary confinement was 'undesirable', §116. See also Ingelse (2001), p. 256.

¹²¹ HRC Ng v. Canada, 5 November 1993, §16.4.

tions under the Covenant by extraditing Ng without having sought assurances that he would not be executed.¹²²

Specific issues of contention regarding the prohibition of ill treatment are the death row phenomenon, life imprisonment and expulsion of a person facing 'lack of proper care' in the receiving State. These issues have played a role in decision making on provisional measures.¹²³

3.3.2 Death row phenomenon

Chapter III (halting executions) discussed the approach of the European Court and the HRC to the death row phenomenon. The HRC does not consider this phenomenon, as such, to constitute a violation of the prohibition of cruel treatment. Since its judgment in Soering v. UK (1989) the ECtHR does. The European Commission had previously found that exposing a petitioner to the death row phenomenon did not constitute a violation of the prohibition of cruel treatment. Nevertheless, it had used provisional measures in Soering, as it did in the previous case of Kirkwood v.

¹²² Five members of the HRC would have found a violation of Article 7 on different grounds. Pocar and Lallah considered that because they would find a violation of Article 6, they would necessarily find a violation of Article 7 as well. Aguilar Urbina pointed out that the death penalty as such constituted cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment in violation of that article and not only in case of gas asphyxiation. In any case he considered that the application of the death penalty was subsumed by the violation of Article 6. See §11 of Ng v. Canada. Chanet considered that the HRC had engaged in 'questionable discussion' when it assessed the suffering caused by cyanide gas and took 'into consideration the duration of the agony'. She wondered whether it would find no violation if the agony lasted nine minutes, now it has deemed unacceptable an agony lasting more than ten minutes. She noted that a strict interpretation of Article 6 could have prevented this debate. Wennergren, finally, quoted one of the dissenting justices of the US Supreme Court in a 1992 case denying an individual a stay of execution by gas asphyxiation in California. Justice John Paul Stevens wrote: "The barbaric use of cyanide gas in the Holocaust, the development of cyanide agents as chemical weapons, our contemporary understanding of execution by lethal gas, and the development of less cruel methods of execution all demonstrate that execution by cyanide gas is unnecessarily cruel". Wennergren considered that this summarised 'in a very convincing way' why the use of this method amounts to a violation of Article 7. He also explained that he did not consider execution by lethal injection acceptable either 'from a point of view of humanity' but at least this did 'not stand out as an unnecessarily cruel and inhumane method of execution, as does gas asphyxiation'. On the other hand, two other members of the HRC would not have found a violation of Article 7 at all. Herndl emphatically disagreed with the HRC's finding of a violation of Article 7 because of the execution method. He criticised the fact that the HRC gave only one reason to substantiate its finding of a violation, namely that the execution method did not meet the test of the 'least possible physical and mental suffering'. He considered it futile to attempt to establish categories of execution methods, because it was 'futile to attempt to quantify the pain and suffering of any human being subjected to capital punishment'. This was so, as long as 'such methods were not manifestly arbitrary and grossly contrary to the moral values of a democratic society, and as long as such methods are based on a uniformly applicable legislation adopted by democratic processes'. Ando equally disagreed with the finding of a violation of Article 7. The only thing he was certain of was that the article 'prohibits any method of execution which is intended for prolonging suffering of the executed or causing unnecessary pain to him or her'.

¹²³ Obviously there have been other issues as well, such as that of female genital mutilation. The ECtHR has pointed out in this context that 'it is not in dispute that subjecting a woman to female genital mutilation amounts to ill-treatment' contrary to Article 3 ECHR. What is the issue in such cases is whether the petitioner is facing a real risk of such treatment. ECtHR Collins and Akaziebie v. Sweden, 8 March 2007 (inadm. by a majority). In this case on 8 July 2005 provisional measures were used but withdrawn in the finding on inadmissibility.

UK (inadm. 1984). In the latter case it had first taken and renewed provisional measures, but five months after it had initially taken them it decided not to renew them and only to resume its examination of the case more than two months later. The next month the petitioner informed it that the State had signed the relevant extradition warrant. Counsel requested the President to take provisional measures 'in view of the proximity of the Commission's resumption of its examination of the admissibility of the matter'. The President declined to do so. On the day the proceedings before the Commission were to resume the petitioner once more requested the use of provisional measures. Counsel invoked Art. 13 ECHR and noted the unsuccessful outcome of the proceedings for habeas corpus. Again the Commission declined to use provisional measures.

The fact that it used provisional measures initially indicates its willingness to do so also when the case law on the merits is not yet clear. The fact that it later decided not to renew the measures may indicate that by then the Commission had already deliberated about it and the likelihood of a majority for finding a violation on the merits seemed too limited to continue asking the UK to postpone the extradition.

Given that a few years later, in the Soering case, the Commission again used provisional measures, several members may have believed that Soering could be distinguished from Kirkwood. It may also be that it was clear, already at the stage of provisional measures, that there had been a shift in approaches within the Commission or that a different approach by the Court would be likely. Eventually, the Commission concluded by 6 votes to 5 that Soering's extradition would not constitute a violation of Article 3, while the ECtHR concluded unanimously that it would.¹²⁴ Should the Commission have decided not to take provisional measures in this case, the petitioner would already have been extradited. This would have made redundant the Court's provisional measures.

As noted, thus far the HRC has not found the death row phenomenon as such to be in violation of Article 7 ICCPR. Nevertheless, it has found violations of this article in the context of detention situations on death row. An argument may be made that States should not be allowed to extradite someone to a situation such as those in which the HRC found violations of Article 7 ICCPR in Jamaican cases involving death row inmates. In such a case provisional measures could be used in order to prevent irreparable harm and the decision on the merits would forbid the State to extradite. In result for the petitioner this would be strikingly different from the Committee's case law relating to persons who are already on death row. In the latter cases its eventual decision on the merits does not indicate that the State should abstain from executing persons who have experienced violations of Article 7 on death row.¹²⁵

The fact that CAT has not used provisional measures to halt refoulement in cases involving a real risk of inhuman treatment rather than torture does not mean that its interpretation is not significant to help understand the concept of provisional measures in human rights adjudication generally. Under Article 16 Convention against Torture, the obligation to take general measures against cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, CAT has expressed its concern about solitary confinement and, even more so, incommunicado detention. In the latter situation the detainee is not only deprived of all contact with the outside world, but equally of all contact with other detainees. CAT has found that such detention violated Article 2(1), because such situations were conducive to torture. Torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment is more likely to occur in situations in which there is no access to court and counsel, family members or independent medical assistance. The longer the period before a detainee is brought before a court, the greater the risk of ill treatment. Detainees are normally tortured most severely in the first days of their detention. Moreover, a lengthy period of detention may make it difficult to find visible traces of ill treatment.¹²⁶

¹²⁴ EComHR Soering v. UK, 19 January 1989; ECtHR Soering v. UK, 26 June 1989. For a discussion of the case see e.g. Van der Wilt (1995), pp. 53-80; Shea (1992), pp. 85-138; Lillich (1991), pp. 128-149; Van den Wyngaard (1990), pp. 757-779 and Quigley/Shank (1989), pp. 241-272.

¹²⁵ See Chapter XIII (Protection).

3.3.3 Life imprisonment

Petitioners have also requested the use of provisional measures to prevent extradition facing long prison sentences rather than the death penalty. While the evidentiary issues are similar to those in other extradition cases, the type of harm threatened is different. In S.I.G. v. the Netherlands (1985) the European Commission had taken provisional measures to halt an extradition to the US for someone awaiting a prison sentence of 50 years.¹²⁷ In another case, a few years later, it refused to take provisional measures and pointed out, when it subsequently declared the case inadmissible, that Article 3 ‘cannot be interpreted in the sense that it would require a procedure for the reconsideration of a life sentence with a view to its remission or termination in any country to which extradition from a Convention State is envisaged’.¹²⁸ In Einhorn v. France (2001) the Court had taken provisional measures, but lifted them only a few days later. On the merits it pointed out that it did ‘not rule out the possibility that the imposition of an irreducible life sentence may raise an issue under Article 3’. ‘Consequently, it is likewise not to be excluded that the extradition of an individual to a State in which he runs the risk of being sentenced to death without any possibility of early release may raise an issue under Article 3’.¹²⁹ This case did not relate to such a situation. In other words, the fact that the Court lifted its provisional measures may relate to evidentiary requirements rather than to expectations on a decision on the merits. In Weiss v. Austria (2002) the petitioner had been tried in absentia for fraud, racketeering and money laundering. He was sentenced to a period of 845 years without opportunity for release until having served at least 711 years. ECtHR first used provisional measures to halt his extradition, but then, on request of Austria, it decided not to prolong them. The petitioner subsequently withdrew the case in order to submit it to the HRC.¹³⁰ In May 2002 the Special Rapporteur of the HRC used provisional measures to halt his extradition until the Committee ‘had received and addressed the State party’s submission on whether there was a risk of irreparable harm to the author, as alleged by counsel’.¹³¹ The ECtHR had not indicated how it had phrased the provisional measure nor why it subsequently did not prolong them. The HRC, on the other hand, did specify its provisional measure, the phrasing of which was more cautious than usual. Instead of requesting the State to halt the extradition until the HRC had examined the merits (or admissibility) it requested it to halt the extradition until the Committee had dealt with the State’s comments about the existence of a risk of irreparable harm. In fact adjudicators may always withdraw, or decide not to prolong, their provisional measures upon receipt of information showing that there was no risk or the circumstances had since changed and there was no longer any imminence or risk.¹³² In this case, how-

¹²⁶ See also Chapter VIII (Procedural rights).

¹²⁷ EComHR S.I.G. v. the Netherlands, 10 October 1985 (inadm.).

¹²⁸ ECtHR P. and R.H. and L.L. v. Austria, 5 December 1989 (inadm.). See also Nivette v. France, 3 July 2001 (inadm.). While it is unclear whether provisional measures were requested in Nivette, the Court indicated that the relevant criterion is whether there is a risk of a sentence of life imprisonment ‘without any possibility of early release’.

¹²⁹ ECtHR Einhorn v. France, 16 October 2001 (inadm.). Among others it referred to Council of Europe documents that were ‘not without relevance’, §27.

¹³⁰ ECtHR Weiss v. Austria, 13 June 2002 (struck out).

¹³¹ HRC Sholam Weiss v. Austria, 3 April 2003. (initial submission 24 May 2002, Rule 86 of 24 May 2002; extradition 9 June 2002). See also Chapter XIII on the protection required.

¹³² See Chapter XV on Immediacy and Risk.

ever, the cautious phrasing appears to be related to doubts not about the risks involved, but about whether these would warrant the use of provisional measures.¹³³

An example in which the HRC Special Rapporteur refused to use provisional measures to prevent a long prison sentence is that of J. v. Canada (disc. 2003).¹³⁴ The case was submitted in March 1996 on behalf of an American citizen who had fled to Canada after he was charged with drug trafficking. His counsel requested the HRC to use provisional measures in order to prevent his extradition if the Supreme Court of Canada would decide so. Counsel argued that the petitioner could be condemned to at least 20 years imprisonment in the US while the sentence for the same crime would be substantially lower in Canada. The argument appeared to be that the sentence would be disproportionate, in violation of Articles 7 and 10. A week later the Special Rapporteur registered the case under Rule 91 (current Rule 97), but refused to use provisional measures. Subsequently, the HRC did not hear anything from the State until July 1998, when it informed the Committee that in March 1996 the Supreme Court of Canada had decided to allow the extradition which would take place the same day. The refusal to use provisional measures shows the Committee's reluctance to use them other than in the most extreme circumstances.¹³⁵

The HRC has not yet determined on the merits whether life imprisonment without the possibility of parole would constitute a violation of Article 7 ICCPR, either generally or in the specific circumstances of the case.¹³⁶ In Weiss v. Austria (2003),¹³⁷ it considered that the petitioner's conviction and sentence were not yet final, 'pending the outcome of the re-sentencing process which would open the possibility to appeal against the initial conviction itself'. In this light it considered it was premature for it to decide, on the basis of hypothetical facts, whether his extradition to serve life imprisonment without the possibility of early release gave rise to the State's responsibility under the ICCPR.¹³⁸ The petitioner had submitted that a sentence of 845 years for offences of fraud was 'grossly disproportionate' and amounted to inhuman punishment and that a life sentence without parole for a non-violent offence was inhuman per se.¹³⁹

¹³³ For a recent example see ECtHR Press release 4 August 2008 regarding Mustafa Kamal Mustafa (Abu Hamza) v. UK. His complaint was that if extradited he would be exposed to treatment in breach Article 3 ECHR 'because he risks a life sentence without parole and, particularly in view of his health problems, as a result of the fact that he might be detained in a so-called "supermax" detention facility'. In other words the life imprisonment claim was combined with a claim involving health issues.

¹³⁴ HRC J. v. Canada (685/1996) discontinued in April 2003 (on file with the author).

¹³⁵ Equally, it shows that some States indeed extradite a person immediately upon exhaustion of domestic remedies, warranting the use of provisional measures in advance of such exhaustion. See Chapter XV on immediacy (assessment of temporal urgency). In April 2003, after several reminders sent to counsel, the HRC decided to discontinue the case. The case also illustrates the main reason for discontinuance other than that the case has been solved. When a person has been extradited or expelled it is very difficult to contact the petitioner, even if expelled or extradited to an accessible State like the US.

¹³⁶ See Ingelse (2001), p. 279 on the CAT and life imprisonment as cruel treatment.

¹³⁷ HRC Sholam Weiss v. Austria, 3 April 2003 (initial submission 24 May 2002, Rule 86 of 24 May 2002; extradition 9 June 2002).

¹³⁸ HRC Sholam Weiss v. Austria, 3 April 2003, §9.4.

¹³⁹ Id., §6.7. The HRC did find a violation of Article 14(1) on equality before the courts, taken together with the right to an effective and enforceable remedy under Article 2(3), because the petitioner was extradited in breach of a stay issued by the Administrative Court and because he had not been able to appeal the decision of the Upper Regional Court, while the prosecutor could and did appeal an earlier judgment of this Court, §9.6. It also reiterated that the State had violated its obligations under the OP by extraditing the petitioner before the HRC had been able to address his allegation that this would cause irreparable harm, §10.1. See Chapter XVI (Legal status) and XVII (Official responses).

Given its reluctance to interpret the death penalty and the death row phenomenon as a violation of Article 7 presently it is not likely that the HRC would find a violation of this article in the context of imprisonment for life. In this context the use of provisional measures seems less appropriate.¹⁴⁰

Austria did not respect the provisional measure and extradited Weiss.¹⁴¹ Irrespective of doubts about the appropriateness of these measures in a given case, respect for the HRC and good faith application of the obligations arising under the individual complaint procedure demands compliance with the Committee's provisional measures.¹⁴² The HRC pointed out once more, but this time in the context of extradition and expulsion, that these measures are essential to the its role under the OP. Flouting the rule on provisional measures undermines the protection of Covenant rights under the OP, especially if States did this 'by irreversible measures such as the execution of the alleged victim or his/her deportation from the country'.¹⁴³ On the one hand the reference to 'especially' indicates that the HRC considers that States could ignore their obligations also through reversible measures. One might think of ignoring deadlines for response or stating disagreement but, on the basis of factors other than the Committee's provisional measures, refraining from taking irreversible action. On the other hand, the word 'especially' indicates the particularly reprehensible nature of irreversible acts in cases in which it had used provisional measures. At the same time it is noteworthy that the HRC does not use the term 'irreparable'. By using the term irreversible instead it potentially extends the range of cases in which it could use provisional measures. This could indicate that it is not ready to reverse its approach taken in Stewart v. Canada (1996) in which it used provisional measures in family life cases.¹⁴⁴

3.3.4 Lack of proper care

Both the European Commission and the ECtHR have used provisional measures to prevent deportation in some cases of 'lack of proper care' in the receiving State, but only very exceptionally. An early case in which the European Commission took such provisional measures was Taspinar v. the Netherlands (1985).¹⁴⁵ In July 1984 the Commission had taken provisional measures and requested information 'concerning the grounds on which the Government considered it justified to conclude that the applicant's child would be taken care of if returned to Turkey'. This question, relating to a seven year old child, helps explain the rationale for the use of provisional measures to halt the expulsion pending further examination of the case.¹⁴⁶ The European Commission subsequently used provisional measures in other cases involving lack of proper care as well. It pointed out that it did 'not exclude that a lack of proper care in a case where someone is suffering from a serious illness could in certain circumstances amount to treatment contrary to Article 3'.¹⁴⁷

The Commission was unlikely to take provisional measures because of the psychological condition of a petitioner, including the risk of suicide.¹⁴⁸ Yet it did use provisional measures

¹⁴⁰ This may explain the cautious phrasing of its provisional measures in this case. Yet, it does not justify Austria's non compliance. See Chapter XVII (Official responses).

¹⁴¹ See Chapter XVII (Official responses).

¹⁴² See further Chapter XVI (Legal status).

¹⁴³ HRC Sholam Weiss v. Austria, 3 April 2003, §7.2.

¹⁴⁴ HRC Stewart v. Canada, 1 November 1996. See Chapter XII on provisional measures in other situations, under the heading 'halting deportation in family life cases'.

¹⁴⁵ EComHR Taspinar v. the Netherlands, 9 October 1985 (struck out after a statement by the authorities that they would grant the 7 year old son a residence permit).

¹⁴⁶ The provisional measure was taken under Rule 36 and the question was asked under Rule 42.

¹⁴⁷ See e.g. EComHR Tanko v. Finland, 19 May 1994 (inadm.).

¹⁴⁸ See e.g. EComHR Choudry v. UK, 13 May 1996 (inadm.). This case involved a risk of serious deterioration of the psychiatric illness of one petitioner upon deportation of her husband, as well because of the age (unaccompanied child)¹⁴⁹ or physical condition of the petitioner and in light of the availability of (medical) care in the receiving State (e.g. claims of lack of proper care for deaf petitioner with little communication skills;¹⁵⁰ of lack of medication to prevent a petitioner from losing his eyesight;¹⁵¹ or of adverse circumstances for terminally ill persons).¹⁵²

The ECtHR has been less forthcoming in this context. It did use provisional measures to halt the expulsion of D. who was in the final stages of a terminal illness (AIDS) and had no prospect of family support nor medical care upon expulsion. On the merits in D. v. UK (1997) it first pointed out that ‘aliens who are subject to expulsion cannot in principle claim any entitlement to remain in the territory of a Contracting State in order to continue to benefit from medical, social or other forms of assistance provided by the expelling State’. However, it then found that compelling humanitarian considerations may exceptionally result in a violation of Article 3. In this case expulsion of the petitioner to St. Kitts would violate this article. The lack of family support and medical care upon expulsion would hasten his death and subject him to acute mental and physical suffering.¹⁵³ Subsequently, in another case still dealt with by the Commission, deportation of a as a claim of lack of proper care for the husband regarding his leg and arm prostheses. The President refused to take provisional measures in July 1995. Two months later the Commission did give the case priority, but the petitioners subsequently moved to Ireland and were no longer at risk of deportation to Pakistan. The case was declared inadmissible. Yet see D. et al. v. Sweden, 8 September 1993 (struck out) and Harron and Alayo v. Sweden, 7 March 1996 (adm.) and 3 December 1996 (struck out) in which the Commission did use provisional measures on behalf of petitioners claiming a real risk of permanent physical and mental injuries upon their expulsion to Uganda. In this case there was a suicide risk as well.

¹⁴⁹ See the above EComHR Taspinar v. the Netherlands, 9 October 1985. On the other hand, on 31 January 1994, in Nsona v. the Netherlands, the President of the Commission decided not to use provisional measures to halt the expulsion of nine year old Francine Nsona to Zaire (Congo) (he ‘found no basis’ for a Rule 36 decision). That same day she was sent to Switzerland where Swiss Air decided to provide shelter in its nursery. Subsequently she was sent to Kinshasa, apparently travelling alone. A business relation of Swiss Air collected her at the airport and brought her to the immigration authorities in Zaire. On the merits the Commission accepted that her removal to Zaire ‘might have exposed her to some hardship’ but not to the risk of treatment prohibited by Article 3, see Rule 31 Report, 2 March 1995 (20 votes to 4). The ECtHR found no violation of Article 3 either, Judgment of 26 October 1996 (dissenting opinion by judge De Meyer arguing that her removal did give rise to an issue under Article 3 because of the haste to remove such a young child without appropriate investigation and because the State handed over to others all responsibility for her welfare as soon as she had left its territory; this was not merely an ‘attitude’ that was ‘open to criticism’, but treatment ‘difficult to consider human’).

¹⁵⁰ See EComHR Nasri v. France, 13 July 1995 (provisional measure more than three years previously).

¹⁵¹ See EComHR Tanko v. Finland, 19 May 1994 (inadm.). In this case the petitioner invoked risk of losing his eyesight in view of the inadequate facilities for treating him and possibly operating on him in Ghana. The Commission took provisional measures in March 1994 and prolonged these in April. Subsequently it did not find it established that the petitioner could not obtain his medication in Ghana or bring it with him from Finland. Thus, it declared the case inadmissible. More generally about the assessment of risk see Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

¹⁵² See e.g. EComHR D. v. UK, 15 October 1996 (Rule 31 report); Harron and Alayo v. Sweden, 7 March 1996 (adm.) and 3 December 1996 (struck out); ECtHR D. v. UK, 2 May 1997; ECtHR Tatete v. Switzerland, 18 November 1999 (adm.) and 6 July 2000 (Judgment) (the first provisional measure was still taken by the Commission); ECtHR S.C.C. v. Sweden, 15 February 2000 (inadm.); ECtHR Taskin v. Germany, 22 May 2001 (adm.) and 23 July 2002 (struck out); ECtHR Cardoso and Johansen v. UK, 5 December 2000 (struck out).

¹⁵³ ECtHR D. v. UK, 2 May 1997, §§51-54.

person to Congo would also violate Article 3. His HIV infection had ‘already reached an advanced stage necessitating repeated hospital stays’ and the care facilities in Congo were precarious.¹⁵⁴ On the other hand, in S.C.C. v. Sweden (2000) the ECtHR declared inadmissible a claim under Article 3. In this case there were no exceptional circumstances in which removing the petitioner may result in a violation ‘owing to compelling humanitarian considerations’. She was not in the advanced stages of AIDS, her children and other family members were living in Zambia and, according to a report from the Swedish Embassy, AIDS treatment was available.¹⁵⁵ In this case the Court did use provisional measures.

Bensaid v. UK (2001) is another example of the strict approach of the ECtHR on the merits.¹⁵⁶ This case involved a petitioner suffering from a serious and long-term mental illness. On the merits the Court expressed awareness of the difficulties of obtaining medication in Algeria and ‘the stress inherent in returning to that part of Algeria, where there is violence and active terrorism’. Nevertheless, it considered that medical treatment was available in Algeria and the fact that his circumstances would be ‘less favourable than those enjoyed by him in the United Kingdom is not decisive’ from the point of view of Article 3. The Court emphasised the ‘high threshold’ set by Article 3, ‘particularly where the case does not concern the direct responsibility of the Contracting State for the infliction of harm’. Thus, it did not find ‘a sufficiently real risk’ because the case did not disclose the exceptional circumstances of D. v. UK. Yet, pending the proceedings it had taken provisional measures.¹⁵⁷

More recently the ECtHR has confirmed its strict approach.¹⁵⁸

Even if it initially did use provisional measures pending the proceedings in these cases, it sometimes let itself be easily swayed by the State’s submissions and decided not to prolong these measures.¹⁵⁹ In N. v. UK (2008), the Court apparently did use and continue to use provisional ¹⁵⁴ EComHR B.B. v. France, 8 September 1997 (adm.), 9 March 1998 (Article 31 report finding by 29 to 2 votes that there would be a breach of Article 3) and 7 September 1998 (struck out after French undertaking not to deport him). The provisional measures were of 2 April 1996.

¹⁵⁵ ECtHR (first section) S.C.C. v. Sweden, 15 February 2000 (inadm.).

¹⁵⁶ ECtHR Bensaid v. UK, 6 February 2001.

¹⁵⁷ The Court does not specify the date on which it took provisional measures in this case. It simply indicates that it used them.

¹⁵⁸ See e.g. ECtHR Arcila Henao v. the Netherlands, 24 June 2003 (inadm.); Ndangoya v. Sweden, 22 June 2004 (inadm.); Amemignan v. the Netherlands, 25 November 2004 (inadm.); Hida v. Denmark, 19 February 2004 (inadm.); Haliti et al. v. Denmark, 19 February 2004 (inadm.); Muratovic v. Denmark, 19 February 2004 (inadm) (involving PTSD); Kaldik v. Germany, 22 September 2005 (inadm. by a majority) (involving PTSD) and N. v. UK, 27 May 2008 (Grand Chamber). While in these cases no mention is made of petitioners’ requests for provisional measures nor of the Court’s decision to use or not to use Rule 39, the dissenting opinion by Judges Tulkens, Bonello and Spielmann in ECtHR (Grand Chamber), N. v. UK, 27 May 2008 points out that provisional measures were used in that case. More generally they point out that ‘(a) glance at the Court’s Rule 39 statistics concerning the United Kingdom shows that, when one compares the total number of requests received (and those refused and accepted) as against the number of HIV cases, the so-called “floodgate” argument is totally misconceived’, §8. They discuss the statistics in a footnote, noting that of the more than 300 provisional measures used between June 2005 and April 2008 less than 30 involved HIV cases; while this shows that this is a minority, it nevertheless indicates that the Court has used provisional measures in these ‘lack of proper care’ cases.

¹⁵⁹ See e.g. ECtHR Salkic et al. v. Sweden, 29 June 2004 (inadm.), §2. In this case the President initially used provisional measures and considered it necessary to obtain information on the question whether there was anyone that would assist the family upon their arrival in Sarajevo and the State responded that ‘no arrangements had been made for assistance to the applicants upon their arrival in Sarajevo. However, the Migration Authority had scheduled a meeting with them measures, but subsequently found that the case was not sufficiently ‘exceptional’ for a finding of a violation of Article 3 ECHR for lack of proper care in the receiving State. In its discussion of general issues in this case the Court noted that the decision ‘to remove an alien who is suffering from a serious mental or physical illness to a country where the facilities for the treatment of that illness are inferior to those available in the Contracting State may raise an issue under Article 3, but only in a very exceptional case, where the humanitarian grounds against the removal are compelling’.¹⁶⁰ The Court has decided to maintain the ‘high threshold’ it set in D. v. UK, only finding a violation of Article 3 in ‘very exceptional circumstances’ (D., for instance, was critically ill and appeared to be close to death, no nursing or medical care was available, nor family ‘willing or able to care for him or provide him with even a basic level of food, shelter or social support’).¹⁶¹ As a reason for using this high threshold it noted that ‘the alleged future harm would emanate not from the intentional acts or omissions of public authorities or non-State bodies, but instead from a naturally occurring illness and the lack of resources to deal with it in the receiving country’.¹⁶² It considered that while many of the rights in the ECHR ‘have implications of a social or economic nature’, the Convention ‘is essentially directed at the protection of civil and political rights’.¹⁶³ It concluded its general discussion of the issue by pointing out that it is ‘necessary, given the fundamental importance of Article 3 in the Convention system, for the Court to retain a degree of flexibility to prevent expulsion in very exceptional cases’. Nevertheless, Article 3 ‘does not place an obligation on the Contracting State to alleviate such disparities through the provision of free and unlimited health care to aliens without a right to stay within its jurisdiction. A finding to the contrary would place too great a burden on the Contracting States’.¹⁶⁴ The Court even referred to the ‘search for a fair balance between the demands of the general interest of the community and the requirements of the protection of the individual’s fundamental rights’.¹⁶⁵ This is a controversial statement as Article 3 ECHR is absolute and does not allow for such a balance.¹⁶⁶ It has been suggested, therefore, that it might be more appropriate to discuss lack of proper care cases under Article 8 ECHR, where such a balance would be possible.¹⁶⁷ It is argued in this book that in those exceptional cases where the Court would be likely to find a violation on the merits, the use of provisional measures would be appropriate also in the context of an Article 8 claim as it does concern risk of irreparable harm to persons.

The use of provisional measures to halt expulsion in cases involving lack of proper care in the receiving State has not remained a practice, albeit modest, of the Strasbourg organs alone. The HRC has equally used provisional measures to halt deportation in the face of an expected lack of on 12 March 2004 where the issues would be discussed and similar meetings had taken place on earlier occasions’. On 9 March 2004 the Chamber reconsidered the petition ‘in the light of the information provided by the Swedish Government’ and decided not to prolong the provisional measure. A few days later the petitioners informed the Court that the meeting with the Migration Authority had been cancelled. In addition they ‘disputed that any such meetings had been held on earlier occasions’. Subsequently they were deported.

¹⁶⁰ ECtHR (Grand Chamber) N. v. UK, 27 May 2008, §42.

¹⁶¹ Ibid.

¹⁶² Id., §43.

¹⁶³ Id., §44.

¹⁶⁴ Ibid.

¹⁶⁵ Ibid.

¹⁶⁶ See e.g. ECtHR Saadi v. Italy, 28 February 2008, §127. See also the dissent by Judges Tulkens, Bonello and Spielmann in N. v. UK, §7 and, e.g. Terlouw (2008) and Bruin (2008).

¹⁶⁷ See the annotation of N. v. UK, 27 May 2008, by Battjes (HBA) in Jurisprudentie Vreemdelingenrecht JV 2008/266, §5.

proper medical treatment in the receiving State. In C. v. Australia (2002)¹⁶⁸ the petitioner was an Assyrian Christian with a psychiatric condition, which he incurred in immigration detention. During this detention as a ‘non-citizen’ without an entry permit he had developed a serious psychiatric illness.¹⁶⁹ Only in August 1994, after more than two years, he was released from detention into his family’s custody, on the basis of his special (mental) health needs. At this point he was behaving delusional and in May 1996 he was convicted for aggravated burglary and threats to kill. Subsequently he was sentenced to a prison term. Following this the State planned to deport him to Iran.¹⁷⁰ In December 1999 the HRC used provisional measures to stay his deportation and the State respected them. Almost three years later, in its decision on the merits, the HRC indeed considered that the petitioner’s continued detention, when the State was aware of his mental condition and failed to take the necessary steps to ameliorate his mental deterioration, constituted a violation of Article 7 ICCPR.¹⁷¹ Moreover, it found that his deportation would amount to a separate violation of this article. It attached weight to the fact that he ‘was originally granted a refugee status on the basis of well-founded fear of persecution as an Assyrian Christian, coupled with the likely consequence of return of his illness’. The State had ‘not established that the current circumstances in the receiving State are such that a grant of refugee status no longer holds validity’. It further observed that the domestic courts had accepted ‘that it was unlikely that the only effective medication (Clorazil) and back-up treatment would be available in Iran’ and found the petitioner ‘blameless for his mental illness’ that was ‘first triggered while in Australia’. Thus, the ¹⁶⁸ HRC C. v. Australia, 28 October 2002 (initial submission 23 November 1999, Rule 86, 2 December 1999).

¹⁶⁹ He was detained in July 1992 and psychologically assessed for his deteriorating psychiatric condition since August 1993.

¹⁷⁰ In October 1996 he underwent psychiatric assessment. The assessment report noted that ‘no previous illness was apparent and that his morbid-origin persecutory beliefs developed in detention’. It found ‘little doubt that there was a direct causal relationship between the offence for which he is currently incarcerated and the persecutory beliefs that he held on account of his [paranoid schizophrenic] illness’. ‘As a result of treatment’ it found ‘a decreasing risk of future acts based on his illness, but an ongoing need for careful psychiatric supervision’. A subsequent assessment came to similar conclusions. On this basis the minister ordered his deportation. See §2.8. The Administrative Appeals Tribunal found that his case fell outside the provisions of the Refugee Convention because ‘while he could suffer a recurrence of his delusional behaviour in Iran which given his ethnicity and religion could lead to a loss of freedom, this would not be ‘on account of’ his race or religion’. Moreover, it made no findings on the standard of health care facilities in Iran, although it found a ‘lack of certainty’ that the petitioner ‘would be able to obtain Clorazil in Iran’. See §2.10. The Federal Court equally noted that ‘while [his] illness can be controlled by medication available in Australia [Clorazil], the medication is probably not available in Iran’. See §2.11.

¹⁷¹ The HRC noted that the psychiatric ‘evidence was essentially unanimous’ about the fact that the psychiatric illness ‘developed as a result of the protracted period of immigration detention’. It pointed out that the State was aware of this at least since August 1992 and that by August 1993 ‘it was evident that there was a conflict between the author’s continued detention and his sanity’. ‘Despite increasingly serious assessments of the author’s conditions in February and June 1994 (and a suicide attempt), it was only in August 1994 that the Minister exercised his exceptional power to release him from immigration detention on medical grounds’. By that time his ‘illness had reached such level of severity that irreversible consequences were to follow’. HRC C. v. Australia, 28 October 2002, §8.4. Among others, the HRC also considered that given the circumstances, ‘whatever the reasons for the original detention, continuance of immigration detention for over two years without individual justification and without any chance of substantive judicial review was in the Committee’s view, arbitrary and constituted a violation of article 9, paragraph 1’, §8.1.

HRC considered that his deportation ‘to a country where it is unlikely that he would receive the treatment necessary for the illness caused, in whole or in part, because of the State party’s violation’ of his rights would amount to a violation of Article 7.¹⁷²

The second time the HRC used provisional measures in the context of lack of proper care in the receiving State was in December 2001. In Romans v. Canada (2004) it requested the State not to deport a petitioner to Jamaica. His family had expressed fear for his life and physical integrity because of his mental illness and the situation in Jamaican prisons.¹⁷³ This provisional measure was taken before the decision on the merits in the aforementioned C. v. Australia (2002), indicating an expectation that the full Committee would indeed find a violation in the circumstances.¹⁷⁴

Some failed requests for provisional measures could also provide insight in the approach of an adjudicator. A subcategory of a ‘lack of proper care’ case relates to claims of risk to the family members of the person to be deported. In Choudry v. UK the main claim related to the risk of a serious deterioration of the psychiatric illness of the wife of the person to be deported. The ECtHR refused to take provisional measures in this case.¹⁷⁵ In P.L.-B. v. Canada (disc. 1996)¹⁷⁶

¹⁷² HRC C. v. Australia, 28 October 2002, §8.5. Ando, Klein and Yalden dissented with regard to the finding of a violation of Article 7. They considered that arguing that the conflict between the petitioner’s continued detention and his sanity could only be solved by his release would expand the scope of Article 7 too far. They did not think that the fact that the State did not immediately order the release of the petitioner amounted to a violation of Article 7. They did not agree either with the other ground the HRC had found for a violation of Article 7. They considered that the State had provided ‘detailed arguments’ to the effect that the petitioner, as an Assyrian Christian, would not suffer a persecution in Iran and would be able to receive an effective medical treatment.

¹⁷³ HRC Steven Romans v. Canada, 9 July 2004. By 1995 this petitioner had been diagnosed to suffer from chronic paranoid schizophrenia and from substance abuse and personality disorders. At the end of 1996 he was convicted of assault. A deportation order was issued in July 1999. The Appeal Division of the Immigration Board accepted that there would be ‘great emotional hardship’ inflicted on his family if he were deported, but ‘on balance of probabilities’ he himself would not suffer ‘undue hardship’. His counsel argued that he was mentally incompetent to act on his own and to care for himself, which was recognised by the Appeal Division. Deportation would leave him with ‘virtually no treatment facilities’. ‘Bellevue Hospital in Jamaica had advised that it could not treat violent patients, and such persons are placed in regular prison facilities’. Counsel before the HRC also argued that Jamaica had a long history of mistreating the mentally ill in correctional facilities. Counsel had referred to the ECtHR case D. v. UK. In May 2002 the State contended that the case was inadmissible for failure to exhaust domestic remedies. Apart from this it considered that ‘an alleged deterioration of his condition after return was largely speculative’ and that he had presented ‘no evidence that death would be a necessary and foreseeable consequence of a return to Jamaica’. Eventually the HRC declared the case inadmissible for non-exhaustion of domestic remedies. See also Chapter XIV on the relationship with admissibility and the issue of suspensive effect.

¹⁷⁴ Even CAT, which does not recognize the application of the principle of non-refoulement in the context of cruel treatment, as it makes a formal link between non-refoulement in Article 3 ICAT and the definition of torture in Art. 1 ICAT, has nevertheless taken into account medical evidence of the psychological state of the petitioner who ‘does not appear capable of coping with a forcible return’ which ‘would entail a definite risk to his health’ when determining on the merits that the petitioner could not be returned to Libya. Yet the Committee equally pointed out the petitioner’s political activities subsequent from his departure from Libya ‘and the persistent reports concerning the treatment generally meted out to such activists when they are forcibly returned’. CAT Gamal El Rgeig v. Switzerland, 15 November 2006, §7.4.

¹⁷⁵ ECtHR Choudry v. UK, 13 May 1996 (inadm.).

one of the arguments of counsel related to the risk of irreparable harm to the petitioner's children if he would be separated from them, also given the fact that their mother was terminally ill.¹⁷⁷ The HRC was unable to use provisional measures in time.¹⁷⁸ The case provides useful information on counsel's argument about irreparable harm to both the alleged victim and the children under his care. The fact that in this case the petitioner did not report for removal and could not be found at his home address taking care of his children does not diminish the value of an argument about threats of irreparable harm to family members of the petitioner. Such argument may apply when they are in a vulnerable position, for instance because of their age, illness or disability.

3.4 Findings ratione personae

3.4.1 Introduction

Several aspects of findings ratione personae are also relevant in a discussion on the issue of provisional measures to halt expulsion. One is the issue whether provisional measures are used to halt removal to a safe State that may subsequently remove the petitioner to a State where she runs the risk of irreparable harm. Another is whether they are used when the risk of harm emanates from non-State actors, and yet another whether they have been used to deal with the phenomenon of extraordinary rendition.

3.4.2 Indirect danger through removal

The HRC, CAT and ECtHR have specifically noted that sending States are responsible for exposing a person to a real risk of ill-treatment 'either in the country to which removal is to be effected

¹⁷⁶ HRC P. L.-B. v. Canada, 556/1993, discontinued 17 April 1996, request for urgent measures of 4 October 1993, initial submission of 5 October 1993, information about his deportation on 7 October 1993 and Rule 91 of 18 January 1994 (on file with the author).

¹⁷⁷ Counsel had further requested the HRC to take provisional measures because the petitioner would face irreparable harm should he be returned to Angola. She pointed out that, 'given the medical support for his account of detention and torture in 1991', it was reasonable to infer that his collaboration with the UNITA rebels was known to the Angolan authorities and that he ran the risk of being detained upon his return. She pointed out that, once he had been expelled, even if the HRC would eventually decide favourably on the merits, it would be unlikely that he could be found and returned to Canada. She also referred to the rise in hostilities in Angola and the risk that he would not survive a forced return. She concluded that the removal of the petitioner at this stage 'would effectively frustrate any possible good that could come out of the submission of a communication to the Committee'. She emphasised that granting provisional measures in this case 'would not have any adverse impact on the public interest in Canada' as it was 'a unique factual situation'. They 'would have no generalised effect on the operation of Canada's immigration system'. Submission of 5 October 1993, in P. L.-B. v. Canada (556/1993), discontinued 17 April 1996 (on file with the author).

¹⁷⁸ See Chapters II (Systems) and XV (Immediacy and risk). Subsequently, the Rapporteur requested the State to clarify the circumstances of the petitioner's deportation in October 1993. The State responded six months later. Apart from providing information and arguments about admissibility and the domestic law and proceedings, it also noted that 'contrary to the impression which the Committee may have' immigration officials had not removed the petitioner from Canada. The State did acknowledge that he was scheduled for removal in October 1993, but pointed out that he did not appear and that his current whereabouts were unknown. Note verbale transmitting the case under Rule 91 of 18 January 1994; Submission of the State of 19 July 1994, in P. L.-B. v. Canada (556/1993), discontinued 17 April 1996 (on file with the author).

or in any country to which the person may subsequently be removed'.¹⁷⁹ This is often referred to as indirect removal to third States or removal to intermediary States. In T.I. v. UK, for instance, the ECtHR took provisional measures to halt expulsion to Germany in order to prevent an expulsion from Germany to Sri Lanka.¹⁸⁰

As a precondition for a State's reliance on an 'internal flight alternative' the Court has also listed certain guarantees that have to be in place: 'the person to be expelled must be able to travel to the area concerned, to gain admittance and be able to settle there, failing which an issue under Article 3 may arise, the more so if in the absence of such guarantees there is a possibility of the expellee ending up in a part of the country of origin where he or she may be subject to ill-treatment'.¹⁸¹

3.4.3 Threats by non-State actors

CAT deals with a limited definition of the prohibition of torture, which it has found to exclude torture by non-State actors. This has repercussions for its use of provisional measures. In fact it has not used them in such cases.¹⁸² The HRC and the ECtHR, on the other hand, have used provisional measures in situations involving threats by non-state actors.¹⁸³

¹⁷⁹ See HRC General Comment No. 31 [80], Nature of the General Legal Obligation Imposed on States Parties to the Covenant, CCPR/C/21/Rev.1/Add.13, 26 May 2004, §12; See also CAT Korban v. Sweden, 16 November 1998 and CAT General Comment 1 on Article 3 ICAT.

¹⁸⁰ ECtHR T.I. v. UK, 7 March 2000. The Commission did not always take into account the possibility that the State would return a petitioner to another State where he would also be at risk. In e.g. EComHR Barir et al. v. France, 18 October 1993, the Commission had used provisional measures (on 27 March 1992) for France not to expel the petitioners to Somalia, upon which France proceeded to expel four of them to Syria (on 29 March 1992). The petitioners had stressed from the start that their expulsion to Syria or Egypt would also expose them to ill treatment.

¹⁸¹ ECtHR Salah Sheekh v. the Netherlands, 11 January 2007, §141 (provisional measures were used pending the proceedings). The Court added that there was no guarantee that once there the petitioner would be able to stay in the territory and 'with no monitoring of deported rejected asylum seekers taking place, the Government have no way of verifying whether or not the applicant will have succeeded in gaining admittance'. "In view of the position taken by the Puntland and particularly the Somaliland authorities, it seems to the Court rather unlikely that the applicant would be allowed to settle there. Consequently there is a real chance of his being removed, or of his having no alternative but to go to areas of the country which both the Government and UNHCR consider unsafe", §141. See more closely on this case, e.g. Terlouw (2007), pp. 185-194.

¹⁸² See e.g. CAT Rocha Chorlango v. Sweden, 22 November 2004, §5.2 and S.S v. the Netherlands, 5 May 2003, §6.4 (in this case provisional measures were used, but the claim not only related to risks originating from a non-governmental entity but also related to risks originating from the State). See further on non-governmental entities Ingelse (2001), p. 400, pp. 403-404.

¹⁸³ See e.g. ECtHR Ahmed v. Austria, 17 December 1996. See also e.g. Sheekh v. the Netherlands, 11 January 2007, in which provisional measures were used pending the proceedings and where the Court stated on the merits, at §137: "Owing to the absolute character of the right guaranteed, Article 3 of the Convention may also apply where the danger emanates from persons or groups of persons who are not public officials. However, it must be shown that the risk is real and that the authorities of the receiving State are not able to obviate the risk by providing appropriate protection". In Ahani v. Canada, 29 March 2004, §10.7 the HRC emphasized that both the right to life and the right to be free from torture also required the State to take 'steps of due diligence to avoid a threat to an individual of torture from third parties' (finding a violation of Article 13 in conjunction with Article 7 ICCPR for the failure to provide the petitioner with 'the procedural

3.4.4 Extraordinary renditions and other forms of transfer

It may be assumed that the human rights adjudicators will take provisional measures in situations involving involuntary return, independent of the term used for this return (expulsion, extradition, rendition, removal, etc.), or involuntary transfer (from the authority of one State to those of another, on the same territory). The risk facing the person involved should be the determining factor. So-called extraordinary renditions, for instance, could violate the principle of non-refoulement even more than an extradition or expulsion following the appropriate procedures.¹⁸⁴ In the face of a growing practice of making use of these extraordinary renditions alertness by the relevant human rights adjudicators would be warranted, including with regard to (proprio motu) use of provisional measures in pending cases.

With regard to Article 3 of Protocol 4 to the ECHR (prohibition of expulsion of nationals) and Article 1 of Protocol 7 to the ECHR (procedural safeguards in relation to expulsion of aliens) the Bosnia Chamber has clarified the terms ‘expelled’ and ‘expulsion’. It has pointed out that the protection afforded by these two articles ‘applies also in cases in which a person is deported, removed from the territory in pursuance of a refusal of entry order or handed over to officials of a foreign power’. In one case it found that the respondent Parties had not followed the requirements of a legal expulsion procedure arising from the domestic law. The violations fell within the responsibility of both respondent Parties. The factual actions taken by them, with regard to the revocation of citizenship, the decision on refusal of entry and ‘the handing-over the applicant for expulsion to the US forces, after making sure in diplomatic contact that those forces would take him into custody and bring him out of the country, involved action of both Parties which constitutes a violation of the applicant’s rights’.¹⁸⁵

The request for provisional measures by lawyers acting on behalf of Saddam Hussein and refused by the ECtHR in June 2004 did not relate to transporting people from one State to another to be ‘interrogated’, but involved the transmission of a former dictator to a transitional government (Iraq’s interim government) in a State that has not abolished the death penalty. Lawyers acting on behalf of Saddam Hussein asked the ECtHR ‘to permanently prohibit the United Kingdom from facilitating, allowing for, acquiescing in, or in any other form whatsoever effectively participating, through an act or omission, in the transfer of the applicant to the custody of the Iraqi Interim Government unless and until the Iraqi Interim Government has provided adequate assurances that the applicant will not be subject to the death penalty’. They relied on Articles 2 and 3 ECHR and on Protocols 6 (abolition in times of peace) and 13 (abolition in all circumstances) to the Convention, arguing that the UK ‘has an obligation to ensure individuals are not subject to the death penalty and therefore not to surrender legal or physical custody of individuals to a country protections’ required to prevent irreparable harm, §10.8; given this finding there was no need to determine the extent of the risk of torture prior to Ahani’s deportation nor was there a need to determine whether he suffered torture or ill treatment subsequent to his return, §10.10). See also the Concluding Observations of the HRC to the report by France, CCPR/C/60/FRA/4, 31 July 1997, §20: “The Committee is particularly concerned by the restrictive definition given to the concept of ‘persecution’ for refugees by the French authorities as it does not take into account possible prosecution proceedings from non-state actors”.

¹⁸⁴ See e.g. ‘Torture by proxy’, the report by the Association of the Bar of the City of New York and the Center for Human Rights at New York University (2004); American Civil Liberties Union (2005), pp. 10-12 and pp. 25-36; Human Rights Watch (2005); Amnesty International (2005); Mayer (2005). See further e.g. Special Rapporteur on the promotion and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms while countering terrorism, Martin Scheinin, e.g. Mission to the US, A/HRC/6/17/Add.3, 22 November 2007, p. 18.

¹⁸⁵ Bosnia Chamber Bensayah v. BiH and Fed.BiH, 7 March 2003, §§111-127. See also Ait Idir v. BiH and Fed.BiH, 4 April 2003, §101 and Boudellaa, Lakhdar, Nechle and Lahmar v. BiH and Fed.BiH, 11 October 2002 (adm. & merits), §§177-205.

or jurisdiction where they would face such consequences and other breaches of the Convention'. The ECtHR decided not to grant this request.¹⁸⁶ Press agency Reuters, observing that the decision was not motivated,¹⁸⁷ noted that a spokesperson for the Court had indicated to it that it only takes provisional measures if it is convinced that there is a risk of physical harm that is very important, irreversible and imminent.¹⁸⁸

The question arises whether the Court refused to take provisional measures mainly for political reasons, because of the person involved, or for policy reasons, fearing a flood of new submissions regarding extraordinary renditions. In light of its Bankovic judgment it is also possible that it considered itself incompetent to deal with human rights violations committed by Member States outside their own territory. In that case it would consider itself prima facie incompetent to take provisional measures.¹⁸⁹ Yet since that time it has used provisional measures, e.g. to halt transfer of detainees by UK authorities in Iraq to the Iraqi authorities.¹⁹⁰ The most plausible reason may be the fact that the Provisional Coalition Authority did not actively implement the death penalty at the time of the intended transmission. Just a few weeks after the ECtHR refused to take provisional measures the new Iraqi Interim Government re-instated the death penalty. It was one of its first decisions following the transfer of sovereignty. The ECtHR may not have foreseen this risk.

¹⁸⁶ ECtHR Press release 337, 'European Court of Human Rights rejects requests for interim measures by Saddam Hussein', 30 June 2004.

¹⁸⁷ On the lack of publication and motivation in most systems see also Chapter II.

¹⁸⁸ See Reuters, 'Conseil de l'Europe: pas de "mesures provisoires" pour Saddam Hussein', 30 June 2004 ('n'impose à un État des «mesures provisoires», en vertu de l'article 39 de son règlement, que lorsqu'elle est «convaincu qu'il y a un risque de préjudice physique très important, irrémédiable et imminent»'), posted on <www.peinedemort.org> (accessed on 13 August 2004).

¹⁸⁹ See ECtHR Bankovic et al. v. Belgium and 16 other States, 12 December 2001 (inadm.). The Court's approach to extraterritorial obligations as it appears from Bankovic seems to be contrary to its normal interpretation methods. Moreover, the Court put itself outside present day reality. See e.g. Lawson (2004), pp. 83-123. Subsequent to Bankovic it seems to have adapted its approach somewhat, gravitating more towards the approach of the Inter-American Commission, HRC and ICJ. See e.g. ICJ Legal consequences of the construction of a wall in the occupied Palestinian territory (Advisory Opinion), 9 July 2004, holding that the ICCPR is applicable in respect of 'acts done' by a State in the exercise of its jurisdiction outside its own territory, §§107-113; Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (Congo v. Uganda), judgment of 19 December 2005, §§179-180 and Case concerning the application of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (Georgia v. Russia), Order for provisional measures of 15 October 2008, §109. The Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances has equally expressed concern about the 'extraordinary renditions' that had been used to 'transport terrorist suspects to other States for aggressive interrogation'. Report of the Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances, E/CN.4/2006/56, 27 December 2005, §22. See also e.g. Gondek (2005) and Coomans/Kamminga (2004). For a different approach see O'Boyle (2004), pp. 125-139. Further on jurisdiction and provisional measures see Chapter XIV.

¹⁹⁰ Provisional measures in case of Faisal al-Saadoon and Khalef Mufdhi v. UK, 30 December 2008 (by the Acting President of the Fourth Section). A scan of the ECtHR letter to counsel confirming its use of provisional measures was posted at <<http://humanrightsdoctorate.blogspot.com/2009/01/uk-breaches-provisional-measures.html>>. The provisional measure was ignored by the UK in reference to a decision of a domestic court. See also Chapters XIV (Jurisdiction) and XVII (Official responses).

4 CONCLUSION

The HRC and CAT, the adjudicators in the three regional systems as well as the Bosnia Chamber have all used provisional measures to halt refoulement. This means that they consider that they can use such measures to prevent a State from exposing an alleged victim to future violations in another State. Moreover, it may be expected that all adjudicators would be able to take provisional measures also to halt removal to a third State that is likely to subsequently remove the alleged victim to a State where he is at risk of torture. It may equally be expected that all adjudicators could use provisional measures in the context of extraordinary renditions and other forms of transfer. CAT has not used provisional measures in the face of risk of torture by non-State actors and in light of its case law on the merits is unlikely to do so. The other adjudicators may indeed use them in such circumstances. When the petitioner claims a real risk not of torture but of cruel treatment CAT does not use provisional measures either. The HRC and ECtHR have used provisional measures in the face of a real risk of cruel treatment in the receiving or requesting State and in light of the relevant provisions and case law the other adjudicators may do so as well.

In the European system provisional measures have been used on occasion to halt expulsion of a person facing lack of proper care in the receiving State. The HRC has recently confirmed this approach on the international plane and it is not unlikely that the other adjudicators, with the exception of CAT, will interpret the obligations under the respective treaties in a similar manner. Nevertheless the use of provisional measures by these adjudicators in cases involving lack of proper care is by no means certain, for instance because the ECtHR, the only adjudicator with some established practice on the issue, has a very strict approach on the merits. Nevertheless, the use of provisional measures would tie in with what they could do on the merits.

Both the HRC and the ECtHR have been ambivalent with regard to the issue of life imprisonment. This is also reflected in their provisional measures to halt extradition of people facing this punishment. They are reluctant to take such measures and, if they do, are likely to be convinced by the State's arguments not prolong them.

The ECtHR has used provisional measures to halt extradition of a person facing the death penalty in light of the death row phenomenon. In Soering it eventually determined that this phenomenon could constitute cruel treatment. As virtually all Member States of the Council of Europe have ratified at least one of the two Protocols on the death penalty by now, extradition to face such a penalty would in any case constitute a violation of the right to life. Moreover, the Court has now acknowledged that the developments regarding the attitudes towards the death penalty may have removed textual limitations in the interpretation of the right to life in the ECHR itself. This means that there is no longer a need to take provisional measures just in order to halt exposure to the death row phenomenon. This is not yet the case in the interpretation of the ICCPR by the HRC. While it has not yet recognised the death row phenomenon as such to constitute a violation of Article 7, some of its members would be willing to do so and counsel for petitioners is likely to continue invoking the argument. Thus, the issue is bound to recur in the context of provisional measures.

In the range of situations involving claims of non-refoulement provisional measures have been used by various adjudicators. Given their case law on the merits some of these claims are almost certain to trigger the use of provisional measures because the adjudicators consider that expulsion or extradition would result in irreparable harm to the claim. Of course the actual use of the provisional measures then still depends on whether the adjudicator considers there is a real and immediate risk of such harm.¹⁹¹ For other claims, such as those involving lack of proper care or life imprisonment, the case law on the merits is not so clear and neither is the likelihood of adjudicators using provisional measures pending the proceedings to prevent irreparable harm.

¹⁹¹ See Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

CHAPTER VI

LOCATING AND PROTECTING DISAPPEARED PERSONS

1 INTRODUCTION

Several of the adjudicators have used provisional measures to intervene in disappearance cases. The term ‘disappearance’ refers to a technique of unacknowledged detention, often followed by extrajudicial execution, generally ‘as the result of a deliberate plan, carefully executed, either directly by government authorities or with their tacit approval, in a manner designed to avoid accountability’.¹ Disappearances are not restricted to military regimes although they often take place ‘in countries where the military establishment is either in power or has a high degree of autonomy from civilian authority’.² The preamble to the UN Declaration on the Protection of all Persons from Enforced Disappearance describes the phenomenon as follows: ‘persons are arrested, detained or abducted against their will or otherwise deprived of their liberty by officials of different branches or levels of Government, or by organized groups or private individuals acting on behalf of, or with the support, direct or indirect, consent or acquiescence of the Government, followed by a refusal to disclose the fate or whereabouts of the persons concerned or a refusal to acknowledge the deprivation of their liberty, which places such persons outside the protection of the law’.³

The Inter-American Commission has used precautionary measures several times in disappearance cases. The HRC has intervened occasionally in such cases, albeit generally without formally invoking its rule on provisional measures. The Bosnia Chamber has used provisional measures in this context as well. The ECtHR, on the other hand, while having dealt with petitions relating to disappearances, has not yet done so through the use of provisional measures.

The phenomenon of disappearances is very relevant still. While it first became known in the 1970s in the Americas, it has since become a serious human rights issue in various other parts of the world as well, including in the context of the ‘war on terror’ launched after the 9/11 terrorist attacks in the US (2001).⁴ This chapter first discusses the practice of the human rights adjudicators in urgently dealing with disappearance cases. Then it explores how this practice relates to their decisions on the merits.

¹ Berman/Clark (1982), p. 532.

² Méndez/Vivanco (1990), pp. 510-511; see also Grossman (1992) and Brody/González (1997).

³ Preamble to the UN Declaration on the Protection of all Persons from Enforced Disappearance, General Assembly resolution 47/133, 18 December 1992. Thus far this has been the international instrument generally referred to internationally, e.g. by the UN Working Group on Enforced and Involuntary Disappearances. See e.g. Brody/González (1997). The UN Working Group on Enforced and Involuntary Disappearances ‘deems that it should construe the definition provided by the Declaration, in a way that is most conducive to the protection of all persons from enforced disappearance’. Definition of enforced disappearance, General Comment by WG, during 81st session, 20 March 2007. The International Convention for the Protection of All Persons against Enforced Disappearances, adopted 20 December 2006, but not yet entered into force, provides a working definition in Article 2: ‘the arrest, detention, abduction or any other form of deprivation of liberty by agents of the State or by persons or groups of persons acting with the authorization, support or acquiescence of the State, followed by a refusal to acknowledge the deprivation of liberty or by concealment of the fate or whereabouts of the disappeared person, which place such a person outside the protection of the law’. By 1 November 2008, 79 States had signed and five States had ratified this treaty. It will enter into force upon 20 ratifications or accessions. Often a reference is also made to the definition in Article 7(2)(i) of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, which is similar to the definition found in the new Convention.

2 PRACTICE

Several delegations in the working group drafting the International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance⁵ had argued in favour of the inclusion of a reference to provisional measures in the treaty itself, for the purpose of emphasising the importance of such measures in the context of disappearances, ‘especially in order to avoid irreparable harm and preserve evidence’.⁶ Indeed, Article 31, which provides for an optional individual complaint procedure, specifically includes the possibility of using provisional measures. Article 31(4) stipulates:

“At any time after the receipt of a communication and before a determination on the merits has been reached, the Committee may transmit to the State Party concerned for its urgent consideration a request that the State Party will take such interim measures as may be necessary to avoid possible irreparable damage to the victims of the alleged violation. Where the Committee exercises its discretion, this does not imply a determination on admissibility or on the merits of the communication”.

Yet in urgent cases the Committee introduced by this treaty may address even States parties that have not recognized the individual complaint procedure under Article 31. The innovative Article 30 introduces the possibility for the Committee to intervene upon a request ‘by relatives of the disappeared person or their legal representatives, their counsel or any person authorized by them, as well as by any other person having a legitimate interest’ that ‘a disappeared person should be sought and found’. In fact when it considers that a range of procedural requirements is met, it ‘shall request the State Party concerned to provide it with information on the situation of the persons sought, within a time limit set by the Committee'.⁷ A related provision is Article 34 on widespread disappearances:

⁴ See e.g. Paust (2004), pp. 79-96. See further Berman/Clark (1982). See also the discussion on secret detention centres, e.g. the Marty report presented on behalf of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe, Committee on Legal Affairs and Human Rights, Document 10957 and Add.; AS (2006) CR 17, 27 June 2006; Res. 1507 (2006), 27 June 2006 and Rec. 1754 (2006), 27 June 2006; Amnesty International, Below the radar: secret flights to torture and disappearance, 5 April 2006, AI Index: AMR 51/051/2006; Amnesty International, Partners in crime: Europe’s role in US renditions, 14 June 2006, AI Index: EUR 01/008/2006; Amnesty International, Secret detention in CIA ‘Black Sites’, 8 November 2005, AI Index: AMR 51/177/2005; Amnesty International, USA: Torture and secret detention, testimony of the ‘disappeared’ in the ‘war on terror’, 4 August 2005, AI Index: AMR 51/108/2005; Amnesty International urgent action regarding the possible ‘disappearance’ of Canadian national Maher Arar, 21 October 2002, AI Index: AMR 51/159/2002 and subsequent actions; Human Rights Watch, The United States’ Disappeared: the CIA’s long-term ghost detainees, a Human Rights Watch briefing paper, October 2004. The issue discussed here is obviously related to those discussed in the chapters on non-refoulement (Chapter V, in particular its discussion of ‘extraordinary renditions’), treatment in detention (Chapter VII), ensuring procedural rights to protect the right to life and personal integrity (VIII) and jurisdiction (Chapter XIV).

⁵ Adopted 20 December 2006, not yet entered into force (by 1 November 2008: 79 signatories and 5 ratifications).

⁶ E/CN.4/2005/WG.22/CRP.9/Rev.1, 22 September 2005, §24. On this new treaty see also Chapters II (Systems) and XVI (Legal status).

"If the Committee receives information which appears to it to contain well-founded indications that enforced disappearance is being practised on a widespread or systematic basis in the territory under the jurisdiction of a State Party, it may, after seeking from the State Party concerned all relevant information on the situation, urgently bring the matter to the attention of the General Assembly of the United Nations, through the Secretary-General of the United Nations".⁸

2.1 HRC

In the early detention cases, mostly involving Uruguay, the HRC often not only requested information regarding the state of health of detainees but also regarding their whereabouts. In those cases it did not formally invoke its rule on provisional measures, but instead it used its rule on the transmission of cases. Yet it did so at least partially to intervene in ongoing situations. Under this rule the HRC informs the State concerned of the case brought against it, in order to allow it to respond.⁹ In other words, it used 'informal provisional measures' rather than formal provisional measures under Rule 86 (current Rule 92). The very first enquiry of this kind dates from 1978 and concerned an unspecified State.¹⁰ The next of such inquiries were made between 1979 and 1981 in cases involving Uruguay. An example of an enquiry in one of the early cases is Martinez Machado v. Uruguay (1983). The petitioner was a Uruguayan national living in France acting on behalf of his brother. Eight years after his brother, a history teacher, was arrested, he was sentenced by a military court to nine and a half years imprisonment. Subsequently, in November 1980, he disappeared from Libertad prison.¹¹ His family had no contact with him and 'felt great concern for his state of health'. Within a month the HRC transmitted the case and also requested information on his whereabouts. This decision seems to have been taken proprio motu on the basis of the facts mentioned in the complaint.¹² Mr. Martinez only resurfaced more than five months later. In 1983 the HRC found that Uruguay had violated the Covenant, including Article 10(1) ICCPR, because it had held him incommunicado for more than five months.¹³

A decade later, with no information on the intervening period, it was Libya that was requested to provide the Committee with information on the whereabouts of an alleged victim. As ⁷ On the procedural requirements see Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction and admissibility).

⁸ See also Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4 on the group of beneficiaries. The treaty also contains a compromissory clause for submission to the ICJ, see Article 42.

⁹ Rule 91, current Rule 97.

¹⁰ HRC M.A. v. S., 24 April 1979.

¹¹ As he noted, previously the same had happened to Teti Izquierdo, see Chapter VI on intervention in detention situations involving risks to health and safety.

¹² The HRC did not enquire, however, about the alleged victim's state of health, although the petitioner had noted the family's great concern: Martinez Machado v. Uruguay, 4 November 1983.

¹³ In the decision on the merits the HRC determined the State was under an obligation to take immediate steps to ensure strict observance of the Covenant. It must also treat him with humanity as required by Article 10(1). It was expected, moreover, to transmit a copy of the Committee's decision to the victim. See further HRC Drescher Caldas (represented by his wife Ibarburu de Drescher) v. Uruguay, 21 July 1983; Sendic Antonaccio (submitted by Setelich) v. Uruguay, 28 October 1981; Teti Izquierdo v. Uruguay, 1 April 1982; Martinez Machado v. Uruguay, 4 November 1983, but also Dave Marais v. Madagascar, 24 March 1984.

the full Committee had done in the previous cases, when there was not yet a Special Rapporteur on New Communications, the request was made under its rule on the transmission of cases.¹⁴

Thus far there is only one case involving the health and/or whereabouts of the alleged victim in which the HRC explicitly used provisional measures, requesting the State to ‘avoid any action which might cause irreparable harm to the alleged victim’. This was the case Tshishimbi v. Zaire (1996).¹⁵ In April 1993 the petitioner, residing in Belgium, had submitted a complaint to the HRC on behalf of her husband. He had been abducted in Zaire (Democratic Republic of the Congo) the previous month. He was a career military officer who had been imprisoned in 1973 for his refusal to obey orders. Since the late 1970s he had sympathized with the opposition parties. In 1992 Etienne Tshisekedi, the leader of the main opposition movement, became Prime Minister and appointed Tshishimbi as his military advisor. President Mobutu did not recognise the new Government and the petitioner noted that the military and especially the members of the special presidential division, loyal to President Mobutu, subjected the new Prime Minister, his Cabinet and his special advisors to ‘constant surveillance, and at times harassment and bullying’. In this context, she claimed, her husband was abducted.¹⁶ The disappearance took place after he had left the residence of the Prime Minister to go home. A month later Belgian press reported that he was believed to be detained at the headquarters of the National Intelligence Service. Ill treatment apparently was common in this place. It was on that day that his wife petitioned the HRC and requested provisional measures.¹⁷ The Special Rapporteur transmitted the case to the State Party requesting information on the whereabouts and state of health of the alleged victim, as the full Committee had done in the previous six cases. The difference was that the Rapporteur used formal provisional measures under Rule 86 (current Rule 92) as well. She did so a month after receipt of the initial submission, urging the State ‘to avoid any action which might cause irreparable harm to the alleged victim’.¹⁸ It is remarkable that, next to the provisional measure proper, the Rapporteur posed a question under the general rule on transmission and inquiry. She asked the State ‘to clarify the circumstances’ of his abduction, to investigate the allegations and ‘to provide ¹⁴ HRC Mohammed Bashir El-Megreisi (submitted by his brother Youssef El-Megreisi) v. Libya, 23 March 1994. The petitioner’s brother had disappeared in January 1989. Almost two years later, he submitted a complaint to the HRC. The Optional Protocol entered into force for Libya on 16 August 1989. Seven months later the Special Rapporteur requested information under Rule 91 on the whereabouts of the brother and his state of health.

¹⁵ HRC Tshishimbi v. Zaire, 25 March 1996.

¹⁶ Early April 1993 Belgian press reports mentioned that he had been arrested. The exact circumstances of his abduction, however, remained unknown.

¹⁷ The submission pointed out that his family and the Government of Prime Minister Tshisekedi had been without news about Colonel Tshishimbi since 28 March 1983 when he was taken to an unknown destination where they expected him to be tortured. The petitioner expressed great anxiety about his fate. She referred to the activities by President Mobutu against those close to Prime Minister Tshisekedi. She also requested the Committee to use an urgent admissibility procedure in light of the risks to the life of Tshishimbi (submission of 21 April 1993, on file with the author). In its View the Committee pointed out that counsel for the petitioner did not indicate whether any steps had been taken in Kinshasa to pursue domestic remedies, but it concluded that it was apparent that the petitioner and her counsel considered any resort to such remedies to be futile, ‘given in particular the absence of reliable information about the whereabouts of Mr. Tshishimbi’.

¹⁸ “Par ailleurs, conformément à l’article 86 du règlement intérieur du Comité, le Gouvernement de son excellence est prié de prendre toutes les mesures appropriées pour éviter qu’un préjudice irréparable ne soit causé à la victime de la violation alléguée”. Note verbale of 21 May 1993 (on file with the author).

information about Mr. Tshishimbi's whereabouts and state of health'.¹⁹ It may be that she intended to maintain the practice of requesting information on the whereabouts and state of health under that Rule and reserve the use of Rule 86 (current Rule 92) to very exceptional cases. It is also possible that she wished to maintain some continuity with the previous cases or that she considered that provisional measures could draw the attention of the State only to the obligation to refrain from acting and not to any positive obligations. The latter would then be within the purview of the rule on the transmission of cases.

2.2 Inter-American Commission

As discussed in Chapter II the first precautionary measures taken by the Inter-American Commission dealt with disappearances, but its use of (informal) precautionary measures was often rather discretionary.²⁰ The Commission is the adjudicator that has used precautionary measures most often in order to locate disappeared persons. It is very sensitive to the experiences of the American continent with disappearances that took place mainly in the 1970s and 1980s. Since then the number of disappearances decreased but once in a while the Commission did request a State to ascertain the whereabouts of a person recently disappeared. The use of precautionary measures in these cases is not always clearly documented. More information is available as of the late 1990s. There have been several cases in Colombia in which the Commission took precautionary measures in order to find disappeared persons.²¹ Other addressee States have included Guatemala, Mexico and Guyana.²²

¹⁹ It was phrased as follows: 'et d'informer le Comité sur l'adresse ainsi que l'état de santé actuel de l'auteur de la communication'. Note verbale of 21 May 1993 (on file with the author).

²⁰ Author's interview with Commissioner Juan Méndez, Washington D.C., 17 October 2001. In the 1980s he was working as a practitioner at Human Rights Watch.

²¹ See e.g. CIDH lawyers collective 'José Alvear Restrepo' v. Colombia, precautionary measures of 14 March 1997 (probably informally), on 15 March 1997 the beneficiary was released (see Case of Mr. Vilalba Vargas, CEJIL case docket 1997); 4 Investigators Popular Training Institute v. Colombia, precautionary measure of 28 January 1999, they were released on 11 and 19 February 1999, Annual Report 1999, §17; Robinson Ríos Uribe and José Gregorio Villada v. Colombia ("they were last seen at a Medellín metropolitan police checkpoint on November 27, 2001, as they were travelling toward Cali. Some days later, the two young men contacted their families and told them they had been abducted by a paramilitary group. The Commission undertook a series of steps toward clearing up this situation during its on-site visit (December 7-13, 2001); finally, on December 18, 2001, it asked the Colombian government, as a matter of urgency, to take the steps necessary to reveal the whereabouts and guarantee the lives and persons of the aforesaid individuals and to launch a prompt and effective investigation using the urgent search mechanism established by Law 589/2000"), Annual Report 2001, §26; Luis Alberto Sabando Véliz v. Colombia, precautionary measure of 19 October 2004, Annual Report 2004, §27; More than 9 members of the Embera Katio indigenous community of Alto Sinú v. Colombia, precautionary measure of 4 June 2001, Annual Report 2001, §17.

²² See e.g. CIDH Jorge Alberto Rosal Paz v. Guatemala, 11 March 2004 (friendly settlement), precautionary measures of 10 August 1983, 30 May 1984, 19 February 1985 and 1 August 1985; Franz Britton (Collie Wills) v. Guyana, precautionary measures of 4 & 5 April 2000, 24 August 2000, 4 February 2001, 10 October 2001 (adm.), Annual Report 2000, §34 and Franz Britton AKA Collie Wills v. Guyana, 10 October 2001 (adm.), §§11 and 18; Faustino Jiménez Álvarez v. Mexico, precautionary measures of 13 July 2001 and extension of 28 November 2001 to protect his wife and a witness against threats, Annual Report 2001, §39 and Oscar Umberto Duarte Paiz v. Guatemala, precautionary measures of 5 July 2006, 18 (12) Guatemala Human Rights Update, 13 July 2006, pp. 4-5.

In March 1997 lawyers collective 'José Alvear Restrepo' in Colombia²³ requested the Commission to take precautionary measures on behalf of one of its lawyers. Members of the National Police in Bogotá had arbitrarily detained him after a demonstration involving professors and students. The Commission immediately requested information from the Colombian government with regard to his detention. The government responded and he was freed the next day.²⁴ It is not clear whether the Commission simply requested information or indeed took actual precautionary measures. This example does not necessarily fall within the category of protecting disappeared persons but the detention took place in unclear circumstances conducive to disappearance.²⁵

In January 1999 the Commission was informed that a group of armed civilians had forcefully entered the headquarters of the Popular Training Institute (IPC) in Medellín, Antioquia and had abducted four of its investigators.²⁶ The Commission took precautionary measures that same afternoon. It urgently contacted Colombia to take the necessary measures to ascertain the whereabouts of the victims and protect their lives, physical integrity and liberty. Two of them were freed within two weeks and the two others a week later.²⁷

In November 1999 the Commission requested Colombia to ascertain the whereabouts of two spokesmen for the peasant migration²⁸ and ensure their life and physical integrity. Military units had apparently arrested them the previous day. According to eyewitness accounts they had been tied to a tree and tortured. Following this, the self-defence units ('Autodefensas') had kept them in detention, publicly acknowledging their participation in the incident.²⁹ In its Third Report on the human rights situation in Colombia, published in March 1999, the Commission noted that it had taken precautionary measures on behalf of these two persons, but had received no further news on their whereabouts.³⁰ This case is an example of the close links these self-defence units can have with the police, military or other government authorities in certain areas of Colombia. It indicates also how clearly interrelated the different types of violations are, as well as the reasons for the perpetrators to commit them. The case related to issues of migration and possibly land rights and involved human rights defenders and witnesses to human rights violations. In such situations the Commission may order a State to ascertain the whereabouts of certain disappeared persons, but also to protect persons against attacks, often by members of paramilitary groups.³¹

In March 2000 the Commission requested Colombia to protect the life, physical integrity and liberty of a human rights defender who had disappeared six days earlier. He had held various ²³ The submission was made together with CEJIL.

²⁴ CIDH Case of Mr. Vilalba Vargas, CEJIL case docket 1997 (on file with the author).

²⁵ On provisional measures in detention cases, see Chapter VI.

²⁶ The 'Autodefensas' (paramilitaries) of Córdoba and Urabá had claimed responsibility for the kidnappings.

²⁷ CIDH Annual Report 1999, Chapter III.C.1, §17.

²⁸ They were from the Middle Magdalena region.

²⁹ CIDH Annual Report 1999, Chapter III.C.1, §23. The Autodefensas described one of these human rights defenders as a 'terrorist of the ELN'.

³⁰ CIDH Annual Report 1999, Chapter V – Colombia, §120.

³¹ The Commission had also requested the State to guarantee the lives and physical integrity of the residents of La Vereda La Placita who had witnessed and denounced the acts of torture. Several days later, on 6 December 1999, it requested Colombia to amplify the precautionary measures to include eight other persons who had also served as spokespersons for the peasant migration. Their personal security was in danger as well. During the period covered by the 1999 Annual Report the petitioner and the State continued to present information on the precautionary measures. Annual Report 1999, Chapter III.C.1, §§23-24.

elected positions and was working in marginalised, black and indigenous communities. Prior to his disappearance, several actors in the armed conflict had threatened him.³²

In June 2001 the Commission took precautionary measures to clarify the whereabouts and protect the lives and personal integrity of nine named persons as well as ‘other members of the Embera Katio indigenous community of Alto Sinú’ who had been abducted from the community’s main town and the neighbouring areas.³³

Since 1996 the Annual Reports mention only a few States other than Colombia with regard to which the Inter-American Commission had used a precautionary measure requesting to locate a disappeared person. In April 2000 it took such a measure on behalf of Franz Britton, also known as Collie Wills. The petitioner reported that Mr. Britton had not been seen since his re-arrest in Guyana on 25 January 1999.³⁴ Earlier he had been arrested, and released four days later. Upon request, he reported to the police station the next day and was re-arrested by Leon Fraser, the Commissioner of Police. Eyewitnesses subsequently claimed they had seen him in the company of Mr. Fraser, who was head of the dreaded ‘Black Clothes’ police. They claimed he was being bundled into a silver grey car. According to the petitioner the ‘Black Clothes’ police unit was responsible for most of the extra-judicial killings in Guyana. A week later a domestic court ordered the Commissioner of Police to bring Mr. Britton before a court, by a writ of habeas corpus. In an affidavit the Commissioner stated that he had released him two days after his re-arrest and that he was no longer in police custody. The Commission took precautionary measures, requesting the State to take the appropriate measures to protect the life of Mr. Britton. The Commission also requested information on his health status, the reason for his arrest and detention and the location of the detention facilities where he was being held.³⁵ It is noteworthy that when the petitioner requested it to take provisional measures he had already been disappeared for more than a year.³⁶ The question arises whether this disappearance was still so recent that a precautionary measure could prevent irreparable harm. Still, in October 2001, when the Commission declared the case admissible, it also decided to maintain in effect its precautionary measures.³⁷

In July 2001 the Commission took precautionary measures on behalf of someone who had been violently detained in Mexico the month before, without a warrant. His family had witnessed how agents of the judicial police had abducted him in an operation involving several vehicles also marked as belonging to this police force. They filed complaints with the Attorney General of the state of Guerrero, who apparently took no effective steps to locate him. Upon the petitioners’ request the Commission’s precautionary measures asked for intervention by the federal Attorney General because the petitioners suspected complicity between the kidnappers and the public prosecution service of Guerrero. In August Mexico responded that an investigation had begun, with the involvement of the wife of the disappeared man. The next month the petitioners informed the Commission that there were still irregularities in the investigation. In November Mexico

³² CIDH Annual Report 1999, Chapter III.C.1, §25.

³³ On behalf of the other members of that indigenous community who had not yet been abducted but who were working together with the petitioners, the Commission took precautionary measures as well, to the effect that the State should protect them against further attacks. The Commission also requested Colombia to investigate, prosecute and punish those responsible for the attacks against the indigenous community. CIDH Annual Report 2001, §17.

³⁴ The petitioner was the Chairman for Economic Empowerment in Guyana.

³⁵ CIDH Franz Britton AKA Collie Wills v. Guyana, 10 October 2001. By letters of 4 and 5 April 2000, 24 August 2000 and 4 February 2001 the Commission requested information about the adoption of the precautionary measures, the admissibility of the petition and the merits. It did not receive a reply, §§11 and 18.

³⁶ Commission took precautionary measures one year and two months after the alleged disappearance, which was ten days after they were requested by the petitioner.

³⁷ CIDH Franz Britton AKA Collie Wills v. Guyana, 10 October 2001, §§11 and 18.

reported that it was continuing its search to locate him and it had arrested two suspected perpetrators. Subsequently the Commission extended its precautionary measures to cover the wife of the disappeared man, who was in grave danger because of her search. The precautionary measure also came to include a former officer of the judicial police in Guerrero who was under arrest and whose life was being threatened if he continued to make allegations about the involvement of judicial police officers and their superiors in kidnappings.³⁸

2.3 European system

While the European Commission and Court have dealt with disappearance cases as well they do not seem to have used formal provisional measures in this context.³⁹ The next section examines their case law in disappearance cases to assess whether it would give occasion to the use of provisional measures.

2.4 Bosnia Chamber

Many disappearances took place in former Yugoslavia between 1991 and 1995. According to conservative estimates ‘some 17,000 persons in Bosnia-Herzegovina are still recorded as missing’.⁴⁰ Nevertheless, the only known occasion in which the Bosnia Chamber used provisional measures was in 1996, requesting Republika Srpska to find a priest and his parents who had disappeared.⁴¹ Families of disappeared persons may have focussed their efforts on other types of recourse, in particular the International Commission on Missing Persons (ICMP). In 1996 this Commission was specifically instituted to assist these families in order to ‘secure the co-operation

³⁸ CIDH Annual Report 2001, §39. Another example is the Commissions precautionary measure on behalf of Oscar Umberto Duarte Paiz who was kidnapped on 24 May 2006, requesting ‘an expedited transfer of any information’ regarding his whereabouts. Mr. Duarte Paiz was the leader of the San Juan Integral Association for the Development of Quetzal City and Bordering Communities (ASIDECQ). It also asked for protection of his family members and seven members of his organization, Guatemala Human Rights Commission (US), 18 (12) Guatemala Human Rights Update, 13 July 2006, pp. 4-5. On provisional measures to protect against death threats and harassment generally, see Chapter IX.

³⁹ There is one case, ECtHR Istrate v. Moldova, 13 June 2006 (4th section), in which the ECtHR, dealing with a case involving Article 6 ECHR, approximately 2 years after the initial submission, received a letter signed by the petitioner, ‘dated 1 September 2003’, posted 7 April 2005, in which he stated ‘that he had previously been the victim of an attempted murder, that he was afraid for his life and that he sought the Court’s protection’. ‘He had also stated that the letter had been given to a third person who had been instructed to post it in case of his disappearance’. Subsequently the ECtHR inquired with the State, asking it to comment on the letter. In June 2005 the petitioner contacted the Court again and the case was pursued under Article 6 ECHR without further reference to the right to life. See also the Court’s request for information on 8 March 2004, asking Georgia and Russia to ‘provide information on the disappearance of Mr Khashiev and Mr Baymurzayev and, if applicable, on their health and place of detention in Russia’. ECtHR Shamayev et al. v. Georgia and Russia, 12 April 2005, §45.

⁴⁰ Amnesty International, ‘Bosnia-Herzegovina: Human Rights Chamber decision on Srebrenica – a first step to justice’, AI Index: EUR 63/007/2003, 7 March 2003.

⁴¹ Bosnia Chamber Matanović v. Srpska, 6 August 1997; in other disappearance cases (Balić v. Srpska, 10 September 1998 (adm.) and Grgić v. Srpska, 3 September 1997) no mention is made of the use of provisional measures.

of Governments and other authorities in locating and identifying persons missing as a result of armed conflicts, other hostilities or violations of human rights and to assist them in doing so'.⁴²

3 RELATION BETWEEN PROVISIONAL MEASURES LOCATE AND PROTECT DISAPPEARED PERSONS AND THE EXPECTED DECISION ON THE MERITS

3.1 Introduction

In some of the cases in which adjudicators used provisional measures to locate disappeared persons a decision on the merits is available as well that could shed light on the relation between the case law on the merits and the use of provisional measures. Moreover, disappearance cases in which no provisional measures were used could still help clarify the practice of the adjudicators vis-à-vis such measures. After all provisional measures may not have been used simply because the disappearance was not recent, but the decision on the merits could still justify future use of such measures in imminent cases, indicating likelihood of success on the merits.

3.2 HRC

From the start of its activities the HRC has dealt with claims in which the whereabouts of the alleged victims were unclear. It has emphasised the positive obligations of States under the right to life in Article 6 ICCPR.⁴³ The obligation under this article to take preventive measures against disappearances, combined with the obligation to protect the right to security of person under ⁴² See the website of the ICMP: <<http://www.ic-mp.org/home>>. Subsequently its mandate was expanded. It is headquartered in Sarajevo, BiH, but also has offices in the Republic of Croatia, Serbia and Montenegro, and Kosovo.

⁴³ See e.g. HRC Dermi Barbatto (submitted by Mr. Gilmet Dermi on behalf of his cousins) v. Uruguay, 21 October 1982. The HRC concluded that the Uruguayan authorities were responsible for not taking adequate measures to protect the life of one of the alleged victims, either by act or by omission. He had served his sentence in July 1980 but he was still in detention in December of that year. He was last seen alive on 24 December. On 28 December the authorities showed his mother his dead body for identification. His brother, a medical doctor, had disappeared earlier that month, on 2 December 1980. Only on 19 December 1980 his detention was officially announced. The authorities described him as belonging to a group of relatives of prisoners who had carried out 'agitation and propaganda activities'. He continued to be held incommunicado. The petitioner claimed a violation of Article 10 ICCPR 'because the treatment of detainees in Uruguay did not conform to this provision'. He pointed out that he was unable to provide more detailed information about his treatment in detention because he was being held incommunicado. The HRC found a violation of Article 6 with regard to the brother who died in detention, and of Articles 9(3) (not being brought promptly before a judge), 9(4) (incommunicado detention and violation of right habeas corpus) and 14(3)(c) (undue delay). It did not further address the Articles 10 and 7 claims. Only in the paragraph on reparations it pointed out that the State was obliged to take effective steps, among others, to ensure strict observance of the rights of detained persons set forth in Articles 7, 9 and 10 ICCPR. In light of the circumstances of his brother's continued detention and death and in light of the circumstances of his own arrest and incommunicado detention the HRC could have requested information about his health status under Rule 91 (currently Rule 97).

Article 9 ICCPR, underlines the importance of the State's duty to take positive measures to protect persons against threats to their life and dignity.⁴⁴

In Almeida de Quinteros v. Uruguay (1983) the HRC not only found violations of the rights of the disappeared person, but also of the rights of this person's family.⁴⁵ It confirmed this approach in subsequent cases.⁴⁶ In El-Megreisi v. Libya (1994), in which the HRC had taken 'informal' provisional measures in 1989, it found on the merits that the prolonged incommunicado detention in an unknown location constituted a violation of Article 7 ICCPR (prohibition of torture and cruel and inhuman treatment).⁴⁷ In the case of Tshishimbi v. Zaire (1996), the only known case in which the HRC formally used provisional measures, the State had not responded at all. Three years later, in its decision on the merits the HRC found that the State had failed to ensure his liberty and security of person, in violation of Article 9(1). It referred to its previous jurisprudence that an interpretation of Article 9(1) limited to the context of arrest and detention would render ineffective the guarantees of the Covenant by allowing States parties to 'tolerate, condone or ignore threats made by persons in authority to the personal liberty and security of non-detained individuals within the State party's jurisdiction'. The HRC also found that the removal of the victim and the prevention of contact with his family and with the outside world constituted cruel and inhuman treatment in violation of Article 7. It urged the State party to thoroughly investigate the circumstances of the abduction and unlawful detention and to bring to justice those responsible. The State party was under an obligation to ensure that similar violations did not occur in the future.⁴⁸ In Thevaraja Sarma v. Sri Lanka (2003) it found violations of Articles 7 and 9 ICCPR with regard to the disappeared son and of Article 7 with regard to the petitioner and his ⁴⁴ HRC General Comment 6 (16) about Article 6 ICCPR points out that States should take 'specific and effective' measures to prevent disappearance. They should also establish 'facilities and procedures to investigate thoroughly, by an appropriate and impartial body, cases of missing and disappeared persons'. In the case of Ana Rosario the HRC found violations of Articles 6(1), 7 and 9(1), all juncto Article 2(1) and of Article 24(1). Her abduction and disappearance and the prevention of contact with her family and the outside world constituted cruel and inhuman treatment. Eight days before her disappearance a court had provisionally released her into the custody of her grandfather and the armed State agents who abducted her from her home had not acted on the basis of an arrest warrant or the orders of a judicial officer. The State, moreover, had ignored the HRC's request for information about the results of her grandfather's petition for habeas corpus, all in violation of Article 9. Finally, in violation of Article 24(1), the State did not adopt any particular measures of protection to investigate her disappearance and ensure her security and welfare. Such special measures were required because of her status as a minor. Ana Rosario Celis Laureano (submitted by her grandfather Laureano Atachahua) v. Peru, 25 March 1996. See also Alfredo and Samuel Sanjuán Arévalo (submitted by their mother Elcida Arévalo Perez) v. Colombia, 3 November 1989.

⁴⁵ HRC Almeida de Quinteros v. Uruguay, 21 July 1983. "The Committee understands the anguish and stress caused to the mother by the disappearance of her daughter and by the continuing uncertainty concerning her fate and whereabouts. The author has the right to know what has happened to her daughter. In these respects, she too is a victim of the violations of the Covenant suffered by her daughter, in particular of article 7". By letter of 15 June 1987 the victim's mother informed the Committee that the State had failed to implement its Views and requested the Committee to urge the State to comply with its Views. By note of 31 October 1991 the State party only referred to the relevant paragraphs of Law 15.848 of 22 December 1996, without providing any further information on her daughter's case.

⁴⁶ See e.g. HRC J. Thevaraja Sarma (submitted by his father S. Jegatheeswara Sarma) v. Sri Lanka, 16 July 2003.

⁴⁷ HRC Mohammed Bashir El-Megreisi (submitted by his brother Youssef El-Megreisi) v. Libya, 23 March 1994.

⁴⁸ HRC Tshishimbi v. Zaire, 25 March 1996. See also Chapter XVII (Official responses).

wife. It noted, however, that the petitioner had not asked the HRC to conclude that his son was dead and that, while invoking Article 6, he also asked for ‘the release of his son, indicating that he has not abandoned hope for his son’s reappearance’. The HRC considered that in such circumstances it would be inappropriate to presume his death and make a finding with respect to Article 6. It pointed out that the State was under an obligation to provide the petitioner and his family with an effective remedy, ‘including a thorough and effective investigation into the disappearance and fate of the author’s son’ and ‘his immediate release if he is still alive’.⁴⁹ The HRC also referred to the UN Declaration on the Protection of all Persons from Enforced Disappearances (1992). Moreover, it referred to the definition of enforced disappearance contained in Article 7(2)(i) of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court and noted that disappearance constitutes a violation of many of the rights in the ICCPR, including the right to liberty and security of person (Article 9), the right not to be subjected to torture or ill treatment (Article 7) and the right of persons deprived of their liberty to be treated with humanity and respect for their inherent dignity (Article 10). Finally it pointed out that disappearance constitutes a grave threat to the right to life (Article 6).⁵⁰

The standard phrase used by the HRC in reference to the burden of proof is that it ‘cannot rest on the author of the communication alone, especially considering that the author and the State party do not always have equal access to the evidence and that frequently the State party alone has access to relevant information’. It then continues with: ‘It is implicit in article 4(2) of the Optional Protocol that the State party has the duty to investigate in good faith all allegations of the violation of the Covenant made against it and its authorities, and to furnish to the Committee the information available to it’.⁵¹ Moreover, according to McGoldrick the HRC does not apply a standard of ‘beyond a reasonable doubt’, but rather a standard ‘approximating to’ a ‘balance of probabilities’.⁵²

Not only does the case law of the HRC comport with the State’s obligation to ensure that similar events do not occur in the future, as traditionally mentioned in the paragraph on reparations in the Committee’s Views,⁵³ it also underlines the State’s duty to act swiftly in the face of threats against persons rather than await the HRC’s final determination. While the case is pending this certainly justifies a reminder of the State’s positive obligations by the HRC, through the use of provisional measures.

3.3 Inter-American system

Already in the early 1970s the Inter-American Commission has denounced the act of disappearing people.⁵⁴ Since then it has consistently denounced the phenomenon in strong terms. In 1983 the political organs of the OAS became involved as well. The OAS General Assembly declared that forced disappearance was ‘an affront to the conscience of the Hemisphere and constitutes a crime

⁴⁹ HRC J. Thevaraja Sarma (submitted by his father S. Jegatheeswara Sarma) v. Sri Lanka, 16 July 2003.

⁵⁰ Ibid. See also Blaauw (2002) and Froidevaux (2002). In Louisa Bousroual (on behalf of her husband Salah Saker) v. Algeria, 30 March 2006 the petitioner assumed that her husband, who had been disappeared in 1994, had died. In this case the HRC found a violation of the right to life as well.

⁵¹ See e.g. HRC Marais v. Madagascar, 24 March 1983; Bleier v. Uruguay, 29 March 1982 and Mukong v. Cameroon, 21 July 1994.

⁵² McGoldrick (1994), para. 4.36. Generally see Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

⁵³ See also Chapter XIII on the relationship between provisional measures and forms of reparation.

⁵⁴ CIDH Annual Report 1974.

against humanity'.⁵⁵ In 1994 the OAS General Assembly adopted the Inter-American Convention on Forced Disappearance of Persons.⁵⁶

In Velásquez Rodríguez (1988) the IACHR set out its influential doctrine of state responsibility with regard to disappearances. Taking into account the systematic practice of disappearances and the general human rights situation in Honduras, it found that the disappearance of Mr. Velásquez Rodríguez constituted a violation of the right to life, humane treatment, personal liberty and security.⁵⁷ It found that the act of disappearing people and the subsequent failure to investigate these disappearances constituted a violation of a range of rights.

Subsequently it dealt with various other disappearance cases.⁵⁸ In Bámaca Velásquez (2000), for instance, the Court also found that Guatemala had violated a range of rights: the right to personal liberty (Article 7 ACHR) of the disappeared person, Efraín Bámaca Velásquez, as well as his right to humane treatment (Article 5(1) and 5(2) ACHR), the right of his wife and immediate family to humane treatment, his right to life (Article 4 ACHR), his right to judicial guarantees and judicial protection (Articles 8 and 25 ACHR) as well as that of his wife and immediate family. Moreover, the State neither complied with the general obligations of Article 1(1) ACHR – in connection with the violations of the aforementioned substantive rights –, nor with the obligation to prevent and punish torture (Articles 1, 2, 6 and 8 of the Inter-American Convention to Prevent and Punish Torture).⁵⁹

The Inter-American Commission has dealt with a considerable range of cases involving disappearances. As noted, it has regularly used precautionary measures in such cases as well.⁶⁰ The Commission and Court have both referred to the UN Declaration against disappearances and to other international and regional instruments as well.

They have also referred to the concept of the burden of proof, which could be relevant not only as an indication of the evidence of risk to life required for the use of provisional measures,⁶¹ but also to indicate the general attitude of the adjudicator towards the phenomenon of disappearances. This, in turn, could help clarify the use of provisional measures. The IACHR noted that 'because the Commission is accusing the Government of the disappearance of Manfredo Velásquez, it, in principle, should bear the burden of proving the facts underlying its petition'.⁶² It seems, however, that the Court simply wished to point out that the Commission should make a prima facie case. As Kokott points out, human rights treaties have a 'non-reciprocal, law-making character'. This makes individual complaint proceedings under human rights treaties less adver-

⁵⁵ OAS Resolution AG/RES. 666 (XVIII-0/83), 18 November 1983, §5.

⁵⁶ Adopted at Belém do Pará, 9 June 1994; entered into force on 28 March 1996; 12 State parties as of 30 July 2006.

⁵⁷ IACHR Velásquez Rodríguez (Honduras), 29 July 1988.

⁵⁸ See e.g. IACHR Godínez Gruz (Honduras), 20 January 1989; Caballero Delgado and Santana (Colombia), 8 December 1995; Garrido and Baigorria (Argentina), 2 February 1996; Castillo Páez (Peru), 3 November 1997. In Blake (Guatemala), 24 January 1998, it emphasized the rights of the next of kin.

⁵⁹ IACHR Bámaca Velásquez case (Guatemala), Judgment of 25 November 2000 (merits). See also e.g. Juan Humberto Sanchez (Honduras), 7 July 2003 (violations of Articles 4, 5, 7, 8 and 25); Molina Thiessen (Guatemala), 4 May 2004 (right to life, humane treatment, right to personal liberty, fair trial, rights of the family, rights of the child and judicial protection); Case of 19 Merchants disappeared in 1987 (Colombia), 5 July 2004 (violations personal liberty, personal integrity and life); Serrano Cruz sisters (El Salvador), 1 March 2005 (violations of Articles 5, 8, 17, 18, 19, 25).

⁶⁰ See e.g. CIDH Juan de la Cruz Núñez Santana et al. v. Peru, 13 April 1999; Ignacio Ellacuría et al. v. El Salvador, 22 December 1999.

⁶¹ See generally Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

⁶² IACHR Velásquez Rodríguez case, 29 July 1988, §123.

sarial than most domestic proceedings. The non-reciprocal or universal character of human rights treaties warrants an approach in which the individual petitioner does not bear the burden of proof, but rather only the burden of presenting a prima facie case.⁶³ Referring to the burden of proof of an individual ‘evokes a perception of a technical burden of producing evidence which is not found in human rights law’. Rather than the burden of proof the petitioner has, as Kokott calls it ‘the “burden” of presenting a prima facie case in supporting one’s claim (commencement de preuve) or the risk of non-persuasion’.⁶⁴

The IACHR has ‘set the standard’ on the standard of proof in serious human rights cases:

“The international protection of human rights should not be confused with criminal justice. States do not appear before the Court as defendants in a criminal action. The objective of international human rights law is not to punish those individuals who are guilty of violations, but rather to protect the victims and to provide for the reparation of damages resulting from the acts of the States responsible”.⁶⁵

In light of the purpose expressed in the relevant treaties of effective protection of human rights it indeed appears ‘illogical’ to apply the high standard of ‘beyond a reasonable doubt’ to international adjudication.⁶⁶ Kokott referred to decisions by international adjudicators showing that these in fact are willing to accept a lower standard of proof than that of ‘beyond a reasonable doubt’, at least in cases concerning the most serious human rights violations.⁶⁷

The Commission’s as well as the Court’s case law on the merits, finding disappearances to constitute a violation of a combination of rights, referring to regional and international instruments and taking into account the position of the individual in the assessment of the evidence, clearly confirms the appropriateness of the use of provisional measures.

3.4 European system

Both the Inter-American Court and the HRC – as discussed under the previous subheading – have found that enforced disappearances could constitute a violation of the rights to life, humane treatment and personal liberty and security.⁶⁸ Similar to the approach of the HRC and the Inter-American Commission and Court, the European Commission and Court have found that disappearances violate the rights of the next of kin as well.⁶⁹ In Kurt v. Turkey (1996/98), for instance, the European Commission and Court found that the State had violated the prohibition of cruel

⁶³ Kokott (1998), p. 211.

⁶⁴ Ibid.

⁶⁵ IACHR Velásquez Rodríguez, Judgment of 29 July 1988, §§134-135.

⁶⁶ See Kokott (1998), pp. 205-206.

⁶⁷ Id., pp. 196-205.

⁶⁸ The African Commission does not seem to have had occasion to deal with disappearances on the merits, but see ACHPR Africa Legal Aid (on behalf of Mr. Lamin Waa Juwara) v. the Gambia, 209/97, found inadmissible in May 2000 (no reference to the use of provisional measures in this case, which was submitted 1,5 years after the disappearance).

⁶⁹ See e.g. ECtHR Timurtas v. Turkey, 13 June 2000, §95; and Çakici v. Turkey, 8 July 1999, §98. In subsequent cases it has sometimes found a violation to the disappeared person himself, but it has not considered the disappearance itself to be a form of torture or ill treatment.

treatment with regard to the mother of the disappeared person. On the other hand they did not examine separately whether the disappeared person himself was a victim of such treatment.⁷⁰

This context it may be significant that the European Commission and Court do not seem to have used provisional measures in order to help find the disappeared person alive. In fact they have generally taken a more restrictive approach towards disappearances than the HRC and the Inter-American Commission and Court, possibly because they were less attuned to dealing with particularly serious and systematic human rights violations. The subsequent paragraphs will further refer to differences between the approach in the European system and that of the other systems.

In the inter-State case Cyprus v. Turkey (1999) the European Commission did emphasize the positive obligations of States to protect human rights and recalled that the HRC stressed that States should take 'specific and effective measures to prevent disappearances and establish effective facilities and procedures to investigate early, by an appropriate and impartial body, cases of disappearances that may involve a violation to the right to life'.⁷¹ Subsequently, when the ECtHR dealt with this case in 2001, it invoked its distinction between substantive and procedural violations of the right to life. It found that there had been no breach of Art. 2 ECHR 'by reason of an alleged violation of a substantive obligation under that Article in respect of any of the missing persons'.⁷² At the same time it found that 'there has been a continuing violation of Article 2 of the Convention on account of the failure of the authorities of the respondent State to conduct an effective investigation into the whereabouts and fate of Greek-Cypriot missing persons who disappeared in life-threatening circumstances'.⁷³ It equally found that 'there has been a continuing violation of Article 5 of the Convention by virtue of the failure of the authorities of the respondent State to conduct an effective investigation into the whereabouts and fate of the Greek-Cypriot missing persons in respect of whom there is an arguable claim that they were in Turkish custody at the time of their disappearance'.⁷⁴ Yet it held that 'no breach of Article 5 of the Convention has been established by virtue of the alleged actual detention of Greek-Cypriot missing persons'.⁷⁵ In fact the 'combination-approach' taken in the Inter-American system and by the HRC is to be preferred.⁷⁶

Apart from creating an evidentiary hurdle, as discussed in the subsequent paragraph, the European Commission and Court initially did not consider disappearances as the complex mix of multiple and continuous human rights violations recognized by the Inter-American Court and HRC. They simply found a particularly serious violation of Article 5 ECHR (personal liberty and security) in the context of the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment, rather than a violation of these rights taken together.⁷⁷

Yet this has since changed. The ECtHR has begun finding violations of the right to life as well, not only procedurally, but also substantively. It has held that lengthy periods of unacknowledged detentions went 'beyond a mere irregular detention' in violation of Article 5 ECHR⁷⁸ and ⁷⁰ EComHR Kurt v. Turkey, 5 December 1996, §§197 and 221. See also ECtHR Kurt v. Turkey, 25 May 1998. In his concurring opinion in Matanović et al. v. Republika Srpska, 6 August 1997 Nowak notes that this approach was 'somewhat surprising', Concurring Opinion, §6.

⁷¹ EComHR Cyprus v. Turkey, 4 June 1999, §202.

⁷² ECtHR Cyprus v. Turkey, 10 May 2001, §130. See also EComHR Cyprus v. Turkey, 4 June 1999.

⁷³ ECtHR Cyprus v. Turkey, 10 May 2001, §136.

⁷⁴ Id., §150.

⁷⁵ Id., §151.

⁷⁶ See also Taqi (2001), pp. 940-984 and the discussion under the next heading ('Bosnia Chamber').

⁷⁷ ECtHR Kurt v. Turkey, 25 May 1998, §201 (a forced disappearance 'raises fundamental and grave issues under Article 5'). See also EComHR Cyprus v. Turkey, 4 June 1999, §119.

⁷⁸ See e.g. ECtHR Timurtaş v. Turkey, 13 June 2000, §83.

also examined such allegations from the perspective of Article 2 ECHR (right to life), albeit without taking into account the prohibition of torture and ill treatment (Article 3 ECHR).⁷⁹

On the other hand, the ECtHR has not yet done away with the evidentiary hurdle it created in its earlier case law. By 2006 it still used the evidentiary standard of ‘beyond reasonable doubt’.⁸⁰ Such a standard is in fact more appropriate as imposed on a State in the context of a criminal law case than on a petitioner for proving the responsibility of a State in a disappearance case.⁸¹ The standard does not seem to be required by the text of the ECHR itself. Its context, object and purpose certainly do not require it.

Moreover, the ECtHR has indeed shown an awareness of the special responsibility of the State by pointing out that ‘Convention proceedings do not in all cases lend themselves to a rigorous application of the principle affirmanti incumbit probatio (he who alleges something must prove that allegation)’.⁸² It has also noted that this standard ‘should not be interpreted as requiring such a high degree of probability as in criminal trials’.⁸³ In this context dropping the reference to the criterion of ‘beyond reasonable doubt’ would be the next logical step. After all, when ‘the events in issue lie wholly, or in large part, within the exclusive knowledge of the authorities’, ‘the burden of proof may be regarded as resting on the authorities to provide a satisfactory and convincing explanation’.⁸⁴ If it can be established that someone was ‘officially summoned by the military or the police, entered a place under their control and has not been seen since’ the onus is indeed ‘on the Government to provide a plausible explanation as to what happened on the premises and to show that the person concerned was not detained by the authorities, but left the premises without subsequently being deprived of his or her liberty’.

⁷⁹ See e.g. ECtHR Orhan v. Turkey, 18 June 2002, §§328-332.

⁸⁰ See e.g. ECtHR Akdeniz v. Turkey, 31 May 2005 (4th section), §96 (“the Court has generally adopted up to now the standard of proof “beyond reasonable doubt”. Such proof may follow from the coexistence of sufficiently strong, clear and concordant inferences or of similar unrebutted presumptions of fact; in addition, the conduct of the parties when evidence is being obtained may be taken into account”); Bazorkina v. Russia, 27 July 2006 (1st section), §106; Uçar v. Turkey, 11 April 2006 (2nd section), §74; Şeker v. Turkey, 21 February 2006 (2nd section), §§64-65; Nesibe Haran v. Turkey, 6 October 2005 (3rd section), §65; Özgen et al. v. Turkey, 20 September 2005 (2nd section), §36; Taniş et al. v. Turkey, 2 August 2005 (4th section), §160; Türkoğlu v. Turkey, 17 March 2005 (3rd section), §116 and Orhan v. Turkey, 18 June 2002 (1st section), §264.

⁸¹ For a critical discussion of the case law until 2000 see Taqi (2001), pp. 940-984 (discussing EComHR Kurt v. Turkey, 5 December 1996; ECtHR Kurt v. Turkey, 25 May 1998; Cakici v. Turkey, 8 July 1999 and Timurtas v. Turkey, 13 June 2000). In Labita v. Italy, Grand Chamber Judgment of 6 April 2000, a Dissenting Opinion of eight judges pointed out that the ‘test, method and standard of proof in respect of responsibility under the Convention are different from those applicable in the various national systems as regards responsibility of individuals for criminal offences’, Joint Partly Dissenting Opinion of Judges Pastor Ridruejo, Bonello, Makarczyk, Tulkens, Strážnická, Butkevych, Casadevall and Zupančič, §1. See also Veznedaroglu v. Turkey, Judgment of 11 April 2000, Partly Dissenting Opinion of Judge Bonello, §12: ‘in other fields of judicial enquiry, the standard of proof should be proportionate to the aim which the search for the truth pursues: the highest degree of certainty, in criminal matters; a workable degree of probability in others’ and Tahsin Acar v. Turkey, 8 April 2004 with concurring opinion by Judge Bonello, pointing out: “Unacceptable that the applicant is told by a court of justice that he cannot win against the State, as he failed to produce evidence which the state had wrongly failed to produce”.

⁸² ECtHR Taniş et al. v. Turkey, 2 August 2005 (4th section), §163.

⁸³ ECtHR Nachova and Others v. Bulgaria, 26 February 2004, §166.

⁸⁴ See ECtHR Salman v. Turkey, 27 June 2000 (Grand Chamber), §100; see also Taniş et al. v. Turkey, 2 August 2005 (4th section), §160; as well as Çakıcı v. Turkey, 8 July 1999 (Grand Chamber), §85; Timurtas v. Turkey, 13 June 2000, §82.

“In the absence of such an explanation, the Court’s examination of the case may extend beyond Article 5 to encompass, in certain circumstances, Article 2 of the Convention”.⁸⁵

In a recent case, of July 2006, the ECtHR found Russia in violation of the right to life (both substantively and procedurally), personal liberty and an effective remedy for a disappearance that took place in Chechnya.⁸⁶ Nevertheless, while it found the authorities responsible for his death, it found ‘the exact way in which he died and whether he was subjected to ill-treatment while in detention’ were ‘not entirely clear’.⁸⁷ It found insufficient evidence for a violation of Art. 3 ECHR ‘since the information before it’ did ‘not enable the Court to find beyond all reasonable doubt that the applicant’s son was subjected to treatment contrary to Article 3’.⁸⁸

This is the first of many disappearance cases regarding Chechnya pending before the Court.⁸⁹

3.5 Bosnia Chamber

With regard to the disappearance of the Roman Catholic priest and his parents, mentioned in the previous section for its use of provisional measures in 1996, in 1997 the Bosnia Chamber found that Republika Srpska had failed to secure the petitioners’ right to liberty and security of person.⁹⁰ It decided not to consider whether a forced disappearance also constituted a violation of Articles 2 and 3 ECHR. In his concurring opinion Nowak rightly pointed out that the Chamber was not bound by the restrictive approach taken by the Ombudsperson, only alleging violations of Article 5. After all the case did not only deal with arbitrary deprivation of personal liberty and security, but in fact dealt with enforced disappearance as a larger phenomenon encompassing a wider range of rights. This criticism in fact also applies to the approach of the ECtHR at the time. As discussed, it only started to change this approach around 2000. Nowak noted that while the UN Declaration on the Protection of all Persons from Enforced Disappearance was not legally binding, it did constitute ‘the most elaborate and authoritative international instrument in this field’.⁹¹ Enforced disappearances were human rights violations not explicitly referred to in the ECHR (1950) and the Declaration should be taken into account when applying the Convention. He pointed out that the ‘very act of enforced disappearance is a particularly serious violation of human rights which clearly goes beyond mere arbitrary deprivation of personal liberty and security’.⁹² Such disappearances constitute ‘a violation of the rules of international law guaranteeing, inter alia, the right to recognition as a person before the law, the right to liberty and security of the person and the right not to be subjected to torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. It also violates or constitutes a grave threat to the right to life’.⁹³ There ⁸⁵ ECtHR Taniş et al. v. Turkey, 2 August 2005 (4th section), §160.

⁸⁶ ECtHR Bazorkina (regarding the disappearance of her son Yandiev) v. Russia, 27 July 2006. See also ECtHR Gongadze v. Ukraine, 8 November 2005, finding violations of Article 2, ‘both in its substantive and procedural aspects’, as well as of Articles 3 and 13. Generally about the evidentiary requirements for provisional measures see Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

⁸⁷ ECtHR Bazorkina v. Russia, 27 July 2006, §131.

⁸⁸ Id., §133.

⁸⁹ See e.g. Human Rights Watch, ‘Russia condemned for ‘disappearance’ of Chechen,’ 27 July 2006; International Herald Tribune, ‘European Court blames Russia for missing Chechen,’ 27 July 2006; <bbc.co.uk>, ‘Russia censured over Chechen man’, 27 July 2006.

⁹⁰ Bosnia Chamber Matanović et al. v. Srpska, 6 August 1997.

⁹¹ Bosnia Chamber Matanović et al. v. Srpska, 6 August 1997, Concurring Opinion Nowak, §3.

⁹² Bosnia Chamber Matanović et al. v. Srpska, 6 August 1997, Concurring Opinion Nowak §4.

⁹³ Ibid.

was ‘ample evidence’ that the disappearance of the petitioners was ‘not an isolated case’.⁹⁴ Nowak provided some relevant contextual information about the ‘special process on missing persons in the territory of the former Yugoslavia’.⁹⁵ He pointed out that the Chamber should have taken into account the provisions of the UN Declarations and the relevant international case law as a tool for interpreting the ECHR. Just like the Inter-American Court and the HRC the Bosnia Chamber should have found violations of the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment as well.⁹⁶ Again, this comment may well apply to the ECtHR too.

In this same case the Chamber did refer to the presumption of responsibility of the State that is created when someone has disappeared from official custody. It recalled the statement by the European Commission that Article 5 ECHR could be understood as a guarantee against disappearances and any ‘unaccounted disappearance of a detained person’ must be considered as a particularly serious violation of this Article.⁹⁷ Finally the Bosnia Chamber expressed its agreement with the approach to evidence taken by the Inter-American Court of Human Rights in Velasquez Rodriguez.⁹⁸

In the Srebrenica cases (2003) the Bosnia Chamber found that Republika Srpska had violated the human rights of their family members by the continued refusal to inform them of the fate of their loved ones.⁹⁹ It had done ‘almost nothing to clarify the fate and whereabouts of the presumed victims of the Srebrenica events, or to take other action to relieve the suffering of their surviving family members, or to contribute to the process of reconciliation in Bosnia and Herzegovina’.¹⁰⁰ This time the Chamber extensively referred to the ICTY decision Prosecutor v. Radoslav Krstić, international instruments, including the UN Declaration, and international and domestic activities and decisions. Moreover, it ordered Republika Srpska, in accordance with the ‘guiding principles’ on reparation developed by the IACHR,¹⁰¹ ‘as a matter of urgency’, to release immediately ‘any such missing persons who are still alive and held in detention unlawfully’.¹⁰²

Although the Bosnia Chamber initially took an overly limited approach on the merits in Matanović et al. v. Srpska (1997), only finding a violation of Article 5 ECHR, it did take provisional measures while this case was still pending.

Moreover, whatever improvements could still be made, the subsequent case law of the ECtHR, also finding violations of Articles 2 and 3 ECHR in certain disappearance cases, in fact confirms the relationship with the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment that seems to underlie the Chamber’s use of provisional measures in Matanović. Finally, the relationship between the protection required in orders for reparation and for provisional measures was clearly ⁹⁴ Bosnia Chamber Matanović et al. v. Srpska, 6 August 1997, Concurring Opinion Nowak §5.

⁹⁵ Ibid.

⁹⁶ In this case Nowak would also have found a violation of Article 3 because ‘the prolonged period of incommunicado detention’ to which the petitioners had been exposed constituted as such inhuman treatment. Moreover, he would have found a violation of Article 2(1) jo. 1 ‘because the enforced disappearance of the applicants for a period of one and a half years as from the entry into force of the Dayton Peace Agreement constitutes a grave threat to the right to life, because there are certain indications that one or more of the applicants might have died in detention, and because the respondent Party has failed to secure and protect the applicants’ right to life’, Bosnia Chamber Matanović et al. v. Srpska, 6 August 1997, Concurring Opinion Nowak, §9.

⁹⁷ EComHR Cyprus v. Turkey, Application No. 8007/77, 72 DR, p. 38.

⁹⁸ Bosnia Chamber Matanović et al. v. Republika Srpska, 6 August 1997, §35.

⁹⁹ Bosnia Chamber Srebrenica cases (49 petitions), 7 March 2003. It did find that it had no jurisdiction ratione temporis vis-à-vis the disappeared persons themselves since the violations took place before the Dayton Peace Agreement was signed (14 December 1995).

¹⁰⁰ Bosnia Chamber Srebrenica cases (49 petitions), 7 March 2003, §188.

¹⁰¹ See Bosnia Chamber Srebrenica cases (49 petitions), 7 March 2003, §211.

¹⁰² Ibid.

confirmed in the Chamber's judgment in the Srebrenica cases (2003). Sadly, the order to release those missing persons that are still alive, while very appropriate, must have been made for rhetorical purposes rather than the expectation that persons would still return alive.

4 CONCLUSION

The HRC has mainly used informal provisional measures in its early political detention cases, when the whereabouts of the detainee were unclear. It once used provisional measures formally. The Inter-American Commission has regularly used precautionary measures on behalf of disappeared persons. The Bosnia Chamber has also used provisional measures at least once in a disappearance case. The ECtHR, on the other hand, does not appear to have used them yet in the context of the disappearance cases that it has dealt with.

The discussion in section 3, on the relation to the case law on the merits under the various international and regional human rights treaties, confirms that the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment underlie the use of provisional measures by the HRC, the Inter-American Commission and Court and the Bosnia Chamber.

The human rights adjudicators have all confirmed that given the inequality between the individual and the State the burden of proof cannot rest solely with the individual, particularly in relation to claims about the right to life. Unfortunately they have not always been that clear on the standard of proof. After all, in order to achieve an early shift in the burden of proof from the petitioner to the State, the petitioner should not have to meet the standard of evidence 'beyond a reasonable doubt'. The State always has the monopoly of power vis-à-vis the individual. It normally also has a monopoly on information, especially in relation to disappearances and torture. Exactly given this unequal situation between the two, both as to the consequences of any finding and in light of the possibility to obtain evidence, the standard of proof in cases between unequal parties should vary according to the allocation of the burden of proof. It should be higher if the initial burden is on the State (e.g. in a criminal trial, where the State has to prove an individual's guilt in order to deprive him of his freedom). It should be lower if the initial burden is on the individual (e.g. in disappearance or torture cases claiming state responsibility). In the latter case the burden shifts from the individual to the State once the individual has made a prima facie case. After all the individual claims human rights violations of a very serious nature often involving the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment while the consequences for the State simply involve refraining from acting, providing access, releasing a person, providing compensation, etc. Moreover, the State is able to retrieve and make disappear information and evidence and therefore is at a much stronger position than the individual claiming a human rights violation.¹⁰³

The best way to urgently deal with disappearances is to prevent them from taking place by adequately responding to threats against persons. As discussed in Chapter VII, this includes taking measures to physically protect persons as well as investigating and prosecuting previous threats. Once a disappearance has occurred, the chance of finding the person involved diminishes with each day. Intervention in the first days of a disappearance thus has the greatest chance of finding the person alive.

The UN Working Group on Enforced and Involuntary Disappearances¹⁰⁴ has introduced the rule that it would issue an urgent appeal in each case on which it received information within three months of the last time the person was seen. Different from the Working Group, however, the Inter-American Commission did not regulate its urgent procedure in this respect. As discussed, at least on one occasion it took precautionary measures to locate the person concerned more than a year after he had last been seen. Later it even decided to maintain these measures when it declared the case admissible. One may speculate on the Commission's reasons. It may be that it considered this disappearance an unusual occurrence in the State involved and either believed that there was still a chance to find the disappeared person alive, or at least wished to preserve evidence of the disappearance, or more generally wished to emphasise the seriousness of the situation by using precautionary measures in a symbolic gesture aimed at the prevention of new disappearances.

¹⁰³ See also Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

¹⁰⁴ For a brief reference to this Working Group see Chapter II (Systems), section 2.4 'Power and promptness of the HRC to take provisional measures', under the subheading 'prompt intervention in disappearance and detention cases'.

The fact that the ECtHR has not yet used provisional measures to locate disappeared persons may relate to its functioning in general, especially its fear for a flood of urgent disappearance cases. Yet it is unlikely that such fear would prod the overworked Court simply to dismiss a well-reasoned request for provisional measures in a recent disappearance case, in the context of a pattern of disappearances with the ensuing impunity. It is more likely that the Court simply has not yet received such requests. The reason may be that not just the Court and its staff, but also domestic counsel and NGOs are in a 'non-refoulement mode' vis-à-vis the Court. The Court is accustomed to use provisional measures mainly in expulsion and extradition cases. A related explanation may be found in the case law on the merits on this particular subject matter, which has been more restrictive than that of the other human rights adjudicators. It has generally assigned a heavy burden to the petitioner for proving the State's direct responsibility for a disappearance. Moreover, those NGOs dealing specifically with disappearances may simply assume that they may only submit a case upon exhaustion of domestic remedies, even when domestic habeas corpus proceedings are ineffective in locating the disappeared person in time to prevent his or her extrajudicial execution.

Given the importance of the rights involved, the ECtHR should indeed follow the example of the other adjudicators and use provisional measures as well when faced with a petition regarding a recent disappearance. This could be relevant not just for disappearances in traditional conflict areas within Council of Europe States,¹⁰⁵ but also in light of recent reports on the disappearance of persons in the context of the 'war on terror'.¹⁰⁶

Petitioners may bring complaints against Council of Europe States in which disappeared persons were last seen or on the basis of reports about secret detention centres on their territory.¹⁰⁷

¹⁰⁵ See e.g. Human Rights Watch, Russia/Chechnya, Swept under: torture, forced disappearances, and extrajudicial killings during sweep operations in Chechnya, February 2002; Human Rights Watch, Russia, Last seen...: continued 'disappearances' in Chechnya, April 2002; Amnesty International Urgent Action on behalf of at least 34 men from an unofficial settlement for internally displaced persons in Altievo, Nazran region, Ingushetia, 24 June 2004, AI Index EUR 46/039/2004.

¹⁰⁶ The Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances has also referred to 'the existence of secret detention centres where terrorist suspects are held in complete isolation from the outside world'. In this context it pointed out that it was 'well documented' that disappearance was 'often a precursor to torture and even to extrajudicial execution'. Report of the Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances, E/CN.4/2006/56, 27 December 2005, §22.

¹⁰⁷ See also the references in the Introduction to this Chapter. The Working Group on Enforced and Involuntary Disappearances has interpreted Article 10 of the Declaration (stipulating that persons 'deprived of liberty be held in an officially recognized place of detention') to mean that such place must always be 'clearly identifiable'. "Under no circumstances, including states of war or public emergency, can any State interests be invoked to justify or legitimize secret centres or places of detention which, by definition would violate the Declaration, without exception" E/CN.4/1997/34, 13 December 1996, §24. See further Chapter V (Non-refoulement) on extraordinary renditions. At the same time complaints may be brought before the Inter-American Commission against the US. See further Chapter VIII on procedural rights and Chapter XIV on jurisdiction and admissibility.

In fact, as ICJ Judge Simma pointed out in his Separate Opinion in Congo v. Uganda (2005), this concerns obligations erga omnes in which not just individual petitioners, but also other States have a legal interest:

“If the international community allowed such interest to erode in the face not only of violations of obligations erga omnes but of outright attempts to do away with these fundamental duties, and in their place to open black holes in the law in which human beings may be disappeared and deprived of any legal protection whatsoever for indefinite periods of time, then international law, for me, would become much less worthwhile”.¹⁰⁸

¹⁰⁸ ICJ Armed activities on the territory of the Congo (Congo v. Uganda), Judgment of 19 December 2005, Separate Opinion Judge Simma, §41.

CHAPTER VII

INTERVENING IN DETENTION SITUATIONS INVOLVING RISKS TO HEALTH AND DIGNITY

1 INTRODUCTION

Most adjudicators, even the ICJ and ITLOS, have dealt with situations regarding persons deprived of their liberty.¹ The human rights adjudicators have used provisional measures not only on behalf of disappeared persons,² but also on behalf of persons whose place of detention was known. In both cases provisional measures are taken in order to prevent the (further) torture, ill-treatment and death of the persons involved.

The HRC has intervened in detention cases very frequently, especially in the 1970s and 1980s, but also more recently. In the Inter-American system provisional measures have been used repeatedly as well. Examples from these systems, as well as from the European and African systems will be given in section 2.

These provisional measures do not generally entail a direct intervention to prevent a specific interrogation-method³ or punishment.⁴ Instead they entail the prevention of and putting a stop to ongoing ill-treatment.⁵ Most often they require positive measures to prevent the further deterioration of the health of a detainee, for instance by providing access to medical care and by paying special attention to particularly vulnerable detainees, such as minors, detainees in mental distress and detainees on a hunger strike.

As pointed out in the Introduction to Part II, the argument in this book rests on the assumption that there is a link between provisional measures and the decision on the merits. Hence in order to explain the use of provisional measures there must be a likelihood of finding a violation on the merits with regard to the right to life and personal integrity, in this case of detainees. Section 3 deals with that issue.

¹ See Chapter I, referring to ICJ Hostages case and ITLOS case law regarding release of a vessel or crew.

² See Chapter VI. For death threats and harassment in detention see Chapter IX. The use of provisional measures in cases of lack of access to court and counsel are discussed in Chapter VIII.

³ For a case in which such intervention was requested see section 2.2 of this Chapter. See also the Cleveland Principles on the Detention & Treatment of Persons in Connection with 'The Global War on Terror' adopted at a Conference at Case Western Reserve University School of Law, Ohio, 7 October 2005 and subsequently endorsed by many other experts. See further Chapter VIII (Procedural rights) on extraterritorial detention (e.g. Guantanamo) and Chapter VII (Expulsion) on so-called extraordinary renditions, both in the context of counter-terrorism measures.

⁴ On provisional measures to prevent corporal punishment see Chapter IV.

⁵ See section 2.2 of this Chapter.

2 PRACTICE

2.1 Introduction

Most human rights adjudicators have used provisional measures in one way or other in the context of detention. Section 2 briefly refers to specific measures to protect against ill-treatment,⁶ including certain interrogation methods. It then focuses on the use of (informal) provisional measures relating to the health situation of detainees, sometimes in the form of requests for information, sometimes explicitly in order to ensure access to medical care. This section also pays attention to the protection of particularly vulnerable detainees, with a focus on minors, as well as to requests for provisional measures by or on behalf of detainees on a hunger strike. Some cases involve a request by petitioners to halt the execution of a detention order rather than to ensure access to medical treatment.⁷ The discussion of the use of provisional measures in detention situations concludes with a discussion of situations, dealt with by the HRC in the context of death row, in which provisional measures could have been used.

2.2 Protecting against certain interrogation methods and other ill treatment

2.2.1 European system

There is one famous case involving the legality of interrogation methods in which the adjudicator had been requested to intervene pending the proceedings. In Ireland v. United Kingdom (1972) the European Commission was requested to order the UK to halt a specific interrogation method. This was at a time when the Commission had indeed used provisional measures previously, generally in the context of halting an expulsion, extradition or the execution of a death sentence, but the possibility to do so had not yet officially been included in its Rules of Procedure.⁸

The request to take provisional measures in this case was made as part of the inter-State complaint procedure. Ireland had invoked this procedure against the UK in December 1971, arguing that the latter's use of five interrogation techniques ((a) wall-standing;⁹ (b) hooding;¹⁰ (c) subjection to noise;¹¹ (d) deprivation of sleep; (e) deprivation of food and drink) against suspected IRA terrorists was incompatible with Article 3 ECHR.¹²

That same month the Commission decided to give priority to the application.¹³ Three months later Ireland referred to reports by detained persons and by Amnesty International that the ill treatment was continuing despite the fact that Ireland's Article 3 claim was pending before the ⁶ See also Chapter IX (protecting against death threats and harassment).

⁷ In general about the specific protection required by provisional measures see Chapter XIII (Protection).

⁸ The European Commission did so in 1974.

⁹ '(F)orcing the detainees to remain for periods of some hours in a "stress position", described by those who underwent it as being "spread eagled against the wall, with their fingers put high above the head against the wall, the legs spread apart and the feet back, causing them to stand on their toes with the weight of the body mainly on the fingers"'.
¹⁰ '(P)utting a black or navy coloured bag over the detainees' heads and, at least initially, keeping it there all the time except during interrogation'.

¹¹ '(P)ending their interrogations, holding the detainees in a room where there was a continuous loud and hissing noise'.

¹² The techniques were sometimes referred to as 'disorientation' or 'sensory deprivation' techniques. ECtHR Ireland v. UK, Judgment of 18 January 1978, §96.

¹³ See Rule 38(1) of the Commission's Rules of Procedure.

Commission. It requested provisional measures to ensure that such ill treatment was discontinued pending a decision in the case, in order to prevent irreparable harm.¹⁴ While Ireland recognized that the ECHR did not expressly empower the Commission to order or direct a Government to adopt such measures, it submitted that the Commission did possess the power to take provisional measures as this was ‘the necessary attribute of its judicial functions and therefore covered by the doctrine of implied powers’. It also referred to previous cases in which the Commission had requested Governments to take provisional measures. In particular it requested the Commission to seek an undertaking by the UK that all treatment of detainees complained of under Article 3 should be discontinued; to seek permission for attendance by observers nominated by the Commission at centres of custody ‘to ascertain whether these persons were subjected to such treatment’; and to seek ‘an undertaking that all such persons in custody should be taken to the centres where these observers would be located and that the observers should at all times be given access to such persons’.

Ireland considered that ‘the object of interim measures is generally the preservation of the rights of the parties, pending adjudication, insofar as the damage threatened to these rights would be irreparable’. It submitted that ‘the measures suggested would not in any way prejudice the rights of the respondent Government, but that they would on the other hand protect from irreparable damage the right to physical integrity of those persons in custody who had been and were still being subjected to ill-treatment’.¹⁵

In response the UK observed that the Commission should first decide on the admissibility of the case.¹⁶ It also noted that the proposal was made in respect of ‘new and unspecified allegations’ and not on the material already supplied to the Commission. Finally, it submitted that the Convention did not include a provision ‘conferring on the Commission competence to order interim measures of the kind that were being sought’.¹⁷ With this formulation, adding ‘of the kind that were being sought’, the UK seemed to have left the door slightly ajar. It could be argued that this State mainly disagreed with the specific measures of protection requested by Ireland, rather than disputed the overall competence of the Commission. It is also possible that it considered the Commission should only use provisional measures to halt activities that, if they indeed are taking place, undisputedly violate Article 3. After all, in the latter situation a provisional measure would indicate a likelihood that the Commission would determine that these activities constitute ill-treatment as forbidden under Article 3. In the former situation it would indicate a likelihood that this treatment (which is forbidden under Article 3) is in fact taking place or will occur.

That same month, in March 1972, the Commission decided that it ‘did not have the power, consistent with its functions under the Convention, to meet the request made in the applicant Government’s letter’.¹⁸ Apart from noting that it made the decision after considering Ireland’s letter and the response by the UK it did not explain its decision. It did not say that it did not have the power to order provisional measures at all, only that it could not meet the specific request made by Ireland.¹⁹

The ECtHR eventually found that ‘(t)he five techniques were applied in combination, with premeditation and for hours at a stretch; they caused, if not actual bodily injury, at least intense physical and mental suffering to the persons subjected thereto and also led to acute psychiatric disturbances during interrogation. They accordingly fell into the category of inhuman treatment within the meaning of Article 3 (art. 3). The techniques were also degrading since they were such

¹⁴ See ECHR Yearbook 23, p. 82.

¹⁵ Id., p. 84.

¹⁶ Ibid. See further Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction and admissibility).

¹⁷ It referred to the Commission’s decision in X v. FRG, 20 March 1958, 297/57.

¹⁸ ECHR Yearbook 23, p. 88.

¹⁹ See further Chapter XIII (Protection).

as to arouse in their victims feelings of fear, anguish and inferiority capable of humiliating and debasing them and possibly breaking their physical or moral resistance'.²⁰ This recourse to the five techniques amounted to a practice of inhuman and degrading treatment in violation of Article 3.²¹

Thus far the judgments and decisions of the ECtHR do not seem to indicate similar cases involving requests to order a halt to certain interrogation methods while the case is pending before it, but provisional measures are certainly feasible in this respect.

There could also be other forms of ill treatment unrelated to interrogation methods. To take but one example, on the merits the ECtHR has had to deal with the issue of force-feeding. It found that a measure that 'was considered to be medically necessary – such as force-feeding a detainee to save her/his life – could not in principle be regarded as inhuman and degrading'. Yet, 'such a measure had to have been proved to be medically necessary and the procedural guarantees for the decision to force-feed had to be complied with'. 'Moreover, the manner in which the applicant is subjected to force-feeding during the hunger strike shall not trespass the threshold of a minimum level of severity envisaged by the Court's case law under Article 3 of the Convention'.²² While it is feasible that a petitioner on hunger strike would request the Court to order a State to halt force-feeding, the Court would not easily do so unless faced with information of persistent use of force-feeding that is not medically warranted or done in a manner in itself contrary to Article 3.²³ An example of a case where the Court found a State in violation of Article 3 for such force-feeding is Ciorap v. Moldova (2007). In this case it concluded that the petitioner's 'repeated force-feeding, not prompted by valid medical reasons but rather with the aim of forcing the applicant to stop his protest, and performed in a manner which unnecessarily exposed him to great physical pain and humiliation, can only be considered as torture'.²⁴ Were it to receive a claim in an ongoing situation of such type of force-feeding the use of provisional measures would be warranted.

2.2.2 Inter-American system

Adjudicators have regularly dealt with allegations of ill treatment that, once proven, would immediately constitute violations of international law. Often this concerns ill treatment in detention and sometimes it is ongoing. In response the Inter-American Commission has used various precau-

²⁰ ECtHR Ireland v. UK, Judgment of 18 January 1978, §167.

²¹ Id., §168. CAT has also pointed out that suspects must not be blindfolded during interrogation and that using 'moderate physical pressure' is completely unacceptable as a method of interrogation because allowing this, together with the secrecy of the standards of interrogation, would create conditions leading to a risk of ill treatment and torture. See e.g. Ingelse (2002), pp. 254-255 and the references therein.

²² See ECtHR Nevmerzhitsky v. Ukraine, 5 April 2005, §94. At §93 it noted: "When, however, as in the present case, a detained person maintains a hunger strike this may inevitably lead to a conflict between an individual's right to physical integrity and the High Contracting Party's positive obligation under Article 2 of the Convention – a conflict which is not solved by the Convention itself" (see X v. Germany (1984) 7 EHRR 152). "In the instant case, the Court finds that the force-feeding of the applicant, without any medical justification having been shown by the Government, using the equipment foreseen in the decree, but resisted by the applicant, constituted treatment of such a severe character warranting the characterisation of torture", §98. See also ECtHR Herczegfalvy v. Austria, Judgment of 24 September 1992, §83.

²³ About the role of physicians in this respect see e.g. World Medical Association, Declaration on hunger strikers, November 1991, <www.wma.net/e/policy/h31.htm> and Oguz and Miles (2004). For a commentary by the Dutch branch of the International Commission of Jurists on force-feeding, see Wijnakker (2006), pp. 434-449.

²⁴ ECtHR Ciorap v. Moldova, 19 June 2007, §89.

tionary measures to protect detainees against ill treatment by prison officials and others. The Inter-American Court has equally dealt with such issues.²⁵

In August 1992 the Inter-American Commission took precautionary measures in a case against Peru, aimed at the protection of the prisoners who had been at the ‘Miguel Castro Castro Prison’ in Lima during an attack by the Army that took place in May 1992. In particular, it requested information on the whereabouts and medical condition of the inmates who had been wounded. Formally, the Commission had received the first communication twelve days after the attack.²⁶

In fact, it appears from the Commission’s 1993 Report on Peru that its Executive Secretariat received reports about the events already in early April 1992. Unsuccessfully, the Commission made several attempts to convince the government to allow it to use its good offices. Apparently, the ICRC had not been allowed to play a role at all in the earlier stages of the military operation of early May. Only in the night of 8 May was it allowed a brief visit. Reportedly, the prosecutor was the only non-military presence in the prison. No institution or individual had been allowed to enter the prison as independent observer.²⁷ The Commission noted that, as reported by independent sources, on 7 May and especially on 8 May the inmates had asked for the presence of institutions such as the ICRC and the Commission, whose good offices could help implement the prison transfer. The authorities, however, did not accept these suggestions and on 9 May the ‘combined army and police forces’ used force against the inmates, including explosives and weapons of war. Four days later the Chairman of the Commission sent the following letter to Peru’s Minister of Foreign Affairs:

“I have the honor to address your Excellency in connection with the events that occurred at the ‘Miguel Castro Castro’ prison starting on May 6, 1992 to request that you kindly adopt the following measures at soon as possible:

Provide the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights with a complete list of the male and female inmates who were in cellblocks 1A and 4B of that institution on May 5 last.

Provide the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights with a complete list of the individuals who were killed, wounded, or who have been missing since May 6.

Provide the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights with a complete list of the survivors, and where they are at the present time.

Re-establish, as soon as possible, visits from relatives of the inmates, so that they provide them with any clothing, medications and toiletries that they may need.

Take the necessary measures to provide the wounded with the medical care they require”.²⁸

As indicated before, the Commission formally opened the case relating to the incident in June 1992. In its Special Report on Peru it noted that the next month the ‘disturbing information’ it received concerning the situation of the inmates prompted it to request Peru, in August 1992, to take measures to protect the rights of the detainees.²⁹ Indeed its admissibility report in the Castro ²⁵ Obviously this is closely related to the discussion in Chapter IX (threats).

²⁶ The Commission alleged that 500 troops of the Peruvian army had entered the prison to transfer the inmates to the ‘Santa Mónica’ prison. During the attack by the Army 34 inmates died and 18 others were wounded. The Commission also received information from ‘a variety’ of other sources including letters sent by inmates. The Commission opened the case the next month. See CIDH Hugo Juárez Cruzat et al. (Miguel Castro Castro Prison) v. Peru, 5 March 2001 (adm.).

²⁷ CIDH Special Report on Peru 1993, §95.

²⁸ Id., §97.

²⁹ Before providing the complete text of the precautionary measures taken, the Commission listed the situation as denounced by the petitioners and NGOs: “a. That a group of around 80 inmates in cellblock 4-B and 2 members of Tupac Amaru Revolutionary Movement had been transferred to Yanamayo prison Puno. b. That prison does not have the facilities to provide inmates with the

Castro Prison case notes that it took precautionary measures on 18 August 1992. It decided to do so '(i)n view of the information supplied and the fact that there had been no reply from the Government of Peru'.³⁰ It requested Peru to send an official list of the persons who died or disappeared during the incidents in May. It also requested information on the whereabouts and medical condition of the surviving inmates.³¹

The Commission pointed out that it had received additional information with regard to the case 'to the effect that inmates in the Miguel Castro Castro penal institution were in very bad condition, very poorly fed – far below the minimum requirements – and that the sick and those in need of medical attention were living alongside healthy inmates. No inmate was allowed to receive visits from relatives or their attorneys. In general, conditions were such that they posed a serious threat to the inmates' personal security and even their lives'.³²

According to the petitioners, during (and after) the Army attack of May 1992, Peru rejected the proposal by the inmates to form a committee with representatives of the ICRC and the Inter-American Commission. The petitioners pointed out that 'the prisoners made every effort to resolve the situation differently and even went so far as to sign a document with Attorney General Mirtha Campos, where the main point was the Red Cross' presence as a minimum requirement to guarantee the lives of the prisoners at the time of surrender'. The petitioners added that they only revolted when they realised 'that the real objective of the Army and police troops was to kill everyone'. They stated that the confrontation continued from 6 May to 9 May 1992, 'when the Army troops began to selectively execute prisoners, despite the fact that they had surrendered and minimum protection needed to cope with the very low temperature at that altitude and the inhospitable climate. c. The individuals being held have been taken to Yanamayo with only the clothes on their backs, after having spent several weeks exposed to the elements, poorly fed, and subjected to various types of serious mistreatment; a number of them were also wounded. d. No authorisation has been given to allow relatives to visit those being held in Yanamayo and they are not allowed to send them the food, clothing, coats or medicine the prisoners need to cover their basic needs. e. Two inmates have already died as result of the inadequate facilities, their very weakened physical condition at the time they were transferred and because of the authorities' refusal to permit the vital necessities of those being held at Yanamayo prison to be supplied by those outside. f. Members of rival armed groups are said to be held inside the same facilities, which poses a serious threat to their personal safety and life should serious violence occur". CIDH Special Report on Peru 1993, §99.

³⁰ They consisted of the following: "1. That the Government of Peru authorize the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights to conduct an on site inspection of the Yanamayo prison facilities in the Department of Puno. 2. That the Government of Peru authorize the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights to speak with persons deprived of their liberty in that penal institution. 3. That the Government of Peru authorize relatives and attorneys to visit prisoners in that and other detention centers and that it allow clothing, medicine, coats and toiletries that the inmates require to meet their vital needs to enter. 4. That the Government of Peru provide persons suffering from health problems with needed medical care and that such persons be transferred to establishments where they can receive proper medical attention. 5. That the Government of Peru adopt measures to keep separate persons who are considered members of rival armed groups, so as to avoid the kind of violence that could threaten the safety or life of the inmates. 6. That the Government of Peru forward to the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights the official list of persons who died and disappeared as a result of the events that occurred at the Miguel Castro Castro penal institution, as well as a list of the wounded and the whereabouts of those transferred". CIDH Special Report on Peru 1993, §100.

³¹ While it remains unclear whether the exact date was 14 or 18 August, it seems likely that the precautionary measures mentioned here are the same as the aforementioned of 14 August reproduced in the Commission's Special Report on Peru.

³² CIDH Special Report on Peru 1993, §§101-102.

were leaving the facility to be transferred to another facility'. The petitioners maintained that the Prison Warden, the Assistant Warden and another commander they identified were immediately to blame for the events leaving dead 34 prisoners and wounding 13 others. According to them 'these three had a plan to isolate and annihilate the inmates'. The petitioners also mentioned another incident, later in May 1992, where 500 Army troopers entered the prison again, heavily armed and wearing hoods in order to move 300 prisoners. Allegedly, prisoners were ill-treated and beaten. This exacerbated the conditions of those who had already been wounded during the attack of 6 May. The petitioners claimed that the detainees were held incommunicado and some of them without clothing or shoes. 'There were few mattresses and blankets, little food and no proper medical attention'.³³ They argued that they had submitted their petition before domestic remedies had been exhausted 'because of the urgency of the situation and to avoid further and possibly irreparable harm to the inmates at Miguel Castro Castro prison'.

Among others, the State contended that the operation was conducted by National Police troops and the Army troops were simply guarding the outside perimeter of the prison and never directly intervened. It alleged that the police only intervened because the male inmates, who were members of Sendero Luminoso (Shining Path), had rejected earlier attempts to persuade the inmates to cooperate in the transfer. It also maintained that a document shows that ICRC representatives were present. It reiterated that its Army 'did not selectively and summarily execute the prisoners as they were leaving the prison, since the Army troops did not have a direct hand in the operation (...) instead, they confined their activities to security outside the prison'.

In December 1992 the President of the Inter-American Court decided not to take urgent measures in the Peruvian Prisons cases.³⁴ The Court confirmed this in plenary session by a decision not to order provisional measures for lack of evidence of risk.³⁵

In its 1993 Special Report on Peru the Commission pointed out that it had received additional information with regard to the case 'to the effect that inmates in the Miguel Castro Castro penal institution were in very bad condition, very poorly fed – far below the minimum requirements – and that the sick and those in need of medical attention were living alongside healthy inmates. No inmate was allowed to receive visits from relatives or their attorneys. In general, conditions were such that they posed a serious threat to the inmates' personal security and even their lives'.³⁶ It was only in 2001 that the Commission declared the case admissible.³⁷ It determined that Peru had waived the requirement to exhaust national remedies because it had not asserted this requirement in a timely manner.³⁸

³³ In this context they claimed that the treatment of inmates in this prison was 'inhumane, given the scarcity of food, the lack of heating in the cells, the lack of medical care for sick prisoners, the absolute ban on visits – both by family members and prisoners' attorneys –, the harassment, abuse and brutality of the guards charged with the custody of the prisoners and the safety of prisons'.

³⁴ IACHR Peruvian Prisons cases, Resolution of the President of 14 December 1992.

³⁵ IACHR Peruvian Prisons cases, Order of the Court of 27 January 1993. According to the Commission the Inter-American Court did order provisional measures in December 1992, in connection with the situation at the Peruvian prisons in general (including the 'Miguel Castro Castro Prison'): Hugo Juarez Cruzat et al. (Miguel Castro Castro Prison) v. Peru, 5 March 2001 (adm.), §5. See further Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk).

³⁶ CIDH Special Report on Peru 1993, §§101-102.

³⁷ CIDH Hugo Juarez Cruzat et al. (Miguel Castro Castro Prison) v. Peru, 5 March 2001 (adm.).

³⁸ It pointed out, moreover, that in July 1992 the habeas corpus petition relating to the events had been declared inadmissible by the Peruvian court.

Another case in which the Inter-American Commission took precautionary measures, at least according to its Annual Report 1998, was that of Damion Thomas.³⁹ The case alleged ongoing ill-treatment by prison officials in the St. Catherine Prison in Jamaica.⁴⁰ Yet in its Final Report the Commission did not refer to the precautionary measure previously mentioned in its Annual Report. In fact it related to its refusal to heed to the petitioners' repeated requests for such measures. It noted that in their original petition and subsequent communications the petitioners requested such measures 'based upon an immediate threat posed to Mr. Thomas' mental and physical health'. In April 2000 the Commission responded to the various requests by stating that 'based upon the information provided by both parties in the matter, it considered that it could effectively address the concerns raised by the petitioners through the Commission's complaint procedure and without the need to adopt precautionary measures at that time'.⁴¹

The petitioners apparently had requested the Commission to ensure their client's transfer to a prison in Jamaica other than St. Catherine's District Prison.⁴² A month after the Commission's refusal to adopt precautionary measures, Jamaica sent a communication arguing that 'the Petitioners should be disallowed from applying for precautionary measures until such time as they intended to open a full case before the Commission'. In the alternative, it argued, that 'the information provided by the Petitioners did not substantiate the occurrence or threat of irreparable damage necessary to support the adoption of precautionary measures by the Commission'.⁴³

Here the State argued that there should be a connection between a request for precautionary measures and opening a full case before the Commission. In fact, petitioners have often requested precautionary measures before sending in a formal petition in a full case. The Commission, moreover, has often resorted to precautionary measures before opening a case and in many of these situations a case was never formally opened.⁴⁴ Only in death penalty cases the Commission now opens a case immediately and assigns a case number. What is interesting here is that the State believed the petitioners should not even be allowed to apply for precautionary measures if they did not intend to open a full case.⁴⁵

In any case, the Commission seemed to agree with regard to the State's position that the information provided by the petitioners did not substantiate the occurrence or threat of irreparable harm necessary to support the adoption of precautionary measures.⁴⁶ Yet in its Final Report the ³⁹ CIDH Annual Report 1998, §43 (to take the necessary measures to prevent him from suffering irreparable harm), case 12.069.

⁴⁰ Normally, precautionary measures addressed at Jamaica aim at halting the execution of a death sentence.

⁴¹ CIDH Damion Thomas v. Jamaica, 4 April 2001 (merits), §14.

⁴² CIDH Damion Thomas v. Jamaica, 15 June 2000 (adm.), §3. The petitioner in this case was Allen & Overy, a law firm in London.

⁴³ Id., §13.

⁴⁴ See in general about the proceedings Chapter II (Systems).

⁴⁵ The petitioners themselves had 'expressed the view that he communication filed on Mr. Thomas' behalf was not a request to open a full case on their complaint, but rather a request for precautionary measures to protect Mr. Thomas' life and physical integrity'. CIDH Damion Thomas v. Jamaica, 15 June 2000 (adm.), §5. The Commission, however, had already opened the case in December 1998 and the petitioners had consistently taken part in the procedure set by the Commission. In this light the State's reference to the original intention of the petitioners is particularly intriguing.

⁴⁶ According to both the Admissibility and the Final Report it never took precautionary measures. It is not clear whether the reference in its discussion of precautionary measures in its Annual Report 1998 to such measures, as taken on 9 December 1998 is mistaken or whether the reports on admissibility and merits simply fail to mention that the Commission initially did take them. If the Commission indeed took precautionary measures on 9 December, it did so two days before it formally opened the case, which was on 11 December 1998.

Commission concluded that Jamaica was responsible for failing to respect the physical, mental and moral integrity of Mr. Thomas, thereby subjecting him to cruel or inhuman punishment or treatment in violation of Articles 5(1) and 5(2) jo. 1(1) ACHR.⁴⁷ If it never took such measures earlier during the proceedings it must either have believed that no irreparable harm had occurred or that, at the time, there was no sufficient substantiation of a threat of such occurrence.

Another example of Commission involvement to protect detainees against ill treatment is reported by CEJIL. On an unspecified date this NGO requested the Commission to take precautionary measures to protect the physical integrity of almost 150 labour union members who had been arbitrarily detained upon their attendance of an assembly. Allegedly, the Bolivian authorities had taken them to various military camps. At these camps they were subjected to torture and mistreatment and deprived of access to medical attention. At the same time, the government declared a state of emergency, so that they could not file writs of habeas corpus and were denied the assistance of counsel. The Commission took precautionary measures in May 1995 and eventually the detainees were freed.⁴⁸ Clearly, this precautionary measure did not only relate to prison conditions and access to health care but also to the prevention of torture and disappearances.

In April 1996 the President of the Inter-American Court requested Ecuador to adopt forthwith the measures necessary 'to effectively ensure the physical and moral integrity of Mr. Rafael Iván Suárez-Rosero, so that any provisional measures that the Inter-American Court may take can have the requisite effect'.⁴⁹ The beneficiary was detained at that time. In June 1996 the Court lifted the urgent measures, having received note from the Commission that 'it was desisting from its requests for provisional measures on the grounds that the circumstances of extreme gravity and urgency that had inspired the adoption of urgent measures no longer existed, a fact demonstrated by the release of Mr. Rafael Iván Suárez-Rosero by the Government of Ecuador, and that there was currently no risk to the safety of Mr. Suárez-Rosero and his family'.⁵⁰

More recently the Inter-American Court has also ordered provisional measures in serious detention situations of a general nature, affecting larger groups of people.⁵¹ In the Urso Branco

⁴⁷ CIDH Damion Thomas v. Jamaica, case 12.069, Final Report 50/01, 4 April 2001, §VII. It recommended Jamaica to grant the petitioner an effective remedy, including compensation, to investigate the facts, determine responsibility and undertake 'appropriate remedial measures'. It also recommended it to ensure that detention officials are appropriately trained with regard to standards of humane treatment and that complaints about ill treatment and other conditions of detention are properly investigated and resolved.

⁴⁸ CEJIL case docket 1997 (on file with the author).

⁴⁹ IACHR Suárez-Rosero (Ecuador), Order of 12 April 1996 (President). Later that same month the President expanded the urgent measures to include the family members of the detainee.

⁵⁰ IACHR Suárez-Rosero (Ecuador), Order of 28 June 1996.

⁵¹ For a range of Orders dealing with requests for provisional measures in the context of detention see e.g. IACHR Matter of the Penitentiary Center of the Central Occidental Region (Uribana Prison) (Venezuela), Order of 2 February 2007; Matter of Urso Branco prison (Brazil), Orders of 2 May 2008, 21 September 2005, 7 July 2004, 22 April 2004, 29 August 2002 and 18 June 2002; Matter of the Mendoza prisons (Argentina), Orders of 27 November 2007, 30 March 2006, 18 June 2005, 22 November 2004; Matter of the persons imprisoned in the "Dr. Sebastião Martins Silveira" Penitentiary in Araraquara São Paulo (Brazil), Order of the President of 10 June 2008; Order of 30 September 2006; Matter of Children Deprived of Liberty in the "Complexo do Tatuapé" of FEBEM (Brazil), Order of President 10 June 2008, Orders of 3 July 2007, 4 July 2006, 30 November 2005 and 17 November 2005; Matter of Yare I and Yare II Capital Region Penitentiary Center (Venezuela), Orders of 8 February 2008, 30 November 2007 and 30 March 2006; Matter of Capital El Rodeo I & El Rodeo II Judicial Confinement Center, Order of 8 February 2008; Matter of Monagas Judicial Confinement Center ('La Pica') (Venezuela), Order of 3 July 2007 and 9 February 2006; Case of the Miguel Castro-Castro Prison v. Peru, Orders of 29 January 2008 and 30 January 2007.

Prison case, for instance, it ordered Brazil to immediately take all necessary measures to protect the lives and personal integrity of all persons detained in certain detention centers, as well as those working there and visitors.⁵² Moreover, in its Order for provisional measures in Las penitentiarias de Mendoza v. Argentina the Court required the State to take the necessary measures to protect the life and personal integrity of all detainees from the detention centers involved, as well as employees and visitors.⁵³ The Court has noted that the State must ‘make the appropriate adjustments to deal with the structural problems’, but meanwhile, sometimes the situation makes it necessary that detainees ‘who are being affected by such flaws, be protected by provisional measures if their condition is of extreme seriousness and urgency’.⁵⁴ In any case extreme seriousness ‘should be assessed taking into account the specific context’, as ‘it is clear that if the fundamental rights such as the right to life and physical integrity are subjected to such type of threat, an order for provisional measures should be considered’.⁵⁵ The urgency criterion ‘refers to special and exceptional situations that deserve an immediate measure and response aimed at averting the threat’. This involves ‘circumstances that because of their own nature imply an imminent risk’. A ‘lack of response would mean a danger per se’.⁵⁶

In January 2006 the Court took provisional measures on behalf of those persons deprived of their liberty by Venezuela, detained in the Detention Centre of Monagas, known as ‘La Pica’. The State should efficiently and immediately take measures to prevent violence in La Pica to the effect that no-one would die and the personal integrity of the detainees and others present in La Pica would be respected. As usual, the measures required should be planned and implemented with the participation of the representatives of the beneficiaries. The State was also requested to provide an up-to-date list of all persons detained and indicate the circumstances of their detention.⁵⁷ Finally, the State should investigate and prosecute the acts that led to the adoption of the provisional measures.⁵⁸

2.3 Requests for information on the health situation of detainees

It has mainly been the HRC that has requested information on the health situation of detainees without explicitly requesting States to ensure medical attention. There are at least twenty cases involving political prisoners in which the HRC used such informal provisional measures to intervene in ongoing detention situations. The first time it did so was in 1977. Most interventions took place in the 1970s and early 1980s and involved Uruguay. There have also been cases against Zaire (now the Democratic Republic of Congo), Madagascar, Bolivia, Nicaragua and Peru.

The Rule 91 (current Rule 97) requests for information about the health of an alleged victim clearly aim at ensuring proper proceedings and safeguarding the evidence. At the same time, ⁵² IACHR Cárcel de Urso Branco (Brazil), Order of 21 September 2005. See also the Orders of 18 June and 22 August 2002, 22 April and 7 July 2004. See further Chapter XIII (Protection). On 21 October 2006 the Commission declared this case admissible. Its report includes a list of the 96 inmates who had died in the Urso Branco prison between 3 November 2000 and 8 February 2006.

⁵³ IACHR Las penitentiarias de Mendoza (Argentina), Order of 22 November 2004.

⁵⁴ IACHR Matter of Capital El Rodeo I and El Rodeo II Judicial Confinement Center, 8 February 2008, 14th ‘Considering’ clause.

⁵⁵ Id., 17th ‘Considering’ clause.

⁵⁶ Id., 18th ‘Considering’ clause.

⁵⁷ More generally on the group of beneficiaries see Chapter XIII.

⁵⁸ CIDH Caso del internado judicial de Monagas (‘La Pica’) (Venezuela), Order of 13 January 2006. Yet analysing compliance with this requirements is a matter to be dealt with on the merits. See infra referring to IACHR Matter of the Children Deprived of liberty in the “Complejo do Tataupé” of FEBEM, Order of 3 July 2007, 12th ‘Considering’ clause and 7th ‘Decisional’ clause.

however, these requests seem to have the additional purpose of preventing irreparable harm to the persons involved. Hence, the requests for information on the health and ‘whereabouts’ of alleged victims, as found in these communications, seem to function as informal requests for provisional measures. If this implies preventing irreparable harm, the next question is whether this means refraining from acting or taking positive measures to prevent irreparable harm. In fact the substance of the HRC’s informal provisional measures in the above cases illustrates a continuum between negative and positive action in respect of the obligations under the ICCPR and the OP.⁵⁹

The case of M.A. v. S (1978) is one of the first cases in which the HRC requested information on the alleged victim’s whereabouts and state of health. It is also one of the few cases in which it published such a decision separately,⁶⁰ although it did not specify the addressee State.⁶¹

The first occasion in which the petitioners explicitly requested the HRC to use provisional measures on behalf of a detainee was in 1977 in the case of Altesor v. Uruguay (1982).⁶² Four months after the initial submission they requested the HRC to take provisional measures to avoid irreparable harm to their father’s health and life in light of his ‘very poor state of health’.⁶³ The ⁵⁹ See also Chapter XIII (Protection).

⁶⁰ HRC M.A. v. S, 24 April 1979, com. no. 20/1977, CCPR/C/OP/1 at 5 and 20. Its decision was of 25 January 1978. On that same day it also requested a State to halt the expulsion of another petitioner. This case was published as well: O.E.v. S, 25 January 1978, 22/1977, CCPR/C/OP/1 at 5 (1984); 26 July 1978, CCPR/C/OP/1 at 6; 27 October 1978, CCPR/C/OP/1 at 35. In December 1977 Ms. M.A. had submitted a complaint on behalf of her husband. Only very little information is available in this case. She stated that her husband was arrested in the unspecified State ‘S’ two months previously. He allegedly was detained incommunicado and attempts to resort to domestic resources, including habeas corpus, had been unsuccessful. The HRC requested the petitioner to inform it whether a case concerning her husband had been submitted to the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights. It requested the State to provide information on the state of health of the petitioner’s husband. The State party responded, among others, with the observation that the alleged victim was a ‘wanted person’ and that the same matter had also been submitted to the Inter-American Commission. The petitioner acknowledged this but did not respond to the Committee’s request whether it was her intention to withdraw the case from the Inter-American Commission. On 24 April 1979 the HRC decided to declare the case inadmissible.

⁶¹ Around 25 January 1978, when it had requested information about his whereabouts and state of health, it also dealt with the abovementioned cases Valentini de Bazzano and Altesor. It is not clear why the HRC kept anonymous the State involved even after it had declared the case inadmissible. Given the state of ratifications of OAS members in 1979 this case may relate to Uruguay as well. See also Drescher Caldas (represented by his wife Ibarburu de Drescher) v. Uruguay, 21 July 1983. In January 1979 Ms. Ibarburu de Drescher had submitted a complaint against Uruguay on behalf of her husband Mr. Drescher Caldas. Among others, she requested that a medical examination should be permitted by doctors suggested by her husband’s family. In April 1979 the HRC transmitted the case under Rule 91 and also ‘drew the State party’s attention to the concern expressed by the petitioner with regard to the state of health and whereabouts of her husband’. It requested the State ‘to furnish information to the Committee thereon’. For another case in which it enquired about the health of the petitioner see Pietraroia v. Uruguay, 27 March 1981. The HRC did so two months after initial submission, when it declared the case admissible.

⁶² HRC Altesor v. Uruguay, 29 March 1982.

⁶³ The petitioners were Uruguayan nationals residing in Mexico acting on behalf of their father, a former trade union leader and member of the Chamber of Deputies. In their initial letter of 10 March 1977 they stated that he was arrested in 1975 without any formal charges. Shortly before his arrest, they noted, ‘he had undergone a heart operation which saved his life but at the same time made it necessary for him to observe very strict rules regarding work, diet and medication’.

HRC did not formally take provisional measures, but that same month it transmitted the complaint to the State party and included a request for information about the alleged victim's state of health.⁶⁴

Another case, besides that of Altesor, in which a petitioner specifically requested the use of provisional measures in order to avoid irreparable harm to the health of the alleged victim, was Sendic v. Uruguay (1981).⁶⁵ The petitioner was Violeta Setelich, a Uruguayan national living in France. She submitted the complaint on behalf of her husband, detained in Uruguay. He had been the main founder of the Movimiento de Liberación Nacional Tupamaros. She stated that in all places of detention where he had been kept between 1973 and 1976 he was subjected to ill treatment. She mentioned solitary confinement, lack of food and harassment. In one of these places he developed a hernia as a result of a severe beating by the guards. She also declared that, as of February 1978, he was again subjected to inhuman treatment and torture. He was forced to do the 'plantón' (to stand upright with his eyes blindfolded) throughout the day. He was only allowed to rest for a few hours at a time. He was beaten and received insufficient food.⁶⁶ She noted that because of his hernia he could only take liquids and was unable to walk without help. Apart from this he also suffered from heart disease. His state of health continued to deteriorate and she feared for his life.⁶⁷ In this light she requested the Committee to apply provisional measures 'to avoid irreparable damage to his health'.⁶⁸ Four months later, in March 1980, the HRC transmitted the communication to the State party and also requested it to inform it about the state of health of Mr. Sendic, the medical treatment given to him and his exact place of detention.⁶⁹

On the merits the Committee found violations of, among others, Articles 7 and 10(1) because Sendic was 'held in solitary confinement in an underground cell, was subjected to torture for three months in 1978 and is being denied the medical treatment his condition requires'. In this respect the State was under an obligation to extend to him the treatment required under Articles 7 and 10. 'The State party must also ensure that Raúl Sendic receives promptly all necessary medical care'.⁷⁰ It was not until its decision on the merits that it requested the State to provide the necessary medical care. In other words, pending the proceedings it only requested information Allegedly he was subjected to beatings and electric shocks and later remained handcuffed, hooded and in absolute solitary confinement.

⁶⁴ Four months later it did request the State to ensure adequate medical treatment. Subsequently, at the admissibility stage, it requested information again regarding the state of health of the alleged victims.

⁶⁵ HRC Sendic Antonaccio (submitted by his wife Violeta Setelich) v. Uruguay, 28 October 1981.

⁶⁶ After three months, when he received his first visit, his state of health was alarming. She stressed that his situation had not changed since the entry into force of the ICCPR and the Optional Protocol on 23 March 1976. With regard to his medical health she alleged that he had needed an operation for his hernia since 1976. There had been, she pointed out, a medical order to perform such an operation, but the military authorities had refused to take him to a hospital.

⁶⁷ The HRC noted that she 'even thought that it had been decided to kill him slowly, notwithstanding the official abolition of the death penalty in Uruguay in 1976'.

⁶⁸ At the time of writing (28 November 1979) she was also unsure about her husband's whereabouts and requested the HRC to obtain information from the State party about his place of detention and the conditions of his imprisonment.

⁶⁹ In three further letters Ms. Setelich emphasised her deep concern about her husband's state of health. "She reiterated that after soldiers had struck him in the lower abdomen with gun butts at Colonials barracks in mid-1974 her husband had developed an inguinal hernia and that there was a risk that the hernia might become strangulated".

⁷⁰ HRC Sendic Antonaccio (submitted by his wife Violeta Setelich) v. Uruguay, 28 October 1981. By note of 31 October 1991 the State party informed the Committee that it had released the author on 14 March 1985.

about medical health, but it did not formally request the provision of medical care. Nevertheless, it seems likely that this was, at least partially, underlying the request for information.⁷¹

In another Uruguayan case concerning political prisoner a Brazilian national living in the Netherlands submitted a complaint on behalf of her son detained in Uruguay. She expressed deep concern about her son's state of health, mentioning that he suffered from a heart disease, had received two operations and urgently needed a third one and that the authorities were denying him proper medical attention. The Working Group of the HRC transmitted the case two months after initial submission and requested information on the alleged victim's health at the same time.⁷² In most cases the Committee requested information on the health of the alleged victim when it transmitted the case as well as when it declared the case admissible.⁷³ On several subsequent occasions the HRC did specifically ask Uruguay to ensure access to medical care,⁷⁴ but in the last two cases against Uruguay the HRC again simply inquired about the health of alleged victim. It neither repeated nor intensified this request later.⁷⁵

⁷¹ See also Chapter XIII on the relationship with the forms of reparation.

⁷² HRC Estradet Cabreira v. Uruguay, 21 July 1983. She stated that her son had been detained in Libertad prison since January 1973. Just like in previous communications by family members of political prisoners detained in Libertad, she complained about conditions of imprisonment including the small size of the cell, the fact that he was kept there 23 hours a day and about the punishments inflicted on detainees, such as being sent for solitary confinement at 'La Isla'. She claimed that 'the worst part of her son's imprisonment is the continuous harassment by the guards and the severe punishment for such actions as reporting to relatives on prison conditions or speaking with other inmates without authorization'. She alleged, furthermore, that 'detainees are continuously kept in a state of anxiety and tension because they live in constant fear of being again interrogated in connection with the prior conviction or with purported political activities in prison'. This situation seriously endangered the physical and mental health of the detainees at Libertad. She mentioned the names of several detainees in poor health who died.

⁷³ HRC Vasilskis v. Uruguay, 31 March 1983. Despite the fact that the HRC initially did not enquire about the health of the alleged victim, the State did respond to the allegations in this respect. Her living conditions were the same as those of the other female prisoners and she was 'not subject to the slightest discriminatory treatment and it is completely untrue to state that she received insufficient food or is subject to ill-treatment'. The State acknowledged that she suffered from Raynaud's disease and pointed out that she was receiving the necessary treatment: 'her present condition can be described as compensated'. See also Dave Marais v. Madagascar, 24 March 1984. In one case it initially did not enquire about the health of the victim, but when it declared the case admissible it did request 'further information about her health'. See e.g. Larrosa Bequio v. Uruguay, 29 March 1993.

⁷⁴ See section 3.4.

⁷⁵ HRC Lucia Arzuaga Gilboa (submitted by her aunt Felicia Gilboa de Reverdito) v. Uruguay, 1 November 1985. Ms. Gilboa de Reverdito submitted a case on behalf of her niece Ms. Arzuaga Gilboa, a university student who was detained in Uruguay from June 1983 until early September 1984. The petitioner stated that her niece suffered from the consequences of meningitis contracted in 1982 and required special medical treatment. The case was initially submitted in July 1983. That same month the Working Group transmitted the case to the State under Rule 91 and requested to inform it of the alleged victim's state of health. In a submission of September of that year she gave specific information about torture and various forms of cruel and degrading treatment to which she claimed her niece had been subjected. She pointed out that she was unable to specify its effect 'because it has not yet been possible to attain any clinical information or to have her examined by a reliable doctor'. She did refer to some symptoms, which gave her cause for alarm. For instance, after they had strung her up by the chain of her handcuffs, naked, in an open yard, in mid winter, she suffered attacks of vomiting. She was then taken for examinations the nature of which has remained unclear. 'It is known, however, that some of the examinations involved electro-encephalograms. In this regard, it should be borne in mind that, as

A relevant health inquiry case not involving Uruguay is Jaona v. Madagascar (1985).⁷⁶ In this case counsel claimed that the petitioner, a 77-year-old politician, was arrested 'on the pretext that demonstrations organised in his support were endangering public order and security' and taken to a military camp. He was not brought before a judge. Counsel claimed violations of Articles 9, 18 and 19. The Working Group decided to transmit the case and requested the State to inform it of the petitioner's state of health. Two months later counsel submitted additional information about the petitioner's state of health and alleged that the authorities were refusing him the necessary medical care and had not authorized specialist professors, including the Dean of the Faculty of Medicine of Tananarive, to examine him. He also referred to the petitioner's hunger strikes of January 1983. The claim itself related to arbitrary detention and freedom of expression, but the informal provisional measures related to the health of the detainee.⁷⁷ In Marais v. Madagascar (1983) the HRC also requested the State to provide information about the whereabouts and health of the alleged victim. In this case, it found violations of Articles 7 and 10 as well.⁷⁸

Another case was Lafuente Penarrieta et al. v. Bolivia (1987).⁷⁹ In April 1984 eight Bolivian citizens, one of them living in the US, submitted a complaint on behalf of four of their relatives and three others who were being held at the San Jorge Barracks in Bolivia. Their submission stated that members of the armed forces arrested the alleged victims in October 1983 on suspicion of being guerrilleros. Allegedly, they were severely tortured during the first two weeks, kept incommunicado for 44 days under inhuman conditions and held in solitary confinement. The

I stated in my initial communication, my niece contracted meningitis last year. The blows to the head which she received were there particularly dangerous in her case". In the last health case against Uruguay, Raul Cariboni (submitted by his wife Ruth Magri de Cariboni) v. Uruguay, 27 October 1987, the alleged victim's wife submitted a case in October 1983. Her husband, a former professor of history and geography, was detained from 1973 until 13 December 1984. She mentioned that he had suffered two heart attacks during torture and that in December 1976 the medical board at the Central Hospital of the Armed Forces had concluded that only heart surgery could save him. Examinations in 1978 and 1982 resulted in an advice to have special examinations, in the form of phonocardiograms, every six months. Such examinations, however, were not made possible in the prison. She also stated that, after visits made in 1980 and 1983, the ICRC had listed him 'among the prisoners in most precarious state of health'. She pointed out that 'he was in danger of dying suddenly unless he received adequate medical attention and could enjoy conditions of life different from those he was subjected to in prison'. Four months after the initial submission the Working Group transmitted the case to the State under Rule 91 and requested information on alleged victim's state of health.

⁷⁶ HRC Monja Jaona v. Madagascar, 1 April 1985. The petitioner was represented by Maître Eric Hammel, who was a lawyer in Madagascar until his expulsion in February 1982. He was now assisting the petitioner from France. Hammel was also counsel in the cases Marais v. Madagascar, 24 March 1983 and Wight v. Madagascar, 1 April 1985 (in those cases referred to as Hamel). He claimed that his own expulsion by order of the Ministry of Justice had related, among others, to his involvement in representing the petitioner in relation to a previous arrest. This time Jaona was arrested on 15 December 1982 and taken to the military camp of Kellivondrake. Counsel pointed out that the arrest followed Jaona's public denunciation of election fraud and his call for new elections. The HRC was informed of his release on 26 March 1984. Hammel himself submitted a case against Madagascar in August 1983. See Eric Hammel v. Madagascar, 3 April 1987.

⁷⁷ On the merits the HRC found violations of Articles 9 and 19 and considered that the petitioner should be granted compensation under Article 9(5). After being elected deputy of Madagascar Joana was released.

⁷⁸ HRC Dave Marais v. Madagascar, 24 March 1984.

⁷⁹ HRC Lafuente Penarrieta, Rodriguez Candia, Ruiz Caceres and Toro Dorado v. Bolivia, 2 November 1987.

authorities had denied them proper medical attention and their state of health was very poor. One of them was suffering from a skull fracture, which was only attended to four months later. In October 1984 they started a hunger strike, which lasted a month. The Working Group on New Communications requested the State to inform the HRC about the state of health of the alleged victims when it transmitted the case to the State, more than a year after the first submission.⁸⁰

In 2003 the Special Rapporteur on New Communications noted that he had used what he called a ‘Pocar type’ request for information about the medical situation and medical attention of a petitioner who had requested provisional measures to release him so that he could receive medical attention.⁸¹ This remark shows that Pocar also intervened in medical situations when he was a Special Rapporteur between 1995 and 1999. Information about such cases is not yet readily available.

2.4 Ensuring access to health care in detention

2.4.1 Introduction

The HRC, the Inter-American Commission and Court, the African Commission, the (former) European Commission and the European Court have all used provisional measures in order to ensure access to health care in detention.

2.4.2 HRC

At the end of January 1978 the HRC requested the State to ensure adequate medical treatment in the aforementioned case of Altesor (1982).⁸² As noted, the previous year it had already requested information on the state of health of the alleged victim in February 1978. Around the same time as its request for positive measures in Altesor it requested such measures in Valentini de Bazzano v. Uruguay (1979) as well.⁸³ When it declared the complaint admissible it requested the State

⁸⁰ At this stage the Working Group determined that the petitioners could act on behalf of the four alleged victims who were their relatives. With regard to the other three persons, including the man who was suffering from a skull fracture, it requested the petitioners to provide written evidence of their authority to act. In April 1986 the HRC declared the case admissible in so far as it related to the relatives of the petitioners. The petitioners had not submitted evidence on their authority to act on behalf of the other three persons. At this stage the group of beneficiaries of this request for information had been reduced from seven to four persons. Initially the group of beneficiaries for the informal provisional measures was larger. Obviously, in the face of insufficient information the HRC initially took the better safe than sorry approach. Only after it had given the petitioners the opportunity to show their authority to act on behalf of these three persons it decided to declare that part of the case inadmissible for insufficient evidence. For another example of an informal provisional measure to enquire about the state of health of a detainee see Juan E. Zelaya Blanco and Myriam Zelaya Dunaway (on behalf of Roberto Zelaya who later joined) v. Nicaragua, 20 July 1994.

⁸¹ Interview by author with Special Rapporteur Scheinin, Geneva, April 2003.

⁸² HRC Altesor v. Uruguay, 29 March 1982.

⁸³ HRC Valentini de Bazzano v. Uruguay, 15 August 1979. The petitioner did not specifically request the HRC to use Rule 86 on provisional measures or request information about their health under Rule 91 and, initially, the Committee did not do so proprio motu either when it transmitted the case to the State under Rule 91. The petitioner claimed that her husband, Mr. Bazzano Ambrosini, had been tortured upon his arrest in 1975. A judge granted him conditional release after a one-year detention, but without the judge’s knowledge he had been removed from the place of detention and taken to an unknown place. Later he was once more taken to an party proprio motu to arrange for the medical examination of the petitioner's husband and stepfather and to give them 'all necessary medication and treatment if this had not already been done'.⁸⁴ One and a half years later it adopted its View, which included a reference only to the health of the petitioner's husband, not to that of the other two alleged victims. It noted that the husband 'remained imprisoned in conditions seriously detrimental to his health' and found violations of Articles 7 and 10(1) in this respect.⁸⁵ Even more remarkable than the fact that, pending the proceedings, the HRC had inquired proprio motu about the health of the petitioner's relatives, was that at the admissibility stage it also requested the State to provide all necessary treatment and medication. In other words, this encompasses more than requesting the necessary information for the conclusion of proceedings under the OP.

Teti Izquierdo v. Uruguay (1982)⁸⁶ related to a disappearance⁸⁷ and to access to medical care, entailing informal provisional measures to act rather than abstain from acting.⁸⁸ The petitioner specifically discussed the treatment of her detained brother, and enclosed, among others, the testimony of a former detainee who was released and expelled to France in April 1980:

unidentified place and confined incommunicado. In February 1977 he was charged with 'subversive association' and remained 'together with four other political prisoners in a cell measuring 4.50 by 2.50 meters in conditions seriously detrimental to his health'. With regard to her stepfather, Mr. Massera, a professor of mathematics and former Deputy to the National Assembly, she noted, among others, that he had been forced to remain standing with his head hooded for long hours. When he lost his balance he fell down and broke his leg. Since he did not immediately receive medical treatment the leg that was broken is now several centimetres shorter than the other leg. The health related complaint on behalf of her mother, Ms Valentini de Massera, was that she had been subjected to ill treatment and had suffered from inadequate diet and unhealthy working conditions.

The HRC did not mention the health of the petitioner's mother.

It gave its own summary of the facts on which it would base its views and noted that the State party had not contradicted these. It found several other violations with regard to all three of them, including of Article 10(1) for the denial to receive visits by any family member. Some of these violations might also bear a relationship with the Committee's request, pending the proceedings, about the health of the author's husband and stepfather. One was that the State had held her husband incommunicado for months in violation of Article 10(1) and another was that it was responsible for the torture of her stepfather who suffered permanent physical damage as a result, in violation of Articles 7 and 10(1). Using the general expression it would often use in subsequent findings of violations of various types the HRC considered that the State party was 'under an obligation to take immediate steps to ensure strict observance of the provisions of the Covenant and to provide effective remedies to the victims'.

⁸⁶ HRC Teti Izquierdo v. Uruguay, 24 October 1980 (Rule 91 decision), 73/1981, CCPR/C/OP/1 at 7 (1984). Teti Izquierdo v. Uruguay, 1 April 1982.

⁸⁷ See Chapter VI on intervention in disappearance cases.

⁸⁸ See also Chapter VI on (informal) provisional measures in disappearance cases. Ms. Teti Izquierdo had submitted a case on behalf of her brother Mario on 7 July 1980. She was an Uruguayan national residing in France. Her brother was detained in Uruguay. He held dual nationality, Uruguayan and Italian. She stated that he was a medical student arrested on 24 May 1972. After his arrest he was held incommunicado and tortured several times, as a result of which he suffered serious physical and psychological injury. In 1974 he attempted suicide. In 1978 he was sentenced to ten years imprisonment, a sentence that he would have served in May 1982. Because of good conduct and his advanced studies in medicine, the prison authorities had allowed him to provide medical treatment to the other prisoners. He did this for several years, earning him the esteem of his fellow prisoners.

“It was towards the end of 1979 that Major Maurino took over the post of Prison Director. He questioned Mario several times. The Major knew him already because he was the officer who had tortured him during the interrogations”.

The petitioner alleged that this Major held her brother responsible ‘for having instigated statements made by prisoners to the Red Cross Mission which visited the prisoners in the Libertad Prison in February/March 1980’. Consequently, a group of prisoners including her brother was subjected to reprisals, consisting of death threats and physical attacks. Ms. Teti alleged that in June 1980 her brother was forced to sign a statement in connection with new charges against him. In August 1980 they moved him to a punishment cell, in total isolation. The above-mentioned former detainee also testified that her brother was questioned again by the Major after the Red Cross delegation left. He ‘accused Mario of being responsible for the complaints allegedly made by the prisoners to the Red Cross that he was a torturer. Until the day I left, Mario was constantly harassed and threatened’. While this indicated ongoing threats the HRC only used informal provisional measures after it was informed of the petitioner’s disappearance.⁸⁹ Subsequently the petitioner submitted some more information about her brother’s removal from the Libertad Prison. Afterwards, ‘neither his relatives nor the international agencies nor the Italian Embassy in Uruguay had managed to see him or to obtain any definite information regarding his situation and place of detention’. It was only towards the end of May 1981, however, that he was brought back to the Libertad Prison. He had been kept incommunicado for eight months.⁹⁰ The State did not provide any of the information requested.⁹¹

⁸⁹ See also Chapter IX on death threats and harassment. Three months after her initial submission the petitioner sent a telegram informing the HRC that her brother had disappeared from Libertad prison. She expressed fear for his physical safety. Two weeks afterwards the HRC decided to use ‘informal’ provisional measures by transmitting the case while requesting information on the whereabouts and state of health of the alleged victim. There was no Special Rapporteur on New Communications yet and only the full Committee decided on such issues. About prompt decision-making see also Chapter II.

⁹⁰ A week later the petitioner expressed extreme alarm about her brother’s health. When he was moved from Libertad Prison he weighed 80 kilograms and upon his return he weighed only 60 kilograms. She was afraid that ‘if he continued to be subjected to unsatisfactory conditions of imprisonment, his health might suffer even more, to the point where his life might be in danger’. More than four months after the HRC’s request about the health and whereabouts of Teti Izquierdo, the State Party submitted that the military examining magistrate had ordered another inquiry because further evidence had appeared that would warrant new proceedings. The authorities had identified ‘new ringleaders of the “Tupamaros Extremist Movement”’. Accordingly the State pointed out he ‘was moved from Military Detention Establishment No. 1 to another Detention Establishment, with the agreement and knowledge of the competent court, for the purpose of the requisite investigation, interrogation and inquiries, and also for reasons of security, with a view to dismantling the said plan. His state of health is good’. On 6 May 1981 it stated the same.

⁹¹ See generally Chapter XVII (official responses). Ms. Teti alleged that General Rafela had revealed the new charges against her brother in a press communiqué denouncing an alleged invasion plan organised from Libertad Prison. The authorities brought several charges against her brother that they said would justify a retrial. During the time he was removed from Libertad Prison the authorities did not mention his whereabouts and he was not allowed any contact with his defence lawyer or relatives. She pointed out that the military authorities had also charged several other political prisoners who were, like her brother, close to the end of their full sentences. She mentioned as examples professor Raul Martinez and psychologist Orlando Pereira. She also noted that any ‘invasion plan’ against Libertad Prison was very unlikely given the conditions at this prison. It was one of the prisons with the most efficient security systems.

When the HRC declared the case admissible in July 1981 it not only requested the State Party to inform it (for the second time) ‘of Mario Teti’s state of health’ but also ‘to ensure that he was given suitable medical treatment’. In September 1981 the petitioner informed the HRC that her brother received an electrocardiogram upon his return to Libertad. This ‘revealed that the heart attack he had suffered in 1980 had resulted in a blockage of the left artery’. Because of his chronic asthmatic condition, she pointed out, it was very difficult to treat his cardiac disease. Apart from this, her brother was suffering from thrombophlebitis in both legs. The HRC did not intervene with regard to his health any further until its decision on the merits almost a year later when it noted that the State party should also ensure that he ‘receives promptly all necessary medical care’.

Thus the HRC intensified its request for information in its admissibility decision by asking the State to ‘ensure he was given suitable medical treatment’.⁹²

In Marais v. Madagascar (1983) the HRC also used informal provisional measures of a positive nature. It did so first in October 1981.⁹³ In its admissibility declaration the Committee reiterated its request to provide it with detailed information about the alleged victim’s state of health. ‘[W]ithout prejudging the merits of the case’, it pointed out that the State party ‘should ensure that Mr. Marais was held under humane conditions of imprisonment’ in accordance with Article 10 ICCPR.⁹⁴ On the merits the HRC found violations of Articles 7 and 10(1) and pointed out that it ‘would welcome a decision by the State party to release Mr. Marais, prior to completion of his sentence, in response to his petition for clemency’.

In Muteba v. Zaire (1990)⁹⁵ the HRC’s Working Group sought information about the alleged victim’s state of health and it specifically requested the State to ‘ensure that Tshitenge Muteba received adequate medical care’.⁹⁶ In March 1983 the full Committee confirmed this, when it declared the case admissible, it once more sought information about his state of health and requested the State to ensure he received adequate medical care.⁹⁷

⁹² See also HRC Raul Sendic Antonaccio (submitted by his wife Violeta Setelich) v. Uruguay, 28 October 1981.

⁹³ HRC Dave Marais v. Madagascar, 24 March 1984.

⁹⁴ See also Chapter VIII on ensuring procedural rights to protect the right to life and personal integrity, discussing the Committee’s informal provisional measure to ensure access to counsel.

⁹⁵ HRC Muteba v. Zaire, 24 July 1984. Nina Muteba submitted the case on 13 June 1982 on behalf of her husband who was being detained in Zaire at the time of submission. Later, her husband was able to leave for France and joined her in the submission before the HRC. In February 1982 she received a copy of a note from her husband sent to the ICRC. He explained that he had been arrested on 31 October 1981, that he had no contact with the outside world and that food was insufficient. In addition, Ms. Muteba informed the HRC that she received information from one of her brothers and from a former detainee ‘that her husband had been subjected to such severe torture that he became unrecognizable and that he continued to be held under inhuman prison conditions’. She explained that her husband could not take legal steps to address the situation locally because he ‘had never been allowed to establish contact with a lawyer or a judge’, and ‘no member of his family dared to do anything on his behalf because they were afraid of retaliation’.

⁹⁶ See also the inquiry into access to court and the ability to contact a lawyer.

⁹⁷ In March 1984 Mr. Muteba informed the Committee that he was released following an amnesty and had joined his family in France in August 1983. He submitted ‘a detailed report on his detention substantiating the allegations made by his wife and legal representative’. He was able to mention names of persons responsible for torturing him. He also referred to mock executions and the expectation by the regime that certain ‘special treatment’ would result in madness or death by torture, starvation or sickness. He alleged he was able to survive with the help of some discontented soldiers of Mobutu’s presidential guard. The HRC found violations of Articles 7 and 10(1) because he was subjected to torture and not treated ‘with humanity and the inherent dignity of the human person, in particular because he was held incommunicado for several months’.

A more recent case in which the HRC urged a State, pending the proceedings before it, to provide the alleged victim with adequate medical treatment is Polay Campos v. Peru (1997).⁹⁸ In July 1992 the authorities had transferred petitioner's husband to the Miguel Castro Castro Prison in Yanamayo, situated at an altitude of 4000 meters. In April 1993, a month after initial submission, a tribunal of faceless judges, established under special anti-terrorist legislation, sentenced him to life imprisonment. The HRC noted that it appeared from the file that he was convicted of 'aggravated terrorism'.⁹⁹ At the end of that month he was transferred to the Maximum Security Prison in the Callao Naval base in Lima. The petitioner provided the HRC with a newspaper clipping showing her husband handcuffed and locked up in a cage. She claimed that he was beaten and had received electric shocks during this transfer. He was now held 'in a subterranean cell where sunlight only penetrates for 10 minutes a day, through a small opening in the ceiling'. She also pointed out that his lawyer was himself imprisoned in June 1993, allegedly for defending her husband. The case was transmitted to the State in May 1994. At this point the Rapporteur did not yet make a request about the health situation of Polay Campos.¹⁰⁰ In June 1994 the petitioner noted that her mother-in-law had finally been able to visit her son the previous month. She described his situation as very serious. He lost about twenty kilos, was detained incommunicado and, because of the lack of sunlight (except for fifteen minutes), his vision had been seriously affected. The petitioner also noted that her mother-in-law had initiated a habeas corpus action, which she enclosed. In this appeal extreme worry was expressed about his life, health and physical and psychological integrity. This domestic appeal also noted that Vladimir Montesinos had visited him at the naval base, told him he would only leave his cell in a coffin, for which he should already arrange payment. Allegedly Montesinos also noted that once the death penalty would have been approved in the new Constitution Polay Campos would be the first to be executed.¹⁰¹

When it declared the case admissible in March 1996 (three years after the first submission), the HRC requested information not only about the operation of special tribunals under the anti-terrorist legislation but also about 'the victim's current conditions of detention'. It was at this point that it also enquired about his medical condition and urged the State to provide him with adequate medical treatment.¹⁰² Similar to the cases previously discussed, such inquiry could serve the examination of the merits. At the same time, however, it could also be seen as an act to keep the State on guard concerning any failure to ensure the right to life and humane treatment of the alleged victim pending the proceedings. The fact, finally, that the Committee not only requested

⁹⁸ HRC Polay Campos (submitted by his wife Espinoza de Polay) v. Peru, 6 November 1997. On 5 March 1993 Ms. Espinoza de Polay submitted the case on behalf of her husband who was detained in Peru. She sent her submission from France.

⁹⁹ The petitioner's husband was the leader of the Movimiento Revolucionario Túpac Amaru (MRTA).

¹⁰⁰ The Committee's View does not provide information about its transmission of the case to the State, but the file shows the Rapporteur transmitted it in May 1994, fourteen months after initial submission. Note verbale of 5 May 1994 (on file with the author).

¹⁰¹ 'Accion de habeas corpus' brought before the Superior Court of Callao, 3 June 1993, sent to the Committee on 20 June 1994 (on file with the author). General Montesinos was infamous during the Fujimori reign, for orchestrating (and participating in) torture and for fraud. See e.g. National Security Archive, a non-governmental foreign policy documentation centre at George Washington University, <<http://www.gwu.edu/~nsarchiv/NSAEBB/NSAEBB37/>> (consulted 25 August 2008).

¹⁰² The inquiry about his health consisted of a request to forward copies of the relevant reports of the ICRC delegates and of the District Attorney and doctor who had visited and examined him in December 1994. It also consisted of a request to forward reports of subsequent visits. See §6.5 of the View.

information but urged Peru to provide the alleged victim with adequate treatment, clearly establishes this case as one in which the HRC, used positive provisional measures informally, without mentioning the Rule on provisional measures.¹⁰³

In November 1997 the HRC adopted its View in this case. With regard to the victim's detention in the Miguel Castro Castro prison it found that the State had not refuted the allegation that he had been detained incommunicado, also implying he had been unable to talk to a legal representative. Another allegation the State had not refuted was that he was kept in an unlit cell for 23 and a half hours a day in freezing temperatures. The Committee concluded this amounted to a violation of Article 10(1). During the last month of the victim's stay in this prison his case was already under examination by the HRC, but it did not intervene at the time to prevent irreparable harm.

Regarding his transfer to the prison at Callao the HRC also found that the fact that the authorities displayed him to the press in a cage was a degrading treatment contrary to Articles 7 and 10(1). About his detention at Callao the HRC concluded that his total isolation for a period of a year and the restrictions on correspondence with his family violated Articles 7 and 10(1). It discussed the general conditions of detention at this prison and noted Peru's detailed information about the medical treatment 'as well as his entitlements to recreation and sanitation, personal hygiene, access to reading material and ability to correspond with relatives'. It concluded, on the other hand, that the State party had not provided any information about the claim that he continued 'to be kept in solitary confinement in a cell measuring two metres by two, and that apart from his daily recreation, he cannot see the light of day for more than 10 minutes a day'. In this respect it found violations of Articles 7 and 10(1) as well. It did not make the usual comment about the obligation to treat the detainee with the respect required under Article 10, to ensure adequate medical care and take the necessary steps to prevent any further violations. This could be explained by the fact that it had found a violation of Article 14 as well, because of his trial by a special tribunal of 'faceless judges'. In this light it considered that the victim should be released 'unless Peruvian law provides for the possibility of a fresh trial that does offer all the guarantees required by article 14 of the Covenant'.¹⁰⁴

In one case the HRC used provisional measures on behalf of a person who tried to prevent the execution of a detention order. Within a month of receipt of the initial communication Special Rapporteur Lallah contacted the Ministry of Justice of Spain on behalf of a sixty-four-year-old petitioner claiming violation of Article 14. He mentioned that the petitioner had presented a medical affidavit indicating he was suffering from cancer and other grave illnesses.¹⁰⁵ The State responded ten days later arguing, among others, that a domestic court had considered that he could receive adequate medical treatment while in detention. It summarised the situation by concluding that there appeared to be no case of irreparable harm. It also noted that once it would have received relevant medical information it would adopt the appropriate measures and that it had sent the Committee's provisional measures to the relevant judicial body.¹⁰⁶

¹⁰³ It was Prado Vallejo, member of the HRC (Ecuador) and Rapporteur in this specific case who suggested the inclusion of a formal request in the admissibility decision to the effect that the victim would receive the requisite medical attention, letter Julio Prado Vallejo to Secretariat, 2 January 1996 (on file with the author).

¹⁰⁴ See also Chapter XIII (Protection).

¹⁰⁵ HRC V. v. Spain, 495/1992 (disc. 1995), provisional measures of 22 May 1992. The telegram to the Ministry of Justice contained more information than the official Note Verbale to the Permanent Representative, but probably the other information could be found in the annexes to the Note Verbale (on file with the author).

¹⁰⁶ Letter Ministry of Justice to the Special Rapporteur, 1 June 1992 (on file with the author).

2.4.3 Inter-American system

The Inter-American Commission and Court have also taken provisional measures in detention cases involving access to health care. Moreover, during a country visit the Inter-American Commission sometimes requests certain authorities to take action in urgent cases. This approach is not unlike what the European ‘prison visiting’ Committee against torture (CPT Committee) does in urgent cases, as well the activities of UN Special Rapporteurs and other UN officials taking part in a country mission.

Occasionally the Inter-American Commission has taken precautionary measures for access to health care in detention.¹⁰⁷ In April 2001 the Commission took precautionary measures on behalf of a prisoner in Cuba. In its Annual Report the Commission quoted from the petitioners’ request for precautionary measures that ‘his health is delicate because of a tumor on his right lung’ and that the prisoner began a hunger strike in February 2001 in demand of medical care.¹⁰⁸ The Commission requested Cuba:

“(1) To transfer inmate [...] to a hospital specializing in the kind of physical ailments from which he is suffering. (2) To grant him specialized medical attention, to be administered in collaboration with a physician selected by his family”.¹⁰⁹

In February 1997 Mr. Cesti-Hurtado was detained in the Simón Bolívar barracks in Peru without contact with the outside world. He was ‘prevented from receiving food or medicines’, despite the fact that his wife had arranged with the Public Defender to bring him these herself three times a day as he was suffering from heart problems (cardiac ischemia) since 1994. The Commission’s petition before the Inter-American Court argued that this could ‘pose a threat to his life, given the tense situation to which he has been subjected’.¹¹⁰ The Commission requested the Court to order Peru to comply with a domestic habeas corpus ruling, but the President decided not to issue such urgent measures.¹¹¹ Invoking Article 5 ACHR (respect for physical, mental and moral integrity and the prohibition of cruel treatment) he nevertheless ordered urgent measures proprio motu. He concluded ‘from the content of the Commission’s request’, ‘that in reference to the state of health of Mr. Cesti Hurtado, it is necessary to request the Government of Peru to take urgent measures to ensure his physical, psychological and moral integrity by providing adequate medical treatment

¹⁰⁷ The case of Mr. Esquina Mendoza and others, in preventive detention in Sololá in Guatemala, serves as an example. In April 1998 the Commission took precautionary measures requesting Guatemala to take the necessary measures to protect their physical integrity. They were seriously ill and the poor conditions of their detention resulted in a dangerous health situation. Annual Report 1998, §24. Other examples date from October 1998 and January 1999 when the Commission requested Peru to take the necessary measures for the medical care of two gravely ill detainees. Case 11.167 of Mr. Morales Zapata. Annual Report 1998, §49 and case 12.171 of Mr. Tulich Morales, Annual Report 1999, Chapter III C.1, §48. In 2002 they were pardoned for humanitarian reasons. CIDH, Press Release 16/00, 20 October 2002, §13 (the Commission noted that it had previously adopted precautionary measures ‘pertaining to their medical care’). See also e.g. on behalf of a detainee at the Miguel Castro Castro prison (Peru), apparently suffering from diabetes and kidney disease, CIDH Annual Report 2005, Chapter III, §35 and on behalf of a detainee in Suriname apparently suffering from ‘complete occlusion of the aorta and gangrene in the lower limbs’, CIDH Annual Report 2004, chapter III, §44.

¹⁰⁸ Generally on hunger strikes see section 2.5.4 of this chapter.

¹⁰⁹ CIDH Annual Report 2001, §28. On Cuba’s response see Chapter XVII (official responses).

¹¹⁰ IACHR Cesti Hurtado (Peru), Order of the President of 29 July 1997, (having seen clause 2(f)).

¹¹¹ See further Chapter XI on provisional measures in other situations.

for his heart problems'.¹¹² In September 1997 the Inter-American Court confirmed this by ordering provisional measures to ensure the physical, psychological and moral integrity of Mr Cesti-Hurtado, in detention in Peru. It subsequently ordered Peru to maintain the provisional measures it had adopted to ensure his personal integrity and 'permit him to receive the medical treatment of his choice'. In addition, in June 1999 it ordered the State to expand the provisional measures to ensure the physical and psychological integrity of three of his family members.

The Court's discussion of Article 5 in the judgment on the merits (1999) is significant in the context of the provisional measures taken while the case was still pending. The State had declared that it has always respected the right to physical safety and that Cesti Hurtado enjoyed 'special treatment in compliance with the orders of the Court itself, is subject to medical evaluations, and has a series of amenities enjoyed by no other prisoner in Peru'.¹¹³ The Court observed 'that the substance of this alleged violation was closely connected to the objective of the provisional measures adopted in favor of Gustavo Cesti Hurtado'. Therefore, it would 'study the allegations of the parties in the light of the information contained in the State's latest reports' and the observations presented by the Inter-American Commission.¹¹⁴ Among others, it found that Peru should indeed comply with the domestic decision on habeas corpus, but also that 'based on the evidence in the proceedings', it had not been shown that the treatment received by Gustavo Cesti Hurtado during his detention has been inadequate in violation of Article 5(2) ACHR.¹¹⁵

Two months later Peru released him, but the Court decided to maintain the provisional measures for his protection and that of his family. The next year the Commission acquiesced in the State's request to lift them, noting that the victim had already been released and that it had included in its application for reparations 'a chapter on the deterioration of Mr. Cesti's health because of his imprisonment and the medical care that had been offered him'. In August 2000 the Court indeed lifted its provisional measures.¹¹⁶

2.4.4 African system

There have been several cases involving detainees, but it is not always clear whether the African Commission had taken provisional measures. The death sentences of political prisoners Orton and Vera Chirwa had been commuted due to international pressure, but they remained in prison in Malawi in extremely adverse conditions.

They had been in detention since 1981, the year when the African Charter was adopted. It is not clear when the case was first brought before the Commission, but the Commission decided to bring it to the attention of Malawi early March 1992. Orton Chirwa died in prison in October of that year. His wife was released in January 1993, 'for strictly humanitarian reasons', after a period of 12 years in prison. She later became a member of the African Commission and its Special Rapporteur on Detention. In December 1993 the Commission 'decided that the communications ¹¹² IACHR Cesti Hurtado (Peru), Order of the President of 29 July 1997, (7-9th considering clauses). See further XIII (beneficiaries) which also addresses the rights of addressees.

¹¹³ IACHR Cesti Hurtado (Peru), Judgment of 29 September 1999, §155. The State pointed out that Captain Cesti Hurtado had received 'due and adequate medical attention in the Military Hospital', where he went to the dentist and the doctor every week. All the specialized examinations that he requested for his heart condition had been carried out in the Military Hospital. It had not been possible to agree to his request to be treated in a private clinic 'because it was necessary to avoid making distinctions between prisoners', §157.

¹¹⁴ Id., §158.

¹¹⁵ Id., §160.

¹¹⁶ IACHR Cesti Hurtado (Peru), Orders of 11 September 1997, 21 January 1998, 3 June 1999, 19 November 1999 and 14 August 2000; Judgment of 29 September 1999. See also Chapter XII (other situations), referring to a follow-up request by the Commission.

gave evidence of a series of serious or massive violations of human rights in Malawi'. It resorted to the Assembly of Heads of State of the Organization of African Unity (now African Union), under Article 58 ACHPR.¹¹⁷ The official version of its decision on the merits does not mention its use of provisional measures, but in an older version mention is made of Rule 109, which used to be the rule on provisional measures.

On the other hand, in December 1993 official action regarding Malawi may indeed have been useful, but intervention to alleviate the detention situation of Orton and Vera Chirwa would have been futile, as Orton had already died in October 1992 and Vera was released in January 1993. It is possible that the Commission tried to intervene previously, but there is no public record in this regard.

In its decision on the merits, taken in 1994, the Commission found that they had been tortured and ill treated, including by a 'reduction in diet, chaining for two days of the arms and legs with no access to sanitary facilities, detention in a dark cell without access to natural light, water or food, forced nudity, and beating with sticks and iron bars'. The Commission found that these acts, jointly and separately, clearly constituted violations of Article 5 ACHPR. It also found a range of general prison conditions in violation of this article, including 'shackling of hands in the cell so that the prisoner is unable to move (sometimes during the night and day), serving of rotten food, solitary confinement, or overcrowding such that cells for 70 people are occupied by up to 200'.¹¹⁸

A known case in which the African Commission has taken provisional measures is that of Constitutional Rights Project and Others v. Nigeria.¹¹⁹ The health of the detainees involved was deteriorating and early 2005 the Commission invoked Rule 109 on provisional measures to call upon Nigeria to ensure that their health was not in danger.¹²⁰ In other detention cases, sometimes explicitly including claims of lack of access to medication and medical attention, it is again unclear whether provisional measures were used. On the merits it has found a violation of Article 5 for 'deprivation of light, insufficient food and lack of access to medicine or medical care'.¹²¹

¹¹⁷ ACHPR Amnesty International on behalf of Orton and Vera Chirwa v. Malawi, 16th session, October/November 1994, §16, referring to Rule 109 of the Rules of Procedure (on the use of provisional measures).

¹¹⁸ Id., §§33-34. The UN Working Group on Arbitrary Detention notes in Decision 13/1993 that the 'very harsh conditions of detention might have been the cause of death of Orton Chirwa'. This 'justified the Working Group's urgent appeal to the Government of Malawi concerning Chihana Chakfwa, an appeal that has unfortunately gone unanswered', E/CN.4/1994/27.

¹¹⁹ ACHPR Constitutional Rights Project and Others v. Nigeria, decided at the 26th ordinary session, 13th Annual Activity Report 2000. This was part of a range of cases involving detention: Constitutional Rights Project and Others v. Nigeria, 140/94, Decided at the 26th ordinary session, 13th Annual Activity Report and (2000) AHRLR 227; Constitutional Rights Project v. Nigeria (I), 148/96, decided at the 26th ordinary session, 13th Annual Activity Report and (2000) AHRLR; Constitutional Rights Project and Another v. Nigeria, 150/96, decided at the 26th ordinary session, 13th Annual Activity Report and (2000) AHRLR 235; Civil Liberties Organisation v. Nigeria, 151/96, decided at the 26th ordinary session, 13th Annual Activity Report and (2000) AHRLR 243.

¹²⁰ ACHPR Constitutional Rights Project and Others v. Nigeria, decided at the 26th ordinary session, 13th Annual Activity Report 2000, §17. In March 1997 it sent a Mission to Nigeria, which also took up the complaints. On the merits it found violations of Article 5 ACHPR.

¹²¹ ACHPR Civil Liberties Organisation v. Nigeria, 151/96, decided at the 26th ordinary session, November 1999, 13th Annual Activity Report and (2000) AHRLR 243, §27.

2.4.5 European system

Worth mentioning here is that already in 1957 the Commission has dealt with a request for provisional measures on account of the poor state of health of a detainee. In this case, however, the Commission simply considered itself incompetent to order provisional measures (these were not included in the Rules of Procedure at the time) and rejected the petition in this respect as incompatible with the provisions of the Convention.¹²²

Obviously, since that time provisional measures have been taken, also in the context of detention. The case of Demir et al. v. Turkey is an example in which the European Commission intervened on the basis of a request for information on the petitioners' health situation and access to medical examination, as has been the practice with the HRC.¹²³

This attention to the health situation of detainees was confirmed in subsequent cases. In Paladi v. Moldova, for instance, the European Court used provisional measures to the effect that the petitioner should not be transferred from a medical centre back to a prison hospital. The next day he was nevertheless so transferred and only a few days later was he allowed to return to the medical centre. On the merits both the fourth section and the Grand Chamber determined that a delay in the implementation of a provisional measure constituted a violation of the right of individual petition as well.¹²⁴

With regard to general conditions of detention the Court has not been keen to intervene.¹²⁵ In Ghvaladze v. Georgia, for instance, initially it refused a request for provisional measures. Nevertheless, several months later it did decide to use provisional measures. In addition it noted 'the existence of other applications before it, which it had already communicated to the respondent Government' It 'put a question to the parties asking whether there existed within the Georgian prison system an administrative practice consisting of keeping detainees in unsatisfactory conditions, and/or a structural problem underlying the lack of medical treatment in provision'. It pointed out that in that case the petitioner would be exempted from the requirement to exhaust

¹²² EComHR X. v. FRG, p. 212, Yearbook 2, pp. 204-214, 22 March 1958 (inadm.).

¹²³ It did so on 15 February 1993, on the basis of Rule 48(2a) of its Rules of Procedure. EComHR Hüseyin Demir, Faik Kaplan, Sükrü Süsin v. Turkey, Report of 29 May 1997.

¹²⁴ ECtHR Paladi v. Moldova, 10 July 2007 (referring to provisional measures of 10 November 2005) (unanimous finding of a violation of Article 3, 6-1 on a violation of Article 34, Judge Bratza dissenting). ECtHR Paladi v. Moldova (Grand Chamber) 10 March 2009 (15-2 on the violation of Article 3; 9-8 on the violation of Article 34). See also Kotsaftis v. Greece, in which provisional measures were used on 9 March 2007 requesting Greece 'to order the transfer of the applicant to a specialized medical centre so that he could undergo all the necessary tests and remain in hospital until his doctors considered that he could return to prison without his life being endangered'. On 15 March 2007 the petitioner was indeed so transferred. ECtHR Press Release 431 of 12 June 2006 on Chamber judgment in Kotsaftis v. Greece, 12 June 2008, §§4 and 32-37. On the merits the Court found that for a certain period Greece had not fulfilled its obligation to safeguard the petitioner's physical integrity, in violation of Article 3 ECHR.

¹²⁵ In the alternative it intervenes but only uses Rule 41 on priority. See e.g. Sarban v. Moldova, Fourth Section Annual Report 2005, p. 9. The judgment on the merits indicates that in January 2005 the petitioner had asked for provisional measures 'requesting his immediate release from detention on remand in order to undergo medical treatment', Sarban v. Moldova, 4 October 2005, §5. Early February the Chamber communicated the case to the State (apparently without provisional measures). Later that month the petitioner withdrew his request for provisional measures after he was given access to his doctor and wife, §5. On the merits the Court found that 'the failure to provide basic medical assistance to the applicant when he clearly needed and had requested it, as well as the refusal to allow independent specialised medical assistance, together with other forms of humiliation' amounted to degrading treatment contrary to Article 3 ECHR, §90.

domestic remedies for purposes of his complaints under Article 3 ECHR.¹²⁶ This may also mean that in this context provisional measures are taken sooner and with increased specificity, possibly also covering a larger group of detainees, as in the Inter-American system.¹²⁷ Other relevant instances of the use of provisional measures in the context of detention are discussed under section 2.5 on protecting particularly vulnerable detainees.

2.5 Protecting particularly vulnerable detainees

2.5.1 Introduction

This section provides examples of provisional measures on behalf of particularly vulnerable detainees. It discusses situations of minors and of detainees in psychological distress (e.g. mental illness). It also discusses how the Inter-American and European systems deal with the situation of detainees on a hunger strike pending the proceedings and how the HRC deals with the question of access to health care by death row inmates pending the proceedings before it.

2.5.2 Protecting the health and safety of minors in detention

Because of the vulnerability of children circumstances of detention more rapidly result in irreparable harm to children than to adults. This may explain why the HRC and the Inter-American Commission and Court have often used provisional measures on their behalf.

In most health cases examined the HRC has invoked Rule 91 (current Rule 97) rather than used provisional measures proper. It did invoke formal provisional measures in a case involving detained children.¹²⁸

In 2001-2002 the Special Rapporteur on New Communications received various requests to use provisional measures on behalf of refugees detained in Australia. In some of these cases he did indeed use them. In other cases he simply made enquiries into their health status, similar to the Committee's early practice.¹²⁹

Several news accounts have provided information about specific cases involving risk of irreparable harm.¹³⁰ A ten-year-old boy had reportedly tried to hang himself and was cut down by detention centre staff.¹³¹ A six-year-old boy reportedly stopped eating and drinking and was admitted to hospital. He was diagnosed with chronic posttraumatic stress disorder. A leaked report by the Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission noted that there was insufficient evidence that the Commonwealth had taken all appropriate measures to prevent the boy from witnessing self-harm and riots. It considered his human rights had been violated by the failure of the Department and the Minister to remove him from detention 'despite strong medical advice'.¹³² If ¹²⁶ See ECtHR Case law information note No. 100, 30 September 2007, p. 10.

¹²⁷ In general on the specificity of provisional measures and the group of beneficiaries, see Chapter XIII (Protection).

¹²⁸ See infra.

¹²⁹ Interview by author with Martin Scheinin, Maastricht 20 September 2002.

¹³⁰ An example is the denial of medication to asylum seekers taking part in a hunger strike at Woomera detention centre. They were denied medication unless they drank two glasses of milk first. This applied to a sixty-year-old schizophrenic woman as well. AAP, 'Hunger strikers denied medicine', 27 March 2003, <www.news.com.au> (consulted 9 April 2003).

¹³¹ AAP, 'Suicide bid by detention boy, 10', the Age, 20 July 2002, <www.theage.com.au> (consulted 9 April 2003).

¹³² AAP, 'Boy detainees rights breached', the Age, 9 May 2002, <www.theage.com.au> (consulted 9 April 2003).

the HRC would be involved in such cases it would be feasible that it would use provisional measures.

The case of the Bakhtiari family (2003) was brought before the HRC in March 2002. The plight of the two eldest boys received particular attention in the media.¹³³ The fourteen-year-old Almadar and twelve-year-old Mentazer Bakhtiari escaped the detention centre twice.¹³⁴ They attempted to claim political asylum at the British Consulate, but they were returned after the British Government had rejected their claim.¹³⁵

An employee of Australasian Correctional Management said that when Almadar arrived at Woomera he turned up regularly for activities and was a lively, inquisitive, 'proud and happy' child who was 'excited to be in Australia'.

"But as the months in detention passed and the family's claim for asylum turned down he seemed to lose his grip on things (...). He fell under the influence of older men who were organising the riots and hunger strikes and who themselves were committing acts of self-harm. He witnessed grown men slashing themselves and others attempting to harm themselves".¹³⁶

Initially the Special Rapporteur only used provisional measures to halt their deportation.¹³⁷ Subsequently, the petitioners provided the Committee with several reports,¹³⁸ finding that 'ongoing detention was causing deep depressive effects upon the children'. In particular these reports referred to several instances of self-harm, including where Almadar and Mentazer stitched their lips together, slashed their arms, 'voluntarily starved themselves and behaved in numerous erratic ways, including drawing disturbed pictures'. The Department of Human Services 'strongly recommended' that the children and their mother should have 'ongoing assessment outside the Woomera facility'.

Five days after receipt of these reports the Special Rapporteur used provisional measures requesting the State to 'inform the Committee within 30 days of the measures it had taken on the basis of evaluation by the State party's own expert authorities that, as a result of incidents of self harm inflicted by at least two of the children upon themselves, Mrs. Bakhtiyari and her children should have ongoing assessment outside of Woomera detention centre, in order to ensure that further such acts of harm were not suffered'.¹³⁹

In September 2002 the petitioners provided the HRC with an Assessment Report of the Department of Human Services, recommending that the children and their mother 'be released into the community in order to prevent further social and emotional harm being done to the children, especially the boys'. It was the Department of Immigration and Multicultural and Indigenous Affairs that had requested this assessment. However, the Rapporteur did not repeat the provisional measures.¹⁴⁰

¹³³ HRC Bakhtiari family v. Australia, 29 October 2003.

¹³⁴ The HRC itself did not mention that the detention centre was privately run.

¹³⁵ Almadar had told ABC radio: "In camp, we didn't learn English; we learned too many bad things (...) we learn how to cut ourselves, how to drink shampoo, how to suicide. Two times I killed myself by razor, two times I suicide me". Larissa Dubecki, Andra Jackson, 'Boys despair over return to Woomera', 20 July 2002, <www.theage.com.au> (consulted 9 April 2003).

¹³⁶ Russell Skelton, 'No happy ending in sight for two young boys', 20 July 2002, <www.theage.com.au> (consulted on 9 April 2003).

¹³⁷ See Chapter V on halting expulsion or extradition.

¹³⁸ A psychologist's report, a report of the South Australian State government's Department of Human Services and a report of an Australian Correctional Management Youth Worker.

¹³⁹ Provisional measures of 3 May 2002.

¹⁴⁰ In its submission of October 2002 the State party pointed out that the family did not cooperate with the assessment that took place in August 2002. 'Mrs Bakhtiyari did not allow the authorities

It is possible that the petitioners in the Bakhtiari case asked the HRC to request the State to release the children.¹⁴¹ In the European and the Inter-American human rights system the Commission and/or Court have indeed requested release in a few instances. Even the HRC itself has once requested a State, as a formal provisional measure, to take into account the health of one petitioner and not to execute the detention order against him while it was examining the admissibility of the case.¹⁴² It is unlikely, however, that Australian counsel would have been aware of this case because it was discontinued and the HRC does not publish information about such cases.¹⁴³

In August 2003 the Full Bench of the Family Court ordered the immediate release of all the children, pending resolution of the final application to the High Court. They were released on that day.¹⁴⁴ More than two months later the HRC published its decision on the merits. Apart from violations of Article 9 (1) and (4), it also found violations of Article 24(1) and, potentially, of Articles 17(1) and 23(1) ICCPR.

It pointed out that, under Article 24(1) ICCPR, ‘the principle that in all decisions affecting a child, its best interests shall be a primary consideration, forms an integral part of every child’s right to such measures of protection as required by his or her status as a minor’. It observed that in this case the children ‘have suffered demonstrable, documented and on-going adverse effects of detention’. It noted that this had been so until their release, that their detention had been arbitrary and in violation of Article 9(1) and that the two eldest sons had suffered in particular. Among others, the state was obliged to pay appropriate compensation to the children. The State should also refrain from deporting the children and their mother while their father was pursuing domestic proceedings, because any such action would result in violations of Articles 17(1) and 23(1) ICCPR.

Awareness of the vulnerability of children caused the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights to intervene in situations where minors (unaccompanied by their families) were detained, not segregated from adults.¹⁴⁵ The HRC has also dealt with such cases but, thus far, the only information available on the use of provisional measures in this context is in the case of Baroy v. the Philippines (inadm. 2003). The petitioner had been sentenced to death and allegedly was seventeen years old at the time of the submission of the case in January 2002. The Rapporteur used provisional measures to halt his execution and ‘further requested the State party speedily to determine the age of the author and meanwhile to treat him as a minor, in accordance with to speak to the two eldest sons, which compromised the assessment. An independent psychologist made an assessment on 2 and 3 September 2002, and made recommendations the Department is considering’.

¹⁴¹ The State reported in the press its view that the lawyers were aggravating the situation of the children. A situation such as this is not easy to assess by a non-permanent international body based in another continent.

¹⁴² HRC V. v. Spain, disc. 1995. The official Note Verbale to the State was less specific than the telegram sent to the Ministry of Justice. The latter referred to an affidavit indicating that the petitioner suffered from cancer and other grave illnesses. It also specified that this request was made for humanitarian reasons. On 1 June 1992 the Ministry of Justice responded that, according to the information it had received, there appeared to be no case of irreparable harm if the petitioner would be detained and that the State would adopt the appropriate measures once it had received the medical information. It noted that the Committee’s provisional measure was sent to the relevant judicial body for determination (on file with the author).

¹⁴³ The letter to the petitioner, moreover, referred only to Rule 91 and did not mention that the Rapporteur had used provisional measures under Rule 86 in the Note Verbale sent to the State on the same date.

¹⁴⁴ See further Chapter XVII (Official responses).

¹⁴⁵ See infra.

the provisions of the Covenant'.¹⁴⁶ The case Damian Thomas v. Jamaica (1999) was not a death penalty case. At the time of submission of the communication the petitioner was a minor.¹⁴⁷ Pending the proceedings the HRC did not use provisional measures to stop or prevent an Article 24 violation. Later it did find violations of Articles 24 and 10(2) and (3) requiring an effective remedy 'entailing his placement in a juvenile institution, separated from adult prisoners if Jamaica legislation authorises it'.¹⁴⁸ The Committee had mentioned that it had received a letter from several inmates at the General Penitentiary, requesting that it act on behalf of the petitioner. The petitioner himself had written to the Commissioner for Prisons requesting that he be removed from the General Penitentiary, an adult prison. Yet when he was moved it was to St. Catherine District Prison, again an adult prison. In a later submission the petitioner added that he had been systematically beaten by warders both at the General Penitentiary and at St. Catherine District Prison.¹⁴⁹ The petitioner had not invoked any particular articles of the Covenant, but the communication appeared to raise issues under Articles 7, 10 and 14. It is customary for the Committee, or rather its Secretariat, to indicate under which articles issues seem to arise in such complaints. In this case, however, at the merits stage, the HRC added that another article of the Covenant was at stake as well. It concluded proprio motu that the facts of the present case also constituted a violation of Article 24 of the Covenant, since the State party has failed to provide to Damian Thomas 'such measures of protection as are required by his status as a minor'. It regretted the State party's lack of cooperation with respect to the non-segregation of the petitioner from adult prisoners.¹⁵⁰

¹⁴⁶ HRC Alfredo Baroy v. the Philippines, 31 October 2003 (inadm.).

¹⁴⁷ In §1 the HRC mentions he was sixteen years old at the time, while in §6.5 it concludes he was seventeen years old.

¹⁴⁸ HRC Damian Thomas v. Jamaica, 8 April 1999 (no Rule 86).

¹⁴⁹ The HRC declared part of the claim inadmissible because of Jamaica's denunciation of the OP. This was the claim relating to ill treatment by warders on specific dates. On the merits the Committee noted that the petitioner had made precise allegations of ill treatment by warders on specific dates, about which he had complained to the prison authorities. It noted that these claims had not been refuted by the State party, which had promised to investigate these but had failed to forward its findings to the Committee, eleven months after promising to do so and in spite of a reminder by the HRC. It recalled that a State party is under the obligation to investigate seriously allegations of violations of the Covenant made under the OP. In this case, however, the Committee considered the claims inadmissible under Article 1 of the OP since the allegations were transmitted to the State party after Jamaica's denunciation of the OP came into force on 23 January 1998. Committee member Solari Yrigoyen dissented. He would have concluded a violation of Articles 10(1) and 7 in relation to the treatment suffered by the petitioner. He stated that although the State party denounced the OP, the events described in the complaint occurred before that date and were handled in the same manner as the original complaint. For this reason, he argued, the terms of the OP continued to apply to the communication. At the same time the HRC did declare admissible the remainder of the claim, which had been transmitted to the State party before Jamaica's denunciation of the OP came into force. See §6.4. The HRC referred to the State party's contention that the circumstances under which the author was being held were not clear and observed that 'given the name, date of birth, date of arrest and of conviction and the location in 1998 in St. Catherine District Prison, all in relation to the author, the State party should have no difficulty in identifying the details relevant to this matter'.

¹⁵⁰ The petitioner was entitled to an effective remedy for the violation of Articles 10(2) and (3) and 24 'entailing his placement in a juvenile institution, separated from adult prisoners if Jamaican legislation authorises it'. This remedy, moreover, was to include compensation for his non-segregation from adult prisoners while he was a minor. One may wonder what the remedy may entail when Jamaican legislation does not authorise separation from adult prisoners.

It would be interesting to know whether, if the possibility of a violation of Article 24 had been mentioned at an earlier stage, the Special Rapporteur on New Communications would have taken provisional measures in order to prevent a 'further violation of Art. 24', especially when there are allegations of abuse or threats by adults. The HRC could have intervened for the petitioner's protection and requested his segregation from adult prisoners and treatment appropriate to his age and legal status. If the rationale of Article 24 is to protect minors from abuse by adult prisoners, in that way it is also a means to prevent torture and cruel treatment.

In the Inter-American human rights system, the Commission and Court have indeed intervened in an increasing number of cases in order to ensure segregation of minors from adults or, more generally, to prevent irreparable harm.¹⁵¹

In one early case against Paraguay the beneficiaries were 255 minors who had been held at the Panchito López re-education centre for minors. After a fire had broken out in which nine minors died, the Commission used precautionary measures and the minors were transferred.¹⁵²

One case involving Honduras has generated information that may be useful to clarify the meaning of the Commission's precautionary measures on behalf of minors in detention. In 1995 the Commission dealt with a case against Honduras alleging the unlawful arrest of street children and their incarceration in the Central Penitentiary of Tegucigalpa. These children were detained together with in each cell approximately 80 adult prisoners. One of the NGOs that brought the case noted that it was 'of great interest because of the international and national media coverage it has received'. 'This case is representative of an urgent situation wherein minors suffer serious mistreatment in detention centres, including sexual abuse and torture. Children have also been killed in detention centres meant for adults'.¹⁵³ Nine days after the initial submission the petitioners urgently requested the Commission to adopt precautionary measures to guarantee the life and physical safety of the juveniles held in that prison and 'to ensure that they were housed in facilities that were appropriate to their status'. The petitioners requested that the juveniles be separated from the adult prisoners. The State should provide medical and psychological treatment to juveniles who had been the victims of physical, sexual and psychological abuse and that it should take the necessary security measures to guarantee the lives and safety of the juveniles detained in the Central Penitentiary.¹⁵⁴ In response, the State noted that it was under enormous economic con-

¹⁵¹ For precautionary measures by the Inter-American Commission see e.g. Annual Report 1996, Chapter II, §4a (Minors in detention v. Brazil); Annual Report 2001, §48 (255 minors in detention v. Paraguay); Annual Report 2004, §36 (62 children held in the Juvenile Center of Provisional Confinement v. Guatemala); Annual Report 2004, §14 (Children confined in the State Foundation for the Well-being of Children v. Brazil).

¹⁵² During the fire a guard shot one youngster, who later died. On 8 August 2001 the Commission took precautionary measures. See Instituto "Coronel Panchito López", case 11.666. Subsequently the Court became involved as well. IACHR "Instituto de Reeducción del Menor" (Paraguay), Judgment of 2 September 2004.

¹⁵³ CEJIL case docket 1997 referring to street children detained with adults at the Central Penitentiary of Tegucigalpa (Honduras). See also Chapter XVII (Official responses).

¹⁵⁴ According to CEJIL's own case docket this case began with a petition for precautionary measures in February 1995, while the Commission's final report mentions 13 April 1995 as the day the petition itself was submitted and 22 May 1995 as the day on which the petitioners requested precautionary measures. The Commission notes that this request was amplified on 6 June 1996 to include three children in the Choloteca jail and 34 children in the San Pedro Sula Prison. CIDH Minors in detention v. Honduras, 10 March 1999 (merits), §49. While the phrasing is unclear, the context leads one to conclude that the Commission indeed used the precautionary measures requested and later amplified them. Literally, the Commission reports that the petitioners' request was amplified.

straints but was making ‘supreme efforts’ to comply with international obligations.¹⁵⁵ It pointed out the alarming rate of juvenile felonies.¹⁵⁶

On the basis of Article 29 ACHR (on interpretation) and the consistent practice of the Commission and Court, the Commission combined the regional and the universal human rights systems to interpret the Convention. It pointed out that other international instruments contained even more specific rules with regard to the protection of children. The Commission concluded that the practice of incarcerating minors in adult penal institutions, thereby endangering their physical, mental and moral health, was indeed a violation of Article 19 ACHR. It pointed out that the obligation to provide special protection for children was a non-derogable obligation under Article 27(2) ACHR. It also referred more generally to the non-derogable rights of the child.¹⁵⁷

The Commission pointed out that the State’s duty to house minors and adults in separate detention facilities was based on Article 5(5) jo. Article 19 ACHR. It also noted that the ‘essential aim of reform and social rehabilitation of prisoners’ under Article 5(6) was ‘absolutely impossible to achieve in penal institutions in which children are forced to live alongside adult criminals’. It then continued discussing the obligations under Article 5(1) (right to respect for physical, mental and moral integrity) and 5(2) (prohibition of torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment or treatment and the right of all person deprived of their liberty to be treated with respect for their inherent dignity). It considered that ‘the cohabitation of juvenile and adult inmates is a violation of the human dignity of these minors and has led to abuses of the juveniles’ personal integrity. The physical superiority of the adult inmates enables them to force themselves upon the juveniles and abuse them’.¹⁵⁸ In conclusion Honduras had violated the ‘special right of minors’ to have their physical, moral and mental integrity respected. It had subjected the juveniles in question to inhuman and degrading treatment and had failed to take the necessary steps to prevent adult inmates from physically and sexually assaulting or abusing the juvenile inmates.¹⁵⁹

¹⁵⁵ In this case they had alleged that the situation of the children violated the international law relating to the detention of minors including Articles 5, 7, 19 and 29(b) ACHR, Articles 7 and 10(b) ICCPR, Articles 3(1), 19(1) and 37 Convention on the Rights of the Child and Article 13(4) of the UN Standard Minimum Rules for the Administration of Juvenile Justice (Beijing Rules).

¹⁵⁶ More generally on official State responses see Chapter XVII.

¹⁵⁷ CIDH Minors in detention v. Honduras, 10 March 1999, §98.

¹⁵⁸ The Commission mentioned as evidence the reports represented by the petitioners, several newspaper articles with statements by judges and prosecutors (included in the Commission’s merits report) and the statements of the juveniles themselves. It pointed out that the acts or omissions by prison, police and judicial officials in relation to the allegations were directly imputable to the State. CIDH Minors in detention v. Honduras, 10 March 1999, §125-130. It also referred to statements made to the press by a Supreme Court justice. These confirmed that the authorities were aware of the fact that juveniles were being raped in the Central Penitentiary but nevertheless transferred them (upon the discovery of one particular case of rape) to another cell occupied by adults, ‘where they would continue to face similar risks’. Minors in detention v. Honduras, 10 March 1999, §133.

¹⁵⁹ In its decision declaring admissible a complaint against Peru on the detention of juveniles, the Commission made no mention of precautionary measures. The complaint concerned insufficient separation from adult detainees, inadequate conditions of detention and lack of regular access to health care. In this case, however, the complaint was only brought after the youths had already left the detention facility complained of). CIDH Leoncio Florian López et al. v. Peru, 3 October 2000 (adm.). With regard to Paraguay the Tekojoja Foundation and CEJIL petitioned the Commission, on 14 August 1996, alleging adverse prison conditions and ‘extreme physical and psychological violence’ to which children and young people were subjected in the Panchito López Penitentiary for minors. Previously, the Tekojoja Foundation had brought a habeas corpus proceeding before the courts in Paraguay with the aim to stop the detention of minors in that penitentiary. They had provided evidence of the uninhabitable conditions of this penitentiary and

The Inter-American Court ordered Brazil, among others, to protect the lives and personal integrity of those minors detained in a detention centre in Brazil as well as others present, in particular to prevent further violent outbursts, to guarantee safety, maintain order and prevent cruel treatment. Moreover, the State should take the necessary measures to reduce overcrowding, confiscate any arms, separate the detainees in accordance with the relevant international standards and keeping in mind the best interests of the child, provide the necessary medical care, periodically monitor the detention conditions and the physical and moral conditions of the children detained.¹⁶⁰ It has pointed out that ‘problems relating to detention centers require medium and long-term actions to adapt their conditions to the corresponding international standards’. Yet States also have the obligation to take immediate action in order to ‘guarantee the physical, mental and moral integrity of the inmates, as well as their right to life and their right to enjoy the minimum conditions for a decent life, especially in the case of children, who require special attention from the State’.¹⁶¹ It specified that the measures to be adopted based on its Order for provisional measures must be adopted ‘immediately and effectively’.¹⁶² On the other hand, ‘the analysis of the effectiveness of the investigations and proceedings relating to the facts that gave rise to these provisional measures’ corresponded to the examination of the merits of the case, which was pending before the Commission.¹⁶³ In other words, while the State was expected to investigate the facts as part of the provisional measures, in order to prevent (further) irreparable harm, it would not analyse the effectiveness of the measures undertaken by the State in this respect, as this was reserved for the merits.¹⁶⁴

In its Orders for provisional measures the Inter-American Court has also included general statements on existing law, such as that ‘as a consequence of its positive obligation to protect the right to life and physical integrity, the State has the duty to prevent that individuals under its custody be subject to conditions such as overcrowding’.¹⁶⁵ It has observed that, together with the the degrading treatment to which the minors were subjected. This included overcrowded conditions, continuous violence and malnourishment, a lack of beds or mattresses and insufficient basic medical attention. The Supreme Court of Paraguay, however, ‘paralyzed’ the case, which prompted the Foundation and CEJIL to bring a complaint before the Commission. CEJIL case docket 1997 (on file with the author). Apparently, the petitioners did not request and the Commission did not take precautionary measures.

¹⁶⁰ IACHR Case of the children and adolescents deprived of their liberty in the ‘Complexo do Tataupé’ of FEBEM (Brazil), Orders of 17 and 30 November 2005. Attached to the 17 November Order is a Concurring Opinion by Judge Cançado Trindade criticizing the long period of adverse detention circumstances before the Commission finally resorted to the Court for provisional measures. See also IACHR Jorge Castañeda Gutman (Mexico), Order of 25 November 2005, Concurring Opinion by Judges Cançado Trindade and Ventura Robles, §§4 and 8.

¹⁶¹ See e.g. IACHR Matter of Yare I and Yare II Capital Region Penitentiary Center, Order of 30 March 2006, 17th ‘Considering’ clause; Matter of the Monagas Judicial Detention Center (‘La Pica’), 9 February 2006, 19th ‘Considering’ clause; Matter of the Children Deprived of liberty in the “Complexo do Tataupé” of FEBEM, Order of 4 July 2006, 12th ‘Considering’ clause and Order of 3 July 2007, 10th ‘Considering’ clause.

¹⁶² IACHR Matter of the Children Deprived of liberty in the “Complexo do Tataupé” of FEBEM, Order of 3 July 2007, 11th ‘Considering’ clause.

¹⁶³ Id., 12th ‘Considering’ clause and 7th ‘Decisional’ clause.

¹⁶⁴ See also Chapter XIII (Protection).

¹⁶⁵ IACHR Matter of the persons imprisoned in the “Dr. Sebastião Martins Silveira” Penitentiary in Araraquara, São Paulo (Brazil), Order of 30 September 2006, 15th ‘Considering’ clause. See also IACHR Las penitentiarias de Mendoza (Argentina), Order of 22 November 2004. Here the Court noted that in light of the relation between the conditions of detention and the right to life and personal integrity it was possible to protect detainees thorough its provisional measures, 11th ‘Considering’ clause.

precarious detention situation in a case and the State's failed 'duty to divide inmates into different categories', these circumstances 'may give rise to violent events (...) and might cause an immediate loss of lives and generalized attacks affecting the inmates' personal integrity'.¹⁶⁶ After all the State's obligation to protect in the detention context extends to the protection against threats and harassment originating from third parties, like other detainees.¹⁶⁷ "Given the characteristics of the detention centers, the State must protect prisoners from violent acts which, if there is no State control, might take place among the detainees".¹⁶⁸ In this light the Court has stressed that 'the acts of the state security officers, specially those aimed at keeping order', or at the referral from one detention centre to the other, 'must be carried out strictly respecting the human rights of the prisoners and preventing unduly violent acts'.¹⁶⁹

2.5.3 (Method of) confinement and protecting detainees in psychological distress

Precautionary and provisional measures may also be warranted because of the specific vulnerability of people for reasons other than their age.¹⁷⁰ In December 1994 a petitioner requested the Inter-American Commission to intervene on behalf of an Argentine citizen detained in Bolivia. She had been arrested for possession and transportation of cocaine. Despite her long and documented medical history of mental illness the Bolivian authorities detained her at a women's prison facility lacking the capability to provide the special treatment required by her condition. During this detention she was raped several times. The Bolivian judiciary refused to transfer her to a specialised psychiatric facility. While it is not clear whether the Commission took the precautionary measures requested to safeguard her physical integrity, it did start an investigation in loco.¹⁷¹ In February 1995 a domestic court acquitted her because of mental incompetence. Yet she remained in detention awaiting fulfilment of procedural requirements. According to CEJIL she was transferred from the women's prison to a psychiatric facility as a result of pressure from international groups and eventually could return home to the care of her family.¹⁷²

In Cesti Hurtado the Commission requested the Inter-American Court twice to order Peru to release Mr. Cesti. The Court did not do this as this would constitute an anticipation of the merits of the case.¹⁷³ Instead it noted that 'the President of this Court, in his Order, instructed the State of Peru to adopt urgent measures by providing Mr. Cesti-Hurtado with proper medical treatment for ¹⁶⁶ IACHR Matter of the persons imprisoned in the "Dr. Sebastião Martins Silveira" Penitentiary in Araraquara, São Paulo (Brazil), Order of 30 September 2006, 15th 'Considering' clause.

¹⁶⁷ IACHR Las penitenciarías de Mendoza (Argentina), Order of 22 November 2004, 12th considering clause.

¹⁶⁸ IACHR Matter of the persons imprisoned in the "Dr. Sebastião Martins Silveira" Penitentiary in Araraquara, São Paulo (Brazil), Order of 30 September 2006, 16th 'Considering' clause.

¹⁶⁹ Id., referring to Matter of Yare I y Yare II Capital Region Penitentiary Center, Order of 30 March 2006, 14th 'Considering' clause; Matter of Monagas Judicial Confinement Center ('La Pica'), Order of 9 February 2006, 16th 'Considering' clause and Matter of Children Deprived of Liberty in the "Complejo do Tatuapé" of FEBEM, Order of 17 November 2005, 14th 'Considering' clause.

¹⁷⁰ See e.g. CIDH Jorge Bernal, Julio César Rotela and 458 patients of the Neuro-psychiatric Hospital v. Paraguay, Annual Report 2003, §60.

¹⁷¹ SERPAJ, a human rights organization from her home country (Argentina), initially submitted the request and was subsequently supported by CEJIL.

¹⁷² CEJIL case docket 1997.

¹⁷³ See IACHR Cesti Hurtado (Peru), Order of the President, 29 July 1997, 5th and 6th 'Considering' clauses and Order of the Court of 11 September 1997, 5th 'Considering' clause.

his heart disease, with a view to protecting his physical, psychological and moral integrity. The Court ratifies that order and decides to maintain those measures'.¹⁷⁴

A famous early detention case dealt with by the Inter-American Court is that of María Elena Loayza Tamayo, who was serving a 20-year prison sentence. Pending the case the Court had ordered Peru to take 'all provisional measures necessary for the effective safeguard of her physical, psychological and moral integrity'.¹⁷⁵ In light of the danger to her physical, psychological and moral health, it ordered Peru to modify her prison conditions, in particular with regard to her solitary confinement. It also expected Peru to provide her with medical treatment, both physical and psychiatric, without delay. On the merits the Court found, among others, that Peru had violated her right to humane treatment, as recognized in Article 5 jo. 1(1) ACHR.¹⁷⁶

In Patanè v. Italy (1986) the European Commission took provisional measures on behalf of a petitioner serving a five year prison sentence 'who was suffering from a severe state of depression and whose health was, according to medical certificates submitted, continuously deteriorating to the point where there existed an acute threat to her life'.¹⁷⁷

In Keenan v. UK (2001) a mentally ill detainee had committed suicide in detention. His mother complained of failure by the detention authorities to protect his life. While the ECtHR considered that there had indeed been a particular risk of suicide in this case, of which the authorities could have been aware, it did not find a violation of the right to life in this case. It did, however, find that the treatment of the detainee had violated the prohibition of cruel treatment.¹⁷⁸

¹⁷⁴ IACHR Cesti Hurtado (Peru), Order of the Court of 11 September 1997, 6th 'Considering' clause. Subsequently the Commission brought the case before the Court on the merits and again requested provisional measures for the provisional release of Mr Cesti. Once more the Court denied this, Order of 29 January 1998, calling upon Peru 'to permit Mr. Cesti Hurtado to receive the medical treatment of his choice', 2nd 'Decisional' clause. On 3 June 1999 the Court expanded its provisional measures to protect his family against threats and harassment. Shortly upon Cesti's release, on 11 November 1999, the Court decided to maintain its provisional measures for the protection of Cesti and his family. By Order of 14 August 2000 it lifted its provisional measures. See further the Court's decisions on the merits and reparations: Judgment on the merits, 29 September 1999, Interpretation of judgment of 29 January 2000; Judgment on Reparations of 21 May 2001 and Interpretation of that judgment of 27 November 2001; Resolution on Compliance of 17 November 2004 (continuing supervision of compliance) and Order by the President of 21 December 2005 (denying renewed request for provisional measures aimed at ensuring compliance with the Court's judgments).

¹⁷⁵ IACHR Loayza Tamayo (Peru), Orders for provisional measures of 2 July and 13 September 1996. Clearly provisional measures taken in the context of incommunicado detention could also help prevent disappearances and torture. Ms Loayza was released on 16 October 1997. On 11 November 1997 the Court ordered the provisional measures closed. In 2000 the Court ordered provisional measures on her behalf again, but this time relating to her socioeconomic circumstances: 13 December 2000 (President) and 3 February 2001. In 2001 (28 August 2001) these were lifted on request of the State (see also Chapter XII on provisional measures in other situations).

¹⁷⁶ IACHR Loayza Tamayo (Peru), Judgment of 17 September 1997.

¹⁷⁷ While the Commission had not specified its provisional measures of 15 October 1985 and the State decided to release the petitioner, who subsequently disappeared. EComHR Patanè v. Italy, 3 December 1986 (struck out). See more generally Chapter XIII (Protection) and XVII (Official responses). See also, in a different factual situation involving a risk of suicide and a possible transfer to communist East-Germany, 27 May 1974, Brückmann v. FRG, EuRGZ 1974, p. 113 and 1976, p. 451.

¹⁷⁸ ECtHR Keenan v. UK, 3 April 2001.

In a situation similar to that occurring in Keenan it is feasible that a petitioner, having exhausted domestic remedies, would request the intervention of the ECtHR.¹⁷⁹

Indeed in more recent cases the Court had used provisional measures to protect detainees in psychological distress. In Prezec v. Croatia (2008), the ECtHR had used provisional measures in September 2007, ordering the State to provide a prisoner with the requisite psychiatric treatment. In response, in January 2008 the State carried out a psychiatric examination. “The report drawn up on 15 January 2008 concluded that the applicant suffered from a personality disorder and was in need of an active, permanent and differential psychiatric treatment”. In March 2008 he was placed in a psychiatric hospital with a treatment programme specifically designed for him. It includes ‘compulsory psychiatric treatment of the applicant in the Zagreb Prison Hospital, consisting of intensive psychiatric treatment in small groups and therapeutic communities, organised art and computer workshops as part of the applicant’s therapy and his preparation for the return to the normal life’. The treatment was to last until his release.¹⁸⁰

In some other contexts requests for provisional measures have remained unsuccessful. In Lorsé et al. v. The Netherlands (2003)¹⁸¹ counsel had requested the ECtHR to take provisional measures to the effect that Lorsé would be immediately transferred from the maximum security prison (EBI) in Vught to an ordinary prison. Alternatively the Court was requested to take provisional measures of a more general nature, namely those ‘necessary to put an end to the continuing violation of Article 3 of the Convention’.¹⁸² The President of the first section decided not to take any provisional measures.¹⁸³

Counsel for the petitioner had noted that the request for provisional measures was made in light of the physical and mental situation of the petitioners.¹⁸⁴ A letter by the Secretariat responding to the request for provisional measures informed counsel for the petitioner ‘that such a request can normally be acceded to only if there is imminent danger of harm that cannot subsequently be remedied or made good, as can be the case, in particular, if the applicant is in danger of being expelled or deported’.¹⁸⁵ Subsequently the Court examined the request and informed counsel officially that it had decided ‘not to indicate to the Government the measure you suggest’.¹⁸⁶

In earlier cases the ECtHR had held that ‘complete sensory isolation, coupled with total social isolation, can destroy the personality and constitutes a form of inhuman treatment which cannot be justified by the requirements of security or any other reason’.¹⁸⁷

¹⁷⁹ See also e.g. ECtHR Dybeku v. Albania, 18 December 2007.

¹⁸⁰ ECtHR Prezec v. Croatia, 28 August 2008 (struck out after friendly settlement).

¹⁸¹ ECtHR Lorsé et al. v. The Netherlands, judgment of 4 February 2003 (former first section). See also Van der Ven v. The Netherlands, judgment of 4 February 2003 (former first section).

¹⁸² ECtHR Lorsé et al. v. The Netherlands, letter of 19 November 1999 (on file with the author).

¹⁸³ ECtHR Lorsé et al. v. The Netherlands, 18 January 2000 (adm.).

¹⁸⁴ A recent domestic decision had had a profound psychological impact on him and he was on hunger strike since 15 November 1999. ECtHR Lorsé et al. v. The Netherlands, initial petition of 19 November 1999 (on file with the author). The Court did not further discuss the petitioner’s hunger strike. Its description of the facts in admissibility decision of 18 January 2000 briefly notes that he began a hunger strike on 17 November 1999.

¹⁸⁵ ECtHR Lorsé et al. v. The Netherlands, letter by the Secretariat of 19 November 1999 (on file with the author).

¹⁸⁶ ECtHR Lorsé et al. v. The Netherlands, letter by Registrar section 1, 30 November 1999 (on file with the author).

¹⁸⁷ See e.g. ECtHR Messina v. Italy, 8 June 1999 (inadm. as to the conditions of detention claim), 1st ‘As to the law’ clause (10th paragraph).

“On the other hand, the removal from association with other prisoners for security, disciplinary or protective reasons does not in itself amount to inhuman treatment or degrading punishment”.¹⁸⁸

In January 2000 the first section began its examination of the admissibility of the Lorsé case. It did decide to give it priority under Rule 41.¹⁸⁹ The admissibility decision indicates that the President of the first section decided not to take provisional measures.

On the merits the Court did not find that the petitioner was subjected to sensory isolation or total isolation. In fact, it noted, that the Italian special regime in an earlier case ‘was significantly more restrictive’.

It found that the combination of the routine strip-searching and the other security measures amounted to inhuman or degrading treatment in violation of Article 3. It considered ‘that in the situation where Mr Lorsé was already subjected to a great number of control measures, and in the absence of convincing security needs, the practice of weekly strip-searches that was applied to Mr Lorsé for a period for more than six years diminished his human dignity and must have given rise to feelings of anguish and inferiority capable of humiliating and debasing him’.

The judgment on the merits does not refer to the request for provisional measures and the admissibility decision only notes that the President decided not to take them. It might be feasible, in future, to use provisional measures to halt such strip-searches that are performed routinely even on those occasions in which the petitioner has not been in contact with the outside world.

2.5.4 Protecting detainees on a hunger strike

In the Inter-American and European systems provisional measures have also been requested by or on behalf of detainees on a hunger strike.¹⁹⁰ The protection requested may still have been improvement of prison conditions or investigation of specific mistreatment.

There are some examples in which the Inter-American Commission took precautionary measures in hunger strike cases.¹⁹¹ It has, for instance, intervened on behalf of a prisoner in Cuba who had a tumor on his lung. Two months previously he had begun a hunger strike demanding medical care.¹⁹²

It is not always clear what role is played by the hunger strike, but it seems unlikely that the Inter-American Commission admonishes the beneficiaries of the precautionary measures to end their hunger strike, as the European Commission and Court have done in the past.¹⁹³

In December 2000 the Commission took precautionary measures on behalf of the petitioners in the case of Juan Carlos Abella v. Argentina,¹⁹⁴ or the La Tablada case, on which it had made public its final Report three years before. The precautionary measures involved twenty of the eleven persons whose right to humane treatment the Commission had found violated in 1997.

¹⁸⁸ Ibid.

¹⁸⁹ ECtHR Lorsé et al. v. The Netherlands, letter by Registrar section 1, received 25 January 2000 (on file with the author).

¹⁹⁰ See also Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4.2, on beneficiaries and addressees (under the heading ‘the petitioner as addressee’) and Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk), section 3.2.5 on health in detention and assessment of risk.

¹⁹¹ See e.g. CIDH precautionary measures of 16 December 1998 on behalf of María Emilia de Marchi (Brazil), case 12.002, Annual Report 1998, §14 and on 27 December 2000 on behalf of eleven detainees in case 11.137 (Argentina), Annual Report 2000, §9; See also Chapter XIII (Protection, discussing beneficiaries and addressees in section 4).

¹⁹² CIDH Annual Report 2001, §28.

¹⁹³ See also Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4.

¹⁹⁴ CIDH Juan Carlos Abella et al. v. Argentina (La Tablada case), 18 November 1997.

With regard to these eleven persons the Commission had also found violations of the right to appeal their conviction to a higher court and the right to a simple and effective remedy. It had recommended Argentina to ‘take the most appropriate measures to repair the harm suffered’ by them.¹⁹⁵ Yet apparently, they were still imprisoned in December 2000. They were in an advanced stage of a hunger strike and the issue became very important in Argentina. The Commission initiated a follow-up in this case.¹⁹⁶ Given the urgency of the situation (some of them might die) the Commission took precautionary measures asking the government to act and resolve the situation so that the detainees would abandon their hunger strike. In its Annual Report 2000 the Commission notes that both Argentina and the petitioners later informed it that the State had taken measures leading them to stop the hunger strike.¹⁹⁷ In a press release of 11 December 2000 the Commission had already noted it issued the following precautionary measure to Argentina: “The immediate adoption of the necessary measures to implement fully the recommendation of Report 55/97”. It reproduced these recommendations and noted that, in the past three years, it had repeatedly taken steps to ensure their implementation, including visiting Argentina and holding three follow-up hearings. It pointed out that the persons involved had been on a hunger strike than 90 days, reportedly because of the non-implementation of the Commission’s recommendation. “Although the Commission is not in favor of a hunger strike that compromises the health and threatens the lives of the persons involved, it believes that the way to resolve this grave situation is to implement the recommendations fully and without further delay”.¹⁹⁸ This was the first case where the Commission used precautionary measures as part of a follow-up of a case that ended three years previously. It shows an approach to the use of these measures that is integrated in the Commission’s other activities and takes into account the other obligations of the State as previously established.

Thus, with regard to the addressees of the its precautionary measures in cases involving hunger strikes it is relevant to note that the Inter-American Commission is not in the habit of telling detainees to give up a hunger strike. In the Tablada case such ‘order’ clearly would have been awkward as the prisoners started their hunger strike because Argentina was not following the Commission’s recommendations that had been based on its findings of violations.

The approach is quite different in the European system. In April 1981 one of the sisters of Robert (Bobby) Sands, MP, urgently contacted the European Commission on his behalf. He was in the 54th day of a hunger-strike ‘which he had no choice but to undertake as a more conventional domestic remedy was not open to him to protest against prison conditions which he regarded as intolerable’. She stated that her brother’s life was in danger. His state of health was ‘such that he is unable himself to make an application directly’. In addition she requested an immediate fact-finding investigation. The Acting President of the Commission took provisional measures, ‘in view of the urgency of the situation’. He requested the State ‘to take the necessary steps to enable a Delegation from the Commission’ to meet with her brother in prison in order to find out whether he indeed intended to make the petition and, if so, to further discuss the substance and proceed-

¹⁹⁵ Id. In §115 the Commission notes that on 14 May 1993 the petitioners had requested it to visit the prisons to verify the status of the prisoners involved as they considered that the lives of these prisoners were in danger. The Commission does not provide information on its reaction to this request.

¹⁹⁶ In Rule 46 of its Rules of Procedure (2000) the Commission has ratified its practice on follow-up and compliance with its recommendations in cases not referred to the Court.

¹⁹⁷ CIDH Annual Report 2000, §9.

¹⁹⁸ CIDH ‘Inter-American Commission on Human Rights Requests Precautionary Measures in the “La Tablada” Case’, Press Release 20/00, 11 December 2000, <www.cidh.oas.org/comunicados/english/2000/Press20-00.htm>. The Commission’s Annual Report 2000 notes that the Commission took precautionary measures on 27 December 2000, while the press release announcing these measures is from 11 December.

ings.¹⁹⁹ This was an atypical provisional measure. It could be considered to aim at the safeguarding of the evidence.²⁰⁰ Yet, the urgency of the situation related to the fact that the life of a possible petitioner was at risk. The Commission meant to ascertain whether Bobby Sands himself agreed with the petition filed by his sister. Meanwhile his life was at risk and the claims involved Articles 2 and 3.

The next day a Delegation of the Commission consisting of the Acting President, Mr Nørsgaard and Mr Opsahl indeed travelled to London for discussions with officials from the Northern-Ireland Office. On 25 April the delegation travelled to Belfast to visit the Maze Prison. The prison doctor informed them that Bobby Sands was 'lucid and capable of following events' but 'physically very weak'. They also spoke with Marcella Sands and her solicitor and with another prisoner. In the end, however, they did not speak with Sands himself. Through the intermediary of his sister's counsel it was established 'that he did not wish to associate himself' with the petition.²⁰¹ Bobby Sands died from the effects of his hunger-strike on 5 May 1981. On the basis of the information provided by the Delegates the Commission considered that his state of health did not prevent him from validly indicating his wish not to be associated with the petition and understanding the implications. It struck out the case.²⁰²

The European Commission and Court have responded to requests for provisional measures by detainees on a hunger strike by invoking its Rule on such measures vis-à-vis the petitioner instead in order for them to stop their hunger strike.²⁰³

More recently, the ECtHR has used provisional measures to halt re-imprisonment of petitioners who had been hospitalized because of the after-effects of long-term hunger-strikes.²⁰⁴

¹⁹⁹ EComHR Marcella Sands and Robert Sands v. the UK, 14 October 1981 (struck out).

²⁰⁰ See also Chapter XII (Other situations).

²⁰¹ See further Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4 on beneficiaries.

²⁰² EComHR Marcella Sands and Robert Sands v. the UK, 14 October 1981 (struck out).

²⁰³ See EComHR S., R., A. and C. v. Portugal, 15 March 1984 (inadm.); Vakalis v. Greece (petitioner was in deteriorating health resulting from hunger strike; the provisional measure of 3 April 1992 did not aim for his release, but it did address both the State and the petitioner), 15 January 1993 (struck from the role upon release) and Ilijkov v. Bulgaria (complaint about continue pre-trial detention and the conditions in which he was force-fed; provisional measure of 20 October 1997 only to the petitioner to stop his hunger strike; Article 31 Report of 29 October 1998; Judgment of 26 July 2001). The Court has confirmed the Commission's approach, see e.g. ECtHR Ilaşcu and others v. Moldova and Russia, 8 July 2004, §11 and ECtHR Taner Tanyeri et al. v. Turkey, 6 December 2005 (struck out). In May and June 2001 the three petitioners in this case started a hunger strike protesting their solitary confinement in so-called F-type prison cells in Turkey. In August they applied to the Court for provisional measures under Rule 39 requesting the Court to order that their detention in these F-type prison cells cease. A month later the President of the Chamber notified the Government of the respondent Party of the introduction of the application under Rule 40 of the Rules of Court and 'invited the applicants, under Rule 39 of the Rules of Court, to discontinue their hunger strike'. In May 2002 the Court was informed by the representative of the petitioners that they had suspended their hunger strike and that they had been released from detention. See also Rodić et al. v. Bosnia and Herzegovina, 27 May 2008. On 24 June one of the petitioners and on 29 June 2005 the other three were 'invited' under Rule 39 to end their hunger strike; they did so on 1 July 2005; on 13 September 2005 the case was granted priority under Rule 41, see §4. See further Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4.

²⁰⁴ See Press release ECtHR 412, 'Fact-finding mission to Turkey in hunger-strike cases', 6 September 2004, referring to this case and '52 other cases'. A report by the Human Rights Foundation of Turkey, September 2004, notes that the ECtHR delegation examined 54 prisoners at the hospital of Istanbul University. The report specifically named petitioners Yanick, Gençay, Balyemez, Kör, Kuruçay, Gürbüz, Uyan, Yıldız and Hun. With regard to Balyemez it noted that

2.6 Access to health care for death row inmates?

In light of its practice of using informal provisional measures enquiring about the health situation of political detainees, sometimes specifically requesting the State to take positive measures, it is interesting to note that the HRC never used such measures on behalf of death row inmates. After all, in some of the death penalty cases there is an apparent lack of medical assistance. On the merits the HRC often specifically recommended, as part of the remedy, the humane treatment of the petitioner in detention. While provisional measures were used in the following cases they were only meant to halt the petitioner's execution and not to intervene to ensure medical assistance. While certain requests by the HRC to the State for information may have triggered changes in treatment or access to medication, there are no known cases of informal provisional measures comparable to those used on behalf of political (and immigration) detainees. One death row prisoner, for instance, asked the HRC whether it could assist him in convincing the Commissioner of Prisons to transfer him to a cell where there was adequate natural light. The Secretariat noted: "I regret to inform you that the Centre for Human Rights is not in a position to request the prison authorities to place you in another cell. You are kindly advised to bring your complaints to the Commissioner of Prisons".²⁰⁵

As noted, it has found violations of Articles 7 and 10(1) in relation to ill treatment on death row that included lack of medical attention. A case in point is Henry and Douglas v. Jamaica (1996).²⁰⁶ Henry was kept in a cold cell after being diagnosed with cancer and Douglas after he incurred medical problems caused by a gunshot wound. The HRC found that the conditions of incarceration under which Henry continued to be held until his death, 'even after the prison authorities were aware of his terminal illness' and the lack of medical attention to Douglas' gunshot wound, constituted a violation of Articles 7 and 10(1).²⁰⁷ It would have been possible, at an earlier stage, to take provisional measures to request medical treatment on their behalf, had the HRC been inclined to do so in death penalty cases.

In other cases the Committee only found a violation of Article 10(1). An example is Hamilton v. Jamaica (1999).²⁰⁸ In this case the petitioner had been shot in the lower area of his spine by a police officer after a hearing by a Magistrate as part of the preliminary enquiry. He became paralysed in both legs and was unable to move from his cell, unless he was carried by other inmates. He was also unable to remove his slop bucket (serving as a toilet) from the cell himself and had therefore been obliged to pay other inmates to remove it. Sometimes he was forced to remain in his cell until he had obtained the necessary funds. Counsel submitted that the petitioner's rights under Articles 7 and 10 of the Covenant were being violated, because the failure of the prison authorities to take into account his paralysed condition and to make proper arrangements for him.

the Court had already taken provisional measures on 5 February 2004 to halt his re-imprisonment. See also provisional measures not to re-imprison in the cases of Hun Kuruçay, Gürbüz, Uyan and Yıldız, all following the fact-finding mission of September 2004, Report Human Rights Foundation of Turkey, <www.tihv.org.tr/report/2004_09/septprison.html>, §4.1. On the merits see e.g. ECtHR Yildiz v. Turkey, 20 October 2005. See also Chapter XV (Immediacy and risk) on the fact-finding mission dealing with the compatibility with Articles 2 and 3 of their continued detention, section 3.2.5. Generally on hunger strikes in Turkey, see Sevinç (2008).

²⁰⁵ HRC Letter by the HRC Secretariat of 12 March 1993 (on file with the author).

²⁰⁶ HRC Henry and Douglas v. Jamaica, 25 July 1996.

²⁰⁷ It observed that 'the issues raised in the initial communication concerning lack of medical treatment and unsatisfactory conditions of detention relate directly to the circumstances of Henry's death'. The Committee considered that, in the circumstances, counsel had standing to continue his representation on the communication despite the fact that Henry had died.

²⁰⁸ HRC Zephinah Hamilton v. Jamaica, 23 July 1999.

This ‘lack of proper care’²⁰⁹ was also said to be a violation of the UN Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners. The Committee found a violation of Article 10(1).²¹⁰

Not only in case of disability or terminal illness would medical treatment be required but also, for instance, in case of allergies with serious consequences.²¹¹ In Brown v. Jamaica (1999)²¹² the petitioner had claimed that the warders had destroyed his belongings, including an asthma pump and other medication and that he had been denied assistance in case of an asthma attack.²¹³ When the petitioner brings specific allegations that the prison conditions cause serious detriment to his health and that he did not receive medical treatment, despite repeated requests, or that the authorities made it impossible to keep the appointment for an operation, the HRC indeed finds a violation of Article 10(1).²¹⁴ It often notes in such cases that the State party had not refuted these specific allegations, nor forwarded any results of the announced investigation into the allegations. Sometimes the HRC not only finds a violation of Article 10 in this respect but also of Article 7. In one case the petitioner had stated that the sanitary conditions of the prison ‘are dreadful, that the quality and quantity of the food is grossly inadequate and that he has been denied access to non-legal mail’. Moreover, he had stated that he had been subjected to inadequate medi-

²⁰⁹ Note that the HRC uses the same terminology here as the ECtHR (in non-refoulement cases), or repeats terminology used by counsel, see Chapter V.

²¹⁰ In yet other cases the HRC found that the evidentiary requirements for a claim of denial of medical treatment had not been fulfilled. It noted, for instance, that ‘the State party observes that its investigations showed that the author did receive treatment for his arthritic condition, while the author denies that any treatment was provided. In the circumstances, the Committee considers that a violation of Article 10 in this respect has not been established’. HRC Tony Jones v. Jamaica, 6 April 1998. The State party had asserted that its investigations had shown that ‘within the resources available the author was treated for his arthritis’. Counsel had observed that the authorities were informed of the petitioner’s arthritic condition in September 1994 and 1995 and in August 1996. “In spite of visits by the Inspector (of Prisons) in April and September 1996, Mr. Jones has still not received any medications for his arthritic condition”.

²¹¹ In one case counsel had claimed that the petitioner was allergic to dust and to the paint used in St. Catherine Prison and that his allergy provoked attacks of asthma and burning eyes. He claimed that he did not receive any treatment for this. The petitioner had also described the conditions of detention on death row as inhumane and degrading and claimed that he was beaten on two specific occasions and did not receive medical attention for his injuries. Since the State party had not answered to any of these allegations, the Committee considered that due weight must be given to the petitioner’s claims. It found that the treatment to which he had been subjected and the conditions of detention as described by him constituted a violation of Articles 7 and 10(1) ICCPR. HRC Beresford Whyte v. Jamaica, 27 July 1998.

²¹² HRC Christopher Brown v. Jamaica, 23 March 1999.

²¹³ If the petitioner had not provided any further information regarding a claim, the HRC will dismiss it for lack of substantiation. See e.g. HRC Everton Morrison v. Jamaica, 27 July 1998; (lack of substantiation that the difficulties in obtaining proper treatment for deteriorating eyesight amounted to violation of Article 10(1)).

²¹⁴ See e.g. HRC Clarence Marshall v. Jamaica, 3 November 1998. In this case it is not clear why the unsanitary prison conditions, the lack of medical treatment and especially treatment such as being hit in the side by a warden ‘to such an extent that he was taken to the prison surgeon’, only amounted to a violation of Article 10(1) and not of Article 7 as well. Nicholas Henry v. Jamaica, 20 October 1998; Conroy Levy v. Jamaica, 3 November 1998 and Leroy Morgan and Samuel Williams v. Jamaica, 3 November 1998.

cal attention, which had caused the loss of his sight in one eye.²¹⁵ The HRC found that these circumstances disclosed a violation of Articles 7 and 10(1) ICCPR.²¹⁶

In Leslie v. Jamaica (1998)²¹⁷ the HRC noted that the petitioner had made very precise allegations about various beatings and deplorable conditions of detention. Among others, he claimed to have been the victim of several assaults. He reported these assaults to the prison authorities and repeatedly requested medical attention to no avail. He wrote to the prison Ombudsman and was finally taken to hospital early 1992. He claimed that warders had told him on several occasions 'that there was no point in providing him with medical treatment, because he was about to be executed'. He submitted that this cost him 'great embarrassment and depression'. He also submitted (providing dates and times) that a warder harassed him, reportedly because he had complained about his treatment to the Ombudsman and the 'Human Rights Office'. He further alleged that a warder had stuck a finger in his eye and kicked him several times.²¹⁸ The HRC found violations of Articles 7 and 10(1).²¹⁹

These cases indicate the range of detention situations in which the HRC could have used (informal) provisional measures. The Committee's attitude towards reparation for violations relating to conditions of detention and access to medical assistance is important as well.²²⁰

In Neptune v. Trinidad and Tobago (1996)²²¹ the HRC found that the victim should be released for the violation of Article 14. It also found violations of Articles 9(3) and 10(1). Pending this release it expected the immediate improvement of the circumstances of his detention. In order to avoid similar violations in the future, it also recommended the State party to improve the general conditions of detention. This fits into the specific form of reparation called 'assurances of non-repetition'. The HRC normally refers to this type of reparation simply by noting the obliga-

²¹⁵ The State party had not refuted 'the specific allegations' and had not, 'in spite of its explicit promise' and the principle in Article 4(2) OP, forwarded results of the investigation. Errol Smith and Oval Stewart v. Jamaica, 8 April 1999.

²¹⁶ A related issue is that of access to medical records. In HRC Zheludkova v. Ukraine 29 October 2002 (no Rule 86) the HRC considered that Article 10(1) had been violated because of the 'consistent and unexplained denial of access to medical records'. Rivas Posada, Ando and Bhagwati disagreed with this, considering that the interpretation of Article 10(1) should not be stretched that far. Medina Quiroga, however, considered that the Committee's reasoning 'excessively restricts' the interpretation of Article 10(1) 'by linking the violation of that provision to the possible relevance which the victim's access to the medical records might have had for the medical treatment that he received in prison'. She pointed out that the right to have access to medical records 'forms part of the right of all individuals to have access to personal information concerning them'. She considered that the denial of the victim's request for access to the medical records in itself constituted a violation of the right in Article 10 to be 'treated with humanity and with respect for the inherent dignity of the human person', independent from the question 'whether or not this refusal may have had consequences for the medical treatment of the victim'.

²¹⁷ HRC Junior Leslie v. Jamaica, 31 July 1998.

²¹⁸ Allegedly the same warder subjected him to further physical and verbal abuse on subsequent dates. The HRC pointed out that the State party had not contested this 'except to say some 14 months later that it would investigate'.

²¹⁹ In later cases with regard to prison conditions the HRC would only find violations of Article 10(1). It would point out that it was not necessary to consider separately the claims arising under Article 7, because Article 10 specifically 'deals with the situation of persons deprived of their liberty and encompasses the elements set out generally in article 7'. This may still be different in situations where petitioners have been beaten. Devon Simpson v. Jamaica, 31 October 2001. See also R. S. v. Trinidad and Tobago, 2 April 2002.

²²⁰ For examples of cases in which provisional measures were indeed used see Chapter XIII on the relationship between provisional measures and possible forms of reparation.

²²¹ HRC Clyde Neptune v. Trinidad and Tobago, 16 July 1996.

tion to ensure that similar violations do not occur in the future. In this case it also gave a recommendation on how to do this, namely by improving the general conditions of detention. In subsequent cases this form of reparation (assurances of non-repetition) could lay a foundation for taking provisional measures to intervene in certain prison situations with a specific impact on a petitioner.²²² The immediate improvement of the circumstances of detention pending release, as a form of specific reparation upon the finding of a violation, may serve as additional argument for the use of provisional measures, to intervene in certain detention circumstances threatening irreparable harm, also on death row. In Henry and Douglas v. Jamaica (1996)²²³ the HRC considered that, in the circumstances, counsel was allowed to continue his representation despite the fact that Henry had died. It observed that ‘the issues raised in the initial communication concerning lack of medical treatment and unsatisfactory conditions of detention relate directly to the circumstances of Mr. Henry’s death’. Subsequently Jamaica indicated that it had ordered an investigation into the complaints that medical attention had been denied to the petitioners. In relation to this issue, counsel had argued that the abuse of convicted prisoners had been a common occurrence for at least 20 years and that the fear of reprisals prevented prisoners from submitting official complaints. The HRC noted that the State party had not contested the allegation that Henry was being kept in a cold cell after being diagnosed for cancer nor that Douglas had received insufficient medical attention for a gunshot wound. It found violations of Articles 7 and 10(1). Pursuant to Article 2(3)(a) ICCPR it pointed out that Douglas was entitled to an effective remedy entailing compensation for the conditions of his detention, in particular for the inadequate medical attention he received for his gunshot wound. It reaffirmed that the obligation in Article 10 to treat individuals deprived of their liberty with respect for their inherent dignity ‘encompasses the provision of adequate medical care during detention; this obligation, obviously, extends to persons under sentence of death’. In this particular case the HRC could have used provisional measures to intervene pending the case to allow Eustace Henry, who was in the final stages of cancer, to die in more humane circumstances and it could have requested the State as well to provide medical attention to Everaldo Douglas. Such measures would be similar to those it used on behalf of political prisoners.²²⁴

In R. S. v. Trinidad and Tobago (2002)²²⁵ the HRC noted the information provided by counsel, showing ‘that the author’s mental state at the time of the reading of the death warrants was obvious to those around him and should have been apparent to the prison authorities’. The State had not contested this information. In the circumstances, issuing a warrant for the author’s execution constituted a violation of Article 7.²²⁶

²²² See the provisional measures by the IACHR and ECtHR in the context of detention.

²²³ HRC Henry and Douglas v. Jamaica, 25 July 1996.

²²⁴ Another case in point is Williams v. Jamaica (1997), 4 November 1997. In this case the HRC found violations of Articles 7 and 10(1) for failure to provide medical treatment for the victim’s mental condition while on death row. An effective remedy included, in particular, an entitlement to appropriate medical treatment. In relation to the finding of violations of Articles 7 and 10(1) in Nicholas Henry v. Jamaica, 20 October 1998, the State party was equally obliged to provide the petitioner with an effective remedy ‘including immediate medical examination and treatment if necessary, compensation, and consideration for early release’.

²²⁵ HRC R. S. v. Trinidad and Tobago, 2 April 2002. Since it had no further information about his state of mental health at the earlier stages of the proceedings it was not in a position to decide whether the State had also violated Article 6 ICCPR. It also found a violation of Article 10 because of prison conditions. At the time of the View the victim’s death sentence had already been commuted. As a form of reparation the HRC mentioned appropriate medical and psychiatric care and improvement of conditions of detention in accordance with Article 10 or release.

²²⁶ HRC R. S. v. Trinidad and Tobago, 2 April 2002. McCordie Morrison v. Jamaica, 3 November 1998, related to ongoing illness in prison. The petitioner developed synovitis, which caused

Questions have also been raised on the circumstances of the death of one of the petitioners involved in Champagne, Palmer and Chisholm v. Jamaica (1994).²²⁷ In letters to the HRC inmates pointed out they were frightened and concerned over his death, mainly because the cause was unknown. They noted that inmates serving longer sentences apparently were not entitled to go the hospital 'on the outside'. They mentioned certain guards who, they considered, should not have a medical function at the prison clinic. Some of them also noted that whenever an ex-death row inmate complained about something the guards would tell them that they should have hanged them.²²⁸ In Khomidov v. Tajikistan (2004) the HRC had used provisional measures in September 2002. In March 2004 the petitioner informed the Committee that she had met her son and found him in bad health and adverse psychological condition. 'He was very nervous, shouted throughout the meeting, and stated that he could no longer live in such uncertainty and prefer to be executed'. She also referred to several health problems for which he received no medical assistance or examination. The HRC did not comment on this in its decision on the merits and did not refer to medical assistance as part of the remedy.²²⁹

swelling of the joints. In its final View the HRC found that the State party had failed to provide additional information, despite its promise to do so. Again it recalled that States are under an obligation to conduct a serious investigation of alleged violations of the ICCPR made under the OP procedure. It referred to Herrera Rubio v. Colombia, 2 November 1987. It specified that this entails 'forwarding the outcome of the investigations to the Committee, in detail and without undue delay'. "Consequently, due weight must be given to the author's allegation that he was denied medical treatment, and the Committee finds that the lack of medical treatment to the author constitutes a violation of article 10 of the Covenant". It did not mention provision of medical treatment as part of the remedy, probably because it recommended release. Devon Simpson v. Jamaica, 31 October 2001, related to prison conditions. As a remedy for the violation of Article 10 the HRC referred to 'adequate compensation, an improvement in the present conditions of detention and due consideration of early release'. By this time the HRC had changed its approach, pointing out that in detention situations it was sufficient to refer to Article 10. It was not necessary anymore to mention Article 7 as well. It would have been feasible to use Rule 86 in relation to disability and prison conditions. In Hamilton v. Jamaica (1999), the case by the petitioner who was paralysed, the HRC found violations of Articles 9(3), 14(3)(c) and 10(1) and considered that the State party was under an obligation to provide the victim with 'an effective remedy, entailing compensation and placement in conditions that take full account of his disability'. Zephinah Hamilton v. Jamaica, 23 July 1999. Between the issuance of provisional measures and the final View, the death sentence had been commuted.

²²⁷ HRC Champagne, Palmer and Chisholm v. Jamaica, 18 July 1994.

²²⁸ In this case the HRC found violations of the right of appeal. Palmer had been transferred from death row to the general penitentiary. He died in May 1994. The HRC did not mention this in its View of July 1994, but in September of that year his counsel provided it with information and suggested it to make representations to the Government in relation to his death. The information consisted of several letters of inmates received by the Jamaica Council for Human Rights. His fellow inmates pointed out that Palmer had been feeling sick already for a month. His condition worsened on 6 May after lunch. He was only brought to the hospital section of the prison where he was given some 'yellow colour pills'. On the morning of 7 May the inmates were told he had died. Allegedly guards had tried to force a prisoner to give him an injection, which this prisoner refused to do. He said to the guards: "You nuh see that the man sick bad and a hospital the man fe go". The officer's response was: "A dead him fi dead". It was also noted that Palmer was bawling the whole night. Counsel received this information on 16 September and sent it to the HRC by letter of 26 September 1994 (on file with the author).

²²⁹ HRC Bakhrom Khomidov (submitted by his mother Saodat Khomidova) v. Tajikistan, 29 July 2004.

Thus far the HRC has never used provisional measures in order to remedy detention situations for prisoners on death row (such as relating to a deteriorating health situation), although it has sometimes suggested such measures in decisions on the merits. One reason for this may be that the Secretariat only consults the Special Rapporteur on New Communications to initiate the case for registration and for any provisional measures. It may also consult this Rapporteur to follow-up on provisional measures already taken, e.g. upon information of a new execution date. However, it generally does not consult the Rapporteur on New Communications when it receives information relating to threats or lack of medical treatment. It simply prepares this information for the Committee member assigned to the case when it will be discussed on admissibility and merits.²³⁰

Obviously, not only in response to claims of lack of medical attention for political prisoners or death row inmates, but also in detention situations of other persons an argument for the use of provisional measures could be made.²³¹

3 RELATION BETWEEN PROVISIONAL MEASURES TO INTERVENE IN DETENTION SITUATIONS AND THE EXPECTED DECISION ON THE MERITS

3.1 Introduction

As the chapters on executions, expulsion and disappearances have already dealt extensively with the relationship between provisional measures and the eventual decision on the merits involving ²³⁰ In April 2003 the Special Rapporteur indicated his intention to request the Secretariat to start contacting him with information relating to new threats of irreparable harm in pending cases. Interview by author with HRC Special Rapporteur Scheinin, Geneva, April 2003.

²³¹ The case of Patterson Matthews serves as an example. He had submitted a complaint not about the fact that he had been sentenced to corporal punishment but about, among others, the deterioration of his eyesight and the lack of access to medical care. The HRC transmitted the case under Rule 91 more than two months after submission. The Rapporteur did not request specific information in relation to the condition of his eye and the medical assistance he received in this regard. The petitioner attributed the lack of medical attention to the fact that he had written about an incident in the prison in November 1988 in which prison warders had killed an inmate. In April 1995 the HRC decided, under Rule 91, to request the State party to provide copies of the petitioner's medical file at the prison as well as his medical file at the eye clinic. It also requested the petitioner to provide more detailed information about the treatment he received for his eye disease and, 'in particular, whether he was ever operated on, or whether an operation was recommended, after May 1991. Patterson Matthews v. Trinidad and Tobago, 4 April 1995. In its admissibility decision of October 1995 the HRC noted that it had not received a reply from the State party, despite a reminder sent to it of that year. It recalled that it was implicit in the OP that States make available to the HRC all information at their disposal and it regretted the lack of cooperation. Nevertheless, it noted that it appeared from the file that the petitioner had visited the eye clinic regularly and that he underwent an eye operation between March and May 1992. Despite the fact that it had this information already when it requested the State to provide it with the medical file, it considered that the petitioner had failed to advance a claim under Article 2 OP. Patterson Matthews v. Trinidad and Tobago, 13 October 1995 (adm.), CCPR/C/55/D/569/1993, 25 October 1995 (initial submission 12 October 1993; Rule 91 of 5 January 1994; unpublished document on file with the author). See also Boodoo v. Trinidad and Tobago, 2 April 2002 (claim about prison conditions, including that a physician recommended his placement in a brightly-lit room in order to prevent the blindness that had begun to set in, and assaults/death threat as a result of his correspondence with the UN Centre for Human Rights, only Rule 91, no Rule 86).

the right to life and personal integrity, this section addresses this issue only briefly. In cases involving provisional measures on behalf of detainees the relevant rights are those involving the right to life (Article 6 ICCPR; Article 4 ACHR; Article 4 ACHPR; Article 2(1) ECHR), the prohibition of torture and ill-treatment (Article 7 ICCPR; Articles 4, 11 and 16 ICAT; Article 5(2) ACHR; Article 5 ACHPR; Article 3 ECHR) and humane treatment in detention (Article 10 ICCPR).²³² Rather than discussing detention rights in general, this section simply refers to some case law that could shed light on the use of provisional measures on behalf of detainees.

3.2 HRC

From the start of its activities the HRC has faced many ongoing detention situations involving risks to health and safety. It has pointed out that Article 10 ‘applies to any one deprived of liberty under the laws and authority of the State who is held in prisons, hospitals-particularly psychiatric hospitals-detention camps or correctional institutions or elsewhere’.²³³ It has often found a violation of both Articles 7 and 10(1) without making a clear distinction between the two. Article 10(1) complements Article 7 ICCPR and both articles impose positive obligations. However, there have been some cases that dealt with Article 10 (1) on its own without also finding a violation of Article 7.²³⁴

The HRC has reaffirmed that Article 10(1) ‘encompasses the provision of, inter alia, adequate medical care during detention’. It also considered that the provision of basic sanitary facilities equally fell within the ambit of Article 10. “The Committee further considers that the provision of inadequate food to detained individuals and the total absence of recreational facilities does not, save under exceptional circumstances, meet the requirements of Article 10²³⁵.

²³² Article 10 ICCPR stipulates: “1. All persons deprived of their liberty shall be treated with humanity and with respect for the inherent dignity of the human person. 2. (a) Accused persons shall, save in exceptional circumstances, be segregated from convicted persons and shall be subject to separate treatment appropriate to their status as unconvicted persons; (b) Accused juvenile persons shall be separated from adults and brought as speedily as possible for adjudication. 3. The penitentiary system shall comprise treatment of prisoners the essential aim of which shall be their reformation and social rehabilitation. Juvenile offenders shall be segregated from adults and be accorded treatment appropriate to their age and legal status”. See also, e.g., Articles 37 and 25 Children’s Convention, Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners (First UN Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, Geneva 1955; approved by the Economic and Social Council, resolutions 663 C (XXIV), 31 July 1957 and 2076 (LXII), 13 May 1977); Body of Principles for the Protection of All Persons under Any Form of Detention or Imprisonment (General Assembly res. 43/173, 9 December 1988); United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Administration of Juvenile Justice (“The Beijing Rules”; GA res. 40/33, 29 November 1985); in general see e.g. Penal Reform International (2001) and Medina Quiroga (2005).

²³³ HRC General Comment 21 on the right to humane treatment in detention (Article 10), 10 April 1992.

²³⁴ In HRC Valentini de Bazzano (also on behalf of her husband Bazzano Ambrosini, her stepfather Massera and her mother Valentini de Massera) v. Uruguay, 15 August 1979, the Committee found that prolonged incommunicado detention violated Article 10(1), §37. A few years later, in a case against Panama, it determined that the detention of the petitioner in a special cell with a mentally disturbed prisoner violated Article 10(1). Wolf v. Panama, 26 March 1992. Moreover, in a case against Hungary the Committee found that limiting exercise and hygiene periods to five minutes a day violated Article 10(1). See HRC Parkanyi v. Hungary, 27 July 1992. As a last example, in Abdool Saleem Yasseen and Noel Thomas v. Republic of Guyana, 30 March 1998, detainees were required to share mattresses and were deprived of natural lighting except for their one hour of daily recreation. This constituted a violation of Article 10(1) as well.

Just like the UN Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners,²³⁶ Article 10 ICCPR sets some very basic minimum standards that fall below, for instance, those of the Committee to the European Convention against Torture. These minimum standards must be safeguarded ‘regardless of a State party’s level of development’. This means that ‘lack of resources’ is no excuse.²³⁷ The Inter-American Commission, the African Commission and the ECtHR have expressed themselves similarly.²³⁸ The Inter-American Commission, for instance, has pointed out that the minimum standards laid down in Article 5 ACHR ‘apply irrespective of the nature of the conduct for which a particular individual had been imprisoned’.²³⁹ They must be satisfied, moreover, ‘even if the economic or budgetary circumstances of a State Party may render compliance difficult’.²⁴⁰ This case law on the positive obligations of States to guarantee minimum standards of detention, including access to health care, also underlies the use of provisional measures pending detention cases.

Sometimes a complaint submitted to the HRC refers to Article 10(3) ICCPR.²⁴¹ The main message of Article 10(3) is that ‘no penitentiary system should be merely retributory’. Each peni-

²³⁵ HRC Paul Kelly v. Jamaica, 8 April 1991. See also Daniel Pinto v. Trinidad and Tobago, 20 July 1990.

²³⁶ Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners (resolution 1955/1977 adopted by the First United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, 30 August 1955; approved by United Nations Economic and Social Council resolution 663 C (XXIV) of 31 July 1957; and amended by ECOSOC resolution 2076 (LXII) of 13 May 1977) (a new rule 95 was added). See also: Body of Principles for the Protection of All Persons under any form of Detention or Imprisonment, adopted by the General Assembly, 9 December 1988, Resolution 43/173; Principles of Medical Ethics relevant to the role of Health Personnel, particularly Physicians, in the protection of prisoners and detainees against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, Adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations on 18 December 1982, resolution 37/194; Code of Conduct for Law Enforcement Officials, adopted by United Nations General Assembly resolution 34/169 of 17 December 1979.

²³⁷ The HRC determined this in a case against Cameroon, in which it also referred to the aforementioned Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners: ‘It should be noted that these are minimum requirements which the Committee considers should always be observed, even if economic or budgetary conditions may make compliance with these obligations difficult’. HRC Albert Womah Mukong v. Cameroon, 8 July 1992, §9.3.

²³⁸ On other case law of these adjudicators see later in this section.

²³⁹ CIDH Damion Thomas v. Jamaica, 4 April 2001 (merits), §37. The Commission points out that the ECtHR takes a similar approach: Ahmed v. Austria, Judgment of 17 December 1996, §38.

²⁴⁰ CIDH Damion Thomas v. Jamaica, 4 April 2001 (merits), §37. The Commission referred here to its previous case law including Baptiste v. Grenada, Final Report 38/00, 13 April 2000, §136.

²⁴¹ Regarding political detainees see HRC Vasilskis v. Uruguay, 31 March 1983 and Oxandabarat Scarrone v. Uruguay, 4 November 1983. In Vasilskis the petitioner alleged on behalf of his sister ‘that the penitentiary system is not aimed at reformation and social rehabilitation of prisoners but at the destruction of their will to resist. They are given a number and are never called by their name. Elena Beatriz Vasilskis is No. 433 of Sector B. Psychological pressures on the inmates are allegedly designed to lead them to denounce other inmates’. Two years later, on 20 March 1985, the victim’s brother informed the Committee about her release. By note of 25 March 1985 the State party itself informed the Committee about her release on 12 March 1985 on the basis of the amnesty act of 8 March 1985, which it confirmed by note of 31 October 1991. In Oxandabarat Scarrone a Uruguayan national living in Spain submitted, on 30 June 1981, a complaint on behalf of her father, detained in Uruguay. The complaint included specific allegations relating to her father’s health, including the statement of a medical doctor who had himself been detained at tentiary system should ‘essentially seek the reformation and social rehabilitation of the prisoner’.²⁴²

In this respect, when examining State reports, the Committee expects to receive information on work and education programmes and post release programmes, but it has never really addressed this issue as part of an individual complaint, nor has it used provisional measures specifically in this context.

The HRC considers that there are elements in certain provisions of the ICCPR that could not be made subject to lawful derogation under Article 4, even though those provisions themselves are not listed in Article 4(2). It has mentioned some ‘illustrative examples’. These indicate the importance the HRC attaches to certain rights in the Covenant. It referred to the obligation, in Article 10, to treat all persons deprived of their liberty with humanity and with respect for the inherent dignity of the human person. This article expressed ‘a norm of general international law not subject to derogation’. This is ‘supported by the reference to the inherent dignity of the human person in the preamble to the Covenant and by the close connection between articles 7 and 10’.²⁴³ The Committee’s provisional measures based on Article 10, relating to the health of detainees, reflect this awareness of the irreparable nature of violations of this article, as discussed in the previous section.

The HRC has often dealt with complaints by death row prisoners about their conditions of detention. These complaints are often based upon Articles 7 and 10 ICCPR and involve beatings, threats and ill treatment upon arrest or in pre-trial detention. Thus far it has not used provisional measures to halt torture and ill treatment pending such cases. Some complaints have dealt not so much with inhumane conditions of detention as such, but rather with the death row phenomenon as a form of cruel treatment. The HRC has often declared them inadmissible because they were not properly raised in the domestic proceedings.²⁴⁴ It declared other claims inadmissible for insufficient substantiation.²⁴⁵ In such cases it has never used provisional measures either.

Libertad prison. He had examined several prisoners there, including the alleged victim. The report stated that the petitioner’s father had suffered a cranioencephalic traumatism in 1976-1977. Since then his ‘faculty of perceiving time and space is impaired’. She also alleged that ‘the prison regime to which her father is subjected is not designed to produce any kind of reform of rehabilitation but aims at psychological and physical annihilation’.

²⁴² HRC General Comment 21 on the right to humane treatment (Article 10), 10 April 1992.

²⁴³ HRC General Comment 29 on states of emergency (Article 4), 24 July 2001.

²⁴⁴ HRC Beresford Whyte v. Jamaica, 27 July 1998 (Medina Quiroga and Scheinin dissenting, considering respectively that the claim of beatings should have been dealt with on the merits and that a violation of Article 7 should have been established).

²⁴⁵ See e.g. HRC Samuel Thomas v. Jamaica, 31 March 1999. The petitioner had claimed that he was badly beaten by police officers or threatened with further physical violence. Jamaica informed the Committee that it had been unable to investigate the petitioner’s allegation ‘in the absence of additional information, such as the place where the author was held, the time at which the incident allegedly occurred and if possible the name(s) of the officers involved’. The Committee noted that the allegations in relation to the treatment while he was in police detention were very vague and it considered that it was incumbent upon an alleged victim to provide sufficient information so that a State party may investigate an allegation. The HRC also noted that the State party did in fact request additional information in order to investigate the claims. It found that the information provided by the author and his counsel was insufficient for the State party to be able to adequately investigate the matter. Although this position seems clear, it could have asked the State party why it did not know the place where the petitioner was held. While in the absence of additional information the State party cannot be expected to know how to investigate allegations, a State party should be able to find out in which place it has held a person in police detention. About the consequences of failure of counsel during the hearing before the

In a case against Georgia the Committee found the State responsible for severe beatings and physical and moral pressure. This included concussion and broken bones, wounding and burning, scarring, torture and threats to family members.²⁴⁶ It is acknowledged internationally that not only physical treatment can amount to torture and ill treatment, but also psychological pressure. As Rodley explains in his standard work on the treatment of prisoners in international law, psychological torture is more sophisticated than physical torture in that it leaves little physical trace. Examples of psychological torture are: deprivation of light, deprivation of darkness, deprivation of sound or sleep, general disorientation, threats of mutilation or death, mock execution and, of course, the threat that physical abuses will be extended to persons close to the prisoner.²⁴⁷ On the basis of its traditional jurisprudence, if the HRC would find a violation of Articles 7 and 10 this would not warrant ‘an appropriate remedy including commutation’.²⁴⁸ Apart from a few cases involving corporal punishment,²⁴⁹ as of yet there are no known cases in which the HRC intervened to put an end to (psychological) torture and ill treatment pending the proceedings.

3.3 Inter-American system

The law of the Inter-American system is comparable to Article 7 jo. 10 ICCPR as Article 5 ACHR not only prohibits torture and ill treatment but also provides that every person has the right to respect for his physical, mental and moral integrity. Among others, the Inter-American Court has pointed out that ‘(i)n the context of health care institutions, whether they are public or private centers, the staff in charge of the care of patients exercise a strong control or dominance over persons who are under their custody. The intrinsic imbalance in power between hospitalized patients and the persons having authority over them is usually greater in psychiatric institutions’.²⁵⁰ It also noted that ‘the personal features of an alleged victim of torture or cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment should be taken into consideration when determining whether his or her personal integrity has been violated, for such features may change the insight of his or her individual reality and, therefore, increase the suffering and the sense of humiliation when the person is subjected to certain types of treatment’.²⁵¹

With regard to persons deprived of their liberty Article 5 ACHR provides in particular that they shall be treated with respect to their inherent dignity.²⁵² Among others, it stipulates that domestic court to substantiate the assault, as well as the lack of medical documents corroborating the assault see also Clarence Marshall v. Jamaica, 3 November 1998.

²⁴⁶ HRC Victor Domukovsky, Zaza Tsiklauri, Petre Gelbakhiani and Irakli Dokvadze v. Georgia, 6 April 1998.

²⁴⁷ See Rodley (1999), p. 10. It is troubling to note that prisoners in the US cannot appeal to even a domestic court when they are subjected to psychological torture (Prison Litigation Reform Act (1996)). See e.g. Tushnet/Yackle (1997) and Robertson (2000). About the importance of access to Court and counsel, also to prevent ill-treatment, see e.g. the precautionary measures by the Inter-American Commission with regard to the extraterritorial detention by the U.S. at Guantanamo, see Chapter VIII (Procedural rights).

²⁴⁸ See the discussion about the relationship between provisional measures and the decision on reparation in Chapter XIII.

²⁴⁹ See Chapter XII (Other situations), section 2.

²⁵⁰ IACHR Ximenes-Lopes v. Brazil, Judgment of 4 July 2006, §107. See also §129 and §140.

²⁵¹ Id., §127.

²⁵² As the IACHR noted in Neira Alegria et al. (Peru), Judgment of 19 January 1995: “In essence, Article 5 refers to the rule that nobody should be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman, or degrading punishment or treatment, and that all persons deprived of their liberty must be treated with respect for the inherent dignity of the human person”.

‘(m)inors while subject to criminal proceedings shall be separated from adults and brought before specialised tribunals, as speedily as possible, so that they may be treated in accordance with their status as minors’. This special attention to minors has been important in the practice of the Inter-American system with regard to provisional measures. Article 5 ACHR also provides that ‘(p)unishments consisting of deprivation of liberty shall have as an essential aim the reform and social readaptation of the prisoners’. In addition the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man provides in Article I: “Every human being has the right to life, liberty and security of his person”. Article XXV lays down the right to humane treatment of everyone in custody and Article XXVI prohibits ‘cruel, infamous or unusual punishment’.²⁵³ In addition, in 2008 the Inter-American Commission adopted Principles and Best Practices on the Protection of Persons Deprived of Liberty in the Americas.²⁵⁴

The Inter-American Commission has often dealt with complaints about prison situations and the obligations of OAS member states. Section 2 has already discussed many Inter-American cases. What underlies these cases is the general approach of the Commission and Court towards the right to life and respect for personal integrity, which is in turn comparable to that of the other human rights adjudicators. The Court has pointed out that the right to life is fundamental to the ACHR, as all other rights depend upon it.²⁵⁵ States have the obligation to guarantee the creation of the necessary conditions for the full exercise of this right. Moreover, the right to respect for personal integrity is of such importance that its protection is particularly emphasized in the ACHR, among others by the prohibition of torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment and the impossibility to suspend this prohibition during times of emergency.²⁵⁶ The right to life and respect for personal integrity do not just imply negative obligations, but positive obligations as well, in order for States to comply with the general obligation laid down in Article 1(1) ACHR.²⁵⁷

Apart from this general attention, the Court has pointed out the particular obligations vis-à-vis detainees.²⁵⁸ Persons deprived of their liberty are in a special situation of powerlessness vis-à-vis the authorities so that States have a special obligation towards them.²⁵⁹ The duty to adopt security measures ‘is more evident since these persons are detained in the state detention centers, and under such circumstances the State plays a special role as guarantor of the rights of the persons that remain under its custody’.²⁶⁰ Detainees have the right to live in conditions of detention ²⁵³ In a resolution of 5 June 2001 the OAS General Assembly expressed its concern over the state of penitentiary systems and detention centres in various countries of the Americas. It noted that ‘this situation hinders and can even prevent the social rehabilitation of convicts, which is the essential aim of prison sentences, according to the Pact of San José’. It pointed out that ‘the topic of all aspects of health in prisons is part of the hemispheric agenda’. It only resolved, however, to instruct the Permanent Council to consider the advisability of a study on this issue. General Assembly Resolution ‘Study of the rights and care of persons under any form of detention or imprisonment’, 5 June 2001, AG/RES.1816 (XXXI-O/01).

²⁵⁴ CIDH Resolution 1/08, 13 March 2008, OEA/Ser/L/V/II.131 doc. 26.

²⁵⁵ See e.g. IACHR “Instituto de Reeducación del Menor” (Paraguay), Judgment of 2 September 2004, §156.

²⁵⁶ Id., §157, referring to Articles 5 and 27 ACHR.

²⁵⁷ Id., §158.

²⁵⁸ See e.g. IACHR Asunto de la Cárcel de Urso Branco (Brasil), Resolución de 2 de mayo de 2008, 19th ‘Considering’ clause.

²⁵⁹ IACHR “Instituto de Reeducación del Menor” (Paraguay), Judgment of 2 September 2004, §152. Significantly, the Court also refers to its Order for provisional measures in the Gómez Paquiyauri brothers case, Order of 7 May 2004, 13th ‘Considering’ clause.

²⁶⁰ See IACHR Matter of the persons imprisoned in the “Dr. Sebastião Martins Silveira” Penitentiary in Araraquara, São Paulo (Brazil), Order of 30 September 2006, 11th ‘Considering’ clause, referring to Matter of Children Deprived of Liberty in the “Complexo do Tatuapé” of FEBEM, Order of 17 November 2005, 7th ‘Considering’ clause; Matter of Urso Branco Prison, that are compatible with their personal dignity. The State has the obligation to respect and ensure their right to life and personal integrity.²⁶¹ It must do so, among others, by guaranteeing minimum conditions of detention compatible with their dignity.²⁶² As Judge García Ramírez has pointed out, the State cannot avoid the peremptory duty to ‘protect the life and integrity of individuals who are subjected to its immediate, complete and constant control and lack, by themselves, the effective ability of self-determination and defence’.²⁶³ In detention situations the role of the State as guarantor is particularly intense and it is thus reasonable to ‘require that the State must avoid, immediately and absolutely, losing human lives as a consequence of violent conditions ruling in prisons, as the result of a direct action by State’s agents, or as actions of other people, that the State should avoid and prevent’.²⁶⁴

The Court has also stressed that upon a finding of a violation the Court must, as a guarantee of non-repetition, ‘take all necessary actions to allow prison conditions to conform to international standards’.²⁶⁵

The Court has also pointed out that the protection of the life of the child ‘requires the State to pay special attention to the conditions of a child’s life while it is deprived of liberty, because this right has not extinguished or been restricted owing to detention or imprisonment’.²⁶⁶

Previously, in a case against Honduras dealing with the detention of minors, the Commission referred to the Judgment of the Inter-American Court in Neira Alegria,²⁶⁷ emphasising that the State is the institution responsible for detention establishments and the guarantor of the right to life and humane treatment of prisoners.²⁶⁸ In this light the Commission elaborated on the position of detainees in general and the ensuing responsibility of the State.

“[T]he State, by depriving a person of his liberty, places itself in the unique position of guarantor of his right to life and to humane treatment. When it detains an individual, the State introduces that individual into a “total institution” – such as a prison – where the various aspects of his life are subject to an established regimen; where the prisoner is removed from his natural and social milieu; where the established regimen is one of absolute control, a loss of privacy, limitation of living space and, above all, a radical decline in the individual’s means of defending himself. All this means that the act of imprisonment carries with it a specific and material commitment to protect the prisoner’s human dignity so long as that individual is in the custody of the State, which includes protecting him from possible circumstances that could imperil his life, health and personal integrity, among other rights’.²⁶⁹

Order of 21 September 2005, 6th ‘Considering’ clause; and Matter of the Mendoza Prisons, Order of 18 June 2005, 6th ‘Considering’ clause. See also e.g. Matter of Capital El rodeo I and El Rodeo II Judicial Confinement Center, Order of 8 February 2008, 11th ‘Considering’ clause.

²⁶¹ See e.g. IACHR “Instituto de Reeducción del Menor” (Paraguay), Judgment of 2 September 2004, §151 and Hilaire, Constantine, Benjamin et al., Judgment of 21 June 2002, §165.

²⁶² IACHR “Instituto de Reeducción del Menor” (Paraguay), Judgment of 2 September 2004, §159.

²⁶³ IACHR Matter of Capital El Rodeo I and el Rodeo II Judicial Confinement Center, Order of 8 February 2008, separate opinion Judge García Ramírez (joined by Judge Medina Quiroga), §15.

²⁶⁴ Id., §16.

²⁶⁵ See IACHR Montero Aranguren et al. (Detention Center of Catia) v. Venezuela, Judgment of 5 July 2006.

²⁶⁶ IACHR Bulacio case, Judgment of 18 September 2003, §126 and Matter of children deprived of liberty in the ‘Complejo do Tataupé’ of FEBEM, Order of 4 July 2006, 9th ‘Considering’ clause and of 3 July 2007, 8th ‘Considering’ clause.

²⁶⁷ IACHR Neira Alegria et al., Judgment of 19 January 1995, §60.

²⁶⁸ Given the reasoning this would also apply in case of privatization.

²⁶⁹ CIDH Minors in detention v. Honduras, 10 March 1999, §135.

According to Article XI American Declaration “Every person has the right to the preservation of his health through sanitary and social measures relating to food, clothing, housing and medical care, to the extent permitted by public and community resources”. The Commission has emphasised that ‘as the state exercises exclusive control over all aspects of a prisoner’s life and well-being, it is subject to an enhanced obligation to supervise and secure for prisoners the minimum standards of humane treatment prescribed under Art. 5 of the Convention’.

In light of the specific commitment derived from the act of imprisonment, the Commission pointed out that the State had a specific obligation to protect prisoners from attacks by third parties including other inmates. If it failed to do so, it violated Article 5 ACHR and incurred international responsibility. This was all the more so with regard to prisoners who are defenceless or at a disadvantage, ‘as in the case of juveniles’.²⁷⁰ The Commission was very clear in this respect:

“In the Commission’s view, the State’s duty to protect the personal integrity of any person deprived of liberty includes the obligation to take all measures necessary to prevent attacks and assaults against a prisoner by agents of the State or private individuals. These obligations become all the more compelling when juveniles are involved. In such cases, the State must not only endeavour to protect their personal integrity, but also to promote the full development of their personality and their reintegration into society”.²⁷¹

The Inter-American system has dealt extensively with the rights of minors in detention. It added to the general responsibility of the State to protect persons, and the specific responsibility to protect the personal integrity of persons in detention, the even greater responsibility to protect minors in detention. Thus the Inter-American Court has pointed out that when children are detained, the State has yet additional obligations under Art. 19 ACHR, taking into account the special position of children and the concept of ‘best interest of the child’.²⁷² Articles 6 and 27 UN Children’s Convention include in the right to life the obligation to ‘ensure to the maximum extent possible the survival and development of the child’. The UN Committee supervising this Convention has interpreted the term ‘development’ broadly, encompassing the physical, mental, spiritual, moral, psychological and social.²⁷³ In that light States have the obligation to ensure detained children are not deprived of their ‘project of life’.²⁷⁴ In that sense, the Inter-American Court has noted that Rule 13 of the UN Rules for the Protection of Juveniles Deprived of their Liberty²⁷⁵ establishes that ‘Juveniles deprived of their liberty shall not for any reason related to their status be denied the civil, economic, political, social or cultural rights to which they are entitled under national or international law, and which are compatible with the deprivation of ²⁷⁰ Id., §§136-137.

²⁷¹ Id., §140. The Commission also referred here to article 40 of the Children’s Convention.

²⁷² IACHR “Instituto de Reeducación del Menor” (Paraguay), Judgment of 2 September 2004, §160; see also e.g. its Advisory Opinion on the Legal Position and Rights of Children, 28 August 2002, §§56 and 60.

²⁷³ UN Committee on the Rights of the Child, General Observation of 27 November 2003, §12.

²⁷⁴ IACHR “Instituto de Reeducación del Menor” (Paraguay), Judgment of 2 September 2004, §161, among others referring to its Advisory Opinion on the Legal Position and Rights of Children, 28 August 2002, §§80-81, 84 and 86-88 and Rule 13.5 of the UN Standard Minimum Rules for the Administration of Juvenile Justice, (‘The Beijing Rules’), GA 40/33, 29 November 1985. On the notion of ‘project of life’ see e.g. IACHR Loayza Tamayo (Peru), 27 November 1998 (Reparations), §§147-148, referring to the project of life as ‘akin to the concept of personal fulfilment, which in turn is based on the options that an individual may have for leading his life and achieving the goal that he sets for himself’, §148. See further Chapter XI (Mass expulsion), section 2 and Chapter XII (Other situations), section 2.1.

²⁷⁵ G.A. res. 45/113, annex, 45 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 49A) at 205, U.N. Doc. A/45/49 (1990).

liberty'.²⁷⁶ Closely related to the argument that the right to life to some extent entails a certain quality of life are the obligations of the State regarding the personal integrity of detained children. In determining whether treatment or punishment is cruel, inhuman or degrading the fact that those subjected to it are children must by necessity be taken into account.²⁷⁷ These findings on the merits clearly support the use of provisional measures to protect the life and personal integrity of minors in detention.

3.4 African system

The African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights contains a provision that is similar to Article 5 ACHR and Article 7 jo.10 ICCPR and, as the African Commission has noted, Article 5 ACHPR 'prohibits not only torture, but also cruel, inhuman or psychological suffering'. 'This includes not only actions which cause serious physical or psychological suffering, but which humiliate the individual or force him or her to act against his will or conscience'.²⁷⁸ The African Commission has a Special Rapporteur on prisons and prison conditions who visits States and prepares reports.²⁷⁹ The Rapporteur may also intervene in urgent cases. In 2002 the African Commission, the Association for the Prevention of Torture (APT) and several other NGOs, institutions and experts adopted the 'Robben Island Guidelines' for the Prohibition and Prevention of Torture, Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment in Africa. Regarding conditions of detention these Guidelines reiterate the importance of separating pre-trial detainees from convicted persons and of ensuring that 'juveniles, women, and other vulnerable groups are held in appropriate and separate detention facilities'. Moreover States should encourage the use of non-custodial sentences for minor crimes and take other measures to reduce over-crowding in places of detention.²⁸⁰

Like the aforementioned Article XI of the American Declaration Article 16 ACHPR stipulates that every individual shall have the right to enjoy the 'best attainable state of physical and mental health' and States parties shall take the necessary measures to 'ensure that they receive medical attention when they are sick'. Analogous to the Inter-American Commission the African Commission has pointed out that the State's responsibility under Article 16 ACHPR is even more evident in detention situations 'to the extent that detention centres are its exclusive preserve, hence the physical integrity and welfare of detainees is the responsibility of the competent public authorities'.²⁸¹ Denying a detainee access to doctors while his health is deteriorating is a violation of Article 16. After all 'the authority of the government is heightened in cases where the individual is in its custody and therefore someone whose integrity and well-being is completely dependent on the activities of the authorities'.²⁸²

²⁷⁶ IACHR "Instituto de Reeducación del Menor" (Paraguay), Judgment of 2 September 2004, §161.
²⁷⁷ Id., §162. The Court also referred to the Gómez Paquiyauri Brothers case (Peru), 8 July 2004, §170 as well as Rule 26(2) of the UN Standard Minimum Rules for the Administration of Juvenile Justice, ('The Beijing Rules'), GA 40/33, 29 November 1985.

²⁷⁸ ACHPR International Pen and Others (on behalf of Ken Saro-Wiwa) v. Nigeria, 31 October 1998, §79.

²⁷⁹ Until recently this was Commissioner Vera Chirwa who had previously been the subject of a petition before the Commission.

²⁸⁰ Guidelines and Measures for the Prohibition and Prevention of Torture, Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment in Africa (The Robben Island Guidelines), §§ 35-37).

²⁸¹ ACHPR Malawi African Association and Others v. Mauritania, 11 May 2000, §120.

²⁸² ACHPR Media Rights Agenda and others v. Nigeria, 31 October 1998, §91.

The African Commission has confirmed that the prohibition of torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment is absolute.²⁸³ It has emphasized, in reference to the UN Body of Principles, that the obligations under Article 5 are to be interpreted 'so as to extend the widest possible protection against abuses, whether physical or mental'.²⁸⁴ Denying medical attention 'under health-threatening conditions' and denying 'access to the outside world' showed lack of respect for the 'dignity inherent in a human being' and for the 'recognition of his legal status'. Such denial did not respect principles 1 and 6 of the UN Body of Principles for the Protection of all Persons under any form of detention or imprisonment. Thus it also constituted a breach of Article 5 ACHR.²⁸⁵ All of this serves as a foundation for the Commission's use of provisional measures in detention cases.

3.5 European system

Apart from many cases on the lawfulness of detention²⁸⁶ the case law on detention of the European Commission and Court has involved the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment in (police) detention. Sometimes this specifically related to positive obligations of the State, once more indicating that their provisional measures in detention cases can be based on substantive case law. In the Greek Case, for instance, the European Commission found that overcrowding, inadequate heating, inadequate sleeping and toilet facilities, insufficient food, recreation and contacts with the outside world constituted a violation of Article 3 ECHR.²⁸⁷ In Cyprus v. Turkey the European Commission found the failure to provide sufficient food, water and medical assistance in detention centres constituted inhuman treatment contrary to Article 3 ECHR.²⁸⁸ In Hurtado v. Switzerland it found a violation because the State had failed to provide appropriate medical assistance during the first six days after his arrest to a prisoner whose rib was fractured.²⁸⁹

As noted, in Lorsé et al. v. the Netherlands (2003) the ECtHR had refused to take provisional measures for a prison transfer or, more generally, to take measures to halt further violations of Article 3. While the Court did not find that the petitioner had been subjected to sensory isolation, it pointed out that it did 'not diverge from the view' expressed by the European Committee for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CPT) that the situation in the prison in Vught 'is problematic and gives cause for concern'. Moreover, the Court noted it was 'struck by the fact that Mr Lorsé was submitted to the weekly strip-search in addition to all the other strict security measures within the EBI'. It considered that this systematic strip-searching required more justification than the Dutch government had provided, exactly because of the awareness by the authorities of the petitioner's 'serious difficulties coping with the regime' and the fact that nothing untoward was ever found during the strip searches. Thus, it found that the combination of routine strip-searching with the other stringent security measures amounted to inhuman or degrading treatment in violation of Article 3.²⁹⁰

Even if, in the circumstances, it decides not to indicate the specific measures suggested by counsel (such as in this case prison transfer), it could decide to take more generally worded meas-

²⁸³ See e.g. ACHPR Huri-Laws v. Nigeria, October/November 2000, §41.

²⁸⁴ ACHPR Huri-Laws v. Nigeria, October/November 2000, §40.

²⁸⁵ Id., §41.

²⁸⁶ See e.g. ECtHR Conka v. Belgium, Judgment of 5 February 2002 and Amuur et al. v. France, Judgment of 25 June 1996.

²⁸⁷ EComHR Greek Case (first), 5 November 1969.

²⁸⁸ EComHR Cyprus v. Turkey, 10 July 1976.

²⁸⁹ EComHR Hurtado v. Switzerland, 26 January 1994.

²⁹⁰ ECtHR Lorsé et al. v. The Netherlands, Judgment of 4 February 2003 (former first section). See also Van der Ven v. The Netherlands, Judgment of 4 February 2003 (former first section).

ures, as counsel had suggested in this case as well. Provisional measures that are more specific might be possible as well, especially in systems with a well-developed jurisprudence on reparations.²⁹¹ Pending the proceedings the adjudicator could order a State to re-examine its strip-search practice with regard to a petitioner and inform it urgently on the security concerns requiring this practice. It could subsequently order a halt to such searches taking place routinely even when the petitioner has had no contact with the outside world.

While the European Commission has sometimes intervened in the past in cases involving psychological distress, the case law on the merits is not that liberal. In Kudla v. Poland (2000) the petitioner had complained, among others, that he had not received adequate psychiatric treatment during his detention on remand. The Commission considered Article 3 had been violated, but the Court found otherwise. It pointed out that Article 3 cannot be interpreted ‘as laying down a general obligation to release a detainee on health grounds or to place him in a civil hospital to enable him to obtain a particular kind of medical treatment’.²⁹² “Nevertheless, under this provision the State must ensure that a person is detained in conditions which are compatible with respect for his human dignity, that the manner and method of the execution of the measure do not subject him to distress or hardship of an intensity exceeding the unavoidable level of suffering inherent in detention and that, given the practical demands of imprisonment, his health and well-being are adequately secured by, among other things, providing him with the requisite medical assistance”.²⁹³ In this case it accepted that ‘the very nature’ of ‘his psychological condition made him more vulnerable than the average detainee and that his detention may have exacerbated to a certain extent his feelings of distress, anguish and fear’. It also took note of the fact that he was kept in custody for six weeks ‘despite a psychiatric opinion that continuing detention could jeopardize his life because of a likelihood of attempted suicide’. Yet ‘on the basis of the evidence before it and assessing the relevant facts as a whole,’ it did not find it established that the petitioner was subjected to ‘ill-treatment that attained a sufficient level of severity to come within the scope of Article 3 of the Convention’.²⁹⁴

On the other hand, the Court does take into account the work of the prison visiting Committee introduced under the European Convention for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. This treaty introduced non-judicial preventive machinery to protect detainees. It is based on a system of visits of prisons and other facilities in which people are deprived of their liberty by the European Committee for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CPT).²⁹⁵ This Committee sometimes intervenes informally in pressing health situations of individual (groups of) detainees, especially in the context of prison visits. Moreover, Rule 32 of its Rules of Procedure, on ad hoc visits stipulates that in addition to its regular visits, ‘the Committee may carry out such ad hoc visits as appear to it to be required in the circumstances’. When the Committee is not in session, the Bureau (consisting of a smaller group of CPT members and several staff members servicing the Committee) may, ‘in case of urgency, decide on the Committee's behalf on the carrying out of an ad hoc visit’. ‘The President of the Committee shall report to the Committee at its next meeting on any action which has been taken under this paragraph’.²⁹⁶ The activities of CAT under the new Optional Protocol Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading ²⁹¹ See further Chapter XIII (Protection).

²⁹² ECtHR Kudla v. Poland, Judgment of 26 October 2000, §93.

²⁹³ Id., §94.

²⁹⁴ Id., §99.

²⁹⁵ See also Recommendation (2006)2 of the Council of Europe Committee of Ministers to member States on the European Prison Rules, adopted 11 January 2006 (952nd meeting).

²⁹⁶ CPT Rules of Procedure CPT/Inf/C (2008) 1.

Treatment or Punishment²⁹⁷ (comparable to the European Convention against Torture) will likely confirm this. Its entry into force may also trigger cases being brought before CAT under the individual complaint proceedings, with the ensuing possibility of CAT using provisional measures in detention cases in a manner similar to that of the other adjudicators.

4 CONCLUSION

In several cases the human rights adjudicators have shown sensitivity towards the health and safety of detainees pending the proceedings.

The HRC has used (informal) provisional measures mainly, but not exclusively, on behalf of political detainees. It seems to have used requests to ensure access to medical care and requests for information interchangeably. The HRC has not clarified why it used informal provisional measures dealing with medical treatment (either requests for information or requests to ensure) under Rule 91 (current Rule 97) rather than formal provisional measures under Rule 86 (current Rule 92), but this may be explained by the fact that it initiated the tradition in its early years. It has not clearly distinguished those situations in which it only enquires about the health situation of a detainee from those in which it requests the State to take positive measures to ensure adequate medical care. In general its approach has been cumulative, first only inquiring, later also requesting positive measures. There are several cases in which the HRC requested the State to ensure adequate medical treatment pending the proceedings. Sometimes it has also mentioned the need to ensure this in its decision on the merits. Hence, in such cases there is a clear correlation between the ‘procedural’ request and the final determination of the case.

A request by the HRC for information about the health situation of a detainee is partly based on the Committee’s hope that it will influence the State to pay more attention to the health of the detainees involved, partly simply meant to help make a decision on the merits. A request to provide treatment, on the contrary, amounts to specifically asking the State for positive action. Such action clearly is required not just on behalf of the proceedings but on behalf of the alleged victim. In other words, it relates to the possible final outcome of the case.

Thus far the HRC has never used (informal) provisional measures in order to remedy detention situations for prisoners on death row (such as relating to a deteriorating health situation), although it has sometimes suggested such measures in decisions on the merits. One reason for this may be that the Secretariat only consults the Special Rapporteur on New Communications to initiate the case for registration and for any provisional measures. It generally does not consult the Rapporteur on New Communications when it subsequently receives information relating to threats or lack of medical treatment. It simply prepares this information for the Committee member assigned to the case when it will be discussed on admissibility and merits. It is recommended that the HRC should change this approach.

The Inter-American Commission and Court, the European Commission and Court and the Bosnia Chamber have also used provisional measures on behalf of ‘non-political’ detainees. Apart from demanding information adjudicators have also specifically requested States to ensure access to health care in detention. Because of the vulnerability of children circumstances of detention more rapidly result in irreparable harm to children than to adults. In their provisional measures, the HRC, the Inter-American Commission and the Inter-American Court have dealt with the specific situation of children in detention.

²⁹⁷ Adopted on 18 December 2002 at the fifty-seventh session of the General Assembly of the United Nations by resolution A/RES/57/199.

Provisional measures have been used to order a halt to violent situations in detention. This chapter also argued that the use of provisional measures to order a halt to disputed interrogation methods or treatment in detention is certainly feasible as well.

On occasion the European Commission and Court have used provisional measures vis-à-vis the petitioners instead of the State in order for them to stop their hunger strike. The Inter-American Commission and Court do not use provisional measures to this end.²⁹⁸ The European Court has incidentally used provisional measures to halt re-imprisonment of petitioners who had been hospitalized because of the after-effects of long-term hunger-strikes, which indicates its focus on preventing irreparable harm.

Both the texts of the respective provisions and the interpretation of the adjudicators in decisions on the merits confirm the fundamental nature of the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment, the special position of detainees and the positive obligations of States to ensure their access to health care and respect their dignity. The use of provisional measures requiring States to take protective measures on behalf of detainees in various contexts, while the case is pending, is firmly based on this case law.

²⁹⁸ See also Chapter XIII, section 4, criticizing the European approach.

CHAPTER VIII

ENSURING PROCEDURAL RIGHTS TO PROTECT THE RIGHT TO LIFE AND PERSONAL INTEGRITY

1 INTRODUCTION

The HRC, the Inter-American Commission and the ECtHR have used provisional measures requesting States to provide information on and ensure access to court and counsel for persons detained incommunicado.¹ At first sight these measures relate to due process and arbitrary detention and are not aimed at preventing irreparable harm to persons, but rather to the claim and, indirectly, to the individual complaint procedure. Yet this chapter argues that these provisional measures also aim at preventing irreparable harm to persons. They appear to have been based on fears for the life and physical integrity of the persons detained.

The issues of incommunicado detention and access to court and counsel have received increasing attention in the context of the counter-terrorism measures introduced by the US after the terrorist attacks of 11 September 2001, mainly in the context of extra-territorial detention of so-called 'unlawful combatants', for instance at Guantanamo Bay.²

The provisional measures used in order to ensure procedural rights³ could be considered a very rudimentary form of international habeas corpus, aimed at helping ensure domestic habeas corpus in the most serious cases. Indeed, one could also consider, as Cançado Trindade does, that all provisional measures are a 'kind of an embryo of an international habeas corpus',⁴ not just those aimed at ensuring procedural rights, but this chapter just deals with the latter.

¹ Similar to its requests to provide information about and medical attention for an alleged victim or to protect against threats, mentioned in the previous chapters.

² See e.g. Joint Report on the Situation of detainees at Guantánamo Bay prepared by the Chairperson of the UN Working Group on Arbitrary Detention, the Special Rapporteur on torture, the Special Rapporteur on the independence of judges and lawyers, the Special Rapporteur on freedom of religion or belief and the Special Rapporteur on the right of everyone to enjoy the highest attainable standard of physical and mental health, E/CN.4/2006/120, 27 February 2006. See in general about the respect for human rights in this context e.g. Report of the UN Special Rapporteur on the promotion and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms while countering terrorism, Martin Scheinin, E/CN.4/2006/98, 28 December 2005 and Communications with Governments, E/CN.4/2006/98/Add. 1, 23 December 2005; Report, UN Independent Expert Robert Goldman on the promotion and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms while countering terrorism, E/CN.4/2005/103, 7 February 2005; UN High Commissioner's Digest of Jurisprudence on Terrorism, 28 July 2003, <<http://www.unhchr.ch/html/menu6/2/digest.doc>> (last consulted 2 October 2006); CIDH report on terrorism and human rights, OEA/Ser.L/V/II.116, Doc. 5 rev.1 corr., 22 October 2002; Guidelines of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe on human rights and the fight against terrorism, 11 July 2002. See also The Berlin Declaration of the International Commission of Jurists on Upholding Human Rights and the Rule of Law in Combating Terrorism, 28 August 2004 and The Cleveland Principles on the Detention & Treatment of Persons in Connection with 'The Global War on Terror', adopted at a Conference at Case Western Reserve University School of Law, Ohio, 7 October 2005 and subsequently endorsed by many other experts.

³ This book deals with procedural rights.

⁴ Interview of author with IACHR President Cançado Trindade, San José, Costa Rica, December 2001.

As in the previous chapters, section 3 deals with the relation of these provisional measures to the decisions on the merits. They all involve procedural rights cases linked to the right to life and the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment.

2 THE PRACTICE OF THE ADJUDICATORS

2.1 Introduction

The HRC, the Inter-American and African Commissions and the ECtHR have all used provisional measures ensuring procedural rights.

2.2 HRC

There have been a few cases in which the HRC has used formal or ‘informal’ provisional measures concerning the right of habeas corpus, access to counsel, family and consul.⁵

In Marais v. Madagascar (1983) the alleged victim, a South African national, had been a passenger on a chartered aircraft that had been forced to make an emergency landing in Madagascar in January 1977, because of lack of fuel. Together with the pilot he was arrested and tried for flying over Malagasy territory and sentenced to five-year imprisonment.⁶ In March 1981, two years after initial submission, the HRC noted with concern that it had received no further information or clarifications in response to two earlier requests. It ‘strongly urged’ the State to provide this information without delay, including on the alleged victim’s state of health and whereabouts. In addition it requested information on his access to his legal representative, Maître Eric Hammel. It requested the State to remove any obstacles barring Hammel’s access to his client, ‘should there hitherto have been any obstacles’. The State should ‘ensure that the lawyer and his client had the proper facilities for effective access to each other’.⁷ When the HRC declared the case admissible it reiterated that the State party should ensure proper access to legal counsel and on the merits it found a violation of Article 14(3)(b) and (d) ICCPR because the authorities had denied the petitioner adequate opportunities to communicate with his counsel, Maître Hammel.⁸

In Muteba v. Zaire (1990)⁹ the HRC requested the State, almost a month after initial submission in 1982, to inform it whether Mr. Muteba had been able to contact a lawyer and whether he had been brought before a court.¹⁰ This was a request additional to the usual request for copies of court decisions. Possibly the HRC decided to ask this additional question not just because it needed it in order to make a determination on the merits, but also as an informal intervention, pending the proceedings before it, to remind the State to ensure access to counsel as well as the right to habeas corpus. In March 1983 the HRC declared Muteba’s case admissible. Again it requested the State to inform it whether the alleged victim ‘had effective contacts with a lawyer and whether he had been brought before a court’.¹¹ Subsequently it found violations of Articles 7

⁵ See about ‘informal’ provisional measures Chapter VI (Disappearances).

⁶ See also HRC John Wight v. Madagascar, 1 April 1985.

⁷ See also Chapter VII on intervention in detention situations involving risks to health and safety.

⁸ On 11 February 1982 Maître Hammel was expelled from Madagascar. From France he continued to represent Dave Marais before the HRC.

⁹ HRC Muteba v. Congo (Zaire), 24 July 1984.

¹⁰ See also the health inquiry and request to ensure adequate medical care.

¹¹ HRC admissibility decision of 25 March 1983 as referred to in Muteba v. Congo (Zaire), 24 July 1984, §7.

and 10, in particular in light of his incommunicado detention. He was entitled to ‘effective remedies, including compensation’ and the State was required to halt an inquiry, punish those responsible and to ‘take steps to ensure that similar violations do not occur in the future’.¹²

A. et al. v. Angola (disc. 2000) was another case relating to a private airplane from South Africa, 21 years after the case against Madagascar.¹³ The plane had been forced to land by the Angolan authorities. Counsel for five passengers and three crew members on board the aircraft approached the South-African Department of Foreign Affairs as well as the HRC. She pointed out that her clients had been detained for almost four weeks without formal charge, during which time the South-African consulate had not been allowed access to them. Neither the South-African authorities nor the families had received any information about their detention or about legal assistance. She noted that family members of three of them had flown to Angola but had been denied access to the detainees. She emphasized that due to the lack of information, family members feared for the safety of the detainees.¹⁴ She requested urgent attention to her clients’ plight, as they had already been detained for almost a month. She pointed out that, according to the information available, there had been no military equipment or cargo of a dubious nature on board the aircraft, but rather foodstuffs and building materials. She pointed out that the Angolan authorities had not afforded consular access to the South-African authorities. There was no information whatsoever on the reasons for their detention or what was going to happen to them. Because of this they were also unable to appoint a legal representative in Angola: there were neither instructions nor factual information on the basis of which such a representative could represent the detainees effectively and properly. In light of the unwillingness to provide information and allow access to them she argued her clients should be released immediately.¹⁵ A few weeks later counsel pointed out that the captain, the co-pilot and the flight engineer had been released and sent back to South-Africa. Counsel spoke with two of them, from which conversation it appeared that they were not aware of the reasons for their release and did not know the whereabouts of the passengers. According to counsel it appeared from this conversation that the persons still detained were passengers ‘who could quite possibly not have been aware as to where the flight was going to go and what the purpose of the flight was’. She requested advice on what could be done to secure their prompt release.¹⁶

Upon receipt of this submission by counsel the Special Rapporteur transmitted the case to the State in as far as it concerned the five persons still detained. He also formally used provisional measures requesting the State to bring the detainees ‘before a court without delay, and to allow them access to their legal representative, family and the South-African consul’.¹⁷

These three cases dealt with by the HRC may be linked to lack of information and fears for the lives and physical integrity of detainees, often detained incommunicado.

¹² HRC Muteba v. Congo (Zaire), 24 July 1984, §13.

¹³ HRC A. et al. v. Angola, disc. 1 August 2000.

¹⁴ HRC Letter by counsel of 13 February 1998 in A. et al. v. Angola (on file with the author).

¹⁵ HRC Submission of 18 February 1998 in A. et al. v. Angola (on file with the author).

¹⁶ HRC Submission of 10 March 1998 in A. et al. v. Angola (on file with the author).

¹⁷ HRC Note Verbale to the State of 10 March 1998, A. et al. v. Angola (on file with the author). In May and August of that year the HRC requested information from counsel and in January 2001 it informed her that it had decided to discontinue the case in the absence of replies to its letters. Letter to counsel of 3 January 2001 informing her of the decision at the Committee’s 69th session to discontinue the case (on file with the author).

2.3 Inter-American system

In February 2002 US NGOs filed a petition with the Inter-American Commission calling illegal the detention at Guantanamo Bay (the US naval base in Cuba) of al-Qaeda and Taliban suspects without charge and without the protection of prisoner of war status.¹⁸ They stated:

“Although the United States has an obligation and right to arrest and try the perpetrators of the horrendous crimes of Sept.11, it must do so in compliance with fundamental principles of national, human rights and humanitarian law”.

The Bush administration had refused to consider any of the 300 (at the time) detainees from 26 countries as prisoners of war.¹⁹ It said that they were fighting for an illegal terrorist group and for a government that was not recognised. The detainees apparently might be tried in closed military tribunals (i.e. by ‘faceless’ judges) that could sentence them to death with a simple two-thirds vote from a military commission.²⁰ They had no access to counsel and had not been informed of the charges against them. The petitioners requested the Commission to demand that the US give the detainees official prisoner of war status. The Vice-President of the Centre for Constitutional Rights, one of the petitioners in this case, stated ‘either they were picked up on the battle field, in which case they’re POWs, or they did something criminal, in which case they should be charged. There is no legal limbo status’.²¹

In March 2002 the Inter-American Commission (CIDH) took precautionary measures and requested the US ‘to take the urgent measures necessary to have the legal status of the detainees at Guantanamo Bay determined by a competent tribunal’.²² It wrote that the available information suggested that the detainees were at the ‘unfettered discretion’ of the US government. It concluded that without clarification of their legal status, their rights under international and domestic law ‘[could not] be said to be the subject of effective legal protection’. No person under the authority and control of a State could be deprived of his fundamental and non-derogable rights and in this case humanitarian law might be relevant next to human rights law. It concluded that the precautionary measures were ‘both appropriate and necessary in the present circumstances, in order to ensure that the legal status of each of the detainees is clarified and that they are afforded

¹⁸ See on the legal status of the detainees or the various proposals for military commissions to try them e.g.: Gill/Van Sliedrecht (2005); Amann (2004); Paust (2004a); Steyn (2004); Dahlstrom (2003); Paust (2003); see also Amnesty International, ‘Bosnia-Herzegovina. Unlawful detention of six men from Bosnia-Herzegovina in Guantánamo Bay’, AI Index Eur 63/013/2003, 30 May 2003; for a defense of the US policies see Yoo/Ho (2003).

¹⁹ By October 2005 the number of persons detained at Guantanamo was reported to be 595, see CIDH Precautionary measure of 28 October 2005 (all precautionary measures in this case have been made available at the website of the Center for Constitutional Rights, one of the petitioners in this case: <http://www.ccr-ny.org/v2/legal/september_11th/sept11Article.asp?ObjID=7lt0qaX9CP&Content=134>; consulted 5 october 2006).

²⁰ The term ‘faceless judges’ became colloquial in the context of Fujimori’s reign in Peru, where suspects accused of terrorism were tried by a panel of anonymous judges, whose faces had also been made unrecognisable.

²¹ Associated Press (Ian James), 25 February 2002.

²² CIDH Guantanamo Bay case, Precautionary measures of 12 March 2002, 41 ILM (2002), p. 532, also published in 23(1-4) Human Rights Law Journal 15 (2002), pp. 14-15 and 96 American Journal of International Law (2002), pp. 730-731. See on the Commission’s precautionary measures in this case e.g. Tittmore (2006); Cerone (2005); Cerna (2004) and Shelton (2002).

the legal protections commensurate with the status that they are found to possess, which may in no case fall below the minimum standards of non-derogable rights'.²³

In its precautionary measure the CIDH pointed out that by depriving the detainees at Guantanamo Bay of their right to an independent determination of their status, the US had also 'effectively deprived them of any other due process rights to which they might be entitled'.²⁴

Indeed the ICRC has noted that international humanitarian law currently does not recognise the status of 'unlawful combatant'. Thus, the detainees should have either prisoner of war or civilian status. As the ICRC put it "There is no intermediate status; nobody in enemy hands can be outside the law".²⁵

Among others the US had claimed that the Commission's precautionary measures were inappropriate because they did not involve cases in which the life or physical integrity were under 'imminent threat of immediate harm'.²⁶ It requested the Commission to reverse its precautionary measures. The petitioners, on the other hand, observed that the CIDH was not obliged to 'confine itself to situations in which there is a threat to life and personal integrity'.²⁷ Moreover, they pointed out that their lives and personal integrity were indeed at risk and that judicial review was essential to the protection of these rights. It noted that the government did not cite independent sources to substantiate its claims that the detainees were treated humanely. They also referred to the reported increase in mental disorders among the detainees.²⁸ The petitioners noted that the ²³ Ibid. See also the follow-up precautionary measure of 23 July 2002. According to the Vice-President of the Centre for Constitutional Rights the Commission's decision was 'a victory for advocates of the rule of law and due process. Failure to abide by the Commission's recommendation would be a lawless act and a violation of the US' treaty obligations'. Press Release Center for Constitutional Rights, 13 March 2002 (on file with the author; archived press releases at <www.ccr-ny.org> only go back to November 2002; consulted 5 October 2006). See also Chapters XVII (Official responses) and XVIII (Follow-up).

²⁴ See CIDH Guantanamo Bay case, Observations by the Center for Constitutional Rights, the Human Rights Clinic at Columbia Law School and the Center for Justice and International Law on the US response to the Commission's precautionary measures of 12 March 2002, 13 May 2002, p. 19, available at <http://www.ccr-ny.org/v2/legal/september_11th/docs/5-13-02ObservationsonGovtResponse.pdf> (consulted 5 October 2006). See also e.g. Special Rapporteur on the promotion and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms while countering terrorism, Martin Scheinin, Mission to the US, A/HRC/6/17/Add.3, 22 November 2007, pp. 9-11.

²⁵ ICRC Commentary on Geneva Convention IV relative to the protection of civilian persons in time of war, Geneva 1958, p. 51 and further references in CIDH Detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Observations by the Center for Constitutional Rights, the Human Rights Clinic at Columbia Law School and the Center for Justice and International Law on the US response to the Commission's precautionary measures of 13 March 2002, 13 May 2002, p. 20.

²⁶ CIDH Detainees at Guantanamo Bay, US response to the Commission's precautionary measures of 12 March 2002, §32.

²⁷ CIDH Detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Observations by the Center for Constitutional Rights, the Human Rights Clinic at Columbia Law School and the Center for Justice and International Law on the US response to the Commission's precautionary measures of 12 March 2002, 13 May 2002, p. 23.

²⁸ CIDH Detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Observations by the Center for Constitutional Rights, the Human Rights Clinic at Columbia Law School and the Center for Justice and International Law on the US response to the Commission's precautionary measures of 12 March 2002, 13 May 2002, pp. 24-25.

majority of Guantanamo detainees were still detained incommunicado.²⁹ Moreover, the US had not disputed the fact that none of the detainees had had access to counsel.³⁰ The CIDH subsequently confirmed and expanded its measures.³¹

As the CIDH already stressed in its first precautionary measure regarding the ‘unlawful combatants’ at Guantanamo Bay, ‘no person under the authority and control of a state, regardless of his or her circumstances, is devoid of legal protection for his or her fundamental and non-derogable human rights’.³² It explained its precautionary measures as appropriate and necessary ‘in order to ensure that the legal status of each of the detainees is clarified and that they are afforded the legal protections commensurate with the status that they are found to possess, which may in no case fall below the minimum standards of non-derogable rights’.³³

This indicates that, from the start, the importance of protecting the non-derogable rights of detainees was the rationale for the use of precautionary measures. Without legal recourse (regarding their status and detention) and access to counsel the detainees were at risk of irreparable harm.

To some extent, as a scholar and staff member of the Commission put it, the precautionary measures by the CIDH may be seen as injunctive measures taken in order to prevent prejudice to the positions of the parties. Yet there are many situations in which they should be regarded more as a ‘protective mechanism to preclude the imminent perpetration of human rights violations against the life or personal integrity of a person or group of persons’.³⁴ In other words, they aim to ‘prevent imminent violations of substantive human rights’ or preserve the Commission’s ‘ability to adjudicate upon consummated violations’.³⁵

In July 2002 CIDH reiterated its precautionary measures for the first time. Moreover, it noted that additional information had augmented its concerns. “In particular, as indicated by the Petitioners and as reported in the media, the manner in which certain detainees at Guantanamo Bay were captured raises reasonable doubts concerning whether they belong to the enemy’s armed forces or related groups”. Among others it referred to information about the presence of six Algerian citizens arrested by US authorities in Bosnia.³⁶

Two years later, in July 2004, the CIDH pointed out that information had surfaced ‘suggesting that U.S. government officials and agencies have developed legal policies and guidelines concerning the methods of treatment and interrogation that are inconsistent with well-established international standards governing humane treatment’.³⁷ In a very important statement it observed

²⁹ In January 2002 the ICRC only spoke with an ‘unspecified handful of detainees’ and the ‘almost complete lack of contact’ of the detainees ‘with the outside world may violate the non-derogable right to be free from cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment’.

³⁰ CIDH Detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Observations by the Center for Constitutional Rights, the Human Rights Clinic at Columbia Law School and the Center for Justice and International Law on the US response to the Commission’s precautionary measures of 12 March 2002, 13 May 2002, pp. 25-26.

³¹ CIDH Detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Precautionary measures of 23 July 2002, 18 March 2003, 29 July 2004 and 28 October 2005.

³² CIDH Detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Precautionary measures of 12 March 2002, p. 4.

³³ CIDH Detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Precautionary measures of 12 March 2002, pp. 4-5.

³⁴ Tittmore (2006), p. 381.

³⁵ Tittmore (2006), p. 382.

³⁶ CIDH Detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Precautionary measures of 23 July 2002. See also Chapter IV (Non-refoulement), referring to the transfer by the Bosnian to the US authorities contrary to a provisional measure by the Bosnia Chamber.

³⁷ CIDH Detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Precautionary measures of 29 July 2004, p. 2, referring among others to the defense department memo on ‘Counter-resistance techniques’ prepared by Pentagon general counsel William J. Hayes II and approved by the US secretary of defense on 2 December 2002, available at <<http://www.cdi.org/news/law/memos-release.cfm>> and <<http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Jun2004/d20040622doc6.pdf>> (consulted 5 October 2006).

that this information ‘appears to contradict previous assurances provided to the Commission by Your Excellency’s government that it is the United States’ policy to treat all detainees and conduct all interrogations, wherever they may occur, in a manner consistent with the commitment to prevent torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, and, if correct, may also have contributed to an environment in which a lack of clarity in standards of treatment facilitated the possible perpetration of abuses’.³⁸ The Commission also requested information regarding the allegation that persons under the age of eighteen were detained in Guantanamo and that they had not been segregated from the adult population.³⁹

In addition, in October 2005 the Commission expanded its precautionary measures specifically emphasizing the importance of investigating allegations of torture. The Commission also pointed out that the US should not use ‘diplomatic assurances’ to circumvent its non-refoulement obligations.⁴⁰

The measures referred not only to the importance of clarifying the legal status of the detainees and of granting them legal recourse and access to counsel, but also expressed concern regarding reports about the possible ill-treatment of detainees, requesting specific information on the whereabouts, status and treatment of detainees in places other than Guantanamo Bay.⁴¹ Moreover, the Commission emphasized the principle of non-refoulement from Guantanamo to other States where detainees would be at risk of irreparable harm to their life or personal integrity. It specified the procedural rights that should help prevent this refoulement. Moreover diplomatic assurances should not be used to circumvent the obligation of non-refoulement. Regarding the treatment of detainees in Guantanamo Bay itself, it emphasized the need for thorough and impartial investigations and prosecutions. The authorities were not to use statements obtained through torture (unless in proceedings to prosecute acts of torture).⁴² The consecutive expansions of the precautionary measures by the CIDH in the Guantanamo case illustrate further the underlying rationale of provisional measures in that they relate to non-refoulement (Chapter V), disappearances (Chapter VI) and detention (Chapter VII) as well.

In a Resolution of July 2006 the CIDH concluded that the US failure to give effect to its precautionary measures had ‘resulted in irreparable prejudice to the fundamental rights of the detainees at Guantanamo Bay including the rights to liberty and to humane treatment’. It urged the US, among others, to close Guantanamo without delay.⁴³

³⁸ CIDH Detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Precautionary measures of 29 July 2004, p. 2 (with footnote referring to the US submission of 24 December 2003, pp. 13-17).

³⁹ CIDH Detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Precautionary measures of 29 July 2004, p. 3.

⁴⁰ CIDH Detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Precautionary measures of 28 October 2005.

⁴¹ CIDH Detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Precautionary measures of 18 March 2003 and 29 July 2004. See also CIDH Precautionary measures of 22 September 2002 on behalf of an unknown number of foreign nationals detained in the US itself following 11 September 2001.

⁴² CIDH Detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Precautionary measures of 28 October 2005.

⁴³ CIDH Resolution 1/06 in Press Release 27/06, ‘Inter-American Commission urges to close Guantanamo without delay’, 28 July 2006, available at <<http://www.cidh.org/Comunicados/English/2006/27.06eng.htm>> (consulted 6 October 2006). Several developments took place domestically, which cannot be discussed extensively here. In Hamdan v. Rumsfeld (2006), for instance, the US Supreme Court finally determined that the military commissions constituted under the Military Order were unlawful. It found that they had not been expressly authorised by the US Congress and were in violation of both international law and US military law. US Supreme Court Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, 548 U.S. 557 (2006) (29 June 2006). Available at <www.supremecourt.gov/opinions/05pdf/05-184.pdf> (consulted 6 October 2006). In September 2006 the US President successfully proposed new legislation and confirmed that the CIA had been using secret detention and ‘alternative’ interrogation techniques. He remarked that ‘unfortunately, the recent Supreme Court decision put the future of this program in question, and we need this legislation to save it’. US President’s Radio Address of 12 September 2006,

In August 2008 a case was brought before the Inter-American Commission on behalf of Djamel Ameziane who had been detained at Guantanamo for more than six years. As part of this complaint a request was made for precautionary measures. On 20 August 2008 the Commission indeed used precautionary measures. Rather than involving the auxiliary rights of access to court and counsel, these measures dealt directly with the prevention of ill-treatment in detention and with the prohibition of refoulement.⁴⁴ The Commission requested the State to immediately take all measures necessary to ensure that he is not subjected to ill-treatment or torture, that he has access to medical care, that he is not transferred to Algeria contrary to the principle of non-refoulement. The Commission also noted that diplomatic assurances could not serve to circumvent the prohibition of refoulement.⁴⁵

Even once Guantanamo is closed (as it had been for a brief period before 11 September 2001),⁴⁶ any official (or unofficial) continuation of the secret detention policy and the use of certain interrogation methods would warrant continued monitoring by the CIDH and others and may trigger further precautionary measures also involving access to court and counsel.

2.4 African system

In April 2002 a petition had been filed against Eritrea on behalf of eleven former government employees who had been detained in September 2001 and were since being held incommunicado. It was alleged that they could be prisoners of conscience, that their whereabouts were 'currently unknown' and that they had 'not been given access to their families or lawyers'. The petitioners feared for their safety.⁴⁷ The African Commission took several increasingly specific provisional measures in this case. In May 2002 it took a provisional measure requesting the President of Eritrea 'to intervene in the matter being complained of pending the outcome of the consideration of the complaint before the Commission'.⁴⁸ Later that month the Ministry of Foreign Affairs responded that the alleged victims 'had their quarters in appropriate government facilities, had not been ill-treated, have had continued access to medical services and that the government was making every effort to bring them before an appropriate court of law as early as possible'.⁴⁹ In October of that year the Commission followed up on its 'urgent appeal' by reminding the State <<http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/09/20060916.html>>. For a critical discussion of the compromise reached between three Republican senators and President Bush see Paust (2006). See also Amnesty International, 18 September 2006. The Military Commissions Act was accepted in October 2006 and it notes that the 'habeas stripping' provisions apply to all cases without exception. The military Commissions Act also allows the use of evidence extracted from certain 'interrogation techniques' as long as these were used before the end of 2005 when the Detainee Treatment Act became law. On 12 June 2008, in Boumediene v. Bush, 553 U.S. (2008), 128 S. Ct. 2229 (12 June 2008), with a 5-4 majority the US Supreme Court found that detainees at Guantanamo did have habeas corpus rights and that the Detainee Treatment Act (2005) did not provide an adequate and effective substitute for such habeas.

⁴⁴ See Chapters VII (Detention) and V (Non-refoulement).

⁴⁵ See Center for Constitutional Rights, press release, 21 August 2008, <<http://ccrjustice.org/newsroom/press-releases/inter-american-commission-human-rights-moves-halt-torture-guantanamo%3A-orders>>.

⁴⁶ See CIDH press release 02/09 on the decision by the new US President, Barack Obama, 'IACHR welcomes order to close Guantanamo detention center', 27 January 2009, at <<http://www.cidh.org/Comunicados/English/2009/02-09eng.htm>> (consulted 27 January 2009).

⁴⁷ African Commission Liesbeth Zegveld and Mussie Ephrem v. Eritrea, November 2003.

⁴⁸ Id., §10.

⁴⁹ Id., §12.

that it was its General Prosecutor's responsibility to bring the accused 'before a competent court of law in accordance with the rules guaranteeing fair trial under relevant national and international instruments'.⁵⁰ In June 2003 the Chairperson of the Commission once more appealed to the President of Eritrea 'to intervene in this matter and urge the authorities holding the 11 individuals to release them or bring them before the courts in Eritrea'.⁵¹ This example indicates that the African Commission has also used provisional measures to ensure access to court and counsel. Equally, in this case the prevention of ill treatment and disappearances seems to have been an underlying rationale for the use of this type of provisional measure.

2.5 European system

With regard to the European system two cases are discussed, one against Turkey, involving access to counsel and the right to life, and the other against Russia, about access to counsel and the protection of personal integrity. The first case relates to the situation of PKK leader Öcalan subsequent to his arrest. A case was brought before the ECtHR on his behalf in which his (Dutch) counsel requested the Court to take provisional measures to ensure access to counsel.⁵² Despite counsel's emphasis on the serious threat of torture or disappearance, and the importance of immediate access of Turkish and foreign lawyers to the petitioner, as well as immediate medical examination, initially the ECtHR did not take provisional measures.⁵³

Yet a remarkable aspect of this case is the fact that the Registry of the Court immediately issued a press release on the submission of the case and the request for provisional measures.⁵⁴ Subsequently it issued another press release pointing out that a Chamber of seven judges deliberated on the request and decided that 'at this stage' the use of provisional measures was 'not appropriate'. At the same time, given 'the gravity of the allegations', the Court decided 'to seek clarification from the Turkish authorities on a number of points concerning the circumstances of Mr Öcalan's arrest and detention'. In particular it asked the Turkish Government for a speedy response to a request for information on the question of Mr Öcalan's access to lawyers.⁵⁵ In the ⁵⁰ Id., §15.

⁵¹ Id., §19. During the 33rd Ordinary Session of the Commission petitioner Zegveld submitted that local counsel were unable to pursue the case domestically for fear of jeopardising their legal practice and even personal persecution. The State responded that the petitioners' assertion in this respect was 'speculative' and that Zegveld herself 'should accredit herself to the courts in Eritrea to enable her to bring this matter before the local courts', §32. In October 2002 the Commission also took a provisional measure on behalf of journalists detained without charge in Liberia. The nature of this provisional measure was not specified. African Commission Samuel Kofi Woods, II and Kabineh M. Ja'neh v. Liberia, October 2002 (this may have been an informal rather than a formal provisional measure).

⁵² See generally Prakken (2005), Chapter 5 and Böhler (2000).

⁵³ ECtHR Application by Dutch counsel Britta Böhler and Ties Prakken of 16 February 1999 and follow-up fax of 17 February 1999 by counsel Stijn Franken pointing out not only that Böhler and Prakken were staying in the transit area of Istanbul airport, not being allowed to enter, but also that domestic counsel were besieged by Turkish police or security forces, that several attorneys had already been arrested and that Mr Öcalan had not been granted access to counsel (on file with the author).

⁵⁴ ECtHR Press Release 96, 18 February 1999, available at <<http://cmiskp.echr.coe.int/tkp197/view.asp?item=8&portal=hbkm&action=html&highlight=&sessionid=8696144&skin=hu-doc-pr-en>> (consulted 6 October 2006).

⁵⁵ It invoked Rule 54 §3 (a) of its Rules. See ECtHR Press Release 106, 23 February 1999, available at <<http://cmiskp.echr.coe.int/tkp197/view.asp?item=1&portal=hbkm&action=>

Court's letter to the petitioner's counsel providing information on the clarification sought from the Government, the gravity of the allegations was specified by reference to Articles 2 and 3 ECHR. In addition, the Court pointed out that it attached particular importance to the possibility of the petitioner to be assisted by lawyers both in the criminal proceedings against him and in the proceedings before the ECtHR. It requested the State to provide such information within three days.⁵⁶

While initially it had refused the provisional measures requested, the next month the ECtHR did decide to take such measures with regard to compliance with the requirements of Article 6 ECHR. In its letter informing counsel of these measures it explained that it took its decision '[b]earing in mind that the applicant risks being tried by a tribunal which the Court has found in two cases not to be in conformity with Article 6 of the Convention and that procedural guarantees assume even greater importance in a case, such as the present, involving the death penalty'. As part of the provisional measure it requested the State to take all necessary steps to secure Öcalan's rights under Article 6 ECHR, to fully respect the rights of the defence, particularly Öcalan's right 'to have effective consultations in private with the lawyers representing him' in the proceedings brought against him in Turkey. Moreover, the State should also enable him effectively to exercise his right of individual petition to the ECtHR, 'through the lawyers of his choice'.⁵⁷

Turkey, however, did not wish to comply with this provisional measure because it considered that it 'went far beyond the scope of interim measures within the meaning of Rule 39'.⁵⁸ In its submission to the Court it stressed that the provisional measures were unprecedented. The practice of the former Commission had always related to issues of non-refoulement, whereby one could speak of an irreversible situation. The criterion of irreparable harm, inherent in the notion of provisional measures, had never been verified in the present case and the Court had not put forward any other justification. The State added that domestic recourse had not even been initiated at this stage and that the provisional measures constituted a 'grave anticipation' of the case, hindering the domestic proceedings. It regretted that the Court had decided to take provisional measures 'based on unfounded allegations by foreign counsel' and considered that the Court's 'unjustified and unmotivated' decisions risked harming the credibility of the system, the most important attribute of which ought to be the legal certainty of the proceedings, avoiding that the Court would succumb to external pressure.⁵⁹ In other words, the State seemed to imply that the provisional measures were unrelated to Articles 2 and 3 ECHR, that Öcalan should first exhaust domestic remedies and that the provisional measures relating to a fair trial and access to counsel would somehow hinder domestic proceedings. The State also suggested that the Court's provisional measures harmed legal certainty by taking seriously the petitioner's allegations.

Different from what was suggested by the State the Court does appear to have had in mind the protection of the right to life and the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment in its use of html&highlight=%F6calan&sessionid=8696144&skin=hudoc-pr-en (consulted 6 October 2006).

⁵⁶ Letter by Secretariat ECtHR to counsel Ties Prakken, 23 February 1999 (on file with the author). According to this Letter the State had also been requested to provide information, among others, on the conditions of his (incommunicado) detention, the frequency of the interrogations and the medical supervision of his treatment and state of health.

⁵⁷ Letter Registry to counsel Ties Prakken, 4 March 1999 referring to its use of Rule 39 (on file with the author). The Court's Press Release of 4 March 1999, announcing these provisional measures, is not currently available at the website of the ECtHR, but see Information Note No. 5 on the case-law of the Court, April 1999, available at <<http://www.echr.coe.int/Eng/InformationNotes/INFONOTENo05.html>> (consulted 6 October 2006). See also Garry (2001), p. 402 and Spronken (2001), p. 442.

⁵⁸ ECtHR Information Note 5, April 1999, p. 6.

⁵⁹ Submission by Turkey of 8 March 1999 (on file with the author).

provisional measures in this case, even specifically referring to the fact that the case involved the death penalty. Indeed the Court was not the only non-national body making the link between the importance of access to counsel and the right to life and prohibition of torture and cruel treatment. On the day the case was brought before the Court the UN Special Rapporteur on Torture already appealed to Turkey to ensure Öcalan's right to physical integrity, requesting information on his circumstances and calling for 'immediate access to legal counsel'.⁶⁰ Moreover, the European Committee for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CPT) visited him on 2 March 1999, concluding that his 'somatic health' was good, but expressing concern about the potentially negative effects on his mental health 'of being held on his own in a remote location under a high security regime'. Among others the CPT remarked: 'Of course, it is also of crucial importance, from a number of standpoints, that Mr Öcalan be guaranteed adequate access to a lawyer. However, the CPT does not intend to pursue this matter, given that the European Court of Human Rights has adopted interim measures on the subject'.⁶¹

A few days after the State's submission, counsel for the petitioner pointed out that their client was still in 'almost complete isolation'.⁶² On the exhaustion of domestic remedies counsel pointed out that there was no obligation to seek remedies that are inadequate or ineffective and they referred to the maximum security measures taken against him, including his incommunicado detention.⁶³ They also referred to earlier judgment by the ECtHR that trial by the Turkish State Security Court was not in conformity with the impartiality requirement of Article 6 ECHR. Moreover, counsel added that the Court's provisional measures regarding fair trial and access to counsel, taken a week previously, had had 'no positive effect on the proceedings'.⁶⁴

Later that month the ECtHR responded by following up on its earlier provisional measure. It requested further information on its implementation and referred specifically to the request in the last paragraph of its provisional measures to keep it informed 'of all measures taken by the authorities to implement the above request'. It asked questions on all aspects of its provisional measures. Among others it wished to know how frequently his lawyers were 'able to visit him and under what conditions of privacy', to what extent military personnel were involved in the prison visits, 'what steps have been taken by the authorities to ensure that the applicant is not hindered in the effective exercise of the right of individual petition' to the ECtHR. It also questioned whether he had been 'permitted to correspond with his lawyers representing him in these proceedings,' and, if so, under what conditions? Had he 'been free to receive visits' from his lawyers in this respect? Finally, the Court wished to know whether the petitioner would be tried before the State Security Court and, if so, what would be the composition of this court.⁶⁵ It appears that the spe-

⁶⁰ UN Special Rapporteur on Torture, Press release of 16 February 1999.

⁶¹ Visit to Turkey by the European Committee for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CPT) from 27 February to 3 March 1999, letter of 22 March 1999, <<http://www.cpt.coe.int/documents/tur/1999-05-04-eng.htm#APPENDIX>> (consulted 6 October 2006).

⁶² He had only been able to see his domestic counsel on 25 February (ten days after his arrest) and on 11 March 1999. The only other contact with the outside world had been a visit by a delegation of the European Committee for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment.

⁶³ They reminded the Court that the two visits by domestic counsel were very brief. The first lasted only 20 minutes and counsel were only allowed to discuss their client's general health situations. A judge and two masked military were present. The second visit could not take place in private either.

⁶⁴ Submission by counsel of 12 March 1999 (on file with the author).

⁶⁵ ECtHR Letter Registrar First Section to the State, 23 March 1999 (on file with the author). Subsequently the ECtHR also used provisional measures to halt the execution of the death cific questions all related to the petitioner's right to a fair trial in the context of the possible imposition of the death penalty and the Court's earlier experience with the proceedings before the State Security Court.

As noted, this is not the only occasion at which the ECtHR used provisional measures to ensure access of a detained petitioner to his lawyer.⁶⁶ In Shtukurov v. Russia (2008), for instance, the petitioner was confined in a psychiatric hospital against his will. In March 2006 the President of the Chamber dealing with his case decided to invoke Rule 39.⁶⁷ The judgment on the merits provides fairly specific information on what was required of the State.⁶⁸ The Government 'was directed to organise, by appropriate means, a meeting between the applicant and his lawyer. That meeting could take place in the presence of the personnel of the hospital where the applicant was detained, but outside their hearing. The lawyer was to be provided with the necessary time and facilities to consult with the applicant and help him in preparing the application before the European Court. The Russian Government was also requested not to prevent the lawyer from having such meeting with his client at regular intervals in future. The lawyer, in his turn, was obliged to be cooperative and comply with reasonable requirements of the hospital regulations'.⁶⁹

3 RELATION BETWEEN PROVISIONAL MEASURES TO ENSURE PROCEDURAL RIGHTS AND THE EXPECTED DECISION ON THE MERITS

3.1 Introduction

The foregoing shows that the few instances in which the adjudicators have taken provisional measures to ascertain the legal status of detainees and ensure their access to court and counsel all somehow relate to the right to life and the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment.

In fact they concern rights auxiliary to the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment. Were the above-mentioned provisional measures appropriate given the likelihood of success on the merits? One question in this respect is whether the adjudicators have determined, on the merits, whether procedural rights relating to the right to life and the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment have a special status in the human rights systems. Another question arose in the sentence imposed on Öcalan, see Press Release 683 of 30 November 1999 and Chapter III (Halting executions).

⁶⁶ See also ECtHR Shamayev et al. v. Georgia and Russia, 12 April 2005 (Rule 39 of 17 June 2003 for Russia to grant unhindered access by counsel to the extradited petitioners, especially for the preparation of the hearing).

⁶⁷ ECtHR (Grand Chamber) Shtukurov v. Russia, Judgment of 27 March 2008, §4.

⁶⁸ Generally on the specificity of provisional measures see Chapter XIII (Protection).

⁶⁹ ECtHR (Grand Chamber) Shtukurov v. Russia, 27 March 2008, §33. Yet the Chief Doctor of the hospital where the petitioner was detained informed the petitioner's lawyer 'that he did not regard the Court's decision on interim measures as binding. Furthermore, the applicant's mother objected to the meeting between the applicant and the lawyer', §35. Initially a domestic court declared that the ban on meetings between the petitioner and his lawyer was unlawful given the provisional measures by the ECtHR, §36, but this decision was reversed on appeal (that court found that the lawyer had not concluded an agreement with the applicant's mother, while she and not the petitioner was entitled to act on behalf of the petitioner in all legal transactions), §39. The petitioner was discharged from hospital on the same day and therefore able to meet with his lawyer and able to pursue the case before the ECtHR. See generally Chapter XVII on official State responses.

context of the detention of so-called ‘unlawful combatants’ at Guantanamo Bay: the extra-territorial responsibility of States.⁷⁰

3.2 Status of auxiliary rights

During armed conflicts humanitarian law is particularly relevant in the interpretation of applicable human rights norms. The CIDH has pointed out that human rights law remains applicable and that no derogation is allowed from certain of these rights, including the right to due process of law.⁷¹ The UN Special Rapporteur on Torture has referred to incommunicado detention as the most important determining factor for risk of torture.⁷² He has emphasized that basic legal safeguards such as habeas corpus and access to a lawyer within 24 hours of the detention as well as the right to inform a family member or friend of the detention ‘ensure his or her humane treatment while in detention’.⁷³ Indeed prompt and effective access of persons deprived of their liberty to ‘a judicial or other competent authority’ is a ‘key safeguard to prevent incidents of torture or other forms of ill-treatment’.⁷⁴ The right to be brought before a court and the right to counsel may serve as safeguards to prevent irreparable harm to persons.

The UN Commission on Human Rights has pointed out that prolonged incommunicado detention ‘may facilitate the perpetration of torture and can in itself constitute a form of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or even torture’.⁷⁵

The UN Working Group on Enforced and Involuntary Disappearances has confirmed the relevance of access to court and counsel in order to prevent disappearances.⁷⁶ In particular it pointed out that ‘any detention which is prolonged unreasonably or where the detainee is not charged so that he can be brought before a court is a violation of the Declaration’. Given the object and purpose of Art. 3 Declaration ‘the period in question should be as brief as possible, i.e., not more than a few days, as this is the only conceivable interpretation of “promptly after detention”’.⁷⁷

The HRC subsequently confirmed this approach in its General Comment on states of emergency (2001) and emphasised that ‘explicitly non-derogable rights’ such as the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment ‘must be secured by procedural guarantees, including, often, judicial guarantees’. It also gave examples of provisions (or elements thereof) that are not listed in Article 4(2) ICCPR, but nevertheless cannot be derogated from. It pointed out that ‘certain elements of the right to a fair trial are explicitly guaranteed under international humanitarian law during armed conflict’ and that it found ‘no justification for derogation from these guarantees during other emergency situations’. The principles of legality and the rule of law required that ⁷⁰ This issue is briefly referred to in this chapter and then further discussed in Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction).

⁷¹ CIDH Coard et al. v. US, 29 September 1999 (on the intervention in Grenada), §§39, 55 and 59.

⁷² See also UN Special Rapporteur on Torture (Nigel Rodley), report to the General Assembly, A/54/426, §42.

⁷³ UN Special Rapporteur on Torture (Theo van Boven), report to the General Assembly A/57/173, 2 July 2002, §18. See generally §§7-18, esp. 16.

⁷⁴ UN Special Rapporteur on Torture (Theo van Boven), Report to the Commission on Human Rights, E/CN.4/2004/56, 23 December 2003, §39.

⁷⁵ See e.g. Res. 2005/39, 19 April 2005, §9.

⁷⁶ See e.g. E/CN.4/1997/34, 13 December 1996, §§26 and 28.

⁷⁷ E/CN.4/1997/34, 13 December 1996, §29. The international responsibility of States under Article 3 Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance ‘arises not only when acts of enforced disappearance occur, but also when there is a lack of appropriate action to prevent or terminate such acts’, E/CN.4/1995/38, 15 January 1996, §53.

such fundamental elements of fair trial must be respected during a state of emergency. In particular it referred to the right to take proceedings before a court to enable the court to decide without delay on the lawfulness of detention.⁷⁸

The HRC has noted that it is ‘inherent in the protection of rights explicitly recognised as non-derogable’ under the ICCPR that they ‘must be secured by procedural guarantees’. This means, for instance, that ‘the right to take proceedings before a court to enable the court to decide without delay on the lawfulness of detention’ is a right accessory to the protection of the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment and torture. In that sense this is in itself a right that could not be derogated from even in times of emergency. The Committee has specifically noted that even during a state of emergency any trial leading to the imposition of the death penalty ‘must conform to the provisions of the Covenant, including all the requirements of articles 14 and 15’.⁷⁹ It had also pointed out, elsewhere, that it ‘is satisfied that States parties generally understand that the right to habeas corpus and amparo should not be limited in situations of emergency’. It considers that the remedies of Article 9(3) and (4) ICCPR, read together with Article 2 ‘are inherent in the Covenant as a whole’.⁸⁰

In 2003 the UN Working Group on Arbitrary Detention published a legal opinion regarding the deprivation of liberty specifically of persons detained in Guantanamo Bay. It had received many communications alleging the arbitrary character of their detention. It concluded that ‘so long as a “competent tribunal” has not declared whether the status of prisoner of war may be considered applicable or not, the persons detained in Guantanamo Bay provisionally enjoy the guarantees stipulated in articles 105 and 106 of the third Geneva Convention’. Moreover, ‘should such a court issue a ruling on the matter’ in which it would invalidate the provisional prisoner of war status, Articles 9 and 14 ICCPR would remain applicable.⁸¹

The situation of the detainees at Guantanamo, as well as that of those detained incommunicado for extended periods elsewhere, illustrates the interrelationship between procedural rights and the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment. In its follow up to its initial precautionary measures on behalf of the Guantanamo detainees the CIDH even expressly included the obligation of non-refoulement⁸² as well as the obligation to investigate torture allegations,⁸³ both directly involving the right to life and the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment.

Article XXV of the American Declaration stipulates, among others, that each person deprived of his liberty ‘has the right to have the legality of his detention ascertained without delay by a court, and the right to be tried without undue delay or, otherwise, to be released. He also had the right to humane treatment during the time he is in custody’. In the Inter-American system the importance of procedural rights to protect the right to life and personal integrity is already evident in Article 27(2) ACHR, enumerating a list of non-derogable rights and adding that no suspension of ‘the judicial guarantees essential for the protection of such rights’ is authorised either. More-

⁷⁸ General Comment 29 on states of emergency (Article 4), 4 July 2001, §§15-16. See also General Comment 24 on reservations, 4 November 1994, §11. See generally on non-derogable rights and states of emergency e.g. Seiderman (2001).

⁷⁹ HRC General Comment No. 29 on states of emergency (Article 4), CCPR/C/21/Rev.1/Add.11, 31 August 2001, §§11 and 15. See also the joint report on Guantanamo by the UN Special mechanisms, E/CN.4/2006/120, 15 February 2006, §14, confirming this interpretation.

⁸⁰ HRC Recommendation to the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities about a draft third optional protocol to the ICCPR, A/49/40, I, Annex XI, §2 (considering such protocol unnecessary).

⁸¹ Report UN Working Group on Arbitrary Detention, E/CN.4/2003/8, 16 December 2002, §64. See also on the risk of torture and cruel treatment in secret detention: Report of the UN Working Group on Arbitrary Detention, E/CN.4/2006/7, 12 December 2005, §§56-57.

⁸² See also Chapter V (Non-refoulement).

⁸³ See also Chapter VII (Detention).

over, before the HRC published the General Comment on states of emergency mentioned above, the Inter-American Court had already published its Advisory Opinions on habeas corpus in emergency situations and on judicial guarantees in states of emergency. In these Opinions it stressed the importance of judicial guarantees (such as access to court and counsel) in order to protect non-derogable rights.⁸⁴ Habeas corpus, for instance, the Court has noted, ‘performed a vital role in ensuring that a person’s life and physical integrity are respected, in preventing his disappearance or the keeping of his whereabouts secret and in protecting him against torture or cruel, inhumane, or degrading punishment or treatment’.⁸⁵ ‘In a democratic society, the rights and freedoms inherent in the human person, the guarantees applicable to them and the rule of law form a triad. Each component thereof defines itself, complements and depends on the others for its meaning’.⁸⁶ ‘[T]he legal remedies guaranteed in Articles 7 (6) and 25(1) of the Convention may not be suspended because they are judicial guarantees essential for the protection of the rights and freedoms whose suspension Article 27(2) prohibits’.⁸⁷ It has confirmed that ‘the “essential” judicial guarantees which are not subject to derogation, according to Article 27(2) of the Convention, include habeas corpus (Art. 7(6)), amparo, and any other effective remedy before judges or competent tribunals (Art. 25(1)), which is designed to guarantee the respect of the rights and freedoms whose suspension is not authorized by the Convention’.⁸⁸

In their decisions on individual cases the IACHR and the CIDH have confirmed the importance of judicial review for the protection of fundamental rights, also when national security may be at stake.⁸⁹ In its precautionary measures on behalf of the ‘unlawful combatants’ at Guantanamo Bay the Commission specifically referred to the Inter-American Court’s judgment in Castillo Paéz (1997) discussing the purpose of habeas corpus as ‘not only to guarantee personal liberty and humane treatment, but also to prevent disappearance or failure to determine the place of detention, and, ultimately, to ensure the right to life’.⁹⁰ Among others it referred to information raising ‘serious possibilities that detainees may have been subjected to treatment that constitutes ⁸⁴ IACHR Advisory Opinion OC-8/87, Habeas Corpus in Emergency Situations (Articles 27(2) and 7(6) ACHR), 30 January 1987 and OC-9/87, Judicial Guarantees in States of Emergency (Articles 27(2), 25 and 8 ACHR), 6 October 1987.

⁸⁵ IACHR Advisory Opinion OC-8/87, Habeas Corpus in Emergency Situations (Articles 27(2) and 7(6) ACHR), 30 January 1987, §35.

⁸⁶ IACHR Advisory Opinion OC-8/87, Habeas Corpus in Emergency Situations (Articles 27(2) and 7(6) ACHR), 30 January 1987, §26.

⁸⁷ IACHR Advisory Opinion OC-8/87, Habeas Corpus in Emergency Situations (Articles 27(2) and 7(6) ACHR), 30 January 1987, §44.

⁸⁸ IACHR OC-9/87, Judicial Guarantees in States of Emergency (Articles 27(2), 25 and 8 ACHR), 6 October 1987, §41. On non-derogable rights and provisional measures, see also Conclusion part II.

⁸⁹ See e.g. IACHR Castillo Petruzzi v. Peru, 30 May 1999 (“Clearly, the proceedings in this case did not fulfill the minimum requirements of “due process of law”, which is the very essence of the judicial guarantees established under the Convention. Failure to fulfill the requirements of due process renders the proceedings invalid”, §221) and CIDH Coard v. US, 29 September 1999, §§54-55, esp. §55: “The requirement that detention not be left to the sole discretion of the state agent(s) responsible for carrying it out is so fundamental that it cannot be overlooked in any context. The terms of the American Declaration and of applicable humanitarian law are largely in accord in this regard. Article 78 of the Fourth Geneva Convention provides a recourse which, implemented according to its object and purpose, is generally consistent with the supervisory control required under Article XXV of the American Declaration. Supervisory control over detention is an essential safeguard, because it provides effective assurance that the detainee is not exclusively at the mercy of the detaining authority. This is an essential rationale of the right to habeas corpus, a protection which is not susceptible to abrogation”.

⁹⁰ IACHR Castillo Paéz (Peru), Judgment of 3 November 1997, §83.

torture or other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, including beatings, sleep deprivation, exposure to extreme temperatures, sensory deprivation and prolonged isolation'.⁹¹

The ECtHR has equally emphasized the importance of access to habeas corpus and counsel in order to protect basic rights against abuse also in such cases.⁹² The same applies to the African Commission. In the case mentioned in section 2, in which it had taken provisional measures on behalf of 11 persons detained incommunicado in Eritrea, it eventually found violations on the merits of, among others, the right to liberty and security of person (Article 6 ACHPR) and of access to court and due process (Article 7 ACHPR). The Commission pointed out specifically that while Art. 6 as such was not an absolute right, in this case the detainees were held incommunicado with no access to their lawyers or families. "Their whereabouts are unknown, putting their fate under the exclusive control of the Respondent State". The Commission followed up on and clarified its provisional measures by noting that they were meant to 'ensure that the 11 persons are removed from secret detention and brought before the courts'.

"Incommunicado detention is a gross human rights violation that can lead to other violations such as torture or ill-treatment or interrogation without due process safeguards. Of itself, prolonged incommunicado detention and/or solitary confinement could be held to be a form of cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment and treatment. The African Commission is of the view that all detentions must be subject to basic human right standards. There should be no secret detentions and States must disclose the fact that somebody is being detained as well as the place of detention. Furthermore, every detained person must have prompt access to a lawyer and to their families and their rights with regards to physical and mental health must be protected as well as entitlement to proper conditions of detention".⁹³

The African Commission pointed out that the eleven persons were detained because of their political beliefs and held in secret detention without any access to the courts, lawyer or family, 'in blatant violation of their rights to liberty and recourse to fair trial'.⁹⁴ It urged Eritrea to order their immediate release. Thus this case has shown a gradual specificity of the Commission's provisional measures, from 'intervening' on behalf of the detainees to urging either to bring them

⁹¹ CIDH Guantanamo Bay case, Precautionary measures of 29 July 2004, p. 2, referring among others to the defense department memo on 'Counter-resistance techniques' prepared by Pentagon general counsel William J. Hayes II and approved by the US secretary of defense on 2 December 200, available at <www.nimj.org>.

⁹² In ECtHR Brannigan and McBride v. UK, 25 May 1993, the ECtHR did not find a violation of Article 5 ECHR because it considered that the UK had indeed fulfilled the basic safeguards of access to counsel and habeas corpus, §§61-65. On the other hand, in Aksoy v. Turkey the Court pointed out that 'the denial of access to a lawyer, doctor, relative or friend and the absence of any realistic possibility of being brought before a court to test the legality of the detention meant that he was left completely at the mercy of those holding him'. It took 'account of the unquestionably serious problem of terrorism in South-East Turkey and the difficulties faced by the State in taking effective measures against it. However, it is not persuaded that the exigencies of the situation necessitated the holding of the applicant on suspicion of involvement in terrorist offences for fourteen days or more in incommunicado detention without access to a judge or other judicial officer'. Aksoy v. Turkey, 18 December 1996, §§82-84. In general the Court has stressed that '[n]ational authorities cannot do away with effective control of lawfulness of detention by the domestic courts whenever they choose to assert that national security and terrorism are involved' see Al-Nashif v. Bulgaria, 30 May 2002, §94 referring to Chahal v. UK, 15 November 1996.

⁹³ African Commission Liesbeth Zegveld and Mussie Ephrem v. Eritrea, November 2003, §55, referring to Constitutional Rights Project and Civil Liberties Organisation v. Nigeria, consolidated communication 143/95 and 150/96.

⁹⁴ African Commission Liesbeth Zegveld and Mussie Ephrem v. Eritrea, November 2003, §57.

before a court or to release them. On the merits this culminated in the finding of a range of violations and the Commission's emphasis on their immediate release. Its awareness of the relation between access to counsel and court on the one hand and torture, ill-treatment and disappearances on the other, is apparent from the above statement and may be assumed to underlie its use of provisional measures in this type of cases.⁹⁵

3.3 Effective control

The other question involving the case law on the merits that has gained particular significance in the context of procedural rights, although it obviously applies in other contexts as well, is that of the extraterritorial applicability of human rights treaties.⁹⁶ The use of provisional measures would be inappropriate if the adjudicators would generally decline to examine such cases on the merits. Do States have responsibility for the acts and omissions of their agents outside their own sovereign territory? This question has gained increasing significance in the context of counter terrorism activities of States, such as extraordinary renditions and running (secret) detention centres, outside their own territory.⁹⁷ The CIDH has taken provisional measures directed against a State operating outside its own territory. Article 1 ACHR refers to 'all persons subject to their jurisdiction'. The American Declaration does not specifically discuss jurisdiction ratione loci. The Inter-American Commission has determined that OAS member States indeed have obligations under the Declaration any time a person is in their jurisdiction or under their control, even if the authorities holding this person are active on territory not their own.⁹⁸

The ICJ has pointed out that 'physical control of a territory, and not sovereignty or legitimacy of title, is the basis for State liability for acts affecting other States'.⁹⁹ Article 1 of the Optional Protocol (OP) to the ICCPR refers to 'individual subject to its jurisdiction'. Article 2(1) ICCPR requires a State party to respect and ensure the rights laid down in the ICCPR refers to 'all individuals within its territory and subject to its jurisdiction'. Already in 1981 the HRC had interpreted Article 2(1) such that the ICCPR applies to all persons within a State's territory and to all ⁹⁵ See also African Commission Civil Liberties Organisation v. Nigeria, (2000) AHRLR 243 (ACHPR 1999), §26: "While being held in a military detention camp is not necessarily inhuman, there is the obvious danger that normal safeguards on the treatment of prisoners will be lacking. Being deprived of access to one's lawyer, even after trial and conviction, is a violation of article 7(1)(c)".

⁹⁶ See on the extraterritorial application of human rights treaties Coomans/Kamminga (2004). See generally on jurisdiction Chapter XIV.

⁹⁷ See also Chapter V (Non-refoulement).

⁹⁸ See e.g. Saldaño v. Argentina, 11 March 1999 (inadm.), §§15-20, in particular §17: "The Commission does not believe, however, that the term 'jurisdiction' in the sense of Article 1(1) is limited to or merely coextensive with national territory. Rather, the Commission is of the view that a state party to the American Convention may be responsible under certain circumstances for the acts and omissions of its agents which produce effects or are undertaken outside that state's own territory". See also Coard et al. v. US, 29 September 1999, §97. See further Cerna (2004 and 2006) and Cassel (2004). The ACHPR does not specifically refer to the scope of State obligations in this respect.

⁹⁹ ICJ Legal Consequences for States of the Continued Presence of South Africa in Namibia (South West Africa) Notwithstanding Security Council Resolution 276 (1970), Advisory Opinion of 26 January 1971, §118.

persons subject to their jurisdiction. In other words, it recognised the extraterritorial applicability in its case law.¹⁰⁰

In light of the above it is suggested that when dealing with a request for provisional measures to the effect that a State should act or refrain from acting in order to prevent irreparable harm outside of its own territory the main criterion should be whether the State exercises prima facie control with regard to the rights of the persons involved.¹⁰¹

4 CONCLUSION

As noted in Chapter VI, disappearances are still a serious human rights issue, also in the context of the ‘war on terror’ launched after the 9/11 terrorist attacks in the US (2001).¹⁰² It was argued in that chapter that in light of recent reports of such disappearances petitioners could bring complaints before the ECtHR against Council of Europe States in which disappeared persons were last seen or on the basis of reports about secret detention centres on their territory.¹⁰³ This could include requests for provisional measures to intervene urgently to clarify the whereabouts and circumstances of the detainees.

Incommunicado detention, prolonged solitary confinement without access to court and counsel are circumstances conducive to torture, ill treatment and disappearances.¹⁰⁴ The underlying rationale for taking provisional measures to ensure access to counsel and court, exactly in a context of incommunicado detention, is indeed the awareness of risk to life and personal integrity. Nevertheless, with regard to the Guantanamo Bay detainees the CIDH did not at first specifically refer to the threat of ill-treatment. It only did so when information became available on the treatment of the detainees and when the general awareness of the media was growing regarding specific allegations of ill-treatment of detainees under the control of US authorities. It then also ¹⁰⁰ See e.g. HRC Celiberti de Casariego v. Uruguay, 29 July 1981 and Lopez Burgos (submitted by his wife Delia Saldias de Lopez) v. Uruguay, 29 July 1981.

¹⁰¹ See also Gondek (2005); Scheinin (2004b) and Lawson (2004). See further the discussion in Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction).

¹⁰² See e.g. Paust (2004b), pp. 79-96. See further Berman/Clark (1982). See also the discussion on secret detention centres, e.g. the Marty report presented on behalf of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe, Committee on Legal Affairs and Human Rights, Document 10957 and Add.; as well as AS (2006) CR 17, 27 June 2006; Res. 1507 (2006), 27 June 2006 and Res. 1754 (2006), 27 June 2006; Amnesty International, Below the radar: secret flights to torture and disappearance, 5 April 2006, AI Index: AMR 51/051/2006; Amnesty International, Partners in crime: Europe’s role in US renditions, 14 June 2006, AI Index: EUR 01/008/2006; Amnesty International, Secret detention in CIA ‘Black Sites’, 8 November 2005, AI Index: AMR 51/177/2005; Amnesty International, USA: Torture and secret detention testimony of the ‘disappeared’ in the ‘war on terror’, 4 August 2005, AI Index: AMR 51/108/2005; Amnesty International urgent action regarding the possible ‘disappearance’ of Canadian national Maher Arar, 21 October 2002, AI Index: AMR 51/159/2002 and subsequent actions; Human Rights Watch, The United States’ Disappeared; the CIA’s long-term ghost detainees, a Human Rights Watch briefing paper, October 2004. The issue discussed here is obviously related to those discussed in the chapters on non-refoulement (Chapter V, in particular its discussion of ‘extraordinary renditions’), treatment in detention (Chapter VII) and jurisdiction (Chapter XIV).

¹⁰³ See also the references in the Introduction to this Chapter. See further Chapter IV (Non-refoulement) on extraordinary renditions. At the same time complaints may be brought before the Inter-American Commission against the US. See further Chapter XIV on jurisdiction and admissibility.

¹⁰⁴ See Van Boven (2006), pp. 92-93. In general see also Boerefijn (2005b), pp. 240-258.

requested information on the location of post 9-11 detainees detained inside and outside of US territory.

Generally speaking the case law on extraterritorial application of human rights obligations suggests that provisional measures could be taken vis-à-vis any State Party with the authority and control over persons.¹⁰⁵ The case law by the three regional adjudicators and by the HRC shows that procedural rights relating to the right to life and personal integrity have a special status in the human rights systems, warranting the use of provisional measures. Indeed this case law, as well as the official statements by UN authorities, suggests that provisional measures to ensure access to counsel and legal recourse is essential in cases of incommunicado detention. Legal protection in the form of access to Court and counsel could help guard against torture, ill-treatment, disappearances and extra-judicial executions. Awaiting the information on ill treatment in such cases is inappropriate given the general knowledge that persons without access to counsel and without legal recourse are by definition particularly at risk.

¹⁰⁵ Yet see further Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction).

CHAPTER IX

PROTECTING AGAINST DEATH THREATS AND HARASSMENT

1 INTRODUCTION

The main problem the Inter-American human rights system has to deal with is that of the intimidation, assault and murder of human rights defenders, witnesses, journalists and others. The Inter-American Commission and Court were the first of the human rights adjudicators to use provisional measures to halt death threats and harassment. They have developed the most extensive practice in this regard. In fact, most of their provisional measures deal with this problem.

Yet the problem of death threats and harassment is not limited to the Americas, but relates to all regions of the world. Indeed, the two other regional adjudicators, the African Commission and the ECtHR, as well as the three relevant international adjudicators, the HRC, CAT and CE-DAW, have also used provisional measures at least once to protect against death threats and harassment.

This Chapter discusses the practice of the adjudicators in this respect, focussing on the Inter-American system. Chapter XIII (Protection) focuses on the specific measures of protection that have been ordered to be taken against death threats and harassment, including the obligation to investigate and prosecute.¹

The persons threatened may be involved in cases pending before the adjudicators, or in attempts at investigating human rights violations before domestic courts. They may receive threats because they are involved as victims, as family members of murder victims or disappeared persons, as witnesses or as counsel, prosecutor or judge.

They may also receive threats as a reprisal for their work as a human rights defender.² According to international officials and NGOs ‘armed forces and their paramilitary allies have frequently labelled the activities of human rights defenders as subversive, in an attempt to discredit their work and present them as legitimate targets in the counterinsurgency war’.³

In 2002 the President of the Inter-American Commission pointed out:

“Human rights defenders and the organizations for which many of them work play a crucial role in litigation of human rights cases and in the process of civil society scrutiny of democratic institutions. The Commission calls for full protection of the work they do”.⁴

¹ This also includes references to case law on the merits relating to this obligation. See Chapter XIII (Protection).

² Some witnesses and human rights defenders become the victims of disappearances (see Chapter VI). Some are harassed but their life and dignity is not at risk. Rather than direct threats to their lives or physical integrity, witnesses and human rights defenders may also receive threats of, for instance, deportation, as a reprisal for their activities. See Chapter XI (Mass expulsion).

³ The quote is from Amnesty International, ‘Human rights defenders’ offices close in climate of terror’, AI index: AMR 23/19/99, 19 February 1999.

⁴ Address by Dr. Juan E. Méndez, President of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, upon presenting the IACHR Annual Report for 2001 to the Committee on Juridical and Political Affairs of the Permanent Council of the OAS, 30 April 2002, <www.cidh.org/discursos/04.30.02.eng.htm> (consulted 20 January 2006). See also Chapter XIII

2 THE PRACTICE OF THE ADJUDICATORS TO TAKE PROVISIONAL MEASURES TO HALT DEATH THREATS AND HARASSMENT

2.1 Introduction

As noted, most of the practice of using provisional measures to protect persons against death threats and harassment relates to the Inter-American Commission and Court.⁵ This Chapter first addresses their practice. It subsequently briefly refers to the practice of the other adjudicators, in chronological order.

The Inter-American Court has referred not only to its authority, but to its duty to prevent irreparable harm to persons. It considered '[t]hat the case known as the Blake Case is presently before the Court, and it is the duty of this Court to avoid irreparable harm to persons, which is understood to include guarding the complete security of witnesses and their relatives and determining whether the measures adopted by the Government have been sufficient'.⁶

The issue of threats may arise in relation to persons in detention (both political detainees and persons convicted of common crime) as well as outside the context of detention.⁷ Threats may involve not only the alleged victim, but also family members, attorneys or other people connected in some manner to the alleged victim.

Persons may be threatened directly, for instance because of their work as a human rights defender. In such cases the adjudicator may open a case bringing a claim that in itself concerns death threats and harassment (section 2.3). In other cases the threats to life and personal integrity may take place in the context of another complaint already pending (section 2.2).

2.2 Protecting persons involved in international human rights adjudication

2.2.1 Introduction

Alleged victims, their family, witnesses, attorneys, prosecutors and judges involved in the examination of a specific human rights violation before a domestic court or as part of a case pending before an international tribunal may face death threats and harassment. This section focuses on the Inter-American practice. As noted, it is mainly in the Inter-American system that provisional measures have been used in this context. It also refers to the practice of the other adjudicators.

(Protection). See in general on human rights defenders, e.g. the Declaration on the Rights and Responsibility of Individuals, Groups and Organs of Society to Promote and Protect Universally recognized Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. A/RES/53/144, Resolution of 8 March 1999 (text adopted 9 December 1998). Article 12 of this Declaration stipulates that States must ensure protection of human rights defenders against violence and threats. In August 2000 a Special Representative of the UN Secretary General on Human Rights Defenders was appointed. See e.g. her report E/CN.4/2005/101, 13 December 2004. On protecting human rights defenders see further e.g. Hallo de Wolf (2002) and Wiseberg (1991).

⁵ See e.g. IACHR Matter of Adrián Meléndez Quijano et al. (El Salvador), Order of 12 May 2007; Case of 19 Tradesmen (Colombia), Order of 12 May 2007; Matter of Ramírez Hinostroza et al. (Peru), Order of 17 May 2007; Matter of Carlos Nieto Palma et al. (Venezuela), Order of 3 July 2007; Case of Gutiérrez Soler (Colombia), Order of 27 November 2007; Matter of Guerrero Gallucci and Martínez Barrios (Venezuela), Order of 29 November 2007.

⁶ IACHR Blake case, Order of 22 September 1995, 5th 'Considering' clause.

⁷ See also Chapter VI (Detention).

2.2.2 Inter-American Commission and Court

Already in the Honduran cases, the first three cases examined by the Inter-American Court it had to deal with death threats against witnesses that had testified before it, or had been called to do so. One witness who had testified before the Court in September 1987, as well as one person who had been summoned to appear, were assassinated. In order to prevent further killings in November 1987 the President of the Court sent a letter calling on Honduras to adopt the necessary measures to guarantee the life and property of two persons who had testified at the Court's hearings. He did not have 'sufficient elements of proof to be sure of who or what entities are responsible for these acts', but he did request Honduras to take the necessary protective measures to guarantee the physical security and property of the two witnesses in accordance with its obligations under the ACHR. He also requested protective measures for the Committee for the Defence of Human Rights in Honduras. He warned the State that if the 'abnormal situation' would continue he would, after prior consultation with the Permanent Commission of the Court, call the full Court to a meeting in Washington where the General Assembly of the OAS was holding its session.

It is clear that the reference to the General Assembly meeting was meant as ammunition to back up his letter. The President also explained that he was submitting the original letter personally to the Ambassador of Honduras in Washington. The Agent of Honduras before the Court would receive a copy by fax.⁸

In January 1988 the full Court pointed out that the lives of some of the witnesses who testified in these three cases were being threatened exactly because they gave such testimony. In this respect, it referred to the notes sent to Honduras by the President and the Secretariat of the Court in November and December 1987 respectively. It strongly condemned the two murders:

"The physical elimination of actual or possible witnesses constitutes a savage, primitive, inhuman and reprehensible act which deeply offends the American conscience and reflects a total disregard for the values that are [sic] essence of the inter-American system".⁹

It ordered Honduras to 'adopt, without delay, such measures as necessary to prevent further infringements on the basic rights of those who have appeared or have been summoned to do so before this Court' in the Honduran cases. It also ordered the State to 'employ all means within its power to investigate these reprehensible crimes, to identify the perpetrators and impose the punishment provided for by the domestic law of Honduras'. Thus, from the start the Court has included in its Orders for provisional measures the obligation to investigate crimes, identify the perpetrators and punish them.¹⁰

⁸ IACHR Velásquez Rodríguez, Fairén Garbi and Solís Corrales, and Godínez Cruz Cases (Honduras), Letter by the President on behalf of witnesses Jiménez-Puerto and Custodio López, 6 November 1987. Two weeks later the Secretariat, upon instruction of the President, requested Honduras once more to take the necessary measures to guarantee the life, personal integrity and property of the witnesses. It noted that 'this afternoon this Secretariat has received a complaint regarding the preparation of an attempt on the life of Dr. Ramón Custodio López, President of the Committee for the Defence of Human Rights in Honduras' (CODEH). Velásquez Rodríguez, Fairén Garbi and Solís Corrales, and Godínez Cruz Cases (Honduras), Letter Secretariat on behalf of witness Ramón Custodio López, 18 December 1987. See also Chapter XVIII (Follow-up).

⁹ Velásquez Rodríguez, Fairén Garbi and Solís Corrales, and Godínez Cruz Cases (Honduras), Order for provisional measures, 15 January 1988. See also section 3 of this Chapter on the relationship with the merits.

¹⁰ See further Chapter XIII (Protection).

The use of provisional measures to protect witnesses in cases pending before the Court has not been limited to these early cases. In the Bámaca Velásquez case, for instance, a witness was also receiving threats after he had testified before the Inter-American Court. In 1998 the Court ordered provisional measures on his behalf and on behalf of his family. It subsequently decided to maintain and expand these measures as they were still necessary during the phase of supervising the implementation of the judgement on reparations.¹¹

Another case in which the Court ordered a State to protect the life and integrity of a witness and his family was the Paniagua Morales case ('the white panel truck case'). In January 1998 three unknown persons had kidnapped and violently beaten the son of the victim in this case. He had been summoned to give testimony to the Inter-American Court during a hearing on the merits of that case. Upon receipt of information that the security of the beneficiaries had improved the Court lifted its provisional measures.¹²

As discussed in Chapter II, upon request of the Commission the Inter-American Court can also order provisional measures in cases not yet pending before it. In 1990, for instance, it ordered Peru to take provisional measures on behalf of a journalist who had survived an attack as well as witnesses of the attack in a case that was pending before the Commission.¹³

Since 1994 the Court had been involved in the Colotenango case. Its Orders for provisional measures in this case against Guatemala aimed to protect witnesses of an armed attack killing several people in a demonstration as well as their family members and the family of the victims and the attorneys. In 2007 it decided to lift its provisional measures in this case.¹⁴

In November 1995 the Commission took precautionary measures on behalf of seven members of the Civic Human Rights Committee of Meta (Colombia). Nevertheless, some of them continued to receive threats. In October 1996 one of them, Mr. Giraldo, was murdered. In light of these events, the Commission requested the Court to take provisional measures on behalf of three of his family members as well as three members of the Civic Committee. The Court did so.¹⁵

On several occasions the Inter-American Commission and Court have had to intervene in the context of the Aguas Blancas massacre. This massacre took place on 29 June 1995 in the state

¹¹ IACHR Bámaca Velásquez (Guatemala), Orders of 29 August 1998, 5 September 2001, 21 February 2003, 20 November 2003 and 11 March 2005.

¹² IACHR Paniagua Morales ('White van') (Guatemala), Order of 19 June 1998; Order of 27 November 1998 lifting the provisional measures.

¹³ IACHR Bustíos-Rojas v. Peru, Order of 8 August 1990, followed up by Order of 17 January 1991.

¹⁴ The matter of Colotenango (Guatemala), Order of 12 July 2007 (lifting the provisional measures ordered by it on 22 June and 1 December 1994, 19 September 1997, 2 February 2000 and 5 September 2001; and clarifying that this lifting of the provisional measures did not mean that the State had complied fully with its Convention obligations described in Report No. 19/97 of the Inter-American Commission, or that the State was released from its obligation to continue with the respective investigations in the domestic jurisdiction to identify and, if applicable, punish those responsible for the facts, and that the Inter-American Commission was responsible for verifying effective compliance with these obligations).

¹⁵ Subsequently the Court held a public hearing on the provisional measures. Annual Report 1997, Chapter IIIa under 'Colombia'. It expanded them several times and also lifted them for some beneficiaries. On 30 September 1999, for instance, the Court issued an order for provisional measures requiring Colombia to maintain the measures necessary to protect the lives and physical safety of Sister Noemy Palencia, upon her return to Meta and of Mariela de Giraldo and her two children as well as of Ms. Rey. It also required Colombia to investigate the denounced facts, which gave rise to the Court's provisional measures, to inform the Court about the results of this investigation, to discover those responsible and punish them. Later it maintained the provisional measures on behalf of Mrs. Mariela de Giraldo and her two daughters as well as for one other person. See also Chapter XIII (Protection).

of Guerrero in Mexico. The police had stopped members of the Organization Campesina de la Sierra Sur (OCSS) who were on their way to take part in protest against the local authorities. Seventeen peasants ('campesinos') died and 22 were wounded by gunfire. Only two of the policemen were injured.¹⁶ In 1996 the Inter-American Commission asked Mexico to protect the life and personal integrity of several witnesses and their family members.¹⁷ In October 1998 it requested protection on behalf of Bernardo Vásquez and eight other members of OCSS. Between June 1996 and 'the date of the request' 35 members were assassinated and the Government had branded the organisation as 'subversive'. Reportedly one person, under torture, had implicated the involvement of Rocio Mesino in the insurgent People's Revolutionary Army.¹⁸ As a result of her statement the Mesino family had been harassed and physically attacked. The organisation's leader Mr. Vásquez Juárez was assassinated in July 1998. Previously he had received several death threats from the judicial police. Other members of the organisation had testified about human rights violations before an Amnesty International delegation and were beaten afterwards. Moreover, Mexico had refused to comply with the Inter-American Commission's Report on the merits in the Aguas Blancas massacre case. In light of all this the petitioner requested protection 'for the lives and physical integrity of the various members of the OCSS and investigation and punishment of the violations reported, including the death of Vásquez Juárez'.¹⁹

A few years later, in July 2001, the Commission took precautionary measures on behalf of another survivor who had received threats because of his activities aimed at securing justice in the Aguas Blancas case. For seven survivors of the massacre, still bearing physical and psychological scars from the massacre, the precautionary measures sought medical attention.²⁰

In its Order of August 2000, in the Haitian case, the Court pointed out, in reference to Article 1(1) ACHR, the responsibility of the Dominican Republic to adopt security measures to protect all persons subject to its jurisdiction. Two witnesses had testified before the Court about the Commission's request for provisional measures to halt deportation in the Haitian case and subsequently received threats.²¹ During the hearing itself the Commission had already pointed out that it believed that the witnesses who appeared at the public hearing were 'justifiably fearful' and 'the interrogation by the State at said hearing did not help dissipate their fear'. One of the witnesses was working with approximately seven small communities or 'bateyes' without utilities or basic services. She 'indicated that there are legislators and Government representatives who asked, through the media, that she be arrested, investigated and expelled; her children and family have been similarly terrorized'. The Court noted, as it had done in other such cases, that this responsibility was 'still more evident in relationship to those who may be bound by proceedings before the supervising organs of the American Convention'.²² On the basis of the affirmations by the witnesses themselves, during the public hearing, and on the basis of the Commission's submissions, the Court found that the two witnesses could, as a consequence of their testimony, become the victims of reprisals. This made it necessary to adopt provisional measures in order to prevent irreparable harm to their lives and physical integrity. It pointed out its practice to protect, by way of provisional measures, witnesses who have testified before it and it ordered the Dominican ¹⁶ CIDH Aguas Blancas case, 11.520. The Network of National Civil Organizations 'All rights for everyone' and the Democratic Revolution Party brought the case before the Commission. CEJIL joined later as co-petitioner.

¹⁷ CIDH Annual Report, 1996, 14 March 1997, §4a.

¹⁸ She had been arrested in June 1998, during the events of El Charco.

¹⁹ CIDH Annual Report 1998, §45.

²⁰ On this type of precautionary measures see XII (Other situations).

²¹ See also Chapter XI (Halting mass expulsion). The case itself was still pending before the Commission.

²² IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic, Order for provisional measures, 18 August 2000.

Republic to 'adopt, forthwith, whatever measures are necessary to protect their lives and personal integrity'.²³

2.2.3 African system

Aware of the requirements inherent in the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment, if not of the practice of the Inter-American Commission and Court in this respect, the African Commission, or its Secretariat, has also intervened to prevent irreparable harm to petitioners or alleged victims in the context of death threats and harassment.

In September 1994 the Commission called on the government of Togo 'to take the necessary measures to prevent irreparable prejudice to Corporal Bikagni'. Two years before, upon his arrest, the petitioner had submitted a complaint on behalf of this Corporal, alleging that he had been tortured and maltreated.²⁴ The Commission did not indicate the type of information it received subsequently, triggering its use of provisional measures. It may well be that he was being threatened with regard to his complaint about torture. It is also possible that he was in need of medical attention. In 1994 the Secretariat of the Commission also intervened in Association pour ²³ IACHR Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic, Order for provisional measures, 18 August 2000. By Order of 26 May 2001 it reiterated that the State was to 'adopt special measures to protect the life and physical integrity of Father Pedro Ruquoy and Solange Pierre'. By Order of the President of 5 October 2005 and the Court's Order of 2 February 2006 the State was to 'adopt such measures as may be necessary to protect the life and personal integrity of Benito Tide-Méndez, Antonio Sension, Andrea Alezy, Janty Fils-Aime, William Medina-Ferreras, Rafaelito Pérez-Charles, Berson Gelim, Father Pedro Ruquoy, Solain Pie or Solain Pierre or Solange Pierre and her four children'. The Court considered 'as regards the background information submitted by the representatives in the instant case, as well as the observations submitted by the Commission, it is prima facie evident that the lives and personal integrity of Ms. Solain Pie or Solain Pierre or Solange Pierre's four children are under threat', Order of 2 February 2006, 15th 'Considering' clause. It pointed out that 'the Commission and the representatives have informed the Court that the threats and harassment suffered by Ms. Solain Pie or Solain Pierre or Solange Pierre and her four children have forced them to leave the Dominican Republic, by reason of which this Tribunal deems it necessary that the State create due conditions for those people to return to their home'. In this respect it referred to previous occasions where it had ordered such measures (Matter of the Communities of Jiguamiandó and Curbaradó, Order of 6 March 2003, 10th 'Considering' clause; Matter of the Peace Community of San José de Apartadó, Order of 24 November 2000, 8th 'Considering' clause and Matter of Giraldo-Cardona, Order of 5 February 1997, 5th 'Considering' clause). It stressed that the State was to 'ensure that said beneficiaries of measures do not face any threats or other sources of fear that may prevent them from continuing to live in their habitual places of residence', 17th 'Considering' clause. Even though the beneficiaries were 'not in the Dominican Republic at present, the State must maintain the measures adopted in their favor with a view to making them effective when said beneficiaries return to their country', 18th 'Considering' clause. With regard to Father Ruquoy, who had left the country out of fear for his life and personal security, after having lived there for 30 years, it pointed out that he was a beneficiary of the Court's provisional measures and 'the State must offer whatever conditions are necessary so that, should Father Ruquoy return to the Dominican Republic, he can remain within Dominican territory and have his life and personal integrity duly protected', 19th 'Considering' clause.

²⁴ ACHPR Degli (on behalf of Corporal N. Bikagni), Union Interafricaine des Droits de l'Homme, International Commission of Jurists v. Togo, March 1995. The official decision does not refer to the provisional measures. See e.g. <<http://dcregistry.com/users/ACHPR/index3.html>> (consulted 20 October 2005) for the initial decision of March 1995 that does refer to the provisional measure.

la Défense des Droits de l'Homme et des Libertés v. Djibouti (2000). The petitioner was an NGO from Djibouti complaining of a series of human rights abuses against members of the Afar ethnic group. It referred to 26 people who had been jailed without trial, tortured or executed.²⁵ No specific information is available on the background of the provisional measures, but given the fact that they aimed to avoid 'irreparable prejudice to the complainant or the victims' it may be assumed that the petitioners and/or the alleged victims were receiving threats because of their complaints about these violations.²⁶

2.2.4 CAT

The three relevant international systems have all used provisional measures at least once to deal with the situation of death threats and harassment.

In B.M'B. v. Tunisia the petitioner had informed CAT that witnesses had been detained and questioned by Tunisian authorities in connection with the petition before the Committee. Moreover, members of the petitioner's and of the victim's families had allegedly been subjected to intimidation.²⁷ In April 1994 CAT took provisional measures 'to ensure that no harm is done to the author's family, the alleged victim's family or the witnesses and their families'.²⁸ The petitioner, who himself was staying in France, had requested such measures to protect the 'physical, moral and economic security' of his family and the other persons threatened.²⁹ CAT later declared the case inadmissible because the petitioner had not submitted sufficient proof to establish his authority to act on behalf of the victim. At the same time it maintained its provisional measures.³⁰

2.2.5 HRC

In January and February 2004 the HRC used provisional measures on behalf of Michael Anthony Fernando, who was being threatened in the context of a case pending before the HRC. The Committee requested Sri Lanka 'to adopt all necessary measures to protect the life, safety and personal integrity of the author and his family members, so as to avoid irreparable damage to them'.³¹

The original petition related to arbitrary detention and torture.³² The petitioner was released in October 2003 when the case was still pending before the HRC. It discussed his case during its

²⁵ These violations were committed by government troops in areas of fighting with the Front pour la Restauration de l'Unité et de la Démocratie, an organisation drawing its support mainly from the Afar ethnic group.

²⁶ Upon confirmation by the petitioner, in March 2000, that it wished to withdraw the complaint because a friendly settlement had been reached, the African Commission decided to close the case, Association pour la Défense des Droits de l'Homme et des Libertés v. Djibouti, May 2000 (closure). See the informal publication of cases at: <<http://dcregistry.com/users/ACHPR/index3.html>>.

²⁷ See CAT B.M'B v. Tunisia, 5 May 1994, §2.6.

²⁸ Id., §5(c).

²⁹ Id., §2.4.

³⁰ See further Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction and admissibility).

³¹ HRC Anthony Michael Fernando v. Sri Lanka, 31 March 2005, §§5.1-5.8. Provisional measures of 9 January and 13 February 2004.

³² The petitioner was sentenced in February 2003 and released in October of that year. The petitioner had been detained for contempt of court after he challenged a controversial Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Sri Lanka. The Asian Human Rights Commission, an NGO, undertook a combination of actions including an online petition, urgent appeals and press releases and a petition filed with the HRC. It has made available an excerpt from the submission. The Asian Human Rights Commission is a regional non-governmental organisation monitoring and lobbying human rights issues in Asia. It was founded in 1984 and is based in Hong Kong. The public October-November session. It did so in the context of the reporting procedure of Art. 40 ICCPR. He himself was present in the NGO delegation.³³

The Committee's Concluding Observations on Sri Lanka (2003) noted with concern reports that victims of human rights violations are reluctant to bring complaints because of intimidation and threats. The State 'should ensure in particular that allegations of crimes committed by State members of its Board of Directors are from Hong Kong, the Philippines, Japan, South Korea and Sri Lanka. Its Advisory Board also includes members from India, Pakistan and Cambodia. See www.ahrchk.net. The Asian Legal Resource Centre is a sister group of the Asian Human Rights Commission. In its initial submission (June 2003) the Asian Human Rights Commission already requested the Committee to use provisional measures, in this case to release the petitioner 'pending a full impartial and independent hearing into the alleged contempt'. It noted the petitioner's 'frail state of health and already substantial period of imprisonment-during which he suffered deterioration of his mental health due to imprisonment and degrading treatment'. In that light early release would be the most appropriate remedy. The HRC did not heed to this request for provisional measures. See <www.ahrchk.net and www.hrschool.org> (consulted on 5 August 2004). See also HRC Anthony Michael Fernando v. Sri Lanka, 31 March 2005, §1.2. It submitted that the petitioner had been hospitalised and, upon his return to the prison, on 10 February 2003, 'he was assaulted several times, specifically between 2 and 5 p.m., when he was beaten by prison guards outside the prison on the road'. 'He was then pushed into a police van where he was kicked repeatedly on the back causing damage to his spinal cord. On his arrival in prison, the Applicant was taken on a stretcher and left to lie near a putrid toilet. He was then stripped naked and left to lie near the toilet for a further 24 hours. Following this sequence of events, the Applicant began to urinate blood and was returned to the hospital in a van'. Human Rights Correspondence School, a project of the Asian Human Rights Commission, lesson series 33 on Fernando's complaint to the HRC, 8 April 2004, <www.hrschool.org> (consulted on 5 August 2004). The teaching modules of the internet correspondence school initiated by the above NGO also include a general introduction on filing a complaint with the UN treaty based human rights mechanisms. This introduction also refers to 'special circumstances of urgency or sensitivity'. It notes, referring to provisional measures: 'typically, such requests are issued to prevent actions that cannot later be undone, for example implementing a death sentence or the deportation of an individual facing the risk of ill treatment and/or torture'. 'If you wish the Committee to consider a request for interim measures, it is advisable to state this explicitly in your complaint, with reasons for why you consider such action to be necessary'. The claims based on Articles 7 (torture on) and 10(1) (conditions of detention) ICCPR were declared inadmissible as a case was still pending before the Supreme Court. Anthony Michael Emmanuel Fernando v. Sri Lanka, 21 March 2005, §8.2. The HRC did find the State responsible for arbitrary detention contrary to Art. 9 ICCPR, §9.2. Reportedly, in May 2008 the Supreme Court found two prison guards responsible for the violation of Fernando's rights with respect to the pending torture claim, see Asian Human Rights Commission, 'Sri Lanka: SC holds prison officers to have committed torture on Tony Fernando', 15 May 2008, <http://www.universalpeoplesforum.org/news_local/ahrchk.net_20080606.htm> (consulted 8 August 2008). The same source also reports that the State would not implement the HRC decision and grant compensation to Tony Fernando because of a previous Supreme Court case (the Singarasa case) holding that HRC decisions have no binding effect within Sri Lanka. For that case: Supreme Court of Sri Lanka, Singarasa case, 15 September 2006, <http://www.srilankahr.net/pdf/sc_judgement1.pdf> (last consulted 8 August 2008). The HRC decision in Nallaratnam Singarasa v. Sri Lanka was of 21 July 2004. See also Asian Human Rights Commission, 'Sri Lanka: The recent judgement of the Supreme Court on the Singarasa case is an attack on the sovereignty of the people', 20 September 2006, <www.ahrchk.net/statements/mainfile.php/2006statements/739/> (consulted 8 August 2008).

³³ HRC Concluding Observations with regard to the report of Sri Lanka, 6 November 2003, CCPR/CO/79/LKA, 1 December 2003.

security forces, especially allegations of torture, abduction and illegal confinement, are investigated promptly and effectively with a view to prosecuting perpetrators'.³⁴

Yet upon his return to Sri Lanka the petitioner received threats. He submitted to the HRC that on 24 November 2003, at 9:35 a.m., an unknown person had called his mother and made death threats against him, demanding he withdraw his three complaints (two domestic with regard to his torture and one to the HRC). That same day, at 10:27 a.m. an unidentified person visited the premises of the Ravaya newspaper that had interviewed the petitioner before and had reported on issues involving the independence of the judiciary. This person threatened the reporter and the editor and demanded that they cease publishing further news on the petitioner. The newspaper reported these threats in its weekend edition. On 28 and 30 November a person visited his parents house again threatening to kill him. This person had left before the police arrived. On 4 December 2003 the petitioner informed the HRC that the two prison officers implicated in his torture complaint had been reinstated. 'As a result, the author lives in daily fear for his life as well as for the life and safety of his wife, his son and his parents. In spite of his complaint to the authorities, he has not, to date, received any protection from the police and is unaware of what action has been taken to investigate the threats against himself and his family'. He recalled that he had received death threats in prison as well. He referred to the Committee's Views in Delgado Paez v. Colombia, that the State was obliged to investigate death threats and protect the victims. Early January 2004 the Committee's Special Rapporteur requested the State party 'to adopt all necessary measures to protect the life, safety and personal integrity of the author and his family, so as to avoid irreparable damage to them'.³⁵

It does not appear that the State acted on this provisional measure. In any case, on 3 February 2004 the petitioner submitted that 'on the morning of 2 February 2004, he had been subjected to an attack by an unknown assailant who sprayed chloroform in his face. A van pulled up close by during the attack, and the author believes that it was going to be used to kidnap him. He managed to escape and was taken to hospital. Had he not escaped, he would have been the victim of an assassination or disappearance'. In response on 13 February 2004 'the Committee, through its Special Rapporteur on New Communications' reiterated its previous provisional measures.³⁶

³⁴ HRC Concluding Observations with regard to the report of Sri Lanka, 6 November 2003, CCPR/CO/79/LKA, 1 December 2003. The NGO's urgent appeal of 1 December 2003 also referred to the Concluding Observations (2003) that Sri Lanka 'should diligently enquire into all cases of suspected intimidation of witnesses and establish a witness protection program in order to put an end to the climate of fear that plagues the investigation and prosecution of such cases'. Asian Human Rights Commission, Update on urgent appeal, Michael Anthony Fernando receives death threats, 1 December 2003, <www.ahrchk.net> (consulted on 5 August 2004).

³⁵ HRC Anthony Michael Fernando v. Sri Lanka, 31 March 2005, §5.1-5.5. He explained that he had reviewed the petitioner's request for provisional measures in light of 'the urgency of this matter'. He noted that this request related 'to various alleged death threats against the author and his family, by reason of the author's communication to the Human Rights Committee'. Provisional measure of 9 January 2004 (1189/2003). The Asian Human Rights Commission reproduced part of the Special Rapporteur's letter to the petitioner informing him of this decision. See Human Rights Correspondence School, a project of the Asian Human Rights Commission, lesson series 33, p. 3, 14 April 2004, <www.hrschool.org> (consulted on 5 August 2004).

³⁶ HRC Anthony Michael Fernando v. Sri Lanka, 31 March 2005, §5.6. Eventually the HRC found that Fernando had been detained arbitrarily in violation of Article 9 ICCPR. It devoted a paragraph to its use of provisional measures, but did not return to this issue in its decision on the merits. The State party had responded to the second provisional measure the next month by submitting 'that the Attorney General's Department directed the police to investigate the alleged attack and to take measures necessary to ensure his safety. The police recorded his statement in which he was unable to either name the suspects or to provide the police with the number of the vehicle that the alleged assailants had traveled in. The investigations remain in progress and steps

In a case involving claims of incommunicado detention, ill-treatment and adverse detention conditions, in November 2005 the Special Rapporteur ‘drew the State party’s attention to the right to submit individual communications to the Committee, under the Optional Protocol to the Covenant, and recalled that an individual and his relatives should not be subjected to intimidation for having submitted a communication to the Committee’.³⁷ It is not specified whether this intervention was based on the Rule on provisional measures, but it could in any case be classified as an informal provisional measure. Nevertheless the Committee does not discuss what triggered this intervention nor what particular measures the State should take to ensure the right of petition. On the merits, finding violations of Articles 7, 9 and 10 ICCPR, there is no reference to the acts of intimidation that triggered the intervention.

In a case brought on behalf of ‘X’ against Serbia in 2005 the petitioner, Humanitarian Law Center, had requested provisional measures ‘to urge the State party to offer protection to the witnesses named in the complaint, to encourage the State party to prevent further interaction between the perpetrators of the sexual abuse and the victim, and to urge the State party to provide to the victim adequate counseling and continued supervision, as may be necessary’.³⁸ The Special Rapporteur rejected these requests.³⁹ The Committee subsequently declared the case inadmissible for lack of standing by the Humanitarian Law Center to act on his behalf, while expressing grave concern for the welfare of the child in question.⁴⁰

The decision not to use provisional measures may be based on the Rapporteur’s estimation that the case would be declared inadmissible for lack of standing. If so, this shows a clear distinction with CAT, which used provisional measures in a case, mentioned above, that also related to

will be taken to inform the author of the outcome’. It stated that it would take appropriate action ‘if the investigations reveal credible evidence that the threats were caused by any person with a view to subverting the course of justice’. See Anthony Michael Fernando v. Sri Lanka, 31 March 2005, §5.7. The Committee concluded by noting, with regard to the petitioner’s safety, ‘a police patrol book had been placed at his residence and police patrol have been directed to visit his residence day and night and to record their visits in the police patrol book. In addition to this, his residence is kept under surveillance by plain-cloth policemen’. There was ‘no evidence to conclude that the author received threats to his life because of his communication to the Human Rights Committee’. See Anthony Michael Fernando v. Sri Lanka, 31 March 2005, §5.8.

³⁷ HRC Sid Ahmed Aber v. Algeria, 13 July 2007, §1.2.

³⁸ HRC Humanitarian Law Center v. Serbia, 26 March 2007 (inadm.), §1.2.

³⁹ Ibid. (decision of 31 January 2005).

⁴⁰ It noted that the child was 12 at the time of the petition to the HRC and thus likely to be able to give his consent. The petitioner had pointed out that consent from the child, his legal guardian or his parents could not be obtained ‘because all are under the influence of the alleged perpetrators of the sexual abuse’. See §6.6. The Committee found that ‘In the absence of express authorisation, the author should provide evidence that it has a sufficiently close relationship with the child to justify it acting without such authorisation’. The Humanitarian Law Center ceased to represent the child in the domestic proceedings in August 2003 and had not been in contact with him, his guardian or his parents. ‘In such circumstances, the Committee cannot even assume that the child does not object, let alone consent, to the author proceeding with a communication to the Committee. Consequently, notwithstanding that the Committee is gravely disturbed by the evidence in this case, it is precluded by the provisions of the Optional Protocol from considering the matter since the author has not shown that it may act on the victim’s behalf in submitting this communication’. §6.7. The evidence submitted related to a ten year old Roma boy who had been sexually abused by five men in a bar. Initially a complaint was brought against the men. The victim was represented by the Humanitarian Law Center. Later the victim changed his testimony and the prosecutor dropped the charges. Several witnesses, including the public health nurse that had persuaded the boy to report the incident to the police, had received threats. Others, including the boy’s parents, were also offered bribes.

insufficient authorization, although admittedly in different circumstances. CAT even maintained these provisional measures after it declared the case inadmissible.⁴¹ What remains clear, however, is the Committee's position, confirmed in 2008, that it follows from Article 1 OP that States parties 'are obliged not to hinder access to the Committee and to prevent any retaliatory measures against any person who has addressed a communication to the Committee'.⁴² In order to help ensure the right to life and the prohibition of cruel treatment, as well as this obligation, the use of provisional measures can no longer be excluded.

2.2.6 ECtHR

It is only haltingly that the ECtHR has followed the approach of the other human rights adjudicators. It did so in June 2004 in Bitiyeva and X v. Russia (2007). The first petitioner in this case had complained under Articles 3 and 5 ECHR about her ill-treatment and illegal detention in January and February 2000. Yet in May 2003, while the case was pending, she was killed in her house by unidentified gunmen along with three other members of her family. The second petitioner, who is the daughter of the first petitioner, expressed her wish to pursue the petition and complained in her own name under Articles 2, 3, 13 and 34 ECHR about the death of her family members, the lack of effective remedies and hindrance of the right of individual petition.⁴³ She discussed various occurrences of threats and intimidation and explained that she 'felt intimidated and feared for her safety, security and life'.⁴⁴ Subsequently the Court used provisional measures. It 'requested the Russian Government to take all measures to ensure that there was no hindrance in any way of the effective exercise of the second applicant's right of individual petition as provided by Article 34 of the Convention'.⁴⁵ Again the Court does not make explicit the link between the right of individual petition (Article 34) and protecting the right to life (Article 2) and personal integrity (Article 3) pending the proceedings. Nevertheless in practice it is the first time it has clearly intervened in a case involving claims of death threats and harassment.⁴⁶ Obviously this is just a first step, as no indication is yet provided on what form this protection should take.⁴⁷

⁴¹ In general on the relevance of jurisdiction on the merits and admissibility see Chapter XIV. On representation see also Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4.4.

⁴² HRC General Comment 33, CCPR/C/GC/33, 5 November 2008 (Advance unedited version), §4.

⁴³ ECtHR Bitiyeva and X v. Russia, Judgment of 21 June 2007 (first section), §3.

⁴⁴ Id., §§59-62.

⁴⁵ Id., §63. Without further information this paragraph adds that the provisional measure was lifted on 20 October 2005.

⁴⁶ In its findings on the merits the Court did not return to its provisional measures. It found that there was 'no direct evidence to support the second applicant's assertion that the killings of the first applicant and of her family members were related to her application to the Court. A breach of Article 34 cannot be found on a mere supposition'. It did recognise, however, 'that the brutal and unresolved killing of the first applicant after she had lodged a complaint in Strasbourg alleging serious human-rights violations by State agents would have inevitably had a "chilling effect" on other current and prospective applicants to the Court, especially for the residents of Chechnya. It can only express its deepest regret and disappointment that there has been no effective investigation which could have elucidated the circumstances of the first applicant's killing (see paragraphs 144-151 above). However, it does not consider that it should make a separate finding of a breach of the respondent State's obligations under Article 34 in this respect, having already found a double violation of Article 2 and of Article 13'. ECtHR Bitiyeva and X v. Russia, Judgment of 21 June 2007 (first section), §164. It also considered that it did 'not have sufficient material before it to conclude that the respondent Government have breached their obligations under Article 34 by putting undue pressure on the second applicant in order to dissuade her from pursuing her application to the Court'. See §167, as discussed in §§165-166. See also the comment by the rapporteur of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe

In August 2008 the ECtHR used provisional measures in the context of the armed action in Georgia that month. Georgia had requested the Court to order provisional measures against Russia. The President of the Court called upon ‘both the High Contracting Parties concerned to comply with their engagements under the Convention particularly in respect of Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention’.⁴⁸ Georgia had brought the inter-State complaint against Russia and, as the ICJ does in such cases, the Court called upon both Russia and Georgia to comply with their international obligations.⁴⁹ on this case suggesting that the Court could have found a violation of Article 34 for failing to carry out a proper investigation, Doc. 11183 Addendum, 1 October 2007, §14.

⁴⁷ See further on the specificity of provisional measures Chapter XIII (Protection), section 3. See also Council of Europe Parliamentary Assembly Resolution 1571 (2007), calling on the Member States to ‘take positive measures to protect applicants, their lawyers or family members from reprisals by individuals or groups including, where appropriate, allowing applicants to participate in witness protection programmes, providing them with special police protection or granting threatened individuals and their families temporary protection or political asylum in an unbureaucratic manner’, §17.2 and ‘thoroughly investigate all cases of alleged crimes against applicants, their lawyers or family members and to take robust action to prosecute and punish the perpetrators and instigators of such acts so as to send out a clear message that such action will not be tolerated by the authorities’ §17.3 and noting ‘that member states’ co-operation with the European Court of Human Rights would benefit if the Court were to continue to develop its case law to ensure full implementation of the member states’ duty to co-operate with the Court, in particular by: taking appropriate interim measures, including new types thereof, such as ordering police protection or relocation of threatened individuals and their families’, §18.1.

⁴⁸ ECtHR Press release issued by the Registrar, ‘European Court of Human Rights grants request for interim measures’, 12 August 2008. The press release noted that ‘on 11 August 2008 the Georgian Government requested the Court to indicate to the Government of the Russian Federation interim measures to the effect that the Russian Government should “refrain from taking any measures which may threaten the life or state of health of the civilian population and to allow the Georgian emergency forces to carry out all the necessary measures in order to provide assistance to the remaining injured civilian population and soldiers via humanitarian corridor”. It also pointed out that ‘(t)he Agent of the Georgian Government informed the Court that this request was made in the context of an application directed against the Russian Federation alleging violations of Articles 2 (right to life) and 3 (prohibition of inhuman and degrading treatment) of the European Convention on Human Rights and Article 1 of Protocol No. 1 (protection of property) to the Convention’.

⁴⁹ See also Chapter I on a request for provisional measures brought by Georgia before the ICJ around the same time, in the context of an application based on violations by Russia of CERD. The ICJ ordered a similar provisional measure: Application of the International Convention on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (Georgia v. Russian Federation), 15 October 2008. As to the use of provisional measures by human rights adjudicators in inter-State cases, the EComHR had previously used provisional measures to halt the execution of death sentences in two inter-State cases, see EComHR Application of the ECHR to the Island of Cyprus (Greece v. UK), 26 September 1958 (Article 31 report), p. 34 and Partial Decision of the Commission as to the admissibility of the application, The Second Greek case (Denmark, Norway and Sweden v. Greece), 5 October 1970, §11. In another inter-State case, Ireland v. UK, the EComHR refused a request by Ireland for the UK to postpone its five interrogation techniques. See further Chapter VII (Detention).

2.3 Protecting persons bringing a claim regarding death threats and harassment

2.3.1 Introduction

As discussed in the previous subsection, the Inter-American Commission and Court have regularly taken provisional measures to protect persons (such as alleged victims or witnesses) involved in the proceedings before them. In addition they have built up an extensive practice of taking provisional measures on behalf of persons who were not already involved in a pending case. In response to petitions specifically relating to death threats and requesting provisional measures at the same time, they have taken provisional or precautionary measures immediately. This subsection will give examples in order to sketch a picture of the types of cases concerned.

2.3.2 Persons involved in domestic (human rights) investigations

Witnesses, attorneys and judges involved in local investigations or trials or otherwise perceived as a threat by local police or militias are often subjected to death threats and harassment. Even members of the military may receive threats, particularly when their (former) colleagues or their ‘associates’ (e.g. paramilitary groups) consider them whistleblowers who have ‘ratted’ on them.⁵⁰ Prison guards may also harass prisoners because they gave information to human rights defenders, both in retaliation and as a warning never to provide such information again.⁵¹

The Commission has dealt with a greater number of urgent cases than the Court. It has taken precautionary measures, for instance, on behalf of an ex-member of the police who had participated in a military operation during which several persons were extra-judicially executed. His testimony could implicate those who had taken part in these actions.⁵²

⁵⁰ In 1997 the Commission took precautionary measures requesting Paraguay to take the necessary measures to guarantee the life and physical integrity of a Major and his family. He had allegedly received threats for testifying before a Special Military Tribunal. CIDH Annual Report 1998, §47.

⁵¹ On 4 March 1999 the Commission requested Mexico to take protective measures on behalf of a prisoner who had been beaten brutally. The prison concerned was the Nuevo León Social Rehabilitation Centre. Other prisoners had been beaten as well. Apparently, these beatings took place as a result of their meeting with representatives of Citizens Support of Human Rights (CADHAC). Allegedly these representatives had also been harassed. Two weeks later Mexico informed the Commission of the measures it had adopted. Mexico had arranged for the intervention of the State Human Rights Commission of Nuevo León and of that state’s government secretariat. CIDH Annual Report 1999, Chapter III C.1, §42.

⁵² The Commission does not indicate whether this testimony would be given as part of a case pending before it or of a case pending before a national court. It is clear, however, that he himself, or an NGO petitioner on his behalf, had brought a case before the Commission. Precautionary measure of 28 February 1996. It appears that he wanted to rejoin the National Police, hence the complaint before the Commission, registered as case 11.237, may have been about his dismissal because he had blown the whistle about this military operation. In the meantime, apparently, he and his family were being threatened. Colombia informed the Commission of a meeting between an official of the Presidential Advisory Board for Human Rights, the beneficiary and a representative of the Colombian Commission of Jurists in order to analyse and study possible measures to be taken. Later, the claimant informed the Commission of his wish ‘not to avail himself of any special protection plan and to rejoin the National Police or to join National Bureau of Investigation’. In September 1996 the State reported on the concrete measures it had taken on behalf of the beneficiary. CIDH Annual Report 1996, 14 March 1997, §4a.

Family members of persons who have been assassinated are in a vulnerable position as well, especially when they seek the investigation of such murder.⁵³ Attorneys are also in a particularly vulnerable position. In June 1999 the Commission used precautionary measures on behalf of an attorney and a public prosecutor, both of the Brazilian state of Espírito Santo. The attorney was a human rights defender and a key witness in corruption cases. He and the public prosecutor had received serious death threats from a paramilitary organisation.⁵⁴

Judges and prosecutors trying to deal with human rights cases domestically are equally subjected to threats as well. In March 2001 the Commission took precautionary measures on behalf of the President of the Constitutional Court of Guatemala. Unknown persons had fired shots at her home, causing material damage to it. Previously she had received death threats.⁵⁵

In August 2001 the Commission took precautionary measures on behalf of eight members of the National Human Rights Unit of the Colombian Attorney General's office and their families. They had begun a judicial investigation of a General 'in connection with the alleged creation and support of private vigilante groups during his tenure as the commander of the army's XVII brigade in the Urabá region of Antioquia'.⁵⁶ As part of this investigation the home of this General was searched and he himself was arrested. Immediately, in retaliation, criminal and disciplinary proceedings were ordered against six members of the Human Rights Unit and two others were asked to resign. One of them was requested to resign as the head of the Anticorruption Unit. The General whose activities they were investigating was released at once. The Commission requested Colombia to protect the lives of the eight persons, to agree with them on the type of security measures to be arranged and to refrain from taking any reprisal against them for simply performing their duties as prosecutors.⁵⁷

Even a former warden requested the protection of the Commission, which in July 2001, took precautionary measures on behalf of a man who had been the warden of La Picota penitentiary in Bogotá in Colombia. At his home he had received death threats by telephone. Persons unknown to him, but claiming to be members of the Calima Block of the United Self-Defence Forces of Colombia (AUC) and other persons claiming to be members of the AUC of South Cesar and Santander had made these threats. At the same time unidentified persons riding motorcycles were constantly following him.⁵⁸

Several people also received threats in the context of the investigation of the murder of Bishop Gerardi in Guatemala. The Bishop had been active in the Interdiocesan Historical Memory Recovery Project (REMHI). He was murdered in April 1998 following the publication of its final report 'Guatemala: nunca más'. The next year an attorney was targeted who had been working with monsignor Gerardi. In April 1999, on the first anniversary of Gerardi's murder, three ⁵³ See e.g. the precautionary measures of 30 January 2001 on behalf of Gloria Gaitán Jaramillo (Colombia). Through the so-called 'National and International Truth Tribunal Campaign' she was trying to further the investigation into the assassination of her father. According to the available information she was harassed and persecuted because of this both at home and at her workplace. CIDH Annual Report 2000, §26 and Annual Report 2001, Chapter III (a), §13.

⁵⁴ The organization Scuderie Le Coq, Case 12.003. On 7 September 1999 the Commission reiterated its request to Brazil to protect them. CIDH Annual Report 1999, Chapter III C.1, §13.

⁵⁵ CIDH Annual Report 2001, Chapter III (a), §31. See also, e.g. the precautionary measures of 5 July 2001 to protect the judicial magistrate in charge of the investigation into the murder of journalist Jean Dominique, Annual Report 2001, Chapter III (a), §37. See also Chapter XIII (Protection).

⁵⁶ It concerned General Rito Alejo del Río Rojas (ret.).

⁵⁷ CIDH Annual Report 2001, Chapter III (a), §20. See also Chapter XIII (Protection).

⁵⁸ Annual Report 2001, Chapter III (a), §19. Colombia was requested to take the necessary steps to protect his life and person, to agree with him on security measures and to investigate the source of the threats.

unidentified armed persons violently entered the attorney's home, searched his house, threatened one of his daughters and assaulted his housekeeper. The attackers stated that they brought the attorney a message consisting of 'a slab of concrete and stone'. The Commission took precautionary measures that same day. Later that month Guatemala reported to the Commission that it had deployed uniformed personnel keeping a constant watch on his residence. The Commission received information on this situation 'until the persons concerned left the country'.⁵⁹ Although it is clear that Guatemala granted some form of protection, the fact that the attorney and his family left the country may indicate that they considered this protection insufficient.⁶⁰ The special prosecutor and the deputy prosecutor investigating Gerardi's murder were threatened as well. In September 1999 the Commission granted precautionary measures on their behalf. Guatemala provided them with personal security and a police patrol was ordered to guard their homes. Subsequently, the special prosecutor resigned and went with his family to the US in voluntary exile.⁶¹ In June 2001 the Commission once more took precautionary measures to protect persons involved in the investigation of Bishop Gerardi's murder. The measures were specifically intended for two persons, one of whom was the coordinator of military affairs at the Myrna Mack Foundation. He had received death threats aimed at keeping him from taking the witness stand in the judicial investigation of Gerardi's murder. Subsequently, Guatemala informed the Commission of the security measures offered: uniformed police officers 'would mount permanent patrols around the perimeter of his home and the Mack Foundation's headquarters'.⁶²

2.3.3 Human rights defenders generally

Apart from the group of witnesses and others involved in one specific case many people are also at risk simply because of their participation in human rights work generally. The Commission has taken a considerable number of precautionary measures on behalf of these human rights defenders and the Court has taken provisional measures as well.⁶³

As with regard to the aforementioned situation, involving human rights litigation, some examples are given to indicate the range of situations involving human rights defenders. In November 1994 the Commission took precautionary measures on behalf of a forensic anthropologist in charge of exhumations in the clandestine cemeteries found in the Rabinal region of Guatemala.⁶⁴ In March 1996 the Commission requested Mexico to protect the life, physical integrity and personal safety of a Mexican human rights defender who was attacked and threatened for visiting a municipal jail to verify complaints by family members of prisoners. The attackers accused her of 'defending delinquents and obstructing police work'.⁶⁵ The Commission had also intervened on behalf of a lawyer, her three sons and four co-workers focussing on the rights of women and children in Petén (Guatemala).⁶⁶

⁵⁹ CIDH Annual Report 1999, Chapter III.C.1, §34.

⁶⁰ About the official State responses see Chapter XVII.

⁶¹ CIDH Annual Report 1999, Chapter III.C.1, §35.

⁶² CIDH Annual Report 2001, Chapter III (a), §32. The Commission does not specify the circumstances of the threats against the other beneficiary of its precautionary measures or any action undertaken by the State to protect her.

⁶³ Sometimes these human rights defenders are themselves attorneys involved in specific human rights litigation, as discussed under the previous heading.

⁶⁴ The threats continued in 1995. Afterwards, they ceased and at the request of the victims CEJIL requested the Commission to close the case in April 1996. CEJIL case docket 1997.

⁶⁵ CIDH Annual report 1996, 14 March 1997, §4a.

⁶⁶ CIDH Annual Report 1996, 14 March 1996, Chapter II, §4a (cont.). She was the director of the legal office IXCHEL, involved in human rights and environmental law. On 12 September 1996 Guatemala informed the Commission of the steps it was taking to protect the beneficiaries.

In 2001 the Commission undertook action on behalf of a human rights defender who had publicly denounced acts of harassment intended to terrorise the community of Cuarto Pueblo, Guatemala. Witnesses in a suit against the military for the crime of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes (committed between 1982 and 1986) had been harassed in particular.⁶⁷ An academic researcher in Guatemala had received threats as well. In 2001 the Commission intervened upon receipt of information about a series of threatening and intimidating acts related to her professional activities. As a historian and social researcher for the Association for the Advancement of Social Science in Guatemala she had completed a study 'on how local power structures showed ties among local elite, the armed forces, and individuals who served as military commissioners and members of civil self-defence patrols during the country's armed conflict'.⁶⁸

Criticism of corruption can equally be life threatening. The Commission requested Ecuador to protect the former director of its State Printing Press as well as a former and a current member of the Congress of Guatemala and their families. They had publicly denounced 'the alleged use by the Guatemalan vice-president of the national printing press to print 20,000 posters and 500,000 handbills bearing accusations and slanderous comments of the president of the Guatemalan Chamber of Commerce, which were later distributed anonymously in the nation's capital and other cities'. The aforementioned director of the State Printing Press was asked to resign and later received a series of serious death threats forcing her to flee Guatemala. The other two persons also received death threats and were harassed. Subsequently Guatemala informed the Commission that it had provided the member of Congress with personal security. The director general of the National Civilian Police had assigned two officers and a vehicle to protect her.⁶⁹

Several human rights defenders in Brazil had denounced the activities of members of the civil police known as the 'Golden Boys' in the North of the state of Rio de Janeiro. As a result a death squad composed of members of this group was threatening them. In December 1996 the Commission took precautionary measures on their behalf.⁷⁰

In 1994 ten members of the Political Prisoners Solidarity Committee (CSPP) in Colombia began receiving a series of death threats from members of local paramilitary groups. These groups promised that they would execute 'the lawyers who worked for the guerrilla force'.⁷¹

In August of that year a paramilitary organisation⁷² issued a press statement that it would execute lawyers who were 'defender of the interest of guerrilla's' in the city of Cúcuta. Subsequently, paramilitary groups, apparently acting with the approval of members of security forces, were threatening members of the CSPP. One of the beneficiaries was working as human rights defender in the city of Popoyán in the Cauca region in Colombia. She had participated in procedures pursued by a lawyers association, including a lawsuit dealing with the massacres at Los Uvos.⁷³ She had been the victim of many acts of violence, which had increased since June 1995.

⁶⁷ Annual Report 2001, Chapter III (a), §33. It concerned the president and legal representative of the Ixcán Human Rights Association in the community of La Unión Cuarto Pueblo and of the Association for Justice and Reconciliation. Apparently an individual armed with a sharp bladed weapon had attacked him nine days previously. He was wounded with a stiletto knife that cut through his left arm and caused him serious bleeding. He had previously told the Justice of the Peace in Ixcán that he had received death threats because of his activities as a human rights defender.

⁶⁸ CIDH Annual Report 2001, Chapter III (a), §34.

⁶⁹ Id., §35.

⁷⁰ CIDH Annual Report 1996, 14 March 1996, Chapter II, §4a (cont.).

⁷¹ CIDH Case Rafael Lozano Garza, et al.

⁷² The COLSINGUE ('Colombia sin guerrilleros').

⁷³ See José Alvear Restrepo Lawyers Association (CCA), case 11.020.

Apparently, the threats against her were part of a greater pattern of intimidating acts against human rights defenders who had some relation with the CSPP.⁷⁴

In February 1996 the Commission took precautionary measures to protect six members of the Cúcuta branch of the CSPP whose lives and personal integrity were at risk. It also requested Colombia to protect two attorneys who had received threatening and intimidating calls for defending political prisoners. The Commission asked the State as well to protect an official of the city of Popayán in the Cauca region. She was responsible for processing claims and providing humanitarian assistance to political detainees, as a result of which she was subjected to constant harassment and threats against her life and personal integrity.⁷⁵ This example illustrates that officials can be subjected to threats as well.⁷⁶

Members of the clergy may also receive threats because of their human rights work. In July 1997 the Commission took precautionary measures on behalf of the pastor of Caldon in the Cauca region (Colombia). He had conducted the funeral rites for three persons who were killed in a local battle between guerrilla forces and the army. One of the persons killed was a guerrilla fighter. Afterwards, the Archbishop of Popayan received a letter from the Cauca police force, accusing the pastor of Caldon of collaboration with the guerrilla fighters. A clergyman who worked with the pastor was kidnapped. Upon his release he was told to give the pastor a message warning him to leave the area.⁷⁷

A paramilitary group went to the headquarters of the Casa de la Mujer in Puerto Wilches and threatened the life of its coordinator. Together with the members of Peace Brigades International the Organización Femenina Popular, headquartered in Barrancabermeja, lodged a complaint with the domestic authorities. Following this, the paramilitary group sent a message stating that the international presence would not last forever, while the women would remain in the town and would therefore 'suffer the consequences'. A few days later the Commission requested Colombia to take steps to protect the life and physical integrity of the members of the Organización Femenina Popular.⁷⁸

In its discussion of Colombia in 1999 the Commission expressed its concern that certain State officials were making declarations suggesting that members of human rights organisations 'acted improperly or unlawfully'. The State officials who did this most often were those belonging to the security forces. It recommended Colombia to 'clarify unequivocally to public opinion that the work of non-governmental human rights organizations in Colombia is legitimate and important'. The Commission pointed out that in April 1999 General Bravo Silva referred to human rights organisations as 'international terrorists'. This statement was not clarified until September 1999 when the Office of the President issued a Circular ordering public servants to refrain from:

"(a) questioning the legitimacy of the human rights organizations and their members, (b) making statements that discredit, harass, or incite harassment against those organizations and (c) issuing public or private statements that stigmatize the work of such organizations".

⁷⁴ In April 1995 one of these human rights defenders, Mr. Ortiz Prieto, had disappeared and another, Mr. Barriga Vergel, was assassinated on 15 June 1995. CEJIL case docket 1997. On 24 June 1995 the CSPP received another threatening phone call. Before hanging up, the caller played sounds of machine-gun fire. In this case as well, the CCA, America's Watch and CEJIL requested the Commission to issue precautionary measures on 27 July 1995 and the Commission did so on 20 February 1996.

⁷⁵ CIDH Annual Report 1996, 14 March 1997, §4a.

⁷⁶ Some other examples are given at the end of this section.

⁷⁷ CIDH Case 11744. Precautionary measures for Fr. Ezio Roattino Bernardi.

⁷⁸ CIDH Annual Report 2000, §19.

While the Commission considered this to be a positive measure, it noted that recent events did cast serious doubt on the government's willingness to implement its own directive. It pointed out that the 'continual exposure to threats and accusations and assassination attempts' had forced these human rights defenders into internal displacement. It had even forced them 'to leave the country and their valuable work'. Apparently, in regions such as Antioquia by 1999 there were no longer human rights defenders permanently based in small municipalities, as they had been left unprotected in the face of the paramilitary presence. The civilian or Police authorities had failed to act.⁷⁹

The Inter-American Court has ordered provisional measures for the protection of human rights defenders as well. In July 1991 the President of the Court ordered Guatemala to take urgent measures in the Chunimá case. He ordered Guatemala to 'adopt without delay all necessary measures to protect the right to life and the physical integrity' of 14 persons listed by name, 'in strict compliance with its obligation to respect and guarantee human rights under Article 1(1) of the Convention'.⁸⁰ The persons threatened were members of an indigenous human rights organisation. The case itself was pending before the Commission, which had requested the Court to take provisional measures based on the following.

The petitioners had urged the Commission to seek the Court's provisional measures because the human rights defenders from the village of Chunimá were exposed to grave and continuous danger. In the last nine months alone five of them had been killed and one had been seriously wounded. They named the two leaders of the civil patrols as the sources of the threats and killings.⁸¹ They noted that on two occasions the police had travelled to the village in an attempt to execute the arrest warrants of the perpetrators. The first time a very large group of armed patrolers confronted them, detained them for two hours and let them leave only 'after extracting a promise from the police that they would never come to Chunimá again'. Their second attempt failed as well. The petitioners also mentioned several other incidents of threats and assaults. Some people, moreover, had distributed anonymous flyers in the village calling CERJ a guerrilla front. CERJ was one of the two human rights organisations whose members were being threatened. The flyers also named residents of the village who belonged to that organisation. The fourteen people for whom the Commission requested the Court's provisional measures included one of the witnesses to the abduction of the human rights activist who was later murdered. Subsequently, this witness had been shot himself and he is now paralysed. During this shooting he had seen the civil patrols murder his father and brother. He and his surviving family members had fled to the office of CERJ.

⁷⁹ CIDH Annual Report 1999, Chapter V – Colombia, §120.

⁸⁰ IACHR Chunimá v. Guatemala, Order of the President of 15 July 1991.

⁸¹ Before the Commission the petitioners had noted that five men in civilian clothes but driving a blue pick-up truck 'known to belong to the army', had abducted a human rights activist in October 1990. The human rights activist was associated with the Mutual Support Group (GAM) and the Consejo de Comunidades Etnicas Runujel Junám/Council of ethnic communities 'we are all equal' (CERJ). It gave the name of the local civil patrol chief who allegedly had shown these five men where the victim was waiting for a bus. This chief of the local civil patrol had previously threatened the life of this activist. On 10 December 1990, in the Guatemala City bus terminal, two masked gunmen shot dead another human rights activist from the community of Chunimá. Before his murder he had been under surveillance by the civil patrols commanded by the above mentioned chief. While a district court judge had issued a warrant for the arrest of this chief in relation to the previous abduction and murder, the police did not carry out the arrest. The petition further noted that the above civil patrol leader, together with another leader, also mentioned by name, and accompanied by four men that could not be identified, shot three other human rights activists from Chunimá. Two of them were killed and one was left seriously injured. One of the persons killed and the man who was seriously injured had been witnesses to the abduction of 6 October 1990. Following their testimony the district court judge had ordered the arrest of the civil patrol leader in Chunimá. The day after they had been shot, the justice of the peace in Chichicastenango ordered the arrest of the above civil patrol leader. Again, the police did not carry out this order. In March 1991 an attorney for the Human Rights Ombudsman of Guatemala took the initiative to evacuate 15 family members of the remaining victim from Chunimá to the office of their human rights organisation in Santa Cruz del Quiché.

Another early example dates from April 1996 when the President of the Court issued an order for urgent measures on behalf of Father Vogt, a Catholic priest, who had been harassed and persecuted because of his pastoral work. There had been several death threats and attempts on his life and 'a series of false accusations linking him to offences such as sedition and deforestation'. Thus, Guatemala should 'adopt forthwith' the necessary measures to protect his life and integrity, to investigate the events and punish those responsible. In June 1996 the Court ratified the President's order.⁸²

2.3.4 Peace Community

One of the most striking situations of death threats and harassment is that of the Peace Community of San José de Apartadó v. Colombia.⁸³ Apart from the particular situation warranting provisional measures, the Peace Community case highlights two important aspects of these measures in the Inter-American system: the protective measures required (their specific substance) and the evolution in the approach to their beneficiaries.⁸⁴ It is also an example with regard to a State in which the situations the Court faces involve internal armed conflicts. These are difficult to deal with in the context of individual adjudication alone.⁸⁵

The situation warranting provisional measures involved a group of peasants and other civilians who started the Peace Community in 1997, in an effort to isolate themselves from the armed conflict. The Community consists of approximately 1200 civilians and is located in the region of Urabá in the state of Antioquia in Colombia, a region suffering under intensive armed conflict between the FARC on the one hand and military and paramilitary groups on the other. The Community is based on humanitarian principles and collective neutrality, including neutrality vis-à-vis all armed actors and no direct or indirect participation in the war. Its members have pledged not to carry arms and to refrain from offering or manipulating information in favour of any of the armed actors. The Community is ruled by an internal council of eight peasants. The members of the Community elect them democratically for a three-year term.

Despite all this, or maybe because of it, since its origin in 1997 this Community has been subjected to constant paramilitary violence and stigmatisation. The paramilitaries have pointed out inhabitants of the Community as guerrillas or as people helping the guerrillas, for instance by providing them with food. Three months after the Community was created, the paramilitaries ⁸² A year and four months later the Commission requested the Court to withdraw the provisional measures. It noted that the threats and harassment had diminished considerably as a result of the provisional measures and that they were not necessary anymore. By order of 11 November 1997 the Court decided indeed to close the provisional measures, Vogt case, Order of 11 November 1997, Compendium July 1996-June 2000, p. 425.

⁸³ IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó v. Colombia, Orders of 9 October 2000 (President), 24 November 2000, 18 June 2002, 17 November 2004, Order of 15 March 2005, Order of 2 February 2006, 17 December 2007 (President), 6 February 2008. The case itself was pending before the Commission as case 12.325. See Chapter II about the relationship between the Commission and the Court.

⁸⁴ See Chapter XIII (Protection).

⁸⁵ See also Chapter XVII (Official responses).

established a roadblock between San José and Apartadó and detained people travelling there.⁸⁶ This roadblock was four minutes away from the army base. The paramilitaries had limited the free passage of food and made lists of people that later appeared in the hands of other paramilitaries who assassinated them. Initially, the paramilitaries only selectively killed people, but this changed later. Between the creation of the Community early 1997 and December 1997, when the Commission first decided to take precautionary measures, 43 of the Community's members had been murdered.⁸⁷

The Commission requested that precautionary measures be adopted for the members of the Community and for the mayor of Apartadó and her family. During her term of office she had criticised both the activities of the guerrillas and those of the paramilitary groups supporting the army.⁸⁸ The Inter-American Commission has been involved in the case since the end of 1997 and has maintained and expanded its precautionary measures several times. In June 1998, for instance, it requested Colombia to adopt precautionary measures on behalf of a member of the Missionary Team of the Intercongregational Commission for Justice and Peace accompanying the peace community. He had received threats from members of the National Army in Carepa, Urabá.⁸⁹

The Commission's precautionary measures proved insufficient and in October 2000 it decided to appeal to the Inter-American Court for provisional measures. In its petition it pointed out the liability of the members of the Colombian army for the violence and harassment by paramilitary groups. It informed the Court that it had been notified of the murders of 47 of the members of the Community within a nine-month period.

In light of the seriousness of the situation the Court detailed some of the facts presented by the Commission in its request for provisional measures. It concerns 21 incidents over a period of almost three years. In relation to the level of responsibility of the State and the type of measures it should take to protect people under threat, it is important to clarify who are normally the perpetrators of the threats and violent acts committed against the Community.⁹⁰ It appears that paramilitary groups ('autodefensas') and one division of the Army were often involved. With regard to eight of the first nine attacks, which took place between December 1997 and April 1998, members of the 17th Brigade of the National Army reportedly were the perpetrators. About the subsequent events, from April 1999 until September 2000, villagers spoke of military, paramilitary or, more generally, armed men.⁹¹ In one case even the local authorities themselves alleged that the crime was committed by paramilitaries. In another case paramilitaries had forced a member of the Community to get off a public bus. His body was later found in Finca El Bajo. Lying next to him was the body of a woman 'who had also been detained in the same paramilitary reserve'. According to the Commission she was a guerrilla. She had been wounded and members of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) had been evacuating her when three men of the paramilitary organisation Autodefensas Unidas de Colombia (AUC) intercepted their vehicle. The ICRC delegates had tried to negotiate with them for an hour in an attempt to safeguard her life, ⁸⁶ IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order for provisional measures, 24 November 2000. The Spanish text speaks of a 'retén', which in the context seems to be a roadblock where people are being detained.

⁸⁷ On 12 December 1997 two Community members disappeared at a short distance from the military base of the 17th Brigade on the road leading to the village of San José de Apartadó. Five days later the Commission took its precautionary measures.

⁸⁸ As a result she had been the target of threats and harassment and after her term of office ended the danger to her life and personal integrity grew even worse. CIDH Annual Report 1999, Chapter 3.C.1, §26.

⁸⁹ CIDH Annual Report 1998, §20.

⁹⁰ See further Chapter XIII (Protection).

⁹¹ IACHR Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order for provisional measures, 24 November 2000.

but despite their opposition the AUC took her out of the vehicle and forced the delegates to leave. In yet another instance a group of about twenty hooded men assassinated six members of the Community and burned the community centre, also destroying its telephone connection. The 17th Brigade may have been involved in this attack. In any case, the next day members of this Brigade, together with paramilitaries, forced themselves into a house, plundered it and threatened the inhabitant as well as the entire Community.

During this period many members of the Community were murdered, some disappeared and several people were injured. People were attacked in their houses, the community centre and while travelling by public transportation. The last incident before the Commission decided to petition the Inter-American Court took place in September 2000 when six armed men forced themselves into a house and kidnapped three persons who were later assassinated.⁹² Early November 2000 the President of the Court ordered urgent measures on behalf of all persons specifically named by the Commission. Later that month the full Court decided to order provisional measures on behalf of all members of the Community, also those it could not specify by name.⁹³ The Court expanded its provisional measures several times, following the Commission's information on new violent acts.⁹⁴

2.3.5 Union leaders

Yet another popular target-group for threats and attacks are trade unionists. In March 1996 the Commission requested Guatemala to take precautionary measures to protect two persons working for the Union of Bank Workers in Guatemala had received serious death threats in connection

⁹² In October 2000 the Commission requested the Court to order provisional measures to protect the lives and personal integrity of the members of this peace community, Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order for provisional measures, 24 November 2000.

⁹³ See further Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4 on beneficiaries. During the hearing of November 2000 the Commission clarified that there had been several massacres. Since the massacre of 19 February 2000 the Community had requested the involvement of the Vice-Presidency of Colombia. They had a meeting a month later in which the Community proposed a series of measures that were not followed up. A return of inhabitants was nevertheless prepared and another massacre took place on 8 July 2000. In the afternoon some hooded people entered the Community and killed six peasants who, according to medical reports, were shot forty times each. Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order for provisional measures, 24 November 2000.

⁹⁴ The Commission had presented 23 incidents that took place between 15 December 2001 and 18 June 2002, the very day on which the Court indeed expanded its provisional measures. Again, the perpetrators were described as soldiers and paramilitaries. To give a specific example of a situation where there may be a link between the paramilitary and the military, on 15 December 2001 three armed men assassinated a member of the Community in the centre of the town of San José de Apartadó and then left for the road leading from Apartadó to San José. At the time, the military were based three minutes from the place where the armed men entered the village. Twice the information of the Commission mentioned one particular member of the paramilitary, known under the name 'Torolo', who had previously been recognised as a participant in the massacre that took place on 8 July 2000. Peace Community of San José de Apartadó case (Colombia), Order for provisional measures, 18 June 2002. There is one occasion where the presence of the military actually seems to have prevented a paramilitary group from murdering someone. Paramilitaries had detained thirteen inhabitants of Apartadó, who were on their way to San José, and had accused them of being guerrillas. They threatened to kill them. They interrogated them about their identities and registered their personal information. When they were beating one of them and it looked like they were going to kill him, an army truck appeared and the paramilitaries withdrew.

with their union work. Some days later, however, one of the two beneficiaries was kidnapped and tortured. In response, the Commission reiterated its request. In May 1996 Guatemala stated that after the kidnapping it had taken protective measures.⁹⁵

In March 1997 heavily armed men in uniforms attacked a car carrying the staff, including Alberto Jaramillo, the President of the Consorcio Porce II Workers Union in Colombia. The uniformed men checked a list they were carrying, identified Alberto Jaramillo and told him to get out. He was later assassinated. Afterwards, groups of armed men in uniform appeared several times at the house of Sergio Jaramillo, the co-founder and former secretary of the Consorcio Porce II Workers Union in Amalfi, Antioquia. In April 1997 the Commission took precautionary measures on his behalf and on behalf of his family.⁹⁶

Mr. Tovar, a member of the Executive Committee of the Unified Workers Central in Colombia had received death threats because of its work as a trade union leader.⁹⁷ The Commission requested precautionary measures on his behalf in November 1997. In January 1998 he left Colombia and the Commission shelved its precautionary measures.⁹⁸ Upon his return he again received threats. These coincided with the assassination of the Vice-President of the Unified Workers Central, Jorge Ortega. In October 1998 the Commission requested Colombia to reactivate the precautionary measures it had adopted previously to protect the lives and physical integrity of Mr. Tovar and his family.⁹⁹

In June 2000 the Commission requested Colombia to take steps to protect the lives and physical integrity of the leaders of four unions.¹⁰⁰ The next month the Commission decided to expand the precautionary measures. It decided to include as a beneficiary of the precautionary measure someone who was detained by a group of uniformed men with long weapons who said they were members of the Autodefensas Unidas de Colombia. He had since disappeared. The expansion of the precautionary measures also included as a beneficiary a prosecuting attorney with the Union of Municipal Workers of Bugalagrande. His name appeared on a list of the paramilitary group operating in the centre of the Department of Valle, together with another union leader who was recently extra-judicially executed.¹⁰¹

2.3.6 Persons involved in land disputes and indigenous communities

Indigenous communities seem to be singularly vulnerable. Not only their cultures and traditional way of life are at risk,¹⁰² but also the lives and physical integrity of many of their members. They ⁹⁵ CIDH Annual Report 1996, 14 March 1997, §4a.

⁹⁶ The Commission does not refer to a case number. Apparently, at the time this matter had not been processed as a Case.

⁹⁷ On 14 June 1994, at the transport terminal in Bogotá, he was thrown by force into a car carrying four persons, probably members of intelligence and security agencies. Later, he was set free. In August 1995, however, he received an anonymous death threat and in May 1997 he was attacked. In late September 1997, upon his return from a trip abroad, he received new threats.

⁹⁸ CIDH Annual Report 1997, February 17 1998.

⁹⁹ CIDH Annual Report 1998, §21.

¹⁰⁰ The unions involved were Municipal Utility Workers Union of Cali-SINTRAEMCALI, the National Union of University Workers and Employees of Colombia (Cali-division), 'Central Unitaria de Trabajadores Sub-directiva Valle del Cauca' and the Union of the Department of Valle del Cauca. The Commission notes that the available information indicated that the leaders of these unions were in imminent danger because the civil and military authorities in the Department of Valle del Cauca were constantly plotting against them and accusing them of being guerrillas, terrorists or sympathisers with insurgent groups.

¹⁰¹ CIDH Annual Report 2000, §21.

¹⁰² See also Chapter X (Culture and religion).

may receive threats from the military or the police, from paramilitary groups, large landowners or others.¹⁰³

Many different groups and individuals in Colombia, including campesinos, have been declared 'military targets'.¹⁰⁴ Moreover, the aforementioned large landowners do not only form a threat to indigenous groups but to small peasants and farm-workers as well. Often there are various linkages between security forces, paramilitaries and landowners, which may help explain the impunity for human rights violations perpetrated by these actors. In a few cases in which persons were threatened NGOs resorted to the Inter-American Commission to intervene.¹⁰⁵

¹⁰³ Since the beginning of 1996 members of the Nahuatl, Lenca and Mayan Nations in El Salvador had suffered many threats against their lives and physical well-being. The Commission took precautionary measures on behalf of the directors of the National Association of the Indigenous Peoples of El Salvador (ANIS), who had been continuously harassed and assaulted. Some of them had been forced into exile. CEJIL case docket 1997 (precautionary measure undated). ANIS and CEJIL had requested the measures in particular for the head of ANIS, who is the spiritual chief of the Nahuatl, Lenca and Mayan Nations. In March 1998 the Commission requested the Court to protect the lives and integrity of the members of the Zenú Indigenous Community in Colombia. Previously the Commission took precautionary measures on behalf of the Zenú community in June 1996. The previous month paramilitary groups in the San Andrés de Sotavento shelter, in the region of Córdoba, had murdered one of their leaders. Later that month, the Secretary of the Town Council of San Andrés was murdered as well and pamphlets were distributed threatening the indigenous leaders. Annual Report 1996, 14 March 1996, Chapter II, § 4a (cont.). In January 1998 it took precautionary measures for the protection of Maximiliano Campo and eleven other leaders of the Paez indigenous community (Colombia) who were also involved in the Caloto case pending before it. Case 11.101, Annual Report 1997, February 17, 1998. On 28 and 29 December 1997 members of a paramilitary force murdered six persons in the area of the Paez indigenous community with lands in Caloto and other parts of northern Cauca in Colombia. Even the official police report mentioned that a paramilitary group was seen in the area of the murders. The precautionary measure was of 7 January 1998. It is mentioned again in the 1998 Annual Report, §17. Paramilitary groups operating in the area had threatened them. The provisional measures requested related to the case Clemente Teherán et al. In March 1998 the President of the Court indeed decided to intervene and in June 1998 the full Court ratified this decision in its Order for provisional measures to protect the lives and personal integrity of 22 persons in this community. IACHR Clemente Teherán et al (indigenous community Zenú) v. Colombia, Orders of 19 June 1998, 29 January 1999, 12 August 2000. The Court lifted its provisional measures by Order of 1 December 2003.

¹⁰⁴ See e.g. precautionary measure of 1 November 2000 to protect the life and physical integrity of the members of the Asociación Campesina del Valle del Río Simitarra. Paramilitary groups in the region had declared them military targets and they had been subjected to systematic threats and fatal attacks on their leaders. In 1999 Colombia had already taken measures on behalf of the spokespersons for the campesino exodus from southern Bolívar. Annual Report 2000, §23.

¹⁰⁵ In December 1995 the Commission took precautionary measures in order to protect the lives and physical integrity of the members of a union of indigenous communities (Union of Indigenous Communities of the Northern Zone of Isthmus (UCIZONI), in Mexico who had been threatened and harassed because of land-ownership conflicts. It had defended peasants and farm workers ('Campesinos') in disputes about land in the state of Oaxaca. The conflicts were between villages in Aroyo Tejon and Mazatlan on the one hand and landowners on the other. In its Annual Report the Commission published the names of these landowners: Fuentes and Raymundo. The Commission also noted that the President of the Commission on Justice and Human Rights of UCIZONI had reported that he had repeatedly received telephone calls threatening his life. Annual Report 1996, 14 March 1997, §4a. In connection with land disputes between the indigenous population of Honduras, the Garífuna. Group of Afro-Caribbean descent, speaking Igñeri, a combination of Arahua, French, Swahili and Bantu. and certain Honduran

With regard to some situations in which the Commission took precautionary measures information is available in the decision on the merits. In 1999, for instance, the Commission found violations of the right to life, humane treatment, fair trial and judicial protection in a case involving impunity against murder and assaults by large landowners in Brazil against landless peasants, rural workers and their union leaders. It found violations against specific persons, but noted about the ‘setting of the violence’ that there had been 190 murders of peasants in the Xinguara district (Southern Pará) since 1990 and that a sentence had been handed down for only one of these murders. It concluded that there was ‘a campaign of violent and illegal action to silence or murder those who support the occupiers of lands and those who assert the legal rights of the rural workers’.¹⁰⁶ The Commission considered that ‘this campaign has been abetted directly by police officers, who by act and omission fail to take the action required to impose order and the rule of law’.¹⁰⁷ When discussing the right to a fair trial and judicial protection (Arts 8 and 25 ACHR) it specifically noted that the victims had to push their domestic complaints forward in the face of ‘frequent delays and inaction’ as well as persecution and threats. It noted that this even triggered its use of precautionary measures.¹⁰⁸

2.3.7 Refugees and internally displaced persons

Threats may cause people to become internally displaced or to flee to other countries. This, in turn, makes them particularly vulnerable for other threats. Refugees, moreover, also risk refoulement.¹⁰⁹ Several members of a displaced community in the region of Turbo in Colombia were murdered in 1997. Some of them had taken refuge in the municipal sports stadium and in special shelters. Subsequently, two armed individuals, who were identified as paramilitary, entered the sports stadium looking for one of them. Another paramilitary person was seen inspecting one of the shelters.¹¹⁰ Within a few days the Commission took precautionary measures.¹¹¹

2.3.8 Detainees

In December 1997 the Commission took precautionary measures on behalf of a detainee and his family. He was threatened because he had provided the authorities with information on presumed connections between paramilitary groups and officials of the Colombian military.¹¹² The Commission and Court have used the tool of provisional measures to request States to improve landowners, both the former mayor of the Garífuna community in the municipality of Limón, in the Colón region, and the ex-President of the Fraternal Black Organisation had been gravely harassed and intimidated. In May 1999 the Commission requested Honduras to take the necessary measures to safeguard their lives and personal integrity. CIDH Annual Report 1999, Chapter 3.C.1, §38.

¹⁰⁶ CIDH Newton Coutinho Mendes et al. v. Brazil, 13 April 1999 (merits), §98.

¹⁰⁷ Id., §99.

¹⁰⁸ Id., §111. See further Chapters XIII (Protection), XVI (Legal Status) and XVII (Official responses).

¹⁰⁹ An example of threats against refugees is the precautionary measure of 12 March 2001, in the Camacho case, to protect the right to life and physical integrity of a group of Colombian refugees in Colombia, Annual Report 2001, §61. About the threat of refoulement see Chapter V (Non-refoulement).

¹¹⁰ The shelter was called ‘Unidos Retornaremos’ (united we will return). Annual Report 1997, February 17, 1998.

¹¹¹ Annual Report 1999, Chapter III.C.1, §26.

¹¹² CIDH José Alirio Arcila Vasquez and family v. Colombia, precautionary measures of 17 December 1997. See also Chapter XIII (Protection).

detention situations or provide access to medication,¹¹³ but also in the context of threats against the lives and physical integrity of detainees.¹¹⁴

2.3.9 Journalists

Clearly, perpetrators of human rights violations or corruption have no fondness for journalists who expose them. While their distaste for such journalists may result in the curtailment of their freedom of expression, something for which the Commission and Court have used precautionary measures as well,¹¹⁵ it may also lead to threats to their lives and physical integrity.¹¹⁶

Two journalists in Colombia had published an article in which they accused a group called CONVIVIR of having committed certain abuses in Medellín. After the publication of their second article on this subject, a bomb destroyed the offices of the CONVIVIR group in Medellín. Following this, both journalists received telephone threats blaming them for having caused the bombing. As a result they were forced to stay in hiding. In July 1997 the Commission took precautionary measures on their behalf.¹¹⁷

In another Colombian case a journalist for 'El Espectador' received a telephone-call from someone with the nickname 'el Panadero' who 'expressed interest in having a journalistic piece done on the paramilitaries' version of the outbreak of violence on 27 April 2000 in the National Model Prison of Bogotá'. At the door of the facilities the journalist was approached, 'surrounded, sedated, and driven to a nearby house where several individuals gagged and beat her and sub-

¹¹³ See also Chapter VII (Detention).

¹¹⁴ See also section 2.5.2, Chapter VII (Detention) on separating minors and adults. In May 2000, for instance, the Commission requested Colombia to take steps to protect the life and physical integrity of political prisoners threatened by paramilitary prisoners wearing 'Autodefensas Unidas de Colombia' (AUC) bracelets. The measures of 11 May 2000 were on behalf of the prisoners detained in buildings 1 and 2 of the National Model Prison in Bogotá. Based on the information available at the time on the precautionary measure, on 27 April 2000 prisoners belonging to paramilitary groups, who were detained in cell block 5, violently attacked the prisoners in cell block 4. They killed 47 inmates and injured 17 others. According to the petitioners several prisoners from cellblocks 3 and 5 were patrolling the facilities carrying long-range weapons and making threats against political prisoners. Annual Report 2000, §17. Elsewhere the Commission refers to the killing of 25 detainees (Annual Report 2000, Chapter IV, §93). See also Chapter XVII (Official responses).

¹¹⁵ See Chapter XII (Other situations), section 3.4.

¹¹⁶ On 26 May 2000, for instance, the Commission took precautionary measures on behalf of a journalist in Peru. Apparently national intelligence service agents had entered the office of the newspaper where he worked and tortured him in order to obtain certain videos from him. He was hospitalised for cuts on his left arm. On 14 July 2000 the State informed the Commission that it could not comply with the precautionary measures as the journalist in question had left Peru on 31 May 2000, Annual Report 2000, §44. In November 2001 the Commission took precautionary measures of four journalists in Colombia. According to information received by the Special Rapporteur for Freedom of Expression, the Southern Liberators Block of the AUC had threatened them. This included an AUC communiqué urging them to renounce their professions within 48 hours or they would be executed. The beneficiaries were the editor of the newspaper 'Diario Sur', a reporter for the weekly 'VOZ' who was also a peace commissioner for the region of Nariño, a reporter for the RCN newscast and a cameraman for 'Caracol Televisión', Annual Report 2001, Chapter III (a), §24.

¹¹⁷ Apparently this matter was not yet transferred as a case.

jected her to degrading treatment'. In June 2000, the Commission requested Colombia to take steps to protect her life and physical integrity as well as those of two other editors.¹¹⁸

2.3.10 Politicians and government officials

Politicians and government officials may also receive threats. They may be the victims of rivalry between colleagues or political parties, or they may put themselves in danger by actually trying to find resolutions for violent situations, by exposing corruption or by taking seriously their work at a human rights division of their government.¹¹⁹

In April 2000 the Commission took precautionary measures requesting Brazil to protect the state police auditor of São Paulo and his family. The Archbishop Emeritus of São Paulo had approached the Commission with a request for such measures. The state police auditor had received threats, 'presumably because of his activities monitoring police conduct'. The State reported that it had granted the precautionary measures.¹²⁰

One precautionary measure directed at Nicaragua is particularly interesting because the President himself seems to have been involved. In February 1999 the Commission requested Nicaragua to protect the lives and physical integrity of three persons who had received threats relating to activities undertaken as part of their professional duties in the General Department for Integrity in Public Service of the Office of the Comptroller-General of Nicaragua. According to the information presented by the petitioner, it was President Alemán himself who had threatened one of the victims, the Comptroller.¹²¹ A few years earlier the Inter-American Court had ordered provisional measures on behalf of Alemán, who was then a presidential candidate. There had been an attempt at his life, which killed one of his bodyguards and injured several persons.¹²²

In March 2001 the Commission took precautionary measures on behalf of a public prosecutor on Colombia's specialised judicial circuit and on behalf of her family. For security reasons they had relocated outside the country. The petitioners had pointed out that Colombia had denied an extension of her leave of absence. As a result, and despite the security concerns, she was forced to return to Colombia immediately. The Commission requested Colombia to guarantee the right to life and person of this prosecutor and her family. Colombia 'undertook a series of measures that concluded satisfactorily for the parties'.¹²³

The Commission also uses country reports as a tool for human rights protection. These reports, in turn, provide a more in depth context of the violations in specific countries. In its discus-

¹¹⁸ The peace editor and the judicial editor of 'El Espectador'. On 19 June 2000, the Commission requested Colombia to expand the precautionary measures to include a journalist working for 'NTC Noticias'. She had received threats similar to those of her colleagues. Annual Report 2000, §20.

¹¹⁹ In September 1994, for instance, the Commission requested Colombia to adopt protective measures on behalf of one of its own government officials, the delegated Attorney General for Human Rights of supporting the guerrilla forces. A member of Congress had accused him of supporting the guerrilla forces, Annual Report 1997, (Hernando Valencia Villa case). In March 1996 the Commission took precautionary measures on behalf of four members of the Guatemalan National Democratic Front, who were elected to the Congress. Later it reiterated them and extended the measures to include their families. In May 1996 Guatemala responded that it was taking measures to protect the persons involved, CIDH Annual Report 1996, 14 March 1996, Chapter II, § 4a (cont.).

¹²⁰ CIDH Annual Report 2000, §13.

¹²¹ See also Chapter XVII (Official responses).

¹²² IACHR Alemán Lacayo v. Nicaragua, Order of 2 February 1996.

¹²³ CIDH Annual Report 2001, Chapter III (a), §15. Generally about the attitudes of States see Chapter XVII.

sion of the human rights situation in Colombia, for instance, it specifically pointed out that the persons threatened and attacked also included public employees. It mentioned the example of the ‘members of the Human Rights Unit of the Office of the Prosecutor-General who are constantly threatened, as well as the municipal ombudsmen (‘personeros’), who are involved in human rights-related tasks at the local level’.¹²⁴

The Commission noted that it had received ‘numerous requests’ for precautionary measures on behalf of ‘human rights defenders, members of civil society organizations, and even State employees, such as municipal ombudsmen (personeros) who are subject to threats, assassination attempts, and/or accused of collaboration with one or another of the parties to the armed conflict’. It stated that it had ‘responded to these urgent calls in the manner that it deemed appropriate’.¹²⁵

The second commander of the Colombian national army had given a statement implicating public employees. He gave this statement during a forum in Miami, Florida organised by the Cuban-American Foundation on Tradition, Family and Property:

“And, finally, what poses greater limitations for us is defending us from the infiltrators of the subversion in the Office of the Prosecutor-General, the Office of the Human Rights Ombudsman, and the Office of the Procurator-General backed by some international organizations that cause us very much harm...the non-governmental human rights organizations, misinformed or infiltrated, are as dangerous as the guerrillas themselves”.¹²⁶

In response both the Prosecutor-General and the Procurator-General publicly warned that these remarks endangered the lives of the members of their institutions.¹²⁷ The Commission noted that such accusations against public employees and members of NGOs and the failure of the government to unequivocally reject these statements put the people referred to in serious danger. The government needed to adopt ‘specific and effective measures to punish those who practically depict people who work for justice and human rights as enemies of the State’.¹²⁸

2.3.11 CEDAW and domestic violence

Thus far the only time an adjudicator other than the Inter-American Commission and Court has used a provisional measure to protect against threats in a case in which the claim itself also aimed at protection was in October 2003. That month CEDAW used provisional measures for the first time as part of its newly established individual complaint procedure. It requested Hungary to take measures to protect the petitioner against threats by her former common law husband. The petitioner, who was not represented by counsel, had urgently requested it ‘to save her life, which she feels is threatened by her violent former partner’.¹²⁹

¹²⁴ CIDH Annual Report 1999, Chapter V – Colombia, §105.

¹²⁵ Id., §118. The Commission took note of the fact that Colombia had handed down indictments in murder cases of five persons including Mr. Valle Jaramillo. It pointed out, however, that seven members of the ‘Comité Técnico de Investigaciones’ of the Human Rights Unit in the Office of the Prosecutor-General had been assassinated. The Commission also noted that it had learned that more than 100 prosecutors were being threatened and some had had to leave Colombia. Annual Report 1999, Chapter V – Colombia, §121.

¹²⁶ Id., §110.

¹²⁷ Id., §111.

¹²⁸ Id., §§113-114. See also Chapter XIII (Protection).

¹²⁹ CEDAW A.T. v. Hungary, 26 January 2005, §4.1.

3 RELATION BETWEEN PROVISIONAL MEASURES TO HALT DEATH THREATS AND HARASSMENT AND THE EXPECTED DECISION ON THE MERITS

3.1 Introduction

Human rights adjudicators have emphasized the importance for States of implementing their positive obligations under the respective treaties to protect the right to life, the prohibition of cruel treatment and torture and the right to personal security. States that do not protect persons under their jurisdiction against death threats and harassment fail to ‘ensure’ the fundamental rights involved.¹³⁰ Obviously threats to persons who have resorted to an international adjudicator also hinder the right of individual petition under the respective treaties.¹³¹

Article 2 ICCPR refers to an undertaking to respect and ensure all rights in the Covenant. Similar to the previous Chapters the other relevant provisions are the right to life (Article 6), the prohibition of torture and cruel treatment (Article 7) and Article 9 (the right to security).¹³² Article 2 ICAT stipulates that States ‘shall take effective legislative, administrative, judicial or other measures to prevent acts of torture in any territory under its jurisdiction’. Article 13 entails the obligation to ensure the right to complain to the competent authorities with allegations of torture. Moreover, ‘(s)teps shall be taken to ensure that the complainant and witnesses are protected against all ill-treatment or intimidation as a consequence of his complaint or any evidence given’. Based on Article 16 ICAT States shall ‘undertake to prevent in any territory under its jurisdiction other acts of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment which do not amount to torture as defined in article 1, when such acts are committed by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity'. Article 4 ICERD obliges States to take immediate and positive measures against incitement of racial hatred. Article 5(b) lays down the security of the person including the protection from violence or bodily harm and Article 6 ICERD refers to the undertaking to ensure effective protection and remedies including reparation and satisfaction.

¹³⁰ This issue is relevant in the context of provisional measures, judgments on the merits as well as judgments on reparation. See further Chapter XIII (Protection).

¹³¹ See 1st Optional Protocol to the ICCPR; Article 22 ICAT; Article 14 ICERD; Optional Protocol to the CEDAW; Article 45(2) ACHPR; Article 44 ACHR; Article 34 ECHR and Article VIII(1) Annex 6 Dayton Peace Agreement. For special attention to victims and witnesses see also the law and practice of the Yugoslavia and Rwanda Tribunals and the International Criminal Court. On protection of witnesses before the Rwanda Tribunal see e.g. Lagrange (2003). See also Article 20 Statute ICTY: ‘due regard for the protection of victims and witnesses’; Article 22 ‘protection of victims and witnesses’. Moreover, Rule 69 (B) Rules of Procedure and Evidence stipulates: “In the determination of protective measures for victims and witnesses, the Trial Chamber may consult the Victims and Witnesses Section”. Rule 75 (A), finally, provides: “A Judge or a Chamber may, proprio motu or at the request of either party, or of the victim or witness concerned, or of the Victims and Witnesses Section, order appropriate measures for the privacy and protection of witnesses, provided that the measures are consistent with the rights of the accused”.

¹³² Chapter VII already discussed the positive obligations of States vis-à-vis detainees. The HRC has pointed out ‘the positive obligations on States parties to ensure Covenant rights will only be fully discharged if individuals are protected by the State, not just against violation of Covenant rights by its agents, but also against acts committed by private persons or entities that would impair the enjoyment of Covenant rights insofar as they are amenable to application between private persons or entities. Thus, failure to ensure Covenant rights, as required by Article 2, may ‘give rise to violations by States Parties of those rights, as a result of States Parties’ permitting or failing to take appropriate measures or to exercise due diligence to prevent, punish, investigate or redress the harm caused by such acts by private persons or entities’. HRC General Comment 31, 29 March 2004, §8. Already in 1992, the HRC noted that Article 7 covers acts committed by private individuals, implying a duty for States to take appropriate measures to protect persons against such acts. HRC General Comment 20 [44] on torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment (Article 7), 3 April 1992.

In its General Recommendation on violence against women the CEDAW pointed out that 'the definition of discrimination includes gender-based violence' and that 'gender-based violence may breach specific provisions of the Convention, regardless of whether those provisions expressly mention violence'. It also stated that 'discrimination under the Convention is not restricted to action by or on behalf of Governments'.

"Under general international law and specific human rights covenants, States may also be responsible for private acts if they fail to act with due diligence to prevent violations of rights or to investigate and punish acts of violence, and for providing compensation".¹³³

In the first case it dealt with since the entry into force of the Optional Protocol instituting an individual complaint proceeding the CEDAW found violations of Articles 2(a), (b) and (e), 5 and 16 for failure to protect the petitioner against domestic violence.¹³⁴ These articles address the positive obligations of States to ensure equality and eliminate discrimination against women.

In the regional systems positive obligations have equally been recognized. Sometimes they have been emphasized in the context of human rights activities other than those directly dealing with individual complaint. Both the African and the Inter-American Commission, for instance, have a Special Rapporteur dealing with the rights of human rights defenders and expressing particular concern when their right to life and personal integrity are under threat.¹³⁵

The Inter-American Court has derived from Articles 4 (right to life) and 5 (humane treatment) together with Articles 1(1) (obligation to respect rights) and 2 ACHR (domestic legal effects) the obligation of States not only to refrain from threatening people but also to actively protect them against threats by others.¹³⁶ This includes the duty to investigate prior violence and ¹³³ CEDAW General Recommendation 19 on violence against women, 29 January 1992, §9.

¹³⁴ CEDAW A.T. v. Hungary, 26 January 2005. See also Boerefijn (2005a), pp. 470-480 and, more generally, Boerefijn (2005c), pp. 35-57.

¹³⁵ See e.g. Special Rapporteur of the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights (ACHPR) on Human Rights Defenders in Africa Me. Reine Alapini-Gansou, Press release on the situation in Cameroon, 7 April 2008 (expressing concern regarding the case of Mrs. Madeleine Afité, president of la Maison des droits de l'Homme du Cameroun (MDHC) 'who has been threatened to death on several occasions these days. Her car was also ransacked during the night of 5 to 6 March, 2008 for having denounced, notably to the international media, human rights violations'). The Inter-American Commission has a Special Unit on human Rights Defenders. The Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe has also paid attention to the issue of death threats and harassment in the context of the ECHR. See Resolution 1571 (2007) on the member States' duty to cooperate with the ECtHR, as well as its Recommendation 1809 and the report by Rapporteur Christos Ourourides, Committee on Legal Affairs and Human Rights, Doc. 11183, 9 February 2007 and Addendum of 1 October 2007. For case law by the African Commission generally acknowledging the positive obligations of States, see e.g. ACHPR Legal Resource Foundation v. Zambia, 2001 (positive obligations based on Article 1 ACHPR); Social and Economic Rights Action Center for Economic and Social Rights (SERAC) v. Nigeria, 6 June 2001 (positive obligations based on the rights themselves); Purohit and Moore v. The Gambia, 2003 (obligation to respect and ensure, but taking into account resources); and the ongoing case (July 2008) Association of Victims of Political Violence & Interights v. Cameroon.

¹³⁶ See e.g. IACHR Velásquez Rodríguez v. Honduras, judgement of 29 July 1998, §§172-175 and Godínez Cruz v. Honduras, 20 January 1989, §186.

threats and to prosecute and punish the perpetrators.¹³⁷ If the threats have resulted in internal displacement the freedom of movement comes into play.¹³⁸ If the victims of such displacement are indigenous peoples, their relation to their ancestral ground play a role as well.¹³⁹ Given the background of many threats the freedom of expression and association and the special recognition of human rights defenders are often emphasized. Journalists, human rights defenders, trade unionists and others threatened and harassed for their activities have the right to continue these activities unhindered.¹⁴⁰

The ECtHR only deals with civil and political rights, but these have been interpreted to include positive obligations.¹⁴¹ This is particularly relevant with regard to Articles 2 (right to life), 3 (prohibition of ill-treatment and torture) and 8 (private life) in conjunction with Article 1 (ensuring the rights). The Bosnia Chamber has equally confirmed that Article 1 ECHR (to 'secure' the rights and freedoms in the Convention) also entails positive obligations to protect those rights.¹⁴²

This section deals with case law in the various systems involving the above provisions that could shed light the relation between provisional measures to halt death threats and the expected decision on the merits.

3.2 Inter-American system

A case in which the Inter-American Commission took precautionary measures to protect minors in detention illustrates that bringing a claim before the Commission may make an NGO vulnerable for retaliation. In 1996 the petitioners reported that the members of the Honduran section of Casa Alianza had been intimidated and harassed. High-ranking government officials had threatened to deprive the organisation of its legal status and to deport Bruce Harris and other members of the organisation who were called 'dangerous aliens' whose purpose it was to slander Honduras.¹⁴³ They also alleged that the President of the Honduran Bar Association had threatened ¹³⁷ See e.g. President IACHR, Velásquez Rodríguez, Fairén Garbi and Solís Corrales, and Godínez Cruz Cases (Honduras), Letter President on behalf of witnesses Jiménez-Puerto and Custodio López, 6 November 1987. This was conformed in the judgements on the merits, see e.g. Velásquez Rodríguez v. Honduras, judgement of 29 July 1998, §188. See further on the obligation to investigate, prosecute and punish as the main reason to take provisional measures Chapter XII (Other situations, section 2.7 on preventing impunity) and as a specific method of protection against death threats Chapter XIII (Protection).

¹³⁸ See also Chapter XIII (Protection).

¹³⁹ About protecting cultural survival see Chapters X (Cultural and religious rights) and XIII (Protection).

¹⁴⁰ See also Chapter XIII (Protection). About provisional measures ordered mainly to protect freedom of expression see Chapter XII (Other situations).

¹⁴¹ See e.g. Mowbray (2004); Van der Velde (2002); Vlemminx (2002); Lawson (1995) and Forder (1992). See further Chapter XIII on the protective measures required. The Council of Europe also introduced the European Social Charter and its Protocols (including a collective complaint system).

¹⁴² See e.g. Bosnia Chamber Matanović et al. v. Republika Srpska, 6 August 1997, §56.

¹⁴³ CIDH Minors in detention v. Honduras, 10 March 1999, §46. The petitioners included the following newspaper articles with their communication: El Heraldo, 'Casa Alianza seeks publicity', 6 October 1996; La Tribuna, 'Casa Alianza's legal status will be revoked if it keeps up its complaints', 10 October 1996; La Prensa, 'Private Development Organization determined to slander Honduras', 11 October 1996 (p. 4A); El Nuevo Día, 'Slandering Honduras is no way to resolve the juvenile problem', 12 October 1996 (p. 14); La Prensa, 'Casa Alianza acting recklessly', 14 October 1996 (p. 20A); El Heraldo, 'Slander, says Sosa Coella: The Director of Casa Alianza should be deported', 10 October 1996.

to revoke the membership of the legal counsel of Casa Alianza in Honduras. As discussed in the previous section in such cases it may become necessary to take protective measures to protect these persons against threats as well. This section refers to the case law on the merits with regard to the obligation of States to protect persons against death threats and harassment. It illustrates how both international and regional adjudicators have interpreted the provisions on the right to life and security and the prohibition of cruel treatment to encompass a positive obligation of the State to protect individuals against threats by private individuals and paramilitaries as well.

3.3 HRC

In Delgado Páez v. Colombia (1990) the HRC referred to the obligation under Article 9(1) to protect the liberty and security of non-detained persons.¹⁴⁴ It pointed out that there was ‘no evidence that it was intended to narrow the concept of the right to security only to situations of formal deprivation of liberty’.

“It cannot be the case that, as a matter of law, States can ignore known threats to the life of persons under their jurisdiction, just because that (sic) he or she is not arrested or otherwise detained. States parties are under an obligation to take reasonable and appropriate measures to protect them. An interpretation of article 9 which would allow a State party to ignore threats to the personal security of non-detained persons within its jurisdiction would render totally ineffective the guarantees of the Covenant”.¹⁴⁵

An interpretation of Article 9(1) limited to the context of arrest and detention would render ineffective the guarantees of the ICCPR.

In its decision on the merits in Tshishimbi v. Zaire (1996)¹⁴⁶ the HRC referred to its prior jurisprudence that Article 9(1) also included protection against ‘threats made by persons in authority to the personal liberty and security of non-detained individuals within the State party’s jurisdiction’. After having found violations of Articles 9(1) and 7 ICCPR it urged the State to thoroughly investigate the circumstances of the abduction and detention and to bring to justice those responsible. As it usually does, the HRC also referred to the obligation to ensure that similar violations do not occur in the future. The investigation and prosecution required could be seen both as a form of redress for the victims and as a means to ensure that similar violations do not occur in the future, taking a firm stance against impunity.¹⁴⁷

¹⁴⁴ HRC Delgado Páez v. Colombia, 12 July 1990. The petitioner in this case was a teacher of religion and ethics at a secondary school in Leticia, Colombia. As an advocate of ‘liberation theology’ his social views differed from those of the man who was the Apostolic Prefect of Leticia at the time the author and alleged victim worked there as a teacher. Among others, the author alleged to have received anonymous phone calls at his residence in Bogotá threatening him with death if he returned to Leticia and did not withdraw his complaint against the Prefect and the education authorities. He received death threats as well at the teachers’ residence in Leticia. He reported these to the military authorities in Leticia, the teachers union, the Ministry of Education and the President of Colombia. On 2 May 1986 unknown killers shot to death a colleague, Ms. Rubiela Valencia, outside the teachers’ residence. The author himself was attacked five days later in the city of Bogotá. Fearing for his life he left the country and obtained political asylum in France in June 1986.

¹⁴⁵ HRC Delgado Páez v. Colombia, 12 July 1990. See also Nowak (1993), p. 163.

¹⁴⁶ HRC Tshishimbi v. Zaire, 25 March 1996.

¹⁴⁷ See also Chapter XIII (Protection).

Other cases against, among others, Zambia, Angola and Equatorial Guinea have confirmed this.¹⁴⁸ In the reparations paragraph in Bahamonde v. Equitorial Guinea (1993) the HRC urged the State to guarantee the security of the victim. The petitioner had contended that he ‘was subjected to harassment, intimidation and threats by prominent politicians and their respective services on a number of occasions’. Observing that the State party had dismissed this claim in general terms without addressing his ‘well-substantiated allegations’, the HRC concluded that the State had failed to ensure his right to security of person. The petitioner had fled the country for Spain in 1991 and he claimed that since his departure he had received death threats. He claimed that ‘the security services of Equatorial Guinea have received the order to eliminate him, if necessary in Spain’.¹⁴⁹ The HRC did not specify its call to guarantee the security of the victim. It could mean either to guarantee his security if he were to return or to guarantee his security in Spain.

It is clear, however, that the HRC considers the State to have extra-territorial obligations, in the sense that Article 2 ICCPR cannot be interpreted in such a way that a State simply may not violate the Covenant on its own territory, but that it is free to do so on the territory of another State.¹⁵⁰ In Dias v. Angola (2000) the HRC referred to the obligation to ‘take adequate measures to protect his personal security from threats of any kind’.¹⁵¹ Several months later, in Chongwe v. Zambia (2000) the HRC was more specific, in referring to the obligation, under Article 2(3)(a), to ‘take adequate measures to protect his personal security and life from threats of any kind’. Not only did it refer to ‘life’ as well as to ‘security’, but it also urged the State ‘to carry out independent investigations of the shooting incident, and to expedite criminal proceedings against the persons responsible for the shooting’.¹⁵² Like Mr. Bahamonde, Mr. Chongwe had fled the addressee State, but the Committee simply pointed out that this State was obliged to take adequate measures to protect his personal security and life from threats of any kind without specifying the territorial ramifications.¹⁵³

In Dias v. Angola (2000) the HRC also referred to the obligation ‘to take adequate measures to protect his personal security from threats of any kind’. Mr. Dias had submitted his complaint

¹⁴⁸ See e.g. HRC Bwalya v. Zambia, 14 July 1993; Bahamonde v. Equitorial Guinea, 20 October 1993; Chongwe v. Zambia, 25 October 2000; Dias v. Angola, 20 March 2000 and Jiménez Vaca v. Colombia, 25 March 2002.

¹⁴⁹ HRC Bahamonde v. Equitorial Guinea, 20 October 1993.

¹⁵⁰ HRC Sergio Ruben Lopez Burgos (submitted by his wife Delia Saldias de Lopez) v. Uruguay, 29 July 1981 and Celiberti de Casariego v. Uruguay, 29 July 1981. The State party informed the HRC by note of 31 October 1991 that Mr. Lopez Burgos had filed a request for compensation and that the sum of $ 200,000 had been awarded to him on 21 November 1990, to be paid in four instalments. At this date the State also informed the Committee that Mrs. Celiberti had presented a claim that was under review and that she was elected to the Council of Montevideo on 26 November 1989. See follow-up report CCPR/C/45/R.6. On extra-territorial obligations, see also Chapter V (Non-refoulement).

¹⁵¹ HRC Dias v. Angola, 20 March 2000.

¹⁵² Moreover, it pointed out that the remedy should include ‘damages’ to the victim ‘if the outcome of the criminal proceedings reveals that persons acting in an official capacity were responsible for the shooting and hurting of the author’. HRC Chongwe v. Zambia, 25 October 2000. Mr. Chongwe was an advocate and the chairman of a 13-party opposition alliance. He claimed that Dr. Kaunda, the former President, and himself were shot at and wounded by the police on 23 August 1997. He also included a Human Rights Watch report confirming the shooting and quoting witness statements and medical reports. The HRC found that the State had failed to protect the petitioner’s right to life and security of person.

¹⁵³ While in certain cases (e.g. occupation) a State does have positive obligations when it acts extraterritorially, it might be far-fetched to require each State also to provide protection against death threats occurring outside of their own jurisdiction. On extraterritorial application of human rights treaties see also Chapter XIV (Jurisdiction).

from Portugal. In this case the Committee specifically noted that he had been unable to enter Angola due to the threats against him.¹⁵⁴ Still, it did not discuss the territorial scope of the obligation to protect the victim against threats nor did it point out the State's obligation to ensure his safe return to Angola. Only in Jiménez Vaca v. Colombia (2002) did the HRC point out that the State was obliged 'to take appropriate measures to protect his security of person and his life so as to allow him to return to the country'. In this case it also urged the State 'to carry out an independent inquiry into the attempt on his life and to expedite the criminal proceedings against those responsible for it'. On the other hand, it seemed more cautious with regard to the assurances of non-repetition. Rather than the usual reference to the obligation to take measures to prevent similar violations in the future, it referred to the obligation 'to try to prevent' such violations.¹⁵⁵ Chapter XII on the relationship between the protection required in provisional measures and in decisions on reparation more closely discusses the Committee's decisions on reparations in cases involving threats and the indications these may give for the use of provisional measures pending the proceedings.

An early case, dating from 1977, involving a claim that family members were being persecuted, is that of Zairian citizen Mbenge who submitted a communication on behalf of members of his family and persons in their employ as well as on behalf of himself.¹⁵⁶ In his initial letter he complained of 'systematic persecution' of his family by the Government of Zaire (Congo). He submitted his complaint from Belgium where he was residing as a political refugee. He alleged that his family was being persecuted because of his political views. He pointed out that he had learned through the press that he had been sentenced to death in September 1977 for supposedly having participated in the invasion of the province of Shaba (formerly known as Katanga). He claimed that President Mobutu had sought in vain to have him extradited from Belgium. Instead, the Government arrested several members of his family as well as business associates who might give information on his whereabouts.¹⁵⁷ On the merits the Committee found a violation of Article 9 (right to security of person). Neither this decision nor the file shows specific intervention by the Committee pending the proceedings before it.¹⁵⁸

¹⁵⁴ HRC Dias v. Angola, 20 March 2000.

¹⁵⁵ HRC Jiménez Vaca v. Colombia, 25 March 2002. Mr. Jiménez Vaca was a practising trial lawyer in the city of Medellín and in the region of Urabá. For his work he was based in the municipality of Turbo. In the region he was the legal advisor to several trade unions and organisations of peasants, including for Sintagro in Antioquia. From 1980 until his flight to the UK in 1988 he was harassed. Several times he asked the authorities for protection. On 26 August 1985 several households received pamphlets asking "are you a member of Sintagro? Doesn't it bother you to belong to a group of hired assassins and murderers of the people, drug bandits led by Argemiro Correa, Asdrúbal Jiménez and Fabio Villa?" Later on one of his brothers disappeared and another was murdered. On 4 April 1988 he was shot at when driving in a taxi in Bogotá. After 5 days in a hospital he was transferred to another hospital for security reasons. He stayed there until he was well enough to travel to the UK. He had identified members of the fourth and tenth army brigades 'as possibly being responsible for the harassment and death threats to which he was subjected'.

¹⁵⁶ HRC Daniel Monguya Mbenge v. Zaire, 25 March 1983.

¹⁵⁷ His younger brother and his father-in-law were arrested in September 1977. Business relation Mozola, a pharmacist, as well as the family driver (no name provided) were also arrested the same day. Six days later he submitted his case before the HRC.

¹⁵⁸ Eventually the HRC decided that the petitioner was justified to act on behalf of his brothers and father-in-law by reason of close family connection. In July 1980 it discontinued consideration of the case to the extent it related to his brother Simon and his father-in-law since it appeared that they 'would now be in a position to act on their own behalf'. Regarding his younger brother the Committee based its assessment on the undisputed fact that he was arrested in order to force him to disclose the whereabouts of his brother Simon and that he was not released from detention until late in 1978 or early in 1979. The HRC found a violation of Article 9 ICCPR. With respect

Early cases hinting at harassment of counsel are those involving Maître Hammel in Madagascar. In February 1982 his law offices had been searched and he was taken away by officers of the ‘political police’ and held in a basement cell. He noted that he was informed that he ‘was suspected of being an international spy’ in view of his contacts and communications with Amnesty International and the HRC since, ‘according to the Malagasy political police, those contacts constituted a crime of international espionage’. After 19 years as a member of the Madagascar Bar he was expelled as a French national and had two hours to pack at his home. The State party informed the HRC, in January 1987, of the decision of the Supreme Court of Madagascar on his case, of August 1986. In this decision the court considered that the Minister of the Interior had been correct in expelling him ‘insofar as his continued presence in Madagascar would have disturbed public order and security’. The court pointed out that it was ‘apparent from the investigation that Mr. Eric Hammel, making use both of his status as a corresponding member of Amnesty International and of the Human Rights Committee [sic] at Geneva, and as a Barrister, of his own free will took the liberty of discrediting Madagascar by making assertions of such gravity that they should have been upheld by irrefutable evidence’. In a case Mr. Hammel submitted on behalf of himself, the HRC found violations of Article 9(4) because he had been unable to challenge his arrest. It found a violation of Article 13 because he had not been allowed to submit reasons against his expulsion and to have his case reviewed by a competent authority while there were no compelling reasons of national security. It also noted with concern that the decision to expel him ‘would appear to have been linked to the fact he had represented persons before the Human Rights Committee’. ‘Were that to be the case, the Committee observes that it would be both untenable and incompatible with the spirit’ of the ICCPR and its OP.¹⁵⁹

In March 1981 the HRC strongly urged the State to provide detailed information about the access of Dave Marais to Maître Hammel, counsel for the alleged victim, and to ensure that they could effectively communicate. In May 1981 Maître Hammel informed the Committee that, ‘as a consequence of his enquiry into his client’s state of health through the examining magistrate’ he ‘was charged at the instance of the Attorney General with spreading false rumours’. He also stated that the political police had questioned him on two occasions.¹⁶⁰ In February 1982 Maître Hammel informed the Committee of his expulsion. In this context he referred to an officers’ plot of the previous month and pointed out that the political police had seized part of his dossier on the Marais case.¹⁶¹ Hammel claimed that his expulsion was also related to his involvement in representing a politician, Monja Jaona, following an arrest. Later Hammel represented Jaona before the HRC with regard to yet another arrest.¹⁶² The situation sketched above illustrates that the HRC has faced situations in which access to counsel was limited partly through interference with his activities. Indeed, the HRC intervened pending Marais to ensure access to counsel.¹⁶³ Obviously this implied that the State should not hinder counsel in his defence. Nevertheless, the HRC did not intervene specifically to protect counsel against harassment.

to the petitioner himself it found a violation of Article 6(2) because he had been sentenced to death twice in circumstances contrary to the provisions of the Covenant and of Article 14(3)(a)(b)(d) and (e).

¹⁵⁹ HRC Eric Hammel v. Madagascar, 3 April 1987.

¹⁶⁰ See also Chapter VIII on ensuring procedural rights to protect the right to life and personal integrity, discussing the Committee’s informal provisional measure to ensure access to counsel.

¹⁶¹ HRC Dave Marais v. Madagascar, 24 March 1984. See also John Wight v. Madagascar, 1 April 1985. The first month of his representation of John Wight Maître Hammel was still in Madagascar.

¹⁶² HRC Monja Jaona v. Madagascar, 1 April 1985.

¹⁶³ See Chapter VIII (Ensuring procedural rights).

In her first communication in Teti Izquierdo v. Uruguay (1982)¹⁶⁴ the petitioner mentioned continued death threats against her husband, detained in Uruguay. The HRC did not respond to this information. Only three months later, in October 1980, when she informed it of his disappearance, it took action and requested to be informed about his health and whereabouts. It is possible that an earlier intervention would have been more effective.

Bautista de Arellana v. Colombia (1995)¹⁶⁵ is particularly relevant in the context of the protection against threats. The case had been submitted by a Colombian lawyer residing in Brussels who was instructed by the family of a Colombian citizen who disappeared in August 1987 and whose body was subsequently discovered. When the lawyer submitted the complaint, in June 1993, he also noted that the family of the disappeared person and himself ‘have received death threats and are subject to intimidation, because of their insistence in pursuing the case’.¹⁶⁶ Counsel pointed out that the authorities promoted the alleged perpetrator to Brigadier General and, in August 1995, awarded him an Order for Military Merit. Finally, he referred to an incident that same month when the alleged victim’s family, together with members of the Association of Relatives of Disappeared Prisoners (ASFADDES), met in a popular restaurant in Bogotá for a demonstration on the occasion of the eighth anniversary of Nydia Bautista’s disappearance.

“Soon after their arrival, an individual in civilian clothes entered the restaurant and occupied a table next to theirs. All those present identified Brigadier General Velandia Hurtado (the alleged perpetrator, ER), who continued to monitor the group throughout the meeting. The presence of Mr. Velandia Hurtado, who otherwise commands the Third Army Brigade in Cali, on those particular premises on that particular day, is considered to be yet another instance of intimidation of Nydia Bautista’s family”.¹⁶⁷

Pending the proceedings the HRC could have used provisional measures to protect her family members.¹⁶⁸

¹⁶⁴ HRC Teti Izquierdo v. Uruguay, 1 April 1982.

¹⁶⁵ HRC Bautista de Arellana v. Colombia, 27 October 1995.

¹⁶⁶ The State explained the disciplinary proceedings that were taking place. It mentioned that the Division of Special Investigations took up the case again after the victim’s body had been found. In February 1991 it heard the testimony of Mr. Garzón Garzón, who was then a member of the National Army. It noted that his testimony could ‘never be corroborated’ and his whereabouts were ‘currently unknown’. The HRC pointed out that the file revealed that this witness ‘requested special police protection for himself and his family after giving his testimony’. Later, in June 1995, a domestic court attached full credibility to his testimony about the disappearance of Ms. Bautista de Arellana. The National Delegate for Human Rights had also given full credit to this testimony by resolution of July 1995. In a later submission to the HRC counsel expressed concern for the National Delegate’s physical integrity and referred to ‘recent reports about further instances of intimidation of Nydia Bautista’s sister (the sister of the alleged victim, ER) by agents of the military’s intelligence service’. By note of 27 July 1995 counsel added that the family of the alleged victim, in particular his sister, continued to be subjected to intimidation and harassment. He also pointed out that the family’s first lawyer had disappeared in Bogotá on 4 July 1990. About the latter’s disappearance see CIDH Dr. A. de Jesus Pedraza Becerra v. Colombia, 25 September 1992.

¹⁶⁷ HRC Bautista de Arellana v. Colombia, 27 October 1995.

¹⁶⁸ See also Chapter XIII (Protection). Another example involving threats is that of Vicente Barzana Yutronic (on his own behalf and on behalf of his two sons) v. Chile, 23 July 1999 (inadm.). The complaint referred to death threats to the petitioner’s family allegedly because of his human rights activities and his Croatian origin. He claimed that his sons had been arbitrarily detained and tortured in May 1994, but gave no specific examples of threats that took place following his initial submission of 8 July 1996. Hence, it makes sense that on 14 February 1997 the case was

The same applies to the case of Jayawardena v. Sri Lanka (2002). The complaint concerned death threats and between the initial submission, when the petitioner was an opposition member of parliament and December 2001, when his party obtained a majority and he became a minister in the new government, he informed the HRC by fax of a range of threats against him. On the merits the HRC found, among others, that the failure to investigate these death threats violated his right of security of person under Art. 9(1) ICCPR. No information is available on explicit requests by the petitioner for provisional measures, not of any informal action by the HRC in this regard.¹⁶⁹

3.4 HRC and death threats on death row

In cases involving death threats on death row the HRC often specifically recommends, as part of the remedy, the humane treatment of the petitioner in detention.¹⁷⁰ There are several cases in which the submissions of petitioners on death row referred to death threats and harassment.

In one case the petitioners were beaten unconscious. The beatings resulted in a fractured arm and other injuries. They were then left without medical attention for almost a day and one of the petitioners was later warned against further pursuing his complaint to the judicial authorities.¹⁷¹

In another case the petitioner had complained that warders allegedly told death row inmates that ‘since the State party was not prepared to hang them’ they would think of ‘other ways of decreasing the death row population’. He submitted that ‘the warders (...) are taunting with death threats and some of them keep on telling me that they are the ones who will be taking me to the gallows and what size rope will fit my neck and how much weight it will take to take my head off my body’.¹⁷² He claimed that since the death of one of his co-defendants, who died as a result of the violence, warders had repeatedly threatened him with death and that ‘the amount of threats increased after those responsible for the death of three inmates were indicted’. The HRC noted that the petitioner had described the events in detail and the State party had not refuted these claims. The State had not informed the Committee ‘whether the threats and ill-treatment to which the author himself allegedly was, and remains, subjected, are also under investigation’ (italics ER).¹⁷³ only transmitted under Rule 91 (current Rule 97). Later the case was declared inadmissible, also in relation to the claims on behalf of his sons, because there was nothing in the materials before the HRC to suggest that the sons had authorized their father to represent them.

¹⁶⁹ HRC Jayawardena v. Sri Lanka, 22 July 2002. Other cases, such as Afuson Njaru v. Cameroon, 19 March 2007 also dealt with death threats and harassment, but apparently these were no longer ongoing when the case was submitted to the HRC. Nevertheless on the merits the HRC found that an effective remedy also entailed the obligation of the State to take effective measures to ensure that the petitioner ‘is protected from threats and/or intimidation from members of the security forces’, §8. Before the case was submitted to the HRC the UN Special Rapporteur against torture had already referred to one of the attacks against the petitioner in his report of his visit to Cameroon, 11 November 1999, Annex II, §37.

¹⁷⁰ See further Chapters III (Executions), VII (Detention) and XIII (Protection).

¹⁷¹ In its decision on the merits the Committee determined that this was an aggravating factor. HRC Randolph Barrett and Clyde Sutcliffe v. Jamaica, 30 March 1992.

¹⁷² Dwayne Hylton v. Jamaica, 8 July 1994. The HRC noted also the allegation that prison warders had severely beaten him during a search.

¹⁷³ “In the absence of further information on such investigations, and taking into account that such investigations as have been undertaken do not appear to have been concluded four and a half years after the events, due weight must be given to the author’s allegations to the extent that they

In the third example the petitioner had submitted that warders had beaten to death another inmate in front of his cell. The day after this beating they returned and maltreated him as well. He suffered a kidney injury but was left in his cell for four days before he was brought to a hospital.¹⁷⁴ The State party did not accept that death row inmates were generally afraid to notify the authorities of instances of ill treatment. In its admissibility decision the Committee simply regretted that the State had not provided it with information about the results of the investigation it had announced.¹⁷⁵ Claims do not all concern threats by authorities. They may also relate to failure to protect against threats by fellow inmates.¹⁷⁶

In all cases involving claims of ill treatment, beatings and death threats upon conviction the HRC expects the State to investigate the situation and inform it accordingly. Lacking this and in the face of detailed descriptions by the petitioner it gives due weight to the latter's allegations.¹⁷⁷ After all, the claims could not have been dealt with during the trial (in which case the HRC normally defers to the findings of domestic courts) because the allegations related to events subsequent to conviction. The HRC did use provisional measures in these cases but not to deal with the threats. It only used them to halt the execution of the petitioners. Nevertheless, in its findings it recommended the State to cease their continuing ill treatment.¹⁷⁸

have been substantiated". HRC Dwayne Hylton v. Jamaica, 8 July 1994; note the other case Dwayne Hylton v. Jamaica, 16 July 1996. See also Garfield Peart and Andrew Peart v. Jamaica, 19 July 1995 and Anthony Leehong v. Jamaica, 13 July 1999.

¹⁷⁴ HRC Ian Chung v. Jamaica, 9 April 1998. He had complained about this treatment to the Parliamentary Ombudsman. Later his counsel had requested information from the Ombudsman's Office about these complaints, but with no results.

¹⁷⁵ Subsequently, the State party contended that its investigation had not substantiated the allegation of ill treatment by warders on death row. The HRC noted that the State party had not indicated who had investigated the claim, when it was investigated and whether a formal report was issued on the results of these investigations. The HRC also noted that the petitioner had given a detailed account of the beatings. It reminded Jamaica of its obligation under the OP to properly investigate allegations of violations of the Covenant and forward the outcome of the investigations to the Committee in detail and without undue delay. It found violations of Articles 7 and 10(1). Ian Chung v. Jamaica, 9 April 1998. See also Lennon Stephens v. Jamaica, 18 October 1995.

¹⁷⁶ See e.g. HRC Silbert Daley v. Jamaica, 31 July 1998.

¹⁷⁷ In March 1993, for example, the HRC declared admissible the case of Garfield and Andrew Peart v. Jamaica, 19 July 1995. Subsequently the alleged victims reported ill treatment and threats and they claimed they did not receive medical treatment. In relation to the claim that warders had beaten Andrew Peart with a metal detector on 4 May 1993, counsel submitted that afterwards he was passing blood in his urine and also suffered from shoulder injuries. He did not, however, receive medical treatment. He further stated that following this incident his client was locked in his cell without water until three days later. Counsel also submitted that Andrew Peart had been receiving death threats from warders, 'allegedly because he testified against one of them before the Court after the death of an inmate in 1989'. The State party submitted that Garfield Peart's communication in relation to the way he was treated in prison was inadmissible because of failure to exhaust domestic remedies. The Committee noted that the petitioner had complained to the acting Superintendent, that his counsel had made a complaint to the Commissioner of Police and was subsequently informed that the complaint was referred to the Commission of Correctional Services for appropriate action. "In the circumstances, the Committee considers that the author and his counsel have shown due diligence in the pursuit of domestic remedies and that there is no reason to review the Committee's decision on admissibility". On the merits the HRC found violations of Articles 7 and 10(1) because of the assaults against both petitioners and the death threats against one of them.

¹⁷⁸ See e.g. HRC Willard Collins v. Jamaica, 1 November 1991.

The case of Rickly Burrell v. Jamaica (1996)¹⁷⁹ is illustrative of situations of ongoing threats. The HRC had used provisional measures only to halt the petitioner's execution.¹⁸⁰ Six months after his initial submission he was killed during a prison incident. With regard to the threats and ill treatment his counsel claimed violations of Articles 7 and 10. The petitioner's violent death, he claimed, constituted a violation of Article 6(1).¹⁸¹ He submitted that there was a prima facie case that the authorities had arbitrarily deprived the petitioner of his life. In view of the evidence the burden of proof was now on the State, which had sole access to the most significant information, such as the autopsy reports.¹⁸² Counsel also referred to a letter received from an inmate stating that a warder had previously threatened Mr. Burrell with death. Apparently, Burrell had been convicted of having murdered a relative of this warder. Following the threats the petitioner had lodged a complaint with the Superintendent. According to the above inmate's letter it was this warder who started the incident and it was him who shot the petitioner in his cell. Counsel also referred to other letters of inmates equally alleging the involvement of this warder.¹⁸³

¹⁷⁹ HRC Rickly Burrell (submitted by Phillip Leach) v. Jamaica, 18 July 1996. After Burrell had been killed the HRC accepted that his counsel would maintain the communication. Upon consultation with the victim's family, the Jamaica Council for Human Rights had instructed counsel to do so.

¹⁸⁰ Note verbale to the Minister of Foreign Affairs and Foreign Trade of 9 June 1993 (on file with the author). See also HRC Bakhrom Khomidov (submitted by his mother Saodat Khomidova) v. Tajikistan, 29 July 2004. In this case Special Rapporteur used provisional measures in September 2002 to halt the execution of the petitioner's son. In March 2004 she re-iterated that investigators had beaten her son, but she had filed no complaint with the authorities 'as she was afraid that they would further harm her son or would execute him'.

¹⁸¹ He referred to HRC Guerrero v. Colombia, 31 March 1982 and Baboeram v. Suriname, 4 April 1985.

¹⁸² HRC Rickly Burrell (submitted by Phillip Leach) v. Jamaica, 18 July 1996, §3.4. Counsel referred to a press release by Amnesty International reporting the killing of four death row prisoners. While reports indicated that they were shot dead after they had tried to take prison guards hostage, some prisoners had been receiving death threats from prison personnel prior to the incident, because they had complained about ill treatment. Counsel wrote to the Parliamentary Ombudsman and to the Superintendent of St. Catherine's prison about the incident and the preceding threats. He received no reply. In January 1994 Amnesty International published a report about the killings. Among others, it noted that the injuries of the guards appeared to have been minor and that none of them were hospitalised. Eyewitnesses among the prisoners had stated that the four prisoners had been shot in their cells 'when they no longer posed a threat to the warders'. They also claimed that 'because of the confined space, it is difficult to see how prisoners could have been shot without injuring the warders, if they were still being held hostage'. Counsel stated that 'at least three of the warders named by prisoners as having been involved in the shootings have been named repeatedly in other allegations involving threats or maltreatment involving prisoners on death row'. No report had been made available about the incident. Counsel also contended that complaints about the many incidents of excessive violence by prison warders were not adequately dealt with. Instead, prisoners complaining about ill treatment were subjected to threats by warders.

¹⁸³ Counsel claimed that the warders had not been trained in restraint techniques and the use of different levels of force. The incidents, he argued, showed that there was no clear chain of command and that 'if the warders had received proper training in control and restraint techniques, they might not have panicked and shot Mr. Burrell and three other inmates'. Among others, the State party submitted that while none of the warders were hospitalised, 'two of them were rendered unfit for work for two months, as a result of the injuries received'. The State party concluded: "Like Burrell, none of these four warders was involved in the commencement of the altercation, but became victims. For Burrell, it was fatal". The HRC regretted that the State had made available neither the autopsy report nor the results of the coroner's inquest. It observed that

Thus, counsel had pointed out that Burrell had been particularly at risk from physical attack and had been seriously threatened and abused prior to his death.¹⁸⁴ Indeed the HRC found a violation of Article 6(1) for failure to take effective measures to protect the victim's life.

If a petitioner informs the HRC about threats such as those mentioned here, it would indeed be appropriate to intervene by means of provisional measures. It could take a gradual approach in this respect, first taking informal provisional measures. As discussed in section 3, the HRC has already formally taken provisional measures to protect against threats. This is in agreement with its approach on the merits to positive obligations to protect the right to life, the prohibition of cruel treatment and torture and the right of personal security.

3.5 CAT

In Dzemajl et al v. Yugoslavia (2002) CAT considered that, in the circumstances, the burning and destruction of houses constituted acts of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. The nature of these acts was 'further aggravated by the fact that some of the complainants were still hidden in the settlement when the houses were burnt and destroyed, the particular vulnerability of the alleged victims and the fact that the acts were committed with a significant level of racial discrimination'. It pointed out that while the acts were not committed by public officials themselves 'they were committed with their acquiescence' and constituted a violation of Article 16(1) ICAT. CAT also specifically referred to the positive obligations flowing from this provision.¹⁸⁵ B.M.B v. Tunisia involved a complaint about Articles 2, 11-14 ICAT, but CAT used provisional measures to protect the petitioner's family and the family of the alleged victim and witnesses against death threats and harassment. In its decision declaring the case inadmissible it repeated its request 'to ensure that no harm is done to the author's family, the alleged victim's family or the witnesses and their families'. This seems to be based on the acknowledgment that States have positive obligations under Articles 5(a) and 16 to protect persons somehow related to the case.

3.6 CEDAW

In A.T. v. Hungary (2005) the CEDAW concluded that 'the obligations of the State party set out in article 2 (a), (b) and (e) of the Convention extend to the prevention of and protection from violence against women, which obligations in the present case remain unfulfilled and constitute a violation of the author's human rights and fundamental freedoms, particularly her right to security of person'.¹⁸⁶ Among others, it pointed out that Articles 5(a) and 16 had been violated, because the petitioner 'could not have asked for a restraining or protection order since neither option the report submitted by the State party acknowledged that the victim's death 'was the unfortunate result of confusion on the side of the warders, who panicked when seeing some of their colleagues being threatened by the inmates'. It also noted that the shooting continued after the warders were rescued.

¹⁸⁴ In this light counsel had noted that the HRC had previously decided that a State party could be responsible 'either by act or omission' for not taking adequate measures to protect against such threats. See his submission of 14 February 1994 (on file with the author), referring to HRC Dermi Barbató (submitted by Mr. Gilmet Dermi on behalf of his cousins) v. Uruguay, 21 October 1982.

¹⁸⁵ CAT Dzemajl et al v. Yugoslavia, 21 November 2002, §§9.2 and 9.6.

¹⁸⁶ CEDAW A.T. v. Hungary, 26 January 2005, §9.3.

currently exists in the State party'. She had been 'unable to flee to a shelter because none are equipped to accept her together with her children, one of whom is fully disabled'.¹⁸⁷

3.7 Inter-American Commission and Court

The Inter-American Court has pointed out in its provisional measures that the State should take effective measures to investigate and punish the perpetrators, 'as a key element of its protective duty'.¹⁸⁸ In Velásquez Rodríguez (1988) it stressed that 'under international law a State is responsible for the acts of its agents undertaken in their official capacity and for their omissions, even when those agents act outside the sphere of their authority or violate internal law'.¹⁸⁹ The Court had found that 'in principle, any violation of rights recognized by the Convention carried out by an act of public authority or by persons who use their position of authority is imputable to the State'.¹⁹⁰

"The State has a legal duty to take reasonable steps to prevent human rights violations and to use the means at its disposal to carry out a serious investigation of violations committed within its jurisdiction, to identify those responsible, to impose the appropriate punishment and to ensure the victim adequate compensation".¹⁹¹

It is 'obligated to investigate every situation involving a violation of the rights protected by the Convention'. After all, 'if the State apparatus acts in such a way that the violation goes unpunished and the victim's full enjoyment of such rights is not restored as soon as possible, the State has failed to comply with its duty to ensure the free and full exercise of those rights to the persons within its jurisdiction'. "The same is true when the State allows private persons or groups to act freely and with impunity to the detriment of the rights recognized by the Convention".¹⁹²

In its judgments on the merits and on reparations the Inter-American Court often refers to the obligation to prevent, to investigate and to punish.¹⁹³ It has pointed out that it mentions this obligation in the judgment on the merits because the obligation to guarantee and ensure the effective exercise of the rights in the ACHR is different from and independent of the obligation to make reparation. This means that the State is obliged to investigate the facts and punish those responsible even if the victim or his next of kin would decide to waive the measures of reparation.¹⁹⁴ Otherwise it would fail to comply with its general obligation to 'ensure the free and full exercise' of the rights under the ACHR.¹⁹⁵

¹⁸⁷ Id., §9.4. More closely on this case see Boerefijn (2005a), pp. 470-480. See also IACHR pending case Cotton Field (Ramos Monárrez et al.) v. Mexico, lodged by the Commission on 4 November 2007 concerning the joint cases Nos. 12,496, 12,497 and 12,498, the Cotton Field: Claudia Ivette González, Esmeralda Herrera Monreal and Laura Berenice Ramos Monárrez (involving an alleged pattern of gender violence that had led to the murder of hundreds of women and girls).

¹⁸⁸ IACHR Giraldo Cardona case (Colombia), Order for provisional measures (on behalf of members of the Civic Human Rights Committee of Meta), 19 June 1998.

¹⁸⁹ IACHR Velásquez Rodríguez, Judgment of 29 July 1988, §170.

¹⁹⁰ Id., §172.

¹⁹¹ Id., §174.

¹⁹² Id., §176.

¹⁹³ See e.g. Medina-Quiroga/Nash Rojas (2007), pp. 19-29.

¹⁹⁴ See, e.g. IACHR Garrido and Baigorria, judgment on reparations of 27 August 1998, §72.

¹⁹⁵ See e.g. IACHR Bámaca Velásquez, judgment of 25 November 2000, §129 and Paniagua Morales et al, judgment of 8 March 1998, §178 (and sixth operative paragraph).

At the same time the Court has expressed an awareness of the difficulties of investigation in certain circumstances. It pointed out:

“The duty to investigate, like the duty to prevent, is not breached merely because the investigation does not produce a satisfactory result. Nevertheless, it must be undertaken in a serious manner and not as a mere formality preordained to be ineffective. An investigation must have an objective and be assumed by the State as its own legal duty, not as a step taken by private interests that depends upon the initiative of the victim or his family or upon their offer of proof, without an effective search for the truth by the government. This is true regardless of what agent is eventually found responsible for the violation. Where the acts of private parties that violate the Convention are not seriously investigated, those parties are aided in a sense by the government, thereby making the State responsible on the international plane”.¹⁹⁶

The Inter-American Commission and Court regularly refer to the aforementioned judgment in Velásquez Rodríguez (1988). In its final decision in the Minors in detention v. Honduras case, for instance, the Commission noted that:

“[that the] insinuation that persons who, for any reason, have recourse to the inter-American system for protection of human rights are disloyal to their country is unacceptable and cannot constitute a basis for any penalty or negative consequence. Human rights are higher values that ‘are not derived from the fact that (an individual) is a national of a certain state, but are based upon attributes of human personality’ (American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man, Whereas clauses, and American Convention, Preamble)”.

The Commission considered that any act of intimidation or threat against the petitioners must be duly investigated and punished.¹⁹⁷ The protective duty of the Commission and Court explains the use of provisional measures to protect persons against threats recognized already in Velasquez Rodriguez (1988). This is based on the positive obligation of States to prevent attacks on life and dignity, among others by investigating and prosecuting past acts.

In June 1997 the Commission took precautionary measures in the case of García Prieto et al. so as to protect several persons against death threats and harassment. Almost ten years later, in September 2006, it requested the Court to order provisional measures. The Court did so that month and in January 2007.¹⁹⁸ At the end of 2007 it found violations on the merits, including a failure to comply with the obligation to investigate the threats and harassment endured. It found ‘a lack of diligence by the police and prosecutorial authorities’ in the conduct of the investigations. This had ‘impeded the determination of the facts and the identification, trial, and possible punishment of the perpetrators responsible for the threats and harassment directed at some members of the García Prieto Giralte family. Moreover, the lack of an adequate and serious investigation has permitted that such events continue to the present’.¹⁹⁹ It had been proven ‘that José Mauricio García Prieto Hirlemañ and Gloria Giralte de García Prieto have lived for years, and continue living, with feelings of insecurity, anguish, and powerless due to the lack of an investigation of the events perpetrated against them. The failure to investigate the threats and harassment has affected the personal integrity of Ramón Mauricio García Prieto’s parents’.²⁰⁰ By way of reparation the Court ordered the State to conclude the pending investigations into the murder of Ramón ¹⁹⁶ IACHR Velásquez Rodríguez, judgment of 29 July 1988, §177.

¹⁹⁷ CIDH Minors in detention v. Honduras, 10 March 1999, §§153-155.

¹⁹⁸ IACHR García Prieto family et al. (El Salvador), Order of 26 September 2006 and Order of 27 January 2007.

¹⁹⁹ IACHR Case of García-Prieto et al. v. El Salvador, Judgment of 20 November 2007 (Preliminary Objection, Merits, Reparations, and Costs), §158.

²⁰⁰ Id., §159.

Mauricio García Prieto and the threats and harassment; as well as to publish the operative paragraphs of the judgment, and certain specific paragraphs, in the official gazette and in another important national newspaper, and to provide the victims with the psychiatric and psychological care required, free of charge.²⁰¹

3.8 ECtHR

Of the three regional systems the European is the last one in which provisional measures have been used in the context of death threats and harassment, and only quite hesitantly. There are various Member States of the Council of Europe in which problems have arisen involving intimidation and harassment of witnesses, human rights defenders, journalists and others.²⁰² An example of a case in which the petitioner specifically requested provisional measures against harassment is Aydin v. Turkey (1997). In this case the petitioner requested the ECtHR to take provisional measures against harassment and intimidation. In particular, State officials should stop contacting the petitioner and her family about the petition. The Court did not take provisional measures, but in its judgment on the merits it did find violations of Articles 3 and 25 (now Article 34) ECHR.²⁰³

In Osman v. UK (1998) the ECtHR referred to the positive obligation to protect the right to life (Article 2) and prevent and suppress offences against the person. In ‘certain well defined circumstances’ this would include an obligation to ‘take preventive operational measures to protect an individual whose life is at risk from the criminal acts of another individual’.²⁰⁴ The Court pointed out that ‘it must be established to its satisfaction that the authorities knew or ought to have known at the time of the existence of a real and immediate risk to the life of an identified individual or individuals from the criminal acts of a third party and that they failed to take measures within the scope of their powers which, judged reasonably, might have been expected to avoid that risk’. It classified Article 2 as ‘a right fundamental in the scheme of the Convention’. In light of the nature of this article it was sufficient for a petitioner ‘to show that the authority did not do all that could be reasonably expected of them to avoid a real and immediate risk to life of which they have or ought to have knowledge’. It also referred to Article 1 and the obligation to ‘secure the practical and effective protection’ of the rights in the Convention, including Article

²⁰¹ “The Court finds that it is necessary to order measures of reparation in order to reduce the mental suffering of José Mauricio García Prieto Hirlemann and Gloria Giralt de García Prieto. To this end, the Court orders the State to provide adequate treatment and medication needed by these individuals, through its public health services, free of charge, for as long as necessary, and given their prior consent and a medical evaluation. When providing the medical, psychological, or psychiatric treatment required, the particular needs and circumstances of each person should be considered, in order to provide the proper treatment”. IACHR Case of García-Prieto et al. v. El Salvador, Judgment of 20 November 2007 (Preliminary Objection, Merits, Reparations, and Costs), §201.

²⁰² The following States, for instance, have recognized the competence of the ECtHR: Armenia, Azerbaijan (including Nagorno-Karabakh), BiH, Croatia, Georgia, Moldova (incl. Transnistria), Romania, Russian Federation (incl. Chechnya and other North Caucasus regions), Serbia and Montenegro, Turkey and Ukraine. Belarus is a candidate for membership of the Council of Europe.

²⁰³ ECtHR (Grand Chamber) Aydin v. Turkey, Judgment of 25 September 1997. See also section 4 of this Chapter.

²⁰⁴ ECtHR Osman v. UK, 28 October 1998, §115.

²⁰⁵ The Bosnia Chamber has equally confirmed that Article 1 ECHR (to ‘secure’ the rights and freedoms in the Convention) also entails positive obligations to protect those rights.²⁰⁶

With regard to the right to life the ECtHR recalled that the first sentence of Article 2(1) enjoined the State ‘not only to refrain from the intentional and unlawful taking of life, but also to take appropriate steps to safeguard the lives of those within its jurisdiction’.²⁰⁷ This involved ‘a primary duty on the State to secure the right to life by putting in place effective criminal-law provisions to deter the commission of offences against the person, backed up by law-enforcement machinery for the prevention, suppression and punishment of breaches of such provisions. It also extends in appropriate circumstances to a positive obligation on the authorities to take preventive operational measures to protect an individual or individuals whose life is at risk from the criminal acts of another individual’.²⁰⁸

The ECtHR has also recognized the positive obligation of States under Article 3. The obligation of States under Article 1 ECHR ‘to secure to everyone within their jurisdiction the rights and freedoms defined in the Convention’, taken together with Article 3, requires States to ‘take measures designed to ensure that individuals within their jurisdiction are not subjected to torture or inhuman or degrading treatment, including such ill-treatment administered by private individuals’.²⁰⁹ ‘State responsibility may therefore be engaged where the framework of law fails to provide adequate protection’ or ‘where the authorities fail to take reasonable steps to avoid a risk of ill-treatment about which they knew or ought to have known’.²¹⁰

The Court reiterated that Article 3 ‘enshrines one of the most fundamental values of democratic society. It prohibits in absolute terms torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment’.²¹¹ The preventive measures required ‘should provide effective protection, in particular, of children and other vulnerable persons and include reasonable steps to prevent ill-treatment of which the authorities had or ought to have had knowledge’.²¹²

Its interpretation of the obligations under Article 8 on the right to family and private life is relevant as well. It has determined that the concept of private life covered the ‘physical and moral integrity of the person, including his or her sexual life’.²¹³ It has pointed out that ‘these obligations may involve the adoption of measures designed to secure respect for private life even in the sphere of the relations of individuals between themselves’.²¹⁴

“Sexual abuse is unquestionably an abhorrent type of wrongdoing, with debilitating effects on its victims. Children and other vulnerable individuals are entitled to State protection, in the form

²⁰⁵ Id., §116.

²⁰⁶ See e.g. Bosnia Chamber Matanović et al. v. Republika Srpska, 6 August 1997, §56.

²⁰⁷ See e.g. ECtHR Mahmut Kaya v. Turkey, 28 March 2000, §85 and L.C.B. v. UK, 9 June 1998, §36.

²⁰⁸ See e.g. ECtHR Mahmut Kaya v. Turkey, 28 March 2000, §85 and Osman v. UK, 28 October 1998, §115.

²⁰⁹ See e.g. ECtHR Mahmut Kaya v. Turkey, 28 March 2000, §115, A. v. UK, 23 September 1998, §22 and H.L.R. v. France, 29 April 1997, §40.

²¹⁰ See e.g. ECtHR Mahmut Kaya v. Turkey, 28 March 2000, §115, A. v. UK, 23 September 1998, §22 and Osman v. UK, 28 October 1998, §§115-116.

²¹¹ See e.g. ECtHR Z. et al. v. UK, 10 May 2001, §73, Osman v. UK, 28 October 1998, §116 and A. v. UK, 23 September 1998, §22.

²¹² See e.g. ECtHR Z. et al. v. UK, 10 May 2001, §73, Osman v. UK, 28 October 1998, §116 and A. v. UK, 23 September 1998, §22.

²¹³ ECtHR X and Y v. the Netherlands, 26 March 1985, §22.

²¹⁴ Id., §§22-23. See also Stubbings v. UK, 22 October 1996, §§61-62.

of effective deterrence, from such grave types of interference with essential aspects of their private lives”.²¹⁵

In Aydin v. Turkey (1996) counsel for the petitioner specifically requested the Commission to take provisional measures (under Rule 36) ‘directing the Government to stop all contact by state officials with the applicant and her family concerning her application’. The Commission transmitted the complaint of harassment of the petitioner and her family by the security forces to Turkey for urgent response. Turkey did not respond. Three weeks later the Commission decided not to take provisional measures. Nevertheless it drew the attention of the Government to ‘the serious consequences which might arise from intimidation and harassment of an applicant and members of his/her family in connection with an application before the Commission’. Further complaints relating to intimidation and harassment of family members were forwarded to the State, which was reminded of its lack of response to the earlier complaints. Only several weeks later the Government made submissions with regard to the allegations of interfering with the right of individual petition. On the merits the Commission found violations of Articles 3 and 25 (now Article 34), Articles that have particular relevance in the context of provisional measures.²¹⁶

In Mahmut Kaya v. Turkey (2000) the ECtHR was ‘satisfied that Hasan Kaya, as a doctor suspected of aiding and abetting the PKK, was at that time at particular risk of falling victim to an unlawful attack. Moreover, this risk could in the circumstances be regarded as real and immediate’. The ‘authorities must be regarded as being aware of this risk’.²¹⁷ Thus, the case law of the ECtHR has confirmed the positive obligations of States to protect persons against violence perpetrated by a private party. Both the Court and, in the past, the Commission have regularly dealt with positive obligations.²¹⁸ On the other hand, they have only recently used provisional measures for the first time in a context of death threats and harassment, while this was certainly not the first occasion on which (potential) petitioners, or witnesses (and their families), have received such threats.

When the Court is faced with situations such as these, involving ongoing threats, it is indeed appropriate for it to take provisional measures requesting the State to take specific protective measures.²¹⁹

4 CONCLUSION

Throughout the world threats to human rights defenders, and to persons involved in domestic or international judicial proceedings, are a recurring problem. The Inter-American Commission and ²¹⁵ ECtHR X and Y v. the Netherlands, 26 March 1985, §27. See also Stubbings v. UK, 22 October 1996, §64 and A. v. UK, 23 September 1998, §22.

²¹⁶ ECHR Aydin v. Turkey, 7 March 1996 (Article 31 Report). The Commission also found violations of Arts 6 and 13, see partly dissenting opinions Thune and Bratza (joined by Trechsel, Soyer, Schermers and Marxer).

²¹⁷ ECtHR Mahmut Kaya v. Turkey, 28 March 2000, §§89-91.

²¹⁸ See e.g. the aforementioned ECtHR Osman v. the UK, 28 October 1998, §116. See also Mastromatteo v. Italy, 24 October 2002, appl. no. 37703/97, §68; Z. et al. v. the UK, 10 May 2001, appl. no. 29392/95, §109 and E. et al. v. the UK, 26 November 2002, §88.

²¹⁹ See Barkhuysen/Van Emmerik/Rieter (2002), p. 87; Rieter (2003b) and the Report by CoE Parliamentary Assembly rapporteur Pourgourides, Doc. 11183, 9 February 2007, §52: “As the binding effect of the Court’s interim measures is now recognised, such measures can be used to counter-act unlawful pressure on applicants to the Court, their lawyers, or members of their families. The Court could require respondent states to take positive action to protect applicants, as the Inter-American Commission and Court have done”.

Court have extensively made use of provisional measures to protect such persons. Apart from protecting the lives and physical integrity of these human rights defenders, such provisional measures were also meant to ensure that the Court's final decision on the merits would not be prejudiced by one of the parties and to preserve the evidence needed in cases before the Court.

Now that the HRC has been functioning for more than three decades at least in one case it has used provisional measures also to halt death threats and harassment.²²⁰ It is feasible that it will indeed use them in more such cases. In other cases, about which it does not yet have sufficient information, even for purposes of provisional measures, it may continue its use of Rule 91 (current Rule 97) to enquire about the situation of a petitioner, both in order to be able to properly deal with the case and to alert the State about possible concerns by the HRC. This applies as well to situations of death threats on death row, in which (informal) intervention might be warranted.

Next to the HRC, CEDAW and CAT have also used provisional measures to protect persons against death threats and harassment. The African Commission has done so as well. Thus, these adjudicators appear to have reaffirmed the extensive practice of the Inter-American Commission and Court with regard to this issue. They may be expected to continue using provisional measures to protect persons against death threats while a case is pending before them. Like the new African Court, all these adjudicators may draw inspiration from the practice of the Inter-American Commission and Court and consolidate their own practices in this respect.

It is only the ECtHR that is lagging behind. Given its case law on the merits (its emphasis on positive obligations and the particular importance attached to the right of petition and the prohibition of cruel treatment) and in light of the death threats against human rights defenders, witnesses and others in various Member States of the Council of Europe, a robust decision by the European Court to use provisional measures in this context would be a logical and appropriate next step.

²²⁰ In 2003 Scheinin considered it more likely that the HRC would decide to request a State to halt an immediate forced eviction with racist motives (Articles 26, 23, 17 ICCPR) than to request it to take positive action to protect against a threat to life. Scheinin, Geneva, April 2003.

CHAPTER X

PROTECTING (INDIGENOUS) CULTURAL AND RELIGIOUS RIGHTS

1 INTRODUCTION

The HRC, the Inter-American Commission and Court and the Bosnia Chamber have used provisional measures to halt certain actions or (industrial) developments that could cause irreparable harm to the (indigenous) culture or religion of certain groups.

In this context the question arises what types of actions or developments would result in irreparable harm to the culture and religion of these groups. A related issue to be addressed in this respect is which rights have been invoked by petitioners or proprio motu by the adjudicators in order to help stop these developments. It is also important to note on behalf of which groups the adjudicators have used provisional measures.

This chapter first discusses the practice of the human rights adjudicators in urgently dealing with cases involving indigenous culture. Then it explores how this practice relates to their case law on the merits and whether a finding of a violation is likely in this respect. Among others it deals with the question what type of cultural and religious rights have been protected by provisional measures, on behalf of whom and why.¹ In conclusion it also asks whether the practice of the HRC, the Inter-American Commission and Court and the Bosnia Chamber with regard to the use of provisional measures in cases involving culture is confirmed by the approach taken in the UN Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples (2007).

2 THE PRACTICE OF THE ADJUDICATORS TO TAKE PROVISIONAL MEASURES TO PROTECT CULTURAL OR RELIGIOUS RIGHTS

2.1 Introduction

This chapter discusses the practice of the HRC, the Inter-American Commission and Court, the African Commission and the Bosnia Chamber with regard to provisional measures to protect cultural or religious rights.

2.2 HRC

In some cases the HRC has used provisional measures to protect cultural rights. While its practice in this regard is not yet extensive, these cases merit close examination because they clarify the concept of provisional measures. They relate to land rights of (members of) indigenous groups and the collective aspects of the right to culture.

The first time it used provisional measures was in Lubicon Lake Band v. Canada (1990).² The petitioner had claimed that the land of the Lubicon Lake Band, approximately 10,000 square kilometres, had been expropriated for commercial purposes (oil and gas exploration) and destroyed. He claimed that ‘the rapid destruction of the Band’s economic base and original way of life had already caused irreparable injury’.³ The State party, on the other hand, maintained that ‘continued resource development would not cause irreparable injury to the traditional way of life of the Band’.⁴ Three years and five months after the initial submission, the HRC declared the case admissible in so far as it might raise issues under Article 27 ICCPR (minority rights, cultural rights) or under other articles. At the same time it requested Canada to take provisional measures to avoid irreparable damage to Chief Ominayak and other members of the Lubicon Lake Band.⁵ In its summary of the submissions the HRC explained that it used provisional measures ‘(i)n view of the seriousness of the author’s allegations that the Lubicon Lake Band was on the verge of extinction’.⁶

¹ See also Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4 (Beneficiaries).

² HRC Bernard Ominayak, Chief of the Lubicon Lake Band v. Canada, 26 March 1990.

Subsequently it simply renewed its original call for provisional measures, without commenting on the non-compliance.⁷ On the merits it found violations and recommended an unclear remedy.⁸ Even if it had eventually recommended a remedy seeking a permanent or interim injunction, such recommendation would to some extent have been too late because it was tardy in using provisional measures in the first place and because the State did not appear to respect them once they had been taken. Pending the case the HRC could have monitored compliance more actively.

The HRC did deal with the case as part of its mechanism for follow-up on Views. It requested Canada to provide ‘any relevant information on measures taken to implement the remedy offered by the State party’.⁹ A member of federal parliament submitted a letter to the Special Rapporteur for Follow-up on Views, emphasising that the violations of Article 27 ICCPR were indeed continuing. He also noted that the Committee’s View was ‘frequently misrepresented by Canadian government officials’. He requested the Rapporteur to urge the State to ‘abandon its “take-it-or-leave-it” offer made to the Lubicon on January 24, 1989 – an offer which demonstrably has not proved to be a remedy – and instead begin negotiations on adequate economic development provisions and compensation’.¹⁰

In its Concluding Observations under the reporting procedure (Article 40 ICCPR) of April 2006 the HRC expressed concern ‘that land claim negotiations between the Government of Canada and the Lubicon Lake Band are currently at an impasse’. It was also ‘concerned about infor-

³ Id., §29.1.

⁴ Id., §29.2.

⁵ Earlier, it had only requested information under Rule 91 (on 16 October 1984 according to the text, on 9 November 1984 according to the cover page) and additional information by interim decision of 10 April 1986. See also Chapter II on timeliness.

⁶ HRC Lubicon Lake Band v. Canada, 26 March 1990, §29.3.

⁷ Id., §25.

⁸ See further Chapter XIII (Protection).

⁹ Canada responded almost a year later by stating: “As the Committee is aware, that remedy consisted of a comprehensive package of benefits and programs valued at $45 million (non-inclusive of the value of land, mineral rights, or possible provincial contributions) and a 95 square mile reserve”. It pointed out that meetings with the Band were terminated because of its demand ‘for additional compensation of at least $170 million’. It noted that ‘the Government’s offer has remained and continues to remain open for acceptance’. It also announced a negotiated settlement with the Woodland Cree Band similar to the 1989 offer to the Lubicon Lake Band and pointed out that both Bands ‘have the same rights under Treaty 8 and are of similar size’. According to Canada the Woodland Cree Band now included about 185 former members of the Lubicon Lake Band. Response of the permanent mission of Canada of 25 November 1991 to the follow-up request of 12 February 1991 (on file with the author).

¹⁰ Letter by Ross Harvey (MP, Canada) to the Special Rapporteur for Follow-up on Views, 28 November 1991 (on file with the author and also available at: <nativenet.uthscsa.edu/archive/nl/91d/0189.html>, consulted 13 March 2003).

mation that the land of the band continues to be compromised by logging and large-scale oil and gas extraction, and regrets that the State party has not provided information on this specific issue (arts. 1 and 27)'. It recommended that State 'to make every effort to resume negotiations' in order to find 'a solution which respects the rights of the Band under the Covenant, as already found by the Committee'. "It should consult with the band before granting licences for economic exploitation of the disputed land, and ensure that in no case such exploitation jeopardizes the rights recognized under the Covenant".¹¹ In 2006 the UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights specifically addressed the case of the Lubicon Lake Band in its Concluding Observations on Canada's compliance with the Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. It recommended 'strongly' that Canada 'resume negotiations with the Lubicon Lake Band, with a view to finding a solution to the claims of the Band that ensures the enjoyment of their rights under the Covenant'. "The Committee also strongly recommends the State party to conduct effective consultation with the Band prior to the grant of licences for economic purposes in the disputed land, and to ensure that such activities do not jeopardize the rights recognized under the Covenant".¹²

Apart from the provisional measures in the Lubicon case, the other provisional measures to protect culture involved the Sami in Finland.¹³ It was in Sara et al. v. Finland (inadm. 1994) that the HRC used provisional measures for the second time in order to protect culture.¹⁴ The State denied that there was a causal link between the measures of protection requested by the petitioners and the object of the communication itself.¹⁵ Apparently it argued that this was the reason why provisional measures should not be taken. Quite apart from the question whether it is appropriate in human rights adjudication to be strict about the relationship between the rights claimed and the request for provisional measures, it is clear that in this case the material object of the petitioners' complaint was the threat to their traditional economic and cultural rights caused by logging and road construction activities in certain reindeer husbandry areas. The HRC found that the material object of the complaint was related to the request for provisional measures.¹⁶

In this case the petitioners feared, at the time of initial submission in 1990, that large-scale logging activities were imminent in the areas used by them for reindeer breeding. They noted that two road construction projects into the petitioners' herding areas had been started without prior consultation.¹⁷ When the HRC initially declared the case admissible in 1991, it indeed used provisional measures.¹⁸ In 1994, however, it set aside this decision, including the provisional measures, ¹¹ HRC Concluding Observations (Canada), CCPR/C/CAN/CO/5, 20 April 2006, §9.

¹² CESCR Concluding Observations (Canada), E/C.12/CAN/CO/4; E/C.12/CAN/CO/5, 22 May 2006, §38.

¹³ See Donders (2002), pp. 301-326 about the Sami as an indigenous people and their cultural identity and rights, with a focus on the Sami in Norway, Sweden and Finland.

¹⁴ HRC Sara et al. v. Finland, 23 March 1994 (inadm.).

¹⁵ The State argued that the Board's authority to approve logging activities in areas other than those designated as protected wilderness, such as the residual area outside the Hammastunturi Wilderness, was not derived from the Wilderness Act. "Accordingly, the State party denies that there is a causal link between the measures of protection requested by the authors and the object of the communication itself, which only concerns enactment and implementation of the Wilderness Act". However, the HRC noted that the continuation of road construction in the residual area could indeed be causally linked to the entry into force of the Wilderness Act.

¹⁶ For purposes of admissibility the petitioners had sufficiently substantiated that this could raise issues under Article 27.

¹⁷ See also Chapter XIII (Protection) on consultation and representation.

¹⁸ The cover page does not mention provisional measures, but it appears from the text that the petitioners requested them. On 9 July 1991 when it declared the case admissible the Committee requested Finland to 'adopt such measures as appropriate to prevent irreparable damage to the authors'.

and declared the case inadmissible for non-exhaustion of domestic remedies. Subsequently, by the time the petitioners could submit a new complaint to the HRC, the logging they had aimed to prevent with their first submission had already taken place. In the follow-up case, moreover, the HRC felt it was unable to draw conclusions on the basis of the evidence before it.¹⁹

In Jouni Länsman v. Finland (Länsman II), 1996) the HRC used provisional measures for the third time in a case involving indigenous culture.²⁰ However, it later decided to set aside this decision. The four petitioners were all members of the Muotkatunturi Herdsmen's Committee. The HRC had denied a request for provisional measures in an earlier case (Länsman I) as being premature.²¹ The petitioners pointed out that about 40 percent of the total number of reindeer owned by the Herdsmen's Committee grazed on the disputed lands during winter. The old untouched forests in the area are covered with lichen, which is very important 'due to its suitability as food for young calves and its utility as emergency food for elder reindeer during extreme weather conditions'.²² The petitioners relied on the Committee's previous reference to minor infringements on the one hand and a denial of the right to culture on the other.²³ They relied upon the incremental approach to violations of Article 27 ICCPR that the HRC had acknowledged already in Lubicon. According to this approach a series of infringements would at some point in time result in a denial of Article 27 ICCPR. They argued that the impending infringement in this case would in fact trigger this denial. In order to prevent this, they requested provisional measures.

The HRC requested the State 'to refrain from adopting measures which would cause irreparable harm to the environment which the authors claim is vital to their culture and livelihood'.²⁴ This indicates a new phrasing of its provisional measures compared to earlier occasions. In Lubicon the HRC requested Canada to avoid irreparable damage to Chief Ominayak and other members of the Lubicon Lake Band. It did explain that it used provisional measures because of the seriousness of the allegations in that the Band was on the verge of extinction, but it did not yet ¹⁹ See HRC Anni Äärelä and Jouni Näkkäläjärvi v. Finland, 24 October 2001. In this case the HRC did find violations of Art. 14 (fair trial) and considered that the State party was 'under an obligation to restate to the petitioners that proportion of the costs award already recovered and to refrain from seeking execution of any further portion of the award'. It also considered that since the decision of the Court of Appeal was tainted by a substantive violation of fair trial provisions (equality of arms), the State was under an obligation to reconsider the petitioners' claims. See also Jarle Jonassen and members of the Riast/Hylling reindeer herding district v. Norway, 25 October 2002 (inadm.).

²⁰ HRC Jouni E. Länsman et al. v. Finland (Länsman II), 30 October 1996.

²¹ See section 3 discussing Ilmari Länsman v. Finland (Länsman I), 26 October 1994.

²² HRC Länsman II, 30 October 1996, §2.4. They also pointed out that Sami reindeer Herdsmen in Finland had difficulties competing with their Swedish counterparts because Sweden subsidised the production of reindeer meat. Apart from that, traditional Sami reindeer Herdsmen in the north of Finland using nature based Sami methods, had difficulties competing with reindeer meat producers in the south who use fencing and feeding with hay.

²³ See the discussion in Ilmari Länsman v. Finland (Länsman I), 26 October 1994, §§9.4-9.8. In its subsequent case law the HRC indeed confirmed its approach that not every interference can be regarded as a denial. In Länsman II, 30 October 1996, the formulation was that the logging had to be of such proportions as to deny the petitioners' rights to enjoy their culture 'in that area'. In Äärelä and Näkkäläjärvi v. Finland, 24 October 2001 it used the term 'threshold' and referred to its practice to enquire whether the interference in the reindeer husbandry was so substantial that it failed to properly protect the right of the petitioners to enjoy their culture. In Apirana Mahuika v. New Zealand, 27 October 2000 and Länsman I the HRC pointed out specifically that measures with a certain limited impact on the way of life of persons belonging to a minority would not necessarily amount to a denial of the right under Article 27 ICCPR.

²⁴ HRC Länsman II, 30 October 1996, §4.1.

take the two step approach ‘risk to environment-risk to culture’ taken in Länsman II. In Sara et al. v. Finland (1994) it requested the State to adopt the appropriate measures to prevent irreparable harm to the petitioners.²⁵ This could be seen as a more traditional approach, as the phrasing did not show an awareness of the collective aspects of the case.²⁶ In Länsman II, however, the HRC not only showed an awareness of the collective aspects of its provisional measure but it noted specifically that the State should refrain from adopting measures that would cause irreparable harm to the environment. Only following this it referred to the petitioners rather than the environment, by noting that they claimed that this environment was vital to their culture and livelihood. This new two step phrasing shows an awareness of the special relation between indigenous peoples and their lands.

Another new approach taken in Länsman II relates to the Special Rapporteur’s request to the State party to inform him ‘if it contended that the request for interim protection was not appropriate in the circumstances of the case’ and, if so, to give reasons for this contention. He would then ‘reconsider the appropriateness of maintaining the request under rule 86’.²⁷

In response the State argued that provisional measures ‘should be issued restrictively, and only in serious cases of human rights violations where the possibility of irreparable damage is real, e.g. when the life or physical integrity of the victim is at stake’. It did not consider that this case revealed circumstances pointing to the possibility of such irreparable damage.²⁸ It noted that the present logging area was only a small portion of the relevant State owned forests and that it had negotiated with the Muotkatunturi Reindeer Husbandry Herdsmen’s Association to which the petitioners also belonged.²⁹ The State noted as well that Rule 86 (current Rule 92) only referred to avoiding irreparable damage to the victim of the alleged violation and stated: “Clearly enough, it does not cover measures having ‘otherwise long-lasting damage’ referred to by the authors in their communication”.³⁰

²⁵ HRC Sara et al. v. Finland, 23 March 1994 (inadm.).

²⁶ Id. Of course this does not mean that the Rapporteur was not aware of these aspects. See also the reference to this case in Kamminga (1996), p. 171 and p. 183.

²⁷ HRC Länsman II, 30 October 1996, §4.1. It transpires from the Note Verbale to the State that he requested it to inform him of its reasons to contest the appropriateness ‘as soon as circumstances permit’. Note verbale to the State party of 15 November 1995 (on file with the author). In the letter of the same date to counsel the HRC simply noted: ‘under rule 86, the State party has been requested to provide information on the alleged irreparable harm caused by logging to the author as early as possible’. Letter to the petitioner of 15 November 1995 (on file with the author).

²⁸ In its submission dated 20 December 1995 but submitted on 15 December (on file with the author) it was phrased as follows: “The Government therefore regards the Committee’s request as inappropriate in the current circumstances, and is of the opinion that the Committee should set aside its request for interim measures”.

²⁹ See also section 3 of this chapter (the heading on consultation) and Chapter XIII (Protection), section 4.4 on representation.

³⁰ Submission by the Permanent Mission of Finland in Geneva dated 20 December 1995, but submitted on 15 December (on file with the author).

Subsequently the HRC revoked its provisional measures.³¹ While it did not explain this decision, one may assume that it agreed with the State party's interpretation of irreparable harm.³² Indeed in the text of its admissibility decision of March 1996 (unpublished) the HRC noted that it had set aside its provisional measure 'in the light of the State party's observations of 15 December 1995 and its pledge to reduce current logging activities in the area specified in the communication'.³³ In their subsequent submission the petitioners welcomed the Committee's decision to declare the case admissible. They did not refer to its decision to set aside its provisional measure, possibly for strategic reasons.³⁴

In 1996 the HRC found that the completed logging of around 250 hectares and the proposed logging of a further 250 hectares in the Angeli area did not constitute a violation of Article 27 ICCPR. On the basis of the information then before it the HRC concluded that the approved logging would not be on a scale threatening 'the survival of reindeer husbandry'. It did point out that if faced with evidence that the effects of the logging 'were more serious than foreseen at present' or new logging plans were to be approved on a larger scale, this could trigger a violation of Article 27. After all, 'though different activities in themselves may not constitute a violation of this article, such activities, taken together, may erode the rights of Sami people to enjoy their own culture'.³⁵

Despite the fact that it found no violation in this case, the provisional measures taken pending the proceedings made sense as they aimed at preventing irreparable harm to the cultural survival of an indigenous group. As a practical matter they may have served a purpose in triggering the State's efforts to seriously consider the arguments made by the petitioners. They may also have contributed to the State's decision at least to decrease the amount of logging with 25 percent until the final view.³⁶

In November 2000 Jouni and Eino Länsman submitted a new petition. Two years later the chairperson of the HRC used provisional measures requesting the State to 'refrain from conducting logging activities that would affect the exercise by Mr. Jouni Länsman and others of reindeer husbandry in the Angeli area, while their case is under consideration by the Committee'.³⁷ In April 2003 it declared the case admissible,³⁸ but another two years later it found that the logging

³¹ Among others, the petitioners noted that 'for the authors of the communication the harm is in any case irreparable, since the lands in question cannot be used as winter herding lands in their lifetime'. They then pointed out that the local Sami had already experienced the first adverse effect of the logging namely that 'the reindeer cannot just be released to the winter herding lands from the round-up place just north of the logging area but must be brought to specific places'. 'This causes a lot of extra work. Within the next months it will be seen whether the reindeer will find enough to eat in the remaining winter herding lands'. The HRC considered that the logging activities approved for the future would be such that 'while resulting in additional work and extra expenses for the authors and other reindeer herdsman' it 'does not appear to threaten the survival of reindeer husbandry', Länsman II, §10.6.

³² See also Chapter XV on assessment of risk.

³³ HRC Jouni E. Länsman et al. v. Finland, 14 March 1996 (unpublished admissibility decision, on file with the author).

³⁴ The petitioners' submission of 20 May 1996 (on file with the author).

³⁵ HRC Jouni E. Länsman et al. v. Finland (Länsman II), 30 October 1996, §10.7.

³⁶ See further Chapter XVII on the official responses of addressee States.

³⁷ HRC Jouni Länsman, Eino Länsman and the Muotkatunturi Herdsmen's Committee v. Finland, 17 March 2005 (Länsman III), §1.2. In this case it was the Chairperson rather than the Special Rapporteur that took the decision on behalf of the Committee. Special Rapporteur Scheinin had been involved in bringing the previous Sami cases before the HRC. Moreover, the HRC adheres to the rule that Committee members do not take part in decisions involving their own State.

³⁸ The HRC noted that legal persons such as the Herdsmen's Committee had no standing and this part of the petition was inadmissible under Article 1 OP.

carried out had ‘not been shown to be serious enough as to amount to a denial’ of the petitioners’ right to enjoy their own culture in community with other members of their group under Article 27 ICCPR.³⁹ Relevant with regard to the provisional measure may be the Committee’s statement, in its decision on the merits, that it was not necessary to consider the negative effect of the proposed logging in the area as the State had committed ‘not to proceed to logging’ in the Kippalrova area.⁴⁰

2.3 Inter-American Commission

Members of indigenous groups are often threatened and attacked. In such cases the Inter-American Commission has taken precautionary measures to protect their lives and physical integrity.⁴¹ Apart from this, similar to the HRC it has also taken some precautionary measures exactly to prevent irreparable harm to indigenous culture. The Commission’s precautionary measures in cultural cases equally have a collective component. The beneficiaries include not only each and every individual member of the indigenous group involved, but also the group as such.

In 1993 the Commission took precautionary measures for the first time in the case of Mary and Carrie Dann v. US. The US did not respond to this request. The petitioners were two members of the Indian Law Resource Center. They claimed that the sisters Dann, who were members and spokespersons for the Dann Band of the Western Shoshone Nation, had asserted Western Shoshone aboriginal title and treaty right for their lands in Nevada and that their ancestors had used and occupied these lands ‘since time immemorial’.⁴² The petitioners also claimed that the sisters’ family ranch was their sole means of support and that their needs were met by the sale of their livestock, goods and produce. They argued that the US had violated the rights of the sisters by confiscating the land ‘through the use of a grossly unfair procedure that “extinguished” the Indian title to the land for a few cents per acre’.⁴³ In August 1993 the petitioners had informed the Inter-American Commission that the US Bureau of Land Management intended to confiscate all livestock found on the lands where generations of Danns have grazed their livestock. They requested the Commission to take precautionary measures, as they feared that the US would sell the livestock of the Danns and of the Western Shoshone National Council that were grazing on these lands. In response the Commission requested the US to ‘stay its intention to impound all livestock

³⁹ HRC Jouni Länsman, Eino Länsman and the Muotkatunturi Herdsmen’s Committee v. Finland, 17 March 2005, §10.

⁴⁰ HRC Jouni Länsman, Eino Länsman and the Muotkatunturi Herdsmen’s Committee v. Finland, 17 March 2005, §9.3. Subsequent to the use of provisional measures, in October 2001, Finland informed the HRC that it refrained from conducting logging activities in the Angeli area’ (the area as defined in the Committee’s previous View) ‘that would affect the exercise by the individual authors’ reindeer husbandry while their communication is under consideration by the Committee’.

⁴¹ See generally Chapter IX (Death threats).

⁴² CIDH Mary and Carrie Dann v. United States, 27 December 2002, §38.

⁴³ CIDH Mary and Carrie Dann v. United States, 27 September 1999 (adm.), §7. In the domestic proceedings it was determined that they had lost their lands through ‘gradual encroachment’. Before the CIDH the Danns pointed out that they had never left their lands and that there were no white settlers on it. In one newspaper article Carrie Dann is quoted questioning whether ‘gradual encroachment’ is a valid component of American law: “I certainly don’t want people saying ‘I gradually encroached on you, and took your rights away’. Either I am a human being or I am not a human being”: J. Mullins, ‘Oh really? Groups endorse plan to end public lands grazing’, Elko Daily Free Press, 1 March 2002, posted in a collection of media accounts on the Dann sisters at <www.angelfire.com/nv2/wells/danns.html> (consulted 15 December 2006).

belonging to the Danns until this case has been resolved'.⁴⁴ The Commission had to reiterate its precautionary measures several times. In June 1999, for instance, the Commission requested the US to take appropriate measures in this case 'to stay the efforts of the Bureau of Land Management to impound their livestock, until the Commission had the opportunity to fully investigate the claims raised in the petition'.⁴⁵ Almost ten years after its first precautionary measures in this case, in 2002, it found that the State had 'failed to ensure the Danns' right to property under conditions of equality contrary to Articles II, XVIII and XXIII of the American Declaration in connection with their claims to property rights in the Western Shoshone ancestral lands'.⁴⁶

More recently the Inter-American Commission has also dealt with urgent indigenous cases involving States such as Belize, Paraguay and Nicaragua. The famous judgment of the Inter-American Court in the Awes Tingni case against Nicaragua started at the Commission level with a precautionary measure 'for the purpose of suspending the concession given by the government to the SOLCARSA Company to carry out forestry work on the lands of the Awes Tingni Indigenous Community'.⁴⁷

With regard to Belize it granted precautionary measures on behalf of the Maya Indigenous Communities and their members in October 2000.⁴⁸ It requested Belize to 'take the necessary steps to suspend all permits, licences, and concessions allowing for the drilling of oil and any other tapping of natural resources on lands used and occupied by the Maya Communities in the District of Toledo, in order to investigate the allegations in this case'.⁴⁹ In its report on the merits the Commission specified that it requested these measures 'until the Commission had the opportunity to investigate the substantive claims raised in the case'.⁵⁰

Another famous case that later went to the Inter-American Court (which did not use provisional measures) is that of the Yakye Axa. In August 2001 a criminal court judge had ordered the removal of the homes of members of the Enxet speaking Yakye Axa Indigenous Community in Paraguay. Under dire circumstances this community had been occupying a strip of land along a highway opposite the lands they claimed as part of their traditional habitat. In September 2001 the Commission took precautionary measures on their behalf in order to halt this removal.⁵¹

This case shows that the Commission can be elaborate in its precautionary measures. It specifies the relevant rights (e.g. property, freedom of movement, physical, mental and moral integrity), as well as the positive obligations of the State.⁵² It noted that the beneficiaries were in ⁴⁴ CIDH Mary and Carrie Dann v. United States, 27 September 1999 (adm.), §14.

⁴⁵ CIDH Mary and Carrie Dann v. United States, 27 September 1999 (adm.), §44 and Annual Report 1999, Chapter III, C.1. §67.

⁴⁶ CIDH Mary and Carrie Dann v. United States, 27 December 2002, §5.

⁴⁷ CIDH Awes Tingni v. Nicaragua, case 11.577, Annual Report 1997, Chapter III. Further on this case see infra in this chapter.

⁴⁸ CIDH Maya Indigenous Communities v. Belize, case 12.053. Annual Report 2000, §11 refers to precautionary measures of 5 October 2000. See also Maya Indigenous Communities v. Belize, 12 October 2004, §8 (noting that it adopted the admissibility report and its decision to take precautionary measures on the same date). The admissibility report refers in §43 to precautionary measures of 28 October 1999 (not mentioned in the Annual Report 1999). The petition involved Mopan and Ke'kchi Maya people of the Toledo District of Southern Belize, represented by the Toledo Maya Council.

⁴⁹ CIDH Annual Report 2000, §11. Belize did not respond.

⁵⁰ CIDH Maya Indigenous Communities v. Belize, report 40/04, 12 October 2004, §8.

⁵¹ CIDH Yakye Axa Indigenous Community v. Paraguay, Annual Report 2001, Chapter III (a), C. 1, §49.

⁵² More generally on positive and negative obligations and the specificity of provisional measures see Chapter XIII (Protection).

‘an extremely needy situation, because of their inadequate access to food supplies and health care’. Paraguay was to take the following measures:

- “(1) To suspend the enforcement of any court or administrative order involving the eviction and/or removal of the homes of the Yakye Axa indigenous community and of its members.
- (2) To refrain from all other actions and undertakings affecting the right to property, free transit, and residence of the Yakye Axa indigenous community and its members.
- (3) To take all steps necessary to ensure the life and physical, mental, and moral integrity of the members of the Yakye Axa indigenous community”.⁵³

The Commission did not specifically refer to prevention of irreparable harm to culture, but this purpose seemed an underlying rationale for its precautionary measures in this case. The indigenous community itself was the beneficiary of the measures, together with its individual members. In that respect the Commission did interpret the right to property, free transit and residence in light of a (collective) right to cultural identity.

Another aspect that played a role here was the utterly inadequate access to food supplies, safe water and health care.⁵⁴ Thus the Commission also requested the State to take all necessary steps to ensure the lives and personal integrity of the members of this community. While the reference to life and personal integrity is customary in its precautionary measures, in this case the Commission equally stressed the importance of ensuring the mental and moral integrity of the members of the indigenous community. The wider reference here suggests that the Commission is sensitive to the (individual) right to cultural identity. A failure to respect this right would result in a failure to ensure the mental and moral integrity of persons.

In other words, on the basis of the Commission’s precautionary measures the State cannot allow the forcible removal of the members of this community to a place where, while they would have access to food supplies and health care, this would in fact mean a removal from their traditional habitat.

In a case involving the Bio-Bio River of the Pehuenches against Chile (friendly settlement 2004)⁵⁵ the petitioners had requested precautionary measures in order to prevent a company from flooding the lands occupied by the alleged victims, as part of the construction of the dam for the Ralco Hydroelectric Plant Project.⁵⁶ The Commission initially, in December 2002, requested Chile, ‘bearing in mind the nature of the matter... [to] refrain from taking any steps that might alter the status quo in the matter, until the organs of the inter-American system of human rights have adopted a final decision’.⁵⁷ For the purposes of this book this request may be qualified as an informal provisional measure. By 2002 the Commission generally was more specific in its use of (formal) precautionary measures and it was not surprising that Chile immediately asked for clarification about the content of this request. It asked the Commission to ‘explain precisely the con-

⁵³ CIDH Yakye Axa Indigenous Community v. Paraguay, Annual Report 2001, Chapter III (a), C. 1, §49.

⁵⁴ In Press Release 23/99 the CIDH noted that during its 1999 on-site visit it spoke with the Yakye Axa and the Sawhoyamaya and ‘was able to see the deplorable situation of these peoples, who live alongside the national highway, without services of any kind, waiting for the authorities to allocate them the land they need’. It added that it appreciated the importance of a Presidential Decree dating from earlier that year that declared the two indigenous communities to be in a ‘state of emergency’ given the ‘extreme conditions’ they were facing. The Decree had ordered the ‘immediate provision of medical and nutritional assistance, but apparently the measures required had not yet been adopted.

⁵⁵ CIDH Mercedes Julia Huenteao Beroiza et al., 11 March 2004 (friendly settlement). See also <<http://www.ciel.org/Hre/hrecomponent2.html>>.

⁵⁶ CIDH Mercedes Julia Huenteao Beroiza et al., 11 March 2004 (friendly settlement), §2.

⁵⁷ Id., §5.

tent and scope of the request made to the State'.⁵⁸ The Commission responded that 'the purpose of the request made to the State of Chile is to ensure that the decisions of the organs of the inter-American system of human rights are not rendered meaningless efforts to protect the human person. Accordingly, the State should refrain from any act that might broaden or exacerbate the dispute and impair the effectiveness of any decision that the Commission might potentially adopt'.⁵⁹ Several months later the petitioners renewed their request for precautionary measures 'based on the alleged disregard of the request made by the IACHR to the State to maintain the status quo'.⁶⁰ The next day the Commission 'granted the requested precautionary measures' (this time formally) and requested the State to '(r)efrain from taking any steps that might alter the status quo in the matter, until the organs of the inter-American system of human rights have adopted a final decision on the case, in particular, avoiding or suspending any judicial or administrative action that entails eviction of the petitioners from their ancestral lands'.⁶¹

Another example involves the Pueblo Indígena de Sarayaku. They were granted legal title to their territory in 1992, but Ecuador reserved the right to the subsoil resources. Supported by the Ecuadorian Center for Economic and Social Rights (CDES) the Sarayaku petitioned the Commission fearing negative environmental impact such as pollution, deforestation and threats to the biodiversity of the area. They did not wish companies to access their lands for oil extraction.⁶² In May 2003 the Commission decided to take precautionary measures.⁶³ Later it decided to request the Court to order provisional measures. The Court indeed did so in order to guarantee not just their physical integrity but also their special relation with their territory.⁶⁴

In the Kankuamo case the Commission had equally requested the Court to order provisional measures not just to protect the life and personal integrity of all members of the Kankuamo community, but also the cultural identity of the Community as a whole and its special relation to its ancestral grounds.⁶⁵ In fact the Court only heeded to part of the Commission's request, although it did add that the protective measures should respect the freedom of movement of the Community members. It observed that all members of this indigenous people were equally at risk of attacks against their personal integrity and life, exactly for belonging to the Kankuamo. Moreover, and this is relevant in the context of their attachment to the lands, they were all at risk of being forcibly displaced. Thus it was necessary for the State to ensure that the beneficiaries of the provisional measures would be able to continue living at their customary place of residence and that the necessary conditions were created so that those members that had already suffered forced displacement would be able to return.⁶⁶ The State should also protect them against attacks by third parties.⁶⁷

Many of the cases dealt with in the Inter-American system involved threats and harassment of indigenous peoples.⁶⁸ The provisional measures protecting against death threats often include ⁵⁸ On the specificity of provisional measures generally see Chapter XIII (Protection).

⁵⁹ CIDH Mercedes Julia Huenteao Beroiza et al., 11 March 2004 (friendly settlement), §6.

⁶⁰ Id., §15.

⁶¹ Id., §15.

⁶² They also feared that the building of roads for the purpose of oil extraction would lead to increased access by other companies and individuals.

⁶³ Precautionary measures of 5 May 2003, referred to in IACHR Caso Pueblo Indígena de Sarayaku, Order of 17 June 2005, 'Having seen' clause 2h.

⁶⁴ IACHR Caso Pueblo Indígena de Sarayaku (Ecuador), Orders of 6 July 2004 and 17 June 2005.

⁶⁵ IACHR Caso Pueblo Indígena Kankuamo (Colombia), Order of 5 July 2004, 2nd 'Having seen' ('Vistos') clause.

⁶⁶ Id., 9th and 10th 'Considering' clauses.

⁶⁷ Id., 11th 'Considering' clause.

⁶⁸ See Chapter IX (Threats).

instructions to protect against internal displacement.⁶⁹ The adverse effect of uprooting people has a particularly pervasive impact on indigenous peoples, because of their particular cultural and spiritual ties to their ancestral lands. Moreover, in many cases the forced eviction is closely related to third party interest in the economic exploitation of indigenous lands. In this light the Court could have added, as suggested by the Commission, a reference to the special relation to the ancestral grounds.

2.4 Inter-American Court

In its abovementioned Order of protection against death threats and internal displacement in the Kankuamo case the Court did not explicitly refer to the special relation of indigenous peoples to their lands,⁷⁰ but in September 2002 the Inter-American Court ordered provisional measures specifically with the aim to protect indigenous culture. It did so in the context of the Awes Tingni case.

Its Order is remarkable for at least three reasons. It was the first time the Court ordered such provisional measures in order to protect indigenous culture as such. Secondly, the timing of the provisional measures is noteworthy: they were ordered after the Court had published its Judgment on the merits and reparations. The Court has observed that, under Article 63(2) ACHR, it may adopt provisional measures ‘in matters it has under consideration’.⁷¹ “Said measures can also be applied during the stage in which compliance with the judgment is overseen’.⁷² It added that ‘in the instant case it is probable that irreparable damage will occur’. This would ‘preclude faithful and full compliance with the judgment on the merits and reparations’.⁷³ The third aspect making the Court’s order remarkable is that it was not the Commission but the representatives of the Mayagna (Sumo) Awes Tingni that had appealed to the Court.⁷⁴

The Inter-American Court considered that the victims had demonstrated ‘the existence of a situation of extreme gravity and urgency regarding the property of the Mayagna Community, ⁶⁹ See generally Chapter XIII (Protection).

⁷⁰ IACHR Caso Pueblo Indígena Kankuamo v. Colombia, Order of 5 July 2004. See also its Order of 30 January 2007.

⁷¹ See e.g. IACHR Order for provisional measures (requested by the representatives of the victims), Mayagna (Sumo) Awes Tingni Community v. Nicaragua, 6 September 2002, 2nd ‘Considering’ clause.

⁷² IACHR Order for provisional measures (requested by the representatives of the victims), Mayagna (Sumo) Awes Tingni Community v. Nicaragua, 6 September 2002, 9th ‘Considering’ clause, referring to an earlier occasion on which it had used provisional measures subsequent to its Judgment namely in Loayza Tamayo, Order of the president of 13 December 2000 and of the Court of 3 February 2001.

⁷³ Ibid.

⁷⁴ As of June 2001, when the Court’s new Rules of Procedure became applicable, the victim (or the petitioner) is able to present arguments and claims independently, once the Commission (or the State) has brought a case before the Court: Article 23 (Participation of the Alleged Victims) Rules of Procedure December 2000, with amendments that entered into force January 2003: “1. When the application has been admitted, the alleged victims, their next of kin or their duly accredited representatives may submit their pleadings, motions and evidence, autonomously, throughout the proceedings. 2. When there are several alleged victims, next of kin or duly accredited representatives, they shall designate a common intervenor who shall be the only person authorized to present pleadings, motions and evidence during the proceedings, including the public hearings. 3. In case of disagreement, the Court shall make the appropriate ruling”.

including the resources therein, which are the basis for their subsistence, culture, and traditions'.⁷⁵ In other words, threats against the property and resources of indigenous peoples may in certain cases warrant the use of provisional measures because of they are essential to the 'subsistence, culture, and traditions' of these peoples.

The Inter-American Court publishes and motivates its provisional measures, often referring to previous case law. Here it could simply draw on its findings on the merits and reparation in the case itself. After all it ordered these measures subsequent to delivering its Judgment. It noted its observation in this judgment that 'a communitarian tradition regarding a communal form of collective property of the land'. It quoted: 'Indigenous groups, by the fact of their very existence, have the right to live freely in their own territory; the close ties of indigenous people with the land must be recognized and understood as the fundamental basis of their cultures, their spiritual life, their integrity and their economic survival'.⁷⁶

Not only did it invoke its Judgment on behalf of the Awas Tingni, but it also referred more generally to a finding on the right to life in another case. This indicates that the Court found it necessary to explain its expansion of the use of provisional measures from cases involving the individual right to life and personal integrity to cases involving cultural survival. It quoted from its Judgment in the Street Children case (1999): 'In essence the fundamental right to life includes, not only the right of every human being not to be deprived of his life arbitrarily, but also the right that he will not be prevented from having access to the conditions that guarantee a dignified existence'.⁷⁷

The Court observed that Nicaragua had reached an agreement with the community to provisionally recognize its land rights, but had failed to implement it. Thus it was 'necessary to protect the geographical area where the members of the (...) Community live and conduct their activities'.⁷⁸ It decided to order the State to adopt 'without delay, whatever measures are necessary to protect the use and enjoyment of property of lands belonging to the Mayagna Awas Tingni Community, and of natural resources existing on those lands, specifically those measures geared toward avoiding immediate and irreparable damage resulting from activities of third parties who have established themselves inside the territory of the Community or who exploit the natural resources that exist within it, until the definitive delimitation, demarcation and titling ordered by the Court are carried out'. In addition, it added its – by now customary – order 'to allow the applicants to participate in planning and implementation of those measures and, in general, to keep them informed'. It also expanded its reference to action against impunity from its provisional measures ordering the State to protect persons against death threats and harassment to the different situation of ensuring cultural survival: 'to investigate the facts set forth in the claim that gave rise to the current measures, so as to discover and punish those responsible'.⁷⁹

In sum, the Court clearly established that the situation was extremely grave as the subsistence, culture and traditions of an indigenous people were at risk. It is significant in this respect that it quotes from judgments referring to 'survival' and the right to life as including the right to a dignified existence.⁸⁰ It noted that 'in the instant case it is probable that irreparable damage will ⁷⁵ IACHR Mayagna (Sumo) Awas Tingni Community v. Nicaragua, Order of 6 September 2002 (requested by the representatives of the victims), 6th 'Considering' clause.

⁷⁶ Id., 7th 'Considering' clause, quoting Mayagna (Sumo) Awas Tingni Community v. Nicaragua, Judgment of 31 August 2001, §149.

⁷⁷ IACHR Mayagna (Sumo) Awas Tingni Community v. Nicaragua, Order of 6 September 2002, 8th 'Considering' clause, quoting from Villagrán Morales et al. ('Street Children' case) v. Guatemala, 19 November 1999, §144.

⁷⁸ IACHR Mayagna (Sumo) Awas Tingni Community v. Nicaragua, Order of 6 September 2002, 10th 'Considering' clause.

⁷⁹ Id., decisional clauses 1-3.

⁸⁰ Id., 7th and 8th 'Considering' clause.

occur that it will preclude faithful and full compliance with the judgment on the merits and reparations in the case of the Mayagna Community.⁸¹

In 2007 the Court lifted the provisional measures. It considered that ‘now that more than five years have elapsed since the adoption of the provisional measures, the Court has assessed the different State reports and the observations of the representatives and the Commission concerning the measures adopted to protect the ownership of the ancestral lands of the members of the Awas Tigni Community, and observes that the information provided is closely related to compliance with the judgment’ of 31 August 2001.⁸² Hence it decided to lift the provisional measures but continue monitoring compliance with the judgment.

A few years after the Court’s order for provisional measures in Awas Tingni the Court’s again used provisional measures specifically aimed at the protection of cultural identity. In July 2004, in its Order in Pueblo Indígena de Sarayaku v. Ecuador the State not only was to guarantee the lives and personal integrity of the Sarayaku, but also their freedom of movement.⁸³ In its subsequent Order of June 2005 it added that the State should also immediately take the necessary measures to ensure that the Sarayaku can make use of the natural resources where they reside and to protect their lives and personal integrity against the activities of third parties exploiting the natural resources, especially against explosive devices. It should guarantee the freedom of movement of the indigenous peoples, in particular on the River Borbonanza. It should maintain the airstrip on the territory in order to maintain their means of transport. Very relevant with regard to the group of beneficiaries is the obligation directed to the state to inform the neighbouring indigenous communities about the meaning and scope of the provisional measures, vis-à-vis the State as well as particular third parties, in order to create an atmosphere conducive to living together in peace.⁸⁴

2.5 African Commission

In June 2004 the African Commission decided to take provisional measures on behalf of the pastoralist Endorois community in Kenya. It urged Kenya ‘to take immediate steps to ensure that no further issuance of mining concessions or transfers of parts to the land occurred prior to the case being concluded’.⁸⁵ Minority Rights Group International (MRG) and the Centre for Minority Rights Development (CEMIRIDE) had requested these measures a year previously, in light of ‘imminent mining activities that would cause irreversible damage to Endorois traditional land’.⁸⁶ They had been divided and displaced from their traditional lands and now lived ‘in a number of locations on the periphery of the reserve, being forced from fertile lands to semi-arid areas’. The priority of the Endorois’ is the restitution of their land. The petitioners argued that the Resolution on the Rights of Indigenous Populations/Communities in Africa, adopted in 2003, offered he ⁸¹ Id., 9th ‘Considering’ clause.

⁸² IACHR Mayagna (Sumo) Awas Tingni Community v. Nicaragua, Order of 6 September 2002, Order of 26 November 2007, 10th ‘Considering’ clause.

⁸³ IACHR Matter of Pueblo Indígena de Sarayaku (Ecuador), Order of 6 July 2004.

⁸⁴ IACHR Matter of Pueblo Indígena de Sarayaku (Ecuador), Order of 17 June 2005, 1st Decisional clause.

⁸⁵ As announced by Minority Rights Group, one of the petitioners, ‘African Commission urged to toughen stance on state non-compliance’, 24 January 2005.

⁸⁶ Minority Rights Group News release ‘Commission to consider Kenya pastoralist case following urgent appeal to state, 8 November 2004, <http://www.minorityrights.org/news_detail.asp?ID=316> (accessed on 4 December 2006).

Commission ‘a valuable basis upon which to extend its understanding and treatment of indigenous and collective rights, including economic, social and cultural rights’.⁸⁷

“The Endorois people’s health, livelihood, religion and culture are all intimately connected with their traditional land, as grazing lands, sacred religious sites and plants used for traditional medicine are all situated around the shores of Lake Bogoria. By forcing the community to move, not only were the Community’s property rights violated, but spiritual, cultural and economic ties to the land were severed”.⁸⁸

Reportedly, ‘in June 2006, local officials tested Endorois’ drinking water sources and found they were poisonously contaminated as a result of ruby mining. Mining has now stopped until the case is resolved’.⁸⁹

The eventual decision on the merits may indicate the provisions of the African Charter that have played a role in the use of provisional measures.⁹⁰ The fact that the African Commission

⁸⁷ Ibid.

⁸⁸ Ibid. In November 2004 the District Commissioner of the Lake Bogoria area had summoned the Endorois ‘to seek their approval to go forth with mining activities, which they unanimously refused. Two days later mining equipment arrived. In response the Endorois ‘gathered to block the road and police forces were sent to the scene where some community members were detained’. “The Chairperson of the Endorois Welfare Council subsequently received a letter requiring his resignation as head teacher of a state school”. Minority Rights Group News release ‘African Commission urged to toughen stance on state non-compliance’, 24 January 2005, <http://www.minorityrights.org/news_detail.asp?ID=342> (accessed on 11 January 2007).

⁸⁹ See Minority Rights Group webpage <<http://www.minorityrights.org/6779/trouble-in-paradise/the-facts.html>> (accessed 22 November 2008). The UN Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights and fundamental freedoms of indigenous peoples, Rodolfo Stavenhagen, in his Mission to Kenya report, noted that the Government ‘should aim at a friendly settlement in the case of the Endorois before ACHPR, leading to the establishment of a system of co-management between the authorities and the local communities in the Lake Bogoria Game Reserve’, A/HRC/4/32/Add.3, 26 February 2007, §108.

⁹⁰ In their submission the petitioners had invoked the free practice of religion (Article 8 ACHPR), the right to property (Article 14), to enjoy the best attainable standard of physical and mental health (Article 16) and the right to freely take part in the cultural life of the community (Article 17(2)). They also invoked rights that are very specific to the African Charter emphasizing issues of development and the collective dimension of human rights, such as the right of all peoples to exist (Article 20(1): “All peoples shall have the right to existence. They shall have the unquestionable and inalienable right to self-determination. They shall freely determine their political status and shall pursue their economic and social development according to the policy they have freely chosen”). Another right invoked by the Endorois was that of all peoples to freely dispose of their wealth and natural resources (Article 21: “1. All peoples shall freely dispose of their wealth and natural resources. This right shall be exercised in the exclusive interest of the people. In no case shall a people be deprived of it. 2. In case of spoliation the dispossessed people shall have the right to the lawful recovery of its property as well as to an adequate compensation. 3. The free disposal of wealth and natural resources shall be exercised without prejudice to the obligation of promoting international economic cooperation based on mutual respect, equitable exchange and the principles of international law. (...) 5. States parties to the present Charter shall undertake to eliminate all forms of foreign economic exploitation particularly that practiced by international monopolies so as to enable their peoples to fully benefit from the advantages derived from their national resources”). Finally, they invoked Article 22(1), which speaks of development and identity: “All peoples shall have the right to their economic, social and cultural development with due regard to their freedom and identity and in the equal enjoyment of the common heritage of mankind”.

used provisional measures in this land rights case submitted by the Endorois of Kenya shows an awareness of cultural identity of groups within States that may subsequently be reflected in the decision on the merits in this case.⁹¹

2.6 Bosnia Human Rights Chamber and cultural/religious survival

The Bosnia Chamber, with its special nature stemming from the Dayton Peace Agreement, obviously operated in a special context of ethnic/religious conflict. It has taken provisional measures involving the rights of religious minorities, ordering the authorities to desist from implementing a local order to exhume the body of the petitioner's deceased wife from a Muslim cemetery; and more generally to protect religious sites and to allow the burial of deceased persons.

The first years of its existence the Chamber was hesitant to intervene pending the proceedings in order to protect Islamic sites.⁹² Yet it eventually decided to use them. It did so in July 1998, three months after it had last refused them in the same case involving the events subsequent to the destruction of 15 mosques in Banja Luka. Upon a request by the respondent Party to postpone the proceedings the Chamber indeed decided to postpone the public hearing. At the same time it used provisional measures ordering the respondent Party 'to take all necessary action to refrain from the construction of buildings or objects of any nature on the sites of the mosques and on the cemeteries and other Islamic sites indicated in the application, and not to permit any such construction by any other institution or person, whether public or private'. Furthermore, it was ordered 'to refrain from the destruction or removal of any object remaining on the sites of the mosques and on the cemeteries and other Islamic sites indicated in the application, and not to permit any such destruction or removal by any other institution, whether public or private'.⁹³ The substance of this provisional measure of July 1998 corresponds remarkably to part of the decision on reparation subsequently ordered, upon the Chamber's finding of violations of the right to peaceful enjoyment of possessions and the freedom of religion, as well as of the prohibition of discrimination regarding these rights.⁹⁴

⁹¹ See in general about this case Morel (2004). According to one of the petitioners this decision is expected for the end of 2008. See Minority Rights Group webpage <<http://www.minorityrights.org/6779/trouble-in-paradise/the-facts.html>> (accessed 22 November 2008). The UN Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights and fundamental freedoms of indigenous peoples, Rodolfo Stavenhagen, in his Mission to Kenya report, noted that the Government 'should aim at a friendly settlement in the case of the Endorois before ACHPR, leading to the establishment of a system of co-management between the authorities and the local communities in the Lake Bogoria Game Reserve', A/HRC/4/32/Add.3, 26 February 2007, §108.

⁹² See Bosnia Chamber Islamic Community in Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Republika Srpska, 11 June 1999, referring to decisions to refuse provisional measures of 12 October 1996, 10 October 1997 (asking the office of the High Representative, UNESCO and the Commission to preserve National Monuments to submit any relevant information in their possession and requesting the Human Rights ombudsperson to investigate certain of the allegations) and 4 April 1998, §§4, 6 and 9.

⁹³ Bosnia Chamber Islamic Community in Bosnia and Herzegovina (Banja Luka mosques) v. Republika Srpska, 11 June 1999, §12. See Chapter II on the special nature of the Bosnia Chamber and the three possible addressees of its Orders for provisional measures. In practice Republika Srpska has been the addressee in the religious cases discussed here.

⁹⁴ Bosnia Chamber Islamic Community in Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Republika Srpska (Banja Luka mosques), 11 June 1999, §212. More generally on the relation to reparation see Chapter XIII (Protection).

That same month the Chamber also used provisional measures in response to the situation Mr Mahmutović found himself in. In July 1998 he was ordered ‘to exhume, at his own expense, his late wife from the Town Cemetery, and to move her remains “to the new town cemetery located in the eastern part of town” within 15 days receipt of the decision’.⁹⁵ At the same time he was obliged ‘to request the Municipal Sanitary Inspection for permission to exhume his late wife’.⁹⁶ He petitioned the Chamber, which ordered Republika Srpska to ‘desist from’ implementing the domestic order for exhumation.⁹⁷

Subsequently, in December 1999, in the context of a petition submitted by the Islamic Community in Bosnia, the Chamber ordered Republika Srpska more generally not to forbid or interfere with any burials in this cemetery ‘carried out by or with the authority of the applicant’.⁹⁸ It did so following information that the authorities had issued a decision prohibiting the burial of Mrs Behija Zec in the Muslim Cemetery in Prnjavor.⁹⁹ This provisional measure did not immediately generate the result required. At the end of that month Mrs Alema Mešić died. She had reserved and paid for a parcel in the Muslim Town Cemetery since 1971. The Islamic Community of Prnjavor requested permission to bury her and informed the International Police Task Force (IPTF) station in Prnjavor. When her son was digging his mother’s grave the next day the Municipal Inspector of Prnjavor appeared with a policeman. They made a report of the incident and ordered the deceased son to cover up the grave again. The representatives of the Islamic Community ‘reminded the Municipal authorities of the Chamber’s recent order forbidding any interference with burials at the Muslim Town Cemetery’. The Municipal Inspector ‘replied that the Chamber’s order was not binding’. “Finally, after several hours of negotiations with the Islamic Community, the municipal authorities and IPTF, the burial of Mrs Alema Mešić was performed at the Muslim Town Cemetery”.¹⁰⁰

The Chamber used provisional measures in various other cases as well.¹⁰¹ In one case it ordered Srpska to ‘take all necessary steps to prevent the christening/consecration’ of ‘or any per-

⁹⁵ See Bosnia Chamber Mahmutović v. Republika Srpska, 8 October 1999, §23. This new town cemetery did not yet exist (information OSCE field office in Doboj), §6. See also §13.

⁹⁶ Bosnia Chamber Mahmutović v. Republika Srpska, 8 October 1999, §23.

⁹⁷ Id., §4.

⁹⁸ Bosnia Chamber Islamic Community in BiH v. Republika Srpska (Muslim Town Cemetery in Prnjavor), 11 January 2000. The Chamber specified the cemetery by indicating its location ‘at cadastral lot k.č. 741/1 k.o. in Prnjavor’. Since initially there had not been ‘any individual threat of exhumation or interference with burials the Chamber at first refused to order the provisional measures requested, §4.

⁹⁹ Id., §9.

¹⁰⁰ Id., §33.

¹⁰¹ See e.g. Bosnia Chamber Islamic Community in BiH (former mosque sites in Zvornik) v. Republika Srpska, 9 November 2000, provisional measures of 10 July 1999 and 21 October 1999 and further Order of 7 July 2000, maintained by decision of 11 October 2000, §§2-7 and The Islamic Community in BiH (former Atik Mosque, Bijeljina) v. Republika Srpska, 6 December 2000, provisional measure of 10 July 1999 and further Order to protect site Atik Mosque of 7 July 2000. See also The Islamic Community in BiH (Jakeš Cemetery) v. Republika Srpska, 8 October 2001, §6 in which the Chamber ordered provisional measures to the effect that the respondent Party was to ‘take all necessary steps to make sure that no burial takes place without the consent of the applicant at the Jakeš Cemetery (...) and to prevent any other disturbance of the above cemetery, particularly the exhumation of human remains and damage to funerary monuments or their removal’. ‘By its express terms this order remains in force until the Chamber delivers its final decision in the case, unless it is withdrawn at an earlier stage of the proceedings’. On the merits the Chamber recalled, at §47, ‘the tradition in Bosnia and Herzegovina to maintain separate burial grounds according to religion. Given this tradition and bearing in mind the prevailing circumstances in the country, the chamber finds the unauthorized formance of any Orthodox ceremony' on the Muslim cemetery of the petitioner's family in Rataj.¹⁰² This family had buried their family members there for several centuries.¹⁰³

The petitioner had complained that the family graves had been disturbed, tombstones had been destroyed, the surrounding fence and gate to the cemetery had repeatedly been torn down and in 2002 an Orthodox cross was engraved into an important stone in the centre of the cemetery. In this regard he had also requested the Chamber to issue an order for the authorities to remove the engraved Orthodox cross. The Bosnia Chamber had rejected this part of the request for provisional measures. It also rejected the request insofar as it was directed against Bosnia and Herzegovina as well as against Republika Srpska.¹⁰⁴ Subsequently, upon a finding of violations on the merits, it did order Republika Srpska 'to ensure that the competent enterprise properly fences in, cleans and maintains the Rataj Muslim graveyard' and 'to take all necessary steps to prevent the Serb Orthodox Church from carrying out any further activities on the Rataj Muslim graveyard'.¹⁰⁵ In other words, upon finding violations, in its decision on reparation it confirmed the provisional measures previously taken.¹⁰⁶ Moreover, it added the obligation to clean, maintain and fence in the Muslim graveyard, which includes the removal of products of vandalism, arguably also in the form of symbols engraved in order to revive the heritage of the Serb Orthodox church. After all, the Chamber had by now found on the merits that the petitioner had been discriminated against in his right to freedom of religion and the enjoyment of the right to respect for private and family life. It had specifically considered that the 'obligation to create conditions conducive to the return of persons expelled during the armed conflict because of their religion' placed a particular burden on the parties to the Dayton Peace Agreement and its Annexes, 'to ensure that returnees will be met with full respect for their religious beliefs and practices, including full respect for the sites that are connected to the manifestation of religious beliefs, such as graveyards'.¹⁰⁷

Regarding the planned orthodox religious activities at the Čengiđ family Muslim graveyard, specifically the liturgy, planned in August 2002, that triggered the petition, the Chamber noted that the authorities 'did not take any action to prevent this liturgy from taking place, nor have they burial on non-Muslims in an exclusively Muslim cemetery to be unjustifiable and provocative'. The Chamber has also ordered the respondent Party, 'as a provisional measures, to prevent the implementation' of certain procedural decisions allocating the site of the Kizlaragina mosque, destroyed in 1992, to a private contractor for the construction of business premises: Islamic Community in BiH (Mrkonjić Grad) v. Republika Srpska, 22 December 2003, §4.

¹⁰² Bosnia Chamber Čengiđ v. BiH and Srpska, 5 September 2003, §3.

¹⁰³ Id., §18.

¹⁰⁴ Id., §3.

¹⁰⁵ Id., §§125-126.

¹⁰⁶ In general on the relation between provisional measures and reparation see Chapter XIII. The petitioner had stated that there was a continued threat of an interference concerning the 'consecration-christening' of the central stone that has not been entirely removed by the Chamber's order for provisional measures' Bosnia Chamber Čengiđ v. BiH and Srpska, 5 September 2003, §108.

¹⁰⁷ Ibid. On the question whether the difference in treatment was justified in that there was a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aims sought to be realised, the Chamber pointed out that it could not disregard the dramatic events that took place in the municipality in question. It referred to an ICTY Trial Chamber judgment noting that 'only about ten Muslims remained at the end of the conflict'. In 1991 there were still more than 20.000 Muslim inhabitants. Bosnia Chamber Čengiđ v. BiH and Srpska, 5 September 2003, §117.

expressed the opinion that it should be prevented'. The Chamber observes that the liturgy was in fact only prevented because of its own Order for provisional measures.¹⁰⁸

3 RELATION BETWEEN PROVISIONAL MEASURES TO PROTECT CULTURAL AND RELIGIOUS RIGHTS AND THE EXPECTED DECISION ON THE MERITS

3.1 Introduction

As discussed, it was in Sara et al. v. Finland (inadm. 1994) that the HRC used provisional measures for the second time in order to protect indigenous culture, the first time being on behalf of the Lubicon Lake Band.¹⁰⁹ In Sara the State denied that there was a causal link between the measures of protection requested by the petitioners and the object of the communication itself. Apparently it argued that this was the reason why provisional measures should not be taken. Quite apart from the question whether it is appropriate in human rights adjudication to be strict about the relationship between the rights claimed and the request for provisional measures, it is clear that in this case the material object of the petitioners' complaint was the threat to their traditional economic and cultural rights caused by logging and road construction activities in certain reindeer husbandry areas. Indeed the HRC found that the material object of the complaint was related to the request for provisional measures.¹¹⁰

In practice the provisional measures by the HRC, the Inter-American Commission and Court and the African Commission related to claims about indigenous culture. Moreover, when the Bosnia Chamber used provisional measures in cases involving religion they in fact aimed at protecting the spiritual survival of a group with an important link and long history to the area as well.

The HRC has used provisional measures only in certain of those cases where the petitioner claimed a violation of Article 27 ICCPR.¹¹¹ Still the issues involved are normally interrelated and it is important to keep the other rights in mind as they may have an impact on the Committee's decision to take provisional measures to protect indigenous culture. Rights in the Covenant that could be relevant for the protection of indigenous culture are the right to self-determination (Article 1 ICCPR), the right to respect for privacy, family or home (Article 17 ICCPR), the freedom of religion (Article 18 ICCPR), the protection of the family (Article 23 ICCPR), the rights of the child (Article 24 ICCPR), the right to participate in public affairs (Article 25 ICCPR) and the right of minorities to enjoy their own culture (Article 27 ICCPR).

¹⁰⁸ Id., §96. More generally on the official responses of States to provisional measures see Chapter XVI.

¹⁰⁹ HRC O. Sara et al. v. Finland, 23 March 1994 (inadm.).

¹¹⁰ The State had argued that the Board's authority to approve logging activities in areas other than those designated as protected wilderness, such as the residual area outside the Hammastunturi Wilderness, was not derived from the Wilderness Act. "Accordingly, the State party denies that there is a causal link between the measures of protection requested by the authors and the object of the communication itself, which only concerns enactment and implementation of the Wilderness Act". However, the HRC noted that the continuation of road construction in the residual area could indeed be causally linked to the entry into force of the Wilderness Act. For purposes of admissibility the petitioners had sufficiently substantiated that this could raise issues under Article 27.

¹¹¹ See in general about the protection of minorities Nowak (1993), pp. 480-505; Meijknecht (2001) and Donders (2002). See about the interdependence of various Covenant rights in relation to indigenous peoples Scheinin (2000).

In 2007 the General Assembly adopted the UN Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, which stresses the importance of land rights and reaffirms the need for special protection of and informed consent by indigenous peoples.¹¹² Yet the provisional measures discussed in this chapter were all taken before that time, when the international legal setting already included, among others, a general recognition of the right to self-determination,¹¹³ ILO-Convention 169 concerning Indigenous and Tribal Peoples in Independent Countries,¹¹⁴ the World Bank Operational Directive on Indigenous people (1991) and various drafts of the abovementioned Declaration.¹¹⁵ Obviously the UN Convention on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD) is also relevant in the context of indigenous and minority rights.

Indigenous groups and minorities have equally resorted to the three regional systems with complaints involving their right to culture and religion. The case of the Endorois, in which the African Commission took provisional measures, was the first time that this Commission would consider the merits of an indigenous land rights case.¹¹⁶ The Inter-American Commission regularly pays attention to the protection of indigenous culture.¹¹⁷ Like the HRC it has done so in the context of country reports as well as individual complaints and its concerns are often similar to those of the HRC. Yet under the ICCPR the States themselves submit the reports and the HRC simply discusses them in a public hearing and publishes Concluding Observations. The Inter-American Commission, on the other hand, often prepares reports itself, on the basis of fact-finding missions. Moreover the American Convention does not include a 'victim requirement', which renders the Inter-American Commission 'accessible to almost anyone concerned with the fate of indigenous groups in the Americas'.¹¹⁸ Despite the inevitable lack of expertise by international adjudicators regarding indigenous land rights, the Inter-American Commission has shown awareness of the importance of safeguarding the cultural integrity of indigenous peoples. This awareness may underlie its use of precautionary measures in cultural cases. The same applies to the provisional measures by the Inter-American Court.

The provisional measures involving culture taken in the Inter-American and African systems were decided in the context of claims based on culture, property and non-discrimination and those taken by the Bosnia Chamber involved religion, property and non-discrimination claims. This section discusses the relevance of the case law on the merits in order to explain the practice of the adjudicators, taking the case law of the HRC as a point of reference. It pays particular attention to the topics of self-determination, land rights/collective rights, the moment of infringement on land rights, the special status of (indigenous) culture, consultation and impact assessment.

¹¹² A/RES/61/295, 13 September 2007.

¹¹³ See e.g. Article 1(2) UN Charter, Article 1 ICCPR and Article 1 UN Convention on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.

¹¹⁴ Adopted 27 June 1989 and entered into force 27 June 1989.

¹¹⁵ See generally on indigenous rights, group rights, minority rights and/or cultural and environmental rights e.g. Anaya (1996); Pritchard (1998); Henrard (2000); Scheinin (2000); Alston (2001); Donders (2002); Rivera-Salgado (2005). See also the reports of the UN Working Group on Indigenous Populations, the reports by UN Sub-Commission Rapporteur Irene Daes and UN Special Rapporteurs on the Human Rights of Indigenous People Rodolfo Stavenhagen and James Anaya.

¹¹⁶ Minority Rights Group News release 'Commission to consider Kenya pastoralist case following urgent appeal to state, 8 November 2004, <http://www.minorityrights.org/news_detail.asp?ID=316> (accessed on 4 December 2006). In general see also Thornberry (2002), pp. 244-264.

¹¹⁷ For a more general discussion see e.g. Thornberry (2002), pp. 265-289 and Hannum (1998), pp. 323-344.

¹¹⁸ Meijknecht (2001), p. 198. See also Chapter XIII (Protection), on the group of beneficiaries.

3.2 Self-determination

As Cançado Trindade noted, already in its Advisory Opinion on the Western Sahara (1975), the ICJ referred to the cultural practices of the nomad populations and affirmed their right to self-determination.¹¹⁹ Yet a recurring problem in cases involving indigenous peoples and threats to the natural habitat is the fact that the HRC does not consider the right to self-determination (Article 1 ICCPR) part of the individual complaint procedure under the OP. The HRC discussed the issue in Lubicon Lake Band v. Canada (1990), which is also the first case in which it used provisional measures to protect an indigenous culture. Because Article 1 ICCPR deals with rights conferred upon peoples as such, under the OP the petitioner, as an individual, could not claim to be a victim of a violation of these rights.¹²⁰ The question whether the Lubicon Lake Band constituted a ‘people’ was not an issue to be addressed under the OP, because the rights that could be claimed under this treaty were the individual rights set out in Articles 6 to 27 ICCPR. Nevertheless, collective submissions by groups of individuals claiming to be similarly affected were indeed possible. The HRC pointed out that there was no doubt that many of the claims presented raised issues under Article 27 and that this article included ‘the right of persons, in community with others, to engage in economic and social activities which are part of the culture of the community to which they belong’.¹²¹ In other words, it introduced the article proprio motu as an alternative to the petitioner’s Article 1 claim. This approach of the HRC towards self-determination in the individual complaint procedure helps explain its use of provisional measures to protect indigenous culture.

The concept of self-determination is relevant in dealing with the question of the identity and interests of the beneficiaries of the Committee’s provisional measures. Collective aspects of the right to culture (Article 27 ICCPR) play an important role in the use of provisional measures. The discussion on these collective aspects has mainly come up in relation to threats to the natural habitat. Possibly this has been done in order to compensate for the fact that the HRC has not considered the right to self-determination (Article 1 ICCPR) under the OP. It shows the Committee’s awareness of the special position of indigenous peoples and the fact that they have no recourse to the HRC except through complaints by individual members of the group. In the Lubicon ¹¹⁹ IACHR Bámaca Velásquez v. Guatemala, 25 November 2000, Separate Opinion Cançado Trindade, §13, referring to ICJ Advisory Opinion on the Western Sahara, 16 October 1975, §87.

¹²⁰ HRC Bernard Ominayak, Chief of the Lubicon Lake Band v. Canada, 26 March 1990, §13.3. In later cases, however, the HRC did point out that ‘the provisions of article 1 may be relevant in the interpretation of other rights protected by the Covenant, in particular articles 25, 26 and 27’. Diergaardt et al. v. Namibia, 25 July 2000, §10.3. In his concurring opinion Scheinin pointed out that this obiter statement represented ‘a proper recognition of the interdependence between the various rights protected by the Covenant, including article 1’. In this case he agreed with the HRC that the petitioners had failed to substantiate their claim under Article 25 ICCPR, but he considered that it had unnecessarily emphasized the individual nature of participation rights under this article. He noted that ‘there are situations where article 25 calls for special arrangements for rights of participation to be enjoyed by members of minorities and, in particular, indigenous peoples’. ‘When such a situation arises, it is not sufficient under article 25 to afford individual members of such communities the individual right to vote in general elections. Some forms of local, regional or cultural autonomy may be called for in order to comply with the requirement of effective rights of participation’. See further Apirana Mahuika et al. v. New Zealand, 27 October 2000 and Marie-Hélène Gillot et al. v. France, 15 July 2002. See also General Comment 12 on Article 1 ICCPR (1984), HRI/GEN/1/Rev. 6, pp. 134-135 and General Comment 23, 8 April 1994, CCPR/C/21/Rev.1/Add.5 (summarizing the Committee’s case law on Article 27) and Nowak (1993), pp. 480-505 discussing the meaning of Article 27, including the travaux préparatoires.

¹²¹ See HRC Bernard Ominayak, Chief of the Lubicon Lake Band v. Canada, 26 March 1990, §32.1 and §32.2. See also the Committee’s General Comment 23 on Article 27, 8 April 1994.

Lake Band case the HRC implied that Article 27 aims at ensuring survival of the cultural, religious and social identity of minorities.¹²² Nevertheless, Article 27 ICCPR only partially addresses the problems indigenous peoples face.¹²³ This seems to apply equally to the provisions of regional human rights treaties invoked by indigenous peoples. In other words, 'Indigenous peoples rely on human rights mechanisms for lack of a better option'. Such mechanisms 'can monitor and curb excessive State behaviour, but they cannot decide on a transfer of authority'.¹²⁴

3.3 Land rights and collective aspects of the right to culture¹²⁵

To understand the purpose of the provisional measures it is important to pay attention to the collective aspects of minority rights and the right to culture, especially read in light of the right to self-determination. Thus far the adjudicators have only used provisional measures to protect the collective aspects of the right to culture, as claimed by individual petitioners and not the individual aspects of this right in relation to exclusion. Given the nature of the individual complaint systems, technically both claims relating to threats to the natural habitat as such and claims relating to exclusion from an indigenous group involve the individual right to live as members of an indigenous group taking part in indigenous culture. Yet in fact the provisional measures have related only to issues of land rights.¹²⁶

Awareness of the special position of indigenous peoples may explain why adjudicators sometimes emphasise collective aspects of land rights and use provisional measures in this context. The preservation of the connection between indigenous peoples and their lands is fundamen-

¹²² See the Committee's reference to Art. 27 in its admissibility decision and its explanation that it had taken provisional measures 'in view of the seriousness of the author's allegations that the Lubicon Lake Band was at the verge of extinction', Lubicon Lake Band v. Canada, 26 March 1990, §29.3.

¹²³ Nowak observes that the specific formulation of Article 27 might seem unsatisfactory, 'measured against the demands for comprehensive collective protection of minorities', Nowak (1993), p. 483. Schmidt points out that the Committee's 'judicial self-restraint, which shuts the door on the examination of claims based on Article 1', was 'open to legal criticism' although 'wise from a political point of view', Schmidt (1997), p. 340. See further Huff (1999), p. 187 who notes that the Committee's position is 'untenable' in light of the plain language of Article 1 OP recognizing the Committee's competence to address communications brought by individuals concerning violations of any of the provisions of the ICCPR. Meijknecht notes that 'the HRC, by "translating" the collective claim into a claim under Article 27 ICCPR, basically reduces the claim to individual proportions'. Meijknecht (2000), p. 190. For the discussion on individual versus collective rights see pp. 184-189. De Feyter compares the right to self-determination to the right to development for indigenous peoples. He concludes from the case of the Lubicon Lake Band: "Human rights mechanisms are an awkward forum for dealing with indigenous attempts at taking control of their own destiny". De Feyter (2001), p. 153. This is so because their claims 'go beyond what human rights treaties can achieve' and relate to 'who should exercise decision making power on development'.

¹²⁴ De Feyter (2001), p. 153. The claim of the Band, he notes, was 'not about the individual rights of Chief Ominayak, but about the collective right of the Band to decide on its own development'. "The claim needs to be transformed into an individual claim because the international human rights forum where it is presented so requires". De Feyter (2001), p. 154.

¹²⁵ For a general overview see e.g. Anaya/Williams (2001).

¹²⁶ See similarly CERD General Recommendation XXIII (51) concerning indigenous peoples (August 18, 1997) (calling upon states parties to the UN Convention on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination to 'recognize and protect the rights of indigenous peoples to own, develop, control and use their communal lands, territories and resources').

tal to the effective realization of the human rights of indigenous peoples ‘and therefore warrants special measures of protection’.¹²⁷

Article 27 ICCPR has been invoked and applied in or with regard to a wide range of States throughout the world, in the context of indigenous peoples. The interpretation of this provision by the Committee supervising this treaty is thus of special interest, particularly regarding its individual and collective aspects. As noted, under the ICCPR another explanation, related to the above, for the emphasis on collective aspects may be that indigenous peoples as such have no recourse to the HRC. The Committee’s special attention to complaints by individual members of indigenous groups if these members seem to represent the interests of the collectivity, rather than ‘simply’ claim their individual right not to be excluded from the indigenous group, may partly be explained by its wish to compensate for this procedural hurdle.¹²⁸

In Länsman II the HRC indicated that the cumulative effect of certain infringements could eventually constitute a violation of Article 27.

“Even though in the present communication the Committee has reached the conclusion that the facts of the case do not reveal a violation of the rights of the authors, the Committee deems it important to point out that the State party must bear in mind when taking steps affecting the right under article 27, that though different activities in themselves may not constitute a violation of this article, such activities, taken together, may erode the rights of Sami people to enjoy their own culture”.¹²⁹

Scheinin has pointed out that Länsman II was based, at least in part, ‘on assessing the logging project on a quantitative scale’.¹³⁰ He noted that the State party relied heavily on this argument, but that it did not do full justice to the petitioners’ case ‘who had emphasised the strategic (qualitative) importance of the specific forest lands in question’ (italics in original). With regard to the sustainability test used by the HRC he notes that incremental developments related to land use could have the effect of eroding the economic basis for an indigenous community’s ‘traditional or otherwise typical means of livelihood’ and thereby amount to a denial of the rights in Article 27.¹³¹

¹²⁷ See CIDH Mary and Carrie Dann v. US, 27 December 2002, §128. Article 13 of ILO Convention 169 concerning Indigenous and Tribal Peoples also stipulates that States ‘shall respect the special importance for the cultures and spiritual values of the peoples concerned of their relationship with the lands or territories (...) and in particular the collective aspects of this relationship’.

¹²⁸ In relation to ‘other’ minorities Art. 1 ICCPR does not seem to apply to the same extent, even though these minorities do not have recourse to the HRC either, except in an individual capacity. See also the discussion of consultation and representation in Chapter XIII (Protection). It has been suggested that it is very problematic to define ‘indigenous peoples’ as a distinctive legal category or ‘a global abstraction capable of working across different types of society with intricate identity politics and rapid cultural and economic change’. See e.g. Kingsbury (2001), p. 245. The UN Declaration on Indigenous Peoples, adopted by the General Assembly on 13 September 2007, A/RES/61/295, does not provide a definition either. See in general about the discussion on the definition of minorities and indigenous peoples: Meijknecht (2001), Chapters III (in particular pp. 115-118) and IV; Donders (2002), pp 169-171 and pp. 204-205; Thornberry (2002), pp. 33-60 and Kingsbury (2001), §§II (Minorities) and V (Indigenous peoples).

¹²⁹ HRC Länsman II v. Finland, 30 October 1996, §10.7.

¹³⁰ Scheinin (2000), pp. 170-171.

¹³¹ Ibid. The European Commission on Human Rights has taken a similar approach in the Alta Dam case. It considered that the interference with the private life and traditional activities of the Sami caused by the building of a water dam and a hydro-electric power station, was limited to the loss

Article 27 ICCPR does not refer explicitly to the individual right to culture. In this respect it is different from Article 18 ICCPR, which refers to the exercise of the right to religion individually or in community with others. While the absence of a reference to ‘individually’ may imply that the collective aspect in the right to culture (Article 27 ICCPR) is stronger than in the right to religion (Article 18 ICCPR), Article 27 is still an individual right. Hence it seems reasonable to assume that the recognition of a collective dimension of the right to culture is meant to enhance the quality of the enjoyment of the individual right. In practice, however, the emphasis on this collective dimension, through the quantitative approach, seems to favour a collective right to culture over an individual right, by simply aiming at guaranteeing that some people may be able to maintain this culture. In Lovelace v. Canada (1981)¹³² the HRC put an emphasis on the rights of the individual, while the later case of Kitok v. Sweden (1988)¹³³ gave priority to ‘the group interest in cultural survival’.¹³⁴ In this case the HRC noted that Kitok had ‘always retained some links with the Sami community, always living on Sami lands and seeking to return to full-time reindeer farming as soon as it became financially possible, in his particular circumstances, for him to do so’.¹³⁵ Nevertheless, it becomes apparent from this case that if the State can show that infringements of individual rights were necessary for the ‘continued viability and welfare of the minority as a whole’ the HRC lets them pass. What seems to have played a role is the State’s argument that Kitok could enjoy the same rights in practice.¹³⁶ This is not fully convincing since part of being able to enjoy your culture as member of an indigenous group is the knowledge that of a piece of land that was comparatively small. See EComHR G. and E. v. Norway, 3 October 1993.

¹³² HRC Sandra Lovelace v. Canada, 30 July 1981. Following publication of this View the State explained the process in which it tried to consult Indian people and at the same time amend the discriminatory provisions as a matter of urgency. See Response of Canada to the Views of the Human Rights Committee, 6 June 1983, Sandra Lovelace v. Canada, 30 July 1981. As becomes apparent in the discussion of R.L. and 16 other members of the Whispering Pine Band v. Canada, 5 November 1991, the eventual amendment of the law by Canada did not receive overall approval.

¹³³ HRC Ivan Kitok v. Sweden, 27 July 1988.

¹³⁴ Anaya (1996), p. 101. The State had acknowledged that the non-reindeer herding Sami had no special rights under the present law. “These other Sami have found it more difficult to maintain their Sami identity and many of them are today assimilated into Swedish society. Indeed, the majority of this group does not even live within the area where reindeer herding Sami live”. Kitok v. Sweden, 27 July 1988, §4.2. The petitioner pointed out: “It is characteristic that the 1964 Royal Committee wanted to call the Lapp village ‘reindeer village’ (renby) and wanted to make the renby an entirely economic association with increasing voting power for the big reindeer owners. This had also been achieved in the present sameby, where members get a new vote for every extra 100 reindeer. It is because of this organisation of the voting power that Ivan Kitok was not admitted into his fatherland Sörkaitum Lappby”. Kitok, §5.3.

¹³⁵ HRC Kitok v. Sweden, 27 July 1988, §9.7.

¹³⁶ Kingsbury (2001), p. 213 puts it as follows: “In so far as the Sameby policy (...) was a response to the crisis in the long-term viability of reindeer-herding lifestyle and culture, however, the Swedish state was implicated much more fundamentally in not securing sufficient land, pasturage, and support for the Sami culture, yet the Committee became more hesitant to intervene. This paradox structures the result in the case, a very uneasy compromise in which no violation of the ICCPR is found because Kitok was in fact being permitted, although not as of right, to herd reindeer, and nothing is said about the systemic assimilationist effects of the diminishing resource base or other aspects of historic Swedish state policy”. See also Thornberry (2002), pp. 159-160 and Simon (1997), p. 160, the latter emphasising the importance of assessing ‘the broader harms affecting all Sami’.

the other members still recognise you as belonging to their group. If you are excluded this does not enhance your enjoyment.

In short, while procedurally only individuals can claim a violation of Article 27 under the OP, materially the collective aspects of Article 27 have priority.¹³⁷ The article is directed towards ‘ensuring the survival and continued development of the cultural, religious and social identity of the minorities concerned, thus enriching the fabric of society as a whole’.¹³⁸ Thus, by referring to the aim of ensuring survival of the cultural, religious and social identity of minorities, this statement confirms the importance the HRC attaches to the collective aspects of Article 27.

A few cases involving culture may assist in clarifying the outer limits of provisional measures exactly because the measures were not used.¹³⁹ In Diergaardt et al. v. Namibia (2000), for ¹³⁷ See also Meijknecht (2001), pp. 131-139. She raises the question whether it is the individual’s, the group’s or the culture’s existence needing protection and notes that Article 27 is basically formulated as a right bestowed upon the individual. She considers that ‘the construction as applied in Article 27 suggests that the tension between the individual and the collectivity can be avoided by denying a legal status and rights to the collectivity, and by attributing rights exclusively to individuals’. The formulation ‘in community with other members of their group’, she acknowledges, ‘suggests some sort of compromise between the individual and collective approach’, but this, she points out, ‘does not change the fact that the rights in question are bestowed upon individuals’. Certainly, from the perspective of the international personality of indigenous peoples Article 27 denies legal status to the collectivity. In its interpretation of the article, however, the HRC seems to attach rights to collectivities at the cost of the individual. General Comment 23 of the HRC points out that while Article 27 ICCPR is expressed in negative terms, a right still exists that ‘shall not be denied’. In fact this means that State parties are under an obligation to ensure that the exercise of this right is protected. “Positive measures of protection are, therefore, required not only against the acts of the State party itself, whether through its legislative, judicial or administrative authorities, but also against the acts of other persons within the State party”. General Comment 23 on Article 27, 8 April 1994, §6.1 (1994). See Crawford (2001), p. 23 for a strictly textual interpretation.

¹³⁸ HRC General Comment 23 on Article 27, 8 April 1994, §9.

¹³⁹ In HRC R.L. and 16 other members of the Whispering Pine Band v. Canada, 5 November 1991, for instance, the HRC specifically noted its refusal to use provisional measures. Like Sandra Lovelace v. Canada, 30 July 1981 and Ivan Kitok v. Sweden, 27 July 1988 this case related to the issue of exclusion from a cultural group. The petitioners argued that new legislation would have an increasingly negative effect on their families. To avoid the termination of family lines through the implementation of this legislation, the Band would have to arrange all future marriages of Band members with members of other Bands. This, they argued, forced them ‘to choose between gradually losing their legal rights and reserve land,’ on the one hand and ‘depriving their children of personal freedom and privacy’ on the other. This, they argued, forced them ‘to choose between gradually losing their legal rights and reserve land’, on the one hand and ‘depriving their children of personal freedom and privacy’ on the other. They sought ‘immediate measures to preserve the status quo pendente lite’ and requested the HRC to use provisional measures and urge the State party ‘to refrain from making any additions to or deletions from the Band List of the Whispering Pines Indian Band, except as may be necessary to ensure that every direct descendant of the petitioners is included for the time being as a member of the Band’. HRC R.L. and 16 other members of the Whispering Pine Band v. Canada, 5 November 1991, §3.9. Among others, the State party noted that it had considered the membership rules as suggested by the Band were ‘not acceptable because they excluded certain specified groups, such as women who lost their entitlement to Band membership as a result of marriage to non-Indians, their minor children, and others’. The HRC did not use provisional measures and declared the case inadmissible for non-exhaustion of domestic remedies. One could speak of harm to specific children in that they might grow up with the knowledge that they could only protect the land and cultural rights of their children by finding a registered Indian to marry. Apparently, following the Lovelace case the instance, counsel requested provisional measures to the effect that ‘no expropriation, buying or selling of the community land take place, that no rent be collected from tenants and that no herds be prevented from grazing on the community land while the communication is under consideration by the Committee’.¹⁴⁰ The Rapporteur refused this request. The discussion on the merits indicates that the HRC did not consider that the petitioners had established a cultural relationship to the lands in question.¹⁴¹ While the Rapporteur did not motivate his refusal to use provisional measures, given the decision on the merits it is likely that he equally concluded, from the initial complaint, that there was insufficient evidence rendering necessary the use of provisional measures to prevent irreparable harm to the culture of the petitioners, threatening the very existence.

In Hopu and Bessert v. France (1997)¹⁴² provisional measures were not, but, it is argued, could have been used. The petitioners had attempted to halt the building of a hotel on an indigenous burial site. They were both ethnic Polynesians living in Tahiti, French Polynesia and the descendants of the owners of a land tract of about 4.5 hectares called Tetaitapu. They argued that their ancestors were dispossessed of their property in 1961. In 1990 a company was seeking to initiate construction work on a luxury hotel complex on the site as soon as possible. In protest the petitioners and other descendants of the owners peacefully occupied the site in 1992. They contended that ‘the land and the lagoon bordering it represent an important place in their history, their culture and their life’ and added that ‘the land encompasses the site of a pre-European burial ground and that the lagoon remains a traditional fishing ground and provides the means of subsistence for some thirty families living next to the lagoon’. They pointed out that their expulsion from the land was imminent. In that light the HRC could have used provisional measures, but apparently it did not.¹⁴³

HRC did express concern about ‘ongoing discrimination against aboriginal women’. In its Concluding Observations to Canada’s Fourth Periodic Report it noted that the amendment to the Indian Act ‘affects only the woman and her children, not subsequent generations, which may still be denied membership in the Community’, CCPR/C/79/Add.105, §19. In 2006 the HRC observed in its Concluding Observations ‘that balancing collective and individual interests on reserves to the sole detriment of women is not compatible with the Covenant’ (Articles 2, 3, 26 and 27). CCPR/C/CAN/CO/5, 20 April 2006, §22. Still, this is not the type of situation that would warrant provisional measures by the Committee because the legislation and acts of implementation would have results that could indeed be reversed. Measures that are reversible cannot be irreparable.

¹⁴⁰ HRC J.G.A. Diergaardt (late Captain of the Rehoboth Baster Community) et al. v. Namibia, 25 July 2000, §3.7.

¹⁴¹ It found that there had been no violation of Article 27. “This conclusion is based on Committee’s assessment of the relationship between the authors’ way of life and the lands covered by their claims. Although the link of the Rehoboth Community to the lands in question dates back some 125 years, it is not the result of a relationship that would have given rise to a distinctive culture. Furthermore, although the Rehoboth Community bears distinctive properties as to the historical forms of self-government, the authors have failed to demonstrate how these factors would be based on their way of raising cattle”. Diergaardt et al. v. Namibia, 25 July 2000, §10.6. The concurring opinion of Evatt and Medina Quiroga more closely addresses the question when land rights may be based on Article 27 ICCPR. They point out that the claim did not draw the protection of this article because it was essentially economic rather than cultural. They note that the petitioners had ‘defined their culture almost solely in terms of economic activity of grazing cattle’. “They cannot show that they enjoy a distinct culture which is intimately bound up with or dependent on the use of these particular lands, to which they moved a little over a century ago, or that the diminution of their access to the lands has undermined any such culture”.

¹⁴² HRC Hopu and Bessert v. France, 29 July 1997.

¹⁴³ The View was published during the period the HRC did not mention the use of provisional measures. Unfortunately, in March/April 2003 and August 2003 the file of this case was not available in Geneva. It appears from telephone contacts between F. de Vries and counsel for the

The most important legal issue arising from Hopu and Bessert (1997) is the question whether and how the HRC may use provisional measures to protect the culture of indigenous peoples when Article 27 ICCPR cannot be invoked. Upon accession to the ICCPR France declared that in light of its constitution Article 27 ICCPR was not applicable.¹⁴⁴ In a previous case dating from 1989 the HRC determined that the French ‘declaration’ was in fact a reservation.¹⁴⁵ petitioners Lestourneaud (Thonon) and Roux (Montpellier) on 11 November 2003 that provisional measures had not been taken. Avocat Roux confirmed this by letter of 10 December 2003 (on file with the author).

¹⁴⁴ No other States parties objected to this declaration, although the Federal Republic of Germany declared that it interpreted the French declaration to mean that the French constitution already fully guaranteed the individual rights protected by Article 27. CCPR/C/2/Rev. 3 as referred to in Nowak (1993), p. 486. Horn (1988), p. 238 points out that ‘reservations and declarations form completely distinct categories of acts due to their different functions’. ‘A reservation affects the norm- an interpretative declaration operates on the norm’s formulation; their objects are distinct’. Lijnzaad (1994), p. 61 notes: ‘The interpretative declaration is an opinion as to how a provision ought to be understood. It is nothing more than a unilateral statement addressed to other states parties and to possible supervisory organs. While the declaration itself has no direct legal effect, either for its author or the other states parties, its aim is obviously to arouse support for the interpretation proposed’. She acknowledges, however, that the distinctions are not always as clear as that. Sometimes the purpose of the State is to condition its acceptance of the treaty not only with its reservations but also with its declarations. Scholars have made a distinction between ‘qualified interpretative declarations’ and ‘mere interpretative declarations’. In relation to the first, once an authoritative determination is made about the meaning of a provision and this interpretation conflicts with the declaration, the declaration turns into a reservation (see references in Lijnzaad (1995), pp. 61-62). She also refers to the judgment of the European Court on Human Rights in the case Belilos v. Switzerland, 29 April 1988. In light of, among others, the lack of transparency in the distinction of the two types of interpretative declarations suggested, Lijnzaad argues that declarations should not have the legal effect of a reservation. ‘Basically a declaration cannot exclude or restrict the legal effect of provisions of the treaty. It should be understood that in cases where a state wishes to exclude or restrict the legal effects of a treaty, an interpretative declaration cannot be used’. (Lijnzaad (1995), p. 65).

¹⁴⁵ See HRC M.K. v. France, 8 November 1989 (inadm.) and T.K. v. France, 8 November 1989 (inadm.). It referred to Article 2(1)(d) of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties. It is doubtful, however, whether it should be the State’s assumed intent rather than the text of the declaration that should be determinative. The text seems to simply observe that the State considered Article 27 irrelevant or inapplicable because the French Constitution provides equality of all citizens before the law without distinction as to origin, race or religion. In French doctrine the latter means that distinctions between citizens on the basis of origin, race or religion are prohibited which, in turn, means that there are no minorities in France. This is also what Higgins pointed out in her dissenting opinion on this issue in 1989. She considered the French notification of Article 27 a declaration and not a reservation. She emphasised that France had submitted both reservations and interpretative declarations when it ratified the Covenant in January 1982. In that light there was ‘no reason to suppose that the contrast in use, in different paragraphs, of the phrase ‘reservation’ and ‘declaration’ was not entirely deliberate, with its legal consequence well understood by the Government of the Republic’. Given this distinction it was ‘ultimately for the Committee to see if the interpretation of the French Government accords with its own’. The HRC had emphasised that the existence of minorities in no way constituted an admission of discrimination. The existence of minorities in the sense of Article 27, she noted in reference to HRC statements, was a factual matter. In its Concluding Observations to the French report, CCPR/C/79/Add. 80, §24 the HRC concluded that it was unable to agree that France was a country in which there are no minorities. It pointed out that ‘the mere fact that equal rights are granted to all individuals and that all individuals are equal before the law does not preclude the Scheinin has pointed out that even if this were correct, in light of the Committee's General Comment this 'reservation' could be considered contrary to the object and the purpose of the Convention.¹⁴⁶ Yet in its admissibility decision (1994) the HRC confirmed its previous case law that the French 'declaration' on Article 27 operated as a reservation. This meant it could not consider complaints against France under that article. Instead it would consider the claim under Articles 14, 17 and 23 ICCPR (family life and privacy).¹⁴⁷

Apart from the fact that the ICCPR includes a specific article on the right to culture while the ECHR does not, Article 8 ECHR refers to the right of everyone to respect for his 'private and family life'. Article 17 ICCPR prohibits arbitrary or unlawful interference with one's privacy, family, home or correspondence. Article 8 ECHR may thus have a wider scope of application. Indeed, prior to the HRC in Hopu the European Commission on Human Rights already acknowledged the possibility of applying the right of private and family life and the home (Art. 8 ECHR) in relation to threats to indigenous land. In G. and E. v. Norway (1993),¹⁴⁸ it noted 'a minority group is, in principle, entitled to claim the right to respect for the particular life style it may lead as being "private life", "family life" or "home"'.¹⁴⁹

The Bosnia Chamber has also accepted that the authorities' order for the exhumation of the petitioner's late wife from the family plot was so closely related to his private and family life that it came within the ambit of Article 8 ECHR.¹⁵⁰ Moreover, in another case, in which it referred as existence in fact of minorities in a country'. As Thornberry (2002), p. 154 notes 'to conclude otherwise would be to accept the argument that a group is created by the prejudices of others-including prejudicial legislation-and that a State has sole authority to make decisions on group existence'.

¹⁴⁶ Scheinin (2000), p. 218, referring to the General Comment 24 on reservations to the ICCPR or the Optional Protocols, 4 November 1994. One might add that denying the existence of minorities could result in a denial of the right to equality in the sense that this right encompasses the right to be different and to express this difference in community with others. It also noteworthy that the HRC pointed out in its General Comment 23 on the right to culture (Article 27), 6 April 1994, the HRC pointed out that '(s)ome States parties who claimed that they do not discriminate on grounds of ethnicity, language or religion, wrongly contend, on that basis alone, that they have no minorities', §4.

¹⁴⁷ Five members of the HRC considered that it should have declared admissible the Article 27 claim in Hopu. Rather than arguing to overrule the aforementioned 1989 decision on the French declaration, they made a distinction between the applicability of the French declaration in metropolitan France and in overseas territories. Apparently during the discussion they attempted to re-open the issue of admissibility of the claim. They noted that, after the Committee's decision not to do so, 'we are able to associate ourselves with the Committee's views on the remaining aspects of the communication'. Partly dissenting opinion by Evatt, Medina Quiroga, Pocar, Scheinin and Yalden in Hopu and Bessert v. France, 29 July 1997. Yet the HRC did not re-open the discussion on the admissibility of the Article 27 claim because the Committee's earlier decision in this respect had been phrased in general terms. It could have considered that it had been the State party that had requested a review of the earlier admissibility decision and that this re-opened not only the discussion of those claims declared admissible but also of those declared inadmissible. After all the HRC did in fact amend its admissibility decision to include a claim based on Article 26 ICCPR.

¹⁴⁸ EComHR G. and E. v. Norway, 3 October 1993, p. 35.

¹⁴⁹ Ibid. It did not find a violation, however, as it considered that the building of a water dam and a hydro-electric power station, while it did interfere with the private life and traditional activities of the Sami, was justified, among others, in the interest of the economic well-being of the country (p. 36). The Commission took a quantitative approach, finding that the interference was limited to the loss of a piece of land that was comparatively small.

¹⁵⁰ Bosnia Chamber Mahmutović v. Republika Srpska, 8 October 1999, §84.

well to the HRC's decision in Hopu, it considered that the petitioner's complaint equally fell within the ambit of Article 8, considering that the graveyard in question had been the graveyard of his family for many generations and that his mother was buried there in 1991.¹⁵¹

The petitioners in Hopu had claimed that the construction of the hotel complex would 'destroy their ancestral burial grounds, which represent an important place in their history, culture and life, would arbitrarily interfere with their privacy and their family life, in violation of articles 17 and 23'.¹⁵² The HRC indeed concluded that the construction of a hotel complex on their ancestral burial grounds interfered with their right to family life and privacy. Nothing in the information before it showed that the State party duly took into account the importance of the burial grounds for the petitioners when it decided to lease the site. The State had not shown that the interference with the petitioners' rights was reasonable in the circumstances and the petitioners were entitled to an appropriate remedy.¹⁵³ The Committee did not refer to the complaint on the threat to their traditional means of subsistence. Clearly this could not be linked to the right to family life and privacy, but only to the inapplicable Article 27 ICCPR.

Both the dissenting opinion on the inadmissibility of the Article 27 claim and the dissenting opinion on the finding of a violation of Articles 17 and 23 seem to consider that, had the Committee been able to deal with the Article 27 claim, it would have found a violation. It is clear that building a hotel complex on the ancestral burial grounds of the petitioners would be a threat to the existence and cultural integrity of the ethnic Polynesians.

Nevertheless, the Committee members differed in their view on the existence of a violation of Articles 17 and 23 ICCPR. The four dissenters who would not have found a violation of those articles noted that 'even when the term "family" is extended, it does have a discrete meaning'.¹⁵⁴ The petitioners had 'provided no evidence that the burial ground is one that is connected to their family, rather than to the whole of the indigenous population in the area'.¹⁵⁵ The values to be protected were not family or privacy but cultural values. They shared the concern for these values, but repeated that they were protected under Article 27 and not 17 or 23 ICCPR. In relation to the notion of privacy they pointed out that it 'revolves around protection of those aspects of a person's life, or relationships with others, which one chooses to keep from the public eye, or from outside intrusion'.¹⁵⁶ Interference with participation and public worship or cultural activities that play important roles in the identities of persons in different societies, they noted, may indeed cause violations of Articles 18 (freedom of religion) and 27 ICCPR. It would be interesting, in that sense, to know what position the dissenters would have taken had the petitioners claimed a violation of the freedom of religion (Article 18).¹⁵⁷ The four dissenters in Hopu regretted that the ¹⁵¹ Bosnia Chamber Čengić v. BiH and Srpska, 5 September 2003, §103.

¹⁵² HRC Hopu and Bessert v. France, 29 July 1997, §10.3.

¹⁵³ The Committee did not specify what this remedy would entail. The State was under an obligation to protect their rights effectively and to ensure that similar violations did not occur in the future.

¹⁵⁴ HRC Hopu and Bessert v. France, 29 July 1997, dissenting opinion Buergenthal, Kretzmer, Ando and Colville.

¹⁵⁵ Ibid.

¹⁵⁶ But see HRC Coeriel and Aurik v. the Netherlands, 31 October 1994. In this case the HRC considered that 'the notion of privacy refers to the sphere of a person's life in which he or she can freely express his or her identity, be it by entering into relationship with others or alone'. It considered that 'a person's surname constitutes an important component of one's identity', §10.2. This meant that the privacy rights in Article 17 included the protection against arbitrary or unlawful interference with the right to choose and change one's own name. This shows that the HRC also considers part of the right to privacy those expressions of identity which one does not choose to keep from the public eye.

¹⁵⁷ In HRC Vakoumé and 28 other persons v. France, 31 October 2000 (inadm.) the petitioners indeed did so. However, the HRC declared this case inadmissible for non-exhaustion.

Committee was prevented from applying Article 27. They expressed their concern with ‘the failure of the State party to respect a site that has obvious importance in the cultural heritage of the indigenous population of French Polynesia’. Yet they believed, ‘that this concern does not justify distorting the meaning of the terms family and privacy beyond their ordinary and generally accepted meaning’.¹⁵⁸ Nevertheless, the majority in Hopu and Bessert considered that Arts 17 and 23 ICCPR had indeed been violated.

It is important to examine whether provisional measures could be used in similar situations if the HRC maintains its approach towards the French declaration. In Vakoumé v. France (inadm. 2000)¹⁵⁹ a company had similarly begun construction of a hotel complex. The 29 petitioners were members of the Touété tribe on the Isle of Pines in Southern New Caledonia. They claimed that ‘the site on which the complex was built was one of special significance for their history, culture and life’. The Rapporteur did not use provisional measures, most likely because the complex had already (partially) been built when the petitioners submitted their complaint.¹⁶⁰ He may have considered it too far reaching to request restoration of the status quo, as part of provisional measures, rather than as part of a decision on reparations.¹⁶¹

The petitioners, on the other hand, are likely to have hoped that the HRC would request the State, pending the proceedings, to demolish the hotel and restore the status quo. While it is indeed possible to order the return to the situation quo ante as part of a provisional measure, this normally concerns the freedom or the legal status of an individual. In a complex situation involving economic constructions and the right to cultural survival, it is preferable to reserve such recommendations for the final determination of the case. Moreover, to the extent demolition of the hotel would redress the violation (an would be considered as a possible form of reparation), the request for provisional measures concerned a situation that was reversible.¹⁶²

Another reason for not using provisional measures upon receipt of the initial complaint may have been the French declaration on Article 27 ICCPR, as discussed in Hopu and Bessert. The petitioners claimed violations of Articles 17(1), 18 and 23(1) ICCPR instead. In so far as they based their complaint on interference of their privacy and family life, similar issues arose as in Hopu and Bessert. In relation to Articles 17(1) and 23 they declared that the ‘Baie d’Oro is an important part of their natural, historical and cultural heritage. Ancestral burial grounds are to be found on the site, which is also the source of legends forming part of the heritage and collective ¹⁵⁸ HRC Hopu and Bessert v. France, 29 July 1997, dissenting opinion Buergenthal, Kretzmer, Ando and Colville.

¹⁵⁹ HRC Vakoumé and 28 other persons v. France, 31 October 2000 (inadm.).

¹⁶⁰ The View only mentions the petitioners’ request for provisional measures and the fact that the Special Rapporteur did not grant these. It does not indicate when and how he responded to this request.

¹⁶¹ The initial submission was of March 1998, when the company involved had already begun construction of the hotel complex. The complex was inaugurated in November 1998 and has since been operational. The View does not indicate when the Rapporteur registered the case. This means it is not clear whether he did so when the complex had not yet been completed or when it already had.

¹⁶² In a way, the request for provisional measures may have been too late. At the same time, the HRC indicated that the complaint itself was too early because domestic remedies had not been exhausted. It may be, therefore, that the Rapporteur would not have used provisional measures either if they had been in time to halt construction of the hotel. In light of the inadmissibility decision, the Rapporteur may have reasoned that the domestic proceedings did have suspensive effect even though they did not in fact halt this construction. Such reasoning, however, would not be convincing in all cases because the procedural possibility of suspensive effect does not guarantee that a domestic court interprets the risk of irreparable harm in the way required by the ICCPR.

memory of the Isle of Pines'.¹⁶³ The difference with Hopu is, however, that the petitioners also claimed interference with their freedom to manifest their religion or beliefs in worship (Article 18). Indeed the HRC could have resorted to Article 18 in this case, with the advantage that a more obvious link might be established (with some specification) between the protection of sacred indigenous burial sites and the right to have and manifest one's religion in community with others, than the link between the protection of these sites and the right to family life and privacy.¹⁶⁴ The collective aspect of this right, moreover, can also be found in the text of the article.¹⁶⁵ The petitioners had claimed that they 'like all Melanesians, live in a natural environment founded on a network of ties to their parents, their families and their dead. Veneration of the dead is a manifestation of religion and tradition inherent in their lifestyle, beliefs and culture'.¹⁶⁶ Yet the View referred to the petitioners' request for the use of provisional measures without mentioning their resort to Article 18 ICCPR. It is possible that the petitioners invoked this article only at a later stage and the HRC did not consider it.¹⁶⁷ In any case the HRC only noted that the petitioners ¹⁶³ HRC Vakoumé and 28 other persons v. France, 31 October 2000 (inadm.), §3.4.

¹⁶⁴ The UN and Inter-American draft declarations on indigenous peoples reaffirm, as Kingsbury phrases it, 'historically-grounded and culturally grounded entitlements and responsibilities with regard to natural resources, religious sites, and spiritual or guardianship relationships with particular land, water, mountains, etc.; (...) duties in relation to ancestors and future generations; continuance of certain kinds of economic practices; and perhaps entitlements and responsibilities in relation to traditional knowledge'. Kingsbury (2001), pp. 239-240. Articles 18 and 27 could assist in protecting religious sites and duties in relation to ancestors, for instance. However, Article 27 is the only article in the Covenant that could be of use to protect certain kinds of economic practices.

¹⁶⁵ Nowak notes that this article expressly emphasises this right as both an individual and collective right ('individually or in community with others') while Article 27 does not include a reference to 'individually'. "This means that individual enjoyment of a minority culture, individual profession to the religion of a minority and the individual use of a minority language are not protected". The individual right, he considers, is that of enforcement of the collective right. This statement may be correct at least with regard to the Committee's use of provisional measures. Nowak (1993), p. 499.

¹⁶⁶ HRC Vakoumé and 28 other persons v. France, 31 October 2000 (inadm.), §3.6.

¹⁶⁷ Yet another reason why the Rapporteur may have decided not to use provisional measures, once he had already decided to await the State party's comments, may be lack of prima facie evidence of irreparable harm. The State party only responded in December 1998, when the hotel complex was already in operation. It considered that the case should be declared inadmissible for non-exhaustion of domestic remedies. The petitioners responded in April 1999. They pointed out that all domestic remedies they had invoked to prevent construction and inauguration of the hotel complex had proved ineffective and futile. One of the decisions the HRC referred to in its description of the domestic proceedings is that of the Nouméa Administrative Tribunal of 4 June 1998 authorising the work to continue. It found that the construction did not violate the rights of the petitioners under the ICCPR 'because it had not been proved that the hotel was to be placed on a site where ancestral tombs were located and because the representatives of the tribe had given their consent for the construction'. Under the heading 'facts and proceedings as they emerge from statements by the authors and from the evidence submitted' the HRC noted that the representatives of the Touété tribe participated in the project for the creation of the hotel complex, except for the 29 petitioners. The South Province of New Caledonia would provide the tribe for a 66 percent holding in the company owning the prospective complex. The representatives (with the exception of the petitioners) provided the company with the usufruct, for a period of 25 years, of the land needed for the construction. The petitioners did not take part in this agreement and claimed to have rights to the plots of land in question. Hypothetically the issue of consultation, representation and participation could have played a role in the decision not to use provisional measures, to the extent that the information raised some doubts about the claimed ‘that the site on which the complex was built was one of special significance for their history, culture and life’.¹⁶⁸

